 “ in Rome close or secure enough to confine

“ this dangerous, detestable rebel, in whose “ single person all the hopes of the Conspi“ rators centered?” — What a plausible ar“ gument might such an Advocate as Cicero “ have formed, in extenuation at least of the “ crime of Catiline’s conspiracy against the SE-“ NATE, from the SENATE’S conspiracy against “ him, plainly discovered by their refusing him “ a fair trial, even when he offered his person as “ security for his standing it!

Cicero’s English Historian makes the following Apology for this part of his conduct:

“ It will seem strange to some, that Cicero, Midd.
 “ when he had certain information of Cati- p. 189.
 “ line’s treason, instead of seizing him in the “ City, not only suffered but urged his escape,
 “ and forced him as it were to begin the war.
 “ But there was good reason for what he did,
 “ as he frequently intimates in his speeches:
 “ He had many enemies among the nobility,
 “ and Catiline many secret friends; and tho’
 “ he was perfectly informed of the whole pro“ gress and extent of the plot, yet, the proofs “ being not ready to be laid before the Pub“ lic, Catiline’s dissimulation still prevailed,
 “ and persuaded great numbers of his inno“ cence; so that if he had imprisoned and pu“ nished him at this time, as he deserved, the “ whole faction were ready to raise a general “ clamour against him, by representing his “ administration as a Tyranny, and the plot as a “ forgery contrived to support it: Whereas, by “ driving Catiline into rebellion, he made all “ men see the reality of their danger, while,
 “ from an exact account of his troops, he “ knew them to be so unequal to those of the “ Republic, that there was no doubt of his “ being destroyed, if he could be pushed to the “ necessity of declaring himself before his other “ projects were ripe for execution. He knew “ also, that, if Catiline was once driven out of “ the City, and separated from his accom“ plices, who were lazy, drunken, thoughtless “ crew, they would ruin themselves by their “ own rashness, and be easily drawn into any “ trap which he should lay for them: The event “ shewed that he judged right; and by what “ happened afterwards, both to Catiline and “ to himself, it appeared, that, as far as hu“ man caution could reach, he acted with the ut“ most prudence, in regard as well to his own as “ to the public safety.” Surely, if we are to judge by the EVENT, this shewed just the contrary of what is here said; it shewed that Cicero

cero acted with the utmost imprudence, in regard to the safety of the Public; so many brave Romans, as fell in the consequent battle, being sacrificed wholly to his unreasonable and cowardly fears for his own person.

But let us attend to the Laureat's observations :

Cibb. 52.

" This confident offer of Catiline, with his
" impudence of coming afterwards to the " Capitol, while under such an accusation,
" so provoked the Consul, that he broke out
" into a most severe invective against him, and
" with all the fire and force of an incensed
" Eloquence, laid open the whole course of his
" treasons, and the notoriety of his villainies.

Middl.

177.

" This we must have allowed him to have " done in all the strongest colours that could " paint the crime, or the criminal, as an ob" ject of danger, terror, and detestation. But " still, without some evidence of the facts al" leged, in what was this flaming elo" quence to avail against Catiline? Could it " have any greater force than an indictment
" well opened against him, which passes for
" no more than a mere fine speech till the " allegations of it are proved? Or, if it was " necessary to make Catiline odious before " he was condemned, would he have been " less odious from evidence than from a bare
" invective accusation? Or, if his evidence " was not judicially prepared, why was Ci" cero so forward with his accusation?"

It may likewise be asked, With what appearance of reason could the Senate take so dangerous and illegal a step as to arm the Consuls with despotic Power, if they had not evidence of this plot sufficient to convict Catiline? and, if they had, what occasion could there be to grant such a commission to the Magistrates, against a man, whose liberty, and even life, was absolutely in their power?

Cibb. 53.

The Laureat observes that Cicero, though, in virtue of the Senate's decree, he might have taken away the life of Catiline, by an executioner, thought the best way of dispatching him was to talk him into his own destruction. " He exhorts, urges, and commands him
" to depart, and, if he would be advised by him,
" to go into a voluntary exile, and free them
" from their fears, &c. — Or, if he would " not go into exile, to go, at least, where he " was expected, into Manlius's camp, and be" gin in war.

Middl.

179.

And then—what was to become of him?

" Why there, says he, he might riot and exult Cibb. 54,
" at his full ease, without the mortification 55.

" of seeing one honest man about him —
" There he might practise all that discipline to " which he had been trained, of lying upon the " ground, not only in the pursuit of his amours,
" but of bold and hardy enterprises; there he
" might exert all that boasted patience of hun" ger, cold, and want — by which, how" ever, he would shortly find himself — un" done.

" Anon we shall see whether Cicero or for" tune had the greater share in his ruin;
" but, as the case yet stands, does not that
" martial patience of those hardships Cicero
" seems to upbraid him with, shew Catiline
" more a formidable than a contemptible
" enemy? and was that a reason for rather
" defying him to the field than condemning
" him to the scaffold? — Cicero himself is " not so sure of this expedient, but that he " confesses it needs an apology; for, after " his imagining what would be and owning
" what had been said against it without doors
" he says —

" To this most sacred voice of my Country I Middl.
" shall make this short answer, that if I had 180.

" thought it the most adviseable to put Catiline
" to death, I would not have allowed that " Gladiator the use of one moment's life. (Hi" therto he only supposes it not adviseable, yet
" proceeds to give instances where death in " the like case had been adviseable.) If in " former days, says he, our most illustrious Ci" tizens, instead of sullying, have done honour
" to their memories by the destruction of Satur" ninus, the Gracchi, Flaccus, and many " others, there is no ground to fear, that, by " killing this Parricide, any envy should lie upon " me with posterity. (Such memorable prece-
" dents therefore might have justified his seve" rity, though he had no equal examples to " excuse his lenity.) Yet, if the greatest envy
" was sure to befall me, it was always my per" suasion, that envy, acquired by virtue, was " really glory, not envy.

" If these were his real sentiments, how Cibb. 56.
" came his natural passion for glory so coolly to " abandon him, as not to seize this laudable
" occasion of advancing it, by following the " practice of the afore-cited illustrious Citi" zens, in making the immediate death of " Catiline an emulous proof of his [own]
" justice and virtue?

" But

Modd.
181.

“ But, as if he had been asked this question,
 “ he further accounts for his conduct by de“ claring, That, even in the Senate, “ There are some, who either do not see the “ dangers that hang over us, or dissemble what “ they see, who, by the softness of their votes, “ cherish Catiline's hopes, and add strength to “ the conspiracy by not believing it.— Whose “ authority influences many, not only of the “ wicked, but the weak: Who, if I had pu- “ nished this man as he deserved, would not “ have failed to cry out upon me for acting the “ Tyrant.— Now I am persuaded, that,
 “ when he is once gone into Manlius's camp, “ whither he actually designs to go, none can be “ so silly as not to see there is a plot, none so “ wicked as not to acknowledge it; whereas,
 “ by taking him off alone, though this pestilence “ should be somewhat checked, it could not be “ suppressed.

Cibb. 58.

“ And, therefore, to make it a moot point
 “ whether Catiline should not suppress the Re“ public, he sends him to an army that ex“ pected him, and to which army, if he had “ had no hopes of success, he would never “ have gone. Or if Cicero knew Catiline, to “ be rash, yet rashness does not always end in “ ruin. However, Cicero, not liking the “ face of a traitor so near him, judged, that “ this snare of his escape would be a surer way
 “ to secure him; for, when once his open re“ bellion became an evidence of the conspi“ racy, it must be believed with a vengeance.
 “ The evidence indeed must be allowed to be “ pretty strong; but that Cicero's so far as“ sisting the rebellion was the wisest way of “ coming at a proof of the conspiracy, seems “ to be a depth in politics not easily to be “ fathomed. To leave open the gates of a “ town, to see if the army of an enemy “ would have the impudence to enter it, “ would be a strange way of destroying an “ enemy. Catiline in Rome might have been “ no more than a lion in the toil; but if Ci- “ cero turned him loose, only, like a bag-fox, “ to catch him again—shall we call it the “ glory or the sport of a statesman? —
 “ But not to lose the respect due to Cicero, “ let us, before we observe upon the conse“ quences of his letting Catiline escape, see “ how they both in the Senate take leave of “ one another.

“ Cicero, having so eloquently exposed
 “ and blackened him, turns to Catiline

“ with an air of security, and thus confounds “ him :

“ With these omens, Catiline, of all prospe- “ rity to the Public, but of destruction to thyself,
 “ and all those who have joined themselves “ with thee in all kinds of parricide, go thy “ way into this impious and abominable war.

“ That is — now I have shewn the “ world how rank and filthy a traitor you “ are, I scorn to foul my fingers with you;
 “ therefore get out, go, troop to the open “ field, and there — punish yourself.

“ Catiline, astonished at the thunder of this “ speech, with down-cast looks and suppliant “ voice, begged of the Fathers not to believe too “ hastily what was said against him by an “ enemy, &c. but, as he was going on to give “ foul-language, the Senate interrupted him, “ calling him traitor and parricide!

“ So far, at least, Cicero had the Senate's “ voice to support him against whatever “ fears or apprehensions the fierceness of “ Catiline or his adherents might have raised “ in him; but Catiline was so stung with “ the Senate's disclaiming him, that, to their “ teeth, he defied them all in this remarkable “ manner :

“ That since he was circumvented, and driven “ headlong by his enemies, he would quench the “ flame which was raised about him by the com- “ mon ruin; and so rushed out of the As- “ sembly.

“ So uncommon an event in History can“ not, sure, but raise the astonishment of an at“ tentive Reader! What a confused idea does “ this leave us of the Roman Government!
 “ that such an audacious spirit, after so out“ rageous a menace to a full Senate, should,
 “ without let or molestation, be turned loose
 “ to put his wickedness in practice! Sure such “ enormous licences could not be deemed a “ right among their boasted sweets of Liberty?
 “ Was their Public Safety of an inferior consi“ deration to the life or confinement of a free“ born Conspirator? Or (if this supposition is “ too strong) could it still be a breach of Privi“ lege, if some honest Patriot had taken Ca- “ tiline by the throat, and brought him back “ to their resentment and justice? If Catiline, “ after such a declaration, found his way open
 “ to Manlius's camp, how shall we reconcile
 “ this tameness of the Senate to common“ sense or policy? Shall we take from them “ all capacity or cognizance of government?

“ call

“ call them no longer Fathers of their Coun“ try, but rather sons of anarchy, without re“ gard of duty, dignity of rank, or spirit? Or “ can all this artful Lenity of Cicero be recon“ ciled with (or refined into) the profound “ policy of a Consul, to whose hands (by an “ express cautionary decree of the Senate “ against this very man) the Public Safety “ was committed?

“ Indeed the dignity of a National Justice “ seems to be but very ill maintained, when “ she rather chuses to call her criminals out to “ the Combat than to her Tribunal. It would “ be very odd to see a Lord Chief Justice turn “ Champion, and, instead of passing sentence “ upon a Traitor, offer him the satisfaction “ of a Gentleman.

62. “ What might have been the consequence “ of the measures taken by Cicero, let us judge
 “ from the opinion of Sallust.

“ Now suppose (says he) Catiline had con“ quered in the first engagement, or had even re“ tired with loss, surely very tragical calamities “ must have overwhelmed the Commonwealth; “ nor would the conquerors have been suffered to “ enjoy their victory long, since, when they were “ weakened and exhausted, whoever had supe“ rior power would have seized the government,
 “ and oppressed the Public Liberty.

“ If this has any weight, could their have “ been more danger in seizing Catiline than in “ letting him go? But, to set aside these ima“ ginary consequences, let us attend to what “ really followed upon Catiline's being so elo-“ quently driven from Rome.

“ Cicero, the next day, to unite the various “ sentiments of the People into an approba“ tion of his conduct in the Senate, calls them “ together in the Forum, where he recounts
 “ the whole transaction, with chiefly the same “ arguments, that had induced him to the “ measures he had taken: But as this point “ has been already observed upon, let it pass “ without further notice, than that here, in “ the secure joy of his heart, (p. 185.) Cicero “ seems almost ludicrously to triumph over
 “ the rest of the Conspirators yet remaining “ in Rome. After describing their profligate “ lives and conversations, he declares it in“ sufferably impudent for such men to pretend to “ plot, &c.—What could it avail in his “ justification of letting Catiline go, to tell the “ People, in the most eloquent language, that “ all his accomplices were a company of fops
 “ and blockheads? He first tells the SENATE,
 VOL. III.

“ that those who had deserted Catiline's army,
 “ and staid behind, were more to be dreaded than
 “ the army itself; and then tells the PEOPLE, “ that those very accomplices were a lazy, “ drunken, thoughtless crew, who he knew
 “ would ruin themselves. Which of these in- 63.

“ consistent assertions (says the Laureate) are “ we to suppose could be true? and from what “ part of the Roman History does it appear,
 “ that to delay the death of Catiline “ was the “ most glorious way of crushing the Conspira“ cy?” “ If Catiline, as Cicero owns, was the 66.
 “ life and soul of the Conspiracy, why would “ Cicero (with such public danger) prolong the “ life of it? How many hours could the Con“ spiracy have lived when the head was off?
 “ Whatever danger arose from the singularity
 “ of Cicero's expedient, he was answerable “ for; and how dear the suspended punish“ ment of this fierce offender was afterwards “ bought, Sallust seems to tell us with a sigh, 64.
 “ in his account of the honest lives it cost to “ defeat him, viz.

“ The victory, indeed, fell to the Common“ wealth, but was accompanied with bloodshed “ enough to check their joy, since the bravest “ among them were either killed in the fight, or “ left it grievously wounded. Nay, as there “ were many that visited the field, whether for “ curiosity or spoil, and turned over the carcases “ of the rebels, some discovered a friend, some a “ kinsman, others a guest; some too there found “ their particular enemies; so that through the “ whole army was seen a various display of con“ trary passions, gladness and sorrow, mourning
 “ and rejoicing. [Gordon's Translation.] Such “ was the consequence of Cicero's lenity.

“ But, notwithstanding this expence of ci“ vil blood, the Conspiracy at last was sup“ pressed, and Cicero had the glory of it. And “ if the expence had been less, might not the “ glory have been greater? But if, at such a “ time, nothing was thought too much for “ their Preserver, it is not to be wondered at;
 “ a people so transported for their deliverance “ seldom repine at the price of it; joy is too “ generous a passion to look into the dry ac“ counts of dangers past, and payments in “ praise cost little to make; but posterity, who “ have not the same passions to blind them,
 “ may think it more amusement than trouble
 “ to see the balance set right, before they pay
 “ in to Cicero the applause he demands for it.
 “ Let us enquire then how much of that praise
 “ was — demonstrably due to Fortune.”

Vid. supra. The Laureate observes, "that it was the
 p. 358. "work of fortune, not of Cicero, that the All. 1. c. 1. "lobrogian Deputies kept not their faith with
 l. 1. c. 1. "the Roman Conspirators." Indeed Cicero himself, as we have seen, disclaims all merit in this particular: *That the Ambassadors of a nation so disaffected, and so able and willing to make war upon us, should fight the hopes of dominion—must needs be the effect of a divine interposition. And if it afterwards cost so much blood to vanquish Catiline, unassisted by the Allobroges, what calamities might not have ensued, had his army been strengthened by such able and willing auxiliaries? The extraordinary joy of Cicero, and of the whole People of Rome, on occasion of the Deputies disclosing the secret engagements they had entered into, and turning evidence against the Conspirators, shewed plainly that a great danger was thought to have been escaped by that discovery. "And what brought the Public
 "into such danger (says the Laureate) but the "refined policy of Cicero?"*

See M. l. d. Add to all this, that Cicero's colleague An-
 p. 118. tonius, who is said to have been embarked in the
 p. 224. same cause with Catiline, and to have had no inclination to fight with him, and in whom Catiline, to the last, had hopes, that, out of regard to their former engagements, he would contrive some way of throwing the victory into his hands, was invested with the same despotic authority, in virtue of which Cicero took upon him to dispense with the laws. What dependance could Cicero reasonably have upon a man so wicked and infamous as Antonius?
 What security that he would act conformably to the purpose of his commission, and not betray his constituents to his old friend and companion? And, in that case, how fatal might have been the consequence!

To what hidden cause then are we to impute
 the surprizing conduct of Cicero in suffering, nay, in forcing Catiline to leave Rome, and go to Manlius's camp? The Consul gives the Senate a hint, that a secret reason had withheld him from taking away the life of that Traitor; and presently after seems to blab the secret, "That it was his apprehension of the "clamours which such severity might have "raised. *If men are so perverse as to complain "of Catiline's being driven away, what would
 "they have said, if he had been put to death?*
 "—Why, a great deal more, perhaps,
 "(answers the Laureate,) but, when the dis-
 "affected had said their worst, honest men

"would, at least, have had this to say, *That,
 "had he been put to death in the City, he could "never have faced them in the Field, or have "killed so many of his Fellow-citizens at the "head of an army."*

The Laureate, in his observations upon this transaction, supposes all along that the Consul, at the time when he drove Catiline out of the City, could legally have taken away his life, and ought to have done it; and this is supposed to be true, because Cicero says it. But Cæsar and the popular party in the Senate were not of this opinion: And it is very evident from Cicero's apprehension of clamours, that he did not think he could justify the putting Catiline to death, without a previous trial and condemnation by the People.

But how shall we account for his not seizing
 the Traitor, and keeping him in close custody
 till he could be brought to justice in due form?
 For my own part, I verily believe, that the heroic Consul spoke from his heart, when he said, he should always think himself in danger while in the same City with Catiline; and that this cowardly fear was the true reason of his rejecting the Conspirator's offer of becoming his prisoner. Nor can I any way account, but by the like fear, for his hasty execution of Lentu-lus and the other accomplices of Catiline's treason: For, as he had such indisputable proofs of their guilt, even their own confession, and there was such an universal dread and detestation of them in the City, what doubt could remain of the People's given sentence against them after a fair and open trial? But Cicero, knowing that to kill him was one of their principle objects, could not think himself safe a single hour while they were alive.

So much for the HIGH CAPACITY and HIGH COURAGE with which Cicero is said to have saved the Public.

His real merit in this affair was, doubtless, very considerable. The Conspirators had projected the setting fire to the City in several places at the same time, in order to facilitate the massacre of those whom they had destined to destruction; probably the greater part of the Senate; many of the other rich Citizens, whose wealth they coveted; their creditors especially; and all their personal enemies.
 Cicero, remarkably fortunate, in receiving intelligence of these things, first from a harlot, and then from the Allobrogian Deputies, made a skilful use of the information, and by his assiduity and provident care, effectually defeated

feated the mischievous plot, so far as it regarded the fire and the massacre. Otherwise, it is likely, there would have been a scene of blood and desolation resembling that in the time of Sylla's victory; whose cut-throats and their creatures, the honesti, would now, in their turn, have had their throats cut: 'till indeed would not have been much to the detriment of the State; but then, with those banditti, many innocent persons would have been murdered, and a great number of industrious artificers and shopkeepers totally ruined by the conflagration: The City therefore, in general, became greatly obliged to the Consul for his timely seizing and securing the persons of the Conspirators, which totally averted the impending evil: And if, after doing his Fellow-citizens this effectual service, he had been content with the consciousness of having done it, and the further reward of their grateful applauses; and not listened to his cowardly fears, so as to be seduced by them to act the tyrant, violating the laws, in a most tender point, without any necessity; he would unquestionably have deserved — almost the fortieth part of the praise he claimed (c) for his performances. As to the compliments made to him by Catulus in the SENATE, and by Cato the year following, from the Rostra (in a spirit of opposition to Cæsar and Pompey) and the loud acclamations of the multitude thereupon, "Whence Pliny, in honour to his memory, cries out, N. vii. 30. "Hail thou, who wast first saluted PARENT OF THY COUNTRY," it seems quite ridi-

Vid. Midd.
p. 227.
Plin. Hist.
N. vii. 30.

culous to bring those compliments of two leaders of a faction, and these bizzes of a mob, as proofs that Cicero "obtained the most glorious title which a mortal can wear — FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY — from the FREE VOICE OF THE SENATE AND PEOPLE OF Rome." Was Rome FREE (d) at his time? Or could Cicero derive any honour from the applauses (e) given to his administration by those Citizens, who, soon after, on account of that very administration, banished him his country? They were as FREE then as when they assented to Cato's compliment to him. What an Idea does his English historian give us of the FREEDOM of Rome, when he makes us see, that, in the Consulship of his Patriot Hero, the very deliberations of the SENATE, concerning Lentulus and the other prisoners, were NOT FREE; that Cæsar, for having declared against dispensing with the laws, "had some difficulty Midd. "to escape with life from the rage of the 225. "Knights (f) who guarded the avenues of the Sueton. J. "Senate; where he durst not venture to appear Cæf. 14. "any more till he entered upon his Prætorship "with the new year!" It is not without Vid. Frag. Sallust. reason, therefore, that the Author of the De-clamation against Cicero reproves the folly of his Cedant arma togæ, concedat laurea linguæ; as if by the sole power of his eloquence, and without any weapon but his tongue, he had done those exploits of which he boasted. Quasi vero togatus, et non armatus, ea quæ gloriari, confeceris.

(c) Plutarch tells us, that on account, not of any bad action, but, of the excessive and never-ceasing praises which Cicero, after his exploit, bestowed on himself, he became odious and intolerable: That in the Senate, the Assemblies of the People, and the Courts of Justice, every body was dunned and deafened with the names Catiline and Lentulus, which the Orator was for ever sounding in their ears: And that his writings of every kind were so stuffed with panegyrics upon himself, as to destroy the pleasure of reading them, notwithstanding all the charms of his wit, and the music of his language.

(d) "In the absence of Pompey, who was sent to war first against the pirates, and then against Mithridates, the strength of the Commons [notwithstanding the restoration of the Tribunitian privileges in the Consulship of Pompey and Crassus] gradually diminished (says Sallust) and the power of a few men increased proportionably. "These engrossed the magistracies, the provinces, every thing; and, while they themselves lived secure, in tranquillity, grandeur, and affluence, terrified the rest with prosecutions and impeachments, in order to render the commons more manageable and submissive."

(e) Plutarch reports (as has been already mentioned,) that the multitude proclaimed Cicero Second Founder of Rome; and the same Plutarch tells us, that the multitude (almost forty years before) proclaimed Caius Marius Third Founder of Rome. And Cicero himself, more than twenty years after all Marius's bloody cruelties, and his death, and when the faction of the Nobles was in power, says to the People — "Shall we condemn Caius Marius, whom we may truly call FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY and PARENT OF YOUR LIBERTY, and OF THIS REPUBLIC? CAIUM MARIUM, quem verè PATREM PATRIÆ, PARENTEM, inquam, VESTRÆ LIBERTATIS, atque HUIUSCÆ REIPUBLICÆ possumus dicere — condemnabimus?" Vid. supr. 367. Vid. supr. 86. Pro Rabir. 10.

(f) Cicero, in his first speech against Catiline, tells him in the Senate-house, that the Knights were hardly restrained from doing him violence. Vid. supra, 345.

C H A P. X.

The spirited conduct of CÆSAR in his Prætorship, [year of Rome 691.] Several persons of distinction are brought to trial in form, on the accusation of having been associates in CATILINE'S Conspiracy. P. SYLLA is defended by CICERO. METELLUS NEPOS, the Tribune, continues to inveigh against the illegal proceedings of CICERO in his Consulship. The SENATE, by a vote, forbids molesting the Consul on that account. METELLUS hereupon proposes a law to call home POMPEY, with his army, to reform and settle the State. This motion opposed by CATO, occasions civil broils and contests, which the SENATE appeases for the present by Acts of power. P. CLODIUS prophane the Mysteries of the Good Goddess. The consequences of this enormity, in the Consulship of PUPPIUS PISO and VALERIUS MESSALA, [year of Rome 692.] POMPEY returns into Italy, and disbands his army. His equivocal conduct after his arrival at Rome. His triumph.

Y. R. 691.

Vid. supr.
p. 365 and 379.Sueton. J.
Cæf. 15.
Dio, l.
xxviii. p.
49.Sueton. J.
Cæf. 17.

CÆSAR, who, through the malicious, clandestine practices of Catulus, and others of that cabal, had been driven to shut himself up in his own house to avoid being assassinated, ventured to come abroad so soon as the new year began; he then entering upon the Prætorship, to which he had been elected some months before. He made it the first act of his office to call Catulus to an account for embezzling the public money in rebuilding the Capitol; and proposed also a law to efface his name from the fabric, and grant the commission for finishing what remained to Pompey.

This affair was moved to the People while the chief members of the Senate were attending the new Consuls, and assisting at the ceremony of their taking possession of the Capitol. Catulus, upon notice of what was doing in the Forum, ran instantly thither to defend himself, and would have ascended the Rostra; but Cæsar ordered him to stay below as a criminal. A great number of the Senators, alarmed for their friend Catulus, came from the Capitol, and, gathering about him, so warmly bestirred themselves in the cause, that Cæsar was obliged to drop it. And it would seem, that, in revenge of this attack upon Catulus, his faction immediately instigated Q. Curius, who had been Cicero's informer in the affair of Catiline, to name Cæsar, in full Senate, as an accomplice in that Conspiracy; and likewise spirited up Q. Vettius, a Roman Knight, to impeach him before Novius Niger, the Quæstor. Curius affirmed, that what he deposed against Cæsar was told to him by Catiline himself; and Vettius promised to produce a letter to Catiline in Cæsar's own hand. Cæsar, full of indignation, called upon Cicero to testify, that he had given

given him early information of some of Catiline's designs; and, Cicero not refusing his Testimony, Curius was thereby frustrated of the reward which had been promised to the first discoverer of the plot, and which he claimed under that title. As for Vettius, Cæsar cited him to answer for his behaviour, and, upon his failing to find security for his appearance, committed him to prison, after he had been roughly treated and almost killed by the Populace who surrounded the Rostra. Cæsar imprisoned likewise the Quæstor Novius, for suffering a superior Magistrate to be arraigned before him. Nor did the Senate make any opposition to these proceedings of the Prætor.

Y. R. 691.
Bef. Chr.
61.
390 Conf.

Several persons, however, of considerable rank had been found guilty, upon the testimony of Vettius, and banished; some of them not appearing to their citation, others after a trial, viz. M. Porcius Læca, C. Cornelius, L. Vargunteius, Servius Sylla, and P. Autronius, &c. The last of these, who lost the Consulship four years before, upon a conviction of bribery, had been Cicero's school-fellow, and Collegue in the Quæstorship, and solicited him with many tears to undertake his defence: but Cicero not only refused to defend him, but, from the knowledge of his guilt, appeared as a witness against him.

Midd. p.
245.

P. Sylla also, Autronius's partner and fellow-sufferer in the cause of bribery, was now tried for conspiring twice with Catiline, once when the plot proved abortive, soon after his former trial; and a second time in Cicero's Consulship: He was defended in the first by Hortensius, in the last by Cicero. The prosecutor was Torquatus, the son of his former accuser (as has been formerly mentioned) a young nobleman of great parts and spirit; who, ambitious of the triumph of ruining an enemy, and fearing that Cicero would snatch it from him, turned his raillery against Cicero instead of Sylla, and, to take off the influence of his authority, treated his character with great petulance, and employed every topic which would raise an odium and envy upon him: He called him a King, who assumed a power to save or destroy, just as he thought fit; said, that he was the third foreign King that had reigned in Rome after Numa and Tarquinius; and that Sylla would have run away, and never stood a trial, if he had not undertaken his cause.

Vid. sup.
P. 323.

Cicero, therefore, in his reply, was put to the trouble of defending himself as well as his Client.——As to the merits of the cause, though there was no positive proof, yet there were many strong presumptions against Sylla, with which his adversary hoped to oppress him: But Cicero endeavoured to confute them by appealing “to the tenor and “character of his life; protesting in the strongest terms, that he, who “had been the searcher and detector of the plot, and had taken such “pains to get intelligence of the whole extent of it, had never met with “the least hint or suspicion of Sylla's name in it, and that he had no other motive for defending him but a pure regard for justice; and as

Midd. p.
248.

Vid. sup.
P. 324.
note (x)

“ he

Y. R. 691. " he had refused to defend others, nay, had given evidence against them
 B. f. Chr. " from the knowledge of their guilt, so he had undertaken Sylla's defence, 190. Conf. " through a persuasion of his innocence." Torquatus, for want of direct proof, threatened to examine Sylla's slaves by torture. This was sometimes practised upon the demand of the Prosecutor; but Cicero observes upon it,
 " that the effect of those torments was governed always by the constitution
 " of the patient, and the firmness of his mind and body; by the will and " pleasure of the Torturer, and the hopes and fears of the Tortured; and " that in moments of so much anguish there could be no room for truth:
 " He bids them put Sylla's life to the rack, and examine that with rigour,
 " whether there was any hidden lust, any latent treason, any cruelty, any " audaciousness in it: That there could be no mistake in the cause, if the " voice of his perpetual life, which ought to be of the greatest weight,
 " was but attended to." Sylla was acquitted*.

As Cicero had a great share in convicting those who were capitally condemned, it was not possible but he must incur much odium on account of those trials; and the more, as the testimony of Vettius was made use of, who very soon appeared to be a man unworthy of credit: For, having presented to the Senate a list, containing the names of the Conspirators, he afterwards asked to have it returned to him, that he might add some names to it: and when, from an apprehension that he had a fraudulent intention in making this demand, it was not complied with, but he was ordered to declare, viva voce, the names of those whom he remembered, this threw him into the utmost confusion and perplexity.

* The English Historian adds—" But Cicero
 " had no great joy from his victory, or com" fort in preserving such a Citizen, who lived
 " afterwards in great confidence with Cæsar,
 " and commanded his right wing in the battle
 " of Pharsalia; and served him afterwards in " his power, as he had before served his kins-
 " man Sylla, in managing his confiscations and
 " the sale of the forfeited estates."

Midd. p.
249.

About the time of this trial Cicero bought a house of M. Crassus on the Palatine hill, adjoining to that in which he had always lived with his father, and which he is now supposed to have given up to his brother Quintus. The house cost him near thirty thousand pounds, and seems to have been one of the noblest in Rome. A Gellius [l. xii. c. 12.] tells us, That, having resolved to buy the house, and wanting money to pay for it, he borrowed it privately of his client Sylla, when he was under prosecution; but the story taking wind, and being charged upon him, he denied both the borrowing and design of purchasing, yet soon after bought the house; and when he was reproached with the denial of it, replied only laughing, that they must be fools to imagine, that, when he had resolved to buy, he would raise competitors of the purchase by proclaiming it.—The truth is, and what he does not dissemble (adds his English historian,) that he borrowed part of the money to pay for it at six per cent; and says merrily upon it, that he was now so plunged in debt, as to be ready for a plot, but that the conspirators would not trust him. It raised indeed some censure upon his vanity for purchasing so expensive a house with borrowed money: But Messala, the Consul, happening soon after to buy Autronius's house at a greater price, and with borrowed money too, it gave him some pleasure, that he could justify himself by the example of so worthy a Magistrate: By Messala's purchase, says he, I am thought to have made a good bargain; and Men begin to be convinced, that we may use the wealth of our friends in buying what contributes to our dignity. Ep. Fam. v. 6. & ad Att. i. 13.

Considering how many of the Conspirators were condemned upon the evidence of this man, and how many were put to death without any previous trial, and upon a vote only of the Senate, it is the less to be wondered at, that the Tribune Metellus Nepos (countenanced perhaps by Cæsar) continued declaiming against the late Consul, and at length resolved to accuse him before the People of illegal proceedings, and bloody acts of power.

Cicero had no inclination to enter into contest with the Tribune, but took some pains to make up the matter with him by the interposition of the women; particularly of Claudia, the wife of Nepos's brother, Metellus Celer, and their sister Mucia, the wife of Pompey. He employed also several common friends to persuade him to be quiet. Nepos answered, That he was too far engaged, and had put it out of his power. Cicero therefore was necessitated to have recourse to other measures for his defence: And, as his cause was the cause of the SENATE, he easily prevailed upon them to pass a decree, that no prosecution should be brought against him for what he had executed by virtue of the power which they had given him, and that whoever should attempt to trouble him on that account should be looked upon as an enemy to his Country. Hereupon Metellus, who found it not possible for him to make head against the SENATE, without the assistance of Pompey, published a law to call that General home with his army, to defend Rome against Catiline, [whose defeat and death were not till after this time] and against the exorbitant power and tyranny of Cicero. The Tribune is said to have been supported by Cæsar in this enterprize. The Senate, in their opposition to it, had the help of some of the Tribunes, particularly of Cato^b: For, as soon as Metellus began to read the law to the People, Cato snatched it away from him: and when he proceeded still to pronounce it by heart, Minucius, another Tribune, stopped his mouth with his hand. This threw the Assembly into confusion, and raised great commotions in the City; till the Senate, finding their faction the stronger, came to an unprecedented, and most impudent, aristocratic resolution, of suspending not only Cæsar, but the Tribune Metellus, from the execution of their offices.

^b Plutarch reports, that Cato had once determined not to stand for the office of Tribune at the last elections, and was going to pass some time in Lucania with certain philosophers, his friends and companions, when he met on the road Metellus Nepos, who from the army of Pompey was hastening to Rome to sue for the Tribuneship: That Cato, apprehending some mischief to the Public from the furious temper of this man, who was one of Pompey's creatures, returned to Rome, and the very next morning put himself among those who stood for the Tribuneship, that he might be able more effectually to oppose the enterprizes of Metellus. The same Historian informs us likewise, that Cato, in order to cool the zeal of the populace for Cæsar, whose PRÆTORSHIP would increase his influence, persuaded the Senate to decree (at a great expence to the Public) before Cæsar entered on that office, a monthly distribution of corn to the poorer sort; and that this stratagem had its effects. Plut. in Cæs. & in Cat.

Cæsar,

Y. R. 691.
Bef. Chr.
62.
390 Cons.

Ep. Fam.
v. 2.

Dio,
xxxvii.
49.

Plut. in Cat. & in Cic.

Y. R. 691.

Suet. in J.
Cæsar. 16.

Cæsar nevertheless resolved at first to continue his administration of justice; but, upon notice that a strong force was preparing to controul him, he thought it more adviseable to act a modest and submissive part. He dismissed his Lictors, laid aside his Toga prætexta, and shut himself up in his own house: And when the populace gathered about it, and shewed themselves ready to support him by force in the dignity of his office, he rejected their offers. The Senate, not expecting so much moderation from him, immediately reversed the decree of his suspension.

Metellus, who left Rome to go to his brother-in-law Pompey (with whose resentment he had threatened the Senators) had not gone far on his journey, before he turned back, and was permitted to re-enter upon his office.

On the first of June this year was celebrated the triumph of Q. Metellus Creticus, which had been long retarded by the intrigues of Pompey's creatures.

M. Pupius Piso, Pompey's Lieutenant, declared himself a candidate for the Consulship at the approaching election, and Pompey wrote to the Senate from Asia, to desire that they would defer the Assemblies for the election till he could come and support in person the interest of his Lieutenant. Many of the Fathers were inclined enough to grant his request, but Cato warmly opposed it as a dangerous compliance and a bad precedent. The Assemblies therefore were held at the usual time. Pompey's recommendation, however, had its effect; for Pupius was unanimously elected. The People gave him, for a Colleague, L. Valerius Messala.

Mild. p.
251.

But the most remarkable event, which happened in the end of this year, was the pollution of the mysteries of the BONA DEA, or the Good Goddess,

Ibid. p.
257.

Cicero published an invective oration against Metellus, which is mentioned in his epistles under the title of Metellina; it was spoken in the Senate in answer to a speech which Metellus had made to the People, and is often cited by Quintilian and others as extant in their time. Metellus Celer, who commanded in Cisalpine Gaul, wrote a peevish and complaining letter to his friend Cicero upon the Senate's treating his brother, the Tribune, so severely; to which Cicero answered with great freedom, but in a stile of kindness and friendship. After complaining of the affront which the Tribune had put upon him on the last day of the year, he concludes thus: "I did not therefore attack your brother, but defend myself only against him; nor has my friendship to you ever been variable, as you write, but firm and constant, so as to remain still the same when it was even deserted and slighted by you. And at this very time,

"when you almost threaten me in your letter, I give you this answer, That I not only forgive, but highly applaud, your grief; for I know, from what I feel within myself, how great the force is of fraternal love; but I beg of you also to judge with the same equity of my cause; and if, without any ground, I have been cruelly and barbarously attacked by your friends, to allow that I ought not only not to yield to them, but, on such an occasion, to expect the help even of you and your army also against them. I was always desirous to have you for my friend, and have taken pains to convince you how sincerely I am your's: I am still of the same mind, and shall continue in it as long as you please; and, for the love of you, will sooner cease to hate your brother, than, out of resentment to him, give any shock to the friendship which subsists between us. Adieu." Ep. Fam. v. 2.

by

by P. Clodius ; which, by an unhappy train of consequences, involved his particular ^a friend Cicero in an unexpected calamity. Clodius, now Quæstor, was descended from the noblest family in Rome, in the vigour of his age, of a graceful person, lively wit, and flowing eloquence ; but, “ with “ all the advantages of nature, he had a mind incredibly vicious ; was “ fierce, insolent, audacious, but, above all, most profligately wicked, and “ an open contemner of gods and men, valuing nothing that either Nature “ or the Laws allowed ; nothing but in proportion as it was desperate, and “ above the reach of other men, disdaining even honours in the common “ forms of the Republic ; nor relishing pleasures but what were impious, “ adulterous, incestuous.” He had an intrigue with Cæsar’s wife Pompeia, who, according to annual custom, was now celebrating in her house ^c those awful and mystical sacrifices of the Goddesses, to which no male creature was ever admitted, and where every thing masculine was so scrupulously excluded, that pictures of that sort were covered during the ceremony. This was a proper scene for Clodius’s genius to work upon ; an opportunity of daring beyond what man had ever dared before him : the thought of mixing the impurity of his lusts with the sanctity of these venerable rights, flattered his imagination so strongly, that he resolved to gain access to his mistress in the very midst of her holy ministry. With this view he addressed himself in a woman’s habit, and by the benefit of his smooth face, and the introduction of one of the maids, who was in the secret, hoped to pass without discovery ; but, by some mistake between him and his guide, he lost his way when he came within the house, and fell in unluckily among the other female servants, who, detecting him by his

Y.R. 691.
De Arusp.
Resp. 20.
Pro Mil.
16.
Vell. Pat.
ii. 45.

De Arusp.
Respont.
17.
Juven. vi.
359.

Cic. ad
Att. i. 12.
& Plut. in
Cic.

^a Plutarch tells us, that Clodius had been singularly serviceable to his friend Cicero, keeping close to his side, as one of the guards of his person, during all his difficulties in the suppression of Cariline’s Conspiracy. This, perhaps, will account for Clodius’s implacable resentment of Cicero’s appearing afterwards a witness against him at his trial : But how shall we account for Cicero’s contracting a particular friendship with such a man as he describes Clodius to be ?

^c Les femmes seules pouvoient assister à ce sacrifice, qu’on appelloit aussi les mysteres, à cause du rapport qu’il avoit avec les mysteres de Cerès.—Ce sacrifice [se faisoit] chez César, non pas en qualité de Grand Pontife, comme l’ont cru plusieurs habiles gens, mais en qualité de Préteur. On ne trouve nulle part que ces mysteres dussent se célébrer chez le Souverain Pontife. Cicéron au contraire dit qu’ils se faisoient chez un de ceux qui étoient cum imperio [de Arusp. Resp.] ce qui ne s’e-

tend qu’aux Consuls et aux Préteurs. Dion [lib. xxxviii.] dit positivement qu’ils se faisoient chez un Consul ou chez un Préteur. L’année du consulat de Cicéron, dans le tems de la conjuration de Catiline, c’est à dire, au mois de Decembre, ce sacrifice se fit chez Cicéron ; et il y apparence [Plut. in Cic.] qu’il se celebra cette année à peu près dans le même tems ; car cette lettre [Lett. xii. lib. i.] est du premier de Janvier, et Cicéron parle de cette affaire comme nouvelle. Mongault, Tom. I. p. 96. N. 10. This ingenious writer, in the same note, adds—On conçoit bien pourquoi il [Clodius] étoit entré déguisé chez César. Il étoit d’intelligence avec la maîtresse de la maison, et il vouloit venger Pompée, et tous les autres maris en grande nombre qui avoient le même sujet, de se plaindre de César. Cette honnête dame qui sacrifioit un homme de ce mérite, et si aimé de toutes les autres femmes, à un jeune étourdi, étoit de la même maison que Pompée.

Y. R. 692.
Bef. Chr.
61.
390 Cons.

voice, alarmed the whole company by their shrieks, to the great amazement of the matrons, who presently threw a veil over the sacred mysteries; and, having caused the doors to be shut, began to search every where with flambeaux. Clodius was at length found in the chamber of the slave who had introduced him; and all the women gathering about him, he was driven out of the house.

The story was presently spread abroad, and raised a general scandal and horror through the whole city: In the vulgar¹, for the profanation of a religion held the most sacred of any in Rome; in the better sort, for its offence to good manners, and the discipline of the Republic. Cæsar put away his wife upon it.

Y. R. 692.
Ad Att. i.
13.

M. Pupius Piso and L. M. Valerius Messala, the new Consuls, had entered upon their office, when the affair was brought before the Senate. The Fathers referred it to the college of priests, who declared it to be an abominable impiety, upon which the Consuls were ordered to propose to the People a law for trying Clodius by a special commission of Judges, to be named by the Prætor. But Q. Fufius Calenus, one of the Tribunes, would not permit the law to be offered to the suffrage of the Citizens. This raised a great ferment in the City. The Senate adhered to their resolution, though the Consul *Piso*² used all the endeavours to divert them from it, and Clodius, in an abject manner, threw himself at the feet of every Senator. After a second debate, in a full House, there were fifteen only who voted on Clodius's side, and four hundred directly against him; so that a fresh decree passed, to order the Consuls to recommend the law to the People with all their authority, and that no other business should be done till it was carried. But this being likely to produce great disorders,

Ibid. 14.

Ibid. 16.

Hortensius proposed an expedient, which was accepted by both parties, that the Tribune Fufius should publish a law for the trial of Clodius by the Prætor, with a bench of Judges DRAWN BY LOT, instead of Judges CHOSEN BY THE PRÆTOR, as the law proposed by the Consuls directed.

Cic. de Arusp.
Resp. iii
18. Cic.
pro Dom.
42.

¹ It had been the common belief of the Populace, that if a man should ever pry into these mysteries he would be instantly struck blind: But it was not possible, as Cicero says, to know the truth of it before, since no man but Clodius had ever tried the experiment: Though it was now found, as he tells him, that the blindness of the eyes was converted to that of the mind.

² Cicero, in a letter to Atticus, gives the character of the two Consuls. "Piso is a man of a weak and wicked mind; a churlish, captious sinner, without any turn of wit; and making men laugh by his looks rather than jests; favouring neither the popular nor aristocratical party; a man from whom no good is to be expected, because he wishes

"none; nor hurt to be feared, because he dares do none." Cic. Ep. ad Att. i. 13. "He would have been more vicious by having one vice the less, laziness." Ibid. 14. [Cicero, in resentment of this Consul's espousing the interests of Clodius, hindered the Senate from decreeing to him the province of Syria, which had been designed and in a manner promised to him. Ad. Att. i. 16.]

The other Consul, Messala, is an excellent magistrate (says our Orator) active and firm, a lover, an admirer, and an imitator of me. Messala Consul est egregius, fortis, constans, diligens, nostri laudator, amator, imitator. Ibid.

Hortensius feared lest Clodius should escape in the squabble without any trial; and was persuaded, that no Judges could absolve him, that a sword of lead, as he expressed himself, would be sufficient to destroy him: But the Tribune knew, that in such a trial there would be room for intrigue, and for corrupting the Judges, which Cicero likewise foresaw from the first; and wished therefore to leave him rather to the effect of that odium, in which his character then lay, than bring him to a trial, where he had any chance to escape.

Clodius's whole defence was to prove himself absent at the time of the fact; for which purpose he produced men to swear, that he was then at Interamna, about sixty miles from the City. But Cicero being called upon to give his testimony, deposed, that Clodius had been with him at his house that very morning at Rome. As soon as Cicero appeared in the court, the Clodian mob began to insult him with great rudeness; but the Judges rose up, and received him with such respect, that they presently secured him from all future affronts.

Cæsar, who was the most particularly interested in the affair, being summoned also to give evidence, declared, that he knew nothing at all of the matter; though his mother Aurelia and sister Julia, who were examined before him, had given a punctual relation of the whole fact: and being interrogated how he came then to part with his wife? he replied, All who belong to me ought to be free from suspicion as well as guilt. Plutarch says, that Cicero himself unwillingly appeared as a witness in this cause, that he was urged to it by the importunity of his wife, a fierce, imperious dame, jealous of Clodius's sister, whom she suspected of some design to get Cicero from her, which by this step she hoped to make desperate. The story does not seem improbable; for, before the trial, Cicero owns himself to be growing every day more cool and indifferent about it; and, in his raileries with Clodius after it, touches upon the forward advances which his sister had made towards him; and, at the very time of giving his testimony, did it with no spirit; and said no more, as he tells us, than what was so well known, that he could not avoid saying it.

The Judges seemed to act at first with great gravity; granted every thing that was asked by the prosecutors, and demanded a guard to protect them from the mob; which the Senate readily ordered, with great commendation of their prudence: But, when it came to the issue, twenty-five only condemned, while thirty-one absolved him. Crassus is said to have been Clodius's chief manager in tampering with the Judges, employing every instrument of corruption as it suited the different tempers of the men; and where money would not do, offering even certain ladies and young men of quality to their pleasure. Cicero says, that a more scandalous company of sharpers never sat down at a gaming-table; infamous Senators, beggarly Knights, with a few honest men among them whom Clodius could not exclude, who, in a crew so unlike to themselves, sat with sad and mournful faces, as if

Y. R. 692. afraid of being infected with the contagion of their infamy; and that Catulus, meeting one of them, asked him what they meant by desiring a guard? were they afraid of being robbed of the money which Clodius had given them?

Cic. 2d
Att. l. 16.

This transaction, however, gave a very serious concern to Cicero. As he looked upon himself to be particularly affronted by a sentence given in flat contradiction to his testimony, so he made it his business on all occasions to display the iniquity of it, and to sting the several actors in it with all the keenness of his raillery ^a.

Ibid.

Midd.
p. 261.

Pompey the Great returned to Rome about the beginning of this year, in the height of his fame and fortunes, from the Mitbridatic war. The City had been much alarmed about him, by various reports from abroad, and several tumults at home, where a general apprehension prevailed of his coming at the head of an army to take the government into his hands ¹.——

But he was too phlegmatic to be easily induced to so desperate a resolution; or seems rather indeed to have had no thoughts at all of that sort, but to have been content with the rank which he then possessed, of the first Citizen of Rome, without a rival ². He had lived in a perpetual course of success and glory, without any slur either from the Senate or People to inspire him with sentiments of revenge, or to give him a pretence for violent measures; and he was persuaded, that the growing disorders of the City would soon force all parties to create him Dictator, for the settlement of the State; and thought it of more honour to his character to obtain that power by the consent of his Citizens, than to extort it from them by violence. But, whatever apprehensions were conceived of him before his coming, they all vanished at his arrival in Italy; for he no sooner set foot there, than he disbanded his troops, giving them orders only to attend him in his triumph.

Plut. in
Pomp.

By his late victories he had greatly extended the barrier of the empire into the continent of Asia, having added to it three powerful kingdoms, Pontus, Syria, Bitbynia, which he reduced to the condition of Roman provinces, leaving all the other kings and nations of the East tributary to the De provin.

conf. 12.

Midd. 263.

^a About this time Cicero is supposed to have made that elegant oration, still extant, in the defence of his old Preceptor the poet Archias: He expected for his pains an immortality of fame from the praise of Archias's muse; but, by a contrary fate of things, instead of deriving any addition of glory from Archias's compositions, it is wholly owing to his own, that the name of Archias has not long ago been buried in oblivion. He had sung in Greek verse the triumphs of Marius over the Cimbri, and of Lucullus over Mitbridates, and was now attempting the Consulship of Cicero. Pro Archia, 9, 11. See Midd. p. 260.

¹ Plutarch tells us, that Crassus, probably, not from any real fear, but in order to gain credit to the calumny, stole out of Rome with his children and his most valuable effects.

² This high rank was not sufficient to preserve to him the affection of his wife Mucia, (sister of the Metelli;) He had a Rival there, and more than one; Cæsar among the rest, if we may believe Suetonius, c. 50. Pompey, fully informed of her scandalous conduct, sent her a bill of divorce before his landing in Italy. She afterwards married Pompey's Quæstor Scaurus, son of the famous Scaurus, Prince of the Senate. Mucia was Pompey's third wife. Antistia was the first, Æmilia the second, and Julia, Cæsar's daughter, will be p. 203. the fourth. Vid. supra,

Republic, as far as the Tigris.—On the merit of these great services he did many acts abroad of a very extraordinary nature ; gave what laws he pleased to the whole East, distributed the conquered countries at discretion, to the kings and princes who had served him in the wars, and built twenty-nine new cities or colonies. [His donatives to his officers and soldiers have been already mentioned.]

Y. R. 692.

Vid. supra, p. 209,

270.

Ibid.

His first business, therefore, after his return, and what he had much at heart, was to get these acts ratified by public authority. The popular faction promised him every thing, and employed all their skill to divert him from an union with Cicero and the SENATE, and had made a considerable impression on him : but he found the state of things very different from their representations, saw Cicero in high credit ¹, and the authority of the Senate much respected, which obliged him to use great management, and made him so cautious of offending any side, that he pleased none. Cicero says of his first speech * [to the People] that it was neither agreeable to the Poor, nor relished by the Rich ; disappointed the Seditious [that is, the Popular men] yet gave no satisfaction to the Honest [i. e. to the Infamous Aristocratic Cabal.]

* Prima Concio.

As

Midd.
p. 242.

¹ Cicero, upon the expiration of his Consulship, had taken care to send a particular account of his whole administration to Pompey, in hopes to prevent any disadvantageous impressions there from reports of his enemies, and to draw from him some public declaration in praise of what he had been doing. But Pompey, being informed of the ill humour which was rising against Cicero in Rome, had answered him with great coldness, and, instead of paying him any compliment, had taken no notice at all of what had passed in the affair of Catiline : Upon which Cicero expostulated with him in the following letter with some resentment, yet so as not to irritate a man of the first authority in the Republic, and to whom all parties were forwardly paying their court.

† i. e. General.

" M. T. Cicero to Cn. Pompey the Great,
" Emperor †.

" Your letter to the Senate afforded inexpressible satisfaction, not only to myself, but to the Public in general ; as the hopes it brought us of a peace are agreeable to those expectations, which, in full confidence of your superior abilities, I had always encouraged the world to entertain. I must acquaint you, however, that it entirely sunk the spirits of that party, who, from being formerly your declared enemies, have

" lately become your pretended friends ; as it utterly disappointed their most sanguine hopes.

" Notwithstanding the letter which you wrote to me by the same express discovered but very slight marks of your affection, yet I received it with pleasure. The truth is, I am always abundantly satisfied with the consciousness of having exerted my best offices towards my friends : And, if they do not think proper to make me an equal return, I am well contented that the superiority should remain on my side. But, if my utmost zeal for your interests has not been sufficient to unite you to mine, I doubt not our co-operating together upon the same patriot principles, will be a means of cementing us more strongly hereafter. In the mean time, it would neither be agreeable to the openness of my temper, nor to the freedom of that mutual friendship we profess, to conceal what I thought wanting in your letters. I will acknowledge then, that the public services I performed during my late Consulship, gave me reason to expect, from your attachment both to myself and to the Commonwealth, that you would have sent me your congratulations : and I am persuaded you would not have omitted them, but from a tenderness to certain persons. Let me assure you, however, that " what

Y. R. 692.

Madd.

p. 264.

As he happened to come home in the very heat of Clodius's affair, so he was presently urged by both parties to declare himself on that head. Fufius the Tribune, at the instigation of the Consul Piso, asked him, before the PEOPLE assembled in the Flaminian Circus, what he thought of empowering the Prætor to chuse Judges, who should be the Prætor's assessors in the trial of Clodius? To which he answered very aristocratically, as Cicero calls it, That he had ever taken the authority of the SENATE to be of the greatest weight in all cases. And when the Consul Messala asked him in the SENATE, what his opinion was of the profanation of religion, and the law proposed about it? he, without entering into particulars, applauded, in general, all the determinations of the SENATE, and the measures they had taken; and, upon sitting down, told Cicero, who sat next him, that he had now said enough, he thought, to signify his sentiments of those matters; which last words were supposed to include the proceedings against Catiline and his associates.

Ad Att. i.
14

Crassus, observing that this declaration had pleased the Senate, rose up, and launched out, in a very high strain, into the praises of Cicero's consulship, declaring himself indebted to it for his being at that time a Senator and a Citizen; nay, for his very liberty and his life; and that as often as he saw his wife, his family, and his country, so often he saw his obligations to Cicero. This is what Cicero, in a letter, relates to his friend Atticus; and he adds, "I perceived Pompey at a loss to guess what was Crassus's motive for so speaking; whether to take the benefit of an opportunity, which he himself had neglected, of making his court to the Senate; or because the illustrious

"what I have performed for the preservation
"of my Country, has received the concurrent
"applauses of the whole world. You will "find, when you return thither, I conducted
"that important scene with so much spirit
"and policy, that you, like another Scipio,
"though far superior indeed to that Hero in "glory, will not refuse to admit me, like a "second Lælius, and not much behind him, I "trust, in wisdom, as the friend and associate
"of your private and public transactions."
Ep. Fam. Lib. V. Ep. vii. Melmoth's Translation, Book I. Let. i.

"Quæsit ex eo, placeretne ei Judices à Prætoris legi, quo consilio idem Prætor uteretur. Ad Att. i. 14.

"Cicero's letter (before-mentioned) to Pompey, had produced in the latter an appearance of amity towards him; but Cicero suspected it not to be sincere, as is evident from his thirteenth epistle to Atticus, in which he says of Pompey, "That indeed he made great

"professions of esteem and consideration for "him, and affected openly to support and
"praise him; but it was easy enough to see
"he envied him, though he endeavoured to "conceal it."——The character that Cicero gives him in the same letter is very different from that of Scipio, to whom he had compared him a little before: His words are, speaking of his conduct, "Nihil come, nihil simplex, nihil in τοῖς πολιτικοῖς honestum, nihil forte, nihil liberum." And again, in the twentieth of the same book, "Is vir nihil habet amplum, nihil excelsum, nihil non summissum, et popolare." Would one believe that the Hero of the fine Oration pro lege Manilia and the Pompey thus described were the same man? "Had he nothing great? nothing elevated? nothing but what was mean and vulgar? Was there neither dignity, nor spirit, nor freedom, nor candour, nor honesty, nor good-nature in his whole behaviour?" Observations on the Life of Cicero, p. 19.

"merit

“ merit of my acts (so highly pleasing to the Senate) extorted praise even from “ a man who was under no personal obligation to me ; but whom, on the con“ trary, out of regard to him (his rival) I had always treated with a par“ ticular slight. From that day I became strongly attached to Crassus :
 “ Nor did I fail to express openly my satisfaction with what Pompey had “ said in my favour, though he had spoken obscurely, and with so much “ reserve.”

Pompey, after this, affected, on all public occasions, to pay so great a court to Cicero, that the popular faction gave him the name of Cneius Cicero.

There was one point which Pompey had much at heart to carry this summer, the election of L. Afranius, one of his creatures, to the Consulship.
 To engage Cato not to oppose him in this undertaking, he sent to him to ask his two nieces (some call them his daughters) in marriage, the elder for himself, the younger for his son. Cato's wife and sister were overjoyed at the proposal, as highly honourable and advantageous to the family : But Cato, who was aware of Pompey's views, gave to the person, charged with the negotiation, the following answer, without hesitating a moment : Tell Pompey, that Cato is not to be snared by women ; that he values his friendship highly ; and that so long as his designs shall be just and reasonable, he may depend upon Cato as a more steady friend than can be made by any alliances whatever.
 But I will not give him hostages to secure my inaction when my Country shall have need of my assistance.

Pompey nevertheless pursued his enterprize, in which he fought (says Cicero) not with the weapon of authority, nor with that of interest, but with what Philip of Macedon took every fortress, into which he could drive a loaded ass. Plutarch tells us, that Pompey himself distributed the money openly in his own gardens : but Cicero mentions it as a current report, that the Consul Piso had undertaken to divide it at his house : which gave birth to two new laws, drawn up by Cato, and his brother-in-law Domitius Ahenobarbus, and supposed to be levelled at the Consul ; the one of which gave liberty to search the houses even of the Magistrates, on informations of bribery ; the other declared all those enemies to the State, at whose house the dividers of money were found. Pompey, however, obtruded Afranius upon the City, by which he greatly disgusted the Aristocratic Faction °.

He had been making preparation all this summer for his triumph, which he deferred to his birth-day, the thirtieth of September ; having resided in the mean while, as usual, in the suburbs : So that the Senate and People, in compliment to him, held their assemblies generally, during that time, without the walls. His triumph lasted two days, and was the ° Plutarch says, that Cato's wife and sister, when they saw how Pompey dishonoured himself, by practising the arts of bribery in so shameful a manner, were convinced that Cato had judged wisely in rejecting his alliance.

Y.R. 692. most splendid which had ever been seen at Rome: He built a temple to B.C. Chr. Minerva out of the spoils, with an inscription giving a summary of his vic-
 62. tories: That he had finished a war of thirty years: had vanquished, 391 Conf. slain, and taken two millions, one hundred, and eighty-three thousand men; sunk or taken eight hundred and forty-six ships; reduced to the power of the empire a thousand, five hundred, and thirty-eight towns and fortresses; and subdued all the countries between the Lake Mæotis and the Red Sea ^p.

P. CN. POMPEIUS. CN. F. MAGNVS. IMP.
 BELLO. XXX. ANNORVM. CONFECTO.
 FVVIS. FVGATIS. OCCISIS. IN. DEDITIONEM. ACCEPTIS.
 HOMINVM. CENTIES. VICIES. SEMEL. CENTENIS. LXXXIII. M.
 DEPRESSIS. AVT. CAPT. NAVIBVS. DCCCXLVI.
 OPPIDIS. CASTELLIS. MDXXXVIII.
 IN. FIDEM. RECEPTIS.
 TERRIS. A. MAEOTI. LACV. AD RVBRVM. MARE. SVBACTIS.
 VOTUM MERITO MINERVAE. Plin. Hist. Nat. vii, 26.

Crevier At the head of the Triumphal Procession, Tom. XII. which lasted two days, was carried a Banner,
 l. xxxviii. with an inscription, importing that Pompey, after he had delivered all the maritime Coasts from the Pirates, and restored to the Roman People the empire of the sea, triumphed over Asia, Pontus, Armenia, Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, Syria, the Scythians, the Jews, the Albanians, Iberia, the island of Crete, the Ba-starnæ, and over the Kings Mithridates and Tigranes. When, after his Triumph, he ha-rangued the People, and, according to custom, gave them an account of his exploits, he said, Oros. l. vi. "That he had fought with two and twenty
 c. 6. Kings, and had so far extended the frontiers Plin. l. vii. "of the empire, that Asia Minor, which, before
 c. 26. & "his conquests, was the remotest of the provinces xxxvii. 2. "belonging to the Roman People, was now in Plut. in "the center of them." [This was not then Pomp. true (says Dr. Prideaux) or at any time after.
 For Proper Asia was never in the middle of the Roman empire. Beyond the Tigris it was never extended eastward, but at this time it reached westward as far as the Atlantic ocean; and from thence to Proper Asia was more than double the distance of Tigris from that province.]

The riches displayed in this third Triumph of Pompey were prodigious. A chest or draught-table, made of two precious stones, four feet long and three feet wide. A moon of gold, of above thirty pounds weight:
 Three table-beds, of gold also; one of which,

it was said, had belonged to Darius Hystaspis.
 Vessels of gold, adorned and enriched with precious stones, enough to furnish nine busets:
 three statues of gold; one of Minerva, another of Mars, and the third of Apollo: the golden vine of Aristobulus, which has been spoken of before: three and thirty crowns of pearl: a little chapel, consecrated to the Muses, all of pearl, with a sun-dial a-top: the effigies of Pompey himself, made also of pearls; besides a chest filled with jewels and rings of great value, which had belonged to Mithri- dates, and which Pompey consecrated in the Capitol with the golden vine, and much other riches. Add to these the throne and scepter of the same Mithridates, and a bust of that Prince in gold, of the height of eight cubits:
 a silver statue of Pharnaces, grandfather of Mithridates: and waggons full of gold and silver. Among the natural curiosities displayed in this Triumph, the ebony-tree was now seen at Rome for the first time, Vid. supra,
 p. 258.

The gratifications given by the triumphant Victor to the officers and soldiers were also expressed in an inscription on a table carried in the shew, which inscription declared likewise, that whereas the whole revenue of the Republic, before his conquests, had not exceeded fifty millions of drachmas a-year, her revenues from the countries alone, which he had conquered, amounted to eighty-five millions. Plin. xii. 4.

This

C H A P. XI.

CATULUS dies. The union of the Senate with the Knights, which was formed in 690, is broke in this year, 692.

The next year (METELLUS CELER and AFRANIUS being Consuls) POMPEY endeavours to get a confirmation, by the Senate, of all his acts in Asia, and to obtain an Agrarian law in favour of his soldiers. The City is alarmed with the rumour of a Gallic war. Clodius forms a scheme to revenge himself on Cicero, for having appeared a witness against him at his trial for impiety. CICERO's conduct on occasion of this danger. JULIUS CÆSAR from Farther-Spain, (of which province he had been appointed to take the government after the expiration of his Prætorship) returns with glory to Rome. In the end of the year 693 the FIRST TRIUMVIRATE is formed.

BEFORE the end of this year the Aristocratic Cabal lost one of its most considerable members by the death of Catulus, who, in his

This display of riches was accompanied with a shew of a different kind; waggons filled with arms of all sorts, beaks of ships, a multitude of prisoners of war, not loaded with chains (as had been the custom in former times) but every one at liberty, and dressed after the mode of their respective countries. Immediately before the triumphal car marched the Kings, Princes, and great Lords, to the number of 324, who had been subdued by force of arms, or delivered as hostages; in particular, the younger Tigranes, with his wife and daughter; and Queen Zoxima, the wife of the elder Tigranes: seven children of Mithridates, viz. five Princes, Artaphernes, Cyrus, Oxathres, Xerxes, and Darius; and two Princesses, Orsabaris and Eupatra: Oltaces, who had reigned in Colchis: Aristobulus, King of the Jews, with his son Antigonus, and two daughters: Some tyrants and the captains of the Cilician pirates: Princesses of Scythia: three Albanian generals, two Iberian: the hostages of those nations and of the King of Comana: and last of all Menander, commander in chief of Mithridates's cavalry.

Several pictures followed, which represented the vanquished Kings, or the battles gained either by Pompey or his Lieutenants: A detail of the adventures of Mithridates, especially the nocturnal battle, wherein he was intirely defeated; his flight; the siege that he maintained in Panticapæum; his death, and that of his two daughters who chose to die with him. There were likewise the portraits of several other of his children, of both sexes, who died before him. This long string of pictures was closed by the Gods of the Barbarians, led in triumph, together with their worshippers.

And now appeared Pompey himself, mounted on a car, glittering with precious stones, and clothed in a military robe, said to be that of Alexander, which Mithridates had found among the treasures brought into the island of Cos by Cleopatra, Queen of Ægypt, grandmother of Ptolemy Alexander II. The principal officers of the army followed the car, some on foot, some on horseback.

It had been formerly the custom, when the Triumphal Procession was over, to put the captives to death, or condemn them to perpetual imprisonment: but the Roman manners were now somewhat softened. Pompey's captives were sent back to their own countries: only Aristobulus and the younger Tigranes were detained, that Hyrcanus and the elder Tygranes might enjoy peace in their dominions.

Y. R. 692.
Bef. Chr.
60.
391. Conf.

public conduct, seems never to have had any thing in view but the perpetuating of the usurped power of the SENATE, an infamous Assembly, usually influenced and governed by him, in conjunction with some few others of the Cornelian brood, Patriots formed under the discipline of Sylla, and invariable enemies of the Free Constitution of Rome. Nor was this the greatest adversity they sustained in this same year: they lost the support of the Equestrian Order. It was one of Cicero's chief glories to have formed a close union between that Order and the SENATE, an union which never could be effected till the Knights were become as corrupt and as infamous as the Senators. The two gangs of robbers were then, by the persuasions of the eloquent Consul, brought into an agreement to support one another: But as such unions are frequently broke by disputes about the plunder, so it happened in the present instance. But let us hear Cicero himself relate the sad tale in a letter to Atticus.

Midd.
271.
Ad. Att.
i. 17.

“ We live here in an infirm, wretched, tottering Republic: for you “ have heard, I guess, that our Knights are now almost disjoined again “ from the Senate. The first thing which they took amiss was the decree
“ for calling the Judges to account who had taken money in Clodius's affair:
“ I happened to be absent when it passed; but hearing afterwards that
“ the whole order resented it, though without complaining openly, I chid
“ the Senate, as I thought, with great effect, and in a cause not very “ modest, spoke forcibly and copiously. They have now another curious “ petition scarce fit to be endured; which yet I not only bore with, but “ defended. The company who hired the Asiatic revenues of the Censors, “ complained to the SENATE, that, through too great an eagerness, they “ had given more for them than they were worth, and begged to be re“ leased from the bargain. I was their chief advocate, or rather indeed
“ the second; for Crassus was the man who put them upon making “ this request. The thing is odious and shameful, and a public confession “ of their rashness: But there was great reason to apprehend, that, if they “ should obtain nothing, they would be wholly alienated from the Senate;
“ so that this point also was principally managed by me. For, on the “ first and second of December, I spoke a great deal on the dignity of “ the two orders, and the advantage of the concord between them, and “ was heard very favourably in a full House. Nothing however is yet “ done; but the SENATE seems well disposed: For Metellus, the Con“ sul elect, was the only one who spoke against us; though that Hero
“ of ours, Cato, was going also to speak, if the shortness of the day “ had not prevented him. Thus, in pursuit of my old measures, I am sup- “ porting, as well as I can, that concord which my Consulship had cemented:
“ But since no great stress can now be laid upon it, I have provided my“ self another way, and a sure one, I hope, of maintaining my authority, “ which

“ which I cannot well explain by letter, yet will give you a short hint of “ it. I am in a strict friendship with Pompey — I know already what “ you say — and will be upon my guard, as far as caution can serve “ me; and give a farther account, some other time, of my present con“ duct in politics. You are to know, in the mean while, that Lucceius “ designs to sue directly for the Consulship; for he will have, it is said, “ but two competitors; Cæsar, by means of Arrius, proposes to join with “ him; and Bibulus, by Piso’s mediation, thinks of joining with Cæsar.
 “ Do you laugh at this? Take my word for it, it is no laughing matter.
 “ — December the 5th.”

Y. R. 692.
 Bef. Chr.
 69.
 391 Conf.

With regard to the first of the two affairs above-mentioned, it should be remembered, that the Knights, though they sat in judgment with the Senators, were not subject to the penalties denounced by the laws against Judges who suffer themselves to be corrupted: Indeed the Tribune Drusus, in 662, passed a law which subjected them to those penalties: but he was murdered soon after, and all his laws were annulled. Cato, on occasion of the scandalous judgment in the case of Clodius, bestirred himself with so much zeal, as to procure a new law of the same import with that of Drusus.

Vid. sup.
 P. 106.
 108.

As to the petition of the Knights, concerning the Asiatic revenues, Cato, when he came to speak to it, opposed it resolutely, and (having justice and reason on his side) prevailed to have it rejected: Which Cicero often condemns, as contrary to all good policy; and complains sometimes in his letters, that Cato, though he was the only man that had any regard to the Republic, yet frequently did mischief, by pursuing his maxims absurdly, and without any regard to the times^a.

Midd. p.
 273.
 Ad. Att. i.
 18. it. ii. 1.

^a This year, 692, produced nothing of importance in affairs abroad; Scaurus, whom Pompey had left in Syria, made an incursion into Arabia Petraea; but, for 300 talents of silver, sold a peace to Aretas, King of that country.

Quintus Cicero, brother of the Orator, and brother-in-law of Atticus (whose sister he had married) had been Prætor the preceding year, and now governed the Province of Asia, which, at the expiration of his Prætorship had been assigned to him, and there he remained three years. The Orator, in some of his letters to Quintus, recommends to him the example of C. Octavius (Augustus Cæsar’s father, whose second wife was Atia, the daughter of Julia, sister of Julius Cæsar.) Octavius was Prætor this year at Rome; and Ci- cero ascribes to him all the qualities of an excellent Magistrate.

^b “ It was the fault of Cato (says a very ingenious writer, speaking of this transaction) not to see that Public affairs are incapable of perfection, and that it is impossible to govern a State, without submitting lesser interests to greater.” [How far this doctrine is supportable in the two present instances, the Reader will judge.] “ Hence it was that, with admirable intentions for the service of his Country, he sometimes did a great deal of mischief, for want of distinguishing between what was good in speculation, and what in practice.” [A distinction somewhat like that for which the Jesuits, in their casuistry, have contended, and which has been so severely censured by M. Paschal.]

V. R. 593.
Chr.
392 Conf.

Ad Att.
ii. 19.

Dio, l.
xxxvii. 52.

Midd.
275.
Dio, ibid.

Ad Att. i.
19.

Ibid.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer and L. Afranius were now entered upon the Consulship. By the influence of the latter (assisted by some of the Tribunes) Pompey, whose creature he was, imagined he should readily obtain the ratification of his aëts, together with an Agrarian Law, which he was pushing forward at the same time, for the distribution of lands to his soldiers. But he was vigorously opposed in both by the other Consul Metellus, his enemy professed, and the more heated by a private resentment of the affront offered to his sister Mucia, whom Pompey had lately put away. Lucullus, who was personally interested in the first article, all his orders and regulations having been reversed by Pompey, declared that the Senate ought not to confirm his aëts in the gross, as if they received them from a Master, but to consider them separately, and ratify those only which were found to be reasonable. Crassus, Cato, and Metellus Creticus, joined Lucullus in the opposition, and the generality of the Senate being of the same side, Pompey could not carry his point there. He wholly employed himself now, therefore, to get his Agrarian Law passed; and, to make it the more palatable, other Citizens, besides the soldiers, were (by a clause inserted therein) to share in the distribution.

Nevertheless the Consul Metellus, and his associates, opposed this enterprize with no less warmth than they had the other. The Tribune Flavius, the promoter of the law, impatient of the opposition he met with, and animated by Pompey's power, had the hardness to commit Metellus to prison; and when all the Senate followed, and resolved to go to prison too, he clapped his chair at the prison-door to keep them out: But this violence gave such a general scandal to the City, that Pompey found it adviseable to draw off the Tribune, and release the Consul. In order to allay these heats, Cicero (of whose conduct, with regard to the confirmation of Pompey's aëts, no mention is made in history; nor in the letters to Atticus) offered an amendment to the Agrarian Law, which satisfied both parties, by securing the possessions of all private proprietors, and hindering the public lands from being given away. His proposal was, That out of the new revenues, which Pompey had acquired to the Empire, five years rents should be set apart to purchase lands for the intended distribution. But the progress of the affair was suspended by the sudden alarm of a Gallic war, which was always terrible to Rome, and being now actually commenced by several revolted nations, called for the immediate care and attention of the Government.

The Senate decreed the two Gauls severally to the two Consuls, and required them to make levies without any regard to privilege, or exemption from service: And that three Senators should be chosen by lot, one of them of Consular rank, to be sent with a public character to the other Gallic Cities, to dissuade them from joining in the war. In the allotment of these Ambassadors, the first lot happened to fall upon Cicero; but the whole assembly remonstrated against it, declaring his presence to be necessary at Rome, and that that he ought not to be employed on such an errand. The same thing happened to Pompey, on whom the next lot fell, who was retained also with Cicero, as two pledges of the Public Safety. The three at last chosen were, Q. Metellus Creticus, L. Flaccus, and Lentulus. The Transalpine Gaul, which was the seat of the war, fell to the lot of the Consul Metellus, who could not contain his joy upon the prospect of glory which it offered him. Metellus, says Cicero, is an admirable Consul: I blame him only in one thing, for not seeming pleased with the news of peace from Gaul. He longs, I suppose, to triumph. I wish that he was as moderate in this, as he is excellent in all other respects. [For he is an admirer and imitator of ME]

Y. R. 693.
Bef. Chr.
59
392 Conf.

Ad Att. i.
20.

Vid. supr.
P. 386.
note (g).

Pompey, finding the Aristocratical Faction united as one man against him (which rendered all his efforts hitherto ineffectual) and resolving nevertheless to carry his point, gave himself up more entirely than ever to the faction of the People, and connected himself even with Clodius, because a favourite of the multitude.

Clodius, who had been contriving how to revenge himself on Cicero, began now to give an opening to the scheme which he had formed for that purpose. His project was to get himself chosen Tribune, and in that office to drive him out of the City. But as all Patricians were incapable of the Tribuneship by its original institution, so his first step was to make himself a Plebeian by the pretence of an adoption into a Plebeian house, which could not yet be done without the suffrage of the People. This case was wholly new, and contrary to all the forms, wanting every condition, and serving none of the ends, which were required in regular adoptions; so that, on the first proposal, it seemed too extravagant to be treated seriously. The solicitor of it was one Herennius, an obscure hardy Tribune, who first moved it to the Senate, and afterwards to the People; but met with no encouragement from either: For the Consul Metellus, the brother-in-law to Clodius, though he gave into it at first, warmly opposed it afterwards, and declared, That he would strangle him sooner with his own hands, than suffer him to bring such a disgrace upon his family. Herennius, however, persisted to press it, but without any visible success; and so the matter hung through the remainder of the year.

Midd.

280.

Ad Att. ii.

1.

Ibid.

Pro Cælio, xxiv.

Cicero affected to treat it with contempt, sometimes rallying Clodius with much pleasantry, sometimes admonishing him with no less gravity: He said to him one day in the SENATE, Your attempt ought to give us no manner of pain: It will be no more in your power, when a Plebeian, to overturn the State, than it was in the power of the Patricians of the same stamp in the time of my Consulship. But, whatever face the Orator put outwardly upon this affair, it gave him a real uneasiness within, and made him unite himself more closely with Pompey, for the benefit of his protection against a storm, which he saw ready to break upon him. Imagining, at the same time, that this step would be censured by many, as a desertion of his old principles,

Ad Att. ii.
1.

Midd.
281.

Y. R. 693. principles, he takes frequent occasion to explain the motives of it to his
 Ref. Chr. friend Atticus, declaring, "That the absolution of Clodius, the alienation 392 Conf. " of the Knights, the indolence and luxury of the CONSULAR SENATORS, " who minded nothing but their fish-ponds, their carps, and mullets, and yet
 " were all envious of him, made it necessary for him to seek some firmer
 " support and alliance. — That in this new friendship he should attend Ad. Ant. i. " still to what the Sicilian wag Epicarmus whispered, Be watchful, and
 19. " distrust; for those are the nerves of the mind." On another occasion he Tard. 20. observes, "That his union with Pompey, though useful to himself, was " more useful to the Republic, by gaining a man of his power and au" thority, who was wavering and irresolute, from the hopes and intrigues
 " of the factious: That if this could not have been done without drawing
 " upon himself a charge of levity, he would not have purchased that, or
 " or any other advantage at such a price; but he had managed the matter
 " so, as not to be thought the worse Citizen for joining with Pompey, but
 " Pompey himself the better by declaring for him. — That, since Catu-
 " lus's death, he stood single and unsupported by the other Consulars in
 " the cause of the Aristocracy; for, as the Poet Rhinton says, some of them
 " were good for nothing, others cared for nothing. But how much these
 " fishmongers of ours envy me, says he, I will write you word another " time, or reserve it to our meeting. Yet nothing shall ever draw me " away from the Senate; because to adhere to it is right, and most agree" able to my interest, and because I am pleased with the marks of re-Ad. Ant. ii. " spect which they give me." In a third letter he says, "You chide me " gently for my union with Pompey: I would not have you to think,
 " that I sought it for my own sake; but things were come to such a " crisis, that, if any difference had happened between us, it must have " caused great disturbance in the Republic, which I have guarded against
 " in such a manner, that, without departing from my old maxims, I have " rendered him the better, and made him remit somewhat of his popu" larity: For you must know, that he now speaks of my acts, which " many have been incensing him against, much more gloriously than he " does of his own; and declares, That he had only served the State suc" cessfully, but that I had saved it. What good this will do me, I know " not; but it will certainly do much to the Republic. What if I could " make Cæsar also a better Citizen, whose winds are now very prospere" rous; should I do any great harm by it? Nay, if there were none who " really envied me, but all were encouraging me as they ought, it would
 " yet be more commendable to heal the vitiated part of the State, than
 " to cut them off: But now, when that body of Knights, who were " planted by me in my Consulship, with you at their head, as our guard
 " in the Capitol, have deserted the Senate, and our CONSULARS place their
 " chief happiness in training the fish in their ponds to feed from their hands,
 " and mind nothing else; do not you think, that I am doing good service,
 " by

“ by managing so, that those who can do mischief, will not? For, as “ to our friend Cato, you cannot love him more than I do; yet, with “ the best intentions and the greatest integrity, he often hurts the Repub“ lic; for he delivers his opinion as if it were in the polity of Plato, “ not in the dregs of Romulus. What could be more just than to call “ those to an account who had received money for judging? Cato pro“ posed, the Senate agreed to it: The Knights presently declared war “ against the Senate, not against me; for I was not of that opinion.
 “ What more impudent than to demand a release from their contract?
 “ yet it was better to suffer that loss, than to alienate the whole order:
 “ But Cato opposed it, and prevailed; so that now, when the Consul “ was thrown into prison, as well as in all the tumults which have lately “ happened, no one of them would stir a foot; though under me, and the “ Consuls that succeeded me, they had defended the Republic so strenu“ ously,” &c.

Y. R. 693.
 Bef. Chr.
 59
 392 Conf.
 Ad Att.
 ii. 1.

In the midst of these transactions, Julius Caesar returned from the government of farther Spain^c, with great fame both for his military and political acts. That province had been allotted him from the expiration of his office of Prætor, which he held in 691. He had conquered the barbarous nations by his arms, and civilized them by his laws; and having subdued the whole country as far as the ocean, and been saluted Emperor by the soldiers, came away in all haste to Rome, to sue at the same time for the double honour of a Triumph and the Consulship. But his demand of the first was incompatible with his pretensions to the second; the one obliging him to continue without the City, the other making his presence necessary within. Many of the Senators, however, were well inclined to dispense with the Laws in his favour. Cato opposed this with his usual steadiness; and, lest his reasons should not prevail, he kept talking till the House broke up. The time for the elections was at hand: Cæsar, therefore, made no hesitation in preferring the solid to the specious; he ceased his pursuit of the triumph to stand for the Consulship, joining interests with L. Luceius, formerly mentioned^d, on condition that this candidate, who was rich, should furnish the money to bribe the centuries. The SENATE, that Cæsar might not have a colleague subservient to his will, espoused the other candidate Bibulus with all their authority, and made a common purse to enable him to bribe as high as his competitors: Which bribery even Cato (if we may believe Suetonius^e) approved, as thinking it

Pro Balbo
 19 Suet.
 J. Cæf.
 18 vid. it.
 Dio, l.
 xxxvii.
 p. 54.

Suet. in J.
 Cæf. 18,
 19.

^c Plutarch tells us, that in Cæsar's journey to Spain at this time, when some of his friends took notice of the miserable condition of the inhabitants of some little town on the Alps, and one asked another in pleasantry, whether there could be any disputes in that place about ranks and offices, or any jealousies among their Chiefs,

Cæsar, with an air of seriousness, declared, that he would rather be the first man there than the second in Rome.

^d Vide supra, p. 326.

^e Plerique pecunias contulerunt, ne Cato quidem abnuente eam largitionem è Rep. heri.

Y. R. 691. for the public good. By this means they got Bibulus elected, a man firm to Bcf. Chr. their interest, and determined to obstruct every attempt of Cæsar which 59 they should dislike.
 192 Conf.

Crassus, Pompey, and Cæsar, were at this time the men who bore the greatest sway in the State, the first by reason of his prodigious wealth, Pompey for his power with the soldiery, and Cæsar for his admirable eloquence and a peculiar nobleness of spirit. These three entered into a solemn agreement to let nothing pass in the Commonwealth without their joint approbation, which triple league is commonly called the The First Triumvirate.

Vell. Pat.
 A. 44.

Pompey's chief motive to this alliance was to get his acts confirmed by the influence of Cæsar in his Consulship.

Plut. in Cæ. App.
 de B. Civ.
 ii. p. 432.
 Suet. ib.
 18.

The aim of Crassus was to maintain, by the assistance of Pompey's authority and Cæsar's vigour, that rank in the State which, without their aid, he could not hope to preserve. He had purchased the friendship of Cæsar at the time when the latter, just on the point of setting out to take possession of his government of Spain, was grievously importuned by his clamorous creditors, who sought to obstruct his departure: Crassus became bound for him as far as 200,000 l. sterling, (for so much did he want to be worth nothing, as he merrily said of himself :) And it is highly probable, that what induced Crassus to act so friendly a part at that time, was to be enabled to make head against his rival Pompey by the auxiliary strength of Cæsar: But now it was become his interest to join with Pompey, as well as with Cæsar, in one common scheme.

Vell. Pat.
 A. 44.

As for Cæsar, he, without question, in giving way to Pompey's glory had the advancement of his own in view: But, whatever private views each of the confederates may have had, if we consider in what hands ' the administration

' Dr. Middleton begins the fourth section of his first volume of the Life of Cicero with these words:

" Cicero, being now reduced to the condition of a private Senator, was to take his place on that VENERABLE BENCH OF CONSULARS, who were justly reckoned the first Citizens of the Republic. They delivered their opinions the first always in the Senate, and commonly determined the opinions of the rest: For, as they had passed through all the public offices, and been conversant in every branch of the administration, so their experience gave them great authority in all debates; and having little or nothing further to expect for themselves, they were esteemed not only the most knowing, but, generally speaking, the most disinterested of all the other Senators, and to have no other view in their deliberations but the peace and prosperity of the Republic.

" This was a station exactly suited to Cicero's temper and wishes; he desired no foreign governments, or command of armies: his province was the Senate and the Forum; to guard, as it were, the vitals of the empire, and to direct all its counsels to their proper end, the general good; and in this advanced post of a CONSULAR SENATOR, as in a watch tower of the State, to observe each threatening cloud and rising storm, and give the alarm to his fellow Citizens from what quarter it was coming, and by what means its effects might be prevented."

To

administration of the Empire had been of late years, it will not, perhaps, seem wonderful that those three men, having a favourable opportunity to do it, should take into their own hands the management of the public affairs. The Triumvirs cannot be said to have made attempts on the Roman constitution, or indeed on any legal authority or government. Anarchy prevailed. We have seen Senators the most celebrated by the Historians for their patriotism, employing themselves in the infamous practices of corrupting Judges and suborning false witnesses: We have seen a daring ruffian threatening a full Senate with destruction, and yet suffered by the Senate peaceably to go and put himself at the head of an army that was to effect that destruction; yet we have seen the same Senate, presently after, assume a lawless power of putting Citizens of the first rank to death, without previous trial and condemnation: we have seen them presume to suspend a Tribune of the People from the exercise of his office, and openly, by a common purse, practise that bribery they had so often condemned, as ruinous to the State. Cato, that stout champion of the Laws, we have seen him a riotous magistrate, violating the privileges of the Tribuneship in the person of one of his colleagues, and, from personal hatred to Cæsar, approved of bribery and corruption in the election of magistrates, after he himself had prosecuted Muræna for a violation of the Laws in that particular: And, lastly, Cicero, the consummate Patriot, pleading in defiance of his own reason and conscience, against punishing, or even calling to account, Judges, notoriously guilty of selling the most iniquitous decrees.

The league of the TRIUMVIRS seemed to want a man of Cicero's character to make it complete: For, whenever they should be engaged in foreign governments, or the command of armies abroad, his authority would be of singular use at home, to manage the affairs of the City, and solicit what they had to transact with the Senate or People. Cæsar, therefore, just before he entered upon the Consulship, sent him word (by their common friend Cornelius Balbus) that he would be governed in

To this description of a CONSULAR SENATOR, if we compare it with what Cicero himself says of a VENERABLE BENCH, may, I think, be applied, not improperly, a passage in Monsieur Bayle, where, on occasion of some groundless reflections, delivered in a pompous oratorical style, by the Abbé de St. Real, on the conduct of King Lewis XI. of France, he exhorts his readers to beware of reflections so adorned. “ Je souhaite que cette remarque serve d'avertissement au Lecteur, qu'il n'y a point de pensées dont il faille plus de desier que de celles qu'on debite d'une maniere éblouissante, & d'un ton majestueux. Les réflexions de l'Abbé de St. Real que je viens d'examiner sont les plus propres du monde

VOL. III.

“ à éblouir; mais otez leur ornemens, regardez-les un peu de près en elles-mêmes, vous n'y trouverez rien de solide.” Dict. de Bayle, artic. LOUIS XI. rem. V.

Who would expect that the Doctor's VENERABLE BENCH of CONSULAR SENATORS were, according to Cicero himself, only a company of fishmongers, of whom some were good for nothing, and others minded nothing but their fish-ponds, their carps, and mulletts, and placed their chief happiness in training the fish in their ponds to feed from their hands? See Midd. p. 281, 282, 283: And see what Cato says of their regard for the Republic, supra, p. 364.

3 F

every

Y. R. 693. every step by him and Pompey, and would likewise use his utmost endeavours (for the Triple League was not yet divulged) to effect a perfect agreement between Pompey and Crassus.
 Bef. Chr. 59.
 392 Conf.

An union, formed by Cæsar, between Crassus and Pompey, gave Cicero no pleasing prospect with regard to the Public; and he was much at a loss to know how to act in this crisis, as he signifies to Atticus in the letter, where he mentions Cæsar's message to him by Balbus.

THE Roman History.

N I N T H B O O K.

From the end of the Year 693, when that Triple League between CRASSUS, POMPEY, and CÆSAR, which is called the FIRST TRIUMVIRATE, was formed, to the beginning of the Civil War in the year 704.

C H A P. I.

The acts of the Triumvirate during CÆSAR's Consulship, year of Rome 694.

WHEN C. Julius Cæsar and L. Calpurnius Bibulus entered upon the Consulship, four affairs of very great importance, and much contested, were depending: Y. R. 694.
Bef. Chr.
58.
393 Conf.

1. Pompey's Agrarian Law.
2. The ratification of Pompey's acts in the East.
3. The petition of the Knights, farmers of the Asiatic revenues to be released from the contract they had made with the Censors (for, though their petition had been once rejected by the Senate, they renewed their solicitations :) and,
4. Clodius's project of making himself a Plebeian, that he might be capable of the Tribuneship.

Y. R. 694.
Bef. Chr.
58.
393 Conf.

Dio, l.
xxxviii. p.
58, 59, 60,

As the political principles of Cæsar and Bibulus were wholly opposite to each other, so were their views and proceedings. But the main trial of strength between them was about the Agrarian law. Cæsar had prepared it, and now resolved to propose it in his own name. He presented it first to the Senate, asking their consent to lay it before the People. He represented to them, that a distribution of lands among the poor Citizens was not only useful, but even necessary for disburdening the City of an indigent multitude, ever prone to sedition, to repeople and cultivate several parts of Italy which were deserted, and to recompence the soldiers who had bravely and faithfully served the Commonwealth.

That the Law, as he had prepared it, could bring no new charge either on the State or on private persons: That, in the distribution of the public lands, he had excepted the territory of Capua, so valuable by its fertility. That as to those lands which were to be bought of private persons, he had ordered, that it should be only of such persons as were willing to sell; and that the price of the lands should be according to their valuation in the Censor's books. That the Republic was enabled to bear this expence, as well by the prodigious sums that Pompey had brought into the Public Treasury, as by the tribute that he had imposed upon his new conquests.

Cæsar observed further, that, for the distribution of the lands, twenty commissioners were to be elected, a number too large to leave room for the apprehension of their agreeing in any thing that might be dangerous to the Public Liberty. That, content with the honour of having proposed the affair, he had excepted himself out of the number of those who might be chosen for the employment: and he concluded with an intimation that there were twenty honourable places, which might be agreeable to some of the Senators.

When he had thus represented the matter to the Senate in general, he addressed himself to each of the Senators in particular, desiring him to declare whether he had any thing to object to the Law proposed, and offered to retrench those articles that could justly displease, and even to abandon his project entirely, if it could be shewn to be unreasonable.

To these questions (if we may believe Dio) the Senate could not answer a word, nor point out any thing exceptionable in the Law; and he adds, that nothing piqued them so much as to find, that a proposal, which they extremely disliked, was not liable to censure. Even Cato was unable to find fault; yet he warmly and obstinately opposed the Law, assigning no other reason for so doing, but that, in his opinion, things ought to remain as they were. It is probable that Cato (whom we have formerly seen lose all regard to decency in his treatment of Cæsar) provoked him, on this occasion, with some outrageous abuse, such as might justify him, as being then one of the supreme Magistrates, in committing the offender to prison. Cato, being ordered into custody, left the Senate-House without a word of complaint, but continued talking against the

Law

Plut. in.
Cat. &
Cæf.

Law as he went along^a. Cæsar, either because he condemned his own anger as intemperate, or because he perceived the Senators much displeased, presently released the prisoner, and dismissed the Assembly; but declared to them at the same time, that, since they would neither approve his Law, nor say what they had to object to it, he would refer it the People. He did as he had threatened: He consulted the Senate no more in this affair, nor in any other that occurred.

Y. R. 694.
Bef. Chr.
58.
393 Conf.
Dio.

When Cæsar brought his Law before the People, he had added to it a clause for distributing (what he had before excepted) the lands of Campania to 20,000 poor Citizens who had three children or more. He had seven of the Tribunes on his side in this contest. Bibulus mustered all his forces, and came down to the Forum, full of courage and resolution, guarded by three of the Tribunes and the greater part of the Senate; and as often as Cæsar attempted to recommend the Law, he as often interrupted him, and declared, that it should never pass in his year. Cæsar asked him (when they were both in the Rostra) whether he found any thing exceptionable in the Law? To which Bibulus made this answer only, That he would oppose all innovations. Hereupon Cæsar exhorted the People to employ their intreaties with his Collegue to desist from his opposition to a Law so beneficial to them. Bibulus, addressing himself to the multitude, — Not a tittle of it shall pass while I am Consul, though you should all desire it; and away he went, as soon as he had uttered those words. Then Cæsar produced Pompey and Crassus into the Rostra to signify their opinion of the Law. Pompey, running over the whole, commended every article of it, declaring, that it was highly reasonable the poor Citizens should partake of the opulence of the State. The People were delighted. Cæsar, raising his voice, said to Pompey, Since you approve of the Law, I desire to know whether you will support it, in case those who are against it employ violence to hinder its being received? Pompey answered, If they come to oppose it with the sword, I will come with sword and buckler to support it: A declaration received with loud applause by the multitude. Crassus too applauded what Pompey had said, and pressed the acceptance of the Law.

Plut. in
Cæf. &
Pomp.

Bibulus, now despairing of success by any other method of opposition, had recourse to the stratagem^b of proclaiming every day a holiday for the remaining part of the year, thereby to hinder all transacting of business with the People. Cæsar laughed at his collegue's edict, and named a particular day for the People to give their suffrages upon the Law. While Cæsar, on the day appointed, was speaking to the People Bibulus arrived,

^a Dio adds, that several of the Senators followed Cato, and, among the rest, M. Petreius, who, being asked by Cæsar, why he went out before the House broke up, answered — Because I had rather be with Cato in prison than with you in the Senate.

^b Sylla, in his first Consulship, made use of the same stratagem in a dispute with the Tribune Sulpicius; but the Tribune forced him to revoke his ordinance.

Vid. supr.
p. 125.

Y. R. 694. interrupted him, and once more repeated his declaration, that the Law
 Bel. Car. should never pass while he was Consul. From words the two parties soon
 28. came to blows: Bibulus was roughly treated, his three Tribunes wounded,
 193. C. 1. and his whole faction driven out of the Forum by the Tribune Vatinius, at the head of the Triumvir's faction: so that the Law passed upon the spot, without any further contradiction.

Bibulus made his complaint the next day, in the Senate, of the violence offered to his person; but finding that nobody cared to enter into the affair, or to move any thing about it, he retired to his house in despair, and there shut himself up during all the remaining part of his Consulship, that is to say, for eight months entire, exercising no one function of his office, except that, whenever Caesar undertook any thing new, he republished his ordinance, by which he had converted every day of the year into a holiday.

By a special clause in the new Law, the Senate and all the Magistrates were obliged, under grievous penalties, to take an oath to the observance of it^c; which oath Cato himself, though he had publicly declared that he would never do it, was induced at last to take. It is said that Cicero brought him to compliance, by representing to him, that perhaps it was not justifiable for a private person to declare a dislike to what had been regulated by the whole nation: He added, After labouring for the good of your Country, how can you abandon it at this time, and, instead of continuing to fight in its defence, give it up a prey to its enemies, consulting only your own repose? For if Cato has no need of Rome, Rome has need of Cato. All your friends con-jure you not to be inflexible, and myself the first of all, to whom you cannot refuse your assistance in the present conjuncture, when Clodius aspires to the Tribuneship for my destruction.

Cicero, nevertheless, speaks with great indignation, in a letter to Atti- cus, of the proceedings of the Triumvirs, and wonders at Pompey's policy in supporting Caesar in an act so odious as that of alienating the best revenues of the Republic: and says, that he must not think to make them amends, by his rents on Mount Libanus, for the loss of those which he had taken from them in Campania.

During these transactions, Clodius was pushing on the affair of his adoption, and soliciting the People to confirm the Law which he had provided for that purpose. The Triumvirate pretended to be against it, or at least to stand neuter; but were watching Cicero's motions, in order to take their measures from his conduct, which they did not find so obsequious as they expected. In this interval it happened, that C. Antonius, Cicero's colleague, who had governed Macedonia from the time of his Consulship, was now impeached, and brought to a trial, for the male-

Ad Attic. xi. 18. & pro Planc. 2.
^c The obligation of swearing was extended, by the Law, to the candidates for next year's magistracies. M. Juvencius Laterensis chose rather to renounce his pretensions to the Tribuneship, than take the oath: But he was the only one who acted that part.

administration of his province, and, being found guilty¹, was condemned to

Y. R. 694.
Bel. Chu.
58.
393 Conf.

^d M. Cælius (the same Cælius for whom Cicero afterwards pleaded) was the chief of three accusers who impeached Antonius. M. Crevier is of opinion, that Antonius was not prosecuted for male-administration in his province, but as an accomplice of Catiline: And for this he cites Cic. pro Cæl. Accusavit [Cælius] C. Antonium, collegam meum: Cui misero præclari in Rempublicam beneficii memoria nihil profuit, nocuit opinio maleficii cogitati: Which passage, nevertheless, in conjunction with another, in Cic. pro Flacco, (to which the learned Writer likewise refers) seems strongly to oppugn that opinion. Flaccus, when Prætor in 690, had been instrumental in suppressing Catiline's Conspiracy; and so had Antonius, then Consul, who, for some crime, was afterwards condemned in the beginning of 694. In the same year Flaccus was prosecuted for male-administration in his province of Asia. His Advocate, Cicero, reminds the Judges of his Client's services against Catiline, and insinuates, that there were persons who had malicious purposes against all those who had served their Country on that occasion. "Antonius is already oppressed. Be it so: He had a peculiar infamy upon him; Yet even he, if I may be allowed to say it, would not have been condemned by you: upon whose condemnation a sepulchre was dressed up for Catiline---Now the death of Lentulus is to be revenged on Flaccus. Oppressus est C. Antonius. Esto: Habuit quamdam ille infamiam suam: Neque tamen ille ipse, pro meo jure dico, vobis iudiciis damnatus esset: cujus damnatione sepulchrum L. Catilinæ celebratum est. --- Nunc a Flacco Lentuli pænæ per vos expectantur." What was the peculiar infamy upon Antonius, that infamy which lessened his merit, and distinguished it from that of Flaccus? Doubtless, it was his being reputed, or rather known, to be a friend to Catiline in his heart, while he was acting against him.

Nocuit opinio maleficii cogitati. "Nevertheless, you, (says Cicero to the Judges) when he was accused of male-administration in Macedonia, would have absolved him, on account of the signal service which, in fact, he did to the Republic when he was Consul." This seems to be the sense of the Orator. He supposes both Antonius and Flaccus to have been prosecuted for male-administration in their provinces, not because there was sufficient ground for such accusation, but on account of what they had done against Catiline.

That Antonius, notwithstanding all the power of Cicero's eloquence exerted in his defence, was readily condemned, seems owing to that infamy which Cicero mentions: Though unquestionably guilty of rapine and extortion in his province, he would, probably, have escaped condemnation, had not his filling himself to act contrary to his inclinations and engagements, made him universally despised and detested by both the friends and the enemies of the Conspirators. With regard to this advocacy of Cicero for Antonius, there are some particulars which may be thought to deserve attention. Cicero writes to him (then Governor of Macedonia in 691) in these terms: --- "Were I to claim even your highest services, the demand could by no means be thought unreasonable, after having contributed every thing on my part for the advancement of your ease, your interest, and your honour." [This hints at his having resigned the lucrative government of Macedonia to him.] "But I may safely appeal to your own conscience, whether you have ever made me the least return: So far from it indeed, that I have heard, (for I dare not say I have been informed*, as it is an expression, it seems which you frequently, though, I am sure, injuriously, object to me,) I have heard then that you have intimated something as if--- "But I leave it to Atticus to tell you the rest; as the report has given him no less concern.

Ep. Fam.
I. Ep. iv.
Melin.
Transl.

* This alludes to the expression [se comperisse] which Cicero had often occasion to employ in the affair of Catiline's Conspiracy. As his principal intelligence arose from some of the Conspirators themselves, who communicated to him, from time to time, the designs of their associates, he was obliged to conceal the Authors of these discoveries:---But though the event proved that his informations were true, yet, in general, this method of accusation was extremely odious, and of dangerous example. Cicero's enemies, therefore, did not fail to take advantage of this popular objection, and were perpetually repeating the phrase, I am informed, whenever they were disposed to reproach his conduct in this transaction. See Meng. Rem. 19. on the nineteenth Letter of the first Book to Atticus. Plut. in vit. Cic. Sallust. Declam. in Cic. 2.

Melin. Vol.
I. p. 18.

" than

V. R. 694. to perpetual banishment. Cicero was his advocate; and, in the course
 Bel. Chr. of 58.

 793. Conf.

“ than it gave myself. In the mean time I “ will only say, that the Senate, and the whole “ Roman People, have been witnesses of that “ uncommon zeal with which I have entered “ into your interest. — Believe me, your “ present affairs require a much larger pro“ portion of my zeal and pains; the utmost “ exertion of which shall not be wanting, pro“ vided I may have reason to think, that they “ are not entirely thrown away. — Atticus will “ inform you in what particular instances you “ may, probably, have occasion for my good “ offices.” —

This letter was written towards the end of 691: Atticus was the bearer. On the first of January, 692, Cicero writes to Atticus in terms to the following effect: “ There is no coming “ to any conclusion with Fenris [a nickname
 “ for Antonius]—Never did I see any thing
 “ more impudent, more sly, more dilatory “ than he is. — So much the better, per“ haps, for me: For Pompey’s harbingers tell “ me, that he will loudly declare for the re“ call of Antonius from his government, and “ that the Prætor will, at the same time, “ move it to the People. Now the case is
 “ of such a nature, that I cannot defend him, “ without incurring the censure not only of “ the most worthy, but even of the vulgar.
 “ For something has fallen out, which I must “ desire you to examine to the bottom. I have “ a freedman, a worthless fellow, I mean Hil-“ larus, who was your accomptant, and whose “ patron you are. This Hilarus, as Valerius
 “ the Linguist, and also Cabilus, have signi“ fied to me, is now with Antonius, who “ gives out, that part of the money, which he “ exerts from the people of his province, is “ for my use, and that I have sent one of my “ freedmen to him to be the Keeper of our “ Common Purse. This touched me very “ sensibly; not that I gave entire credit to the “ report: yet some word must have dropt
 “ from Antonius to occasion such a story. En“ deavour by every method to learn the whole “ truth; and do not fail to drive that rogue “ [Hilarus,] if it be possible, out of the “ Country. Valerius tells me, that he had “ the story from Cr. Plancius.” [He was, at this time, a Tribune of the soldiers in Macedonia; was afterwards Quæstor in the time of Cicero’s exile, and very serviceable to him.

 He is the same Plancius for whom Cicero
 afterwards spoke the Oration pro Plancio.]

“ The very judicious French Translator of Melm.
 “ the Epistles to Atticus seems to imagine Vol. I. p.
 “ there was some foundation for this report; 18. note (2)
 “ as he thinks it probable, that Antonius had “ agreed to pay Cicero a certain sum, in con“ sideration of his having relinquished to him
 “ the government of Macedonia: But this is “ a conjecture altogether unsupported by any “ evidence. Thus much, however, is cer“ tain; in the first place, that Cicero had some “ demands on Antonius, of a nature which “ he did not chuse should be known; as,
 “ whenever he hints at them to Atticus, it is “ always in a very dark and ænigmatical man“ ner: And in the next place, that he sacri“ ficed his own judgment, and the good opi“ nion of the world, in order to support An-“ tonius in his present government. From “ which facts the Reader is left to draw the “ conclusion that he shall judge reasonable.”
Vid. ad Att. lib. xii. 13, 14.

In the fifth Letter of the first book of Ep.
 Fam. Cicero writes thus to Publius Sestius,
 Quæstor, [under Antonius in Macedonia:]

“ Notwithstanding all the world
 “ is sensible, that Antonius has by no means “ acted towards me with the gratitude he “ ought, yet it did not prevent me from “ being his advocate lately in the SENATE:
 “ when, by the influence of my authority,
 “ and the force of what I said, I greatly “ disposed the House in his favour.” —

“ The question in this debate probably Melm.
 “ turned on the recall of Antonius: a ques“ tion, which seems either to have been car“ ried in his favour, or to have been drop“ ped during a considerable time. For it ap“ pears, by a letter to Atticus, written two “ years after the date of the present, that An-“ tonius was still in his government: And Ad. Att.
 “ Dion Cassius assures us, that he was not xi. 2.
 “ brought upon his trial till the Consulate of “ Caesar; that is, not till 694. He was “ then arraigned for his ill conduct in Mace“ donia, and as being concerned likewise in Ca“ tiline’s Conspiracy. This last article of the “ impeachment could not be proved; but the “ truth of it, nevertheless, was generally believed:

of his pleading, happened to fall into a complaint of the times, and the oppression of the Republic, in a stile that was interpreted to reflect severely upon the present rulers. The story was carried directly to Cæsar, who disdaining to contest with Cicero in the way of invectives and smart repartees, yet resolving to humble him, brought on, without delay, the law to confirm Clodius's adoption, instantly calling an Assembly of the Curiae for that purpose. The ministry of one of the Augurs was necessary. Pompey performed this office, and the affair was carried through all the forms to a conclusion with surprizing dispatch. Cicero pleaded for Antonius at noon, and at three o'clock Clodius was a Plebeian.

Bibulus, advertised of what was going forward, and being an Augur, sent notice to Pompey, that he was observing the heavens, and taking the auspices, during which function no business could legally be transacted with the People. But Pompey, instead of paying any regard to his message, gave a sanction to the proceeding, by presiding in it, so that it was carried without any opposition.

Cæsar, having made his court to the multitude by the Agrarian Law, took the opportunity, which the present conjuncture afforded, to conciliate

“ lieved : however, he was convicted of the “ former, and condemned to perpetual banishment. Cicero appeared as his Advocate on this occasion, &c.

Vid. supra, p. 407. [I have offered some reasons against the supposition of Antonius's being arraigned as a Conspirator with Catiline.]

Crevier. Strabo, l. x. 455. Strabo assures us, that Antonius chose the isle of Cephalenia for the place of his exile, of which he acquired the entire Lordship, and in which he built a new city, but had not time to put the last hand to the work before he was recalled home. If this fact be true, Antonius must have enriched himself prodigiously by plundering his province ; for he was over head and ears in debt during his Consulship.

Midd. p. 292. “ These Laws of adoption were drawn up in the stile of a petition to the People, after the following form :

Vid. A. Gell. lib. v. 19. May it please you, Citizens, to ordain, that P. Clodius be, to all intents and purposes of Law, as truly the son of Fonteius, as if he were begotten of his body in lawful marriage ; and that Fonteius have the power of life and death over him, as much as a father has over a proper son : This, Citizens, I pray you to confirm in the manner in which it is desired.

There were three conditions absolutely necessary to make an act of this kind regular :

First, That the adopter should be older than the adopted, and incapable of procreating children, after having endeavoured it without success when he was capable : Secondly, That no injury or diminution should be done to the dignity or the religious rites of either family : Thirdly, That there should be no fraud or collusion in it ; nor any thing sought by it, but the genuine effects of a real adoption. All these particulars were to be previously examined by the College of Priests ; and if, after a due enquiry, they approved the petition, it was proposed to the suffrage of the Citizens living in Rome, who voted according to their original division into thirty Curiae, or wards, which seem to have been analogous to our parishes ; where no business, however, could be transacted when an Augur or Consul was observing the heavens. Now, in this adoption of Clodius, there was not one of these conditions observed : The College of Priests was not so much as consulted ; the adopter, Fonteius, had a wife and children, was a man obscure and unknown, not full twenty years old, when Clodius was thirty-five, and a Senator of the noblest birth in Rome : Nor was there any thing meant by it, but purely to procure the Tribuneship : For the affair was no sooner over, than Clodius was emancipated, or set free again, by his new Father, from all his obligations.

Y.R. 694. the Knights to him, by doing that which Cicero had blamed the Senate for not doing; that is to say, by easing them of the disadvantageous contract which they had long, in vain, complained of, and remitting a third part of what they had stipulated to pay.

Vid. sup.
2. 35+

Suet. J.
Cæf. 20.

And lastly, Cæsar procured a special Law from the People for the ratification of all Pompey's acts in Asia; and, in the struggle about it, so terrified and humbled Lucullus, who was the chief opposer, that he brought him to ask pardon as his feet.

Ad Att.
ii. 19.

Cic. ad
Att. ix. 2.

It does not appear, that any other lands but those of Campania, were distributed by virtue of the new Agrarian Law. Twenty Commissioners¹ were chosen to make distribution; and Pompey did not disdain to be of the number. One of them (named *Cosconius*²) dying before the end of the year, his place was offered to Cicero, but he refused it: And he tells us, that Cæsar often reproached him afterwards with this refusal, as a proof of his enmity, and that he would receive no favour from him.

Ad Att.
ii. 6.

During a great part of the time when these things were in agitation, Cicero contrived to be out of the way. He spent the months of April and May in the country, mostly at his villa near Antium, where he had placed his chief collection of books, amusing himself with his studies and his children, or, as he says jocosely, in counting the waves. For he was under no small difficulty to determine how he should act in relation to the public affairs. If he opposed the Triumvirate, he could not expect to continue well with Pompey, (with whom he wished, at the same time, to engage in a separate alliance, imagining that this would be sufficient to screen him from the malice of his enemies :) If he made himself subservient to the Triumvirate, he could not expect to continue well with the SENATE: In the first he saw his ruin; in the second, the loss of his credit. He chose, therefore, a middle way; which was, so to temper his behaviour, that, without submitting to explicit approbation of what was doing by the Triumvirs, he might avoid irritating their power to his own destruction. This was the scheme of politics, which (as he often laments) the weakness of the honest [the fish-pond men] the perverseness of the envious [nobody knows who] and the hatred of the wicked [the popular party] obliged him to pursue.

Ad Att.
19.

Ad Att.
ii. 7.
Midd.
296.

While Cicero was in the country, he was desired by Atticus to send him the copies of two Orations which he had lately made. His answer was,

¹ The twenty Commissioners established a colony at Capua, and thus drew that City out of the subjection in which the Romans had kept it for above 150 years. It had all that time borne the punishment of its revolt against Rome after the battle of Cannæ, and had continued without Senate, without Magistrates, and without an Assembly of the People. It was only the retreat of those who cultivated the territory, and every year an officer was sent from Rome to administer justice there. Raised by Cæsar to the rank of a Colony, it was delivered from this kind of servitude. The Roman Colonies were like little Commonwealths, which governed themselves in imitation of Rome, the metropolis. Crev.

² Cosconius had been Prætor in Cicero's Consulship, and afterwards Proconsul in Spain.

that

that he had torn one of them, and could not give a copy; and did not care to let the other go abroad, for the praises which it bestowed on Pompey; being disposed rather to recant than publish them, since the adoption of Clodius.— Ad Att. He seems indeed to have been too impetuous at present to compose any thing but invectives, of which kind he was now drawing up certain anecdotes, as he calls them, or a Secret History of the Times, to be shewn to none but Atticus, in the stile of Theopompus, the most satirical of all writers. All his politics, he says, were reduced to this one point, of bating bad Citizens [the leaders of the popular party] and pleasing himself with writing against them. And since he was driven from the helm, he had nothing to wish, but to see the wreck from the shore; or, as Sophocles says:

Under the shelter of a good warm roof,
With mind serenely calm, and prone to sleep,
Hear the loud storm and beating rain without.

Clodius, having got through the obstacle of his adoption, began, without loss of time, to sue for the Tribuneship; whilst a report was industriously spread, which amused the City for a while, of a breach between him and the Triumvirs. The new Plebeian declared every where loudly, that his chief view, in desiring the office of Tribune, was to rescind all Cæsar's acts; and Cæsar, on his part, as openly disclaimed any share in his adoption, and denied him to be a Plebeian^b. This story (whether true or false) was eagerly carried to Cicero by his dear disciple, the younger Curioⁱ (who had assured him before, that he hated, to a prodigious degree, the proud Kings, and that all the young Nobles were as much incensed against them as he himself, and would not bear them much longer) and that Memmius and Metellius Nepos had declared against them: Which being confirmed also by Atticus's letters, gave no small comfort to Cicero; all whose hopes of a change, to the advantage of his cause depended upon their quarrelling among themselves. The pretended ground of this rupture, as it is hinted in Cicero's letters, was Clodio's slighting an offer, which the Triumvirate made to him, of an Embassy to King Tigranes. Cicero, mentioning this affair to Atticus, says, "I am much delighted with what you write about Clodius: try all means to search into the bottom of it; and send or bring me word whatever you learn or suspect, and especially what he intends to do about the embassy. Before I read your letter, I was

Ad Att.
ii. 12.

^b Negent illi Publium Plebeium factum esse. Hoc vero regnum est & ferri nullo pacto potest. Emittit ad me Publius [Clodius] qui obsignat: jurabo Cnaum nostrum Collegam Balbi, Antii mihi narrasse, se in Auspicio fuisse.—

Balbus was probably named one of the Commissioners with Pompey for planting a Colony at Capua, and accompanied Pompey at the time when, in his way thither, Cicero saw him at Antium. Balbus had been Prætor. He had married Cæsar's sister, by whom he had a daughter, who married Octavius, father of the Emperor Augustus. Mong. Tom. I. P. 394.

ⁱ He was son of Scribonius Curio, Consul in 677.

Y. R. 694. " wishing that he would accept it ; not for the sake of declining a battle Bet. Chr. " with him, for I am in wonderful spirits for fighting ; but I imagined,
 58. " that he would lose by it all the popularity which he has gained, by go-593 Conf. " ing over to the Plebeians.—If he slights the embassy, and if this, as " you say, disgusts the authors and promoters of the Law, we shall have " rare sport. But, to say the truth, Publius has been treated somewhat " rudely by them ; since he, who was lately the only man with Cæsar, can" not now find a place among the TWENTY ; and, after promising one
 " embassy, they put him off with another ; reserving, I suppose, the lu" crative ones to be bestowed upon Drusus, or Vatinus, while they bestow
 " the barren one upon him, whose Tribuneship was proposed to be of such
 " use to them. Warm him, I beg of you, on this head, as much as you " can ; all our hopes of safety are placed on their falling out among them" selves, of which, as I understand from Curio, some symptoms begin al" ready to appear."——But all this noise of a quarrel between them was found at last to be without cause ; or if there was any real disgust among them, it proceeded not far.

Ad Ant.
 ii. 8.
 Mich.
 299.

Cicero returned to Rome in June (after an interview with Atticus, who went abroad at the same time to his estate in Epirus.) He resolved to decline all public business, as much as he decently could, and to give the greatest part of his time to the bar, and to the defence of causes¹ ; an employment

Mich.
 p. 300, &
 seq. " Among the other causes which he pleaded this summer, he twice defended A. Terentius, and once L. Flaccus, men of Prætorian dignity, who were both acquitted. The speeches for Terentius are lost ; but that for Flaccus remains, yet somewhat imperfect.

Vid. supr.
 p. 357. This L. Valerius Flaccus had been Prætor in Cicero's Consulship, and received the thanks of the Senate for his zeal and vigour in seizing Catiline's accomplices ; but was now accused by
P. Lælius of rapine and oppression in his province of Asia, which was allotted to him from his Prætorship. The defence consists chiefly in displaying the dignity of the criminal, and invalidating the credit of the Asiatic witnesses.
 Pro Flacc.
 4. 5. Cicero observes, " That the judges, who had " known and seen the integrity of Flaccus's
 " life through a series of great employments,
 " were themselves the best witnesses of it,
 " and could not want to learn it of others,
 " especially from Grecians : That, for his " part, he had always been particularly ad" dicted to that nation and their studies, and
 " knew many modest and worthy men among " them : That he allowed them to have learn" ing, the discipline of many arts, an elegance
 " of writing, a fluency of speaking, and an

" acuteness of wit : But as to the sanctity of " an oath, they had no notion of it, knew
 " nothing of the force and efficacy of it :
 " That all their concern in giving evidence
 " was, not how to prove, but how to express
 " what they said." [Might not the same, with truth, be said of Cicero's pleadings for the most part?] — " Whereas of the Roman wit" nesses, who were produced against Flaccus,
 " though several of them came angry, fierce,
 " and willing to ruin him, yet one could not
 " help observing with what caution and reli" gion they delivered what they had to say ;
 " and though they had the greatest desire to
 " hurt, yet could not do it for their scruples :
 " — That a Roman, in giving his testi" mony, was always jealous of himself, lest
 " he should go too far ; weighed all his " words, and was afraid to let any thing drop
 " from him too hastily and passionately ; or
 " to say a syllable more or less than was ne" cessary."——One part of the charge against Flaccus was, for prohibiting the Jews to carry out of his province the gold which they used to collect annually, through the empire, for the Temple of Jerusalem ; all which he seized, and remitted it to the treasury at Rome. The charge itself

employment always popular, which made many friends, and few enemies : Y. R. 694.
 So that he was still very much frequented at home, and honourably attended abroad, and maintained his dignity, he says, not meanly, considering the general oppression ; nor yet greatly, considering the part he had before acted. Ad Att. ii. 18.

The Triumvirate, if we will believe Cicero, (whom, I think, we cannot have any good reason to believe) came soon to be dreaded and detested by all ranks of men. “ These affecters of popularity (says the Orator) “ have taught even modest men to his. Bibulus, on the other hand, “ is extolled to the skies ; though I know not why, unless he is “ thought to save the State, like Fabius, by doing nothing.” This Consul, from his retreat, was continually teasing the Triumvirs by his edicts, in which he inveighed and protested against all their acts. “ Bi- Ibid. 20.

itself seems to imply, that the Jews made no mean figure in the empire ; and Cicero’s answer, though it betrays a great contempt of their religion, through his ignorance of it, yet shews, that their number and credit were very considerable at Rome. The trial was held near the Aurelian steps, a place of great resort for the populace, and particularly for the Jews, who used it, probably, as a kind of exchange, or general rendezvous of their countrymen : Cicero, therefore, proceeds to say : “ It was for this reason, Lælius, and for “ the sake of this crime, that you have chosen “ this place, and all this crowd, for the trial : “ You know what a numerous band the Jews “ are ; what concord among themselves ; “ what a bustle they make in our Assemblies. “ — I will speak softly, that the Judges on- “ ly may hear me ; for there are people ready “ to incite them against me and every honest “ man ; and I would not willingly lend any “ help to that design. — Since our gold, “ then, is annually carried out of Italy, and “ all the provinces, in the name of the Jews, “ to Jerusalem, Flaccus, by a public edict, “ prohibited the exportation of it from Asia : “ And where is there a man, Judges, who “ does not truly applaud this act ? The Se- “ nate, on several different occasions, but “ more severely in my Consulship, condemned “ the exportation of gold. To withstand this “ barbarous superstition was a piece therefore “ of laudable discipline ; and, out of regard “ to the Republic, to condemn the multitude “ of Jews, who are so tumultuous in all our “ Assemblies, an act of the greatest gravity : “ But Pompey, it seems, when he took Jeru- “ salem, meddled with nothing in that Tem- “ ple : In which, as on many other occasions, “ he acted prudently, that, in so suspicious

“ and ill-tongued a people, he would not give “ any handle for calumny ; for I can never “ believe, that it was the religion of Jews “ and enemies, which hindered this excellent “ General, but his own modesty.” Then, after shewing, “ that Flaccus had not em- “ bezzled or seized the gold to his own use, “ but transmitted it to the public treasury, “ he observes, that it was not therefore for “ the sake of the crime, but to raise an envy, “ that this fact was mentioned ; and that the “ Accusers speech was turned from the Judges, “ and addressed to the circle around them : “ Every city (says he) Lælius, has its reli- “ gion ; we have ours : While Jerusalem, “ flourished, and Judæa was at peace with us, “ their religious rites were held inconsistent “ with the splendor of this Empire, the gra- Pro Flac, “ vity of the Roman name, and the institu- 28. “ tions of our ancestors : But much more “ ought they to be held so now ; since they “ have let us see, by taking arms, what opi- “ nion they have of us ; and, by their being “ conquered, how dear they are to the gods.” He proceeds, in the last place, to shew, what he had intimated in the beginning, “ that the “ real aim of this trial was to sacrifice those, “ who had signalized themselves against Ca- “ tiline, to the malice and revenge of the se- “ ditious.” — He concluded by applying himself, as usual, to move the pity and clemency of the Bench towards the person of the Criminal, by all the topics proper to excite compassion ; “ the merit of his former ser- “ vices, the lustre of his family, the tears of “ his children, the discouragement of the ho- “ nest, and the hurt which the Republic would “ suffer, in being deprived, at such a time, “ of such a Citizen.”

“ Bulus

Y. R. 694. " huic (says Cicero) is exalted to Heaven by men's love and admiration. People do nothing but transcribe and read his protests and harangues. He has attained to the summit of glory by a new way. Nothing is now so popular, so agreeable to the People, as invectives against our popular men. Wherever his edicts are fixed up in the streets, it is scarce possible to pass for the crowds which are reading them." And this common curiosity the Orator would have pass for a demonstration, that the edicts were highly approved by THE PEOPLE in general¹.

How

Ind. Ep.
19.
Midd.
p. 308.

" The inclinations of the PEOPLE (says Cicero) were shewn chiefly in the theatres and public shows. — In the Apollinarian plays, Diphilus, the Tragician, having spoken, in an insolent manner, some passages of his part, which were thought to hit the character of Pompey, was forced to repeat them a thousand times :

" Then by our miseries art Great ———
The time will come when thou wilt wretchedly lament that Greatness ———
If neither Law nor Custom can restrain Thee.

" At each of which sentences, the whole theatre made a mighty roaring and clapping. When Cæsar came in, he was received with but a dead applause : But when the younger Curio, who followed him, appeared, he was clapped as Pompey used to be in the height of his glory. It is said, that Cæsar, offended at this, sent an account of it to Pompey, then at Capua."

[Nobody, who remembers what happened, in a late reign, at our theatre, when the tragedy of Caio was first acted, and these words were significantly sounded forth——

When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway.
The loss of honour is a private station, will infer any thing, concerning the sense and disposition of a NATION, from such roarings and clappings as Cicero speaks of.]

Ep. 21.

Cicero, in another letter to Atticus, writes to this effect : " After lying long in secret, and then grasping, ALL have, at last, begun to speak out, and complain à dty. Our friend, not accustomed to be reproached, but to be praised and extolled, is fallen into a dejection of mind, which shews itself in his countenance : He knows not which way to turn himself. He is sensible that he has proceeded too far, and that to recoil will expose him to the charge of inconstancy. The Good [i.e. the Fish-pond-men, and their creatures and adherents] are his enemies, and even the Wicked are not his friends. I could not refrain from tears, when I saw him, on the twenty-fifth of July, haranguing against the edicts of Bibulus. He, who never used to appear in the Rostra but to speak magnificently of his own merit, and to be applauded, what a mean, abject figure did he make there, displeasing not only the audience, but himself! A spectacle agreeable to none but Crassus. For my own part, as Apellus or Protopogenes would have been grieved to see one of their capital pieces besmeared with dirt, so it was a real grief to me to see the man, whom I had painted with all the colours of my art, become of a sudden so deformed : For, though nobody can think, since the affair of Clodius, that I have any reason to be his friend, yet my love for him was so great, that no injury could efface it."

In another letter——" I have nothing to say to you concerning the Republic, but that all the world hates our present Governors; and yet there is no hope of a change. Pompey, as you may easily believe, is not content with himself, and repents most heartily of what he has done. I cannot foresee what will be the issue of these things ; but certainly they seem to threaten some sudden calamity."

Again, " Our friend Pompey is thoroughly disgusted with his present situation, and wishes to be restored to that from which he fell : He imparts to me his concern, and plainly asks me, WHAT REMEDY ?---I can see none."——Yet Cicero, in his Second Philippic, (when Pompey and Cæsar were both dead)

How just this inference is, we may gather from the following particular : The SENATE (seemingly) to put an affront upon Cæsar, as well as to leave him powerless at the expiration of his Consulship, had assigned to the Consuls of this year, instead of the government of rich provinces abroad, the care of the woods and the roads at home. At the motion of the Tribune Vatinius, the PEOPLE^m granted to Cæsar the government of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum, with three legions, for the term of five years. This convinced the SENATE of their own impotence ; so that when, on the death of Metellus Celer (suspected to be poisoned by his wife Clodia) the government of Transalpine Gaul became vacant, and Cæsar declared a desire to have that province added to the other, they themselves decreed it to him readily, together with a fourth legion, to prevent his recurring a second time to THE PEOPLE.

Y. R. 694.
Bef. Chr.
58.
393 Conf.

Sueton. 19.
Ibid. 22.

Cic. pro
Cælio.

And now Cæsar, having considered that he should be long absent from Rome, that envy was stronger than friendship, and that, if he prospered in the war, Pompey might grow jealous of him, and depart from the political scheme concerted between them, concluded wisely, that no means would be so effectual to hold him fast as an alliance of affinity, formed by giving to him in marriage his daughter Julia, a beautiful and most accomplished young ladyⁿ. Nor did Cæsar fail of success in this measure ; for Pompey became so enamoured of his amiable young wife, as to reduce all his politics (if we may believe Plutarch) to contrivances how he might amuse and entertain her in the most agreeable manner.

Dio,
l. xxxviii.
p. 63.
Appian de
B. C.
p. 435.

dead) had the confidence to assert, “ that he “ used all arguments, and his utmost endeavours, in the Consulship of the worthy Bibulus, to bring Pompey to a breach with “ Cæsar.” [This does not well accord with the letter last cited. Dr. Middleton, however, places the two passages lovingly together, as if they were contiguous parts of one and the same discourse, or at least very near neighbours.] “ But Cæsar was more successful, and “ drew Pompey quite away from him.”

Midd.
p. 310.

— Illud te scire volo, Sampliceramus, nostrum amicum, vehementer sui status poenitere, restituique in eum locum cupere, ex quo decidit, doloremque suum impertire nobis, et medicinam interdum aperte querere ; quam ego possum invenire nullam. Ad Att. L. ii. Ep. 23.

Ego M. Bibulo, præstantissimo Cive, Consule, nihil prætermisi, quantum facere nitique potui, quin Pompeium a Cæsaris conjunctione avocarem. In quo Cæsar felicius fuit : ipse enim Pompeium a mea familiaritate disjunxit. Philip. ii. 10.

^m “ This (says Dr. Middleton) was a cruel

“ blow to the power of the Senate, and a direct infringement of the old constitution, as “ it transferred to THE PEOPLE a right which “ they had never exercised or pretended to be- “ fore.” And, in support of this assertion, the Doctor cites Cic. in Vatin. 15. Eriperit Senatui Provinciæ decernendi potestatem ; Imperatoris deligendi iudicium ; ærarii dispensationem ; quæ nunquam sibi populus Romanus appetivit, qui nunquam hæc a summi consilii gubernatione auferre conatus est. How can this be reconciled with the fact of the Gabinian Law, or with that of THE PEOPLE’s transferring to Pompey, by the Manilian Law, (passed through the persuasion of Cicero) the government of the provinces which had been assigned to Lucullus ? Vid. supra, p. 221, 222, & 329 ; and Vol. II. of this Hist. Book VI. Chap. vii. notes ° and ².

² She had been promised to Servilius Cæpio, and therefore, to comfort him under his disappointment, Pompey’s daughter was now given him for a wife, who had been designed for Faustus Sylla.

Midd.
p. 313.

Y. R. 694.
Bef. Chr.
58.
593 Conf.

It was, probably, about the same time ^a, as well as with the same view of leaving behind him in the City powerful friends, who, during his absence, would, on all occasions, support him in his enterprizes, that Cæsar himself married Calpurnia, the daughter of Calpurnius Piso, whom the Triumvirs had fixed upon to be one of the next year's Consuls. His Colleague was to be Gabinus, a creature of Pompey's.

The Aristocratic worthies, extremely alarmed at these marriages, and much dissatisfied with the new laws and regulations, used great freedom of speech on all those subjects in their private meetings and table-conversation; and the younger Curio had even the boldness to declaim openly, and make loud invectives against the Triumvirate and their proceedings ^b. Those free discourses (which doubtless transpired) and the temerity of the brisk young man ^c, together with the applauses and caresses he met with from the faction, seem to have brought Vettius once more upon the stage — that Vettius who had been Cicero's spy, informer, and witness, in the affair of Catiline's conspiracy [Vettius ille, ille noster index.] This wretch, who had formerly accused Cæsar of being an accomplice with Catiline, now took it into his head to swear a plot upon the opposite faction, and particularly upon the younger Curio, whom he accused of being at the head of an association of certain young Nobles, who had combined to assassinate either Pompey or Cæsar, or both. Whether such a design had been really formed, or whether Vettius had been

Ad Att.
ii. 24.
Vid. supr.
p. 380.

^a It would be very difficult to ascertain the order of the transactions and events of this year, the ancient writers not agreeing in that point, even when they agree in the facts (which frequently they do not.) Appian and Dis have placed the two marriages after the People's grant of the province of Gaul to Cæsar, and have imputed both to the motive above-mentioned. But Suetonius speaks of those marriages as prior to that grant, ascribing, in a great measure, the grant itself to the credit and influence of Cæsar's father-in-law and son-in-law. — Socero igitur generoque suffragantibus, ex omni provinciarum copia Gallias potissimum elegit, &c. 22.

Plutarch marries Pompey to Julia presently after her father's election to the Consulship, and before his entering on that magistracy.

From the 17th and 18th epistles (lib. ii.) of Cicero to Atticus, it would seem, that the marriage of Pompey with Julia, the passing of the Campanian and other laws proposed by Cæsar, and his obtaining the province of Gaul, were much about the same time, Pro-sus ut scribis, ita sentio. Turbatur Sampsi- ceramus [Pompeius.] Nihil est, quod non timendum sit. ομολογούμενος τυρανίδα συσκευάζει. Aperte Tirannidem affectat.] Quid enim ista repentina affinitatis conjunctio, quid ager Campanus, quid effusio pecunie significat? [meaning, by the last, the five year's tribute from the East, to be employed in purchasing lands for the poor.]

A Cæsare valde liberaliter invector in legationem illam sibi ut sum Legatus. Ep. xviii.

^b Univerſa res eo est deducta, spes ut nulla sit, aliquando non modo privatos, verum etiam magistratus liberos fore. Hac tamen in opprefſione sermo in circulis duntaxat, et conviviiſt est liberior, quam fuit. Vincere incipit timorem dolor; sed ita, ut omnia ſint pleniffima desperationis. Ad Att. Ep. xviii. Lib. 2.

Unus loquitur, et palam adverſatur adoleſcens Curio. Huic planſus maximi, conſalutatio forenſis per honorifica, ſigna præterea benevolentia per multa à bonis impertiuntur. — Ibid.

^c This young man's father, Scribonius Curio, had been Consul in 677, and was a particular friend of Cicero's. The son was the Orator's disciple.

Ep. xvi.

suborned to act the part he did, is not to be cleared up by any thing we read in the ancient writers, who mention the disturbance he made by his information. What appears unquestionable is, that he was cast into prison upon his own confession of having, contrary to law, carried about him a dagger; that, in a very short time, he was there secretly dispatched, and his carcase thrown out into the street; and that no enquiry was made after the authors of his sudden death.

Suetonius, to the discredit and disgrace of himself as an historian, tells us, without any hesitation, “that Cæsar” [the distinguishing feature of whose character was nobleness of soul] “to strike a terror into all those of the opposite faction, engaged Vettius, by the force of bribes, to depose, that he had been solicited by certain persons to kill Pompey.” And he adds, “that Vettius having been produced in the Rostra by Cæsar to declare, according to their private agreement, the names of the delinquents; and having named two or three, without gaining credit, Cæsar, despairing of success in so rash an enterprize, took off the informer, it is thought, by poison [intercepisse veneno indicem creditur.]”

If the Historian had reported, that, when there was a great croud in the Forum, Cæsar went thither in disguise to pick a pocket, it would have been as credible as the subornation and poisoning imputed to him. But, in order to reject this monstrous tale, we need not have recourse to Cæsar’s unvarying character of magnanimity and generosity. A very learned and ingenious modern, by no means partial to him, makes no scruple to contradict Suetonius so far as to say, “that there is not the least likelihood of Cæsar’s having set Vettius to work: for, had Cæsar been author of the project, it would have been better conducted.” And he observes, that Vettius’s naming, in his first deposition, Brutus, the son of Cæsar’s mistress Servilia, as concerned in the intended assassination, is a clear proof, that Cæsar did not suggest to the informer the matter of that deposition.

Plutarch

c. 54.

Suetonius tells another senseless story of Cæsar, “That he stole, during his Consulship, three thousand pounds weight of gold out of the Capitol, putting the like weight of gilt copper in its place:” As if Cæsar would have wanted the resolution to seize the treasure openly, upon any urgent occasion.

Yet Cicero’s English Historian, having spoken of the great disaffection of THE PEOPLE to the Triumvirs [which, I believe, appears no where but in Cicero’s letters] goes on thus: “But, to give a turn to the disposition of the People, or to draw their attention, at least,

“another way, Cæsar contrived to amuse the City with the discovery of a new conspiracy to assassinate Pompey.” And then relates the story, as it is told in a letter from Cicero to Atticus; after which, he adds, “But it happened in this, as it commonly does in all plots of the same kind, that the too great eagerness of the managers destroyed its effect: For, by the extravagance to which it was pushed, it confused itself; and was entertained with so general a contempt by all orders, that Cæsar was glad to get rid of it by strangling or poisoning Vettius privately in prison, and giving it out that it was done by the Conspirators.”

Y. R. 694.
Bef. Chr.
58.
393 Conf.

Plutarch makes no mention of this affair, except in his Life of Lucullus, where he tells us, "That the friends of Lucullus and Cato, having expressed a very sharp resentment of the insults which those two great men had suffered from the opposite faction, who had forcibly driven them out of the Forum, the partizans of Pompey produced a certain Bruttian [Vettius] whom they said he had apprehended lying in wait to kill Pompey: That Vettius, when examined before the Senate, did not accuse Lucullus, but other persons, of having instigated him to the murder: But, when interrogated in an Assembly of the People, he named Lucullus as the man who had hired him. No body gave credit to what he said, it being sensible that he had been suborned: and people were confirmed in this persuasion, when, after a few days, the carcase of the accuser was seen lying at the prison-door. It was indeed reported that he had killed himself; but the mark upon his neck of a halter, and the marks upon his body of blows, seem clearly to testify, that those who had suborned him had likewise dispatched him, that he might not reveal their crime."

De B. C.
L. ii. p.
434

Appian, after mentioning Cato's violent opposition to that part of Cæsar's Campanian Law, which obliged the Senators to swear to the observance of it, adds, "that Vettius, a man of the lower sort, ran suddenly into the midst of the croud, brandishing a drawn dagger, and declaring aloud, that he had been suborned by Bibulus, Cicero, and Cato, to kill both Cæsar and Pompey, and that the dagger was given him by Posthumus, one of Bibulus's Lictors. Cæsar, though the story had not much the air of truth, made advantage of it to exasperate the multitude, and he put off the further inquiry into the informer's allegations till the next day; but Vettius was that very night killed in the prison. Various conjectures there were concerning the authors of his

"Conspirators." For this last fact, Cic. in Vatini. and Plut. in Lucull. are quoted: Yet the Orator, in his speech against Vatinius, charges him, not Cæsar, with the murder: And Plutarch, in speaking of Vettius's information, and of his death, never once names Cæsar.

M. Crevier, not less prejudiced than Dr. Middleton, against Cæsar, writes to this effect: "Young Cæsar, as I have said, had rendered himself odious to Cæsar, by declaring against the Triumvirate. Cæsar resolved to bring him and several others into trouble, by contriving to have a weighty charge brought against them, which would make a great noise. For this purpose he made use of that Vettius, by whom he himself had formerly been impeached, as an "accomplice of Catiline.—Then comes the story as related by Cicero.—After which he says—"The imposture was too ill concerted to bear the light of a judicial enquiry. Cæsar apprehended the consequences of so senseless a calumny. One morning Vettius was found strangled in the prison. Such were the wages with which Cæsar paid the services of this villain. He would have thrown the suspicion of his death upon others; but no body was deceived; and HISTORY," [not Cicero, nor even Suetonius, nor any other ancient writer] "charges him with this murder, horrible in all its circumstances. Cicero (adds M. Crevier in a note) makes Vatinius author of the murder; but that was only a politic caution to avoid offending Cæsar."

"death.

“ death. Cæsar charged it upon those whose guilty consciences made “ them afraid of a discovery ; and he obtained the People’s consent to “ his having a guard, that might defend him from such treacherous at“ tempts.”

Y. R. 694.
 Bcf. Chr.
 58.
 393 Conf.

Cicero’s account of the matter is in a letter to Atticus.

“ In my letter by Numestius I pressed you to come hither with so much “ earnestness, that nothing could exceed it. Make more haste, if it be “ possible, than I there¹ urged you to use. Do not, however, be alarmed “ at this (for I know you, and know, that love is always solicitous and “ anxious :) the thing, I hope, will not be so bad in the event as in the “ report. Vettius, that Vettius who was my spy and informer, had pro“ mised Cæsar (as I have discovered) that he would contrive to make Cu“ rio, the son, fall under the suspicion of some criminal enterprize. Ha“ ving, therefore, insinuated himself into an intimacy with the young man, “ and having had, as appears, many meetings with him, he went so far as “ to tell him in confidence, that he was determined to fall with his slaves “ upon Pompey, and kill him. Curio carried this to his father, who dis“ covered it to Pompey.

Lib. II.
 Epist.
 xxiv.

“ The matter was laid before the Senate, and Vettius brought in.
 “ At first he denied that he ever had any conversation with Curio ; but did “ not long persist in that. He requested to be admitted an evidence, which “ was readily granted. He then informed the House, that there was a “ plot formed by many of the young Nobility, of whom Curio was the “ leader : that Paullus was engaged in it from the first, with Brutus
 “ also, and Lentulus the son of the Flamen, with the privity of his “ father : that the Secretary of Bibulus had brought him a dagger
 “ from Bibulus himself. The Senate laughed at this : that Vettius
 “ could not have been master of a dagger, unless the Consul had given him “ one. Another circumstance helped to discredit the information with “ the House, which was, that, on the thirteenth of May, Bibulus had “ put Pompey on his guard against treachery, for which he had Pom-“ pey’s thanks. Curio was called in to answer to Vettius’s allegations, “ and soon confounded him upon one article, which was, that the young “ Nobles had agreed to attack Pompey in the Forum, on the day when “ Gabinus gave his shew of gladiators, and that Paullus was to be the “ leader in the attack ; whereas, it appeared that, at that very time, Paul“ lus was in Macedonia. The Senate decreed, that Vettius, having “ confessed his wearing a dagger, should be laid in irons, and that who“ ever should set him free, should be deemed an enemy to his country.
 “ It was generally supposed, that the scheme was laid so, that Vettius “ should be taken in the Forum with a dagger, and the slaves likewise with “ arms ; and that then he should request to be admitted an evidence :

¹ Si dormis, expergiscere ; si stas, ingredere ; si ingrederis, curre ; si curris, advola. *Ad
 Att. ii. 23.*

Y. R. 694. " but the scheme was disconcerted by the information which Pompey re-Bef. Chr. " ceived from Curio. The decree of the Senate was read in an Assembly 58. " of the People.
 193. Conf.

Vid. supr.
 p. 380.

" The next day, however, Cæsar, who, when Prætor, had hindered Q. Catulus from ascending the Rostra, produced Vettius there, brought him into that place where Bibulus, the other Consul, durst not then appear. Here the fellow gave himself a loose to say what he pleased upon public matters. And now, first of all, he omitted Brutus in his deposition, whom, in the Senate, he had charged most vehemently; which shewed, that he had been well schooled and instructed the night before. In the next place he named, as accomplices, men, against whom he had not thrown out the most distant hint when examined in the Senate, particularly Lucullus, (who, he said, used often to send to him that Caius Fannius, who had been active in the impeachment against Clodius) Lucius Domitius, from whose house, he said, the conspirators were to sally forth. He did not expressly name me, but said, that a fine spoken Consular, who lived in the neighbourhood of one of the Consuls, had told him, that there was, at present, great occasion for an Abala Servilius, or a Brutus. After the Assembly had been dismissed, he was called back by Vatinius, and then added, that he had heard from Curio, that my son-in-law Piso, and Marcus Laterensis were in the conspiracy.

" Vettius is now accused before Crassus Dives upon the Law de Vi. Should he be condemned, he will, without question, pretend to make new discoveries, and pray to be admitted an evidence; and, if this be granted, we shall have abundance of trials. Though I am not used to slight the smallest matter, I have no apprehension from all this.

" People express much affection for me; but so very full is every thing of wretchedness, that I am absolutely tired of my life." &c. &c.

L. XXXVIII.
 p. 63.

Dio Cassius gives us quite another story: He writes, " that Cicero and Lucullus, extremely displeased with the proceedings of the Triumvirs, formed a design, but without success, to take off both Cæsar and Pompey by the hand of Vettius": That Vettius, being discovered and apprehended before he could perpetrate the murder, named those who had employed him; and that, if he had not named Bibulus among the conspirators, it would have gone hard with the other two: But having accused Bibulus out of revenge for his having imparted the matter to Pompey, he fell under a suspicion of having given false evi-

" Dio (says M. Muretus) is so ridiculous as to speak of this affair as a real conspiracy against Cæsar, as well as against Pompey, though Cicero in this LETTER (the 23th of the 2^d Book) and in his INVECTIVE against Vatinius, speaks only of Pompey. The Reader, perhaps, will smile at the reason here given for calling Dio ridiculous: For, surely, nothing which Cicero says on the subject, either in the Letter or in the Invective, can be decisive against Dio with regard to the point in question, if, as Dio reports, there was really an Assassination-plot, and Cicero himself was in it.

" dence

“ dence against Lucullus and Cicero, and of having been suborned to ca“ luminate them. Various rumours concerning these things went about
 “ and nothing certain was known. Vettius, when he was produced “ before the People, having named only those whom I have mentioned, “ was thrown into prison, and there, in a very short time, privately put “ to death.”

Y. R. 694.
 Bef. Chr.
 58.
 393 Conf.

It is highly improbable, that Cicero (though, by inclination and principle, a murderer of all enemies to the usurped authority of the Senate) was in any plot to assassinate Pompey; not only because on Pompey was his chief dependance for protection against Clodius, who of late had terribly threatened him; but because (if in any thing he may be credited) he ever loved Pompey personally, even when he hated his politics. Nevertheless, that a design to kill both Pompey and Cæsar had really been formed by the younger Curio, in concert with many of the young Nobles (the Sanguinaria Juventus, of whom Cicero says (in Ep. vii. of Lib. II.) that, by the report of Curio to him, they had conceived a mortal enmity to Pompey; and would not bear the government of the proud Kings*, meaning the Triumvirs, is a fact not without some foundation even in Cicero's letters, who frequently speaks of an extreme discontent, and even raging

* Una spes est salutis, istorum inter istos dissensio, cujus ego quædam initia sensi ex Curione—Megabocchus [Pompeius] & hæc SANGUINARIA JUVENTUS inimicissima est. L. II. Ep. vii.

† Scito Curionem adolescentem venisse ad me salutatum. Valde ejus termo de Publio [Clodio] cum tuis litteris congruebat. Ipse vero mirandum in modum Reges odisse superbes. Peræque narrabat INCENSAM ESSE JUVENTUTEM, NEQUE FERRE HÆC POSSE. Bene habemus; nos, si in his spes est, opiner, aliud agamus. Ego me do Historiæ. Ep. vii.

N. B. Cicero was at this time at Antium; and writes that he shall be at Formiæ the twenty-first of April; that he shall leave Formiæ the first of May, and be at Antium the third. That from thence he shall go to Tusculum, thence to Arpinum, and be at Rome the first of June.

‡ Video jam quo invidia transeat, et ubi sit habitatura. Nihil me existimaris, neque usu, neque à Theophrasto didicisse, ni brevi tempore desiderari nostra illa tempora videris. Etenim si fuit invidiosa senatus potentia; cum ea non ad Populum, sed ad tres homines immoderatos redacta sit, quidnam censes fore? Proinde isti licet faciant, quos volent. Consules, Tribunos Pleb. denique etiam Va-

tinii strumam sacerdotii διδάσκει [his tincta purpura] vestiant; Videbis brevi tempore MAGNOS non modo eos, qui nihil titubarunt, sed etiam illum ipsum, qui peccavit, Catonem. Ep. ix.

N. B. He had just before, in this letter, laid the blame, in a great measure, upon Cato, that the revolution in the Government was so suddenly made; because Cato had, by his obstinacy in the affair of the Knight's petition, alienated them from the Senate.

— In me incurrit Roma veniens Curio Meus — suum, Mammi, Metelli Nepotis expromptit odium [in Cæsarem] — Complexus juvenem dimisi—Ep. x. [Ed. Vulg. xii.] written when on his journey from Antium to Formiæ.

— Qui fremitus hominum! Quam irati animi! Quanto in odio noster amicus magnus! Ep. xiii. dated 19th of April. From Formiæ.

Prorsus, ut scribis, ita sentio. Turbatur Sampsuramus [Pompeius]. Nihil est quod non timendum sit. Aperit Tyrannidem affectat. Quid enim illa repentina affinitatis conjunctio, quid ager Campanus, quid effusio pecuniæ significat? quæ si essent extrema, tamen esset nimium mali, sed ea natura rei est, ut hæc extrema esse non possint. Quid enim eos hæc ipsa

Y. R. 694—raging anger in the minds of men of all rank, that must speedily break forth in some violent manner, and produce a change in the state of things.

Ep. ix. Let them [the Triumvirs] says he, make what Consul and Tribunes they please, you will very soon see Great and in power, not only those [friends of the Aristocracy] who have made no false step, but even Cato, who deserves reprehension.

Ep. xxiv. The account, given by Cicero (in his letter to Atticus) of Vettius's affair, is by no means satisfactory: and there is the less reason to wonder at this, because he was not present when Vettius was examined by the Senate, nor when, the next day, he made his deposition in an Assembly of the PEOPLE: For, at this critical juncture, Cicero attended none of the ipsa per se delectare possunt? Nunquam huc venissent, nisi ad alias res pestiferas aditus sibi compararent. Dii immortales! verum, ut scribis, hæc in Arpinati a. d. vi. circiter Id. Maias non deslebimus, ne et operam et oleum Philologiæ nostræ perierit; sed conferemus tranquillo animo. Ep. xvii.

* Vid. sup. n. (x) N. B. The foregoing letters were all written while Cicero was in the country. After his return to Rome, which (if he followed his own intention, Ep. viii.) was the first of June, he gives an account to Atticus of the state in which he found the public affairs.

Ep. xviii. Tenemur undique &c. Scito nihil unquam fuisse tam infame, &c.

Ep. xix. —Hoc opinor. Certi sumus perisse omnia. —Iis [edictis Bibuli] ardet dolore, et ira noster Pampeius, &c.

Ep. xx. De Republica breviter ad te scribam. Jam enim charta ipsa ne nos prodat, pertimesco. Itaque posthac, si erunt mihi plura ad te scribenda, ἀλλὰ γὰρ ἄλλως obscurabo. Nunc quidem novo quodam morbo civitas moritur; ut cum omnes ea quæ sunt acta improbent, querantur, doleant, varietas in re nulla sit, aperteque loquantur, et jam clare gemant; tamen medicina nulla afferatur. Neque enim resisti sine internecione posse arbitramur: nec videmus, qui suis cedendi, præter exitum, futurus sit. Bibulus, hominum admiratione, et benevolentia in cælo est: Edicta ejus et conciones describunt et legunt. Novo quodam genere in summam gloriam venit. Populare nunc nihil tam est, quam odium popularium. Hæc quo sunt eruptura, timeo. —Comitia Bibulus cum Archilochio edicto in ante diem xv. Kal. Novemb. distulit.

De Repub. quid ego tibi subtiliter? Tota Ep. xxi. perit: atque hoc est miserius quam reliquisti, quod tum videbatur ejusmodi dominatio civitatem oppressisse quæ jucunda esset multitudini, bonis autem ita molesta, ut tamen sine perniciæ: Nunc repente tanto in odio est omnibus, ut quorsum eruptura sit horreamus: Nam iracundiam atque intemperantiam illorum sumus experti, qui Catoni irati omnia perdidit. Sed ita lenibus uti videbantur venenis, ut posse viceremur sine dolore interire. Nunc vero sibilis Vulgi, sermonibus Honestorum, fremitu Italiæ, vereor ne exarserint. Equidem sperabam, ut sæpe etiam loqui tecum solebam, sic orbem Reipub. esse converniam, ut vix sonitum audire, vix impressam orbitam videre possemus: et fuisset ita, si homines transitum tempestatis expectare potuissent: sed cum diu occulte suspirassent, postea jam gemere, ad extremum vero loqui omnes et clamare coeperunt.

N. B. It is in this letter that Cicero mourns over Pampey, fallen (as he pretends) from the summit of glory into contempt, and speaks of the wretched figure he made the 25th of July, when haranguing against Bibulus's edicts. Vid. sup. p. 414.

—De Repub. nihil habeo ad te Ep. xxii. scribere, nisi summum odium omnium hominum in eos qui tenent omnia, mutationis tamen spes nulla. Sed quod facile sentias, tædet ipsum Pampeium, vehementerque poenitet. Non provideo satis quem exitum futurum putem. Sed certe videntur hæc aliquo eruptura.

Public Councils, but confined himself wholly to pleading Causes *. He seems to have wrote to Atticus the very day of Vettius's appearing in the Rostra, and before the business was quite hushed by the death of that Informant, of whose death, though it is said to have happened the night following, he makes no mention; but writes, that he is to be tried before the Prætor, Crossus Dives, for a breach of the law de Vi, in carrying about him a dagger. So that, when Cicero wrote that letter, he had probably received but a very imperfect relation of what had passed; nothing better, perhaps, than the Lies of each of the two days. And this will appear the more probable, if we consider how very unlikely it is, even supposing Vettius himself to have invented all the matter of his information, that he ever charged Paullus with a design to assassinate Pompey in the Roman Forum, at a time when Paullus was in Macedonia, and no body could be ignorant of his residence there, he being Proquæstor of that province. Y. R. 694.
Bef. Chr.
58.
393 Conf.

Vide Pighi.

And likewise how unlikely it is, that Vettius should impute to Paulus the design of killing Pompey by the hands of the gladiators of Gabinus who was Pompey's creature.

There are, in Cicero's story, other particulars which make it a very lame one:

Bibulus, on the 13th of May, gave Pompey warning to be upon his guard against insidious attempts. How came Bibulus to think that any such attempts were designed? Shall we say, that the elder Curio had imparted to him the intelligence which the younger Curio had received from Vettius? But then, why was no public notice taken of this murderous design for several months after the discovery? Cicero says not a word of the matter before that letter which speaks of the affair as then recent, and which seems to have been written in the beginning of October, or thereabout: For Cicero in Ep. xxiii. after pressing Atticus most earnestly to come with all haste to Rome—"If you are sleeping, awake; if you are standing still, come away; if you are coming, run; if you are running, fly;" he adds, "It is of great importance to me, that if you cannot be here at the Consular elections, you be here as soon as Cledius shall be declared Tribune." The Comitia for the elections, Ep. xx. which used to be held in the end of July, or beginning of August, had, by an edict from Bibulus, been put off to the 18th of October. Epist.
xxiv.

It is manifest, therefore, that the notice, which Pompey received from Bibulus, of treacherous designs against his life, must have been prior, by many months, to the notice he received from the elder Curio of Vettius's purpose to assassinate him, nor could relate to the same conspiracy; nor, consequently, be any proof of Vettius's imposture, in the

* Republicam nulla ex parte attingimus. In causis atque in illa opera nostra forensi, summa iudicia versamus. Ep. xxii. Icos publicis consiliis nullis intersamus, totosque nos ad forensam operam, laboremque contulimus. Ep. xxiii.

Y. R. 694. take he told to the Senate, when examined there. Notwithstanding the
 B. Chr. friendly hint, which Bibulus sent to Pompey the 13th of May, it is very pos-
 58. sible that the same Bibulus, before the month of October, might encourage 393 Conf. a design to destroy him.

L. II. Ep. By some of Cicero's Epistles, written in the month of April, from the
 vii. viii. x. country, to Atticus at Rome, it appears that the younger Curio, and [Ed. Vulg. other hot-headed, bloody-minded young Nobles [Sanguinaria Juventus] xii.] had talked in a strain, as if determined not to bear the Sovereignty of the Triumvirate. Bibulus, apprehensive, perhaps, of their engaging in some rash and fatal enterprize, and not yet in despair of recovering Pompey to the interest of the Senate, might in order to oblige, or perhaps to frighten him, send him an intimation of dangers to which he was exposed.

But, between the 13th of May, when Pompey received that intimation, and the month of October, there might be a great change in the disposition of Bibulus, as there seems to have been in the face of things. In a letter, which Cicero, about the end of May, just before his return to Rome, sent to Atticus, he writes as if under a terrible alarm. "It is as you say,
 " Pompey's head is turned. He aspires to the Tyranny. What else can " be the meaning of his sudden, unexpected marriage with Cæsar's daughter,"
 " &c.?" And in his next Letter, (written after his return to Rome, when Atticus was gone into Epirus) "We are all taken captive and bound,
 " nor do we refuse to be slaves; we look upon death and banishment as " greater evils than slavery, though indeed they are far less. Young Cu-
 " rio is the only man who speaks and opposes openly."

xix. In the next "the Republic is lost beyond recovery.—The edicts of " Bibulus make Pompey flame with anger."

xx. In the next, "Every body speaks out, and there is no variety of sentiment.
 " —Bibulus, by a stinging edict, has put off the elections to the 18th of " October."

xxii. In the next — "The Republic is ruined, totally ruined, and, in one " respect, is in a worse condition than when you left us. For THEN the " Domination of our Rulers was pleasing to the multitude, nor was it destruc- " tive to the better sort, though they did not relish it. But NOW, on a sudden,
 " it is become so generally odious, that I dread the consequence. We have

Ep. xvi. * By one of Cicero's letters, it appears that Pompey disclaimed having any share in that insult which, in the end of April, Bibulus suffered from Fatinius's mob; and which was his pretext for shutting himself up in his house for the rest of the year. Vide supra. p. 406.

† It has been already observed, that we have no guide for fixing, with any precision, the dates and order of the transactions of this year. But by this Letter it would seem, that the marriage of Pompey with Julia, which gave a dreadful alarm to the Aristocratic Faction, was in the end of May. For this Letter is the latest of Cicero's Letters from the country, who came to town in the beginning of June.

‡ —Tum videbatur ejusmodi Dominatio civitatem oppressisse, quæ jucunda esset multitudini, bonis autem ita molesta, ut tamen sine perniciæ, &c.

" experienced

“ experienced the intemperate wrath of those, who, irritated by the op“ position they met with from Cato^d, have overturned all things. At first “ they made use of such gentle and pleasant poisons, that it seemed as if “ we should be able to die without pain : But now, I fear, lest the hisses “ of the populace, the free discourses of the better sort, and the murmur“ ing of all Italy, should provoke them even to rage.”

Y. R. 69+.
 Bef. Chr.
 58.
 793 Cont.

Whatever was the principal evil here complained of, it is evident from this letter, that, at the time when it was written, Bibulus and his faction thought themselves in a more desperate condition than they had been in the month of May preceding; and therefore the friendly hint given by Bibulus to Pompey, on the 13th of that month, can be no proof, that Bibulus had the same friendly disposition towards him, when Vettius charged some of the Leaders of the Faction with an Assassination Plot.

As to the secret which the younger Curio pretended to have learnt from Vettius, the proof of the fact resting wholly on the VERACITY of Curio, one of the persons accused, there is room sufficient to doubt the truth of it. Vettius, even after he had obtained from the Senate a promise of pardon, does not confess a word of his having imparted that secret to Curio : Instead of pretending that he himself, a contemptible wretch, had laid a plot to kill Pompey, (which would indeed have been an incredible story) he charges the Consul Bibulus, young Curio, and many of the discontented Nobles, with having formed such a plot, in the execution of which he was to be employed. He alledged, according to Cicero's report) that the Consul sent him a dagger : But who can imagine that, by this allegation, he meant to intimate, that he could not have been furnished with a dagger any other way ? No surely, his meaning could only be, that the Consul gave him that token of his approving the design.

It would be difficult, perhaps, to collect any thing, which might be called probable, from this blind story. May we not, however, with some appearance of reason, conjecture, that Vettius, who was, by trade, an Informer and a Witness, ready to be employed by any body who would hire him, and who had got money from Cicero, in the time of his despotism, for being a convenient evidence, imagined he had now a fair opportunity to get money from the present reigning powers, by swearing a plot upon their principal enemies. The sharp edicts of Bibulus, the loud declamations of Curio, the known hatred which Lucullus and Brutus bore to Pompey, (the first for having robbed him of his glory, the second for having murdered * his father) were natural reasons for

* Vid. Supr.
 p. 178,

^d M. Mongault thinks that the opposition, here spoken of, was to the law which gave to Cæsar the government of the two Gauls for five years; and that it was Cato's behaviour on this occasion, which provoked Cæsar to send HIM to prison. The ancient writers differ in this particular. If Cæsar was irregular in his manner of his pursuing his point, it is not to be doubted but Cato was as irregular in his method of opposition : He was no Magistrate at this time.

Ibid.
 p. 494.

VOL. III.

3 I

Vettius

Y.R. 694.
Bef. Chr.
58.
153 Conf.

Vettius to constitute them chief Leaders in the enterprize. Indeed, if he meant to make his court to Cæsar, it was a blunder to name Brutus among the conspirators. This mistake he is said to have rectified in his deposition from the Rostra; where, the next day after his examination by the Senate, Cæsar produced him; not to do him honour, as is evident enough from the issue of the affair, but to expose to the People the baseness of the faction who had employed so infamous an impostor to accuse him of treason, and, upon the testimony of such a witness, would have taken away his life, and did actually take away the lives of many Citizens. It does not appear by whose direction, or by whose hands, he was murdered; each faction accused the other of the deed; and neither of them made any enquiry about it.

Midd.
314-

Ad Ant.
ii. 20.

Cicero, in the close of that Letter in which he relates the affair of Vettius, writes as if it caused him no great anxiety; but he had been for some time, and was still, under terrible apprehensions from Clodius, who threatened him with all the terrors of his Tribunate; to which office he was elected without any opposition: and, in proportion as the danger approached, Cicero's apprehensions were every day more and more alarmed. The absence of his friend Atticus was an additional mortification to him: For Atticus, having a great familiarity with all the Clodian family, might have been of service, either in dissuading Clodius from any attempt, or, at least, in getting out of him what he really intended. Cicero pressed him therefore, in every letter, to come back again to Rome. "If you love me (says he) as much as I am persuaded you do, hold yourself ready to run hither as soon as I call: Though I am doing, and will do, every thing in my power to save you that trouble.—My wishes and my affairs require you: I shall want neither counsel, nor courage, nor forces, if I see you here at the time. I have reason to be satisfied with Varro: Pompey talks divinely.——How much do I wish that you had staid at Rome! as you surely would have done, if you had imagined how things would happen: We should easily have managed Clodius, or learnt at least, for certain, what he meant to do. At present he flies about; raves; knows not what he would be at; threatens many; and will take his measures at last, perhaps, from chance," &c.

Ibid. 19.

Ibid. 18, & 19.

Cæsar, knowing the fright that Cicero was in, and having no desire to hurt him, but only to render him more tractable, and better disposed to bridle his tongue, than he had hitherto been, proposed expedients to him for his security: He had [as has been already mentioned] offered to put him into the commission for distributing the lands of Campania, with which twenty of the principal Senators were charged: But, as it was an invitation only into the place of one deceased, and not an original designation. Cicero did not think it for his dignity to accept it.—Cæsar had likewise offered, in the most obliging manner, to make him one of his Lieutenants in Gaul, and pressed it earnestly upon him; which was both a sure and honourable way way of avoiding the danger; and what he might have made use of, so far only, as it served his purpose, without embarrassing himself with the duty of it*. Cicero, sensible of all this, was at first inclined to accept of the employment, and would have gone with Cæsar, if Clodius, perceiving himself in danger of missing his revenge, had not artfully changed his conduct, and, by speaking honourably of Cicero on all occasions, put on the appearance of having laid aside his resentment, and being disposed to a reconciliation. Cicero, weak enough to be deceived by this behaviour, and very unwilling (if it could be avoided) to owe the obligation of his safety to Cæsar, refused, after some hesitation, the Lieutenantancy: which refusal so exasperated Cæsar, that he immediately abandoned him to the fury of Clodius; and of this Cæsar used afterwards to lay the whole blame on Cicero himself, for slighting so obstinately the friendly offers which he made to him. Pompey, all this while was giving Cicero the strongest assurances, confirmed the oaths and vows, that there was no danger; and that he would sooner be killed himself, than suffer him to be hurt; that both Clodius and his brother Appius had solemnly promised to act nothing against him; and, if they did not keep their word, that he would let all the world see, how much he preferred Cicero's friendship to all his other engagements. In Cicero's account of this to Atticus, Varro, says he, gives me full satisfaction; Pompey loves me, and treats me with great kindness. Do you believe him? you will say, Yes, I do. He convinces me, that he is in earnest. — Yet since all men of business, in their Historical reflections, and even Poets too in their verses, admonish us always to be upon our guard, not to believe too easily; I comply with them in one thing; to use all proper caution, as far as I am able; but for the other, find it impossible not to believe him.

* Cicero (as appears by Ep. xviii.) was likewise offered a Free Legation, in order to go and accomplish some vow: but he thought that this would not sufficiently screen him from the attacks of Clodius; and it would hinder him from having the pleasure of seeing his brother, who was then on his way to Rome.

† Though Cicero was so shy of accepting the offices of Commissioner and Lieutenant, it seems that he would have been very willing to accept of a place, that became vacant, by the death of Metellus Celer, in the college of Augurs, if it had been offered him. “Tell me (says he in a letter to Atticus) every tittle of news that is stirring, and, since Nepos is leaving Rome, who is to have his brother's Augurate: It is the only thing by which they could gain me. Observe my weakness! But what have I to do with such things, to which I long to bid adieu, and turn “myself entirely to Philosophy? I am now in earnest to do it; and wish that I had been so from the beginning.”

His English Historian will have it, that his inclination to the Augurate, at this time, was nothing else but a sudden start of an unweighed thought; no sooner thrown out than retracted; and dropt only to Atticus, to whom he used to open all his thoughts with the same freedom, with which they offered themselves to his own mind: “For it is certain (adds the Historian) that he might have had this very Augurate, if he had thought it worth asking for;” that is to say, it is certain, that in a letter to Cato, written nine years after, to convince Cato that he had no vain glory, he writes thus: “I forbore offering myself as a candidate for the office of Augur; tho' you are sensible, I dare say, that I might have succeeded without much difficulty.”

Y. R. 694.
Bef. Chr.
58.
393 Conf.
Plut. in Cic.

Ad Att.
ix. 2.
Vell. Pat.
ii. 45.
Ad Quint.
Fr. i. 2.
Ad Att.
ii. 20.
Ibid. 32.

Ibid. 20.

Ad Att.
viii. 14.

Ep. Fam.
xv. 14.

Ad Att.
i. 15.

Y. R. 694.
Bel. Chr.
58.
393 Conf.

Ad Art.
ii. 20.
Ad Quint.
Fr. i. 2.

But, whatever really passed between Clodius and Pompey, Cicero perceiving, that Clodius talked in a different strain to every body else, and denounced nothing but war and ruin to him, began to be very suspicious of Pompey; and prepared to defend himself by his genuine forces, the Senate and the Knights, with the bonest (as he calls them) of all ranks, who (he pretends) were ready to fly to his assistance from all parts of Italy. This was the situation of affairs, when Clodius entered upon the Tribunate, where his first act was to put the same affront upon Bibulus, which had been offered before to Cicero, on laying down that office, by not suffering him to speak to the People, but only to take the accustomed oath.

C H A P. II.

CLODIUS, a Tribune of the People, in the Consulship of PISO and GABINIUS, year of Rome 695, passes several new laws. He distresses CICERO; who, being deserted by those from whom he expected support, is constrained to go into banishment. To get rid of CATO, the Tribune engages the People to commission him to dethrone PTOLEMY, King of Cyprus, and seize his treasures; which commission he executes with great punctuality. The next year (696) LENTULUS SPINTHER and METELLUS NEPOS being Consuls, CICERO is recalled home, and restored to his dignity and estates: on which occasion CLODIUS raises mischievous riots in the City.

Y. R. 695.
Bel. Chr.
57.
394 Conf.

Ad Quint.
Fr. i. 2.

Post Red.
in Sen. 7.
In Pl. 5.
6.

Pro Sext.
10.

Pro Dom.
9.

Post Red.
in Sen. 4.

THE Consuls of the new year were L. Calpurnius Piso and A. Gabinius; the one the father-in-law of Cæsar, the other the creature of Pompey. Before their entrance into office, Cicero had conceived great hopes of both on account of the influence they were under; but especially of Piso, to whom (by the marriage of his daughter Tullia to C. Piso) he was allied, and who had lately given him marks of confidence, having employed him, at the time of the election, to preside over the votes of the leading century; and when he entered into his office, on the first of January, asked his opinion the third in the Senate, or the next after Pompey and Crassus: But he presently found himself deceived: For Clodius had already secured them to measures, by a private contract, to procure for them, by a grant of the People, two of the best governments of the empire: for Piso, Macedonia, with Greece and Thessaly; for Gabinius, Cilicia: And when this last was not thought good enough, and Gabinius seemed to be displeased with his bargain, it was exchanged soon after for Syria, with a power of making war upon the Parthians. For this price they agreed to serve him in all his designs, and particularly for the oppression of Cicero: who, on that account, often calls them not Consuls, but brokers of provinces, and sellers of their country².

To

Midd. 321.
Vol. Max. by P. Clodius, of plundering and oppressing
viii. 1.

the Allies: When, by throwing himself at the feet of his Judges in the most abject manner, and

To gain the People, Clodius, early in the year (Jan. 3.) promulgated several new laws, contrived chiefly for their advantage. First, That corn should be distributed gratis to the Citizens. Secondly, That no Magistrate should take the Auspices, or observe the heavens, when the People were actually assembled on public business. Thirdly, That the old companies or fraternities of the City, which the Senate had abolished about nine years before, should be revived, and new ones instituted.

Y. R. 695.
Vid. Orat.
in Pison 4.
& notas Ascon.
Dio,
l. xxxviii.
p. 67.

And, to please the Citizens of higher rank, Clodius published a fourth law — that the Censors should not expel from the Senate, or inflict a mark of infamy upon any man, who was not first openly and in form accused, and convicted of some crime by their joint sentence.

These laws, though generally agreeable, were highly unreasonable in Cicero's opinion; who took them all to be levelled at himself, and contrived to pave the way to his ruin; so that he provided his friend, L. Ninius, one of the Tribunes, to put his Negative upon them, especially on the Law of Fraternities; which, under colour of incorporating those societies, gave Clodius an opportunity of gathering an army, and enlisting into his service all the scum and dregs of the City. Dion Cassius says, that Clodius, in an amicable conference with Cicero, and by a promise not to make any attempt against him, persuaded him to withdraw his Tribune, and give no interruption to the new laws proposed: but we find from Cicero's account, that, because the laws were popular, and did not personally affect him, his friends advised him to be quiet; with which advice he complied, though contrary to his own judgment: and we find

Midd.
p. 324.

In Pis. 4.
Dio,
l. xxxviii.
p. 67.

and in the midst of a violent rain, he is said to have moved the compassion of the bench, who thought it punishment enough for a man of his birth, to be reduced to the necessity of prostrating himself so miserably, and rising so deformed and besmeared with dirt. — Cicero says, that Piso, in his outward carriage, affected the mien and garb of a Philosopher; and that his aspect greatly contributed to give him the credit of that character: He was severe in his looks; squalid in his dress; slow in his speech; morose in his manners; the very picture of antiquity, and a pattern of the ancient Republic, ambitious to be thought a Patriot, and a reviver of the old discipline. But this garb of rigid virtue was only the covering of a dirty, sottish, stupid Epicurean; wallowing in all the low and filthy pleasures of life; till a false opinion of wisdom, the splendor of his great family, and the smoky images of ancestors, whom he resembled in nothing but his complexion, recommended him to the Consulship; which exposed the genuine temper and talents of the man.

Pro Sext.
3 & 9.

In Pis. 1.

His colleague Gabinus was no hypocrite, but a professed rake from the beginning; gay, foppish, luxurious; always curled and perfumed; and living in a perpetual debauch of gaming, wine, and women: void of every principle of virtue, honour, and probity; and so desperate in his fortunes, through the extravagance of his pleasures, that he had no other resource, or hopes of subsistence, but from the plunder of the Republic. In his Tribune, when the law by him proposed, which gave the command of the war against the pirates, was depending, he, to pay his court to Pompey, exposed to the mob the plan of Lucullus's house, to shew what an expensive fabric one of the greatest subjects of Rome was building, as he would intimate, out of the spoils of the treasury: yet this vain man, oppressed with debts, and scarce able to shew his head, found means, from the perquisites of his Consulship, to build a much more magnificent palace than Lucullus himself had done.

Pro Sext.

Pro Dom.
409.

likewise

Y.R. 695. likewise, that he blamed himself afterwards for his indolence, and reproached Atticus particularly for having counselled him to let the Law of Fraternities pass; by which it was quickly evident, that Clodius had gained great advantage. The vengeful Tribune, become extremely popular on account of his new laws, eagerly seized the opportunity which this afforded him of driving his hated enemy into banishment: And, for this purpose, he provided a special law, which imported, that whoever had taken the life of a Citizen uncondemned, and without a trial, should be prohibited from fire and water. The putting Catiline's accomplices to death, though not done by Cicero's single authority, but by a general vote of the Senate, and after a solemn bearing and debate, was judged to be illegal, and contrary to the liberties of the People; and Cicero, though not named in the law, was the criminal manifestly marked out by it. Terrified, amazed, half out of his wits, he instantly changed his habit, and, as if he had been actually impeached, appeared about the streets in a sordid or mourning gown, to excite the compassion of the People: whilst Clodius contrived to meet and insult him at every turn; reproaching him for his meanness of spirit, and unmanly dejection; some of the populace even pelting him with dirt and stones. But he soon gathered friends enough about him to secure him from such insults, the whole body of the Knights, and the young Nobility, to the number of twenty thousand, with young Crassus at their head; who all changed their habit, and perpetually attended him, to implore the protection and assistance of the People.

The City was now in great agitation, and every part of it engaged on one side or the other. The Senate met in the Temple of CONCORD; while Cicero's friends assembled in the Capitol; whence all the Knights and young Nobles went in their habit of mourning to throw themselves at the feet of the Consuls, and beg their interposition in Cicero's favour. Piso kept his house that day on purpose to avoid them; but Gabinus received them with intolerable rudeness, though their petition was seconded by the intreaties and tears of the whole Senate: He treated Cicero's character and Consulship with the utmost derision, and repulsed the whole company with threats and insults for their fruitless pains to support a sinking cause. This raised great indignation in the Assembly: when the Tribune Ninnius, instead of being discouraged by the violence of the Consul, made a motion, that the Senate also should change their habit with the rest of the City; which was agreed to instantly by an unanimous vote. Gabinus, enraged at this, flew out of the Senate into the Forum; where he declared to the People from the Rostra, that men were mistaken to imagine, that the Senate had any power in the Republic; that the Knights should pay dear for that day's work, when, in Cicero's Consulship, they kept guard in the Capitol, with drawn swords: And that the hour was now come, when those, who lived at that time in fear, should revenge themselves on their enemies: And to confirm the truth of what he said, he banished L. Lamia, a Roman Knight, two hundred

Y.R. 695.
At Ann.
15.

Vell. Pat.
1. 48.

Plut. Cic.

Midd.
P. 325.

Post Red.
ad Quint.
3.

Pro Sext.
11, 12, 13.
It. Post
Red. in Sen. 5.

hundred miles from the City, for his distinguished zeal and activity in Cicero's cause; an act of power, which no Consul before him had ever presumed to exert on any Citizen, which was followed presently by an edict from both the Consuls, forbidding the Senate to put their late vote into execution, and enjoined them to resume their former dress*^h.

Y. R. 695.

*Ep. Fam.

xi. 16.

Pro Sext.

14.

Midd.

p. 327.

Ad Att.

iii. 15.

Cicero's resolution of changing his gown was too hasty and inconsiderate, and helped to precipitate his ruin. He was not named in the Law, nor personally affected by it: The terms of it were general, and seemingly just, reaching only to those, who had taken the life of a Citizen illegally. Whether this was his case, or not, was not yet the point in issue, but to be the subject of another trial: So that, by making himself a criminal, before the time, he shortened the trouble of his enemies, discouraged his friends, and made his case more desperate than he needed to have done: Whereas, if he had taken the part of commending or slighting the Law, as being wholly unconcerned in it, and when he came to be actually attacked by a second law, and brought to trial upon it, had stood resolutely upon his defence, he might have baffled the malice of his persecutors. He was sensible of his error when it was too late, and often reproached Atticus, that, being a stander-by, and less beaten in the game than himself, he would suffer him to make such blunders.

As the other Consul, Piso, had not yet explicitly declared himself, so Cicero, accompanied by his son-in-law, who was the Consul's near kinsman, took occasion to make him a visit, in hopes to move him to espouse his cause, and support the authority of the Senate. They went to him about eleven in the morning, and found him, as Cicero afterwards told the Senate, coming from a little dirty hovel, fresh from the last night's debauch, with his slippers on, his head muffled, and his breath so strong of wine, that they could hardly bear the scent of it. He excused his dress, and smell of wine, on account of his ill health, for which he was obliged, he said, to take some vinous medicines; but kept them standing all the while in that filthy place, till they had finished their business. As soon as Cicero entered into the affair, he frankly told them, that Gabinius was so miserably poor, as not to be able to shew his head; and must be entirely ruined, if he could not procure some rich province; that he had hopes of one from Clodius, but despaired of any thing from the Senate; that, for his own part, it was his business to humour him on this occasion, as Cicero had humoured his Colleague in his Consulship; and that there was no reason to implore the help of the Consuls, since it was every man's duty to look to himself. Which was all they could get from him.

In Pil. 6

^h And "where is there, says Cicero, in all history, a more illustrious testimony of any man, than that all the honest by private inclination, and the Senate by a public decree, should change their habit for the sake

"of one single Citizen?" But this was manifestly not the case: For the Honest and the Senate were as guilty as he, and had equal need of the People's indulgence.

Pro Sext.

12.

Y.R. 695. Clodius, all this while, was not idle, but pushed on his Law with great vigour, and calling the People into the Flaminian Circus, summoned thither also the young Nobles and the Knights, who were so busy in Cicero's cause, to give an account of their conduct to that Assembly: But, as soon as they appeared, he ordered his slaves and mercenaries to fall upon them with drawn swords, and volleys of stones, in so rude a manner, that Hortensius was almost killed, and Vibienus, another Senator, so desperately hurt, that he died soon after of his wounds. Here he produced the two Consuls, to deliver their sentiments to the People on the merit of Cicero's Consulship; when Gabinus declared with great gravity, that he utterly condemned the putting Citizens to death without a trial: Piso only said, That he had always been on the merciful side, and had a great aversion to cruelty. The reason of holding this Assembly in the Flaminian Circus without the gates of Rome, was to give Cæsar an opportunity of assisting at it, who, being now invested with a military command, could not appear within the walls. Cæsar, therefore, being called upon, after the Consuls, to deliver his mind upon the same question, declared, That the proceedings against Lentulus and the rest were irregular and illegal, but that he could not approve the design of punishing any body for them: That all the world knew his sense of the matter, and that he had given his vote against taking away their lives; yet he did not think it right to propound a law at this time about things that were so long past¹.

In this same Assembly, Clodius obtained a repeal of the Ælian and Favian laws², which had been in force about a hundred years, and made it unlawful to act any thing with the People on the days called *Fasti*³, or while the Augurs or Consuls were observing the heavens, and taking the auspices. These laws were the main support of the Aristocratical interest, as they proved of excellent use for checking any attempt of the Popular Magistrates, that gave the Senate an alarm: Cicero therefore frequently laments the loss of them, and calls them the most sacred laws of the State, the fences and bulwarks of the Public Tranquillity. [But it is no wonder that Clodius, in the character of a Popular Tribune, should attempt the repeal of such laws, seeing the worthy Consul Bibulus had, the very last year, in order to hinder the passing of certain laws beneficial to the People, most impudently proclaimed all the days of eight months together Holy Days.]

¹ This answer, says Dr. Middleton; was artful, and agreeable to the part which Cæsar was then acting; for, while it confirmed the foundation of Clodius's law, it carried a shew of moderation towards Cicero; or, as an ingenious writer expresses it, left appearances only to the one, but did real service to the other.

² The authors of these laws are not certainly known. Manutius says, they were two Tribunes of the People, about a hundred years before Clodius's Tribuneship. Hottomannus gives them different dates and different authors, ascribing the first to Q. Ælius Pætus, Consul in 586; the second to P. Fufius or Furius, Consul in 617.

³ The Dies Fasti were the days on which the Courts of Law were open, and the Prætors sat to hear causes; which days were marked for that purpose in the Calendars.

Pompey,

Pompey, who had hitherto been giving Cicero the strongest assurances of his friendship, and been frequent and open in his visits to him, began now, as the plot ripened towards a crisis, to grow cool and reserved; while the Clodian faction, fearing lest he might be induced at last to protect him, were employing all their arts to infuse jealousies and suspicions into him of a design against him from Cicero. They posted some of their confidants at Cicero's house, to watch Pompey's coming thither, and to admonish him by whispers, and billets put into his hands, to be cautious of venturing himself there, and to take better care of his life; which was inculcated to him so strongly at home by perpetual letters and messages from pretended friends, that he thought fit to withdraw himself from the City, to his house on the Alban hill. It cannot be easily imagined, that he entertained real apprehensions of Cicero: But, if he had any fear, it must, as Cicero says, have been of the common enemies of them both, lest they might possibly attempt somewhat in Cicero's name; and, by the opportunity of charging it upon Cicero, hope to get rid of them both at the same time: but the most probable conjecture is, that, being obliged, by his engagement with Cæsar, to desert Cicero, and suffer him to be driven out of the City, he was willing to humour these insinuations, as giving the most plausible pretext of excusing his perfidy ———."

Before things came to extremity, Cicero thought it adviseable to press Pompey in such a manner, as to know for certain what he had to expect from him. Some of his chief friends undertook the task; Lucullus, Torquatus, Lentulus, &c. who, with a numerous attendance of Citizens, went to find him at his Alban Villa, and to intercede with him, not to desert the fortunes of his old friend. He received them civilly, though coldly; referring them wholly to the Consuls, and declaring, that he, being only a private man, could not pretend to take the field against an armed Tribune, without a public authority; but if the Consuls, by a decree of the Senate, would enter into the affair, he would presently arm himself in their defence. With this answer they addressed themselves again to the Consuls; but with no better success than before; Gabinus treated them rudely; but Piso calmly told them, that he was not so stout a Consul as Torquatus and Cicero had been; that there was no need of arms, or fighting; that Cicero might save the Republic a second time, if he pleased, by withdrawing himself; for, if he staid, it would cost an infinite quantity of Civil blood; and, in short, that neither he, nor his Colleague, nor his son-in-law, Cæsar, would relinquish the party of the Tribune.

After this repulse, Cicero resolved to make his last effort on Pompey, by throwing himself in person at his feet. Plutarch tells us, that Pompey slipped out of a back door, and would not see him: But it is certain, from Cicero's account, that he was admitted to an audience; and, when he began to press, and even supplicate him, in a manner the most affecting, that Pompey flatly refused to help him; alledging, in excuse for himself, the necessity,

Y. R. 695.

Midd. p.

331---334

Pro Dom.

11.

Pio Sext

18.

In Pison.

31.

Ibid.

Ad. Att

x. 4.

Y. R. 695. which he was under, of acting nothing against the will of Cæsar. This experiment convinced Cicero, that he had a much greater power to contend with, than what had yet appeared in sight: He called, therefore, a council of his friends, with intent to take his final resolution, agreeably to their advice. The question was, Whether it was best to stay, and defend himself by force; or to save the effusion of blood, by retreating, till the storm should blow over: Lucullus ^{57.} advised the first, but Cato, and, above all, Hortensius, warmly urged the last; which, concurring with Atticus's Advice, as well as the fears and entreaty of all his own family, made him resolve to quit the field to his enemies, and submit to a voluntary exile.

Plut. in Cat.

De Leg.
ii. 17.

A little before his retreat, he took a small statue of Minerva, which had long been revered in his family, as a kind of Tutelar Deity, and, carrying it to the Capitol, placed it in the Temple of Jupiter, under the title of Minerva, the Guardian of the City, that, in the plunder of his goods, which was likely to ensue, this sacred Guardian might not be profaned by impious hands. Nos, qui illam custodem urbis, omnibus ereptis nostris rebus & perditis, violari ab impiis passi non sumus.

He departed from Rome in the night, escorted by a numerous guard of friends, who, after a day's journey or two, left him, with the greatest expressions of tenderness, to pursue his way towards Sicily, which he proposed as the place of his residence, and where, for his eminent services to the island, he assured himself of a kind reception and safe retreat.

Midd. p.
338.

As soon as it was known that he was gone, Clodius published a second law, conceived in the following terms:

Pro Dom.
18, 19, 20.
Post Red.
in Sen. ii.
10.

Whereas M. T. Cicero has put Roman Citizens to death, unheard and uncondemned; and for that end forged the authority and decree of the Senate: May it please you to ordain, that he be interdicted from fire and water: That no body presume to harbour or receive him on pain of death: And that whoever shall move, speak, vote, or take any step towards recalling him, he shall be treated as a public enemy.

Midd. p.
339.

It is pretended, that this law was essentially null and invalid^a: For
Cicero

^a Plutarch writes Lucullus without any Prænomén; and since the great Lucullus died mad very soon after the time we are speaking of, and was, therefore, probably, too weak now to be capable of Public affairs, we may well suppose, that the Historian means Marcus Lucullus, the brother of Lucius. Crevier.

Ibid.

^a It is said likewise, that the terms of the law were so absurd, that they annulled themselves; for it enacted, not that Cicero may or should be, but that he be interdicted, which was impossible; since no power on earth, says Cicero, can make a thing to be done before it be done. Non talis ut interdicatur, sed ut interdictum sit—Sente noster, bona venia quoniam jam dialecticus es—quod factum non est, ut sit factum, ferri ad populum aut verbis ullis sanciri, aut suffragiis confirmari potest? Pro Dom. 18. Quid si iis verbis scripta est ista proscriptio, ut se ipsa dissolvat? Ib. 9.

N. B. The distinction, here intimated, between interdicatur and interdictum sit, deserves the attention of all Grammarians. They are commonly used indifferently, as terms wholly equivalent, yet, according to Cicero's criticism, the one, we see, makes the sense absurd, where the other is just and proper.

I

Further,

Cicero says, it was not properly a law, but a privilege; or an Act to inflict penalties on a particular Citizen by name, without any previous trial; which was expressly prohibited by the most sacred and fundamental constitutions of the Republic. Vetant leges sacratae, vetant XII tabulae leges privatis hominibus irrogari. Id est enim privilegium. Y. R. 695. Pro Dom. 17.

[This objection to the proceedings against Cicero seems fully to justify them; the thing there spoken of, as prohibited by the laws of the Twelve Tables and the fundamental constitutions of the State, being the very thing of which he had been notoriously guilty. And it ought to be observed, that the Authority of THE SENATE, upon which he acted, could not make his act Legal; but, by a law of the Twelve Tables, whatever THE PEOPLE decreed last was LAW; and the votes of the People were their Decree; so that Cicero was legally banished.] Liv. b. vii. c. 17.

With this Law against Cicero there was another published at the same time, which granted to the two Consuls the provinces above specified, with a provision of whatever troops or money they thought fit. Both the laws passed without opposition, and Clodius lost no time in putting the first of them in execution, but fell immediately to plundering, burning, and demolishing Cicero's houses, both in the City and in the Country. The best part of his goods was divided between the two Consuls; the Marble Columns of his Palatin House were carried publicly to Piso's father-in-law; and the rich furniture of his Tusculan Villa to his neighbour Gabinus; who removed even the trees of his plantations into his own grounds: And, to make the loss of his house in Rome irretrievable, Clodius consecrated the Area on which it stood to the perpetual service of Religion, and built a Temple upon it to the Goddess LIBERTY. Midd. p. 340. Pro Sext. 10 & 24. In Pis. 16. Post Red. in Sen. 7. Pro Dom. 24. Ibid. 40.

“ The desolation of Cicero's fortunes at home, and the miseries which he suffered abroad, in being deprived of every thing that was dear to him, soon made him repent of the resolution of his flight; which he ascribes to the envy and treachery of his Counsellors, who, taking the advantage of his fears, and the perplexity which he was under, pushed him to an act both ruinous and inglorious. This he chiefly charges on Hortensius; and though he forbears to name him to Atticus, on account of the strict friendship between them, yet he accuses him very freely to his brother Quintus, of coming every day insiduously to his house, and, with the greatest expressions of zeal and affection, perpetually insinuating to his hopes and fears, that, by giving way to the present rage, he could not fail of being recalled with glory in three days time. Hortensius was particularly intimate, at this time, with Pompey, and Midd. p. 343--346. Ad Quint. Frat. 1. 3. Ibid. 4.

Further, that the penal clause being grounded on a suggestion notoriously false, that Cicero had forged the decrees of the Senate; it could not possibly stand for want of a foundation. Pro Dom. 19.

And, lastly, though it provided that no body should harbour him, yet it had not ordered him to be expelled, or enjoined him to quit the City. Ib. 20.

Y. R. 695. " might possibly be employed to urge Cicero to this step, in order to save
 B. Chr. " Pompey the disgrace of being forced to act against him with a very high
 57. " hand. But, let that be as it will, it was Pompey's conduct which shocked 394. Conf. " Cicero the most: Not for its being contrary to his Oaths°, which the " ambitious can easily dispense with; but to his interest, which they never " neglected, but through weakness. The consideration of what was use" ful to Pompey, made him depend on his assistance. —

" In this ruffled and querulous state of mind, stung with the recollection
 " of his own mistakes, and the perfidy of his friends, he often laments,
 " that he had not tried the fate of arms, and resolved either to conquer bravely,
 " or die honourably: Which he dwells so much upon in his letters, as to " seem persuaded, that it would have been his wisest course. But this is " a problem, not easy to be solved: It is certain, that his enemies were " using all arts to urge him to the resolution of retreating; as if they ap" prehend the consequences of his stay; and the real aim of the Tri-
 " umvirate was, not to destroy, but to humble him: Yet it is no less " certain, that all resistance must have been vain, if they had found it ne" cessary to exert their strength against him; and that they had already pro" ceeded too far, to suffer him to remain in the City in defiance of them:
 " And, if their power had actually been employed to drive him away, his " return must have been the more desperate, and they the more interested
 " to keep him out; so that it seems to have been his most prudent part,
 " and the most agreeable to his character, to yield, as he did, to the ne" cessity of the times.

Post Red. " But we have a full [certainly not a true] account of the motives of in Sen. 13. " his retreat in the SPEECHES, which he made after his return, both to the 14- " SENATE and the PEOPLE. When I saw the Senate, says he, deprived
 " of its leaders, myself partly pushed, and partly betrayed by the Magistrates;
 " the slaves enrolled by name, under the colour of fraternities, the remains
 " of Catiline's forces brought again into the field, under their old chiefs;
 " the Knights terrified with proscriptions; the corporate towns with military
 " execution, and with death and destruction; I could still have defended myself
 " by arms, and was advised to do so by many brave friends; nor did I want
 " that same COURAGE, which you had all seen me exert on other occasions:
 " But when I saw, at the same time, that, if I conquered my present enemy,
 " there were many more behind, whom I had still to conquer; that, if I hap- " pened to be conquered, many honest men would fall both with me and after
 " me; that there were people enough ready to revenge the Tribune's blood, while
 " the punishment of mine would be left to the forms of a trial and to poste-
 " rity; I resolved not to employ force in defending my private safety after I had

° " I knew him (says Cicero in a letter " to Atticus after Pompey's death) to be an " honest, grave, and worthy man." " This " (adds Dr. Middleton) was the sort and

" true character of the man from one who
 " perfectly knew him." Midd. life of Cic.
 Vol. II. p. 132. What inconsistencies are these! Vid. supra, p. 427.

“ defended that of the Republic without it; and was willing that honest men “ should rather lament the ruin of my fortunes, than make their own desperate
 “ by adhering to me: And if, after all, I had fallen alone, that would have “ been dishonourable to myself; if amidst the slaughter of the Citizens, fatal to “ the Republic.”

Y. R. 695.
 Bef. Chr.
 57.
 394 Conf.

His letters, written during his exile, to Terentia and Atticus, discover, that all he says here, of HIS COURAGE being restrained by his PATRIOTISM, is false. The truth is, he had neither COURAGE nor PATRIOTISM: He would have accepted the Lieutenantcy offered him by Cæsar, and have become an humble servant of the Triumvirate, if Clodius had not out-witted him. And when, by refusing that Lieutenantcy, he had lost the protection of Cæsar, he would have commenced a Civil War to preserve his Station and his fortune, if he had not felt the want of Courage in himself, and had not found, that, even in the opinion of his friends, he over-rated his own importance.

Vid. supra.
 P. 427.

“ Cicero, (says a very candid and ingenious writer) is perpetually “ reproaching himself in these letters to Terentia, and those which he “ wrote at the same time to Atticus, for not having taken up Arms,
 “ and resolutely withstood the Violence of Clodius. He afterwards, “ however, in several of his SPEECHES, made a merit of what he here “ condemns, and particularly in that for Sextius he appeals to Heaven “ in the most solemn manner, that he submitted to a voluntary exile, in “ order to spare the blood of his fellow Citizens, and preserve the pub“ lic tranquillity. Te, te, patria, testor, et vos, penates patriique Dii, “ me vestrarum sedum templorumque causa, me propter salutem meorum civium, “ quæ mihi semper fuit mea carior vita, dimicationem cademque fugisse. But “ Cicero’s veracity, in this solemn asseveration, seems liable to be justly “ questioned. It is certain, that he once entertained a design of taking “ up Arms in his own defence: and the single motive that appears to “ have determined him in the change of this resolution was, his finding “ himself most perfidiously deserted by Pompey. Si ——— quisquam fuisset
 “ (says he in a letter to Atticus) qui me Pompeii minus liberali responso “ perterritum a turpissimo consilio revocaret; — aut occubuissem honeste;
 “ aut viatores hodie viveremus. Dion Cassius asserts, that Cicero, notwith“ standing the unexpected desertion of Pompey, was preparing to put “ himself in a posture of defence; but that Cato and Hortensius would “ not suffer him to execute his purpose. Perhaps this Author may be “ mistaken as to his having made any actual preparations of this kind;
 “ but that he had it in his intentions, seems clear beyond all reasonable “ contradiction. The French Historian of our Author’s banishment has “ relied therefore too much upon Cicero’s pompous professions after his “ return, when he maintains that nothing could be farther from his “ thought than a serious opposition. The contrary appears most evi“ dently to have been the case; and that the patriot-motive, which he so Melm. vol.

 I. p. 35.
 note 1, on
 Let. viii.

Pro Sext.
 20.

Ad Att.
 cxi. 15.

Lib.
 xxxviii.

Hist. de l’Exil. de
 Cic. p. 148.

“ often

Y. R. 695. " often assigns in his subsequent Orations, for leaving his Country, was Bef. Chr. " merely an after-thought, and the plausible colouring of artful eloquence.
 57.
 194 Conf. " Why else, it may be asked, is there not the least hint of any such generous " principle of his conduct, in all the letters he wrote during this period ?
 " Why else is he perpetually reproaching his friends for having suffered
 " him to take that measure ? And why, in a word, does he call it, as in " the passage above cited, turpissimum consilium, the effect of a most igno" minious resolution ? But, were it to be admitted that a regard to his " Country determined him to withdraw from it, still, however, he could " not, with any degree of truth, boast of his Patriotism on that occasion :
 " For the most partial of his advocates must acknowledge, that he no " sooner executed this resolution, than he heartily repented of it. The " truth is, how unwilling soever he might be to hazard the Peace of his " Country in maintaining his Post, he was ready to renounce all tender" ness of that kind in recovering it ; and he expressly desires Atticus to " raise the Mob in his favour, if there were any hopes of making a success" ful push for his restoration: Oro te ut, si quæ spes erit posse studiis bonorum, Ad Att. " auctoritate multitudine comparata, rem confici, des operam ut uno impetu
 iii 23. " perfringatur."

Dyrrachium, Nov. 26.

Midd. p. Clodius, having satiated his revenge upon Cicero, proposed another 347. law [from a like spirit of revenge] against Ptolemy, King of Cyprus ; to deprive him of his kingdom, and reduce it to a Roman province, and confiscate his whole estate. This Prince was brother to the King of
 * Pro Ægypt, and reigning by the same * right, in full peace and amity with Dom. 8. Rome ; accused of no practices, nor suspected of any designs, against the Vid. supr. Republic ; whose only crime was to be rich and covetous ; so that the law
 p. 305. was an unparalleled act of injustice, and what Cicero, in a public speech, note (1) did not scruple to call a mere robbery : But Clodius had an old grudge to Pro Sext. 26, 27, 28, the King, for refusing to ransom him when he was taken by the pirates ;
 29. and sending him only the contemptible sum of two talents : and what, Dio, lib. says † Cicero, must other Kings think of their security, to see their crowns xxxviii. and fortunes at the disposal of a Tribune and six hundred mercenaries ?
 p. 78. † Pro Sext. The law passed, however, without any opposition ; and, to sanctify it, as
 27. App. lib. it were, and give it the better face and colour of Justice, Cato was charged
 ii. p. 441. with the execution of it : Which gave Clodius a double pleasure, by im-Plut. in posing so shameful * a task upon the gravest man in Rome. It was a part Cat. likewise of the same law, as well as Cato's commission, to restore certain exiles of Byzantium, whom their City had driven out for crimes against the public peace. The engaging Cato in such dirty work was a master-

* " It is truly reckoned (say Dr. Prideaux)
 " one of the unjustest acts that the Romans
 " to this time ever did. For Ptolemy had " been admitted as a Friend and Ally of the " Roman People, and had never offended

 " them, or done them any hurt or displea-
 " sure, whereby to deserve this usage from " their hands." Vol. II. p. 448.

piece,

piece, and served many purposes of great use to Clodius: First, to get rid of a troublesome adversary for the remainder of his magistracy: Secondly, to fix a blot on Cato himself, and shew, that the most rigid pretenders to Virtue might be caught by a proper bait: Thirdly, to stop his mouth for the future, as he openly bragged, from clamouring against extraordinary commissions: Fourthly, to oblige him, above all, to acknowledge the Validity of his Acts, by submitting to bear a part in them. The Tribune had the satisfaction to see Cato taken in his trap.

Cato, coming to Rhodes, in his way to Cyprus, sent to Ptolemy to persuade him quietly to recede, promising him, on that condition, the high-priesthood of VENUS at Paphos, on the revenues of which he might be supported in a state of plenty and honour; but of this he would not accept. To resist the Roman power he was not able, and to be less than King after he had so long reigned, he could not bear, and therefore, resolving to make his Life and Reign end together, he put all his riches on shipboard, and, launching out into the sea, purposed, by boring his ship through, to make both his Riches and himself sink into the deep, and there perish together. But, when it came to the execution, he could not bear that his beloved treasure should be thus lost; he continued still in the resolution to destroy himself, but he could not bring his heart to destroy that, which, to him, was far dearer than his dear self; he carried it therefore all back to land, laid it up again in its former repository, and then put an end to his life by poison; having this comfort only in death, that he left his Treasure undiminished, and undivided.

Cato executed his commission with fidelity; and returned the year following, in a kind of triumph to Rome, with all the King's effects reduced into money, amounting to about a million and a half sterling, which he delivered with great pomp into the public treasury.

This proceeding was severely condemned by Cicero; though he touches it in his public speeches with some tenderness for the sake of Cato, whom he labours to clear from any share in the iniquity: "The commission," says he, was contrived not to adorn, but to banish Cato; not offered, but imposed upon him——Why did he then obey it? Just as he was sworn to obey other laws, which he knew to be unjust, that he might not expose himself to the fury of his enemies, and, without doing any good, deprive the Republic of such a Citizen.—If he had not submitted to such a law, he could not have hindered it; the stain of which would still have stuck upon the Republic, and he himself suffered for rejecting it; since it would have been a precedent for invalidating all the other acts of that year: He considered, therefore, that, since the scandal of it could not be avoided, he was the person the best qualified to draw good out of evil, and to serve his Country well, though in a bad cause." But, howsoever this may colour, it cannot justify Cato's conduct; who valued himself highly upon his Cyprian transactions,

Y. R. 695.
Bef. Chr.
57.
394. Conf.

Prid. vol.
II. p. 449.
Plut. in Cat.
Val. Max.
Dio.
Strabo.
Appian.
Vell. Pat.

Midd. p.
348.
Plut. in Cat.

Midd. p.
349.
Pro Sext.
28, 29.

actions, and, for the sake of that commission, was drawn in, as Clodius expected, to support the authority from which it flowed, and to maintain the legality of Clodius's Tribunate in some warm debates even with Cicero himself.

Plut. in.
Cat.
Dio. lib.
xxix. p.
102.

Ad. Att.
iii. 4.

Plut. in
Cic.
Pro Planc.
40.
Ibid. 41.

Ep. Fam.
xiv. 4.

Midd. p.
353.

Ad Att.
iii. 7.

Pro Planc.
41.
Post Red.
in Sen. 14.

It would seem that Cicero left Rome in the beginning of April; for on the eighth of that month he writes to Atticus, *From the sea-coast of Lucania, being then on his way to Vibo, a town of Bruttium, the most southern part of Italy. At Vibo he spent several days with a friend named Sica; and here he received a copy of the law made against him, which fixed the limits of his exile to the distance of four hundred miles from Italy. His thoughts at first had been wholly bent on Sicily†; but no part of that island being within the distance specified by law, he was obliged to turn towards Brundisium, that he might thence pass into Greece. All the towns on his road received him with public marks of respect. When he came to Brundisium, where he arrived on the 17th of April, he would not enter within the walls of the City, but chose to lodge in the villa of his friend, M. Lemius Flaccus, not far from it. Flaccus was not deterred by the penalty of the law from performing towards him all the rights of friendship and hospitality; so that Cicero continued here thirteen days, after which he embarked for Dyrrachium.

During his stay with Flaccus, he was in no small perplexity about the choice of a convenient place for his residence abroad. Atticus offered him his house in Epirus, which was a castle of some strength, and likely to afford him a secure retreat. But, since Atticus could not attend him thither in person, he dropt all thoughts of that, and was inclined to go to Athens; till he was informed, that it would be dangerous for him to travel into that part of Greece, where all those who had been banished for Catiline's Conspiracy, and especially Autronius, then resided.

At Dyrrachium he met with a confirmation of what he had heard before in Italy, that Acbaia and the neighbouring parts of Greece swarmed with those outlaws, who had been driven from Rome on Catiline's account. This determined him to go into Macedonia, where his friend, C. Plancius, was then Quæstor; who, upon the first notice of his landing, came directly, unattended by his Lictors, and without any of the pomp of Magistracy, to meet him; and from Dyrrachium conducted him to his head-quarters at Theffalonica. L. Appuleius, the Prætor or chief Governor of the province, was Cicero's friend; yet he durst not venture to grant him his protection, or shew him any public civility, but contented himself with only conniving at what his Quæstor Plancius did.

* Dat. vi. Id. Apr. in oris Luc. Ad Att. Lib. iii. Ep. 2.

† We are told, that, when Cicero arrived within sight of Sicily, the Prætor, C. Vir- gilius, an old friend, who had been highly obliged to him, sent him word that he must not set foot in it. Plut. in Cic. Pro Planc. 40.

While

WHILE Cicero staid at Dyrrachium, he received two expresses from his brother Quintus, to inform him of his intended route, in returning homeward from Asia, and to settle the place of their meeting: “But Cicero had not resolution enough to see him; finding himself unable to bear the tenderness of such a meeting, and much more the misery of parting; and he was apprehensive besides, that, if they once met, they should not be able to part at all, whilst Quintus’s presence at Rome was necessary to their common interests: So that, to avoid one affliction, he was forced, he says, to endure another most cruel one, that of shunning the embraces of a Brother.

“L. Tubero, however, his kinsman, and one of the brother’s Lieutenants, paid him a visit on his return towards Italy, and acquainted him with what he had learnt in passing through Greece, that the banished Conspirators, who resided there, were actually forming a plot to seize and murder him; for which reason he advised him to go into Asia, where the zeal and affection of the province would afford him the safest retreat, both on his own and his brother’s account. Cicero was disposed to follow this advice, and leave Macedonia: For the Prætor, Apuleius, though a friend, gave him no encouragement to stay; and the Consul Piso, his enemy, was coming to the command of it the next winter: But all his friends at Rome dissuaded his removal to any place more distant from them; and Plancius treated him so affectionately, and contrived to make all things so easy to him, that he dropt the thoughts of changing his quarters. The only inconvenience that Cicero found in his present situation, was the number of soldiers and concourse of people, who frequented the place on account of business with the Quæstor. For he was so shocked and dejected by his misfortune, that, though the cities of Greece were offering their services and compliments, and striving to do him all imaginable honours, yet he refused to see all company, and was so shy of the public, that he could hardly endure the light.

“For it cannot be denied, that, in this calamity of his exile, he did not behave himself with that firmness, which might reasonably be expected from one who had borne so glorious a part in the Republic; conscious of his integrity, and suffering in the cause of his country: For his ‘Cicero seems most unworthily to impute the kindness, which Plancius shewed him, to an interested view: Me adhuc Plancius liberalitate sua retinet. — Spes homine est injecta, non eadem, quæ mihi, posse nos una decedere: quam rem sibi magno honori sperat fore. Ad. Att. iii. 22.

‘Whether it was possible for Cicero to be conscious of integrity, and of suffering in the cause of his Country, or in any cause but his own, the whole tenor of his conduct will best enable the Reader to determine. Let the Reader, if he pleases, compare Mr. Melmoth’s Remark, inserted above in the Text, p. 437, with the following passages, extracted from some of Cicero’s writings by his able Panegyrist:

3 I.

“I have

Y. R. 695.
Bef. Chr.
57.
394 Conf.
Midd. p.
356, 357.
Ad Att.
iii. 9.
Ad Quint.
Fr. i. 3.

Pro Planc.
41.

Ep. Fam.
xiv. 1, 2.

Ad Att.
iii. 7.

Y.R. 695. " his letters are generally filled with such lamentable expressions of grief
 " and despair, that his best friends, and even his wife, was forced to Ep. Fam. " admonish him sometimes, to rouse his courage, and remember his for-
 xiv. 4. " mer character. Atticus was constantly putting him in mind of it";
 " and sent him word of a report, that was brought to Rome by one of " Crassus's freedmen, that his afflictions had disordered his senses: To Ad Att. " which he answered, that his mind was still sound, and he wished only
 iii. 13. " that it had been always so, when he placed his confidence on those who Ibid. 15. " perfidiously abused it to his ruin.

Midd. 360. " I have twice saved the Republic; once Pro Sext. " with glory, a second time with misery: For 22. " I will never deny myself to be a man; or
 " brag of bearing the loss of a brother, chil" dren, wife, country, without sorrow.—For
 " what thanks had been due to me for quit-Pro Dom. " ting what I did not value?—I own my 36, 37. " grief to have been extremely great, nor do I " pretend to that wisdom, which those expected
 " from me, who gave out, that I was too " much broken by my affliction: For such an
 " hardness of mind, as of body, which does " not feel pain, is a stupidity, rather than a vir" tue. — I am not one of those to whom all " things are indifferent; but love myself and
 " my friends, as our common humanity re" quires: And, He, who, for the Public Good, Midd. 361. " parts with what he holds the Dearest, gives
 " the biggest proof of Love to his Country.

" There was another consideration (says
 " his English Historian) which added no small
 " sting to his affliction; to reflect, as he often Ad. Att. " does, not only on what he had lost, but
 iii. 8. " how he had lost it, by his own fault; in Vid. 9, 14, " suffering himself to be imposed upon, and 15, 19, &c. " deluded by false and envious friends. —
 " Though my grief is incredible, yet I am not " disturbed so much by the misery of what I feel,
 " as the recollection of my fault. — Wherefore,
 " when you hear how much I am afflicted, ima" gine that I am suffering the punishment of my
 " folly, not of the event; for having trusted
 " too much to one whom I did not take to be a " Rascal.—Atticus would never allow his " suspicions to be just, not even against Horten-
 " sius, where they seemed to lie the heaviest.
 " This is the substance of what Cicero him" self says, to excuse the excess of his grief: and
 " the only excuse indeed which can be made " for him; that he did not pretend to be " a Stoic, nor aspire to the character of a " Hero:" [Yet he often boasts of his prodigious courage.] Midd. 359

" These remonstrances did not please him; he thought them unkind and unseasonable, as he intimated in several of his letters, where he expresses himself very movingly on this subject. " As to your Ad. Att.
 " chiding me, says he, so often and so severe- iii. 10.
 " ly, for being too much dejected; what misery
 " is there, I pray you, so grievous, which I " do not feel in my present calamity? Did ever
 " any man fall from such a height of dignity,
 " in so good a cause, with the advantage of
 " such talents, experience, interest; such support
 " of all honest men? Is it possible for me to for-
 " get what I was? or not to feel what I am?
 " From what honour, what glory, I am driven?
 " From what children? what fortunes? what
 " a brother? whom, though I love, and have " ever loved, better than myself, yet (that you
 " may perceive what a new sort of affliction I " suffer) I refuse to see; that I might neither
 " augment my own grief by the sight of his, nor
 " offer myself to him thus ruined, whom he had
 " left so flourishing: I omit many other things
 " intolerable to me; for I am hindered by my
 " tears: Tell me then, whether I am still to be
 " reproached for grieving; or for suffering my- " self rather to be deprived of what I ought ne- " ver to have parted with but with my life;
 " which I might easily have prevented, if some
 " perfidious friends had not urged me to my ruin
 " within my own walls, &c." In another letter, " Continue, says he, to assist me, as you
 " do, with your endeavours, your advice, and Ibid. 11.
 " your interest; but spare yourself the pains of
 " comforting, and much more of chiding me:
 " For, when you do this, I cannot help charging
 " it to your want of love and concern for me:
 " whom I imagined to be so afflicted with my " misfortune, as to be inconsolable even yourself."

" WHEN

“ WHEN he had been gone a little more than two months, his friend Y. R. 695.
 “ Ninnius, the Tribune, made a motion in the Senate to recall him, and “ repeal the law of Clodius; to which the whole House readily agreed, Midd. p. 362--367.
 “ with eight of the Tribunes, till one of the other two, Ælius Ligus, “ interposed his negative: They proceeded, however, to a resolution, “ that no other business should be transacted, till the Consuls had actual“ ly prepared a new law for that purpose.—Clodius was now losing ground “ apace; being grown so insolent on his late success, that even his friends “ could not bear him any longer: For, having banished Cicero, and Pro Dom. 25.
 “ sent Cato out of his way, he began to fancy himself a match for “ Pompey; by whose help, or connivance at least, he had acquired all “ his power: And, in open defiance of him, seized by stratagem, into “ his own hands, the son of King Tigranes, whom Pompey had brought “ with him from the East, and kept a prisoner at Rome in the custody of “ Flavius the Prætor. Instead of delivering the Prince up, when Pompey “ demanded him, he put him on board a ship, having undertaken, for a “ large sum of money, to give him his liberty, and transport him into “ Asia. This, however, did not pass without a sharp engagement between “ the Tribune and Flavius: For a storm arising at the instant the Prince “ put off to sea, he was forced to take shelter in the harbour of Antium.
 “ Flavius had notice of this, and marched out of Rome with a body of Aston. in Milon. 14.
 “ men well armed, to recover Tigranes by force. The battle was fought “ in the Appian way; many were killed on both sides, and Clodius proved “ victorious. Among the slain was Papirius, a Roman Knight of Pompey’s “ intimate acquaintance; and Flavius himself had some difficulty to es“ cape with life.

“ This affront roused Pompey to think of recalling Cicero; as well to “ correct the arrogance of Clodius, as to retrieve his own credit, and in“ gratiate himself with the Senate: He dropt some hints of his inclina“ tions to Cicero’s friends, and particularly to Atticus, who presently im“ parted to him the agreeable news: Upon which Cicero, though he had “ no opinion of Pompey’s sincerity, was encouraged to write to him, and Ad Quint. Fr. i. 3. Ad Att. iii. 8.
 “ sent a copy of his letter to Atticus, telling him, at the same time, that “ if Pompey could digest the affront which he had received in the case of “ Tigranes, he should despair of his being moved by any thing. Varro, “ likewise, who had a particular intimacy with Pompey, desired Atticus to “ let Cicero know, that Pompey would certainly enter into his cause, as soon “ as he had heard from Cæsar, which he expected to do every day.—This “ shews what an extraordinary deference Pompey paid to Cæsar, that he “ would not take a step in this affair at Rome, without sending first to Gaul, “ to consult him about it.

“ The City was alarmed, at the same time, by the rumour of a second Pro Sext. 32. In Pison. 12.
 “ plot against Pompey’s life, said to be contrived by Clodius; one of “ whose slaves was seized at the door of the Senate, with a dagger, which

Y. R. 695. " his master had given him, as he confessed, to stab Pompey: Which,
 Bef. Chr. " being accompanied with many daring attacks upon Pompey's person
 57. " by Clodius's mob, made him resolve to retire from the Senate and the 194. Conf. " Forum, till Clodius was out of his Tribunate, and shut himself up in his " own house, whither he was pursued, and actually besieged, by one of Clo-
 " dus's freedmen, Damio. An outrage so audacious could not be over- " looked by the Magistrates, who came out with all their forces, to seize
 " or drive away Damio; upon which a general engagement ensued,
 " where Gabinius, as Cicero says, was forced to break his league with Clodius,
 " and fight for Pompey; at first faintly and unwillingly, but at last hearti-
 " ly; while Piso, more religious, stood firm to his contract, and fought on " Clodius's side, till his fasces were broken, and he himself wounded, and
 " forced to run away.

" Whether any design was really formed against Pompey's life, or the " story was contrived to serve his present views, it seems probable at least,
 " that his fears were feigned, and the danger too contemptible to give " him any just apprehension; but the shutting himself up at home made " an impression upon the vulgar, and furnished a better pretence for turn" ing so quick upon Clodius, and quelling that insolence which he himself
 " had raised: For this was the constant tenor of his politics, to give a free
 " course to the public disorders, for the sake of displaying his own impor" tance to more advantage; that, when the storm was at the height, he " might appear, at last, in the scene, like a Deity of the Theatre, and " reduce all again to order; expecting still, that the People, tired and " harassed by these perpetual tumults, would be forced to create him Dic" tator, for settling the quiet of the City.

" The Consuls elect were P. Cornelius Lentulus and Q. Metellus Nepos:
 " The first was Cicero's warm friend, the second his old enemy; the same
 " who put that affront upon him on laying down his Consulship: His " promotion therefore was a great discouragement to Cicero, who took
 " it for granted, that he would employ all his power to obstruct his re" turn: ——— But Metellus, perceiving which way Pompey's inclination,
 " and Cesar's also, was turning, found reason to change his mind, or
 " at least to dissemble it; and promised, not only to give his consent,
 " but his assistance to Cicero's restoration. His Colleague Lentulus, in " the mean while, was no sooner elected, than he revived the late motion " of Ninnius, and proposed a vote to recall Cicero; and when Clodius in" terrupted him, and recited that part of his law which made it criminal
 " to move any thing about it, Lentulus declared it to be no law, but a " mere proscription, and act of violence. This alarmed Clodius, and " obliged him to exert all his arts to support the validity of the law; he " threatened ruin and destruction to all who should dare to oppose it;
 " and, to imprint the greater terror, fixed upon the doors of the Senate-house
 " that clause which prohibited all men to speak or act in any manner for " Cicero's

• Post Red.
 in Sen. 4.

Ad Att.
 iii. 15.

“ Cicero’s return, on pain of being treated as enemies. This gave a farther “ disquiet to Cicero, lest it should dishearten his active friends, and furnish “ an excuse to the indolent for doing nothing : He insinuates, therefore,
 “ to Atticus, what might be said to obviate it ; that all such clauses were “ only bugbears, without any real force ; or otherwise, no law could ever be “ abrogated ; and, whatever effect this was intended to have, that it must “ needs fall of course with the law itself.

Y. R. 695.
 Bef. Chr.
 57.
 394 Conf.
 Ad Att.
 iii. 23.

“ In this anxious state of mind, jealous of every thing that could hurt,
 “ and catching at every thing that could help him, another little incident “ happened, which gave him a fresh cause of uneasiness : For some of his “ enemies had published an investive Oration, drawn up by him for the “ entertainment only of his intimate friends, against some eminent Sena“ tor, not named, but generally supposed to be Curio, the Father, who “ was now disposed and engaged to serve him : He was surprized and “ concerned, that the Oration was made public ; and his instructions upon “ it to Atticus are somewhat curious ; and shew how much he was struck “ with the apprehension of losing so powerful a friend. You have stunned “ me, says he, with the news of the Orations being published : Heal the “ wound, as you promise, if you possibly can : I wrote it long ago in anger,
 “ after he had first written against me ; but I had suppressed it so carefully,
 “ that I never dreamt of its getting abroad, nor can imagine how it slipped out :
 “ But since, as fortune would have it, I never had a word with him in person,
 “ and it is written more negligently than my Orations usually are, I cannot but “ think that you may disown it, and prove it not to be mine. Pray take care of “ this, if you see any hopes for me ; if not, there is the less reason to trouble “ myself about it.

Ad Att.
 iii. 12.

“ His principal agents and solicitors at Rome were his brother Quintus, “ his wife Terentia, his son-in-law Piso, Atticus, and Sextius, one of the “ Tribunes elect.

“ Sextius

Midd. 368. “ The brother and the wife, being both “ of them naturally peevish, seem to have “ given him some additional disquiet, by “ their mutual complaints against each other ;
 “ which obliged him to admonish them gently “ in his letters, that, since their friends were “ so few, they ought to live more amicably “ among themselves.

“ Terentia, however, bore a very consider“ able part of the whole affair : and, instead “ of being daunted by the depression of “ the family, and the ruin of their fortunes, “ seems to have been animated rather the “ more to withstand the violences of their “ enemies, and procure her husband’s reslo“ ration.

“ She had a particular estate of her own,
 “ not obnoxious to Clodius’s law, which she “ was now offering to sale, for a supply of “ their present necessities.” But we find that “ Cicero, in several of his letters, pressed her “ not to do it.

“ His son-in-law, Piso, was extremely af- Post Red.
 “ fectionate and dutiful, in performing all in Sen. 15.
 “ good offices, both to his banished father Ep. Fam.
 “ and the family ; and resigned the Quæst- xiv. 1.
 “ orship of Pontus and Bithynia, on purpose “ to serve them more effectually by his pre“ sence at Rome.

“ Atticus

Y. R. 695.

Midd. 373.

Pro Sext.

32.

Corn Nep.

Vit. Att.

4.

Ad. Att.

iii. 25.

Ibid. 20.

Midd. 371.

"Sextius took the trouble of a journey into Gaul, to solicit Cæsar's consent to his Restoration; which though he obtained, as well by his own intercession

"Atticus had furnished Cicero for the exigencies of his flight, with above two thousand pounds; and, upon succeeding to the great estate of his uncle Cæcilius*, whose name he now assumed, made him a fresh offer of his purse: Yet his conduct did not wholly satisfy Cicero; who thought him too cold and remiss in his services; and fancied, that it flowed from some secret resentment, for having never received from him, in his flourishing condition, any beneficial proofs of his friendship. In order, therefore, to rouse his zeal, he took occasion to promise him, in one of his letters, that, whatever reason he had to complain on that score, it should all be made up to him, if he lived to return: If fortune says he, ever restore me to my Country, it shall be my special care, that you, above all my friends, have cause to rejoice at it: And tho' hitherto, I confess, you have reaped little benefit from my kindness, I will manage so far for the future, that whenever I am restored, you shall find yourself as dear to me as my brother and my children. If I have been wanting therefore in any duty to you, or rather, since I have been wanting, pray pardon me; for I have been much more wanting to myself. But Atticus begged of him to lay aside all such fancies, and assured him, that there was not the least ground for them; and that he had never been disgusted by any thing, which he had either done, or neglected to do for him; intreating him to be perfectly easy on that head, and to depend always upon his best services, without giving himself the trouble even of reminding him."

Cicero's letters to Terentia, (so excellently well translated into English by Mr. Melmoth) mention the cordial zeal of Piso for his father-in-law, and acquaint us more perfectly than any historian can do, with the state of Cicero's mind in the time of his banishment.

Mr. Melmoth, in a note on the first of them, Melm. writes thus: "The following letters to Ter- Vol. 1. p. entia were written in Cicero's exile, and 25. will prove, either that he was a philosopher only in speculation, or that philosophy itself pretends to more than it has power to perform. Perhaps they will prove both: For as, on the one hand, they discover the most unmanly dejection of spirit; so it is certain, on the other, that much weaker minds have been able, with the assistance of better principles, to support, with fortitude, far severer trials."

BOOK I. LETTER VI.*

To Terentia, to my dearest Tullia, and to my Son.

*Ep. Fam.

l. xiv. Ep.

4. Ed. Græv.

"If you do not hear from me so frequently as you might, it is because I can neither write to you, nor read your letters, without falling into a greater passion of tears than I am able to support: For, though I am at all times, indeed, completely miserable, yet I feel my misfortunes with a particular sensibility upon those tender occasions. Oh! that I had been more indifferent to life! Our days would then have been, if not wholly unacquainted with sorrow, yet by no means thus wretched. However, if any hopes are still reserved to us of recovering some part, at least, of what we have lost, I shall not think that I have made altogether so imprudent a choice. But, if our

* "This Cæcilius, Atticus's uncle, was a famous churl and usurer, (sometimes mentioned in Cicero's letters), who adopted Atticus by his will, and left him three fourths of his estate, which amounted to 80,000 l. sterling. He had raised this great fortune by the favour chiefly of Lucullus, whom he flattered to the last with a promise of making him his heir, yet left the bulk of his estate to Atticus, who had been very observant of his humour; for which fraud, added to his notorious avarice and extortion, the mob seized his dead body, and dragged it infamously about the streets. Val. Max. vii. 8. Cicero, congratulating Atticus upon his adoption, addresses his letter to Q. Cæcilius, Q. F. Pompeianus Atticus. For, in assuming the name of the adopter, it was usual to add also their own family name, though changed in its termination, as from Pompeius to Pompeianus, to preserve the memory of their real extraction: To which some added also the surname, as Cicero does in the present case." Ad. Att. iii. 20.

"present

“ intercession as by Pompey's letters, yet it seems to have been with cer- Y. R. 695.
 “ tain limitations, not agreeable to Cicero: For, on Sextius's return Bef. Chr.
 “ to 57.
 “ 394 Conf.

“ present fate is unalterably fixed——Ah!
 “ my dearest Terentia, if we are utterly and “ for ever abandoned by those gods whom “ you have so religiously adored, and by those “ men whom I have so faithfully served, let “ me see you as soon as possible, that I may “ have the satisfaction of breathing out my “ last departing sigh in your arms.

“ I have spent about a fortnight at this “ place, with my friend Marcus Flaccus. This “ worthy man did not scruple to exercise the “ rights of friendship and hospitality towards “ me, notwithstanding the severe penalties of “ that iniquitous law against those who should “ give me reception. May I one day have it “ in my power to make him a return to those “ generous services, which I shall ever most “ gratefully remember.

“ I am just going to embark, and purpose to “ pass through Macedonia in my way to Cyxi- “ cum. And now, my Terentia, thus wretched
 “ and ruined as I am, can I intreat you un“ der all that weight of pain and sorrow with “ which, I too well know, you are oppressed, “ can I intreat you to be the partner and “ companion of my exile? But must I then “ live without you? I know not how to recon“ cile myself to that hard condition; unless “ your presence at Rome may be a means of “ forwarding my return: if any hopes of “ that kind should indeed subsist. But should “ there, as I sadly suspect, be absolutely none;
 “ come to me, I conjure you, if it be possi“ ble: For never can I think myself com“ pletely ruined, whilst I enjoy my Terentia's “ company. But how will my dearest daugh“ ter dispose of herself? A question which “ you yourselves must consider: For, as to my “ own part, I am utterly at a loss what to “ advise. At all events, however, that dear “ unhappy girl must not take any measures “ that may hinder her conjugal repose, or “ affect her in the good opinion of the world.
 “ As for my son——let me not at least be de“ prived of the consolation of folding him
 “ for ever in my arms. But I must lay down
 “ my pen a few moments: My tears flow too “ fast to suffer me to proceed.

“ I am under the utmost solicitude, as I “ know not whether you have been able to pre“ serve any part of your estate, or (what I sad“ ly fear) are cruelly robbed of your whole for“ tune.—I hope Piso will always continue,

 “ what you represent him to be, entirely ours:
 “ —As to the manumission of the slaves, I “ think you have no occasion to be uneasy.
 “ For, with regard to your own, you may on“ ly promise them their liberty as they should “ deserve it: But, excepting Orpheus, there “ is none of them that have any great claim to “ this favour. As to mine, I told them, if my “ estate should be forfeited, I would give them “ their freedom, provided I could obtain the “ confirmation of that grant: But if I prefer“ ved my estate, that they should all of them, “ excepting only a few, whom I particularly “ named, remain in their present condition.
 “ But this is a matter of little consequence.

“ With regard to the advice you give me of “ keeping up my spirits, in the belief that I “ shall again be restored to my country; I only “ wish that I may have reason to encourage so “ desirable an expectation. In the mean time
 “ I am greatly miserable, in the uncertainty
 “ when I shall hear from you, or what hand
 “ you will find to convey your letters. I would “ have waited for them at this place; but the “ master of the ship, on which I am going to “ embark, could not be prevailed upon to lose
 “ the present opportunity of sailing.

“ For the rest, let me conjure you in my “ turn, to bear up under our afflictions with “ as much resolution as possible. Remember “ that my days have all been honourable;
 “ and that I now suffer, not for my crimes,
 “ but my virtues. No, my Terentia, nothing “ can justly be imputed to me, but that I sur“ vived the loss of my dignities. However,
 “ if it was more agreeable to our children that “ I should thus live, let that reflection teach “ us to submit to our misfortunes with cheer“ fulness; insupportable as upon all other “ considerations they would undoubtedly be.
 “ But, alas! whilst I am endeavouring to “ keep up your spirits, I am utterly unable “ to preserve my own!

“ I have sent back the faithful Philetærus:
 “ As the weakness of his eyes made him in“ capable of rendering me any service. No“ thing can equal the good offices I receive “ from Sallustius. Pescennius likewise has given “ me strong marks of this affection. And I hope
 “ he

Y. R. 695. " to Rome, when he drew up the copy of a law, which he intended to pro-
 Bef. Chr. " pose upon his entrance into office, conformable, as we may imagine, 57- " to
 394 Conf.

" he will not fail in his respect also to you.
 " Sica promised to attend me in my exile :
 " But he changed his mind, and has left me
 " at this place.

" I intreat you to take all possible care of " your health : And be assured, your misfor-
 " tunes more sensibly affect me than my own.
 " Adieu, my Terentia, thou most faithful and " best of wives ! Adieu. And thou, my " dearest daughter, together with that other
 " consolation of my life, my dear son, I bid
 " you both most tenderly farewell.

* Brindisi. *Brundisium, April 30.

† Ep. Fam. BOOK I. LETTER VII. †
 I. xiv.

Ep. 2. To Terentia, to my dearest Tullia, and to my Ed. Græv. Son.

" IMAGINE NOT, my Terentia, that I write
 " longer letters to others than to yourself :
 " Be assured, at least, if ever I do, it is mere" ly because those I receive from them re" quire a more particular answer. The truth
 " of it is, I am always at a loss what to " write : And as there is nothing in the pre" sent dejection of my mind that I perform
 " with greater reluctance in general, so I ne" ver attempt it with regard to you and my " dearest daughter, that it does not cost me a " flood of tears : For how can I think of you
 " without being pierced with grief in the re" flection, that I have made those completely " miserable whom I ought, and wished, to " have rendered perfectly happy ? and I should " have rendered them so, if I had acted with " less timidity.

" Piso's behaviour towards us, in this sea" son of our afflictions, has greatly endeared
 " him to my heart : And I have, as well as I " was able in the present discomposure of my " mind, both acknowledged his good offi" ces, and exhorted him to continue them.

" I perceive you depend much upon the
 " new Tribunes : And, if Pompey perseveres
 " in his present disposition, I am inclined to " think your hopes will not be disappointed ;
 " though, I must confess, I have some fears
 " with respect to Crassus. In the meanwhile
 " I have the satisfaction to find, what indeed
 " I had reason to expect, that you act with " great spirit and tenderness in all my con" cerns. But I lament it should be my cruel
 " fate to expose you to so many calamities,
 " whilst you are thus generously endeavouring
 " to ease the weight of mine. Be assured it " was with the utmost grief I read the account
 " which Publius sent me of the opprobrious
 " manner in which you were dragged from
 " the temple of Vesta * to the office of Va-
 " lerius. Sad reverse indeed ! That thou,
 " the dearest object of my fondest desires,
 " that my Terentia, to whom such numbers
 " were wont to look up for relief, should be
 " herself a spectacle of the most affecting " distress ! and that I, who have saved so " many others from ruin, should have ruined
 " both myself and my family by my own in-" discretion !

" As to what you mention with regard to the " area belonging to my house, I shall never
 " look upon myself as restored to my country,
 " till that spot of ground is again in my pos" session. But this is a point that does not de" pend upon ourselves. Let me rather express
 " my concern for what does ; and lament that,
 " distressed as your circumstances already are,
 " you should engage yourself in a share of those
 " expences which are incurred upon my ac" count. Be assured, if ever I should return to " Rome, I shall easily recover my estate : But,
 " should fortune continue to persecute me,
 " will you, thou dear unhappy woman, will
 " you, fondly throw away, in gaining friends
 " to a desperate cause, the last scanty remains
 " of your broken fortunes ? I conjure you
 " then, my dearest Terentia, not to involve

* " Terentia had taken sanctuary in the temple of Vesta, but was forcibly dragged out from thence by the direc" tions of Cicero, in order to be examined at a public office concerning her husband's effects." Mr. Ross.

" yourself

“ to the conditions stipulated with Cæsar, Cicero greatly disliked it, as “ being too general, and without the mention even of his name, not “ providing

Y.R. 695.
 Bef. Chr.
 57.
 394 Conf.

“ yourself in any charges of that kind : let “ them be borne by those who are able, if “ they are willing, to support the weight. In “ a word, if you have any affection for me, “ let not your anxiety upon my account in“ jure your health, which, alas ! is already “ but too much impaired. Believe me, you “ are the perpetual subject of my waking and “ sleeping thoughts : and, as I know the af-“ fidity you exert in my behalf, I have a “ thousand fears lest your strength should not “ be equal to so continued a fatigue. I am “ sensible, at the same time, that my affairs “ depend entirely upon your assistance ; and “ therefore, that they may be attended with “ the success you hope, and so zealously en“ deavour to obtain, let me earnestly entreat
 “ you to take care of your health.

“ I know not whom to write to, unless to “ those who first write to me, or whom you “ particularly mention in your letters. —
 “ As you and Tullia are of opinion that I “ should not retreat farther from Italy, I have “ laid aside that design. Let me hear from “ you both as often as possible, particularly “ if there should be any fairer prospect of my “ return. Farewell, ye dearest objects of my “ most tender affection. Farewell.”
Theſſalonica, Oct. 5.

• BOOK I. LETTER VIII.

To Terentia, to my dearest Tullia, and to my Son.

“ I learn by the letters of several of my “ friends, as well as from general report, “ that you discover the greatest fortitude of “ mind, and that you solicit my affairs with “ unwearied application. Oh, my Terentia, “ how truly wretched am I, to be the occa“ sion of such severe misfortunes to so faith“ ful, so generous, and so excellent a woman !
 “ And my dearest Tullia too ! — That she,
 “ who was once so happy in her father, “ should now derive from him such bitter for“ rows ! But how shall I express the anguish
 VOL. III.

“ I feel for my little boy ! who became ac“ quainted with grief as soon as he was ca“ pable of any reflection. Had these afflictions “ happened, as you tenderly represent them,
 “ by an unavoidable fate, they would have “ sat less heavy on my heart. But they are “ altogether owing to my own folly, in ima“ gining I was loved where I was secretly “ envied, and in not joining with those who “ were sincerely desirous of my friendship.
 “ Had I been governed, indeed, by my own “ sentiments, without relying so much on “ those of my weak or wicked advisers, we “ might still, my Terentia, have been happy.
 “ However, since my friends encourage me
 “ to hope, I will endeavour to restrain my “ grief, lest the effects it may have on my “ health should disappoint your tender efforts “ for my restoration. I am sensible, at the “ same time, of the many difficulties that “ must be conquered e'er that point can be “ effected ; and that it would have been much “ easier to have maintained my post than it is “ to recover it. Nevertheless, if all the Tri- “ bunes are in my interest ; if Lentulus is “ really as zealous in my cause as he appears :
 “ and if Pompey and Cæsar likewise concur “ with him in the same views, I ought not,
 “ most certainly, to despair.

“ With regard to our slaves, I am willing “ to act as our friends, you tell me, advise.
 “ As to your concern in respect to the plague “ which broke out here, it is entirely ceased :
 “ And I had the good fortune to escape all “ infection. However, it was my desire to “ have changed my present situation for some “ more retired place in Epirus, where I “ might be secure from Piso and his soldiers.
 “ But the obliging Plancius was unwilling to “ part with me ; and still indeed detains me “ here with the hope that we may return to“ gether to Rome. If ever I should live to “ see that happy day ; if ever I should be “ restored to my Terentia, to my children,
 “ and to myself, I shall think all the tender “ solitudes we have suffered, during this sad “ separation, abundantly repaid.

3 M

“ Nothing

• Epist.
 Fam. lib.
 xiv. Ep. i.
 Ed. Græv.

Y. R. 695. " providing sufficiently either for his dignity or the restitution of his estate ;
B. f. Chr. " so that he desires Atticus to take care to get it amended.

57.
394 Conf.

" In

" Nothing can exceed the affection and
" humanity of Piso's behaviour towards eve" ry one of us : And I wish he may receive " from it as much satisfaction as I am persua" ded he will honour. — I was far from in" tending to blame you with respect to my
" brother : but it is much my desire, especi" ally as there are so few of you, that you " should live together in the most perfect har" mony. — I have made my acknowledg" ment where you desire, and acquainted
" the persons you mention, that you had in" formed me of their services.

" As to the estate you propose to sell ;
" alas ! my dear Terentia, think well of the " consequence : Think what would become
" of our unhappy boy, should fortune still " continue to persecute us. But my eyes
" stream too fast to add more : nor would I " draw the same tender flood from yours. I " will only say, that, if my friends should not " desert me, I shall be in no distress for mo" ney : And if they should, the money you " can raise by the sale of this estate will little " avail. I conjure you then by all our mis" fortunes, let us not absolutely ruin our poor
" boy, who is well nigh totally undone alrea" dy. If we can but raise him above indi-
" gence, a moderate share of good fortune
" and merit will be sufficient to open his way
" to whatever else we can wish him to obtain.
" Take care of your health, and let me know
" by an express how your negotiations pro" ceed, and how affairs in general stand.
" — My fate must now be soon determi" ned. I tenderly salute my son and daugh" ter, and bid you all farewell."

* Drazzo. Dyrrachium *, Nov. 26.

P. S. " I came hither not only as it is a " free city, and much in my interest, but as " it is situated likewise near to Italy. But,
" if I should find any inconvenience from " its being a town of such great resort, I " shall remove elsewhere, and give you due " notice."

BOOK I. LETTER IX †.

To Terentia.

" I received three letters from you by the " hands of Aristocritus, and have wept over " them, till they are almost defaced with my " tears. Ah ! my Terentia, I am worn out " with grief : Nor do my own personal mis-
" fortunes more severely torture my mind,
" than those with which you and my children
" are oppressed. Unhappy indeed as you " are, I am infinitely more so ; as our com" mon afflictions are attended with this ag" gravating circumstance to myself, that they " are justly to be imputed to my imprudence
" alone. I ought, most undoubtedly, either to " have avoided the danger by accepting the " commission which was offered me ; or to have
" repelled force by force, or bravely to have " perished in the attempt : Whereas nothing
" could have been more unworthy of my cha" racter, or more pregnant with misery, than " the scheme, which I have pursued. I am " overwhelmed therefore, not only with sor" row, but with shame : Yes, my Terentia,
" I blush to reflect that I did not exert that " spirit I ought for the sake of so excellent a " wife and such amiable children. The dis" tress in which you are all equally involved,
" and your own ill state of health in particu" lar, are ever in my thoughts : As I have
" the mortification at the same time to ob" serve, that there appear but slender hopes
" of my being recalled. My enemies in truth,
" are many ; while those who are jealous of me
" are almost innumerable : And though they " found great difficulty in driving me from my " country, it will be extremely easy for them to " prevent my return. However, as long as " you have any hopes that my restoration
" may be effected, I will not cease to co" operate with your endeavours for that pur" pose, lest my weakness should seem upon
" all occasions to frustrate every measure in " my favour. In the mean while my person
" (for which you are so tenderly concerned)
" is secure from all danger : As in truth I " am so completely wretched, that even my " enemies

† Epist.
Fam. lib.
xiv. Ep.
iii. Ed.
Græv.

“ In the mean while, on the 28th of October, eight of the Tribunes “ jointly offered to the People a law in his favour. But Cicero was “ much more displeased with this, than with the law drawn up by Sex- “ tius : It consisted of three articles ; the first of which restored him only
 “ to his former rank, but not to his estate : The second was only matter of “ form, to indemnify the proposers of it : The third enacted, That, if there “ was any thing in it which was prohibited to be promulgated by any former “ law, particularly by that of Clodius, or which involved the author of “ such promulgation in any fine or penalty, in such case it should have no “ effect. Cicero was surprized that his friends could be induced to propose “ such an act, which seemed to be against him, and to confirm that clause
 “ of the Clodian law which made it penal to move any thing for him :
 “ Whereas no clauses of that kind had ever been regarded, or thought

Y. R. 695.
 Bef. Chr.
 57.
 394. Conf.
 Ad Att.
 iii. 20.

“ enemies themselves must wish, in mere ma“ lice, to preserve my life. Nevertheless, I “ shall not fail to observe the caution you “ kindly give me.

“ I have sent my acknowledgments by “ Dexippus to the persons you desired me ; and “ mentioned at the same time, that you had “ informed me of their good offices. I am “ perfectly sensible of those which Piso exerts “ towards us with so uncommon a zeal : As “ indeed it is a circumstance which all the “ world speaks of to his honour. Heaven
 “ grant that I may live to enjoy, with you “ and our children, the common happiness of “ so valuable a relation !

“ The only hope I have now left arises “ from the new Tribunes ; and that too de“ pends upon the steps they shall take in the “ commencement of their office : For, if they “ should postpone my affair, I shall give up
 “ all expectations of its ever being effected.
 “ Accordingly I have dispatched Aristocritus, “ that you may send me immediate notice of “ the first measure they shall pursue, together “ with the general plan upon which they “ propose to conduct themselves : I have “ likewise ordered Dexippus to return to me “ with all expedition, and have written to my “ brother to request he would give me fre“ quent information in what manner affairs “ proceed. It is with a view of receiving the “ earliest intelligence from Rome, that I con“ tinue at Dyrrachium : A place where I can “ remain in perfect security, as I have upon “ all occasions distinguished this city by my “ particular patronage. However, as soon “ as I shall receive intimation that my enemies

“ are approaching, it is my resolution to re“ tire into Epirus.

“ In answer to your tender proposal of ac“ companying me in my exile, I rather chuse
 “ you should continue in Rome : As I am “ sensible it is upon you that the principal “ burden of my affairs must rest. If your “ generous negotiation should succeed, my “ return will prevent the necessity of that “ journey : If otherwise --- but I need not add
 “ the rest. The next letter I shall receive “ from you, or at most the subsequent one,
 “ will determine me in what manner to act.
 “ In the mean time I desire you would give “ me a full and faithful information how “ things go on : Though indeed I have now “ more reason to expect the final result of “ this affair, than an account of its progress.
 “ Take care of your health, I conjure you ;
 “ assuring yourself that you are, as you ever
 “ have been, the object of my fondest wishes.
 “ Farewell, my dear Terentia ! I see you so “ strongly before me whilst I am writing, that “ I am utterly spent with the tears I have “ shed. Once more, farewell.”

Dyrrachium, Nov. 30.

[N. B. About eleven years after Cicero's return home, and when he was sixty-one years of age, he repudiated this most excellent, this dearly beloved wife, the object of his fondest wishes, on the pretence of her being peevish and expensive, and married a pretty young girl, with a good fortune, to whom he had been left guardian.] See Midd. Vol. II.
 p. 148.

- Y. R. 695. " to have any special force, but fell of course when the laws themselves Ad Att. " were repealed : He observes, that it was an ugly precedent for the succeed-
 iii. 23. " ing Tribunes, if they should happen to have any scruples ; and that Clodius
 " had already taken the advantage of it, when, in a speech to the People, on " the third of November, he declared that this act of the Tribunes was a pro- " per lesson to their successors, to let them see how far their power extended.
 " He desires Atticus therefore to find out who was the contriver of it, and " how Ninnius and the rest came to be so much overseen as not to be aware of " the consequences of it.
- Midd. " The most probable solution of it is, that these Tribunes hoped to
 P. 374. " carry their point with less difficulty, by paying this deference to Clo-Pro Dom. " dius's law, the validity of which was acknowledged by Cato, and several 16. " others of the principal Citizens ; and they were induced to make this " push for it, before they quitted their office, from a persuasion, that, if " Cicero was once restored on any terms, or with what restrictions so-
 " ever, the rest would follow of course ; and that the recovery of his
 " dignity would necessarily draw after it every thing else that was wanted ;
 " Cicero seems to have been sensible of it himself on second thoughts, as Ad Att. " he intimates in the conclusion of his letter : I should be sorry, says he, to
 iii. 23. " have the new Tribunes insert such a clause in their law ; yet let them insert
 " what they please, if it will but pass, and call me home, I shall be content " with it.
- Ibid. 22. " In this suspense of his affairs at Rome, the troops which Piso had " prepared for his government of Macedonia, began to arrive in great " numbers at Thessalonica. This greatly alarmed him, and made him
 " resolve to quit the place without delay : And, as it was not adviseable
 " to move farther from Italy, he ventured to come still nearer, and " turned back again to Dyrrachium : For though this was within the Ep. Fam. " distance forbidden to him by law, yet he had no reason to apprehend xiv. 1. " any danger in a town particularly devoted to him, and which had al" ways been under his special patronage and protection. He came thither Ibid. 3. " on the twenty-fifth of November, and gave notice of his removal to his " friends at Rome, by letters of the same date, begun at Thessalonica and " finished at Dyrrachium : Which shews the great haste which he thought " necessary in making this sudden change of his quarters. Here he re" ceived another piece of news, which displeased him ; that, with the " consent and assistance of his managers at Rome (and particularly of Ad Att. " Atticus) the provinces of the Consuls elect had been furnished with money
 iii. 24. " and troops by a decree of the Senate ; provisions which had never before
 " been made until the entrance of the Consuls into office." This " disturbed him extremely, fearing lest the Tribunes elect, who had all
 " professed good-will to him, should be offended, because they had not " been consulted in the affair, though they had undertaken his cause, and " had desired the power of furnishing out the Consuls, merely to have an oppor-

opportunity of securing them to his interest; whereas now, if the new Consuls had a mind to be perverse, they might be so without any risk; but, let them be never so well disposed, they could do nothing without the consent of the Tribunes.—Another inconvenience followed from this measure, that the Senate, having broken through that resolution which they had taken in his cause, That they would enter into nothing till his affair was settled, were now at liberty to proceed to any other business as they pleased. Cicero, nevertheless, in his letter to Atticus on this head, adds, “It is not however to be wondered at, that my friends, who were applied to, should consent to it; for it was hard for any one to declare openly against a motion so beneficial to the two Consuls; it was hard, I say, to refuse any thing to Lentulus, who has always been my true friend; or to Metellus, who has given up his resentments with such humanity; yet I am apprehensive that we have alienated the Tribunes, and cannot hold the Consuls: Write me word, I desire you, what turn this has taken, and how the whole affair stands; and write with your usual frankness; for I love to know the truth, though it should happen to be disagreeable. The tenth of December.”

But Atticus, instead of answering this letter, or rather indeed before he received it, having occasion to visit his estate in Epirus, took his way thither through Dyrrachium, on purpose to see Cicero, and explain to him in person the motives of their conduct. Their interview was but short; and after they parted, Cicero, upon some new intelligence, which gave him fresh uneasiness, sent another letter after him into Epirus, to call him back again: “After you left me (says he) I received letters from Rome, from which I perceive that I must end my days in calamity; and to speak the truth (which you will take in good part) if there had been any hopes of my return, you, who love me so well, would never have left the City at such a conjuncture: But I say no more, lest I be thought either ungrateful, or desirous to involve my friends too in my ruin. One thing I beg; that you would not fail, as you have given your word, to come to me, wherever I shall happen to be, before the first of January.”

While he was thus perplexing himself with perpetual fears and suspicions, his cause was proceeding very prosperously at Rome, and seemed to be in such a train, that it could not be obstructed much longer: For the new Magistrates, who were coming on with the new year, were all, except the Prætor Appius, supposed to be his friends; while his enemy Clodius was soon to resign his office, on which the greatest part of his power depended: Clodius was sensible himself of the daily decay of his credit, through the superior influence of Pompey, who had drawn Cæsar away from him, and forced even Gabinius to desert him: so that, out of rage and despair, and the desire of revenging himself on these new and more powerful enemies, he would willingly have dropt the pursuit of Cicero;

or

Y. R. 695.
Bet. Chr.
57.
394 Cons.

Midd.

377.

378, 379.

Ad Att.
iii. 25.

Y.R. 695. or consented even to recall him, if he could have persuaded Cicero's friends and the Senate to join their forces with him against the Triumvirate. For this end he produced Bibulus and the other Augurs in an Assembly of the People, and demanded of them, whether it was not unlawful to transact any public business, when any of them were taking the Auspices? To which they all answered in the affirmative. Then he asked Bibulus, whether he was not actually observing the heavens as often as any of Cæsar's laws were proposed to the People? To which he answered in the affirmative: But, being produced a second time by the Prætor Appius, he added, that he took the Auspices also, in the same manner, at the time when Clodius's act of adoption was confirmed by the People: But Clodius, while he gratified his present revenge, little regarded how much it turned against himself; but insisted, that all Cæsar's acts ought to be annulled by the Senate, as being contrary to the Auspices; and on that condition declared publicly, that he himself would bring back Cicero, the guardian of the City, on his own shoulders.

Pro Dom. 47, 48. In the same fit of revenge he fell upon the Consul Gabinus; and in an Assembly of the People, which he called for that purpose, with his head veiled, and a little altar and fire before him, consecrated his whole estate. This had been sometimes done against traitorous Citizens; and, when legally performed, had the effect of a confiscation, by making the place and effects ever after sacred and public: But in the present case it was considered only as an act of madness; and the Tribune Ninnius, in ridicule of it, consecrated Clodius's estate in the same form and manner that, whatever efficacy was ascribed to the one, the other might justly challenge the same.

Midd. p. 381-388. All the ten new Tribunes had solemnly promised to serve Cicero; yet Clodius found means to corrupt two of them, S. Attilius Serranus, and Numerius Quinctius Gracchus, by whose help he was enabled still to make head against Cicero's party, and retard his restoration some time longer: But Piso and Gabinus, perceiving the scene to be opening apace in his favour, and his return to be unavoidable, thought it time to get out of his way, and retire to their several governments: So that they both left Rome, with the expiration of their year; and Piso set out for Macedonia, Gabinus for Syria.

Y.R. 696. On the first of January, the new Consul Lentulus, after the ceremony of his inauguration, and his first duty paid, as usual, to religion, entered directly into Cicero's affairs, and moved the Senate for his restoration, while his colleague Metellus declared, with much seeming candour, that, though Cicero and he had been enemies, on account of their different sentiments in politics, yet he would give up his resentment to the authority of the Fathers, and the interest of the Republic. Upon which, L. Cotta, a person of Consular and Censorian rank, being asked his opinion first, said, That nothing had been done against Cicero agreeably to right, or law,

Ibid. 34-

“ or

“ or the custom of their ancestors : That no Citizen could be driven out Y. R. 696.
Bet. Clu.
56.
 “ *of the City without a trial, and that the People could not condemn,
 “ nor even try a man capitally, but in an Assembly of their Centuries : 395 Conf.
 “ That the whole was the effect of violence, turbulent times, and an “ oppressed Republic : That, in so strange a revolution and confusion of “ things, Cicero had only stepped aside, to provide for his future tranquillity, “ by declining the impending storm ; and, since he had freed the “ Republic from no less danger by his absence than he had done before
 “ by his presence, that he ought not only to be restored, but to be adorned “ with new honours : That what his mad enemy had published against “ him was drawn so absurdly, both in words and sentiments, that, if it “ had been enacted in proper form, it could never obtain the force of a “ law : That, since Cicero therefore was expelled by no law, he could “ not want a law to restore him, but ought to be recalled by a vote of the “ Senate.” ——— Pompey, who spoke next, having highly applauded what Cotta had said, added, “ That, for the sake of Cicero’s future quiet, “ and to prevent all farther trouble from the same quarter, it was his “ opinion, that the People should have a share in conferring that grace, “ and their consent be joined to the authority of the Senate.” After many others had spoken likewise with great warmth in the defence and praise of Cicero, they all came unanimously into Pompey’s opinion, and were proceeding to make a decree upon it, when Serranus, the Tribune, rose up and put a stop to it ; not flatly interposing his negative, for he had not the assurance to do that, against such a spirit and unanimity of the Senate, but desiring only a night’s time to consider of it. This unexpected interruption incensed the whole Assembly ; some reproached, others entreated him ; and his father-in-law Oppius threw himself at his feet, to move him to desist : But all they could get from him, was a promise to give way to a decree the next morning ; upon which they broke up.
 But the Tribune, says Cicero, employed the night, not, as people fancied he would, in giving back the money which he had taken, but in making a Post Red.
ad Quir. 5-better bargain, and doubling his price ; for the next morning, being grown more hardy, he absolutely prohibited the Senate from proceeding to any act.
 This conduct of Serranus surprized Cicero’s friends, being not only per-fidious, and contrary to his engagements, but highly ungrateful to Ci- cero ; who, in his Consulship, had been his special encourager and bene- Ibid.
 factor.

The Senate, however, though hindered at present from passing their decree, were too well united, and too strongly supported, to be baffled much longer by the artifices of Clodius ; and having resolved to propound a law to the People for Cicero’s restoration, they appointed the twenty- Pro Sext.
35, 36, 37,
38.
 second of the month for the promulgation of it. When the day came,
Fabricius, one of Cicero’s Tribunes, marched out with a strong guard,

* This seems to be a strange plea for Cicero, who had put Citizens to death without trial.
 before

Y. R. 695. before it was light, to get possession of the Rostra: But Clodius was too
 B. Chr. 56. early for him; and having seized all the posts and avenues of the Forum, 395 Conf. was prepared to give him a warm reception: He had purchased some gladiators for the shows of his Ædileship, to which he was now pretending, and borrowed another band of his brother Appius; and with these well armed, at the head of his slaves and dependents, he attacked Fabritius, killed several of his followers, wounded many more, and drove him quite out of the place; and happening to fall in at the same time with Cispius, another Tribune, who was coming to the aid of his colleague, he repulsed him also with a great slaughter. The gladiators, heated with this taste of blood, opened their way on all sides with their swords in quest of Quintus Cicero, whom they met with at last, and would certainly have murdered, if, by the advantage of the confusion and darkness, he had not hid himself under the bodies of his slaves and freedmen, who were killed around him, where he lay concealed till the fray was over. The Tribune Sextius was treated still more roughly: For, being particularly pursued and marked out for destruction, he was so desperately wounded as to be left for dead upon the spot; and escaped death, only by feigning it: But while he lay in that condition, supposed to be killed, Clodius reflecting that the murder of a Tribune, whose person was sacred, would raise such a storm as might occasion his ruin, took a sudden resolution to kill one of his own Tribunes, in order to charge it upon his adversaries, and to balance the account by making both sides equally obnoxious. The victim doomed to this sacrifice was Numerius Quinctius, an obscure fellow, raised to this dignity by the caprice of the multitude, who, to make himself the more popular, had assumed the surname of Gracchus: But the crafty clown, says Cicero, having got some hint of the design, and finding that his blood was to wipe off the odium of Sextius's murder, disguised himself presently in the habit of a muletier, the same in which he came to Rome, and with a basket upon his head, while some were calling out for Numerius, others for Quinctius, passed undiscovered by the confusion of the two names: But he continued in this danger till Sextius was known to be alive. According to the account of this day's tragedy, the Tiber and all the common sewers were filled with dead bodies, and the blood wiped up with sponges in the Forum, where such heaps of slain had never before been seen but in the civil dissensions of Cinna and Octavius.

Pro Mil. Clodius, flushed with this victory, set fire with his own hands to the Temple of the Nymphs, where the books of the Censors and the public registers of the City were kept, which were all consumed with the fabric itself. He then attacked the houses of Milo the Tribune, and Cæcilius the Prætor, with fire and sword; but was repulsed in both attempts with loss: Milo took several of Appius's gladiators prisoners, who, being brought before the Senate, made a confession of what they knew, and were sent to jail; but were presently released by Serranus. Upon these outrages, Milo impeached Clodius in form, for the violation of the public peace: But the Consul Metellus, who had not yet abandoned him, with the Prætor Appius, and the Tribune Serranus, resolved to prevent any process upon it; and by their edicts prohibited either the criminal himself to appear, or any one to cite him. Their pretence was, that the Quæstors were not yet chosen, whose office it was to make the allotment of the Judges, while they themselves kept back the election, and were pushing Clodius at the same time into the Ædileship; which would screen him of course for one year from any prosecution. Milo, therefore, finding it impracticable to bring him to justice in the legal method, resolved to oppose force to force, and for this end purchased a band of gladiators, with which he had daily skirmishes with him in the streets. It was much to his honour (says Cicero ridiculously enough) that he bought gladiators for the defence of the Republic, whose preservation depended upon MINE. ^Y.

Consul

This obstruction given to Cicero's return made the Senate only the more resolute to affect it: They passed a second vote, therefore, that no other business should be done till it was carried; and to prevent all further tumults, and insults upon the Magistrates, ordered the Consuls to summon all the people of Italy, who wished well to the State, to come to the assistance and defence of Cicero. This drew a vast concourse to Rome from all parts of Italy, where there was not a corporate town of any note, which did not testify its respect to Cicero by some public act or monument. Pompey was at Capua, acting as chief Magistrate of his new colony, where he presided in person at their making a decree to Cicero's honour, and took the trouble likewise of visiting all the other colonies and chief towns in those parts, to appoint them a day of general rendezvous at Rome, to assist at the promulgation of the law.

Lentulus, at the same time, was entertaining the City with shews and stage-plays, in order to keep the People in good humour, whom he had called from their private affairs in the country to attend the public business. The shews were exhibited in Pompey's Theatre, while the Senate, for the convenience of being near them, was held in the adjoining temple of Honour and Virtue, built by Marius out of the Cimbric spoils, and called, for that reason Marius's monument: Here, according to Cicero's dream a decree now passed in proper form for his restoration; when, under the joint influence of those deities, Honour, says he, was done to Virtue; and the monument of

^Y Honori summo Miloni nostro nuper fuit, quod gladiatoribus emptis Reipub. causa, quæ salute nostra continebatur, omnes P. Clodii conatus furoresque compressit. De Off. ii. 17.

² Cicero, at the time of his flight, being lodged in the villa of a friend, had a morning-dream, which, when he awaked, (about eight o'clock) he told to those about him: "That, as he seemed to be wandering disconsolate in

" a lonely place, C. Marius, with his fasces wreathed with laurel, accosted him, and demanded why he was so melancholy; and when he answered, that he was driven out of his country by violence, Marius took him by the hand, and, bidding him be of good courage, ordered the next Lic-tor to conduct him into his monument, telling him that there he should find safety." De Divin. i. 28.

Y. R. 696. Marius, the preserver of the empire, gave safety to his country-man, the de-
 Bef. Chr. fender of it.

56.
 395 Conf. Clodius had still the courage and address to hinder this decree of the Senate from passing into a law: He took all occasions of haranguing the multitude against it, and used to demand of them aloud, whether they would have Cicero restored or not, upon which his mercenaries, says Pro Sext. 59. Cicero, answering with low feeble voices [semivivis vocibus] in the negative, he instantly declared the proposal to be rejected by Roman People. But the Senate, ashamed to see themselves thus baffled, resolved Midd. p. 391. to take such measures in the support of their decrees, that it should not be possible to defeat them. Lentulus therefore summoned them into the Post Red. in Sen. 10. Capitol on the twenty-fifth of May; where Pompey began the debate, and renewed the motion for recalling Cicero; and in a grave and elaborate speech, which he had prepared in writing, and delivered from Pro Sext. 61. his notes, gave him the honour of having saved his Country. All the leading men of the Senate spoke after him to the same effect; but the Consul Metellus, notwithstanding his promises, had been acting hitherto a double part; and was all along the chief encourager and supporter of Clodius: When Servilius, therefore, a Consular, who had been honoured with a Triumph and the Censorship, rose up, he addressed himself to his kinsman Metellus, and, having laid before him the glorious acts of his ancestors, together with the excellent conduct and unhappy fate of his brother Celer, Cicero's friend, supposed to have been poisoned by his wife, (the sister of Clodius) pressed him so earnestly, and in such moving terms, to Ibid. 62. concur with the Senate in their present measures, that he could not hold out any longer, but, with tears in his eyes, gave himself up to Servilius, and professed all future services to Cicero; in which he proved very sincere, and from this moment assisted his colleague in promoting Cicero's restoration: Post Red. in Sen. 10. So that in a very full house of 417 Senators, when all the Magistrates were present, the decree passed without one dissenting voice but Clodius's. It is probable that the two Tribunes, who had hitherto been Cicero's enemies, were induced, by Metellus's change of conduct, to cease their opposition, and acquiesce.

Midd. p. 393. The Consul Lentulus assembled the Senate again the next day, to concert some effectual method for preventing all farther opposition, and getting the decree enacted into a law: But, before they met, he called the People to the Rostra, where all the principal Senators in their turns repeated the substance of what they had said before in the Senate, in order Post. Red. at Quir. 7. to prepare them for the business of the day: Pompey particularly exerted himself in the praise of Cicero; declaring, That the Republic owed its preservation to him, and that their common safety was connected with his; exhorting them to defend and support the decree of the Senate, the quiet of the City, and the fortunes of a man who had deserved so well of them: That this was the general voice of THE SENATE; of THE KNIGHTS; of all Italy; and,

and, lastly, that it was his own earnest and special request to them, which he not only desired, but implored them to grant. Y. R. 696.
Bef. Chr.
56.

When the Senate afterwards met, they proceeded to several new and vigorous votes, to facilitate the success of their enterprise. 395. Conf.

First, That no Magistrate should presume to take the auspices, so as to disturb the Assembly of the People, when Cicero's cause was to come before them: And that if any one attempted it, he should be treated as a public enemy. Pro Sext.
60, 61.

Secondly, That, if, through any violence or obstruction, the law was not suffered to pass, Cicero should then be at liberty to return without any farther authority.

Thirdly, That public thanks should be given to all the people of Italy who came to Rome for Cicero's defence, and that they should be desired to come again on the day when the suffrages of the People were to be taken.

Fourthly, That thanks should be given likewise to all the states and cities which had received and entertained Cicero; and that the care of his person should be recommended to all foreign nations in alliance with them; and that the Roman generals, and all who had commanded abroad, should be ordered to protect his life and safety.

The law, now prepared for Cicero's restoration, was to be offered to the suffrages of the Centuries; where a decree of the Senate was previously necessary to make the act valid: In the present case there seem to have been four or five several decrees provided at different times, which had all been frustrated by the intrigues of Clodius and his friends; but these last votes proved effectual; Clodius being left single in the opposition after Metellus dropt him; for even his brother Appius chose to be quiet: Nevertheless it was above two months from the last decree before Cicero's friends could bring the affair to a general vote, which they effected at last on the fourth of August. The Assembly was held in the field of Mars, for the more convenient reception of a great multitude, and Cicero, after sixteen months exile, was recalled by the unanimous suffrage of all the Centuries. Midd. p.
395.

“ This, says Cicero's English Historian*, was one of the last genuine acts of FREE Rome; one of the last efforts of PUBLIC LIBERTY, exerting itself to do honour to its patron and defender: for the union of the Triumvirate had already given it a dangerous wound: and the dissension, which not long after ensued, entirely destroyed it.” By which words it would seem, that, in the Historian's opinion, the Triumviral League did not destroy Public Liberty; or, at least, that Rome, even under the domination of the Triumvirs, was sometimes free; seeing it was free when the People recalled Cicero from banishment; though it had been enslaved the year before, when, under the domination of the same Triumvirate, the People banished him: For in the midst of all his joy, on his return home, he could not help grieving, he says, within himself to reflect that a City, so grateful to the defender of its liberty, had been so miserably enslaved and oppressed. * Midd.
p. 397.

V. R. 696.

* Midd. p.
39+Post. Red.
in Sen. 3.

“ One cannot help pausing a while, says the same historian * a little before, to reflect on the GREAT IDEA which these facts imprint of the character and dignity of Cicero; to see so vast an empire in such a ferment on his account, as to postpone all their concerns and interests, for many months successively, to the Safety of a single Senator, who had no other means of exciting the zeal, or engaging the affections of his Citizens, but the genuine force of his personal virtues, and the merit of his eminent services: As if the Republic itself could not stand without him, but must fall into ruin, if he, the main pillar of it, was removed; whilst the greatest monarchs on earth, who had any affairs with the People of Rome were looking on, to expect the event, unable to procure any answer or regard to what they were soliciting, till this affair was decided. Ptolemy, the King of Egypt, was particularly affected by it, who, being driven out of his kingdom, came to Rome about this time, to beg help and protection against his rebellious subjects; but, though he was lodged in Pompey’s house, it was not possible for him to get an audience, till Cicero’s cause was at an end.”

* Vid. sup.
p. 401.

Now, with regard to this unavoidable pause, and the GREAT IDEA on which the historian reflects, I shall once more refer the reader to the passage above transcribed from Mr. Boyle*. Most certainly this shining piece of oratory n’a rien de solide. The fact was plainly this: The same Triumvirs, who, to punish Cicero’s incontinence of speech, gave him up to the fury of the enemy, and suffered him to be banished, did now call him home again to punish the insolence of Clodius, who affected an independency on those who had hitherto been his support.

If there be any thing in the transaction which should excite wonder, it is, that a man of such rare talents and transcendent merit as our eloquent Consul, who is supposed to have been most unjustly banished for well-doing, could not, by the solicitation of all his friends, obtain a restoration, even after his cause was favoured by the Triumvirs, the two Consuls, the whole Senate, and eight of the Tribunes, until, through the influence of all these, such multitudes of voters flocked to Rome from the remote parts of Italy, as were sufficient to outvote those who resided in the City and in its neighbourhood: So that, according to what is said by the historian himself in another part of his work, it was impossible to know, whether the act in Cicero’s favour had passed regularly by the genuine suffrage of the People. Vid. Midd. Vol. I. p. 21. and vid. supra, p. 119.

Ad Art.
iii. 26.

Ibid. iv. 1.

Cicero had resolved to come home, in virtue of the Senate’s decree, whether the law had passed or not; but perceiving, from the accounts of all his friends, that it could not be defeated any longer, he embarked for Italy on the fourth of August, the very day on which it was enacted, and landed the next day at Brundisium, where he found his daughter Tullia already arrived to receive him. He took up his quarters again with his old host Lenius Flaccus, and here in four days he received from

from Rome the welcome news, that the law was actually ratified by the People, with an incredible zeal and unanimity of all the Centuries. This obliged him to pursue his journey without delay. The fame of his landing, and progress towards the City, drew infinite multitudes from all parts to see him as he passed, and congratulate him on his return: So that the whole road was but one continued street from Brundisium to Rome, lined on both sides with crowds of men, women, and children; nor was there a præfecture, town, or colony, through Italy, which did not decree him statues, or public honours, and send a deputation of their principal members to pay him their compliments: That it was rather less than the truth, as Plutarch says, what Cicero himself tells us, that all Italy brought him back upon its shoulders. [Nor can this appear in any degree wonderful, if we consider, that, when Consul, he had, in Pompey's opinion, preserved not only the Roman empire, but, the whole globe of the earth *.]

The modern historian, so often cited above, tells us, that "Cicero's return was truly, what he himself calls it, the beginning of a NEW LIFE to him; which was to be governed by new maxims, and a new kind of policy, yet so as not to forfeit his OLD CHARACTER. He had been made to feel in what hands the weight of power lay, and what little dependance was to be placed on the help and support of his aristocratical friends: Pompey had served him on this important occasion very sincerely, and with the concurrence also of Cæsar, so as to make it a point of gratitude, as well as prudence, to be more observant of them than he had hitherto been:
The Senate, on the other hand, with the Magistrates, and the honest of all ranks, were zealous in his cause; and the Consul Lentulus, above all, seemed to make it the sole end and glory of his administration. The uncommon consent of opposite parties in promoting his restoration drew upon him a variety of obligations, which must needs often clash and interfere with each other, and which it was his part still to manage so, as to make them consistent with his honour, his private and his public duty: These were to be the springs and motives of his NEW LIFE, the hinges on which his future conduct was to turn; and to do justice severally to them all, and assign to each its proper weight and measure of influence, required his utmost skill and address."

Another ingenious writer describes, in colours somewhat less favourable, the NEW LIFE which Cicero entered upon at this time.

"It was the case of this great man, as of many others, that his glory would have been brighter, if his life had been shorter. Had he died immediately after his Consulship, no stain had remained upon his memory. But it cannot be concealed, that his success elated him too much, and that he expected, on quitting his office, to be the soul of the

* — Pompeium adduxi in eam voluntatem, ut in Senatu, non semel sed sæpe, multis-que verbis hujus mihi salutem imperii, atque orbis terrarum adjudicaret. Ad Att. lib. i. Ep. 19.

Y. R. 595. "public deliberations, and to govern by the State his counsels. His banish-Br. Chr. "ment dejected him entirely; and his return did not reinstate him in that 55.
 195 Conf. "aristocratical constancy, by which he had acquired so much honour. He "was reduced to submit to the yoke, make his court for a while to Pompey,
 "and then become the slave of Cæsar."

Of the court which he paid to Pompey, we have a specimen in his speech to the People on the sixth of September, two days after his return home.

On the fifth he had, in the Senate, professed his obligations to that august Assembly in general, and to each Magistrate by name. The number
 Mid. 402. of his private friends was too great to make it possible for him to enumerate or Pro Planc. thank them all, so that he confined himself to the Magistrates, with exception on- 30.
 Pea. Red. ly to Pompey, whom, for the eminence of his character, though at prein Sen. 12. sent only a private man, he took care to distinguish by a personal address and compliment. But as Lentulus was the first in office, and had served him with the greatest affection, so he gives him the first share of his praise; and, in the overflowing of his gratitude, styles him the parent and the god
 Ibid. 4. of his life and fortunes.

The next day he paid his thanks to the People in a speech from the Ros-tra, where he celebrated the particular merits and services of his principal friends, especially of Pompey, whom he declares to be the greatest man for virtue, wisdom, glory, who was then living, or had lived, or ever would live; and that it was but barely possible, scarce lawful, for one man to owe to another so much, as on this occasion, he owed to him^b.

This affair being happily over, the Senate had leisure again to attend to
 Mid. p. public business; and there was now a case before them of a very urgent 405. nature, which required a present remedy; an unusual scarcity of corn and provisions in the City, which had been greatly increased by the late concourse of people from all parts of Italy on Cicero's account, and was now felt very severely by the poorer sort, who began to grow clamorous.
 Pro Dom. Clodius, to create fresh trouble to Cicero, charged the calamity to his 5, 6. score, and employed a number of young fellows to run all night about the streets, and make a lamentable outcry for bread, calling up Cicero to relieve them from the famine to which he had reduced them. Metellus having summoned the Senate to the Temple of Concord, Clodius's mob crowded thither; but happening to meet with Metellus in the way, they presently attacked him with volleys of stones, and the Consul was wounded. For the greater security, he immediately adjourned the Senate into the Capitol. The leaders of this rabble were M. Lollius and M.
Sergius; the first had, in Clodius's Tribune, undertaken the task of killing Pompey; Sergius had been Captain of the guard to Catiline.

^b Cæ. Pompeius, vir omnium qui sunt, fuerunt, erunt, princeps virtute, sapientia ac gloria.—Huic ego homini, Quirites tan-tum debeo, quantum hominem homini debere vix fas est. Post Red. ad Quir. 7.

But

But Clodius, encouraged by this hopeful beginning, put himself at their head in person, and pursued the Senate into the Capitol, in order to disturb their debates, and hinder their providing any relief for the present evil. — But the People themselves, seeing through his design, were so provoked at it, that they turned universally against him, and drove him out of the field with all his mercenaries; when, perceiving that Cicero was not present in the Senate, they called out upon him by name, with one voice, and would not be quieted till he came in person to undertake their cause, and propose some expedient for their relief. He had kept his house all that day, and resolved to do so, till he saw the issue of the tumult; but when he understood that the mob was repulsed and dispersed, and that his presence was universally required, by the Consuls, the Senate, and the whole People, he came to the Senate-house in the midst of their debates, and, being presently asked ^c his opinion, proposed, that Pompey should be engaged to undertake the province of restoring plenty to the City; and that, to enable him to do it effectually, he should be invested with an absolute power over all the public stores and corn-rents of the empire. The motion was readily accepted, and a vote immediately passed, that a law for that purpose should be offered to the People. Except Messala and Afranius, all the Consular Senators were absent: They pretended to be afraid of the mob; but the real cause was their unwillingness to concur in granting this commission to Pompey. The Consuls carried the decree with them into the Rostra, and read it to the People; who, on the mention of Cicero's name in which it was drawn, gave an universal shout of applause; upon which, at the desire of all the Magistrates, Cicero made a speech to them, setting forth the reasons and necessity of the decree, and giving them the hope of a speedy relief, from the vigilance and authority of Pompey. The absence, however, of the Consular Senators, who were the principal members of the House, occasioned some censure: It was said, that the Senate's vote had not been free *; that it had been extorted by fear; and the very next day a motion was made to revoke the decree: But, though all the Consular Senators were then present, the motion was unanimously rejected; and the Consuls were ordered to draw up a law, by which the whole administration of the corn and provisions of the Republic was granted to Pompey for five years, with a power of choosing fifteen Lieutenants to assist him in it.

This furnished Clodius with fresh matter for declaiming against Cicero, whom he charged with ingratitude towards the Senate, which had always been firm to him, and which he now deserted, in order to pay his court to a man who had betrayed him: Adding, that he was so silly as not to know his own strength and credit in the City, and how able he was to maintain his authority without the help of Pompey. Cicero defended himself by saying,

* Veni expectatus multis jam sententiis dictis, rogatus sum sententiam; dixi Reipub. saluberrimam, mibi necessariam.

Y. R. 696. " That they must not expect, now that he was restored, to deceive him by
 Bef. Chr. " the same arts whereby they had ruined him before, raising jealousies
 55. " between him and Pompey; that he had smarted for it too severely already, 195 Conf. " to be caught again in the same snare; that in decreeing this commission
 " to Pompey, he had discharged both his private obligation to a friend, and Pro Dom. " his public duty to the State; that those who grudged all extraordinary
 8. " power to Pompey, must grudge the victories, the triumphs, the accession of
 " dominion and revenue, which their former grants of this sort had procured
 " to the empire; that the success of those shewed what fruit they were to ex- " pect from this."

Ad Att. " How extensive an authority soever this law conferred on Pompey, he, or
 iv. 1. his creatures, were not satisfied with it; for Messius, one of the Tribunes, proposed another, to give him the additional power of raising what money, fleets, and armies he thought fit; with a greater command through all the provinces than their proper governors had in each. " Our Consular Law,
 " says Cicero, now seems modest; that of Messius insufferable: Pompey declares
 " for the first; all his dependants are for the second. The Consuls exclaim
 " with indignation against it: I hold my peace; and the rather as the Ponti-
 " fices have decreed nothing yet concerning my house."

Crevier. " Cicero does not tell us which of the two laws passed: But Dio, in com-Tom. xii. paring the command which was given to Pompey on this occasion, with that which he had in the war against the pirates, gives us reason to believe that it was the law of Messius.

" Pompey named Cicero for his first Lieutenant, declaring that he should consider him as a second self, and act nothing without his advice. Cicero ac-
 M. Ad. 410. cepted the employment, on condition that he might be at liberty to use or Ad Att. resign it at pleasure, as he found it convenient to his affairs: And he soon
 iv. 2. after quitted it to his brother, and chose to continue in the City, where he had the pleasure to see the end of his law effectually answered; for the credit of Pompey's name immediately reduced the price of provisions in the market; and his vigour and diligence in prosecuting the affair established at length a general plenty.

Pitt. in Pomp.

" Cicero was restored to his former dignity, but not to his former fortunes, nor was any satisfaction yet made to him for the ruin of his houses and estates: A full restitution indeed had been decreed, but was reserved to his return; which came now before the Senate to be considered and settled by public authority, where it met still with great obstruction. The chief difficulty was about his Palatin House, which he valued above all the rest, and which Clodius for that reason had contrived to alienate, as he hoped, irretrievably, by demolishing the fabric, and dedicating a Temple upon the area to the goddess LIBERTY; where, to make his work

* Certainly this is not the language of a true Republican.

* — Nos tacemus; et eo magis, quod de domo nostra nihil adhuc Pontifices responderunt. Ad. Att. iv. 1.

the more complete, he pulled down also the adjoining portico of Catulus^f, that he might build it up anew, of the same order with the Temple; and by blending the public with private property, and consecrating the whole to religion, might make it impossible to separate or restore any part to Cicero; since a consecration, legally performed, made the thing consecrated unap-plicable ever after to any private use.

The affair was to be determined by the college of Priests, who were the judges in all cases relating to religion: For the Senate could only make a provisional decree, that, if the Priests discharged the ground from the service of religion, then the Consuls should take an estimate of the damage, and make a contract for rebuilding the whole at the public charge, so as to restore it to Cicero in the condition in which he left it. The Priests therefore of all orders were called together on the last of September, to hear this cause, which Cicero pleaded in person before them: They were men of the first dignity and families in the Republic; and there never was, as Cicero tells us, so full an appearance of them in any cause since the foundation of the City: He reckons up nineteen by name, a great part of whom were of Consular rank.—The question on which the cause singly turned, was about the efficacy of the pretended consecration of the house, and the dedication of the Temple: To shew the nullity therefore of this act, he endeavours to overthrow the foundation of it, “and prove Clodius’s Tribune to be originally null and void from the invalidity of his adoption, none of the conditions of a regular and legal adoption having been observed in his case—that, if the adoption was regular and illegal, the Tribune must needs be so too, which was entirely built upon it: But granting the Tribune to be valid, because some eminent men would have it so, yet the act made afterwards for his banishment could not possibly be considered as a law, but as a privilege only made against a particular person; which the sacred laws and the laws of the Twelve Tables had utterly prohibited.—When he comes to speak of the dedication of the Temple, he observes that the Goddess LIBERTY, to which it was dedicated, was the known statue of a celebrated strumpet, which Appian brought from Greece for the ornament of the Ædileship: And, upon dropping the thoughts of that Magistracy, gave it his brother Clodius to be advanced into a Deity: That the ceremony was performed without any licence, or judgment obtained from the college of Priests, by the single ministry of a raw young man, the brother-in-law of Clodius, who had been made Priest but a few days before; a meer novice in his business, and forced into the service: But if all had been transacted regularly, and in due form, that it could not possibly have any force, as being contrary to the standing laws of the Republic:

^f This portico was built on the spot where Fulvius Flaccus formerly lived, whose house was publicly demolished for the supposed treason of its master. Vid. Vol. II. Y. of R. 632.

- Y.R. 696. " For there was an old Tribunician law, made by Q. Papirius, which Bef. Chr. " prohibited the consecration of houses, lands, or altars, without the ex-
 56. " press command of the People ; which was not obtained, nor even pre-195 Conf. " tended, in the present case : That great regard had always been paid to " this law in several instances of the gravest kind," which he cited, and Midd. then proceeded — " that, after all this, it was to no purpose to mention,
 P. 416. " that the dedication was not performed with any of the solemn words
 " and rites which such a function required ; but by the ignorant young " man before-mentioned, without the help of his colleagues, his books, or " any to prompt him : Especially when Clodius, who directed him, that " impure enemy of all religion, who often acted the woman among " men, as well as the man among women, huddled over the whole cere" mony in a blundering precipitate manner, faltering and confounded in " mind, voice and speech ; often recalling himself, doubting, fearing, he" sitating, and performing every thing quite contrary to what the sacred
 " books prescribed : Nor is it strange," says he, " that, in an act so mad
 " and villainous, his audaciousness could not get the better of his fears :
 Ibid. 417. " For what pirate, though never so barbarous, after he had been plun" dering temples, when, pricked by a dream or scruple of religion, he " came to consecrate some altar on a desert shore, was not terrified in his " mind, on being forced to appease that Deity by his prayers whom he " had provoked by his sacrilege ? In what horrors then, think you, must
 " this man needs be, the plunderer of all temples, houses, and the whole
 " City, when, for the expiation of so many impieties, he was wickedly
 " consecrating one single altar ? " Then [for to swear falsely was, by ha-
 *Vid. supr. bitude, become easy to the Orator *] he makes a solemn invocation and
 P. 437. appeal to all the Gods, who peculiarly favoured and protected that City, to bear witness to the integrity of his zeal and love to the Republic, and that, in all his labours and struggles, he had constantly preferred the public benefit to his own ; and concludes with committing the justice of his cause to the judgment of the venerable bench. —
- Ad Att. The sentence of the Priests turned wholly on what Cicero had alleged
 iv. 2. about the force of the Papirian law, viz. that if he, who performed the office of consecration, had not been specially authorised and personally appointed to it by the People, then the area in question might, without any scruple of religion, be restored to Cicero. This, though it seemed somewhat evasive, was sufficient for Cicero's purpose ; and his friends congratulated him upon it, as upon a clear victory ; while Clodius interpreted it still in favour of himself ; and, being produced into the Rostra by his brother Appius, Midd. acquainted the People, that the Priests had given judgment for him ; but 418, 419. that Cicero was preparing to recover possession by force, and exhorted them therefore to follow him and Appius in the defence of their liberties. But his speech made no impression on the audience ; some wondered at his impudence, others laughed at his folly, and Cicero resolved not to trouble himself

himself or the People about it, till the Consuls, by a decree of the Senate, had ^{V. R. 696.} contracted for rebuilding the portico of Catulus.

The Senate met the next day, in a full House, to put an end to this ^{Ad. 20.} ^{iv. 2.} affair; when Marcellinus, one of the Consuls elect, being called upon to speak first, addressed himself to the Priests, and desired them to give an account of the grounds and meaning of their sentence: Upon which, *Marcus Lucullus*², in the name of the rest, declared, that the Priests indeed were the judges of religion, but the Senate of the law; that they therefore had determined only what related to the point of religion, and left it to the Senate to determine whether any obstacle remained in point of law: All the other Priests spoke largely after him in favour of Cicero's cause: When Clodius rose afterwards to speak, he endeavoured to waste the time so as to hinder their coming to any resolution that day; but, after he had been speaking for three hours successively, the Assembly grew so impatient, and made such a noise and hissing, that he was forced to give over: Yet, when they were going to pass a decree in the words of Marcellinus, Serranus put his negative upon it: This raised an universal indignation; and a fresh debate began, at the motion of the two Consuls, on the merit of the Tribune's intercession; when, after many warm speeches, they came to the following vote; "That it was the resolution of the Senate, that Cicero's house should be restored to him, and Catulus's portico rebuilt, as it had been before; and that this vote should be defended by all the Magistrates; and if any violence or obstruction was offered to it, that the Senate would look upon it as offered by him who had interposed his negative." This staggered Serranus, and the late farce was played over again; his father threw himself at his feet, to beg him to desist; he desired a night's time; which at first was refused, but, on Cicero's request, granted; and the next day he revoked his negative, and without farther opposition, suffered the Senate to pass a decree, that Cicero's damage should be made good to him, and his houses rebuilt at the public charge.

The Consuls began presently to put the decree in execution; and ^{Ibid.} having contracted for the rebuilding Catulus's portico, set men to work upon clearing the ground, and demolishing what had been built by Clodius: But as to Cicero's buildings, it was agreed to take an estimate of his damage, and pay the amount of it to himself, to be laid out according to his own fancy: In which his Palatin house was valued at sixteen thousand pounds; his Tusculan at four thousand; his Formian only at two thousand. This was a very deficient valuation; for the Palatin house had cost him not long before near twice that sum: But Cicero resolved to appear satisfied with the award, because he perceived, or

¹ The famous Lucius Lucullus died this year. He had fallen mad some short time before; but it is not known whether it was a natural disease, or the effect of some liquor given him by one of his freedmen. Plus. in Luc.

Y. R. 696.
Bef. Chr.
56.
395 Conf.

Plut. in Cic.
Dio, 100.

imagined, that those who had clipt his wings had no mind to let them grow again^a.

But, though Cicero acquiesced in the low valuation of his houses, he could not rest till he had destroyed all the public monuments of his late disgrace. It was insufferable, that the law of his exile should remain, with the other acts of Clodius's Tribunate, hanging up in the Capitol, engraved, as usual, on tables of brass: Watching therefore the opportunity of Clodius's absence, he went to the Capitol with a strong body of friends, and, taking the tables down, conveyed them to his own house. This occasioned a sharp contest in the Senate between him and Clodius about the validity of those acts; and drew Cato also into the debate; who, without defending the man, defended the legality of his Tribunate, and of his acts in that Magistracy: For otherwise his own Cyprian commission must be deemed null, and all he did in virtue of it as done without authority. This created a coldness between the two Patriots. Dio speaks of a prior attempt by Cicero to take away the registers, which was defeated by Clodius, assisted by his brother Caius, then Prætor: And that historian speaks of both attempts as made in the Consulship of Marcellinus and Philippus, (Y. of R. 697.) when P. Clodius was Ædile. But Dio's authority is not decisive for the order of events; and it is more likely that Cicero, intoxicated with his prosperity, should venture to do this illegal riotous act before the two brothers entered on their Magistracies, than when they were in office. Be that as it will, it is no wonder that Clodius's fury, when thus provoked, carried him to those acts of vengeful violence which are going to be related.

Midd.
422, 423.
424.
Ad Att.
iv. 3.

Catulus's portico and Cicero's house were rising again apace, and carried up almost to the roof; when Clodius, without any warning, led thither, on the second of November, a band of armed men, who demolished the portico, drove the workmen out of Cicero's ground, and, with the stones and rubbish of the place, began to batter Quintus's house, with whom Cicero then lived, and at last set fire to it; so that the two brothers, with their families, to save themselves, were forced to fly in the utmost haste. Milo had already accused Clodius for his former violences, and resolved, if possible, to bring him to justice: Clodius, on the other hand, was suing for the Ædileship, to secure himself, for one year more at least, from any prosecution: He was sure of being condemned, if ever he was brought to a trial; so that whatever mischief he did in the mean time was all clear gain, and could not make his cause the worse: He now therefore gave a free course to his natural fury; was perpetually scouring the streets with his incendiaries, and threatened fire and sword to the City itself, if an Assembly was that those of whom Cicero here complains were Pompey and Leutulus, the persons who had been most instrumental in his restoration.

^a Idem, mi Pomponi, iidem, inquam, illi, qui mihi pennas inciderunt, nolunt easdem renasci—Ad Att. iv. 2.

It appears, by Ep. ii. Lib. ii. ad Q. Fr.

not called for the election of Ædiles. In this humour, about a week after his last outrage, on the eleventh of November, happening to meet with Cicero in the sacred street, he presently assaulted him with stones, clubs, and drawn swords: Cicero was not prepared for the encounter, and took refuge in the vestibule of the next house; where his attendants, rallying in his defence, beat off the assailants, and could easily have killed their leader, but that Cicero was willing, he says, to cure by diet, rather than surgery¹. The day following Clodius attacked Milo's house with sword in hand and lighted flambeaux, with intent to storm and burn it: But Milo was never unprovided for him; and Q. Flaccus, rallying with a strong band of stout fellows, killed several of his men, and would have killed Clodius too, if he had not hid himself in the inner part of P. Sylla's house, which he made use of on this occasion as his fortrefs.

The Senate met, on the fourteenth, to take these disorders into consideration; Clodius did not think fit to appear there; but Sylla came, to clear himself probably of the suspicion of encouraging him in the violences, on account of the freedom which he had taken with his house. Many severe speeches were made, and vigorous councils proposed. Marcellinus's opinion was, that Clodius should be impeached anew for these last outrages; and that no election of Ædiles should be suffered till he was brought to a trial: Milo declared, that as long as he continued in office, the Consul Metellus should make no election; for he would take the auspices every

Y. R. 696.
Bef. Chr.
56.
395 Conf.

Cibber,
Char. and Cond. of
Cic. p.
153.

¹ On this passage of Dr. Middleton's work the Poet-Laureat (before cited) makes the following remark, "If we had not the evidence of Cicero's own words for this fact, would it be credible? But Cicero's behaviour and sentiments upon the occasion are almost as extraordinary: for though his attendants rallied where he was forced to take refuge and beat off the assailants, and could easily have killed their leader, yet he was willing, says he, to cure by diet rather than by surgery; i. e. he rather chose to cut him down with a long speech than a broad sword. — To be quite grave upon the matter, the fact will plainly stand thus: That Clodius was as desperate a ruffian as ever broke the peace upon the highway, and Cicero was afraid of him.

"This being the wretched state of affairs in Rome, how shall we unravel so perplexing a part of our history? How came this gigantic Republic, these formidable Romans, that so strongly governed the world, so weakly to govern themselves? That, without regard to law, justice, humanity, or the public peace, every licentious leader of "a faction might commit whatever convenient outrage his conscience had a mind to, without shame, punishment, or scarce public notice? Or if any notice at all happened to be taken of it, that very notice was more astonishing than the criminal complained of; for when at last (p. 423.) the Senate were reduced to bear the public enormities of Clodius no longer, they manfully met upon it, and many severe speeches were made, and vigorous councils proposed; and what was the end of them? Why, they vigorously resolved to adjourn, without coming to any resolution at all in the matter. — NOW DID NOT THIS GOVERNMENT WANT A CÆSAR? Yet these were the rough reformers, who have frequently been applauded for sacrificing the first Cæsar to their precious self-abused liberty; a worse tyranny than his condemned ambition ever wished to impose upon them, Yet were they not less rationally happy for forty following years, under their second absolute master Augustus — than they knew how to make themselves, when independent guardians of their native liberty."

day,

Y. R. 696.
Bef. Chr.
55.
395 Cons.

day, on which an Assembly could be held; but Metellus contrived to waste the day in speaking, so that they were forced to break up without making any decree. Milo was as good as his word, and, having gathered a superior force, took care to obstruct the election; though the Consul Metellus employed all his power and art to elude his vigilance, and procure an Assembly by stratagem; calling it to one place and holding it in another, sometimes in the field of Mars, sometimes in the Forum; but Milo was ever beforehand with him; and, keeping a constant guard in the field from midnight to noon, was always at hand to inhibit his proceedings, by obnouncing, as it was called, or declaring, that he was taking the auspices on that day; so that the three brothers were baffled and disappointed^k; though they were perpetually haranguing and labouring to inflame the People against those who interrupted their Assemblies and right of electing; where Metellus's speeches were turbulent, Appius's rash, Clodius's furious. Cicero, who gives this account to Atticus, was of opinion “that there would be no election; and that Clodius would be brought to trial, if he was not first killed by Milo, which was likely to be his fate; : Milo,” says he, “makes no scruple to own it; being not deterred by my misfortune, and having no envious or perfidious Counsellors about him, nor any lazy Nobles to discourage him. It is commonly given out by the other side, that what he does is all done by my advice; but they little know how much conduct, as well as courage, there is in this Hero.”

An affair which very much employed the public attention about this time, was the re-establishment of Ptolemy Auletes^l on the Egyptian throne.

Prideaux,
Part II.
p. 422.

Before Pompey left Asia, there had happened great disturbances and revolutions in Egypt. The Alexandrians, weary of Alexander their King, rose in mutiny against him, drove him out of the kingdom, and called to the crown Ptolemy Auletes, who was a bastard son of Ptolemy Latbyrus; for Latbyrus left no male issue by his wife, but several by his concubines. Alexander, on his expulsion, fled to Pompey, offered him great gifts, and promised him greater, on condition he would undertake his restoration:

Midd.
p. 425.

^k From these facts it appears, that what is said above, of Clodius's repealing the Ælian and Fufian laws, and prohibiting the Magistrates from obstructing the Assemblies of the People, is to be understood only in a partial sense; and that his new law extended no farther than to hinder the Magistrates from dissolving an Assembly after it was actually convened, and had entered upon business: For it was still unlawful, we see, to convene an Assembly while the Magistrate was in the act of observing the heavens.

Prid.

^l This Auletes had used himself to play on a flute or pipe, called Aulos, and was so vain of his skill therein, that he would expose himself to contend for victory in the public shews: Hence he had the name of Auletes, i. e. the piper. And he would often imitate the effeminacies of the Bacchanals, and, in a female dress, dance to the same measures as they; and from hence he was called Diomysius Neos, or the New Bacchus. He is reckoned to have as much exceeded all of his race that reigned before him, in the effeminacy of his manners, as his grandfather Phyſcon did in the wickedness of them.

But

But Pompey refused to meddle in the matter, it being without the limits of his commission. Auletes got possession of the throne; but his title being precarious, he found means, by the interest of Cæsar and Pompey in the beginning of the Triumvirate, to be declared an Ally of the Roman Republic; for which piece of service they were to receive no less than 1,162,500 pounds.

While Cato was at Rhodes, in his way to Cyprus, Auletes came thither to him. For when the Alexandrians heard of the intention of the Romans to seize Cyprus, they pressed Auletes to demand the restoration of that island to Egypt, as being an ancient appendage of the kingdom; or, in case of denial, to declare war against them. Auletes refused to do either; and this refusal, joined with what they had suffered from him by his exactions, in order to raise the money with which he had purchased the favour of Pompey and Cæsar; angered them so far, that they drove him out of the kingdom, and he was then going to Rome, there to solicit the assistance of the Senate for his restoration. On his coming to Cato, and entering into discourse with him about his affairs, Cato blamed him for quitting that state of honour and happiness which he was possessed of in his kingdom, and thus exposing himself to the disgrace, trouble, and contempt, which, as an exile, he must expect to meet with. And as to the help he expected from Rome, he laid before him what great gifts and presents, for the obtaining of it, would be extorted from him by the great men of that city, whose greedy expectations, he freely told him, were such, that, although Egypt were to be sold, the purchase-money would not be sufficient fully to satisfy them. And therefore he advised him to return again into Egypt, and there make up all differences with his people; offering himself to go with him to help him herein. Ptolemy at first approved of the advice, and resolved to be guided by it; but, being afterwards dissuaded from it by those about him, he went forward to Rome, where he soon found, by full experience, all to be true that Cato had told him.

Frid. p. 450 & 451. Dio, lib. xxxix. Strabo, l. xvii. p. 796. Porphyr. in Græc. Euseb. Scalig. ^m The Alexandrians, after Auletes's departure, not knowing what was become of him, placed Berenice, his daughter, on the throne, for his two sons were yet very young, which made them prefer her. They sent an embassy into Syria, to Antiochus Asiaticus, who by his mother Selene, was the next male heir of the family, to invite him to come into Egypt, and there marry Berenice, and reign with her; but the Ambassadors on their arrival in Syria, found him just dead.

Understanding that Selencus Cibicætes, his brother, was still living, they sent an embassy to him with the same proposal, which he readily accepted of. Gabinus (who was now come into his province) at first hindered his going; however, either with or without the consent of the Proconsul, he afterwards went; but, being a very sordid and base spirited man (of which he had given a special instance in robbing the sepulchre of Alexander of the golden case in which his body was deposited) Berenice soon grew weary of him, and caused him to be strangled, and she afterwards married Archelaus, high-priest of the Moon, the great goddess of the Coronians in Pontus: he was the son of that Archelaus who had the chief command of Mithridates's forces in Greece, during his first war with the Romans; but after that, falling into disgrace with his master, fled to them.

When

Y. R. 696.
Bef. Chr.
56.
395 Ccml.

Midd.
P. 427.

When the Alexandrians learnt that Ptolemy was at Rome, they sent thither a numerous embassy, composed of a hundred of their principal Citizens, to plead their cause before the Senate; but the King, having notice of this deputation, procured some of them to be assassinated on the road, others as soon as they arrived at Rome; and others he silenced by proper applications to their fears and their avarice. The Senate ordered, that Dio, the chief of the embassy, an Academic philosopher, should be called and heard. But this Dio was soon after assassinated; and Ptolemy's money, aided by the power of Pompey, who lodged the King in his own house, and openly protected him, stifled this odious affair almost intirely. Some persons indeed were brought to a trial, as having been concerned in the assassination of Dio; and this was one of the chief articles of accusation against Cælius, whom Cicero defended the year following. These murders, and the notion of the King's having bribed all the Magistrates, had raised so general an aversion to him among the People, that he found it advisable to quit the City, and leave the management of his interest to his agents. The Consul Lentulus, who had obtained the provinces of Cilicia and Cyprus, whither he was preparing to set forward, was very desirous of the commission of replacing him on his throne; for which he had already procured a vote of the Senate: The opportunity of a command, almost in sight of Egypt, made him generally thought to have the best pretensions to that charge; and he was assured of Cicero's warm assistance in soliciting the confirmation of it.

In this situation of affairs, the new Tribunes entered into their office: Caius Cato, of the same family with his name-sake Marcus, was one of the number; a bold, turbulent man, of no temper or prudence^a; yet a tolerable speaker, and generally on the side of the Senate.

He opened his Magistracy by declaring loudly against King Ptolemy, and all who favoured him; especially Lentulus, whom he supposed to be under some private engagement with him, and for that reason was determined to baffle all their schemes.

The Senate (as has been just mentioned) had granted to Lentulus the commission for restoring the King; yet it would seem that Pompey was intriguing to get it for himself. An accident which happened at this time, threw an obstacle in the way of their ambition. The statue of Jupiter on Mount Alba having been struck by thunder, the books of the Sibyls were consulted; and there it was read, If the King of Egypt comes to desire your help, deny him not your friendship; but aid him not with your forces; if you do, you shall have trouble and danger. This Oracle, so pat to the purpose, left no room to doubt of its being forged; but Cato,

Midd.
P. 430.

Ad. Quint.
Fr. 2, 3.

^a Before he had borne any public office, he attempted to impeach Gabinus of bribery and corruption; but not being able to get an audience of the Prætors, he had the hardiness to mount the Rostra, which was never allowed to a private Citizen, and, in a speech to the People, declared Pompey Dictator: But his presumption had like to have cost him dear; for it raised such an indignation in the audience, that he had much difficulty to escape with his life.

who

who was fiercely zealous against restoring the King by any means, and had the greater part of the Senate on his side, called up the guardians of the books into the Rostra, to testify the passage to be genuine. To the People it was publicly read and explained; and then laid before the Senate, who greedily received it; and after a grave debate on this scruple of religion, came to a resolution, that it seemed dangerous to the Republic to restore the King by a multitude. It cannot be imagined, that they laid any real stress on this admonition of the Sibyl; but it was a fair pretext for defeating a project generally disliked: They were unwilling to gratify any man's ambition of visiting the rich country of Egypt at the head of an army; and were persuaded, that, without an army, no man would be solicitous about going thither.

Y. R. 696.
Bef. Chr.
56.
395 Col. i.

Ad Quint.
Fr. ii.

Ep. Fam.
ii. 4.

Midd. 248.
Ad Quint.
Fr. ii. 1.

Lupus, likewise, one of C. Cato's Collegues, summoned the Senate, and raised an expectation of some uncommon proposal from him: It was indeed of an extraordinary nature; to revise and annul that famed act of Cæsar's Consulship, for the division of the Campanian lands: He spoke long upon it, and was heard with much attention; gave great praises to Cicero, with severe reflections on Cæsar, and expostulations with Pompey, who was now abroad in the execution of his late commission; in the conclusion he told them, that he would not demand the opinions of the particular Senators, because he had no mind to expose them to the resentment and animosity of any; but from the ill humour, which he remembered, when that act first passed, and the favour with which he was now heard, he could easily collect the sense of the House. Upon which Marcellinus said, that he must not conclude from their silence, either what they liked or disliked: That, for his own part, and he might answer too, he believed, for the rest, he chose to say nothing on the subject at present, because he thought that the cause of the Campanian lands ought not to be brought into debate in Pompey's absence.

This affair being dropt, Racilius, another Tribune, rose up and renewed the debate about Milo's impeachment of Clodius, and called upon Marcellinus, the Consul elect, to give his opinion upon it; who, after inveighing against all the violences of Clodius, proposed, that, in the first place, an allotment of Judges should be made for the trial; and after that, the election of Ædiles; and if any one attempted to hinder the trial, that he should be deemed a public enemy. The other Consul elect, Philippus, was of the same mind; but the Tribunes, C. Cato and Cassius, spoke against it, and were for proceeding to an election before any step towards a trial. When Cicero was called upon to speak, he ran through the whole series of Clodius's extravagancies, as if he had been accusing him already at the bar, to the great satisfaction of the Assembly; Antistius, the Tribune, seconded him, and declared, that no business should be done before the trial; and when the House was going universally into that opinion, Clodius began to speak, with intent to waste the rest of the day; while his slaves and followers without, who had seized the steps and avenues of the Senate, raised so great a noise of a sudden,

Ibid.

Y. R. 596. in abusing some of Milo's friends, that the Senate broke up in no small hurry, and with fresh indignation at this new insult.

Bef. Chr.
56.
395 Conf.

There was no more business done through the remaining part of December, which was taken up with holidays. Lentulus and Metellus, whose Consulship expired with the year, set forward for their several governments; the one for Cilicia, the other for Spain: Lentulus committed the whole direction of his affairs to Cicero; and Metellus, unwilling to leave him his enemy, made up all matters with him before his departure, and wrote an affectionate letter to him afterwards from Spain.

Ep. Fam.
v. 3.

C H A P. III.

Debates and contests in the Senate about restoring King PTOLEMY.

CLODIUS is chosen Ædile. He impeaches MILO. POMPEY pleads MILO's cause. CLODIUS turns the fury of his anger against POMPEY. Civil feuds and conflicts ensue.

CICERO defends SEXTIUS, inveighs against VATINIUS, and moves to have CÆSAR's Act relating to the Campanian lands reconsidered; but soon desists from this pursuit. The Senate refuses to decree a Thanksgiving for a victory obtained by GABINIUS in Judæa. Prodigies are reported to have happened: Various interpretations of them. PISO is recalled from his government of Macedonia. CÆSAR is continued in his command in Gaul. He comes to Luca: POMPEY and CRASSUS meet him there. The Tribune CATO binds the proceeding to an election of new Consuls. The government falls into an Interregnum.

Y. R. 697.
Bef. Chr.

55
396 Conf.

IN the beginning of the new year, when the Consular fasces were transferred to Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus, and L. Marcius Philippus, the question concerning the persons, by whom, and the manner, in which, King Ptolemy should be replaced on the throne of Ægypt, came under deliberation. Cicero's letters to his friend Publius Lentulus Spinther (who had the best claim to the commission, and was Proconsul of Cilicia) being almost wholly narrative of what passed at Rome in relation to that affair, will probably be more satisfactory to the Reader, than any abridgment of the matter therein contained could be; especially as we have so good a translation of those letters into our language.

To Publius Lentulus Proconsul.

Ep. Fam.

l. i. Ep. 1.

Ed. Græv.

B. i. let. 12.

Melmoth.

“ I find it much easier to satisfy the world than myself, in those sacred offices of friendship I exert in your behalf. Numberless indeed are the obligations you have conferred upon me: And as you persevered with “unwearied zeal till you had affected my recall from exile, I esteem it

 “the greatest mortification of my life, that I cannot act in your affairs “with the same success. The truth is, Ammonius, who resides here
 “as Ambassador from Ptolemy, defeats all my schemes, by the most “shameless and avowed bribery: And he is supplied with money for “this purpose, from the same quarter as when you were in Rome. The “party in the King’s interest (though their number, it must be owned, “is inconsiderable) are all desirous that Pompey may be employed to “re-instate him in his dominions. The Senate, on the other hand, fall “in with the pretended Oracle; not indeed as giving any credit to its “predictions, but as being in general ill-inclined to this Prince, and “detesting his most corrupt practices. In the mean while, I omit no “opportunity of admonishing Pompey with great freedom, and conjuring “him not to act such a part in this affair as would cast the deepest stain “upon his character. I must do him the justice at the same time to “acknowledge, that so far as his own conduct is concerned, there does “not appear the least foundation for any remonstrances of this sort. On “the contrary, he is perpetually expressing the highest zeal for your “interest: As he lately supported it in the Senate, with the utmost force “of eloquence, and the strongest professions of friendship. Marcelli- “*nus, I need not tell you, is a good deal displeased at your soliciting
 “this commission: In all other respects, I dare venture to say, he will “very strenuously promote your interest. We must be contented to take “him in his own way: For I perceive it is impossible to dissuade him
 “from proposing, that the injunction of the Oracle shall be complied “with: And, in fact, he had already made several motions to that “purpose.

“I write this early on the thirteenth, and I will now give you an “account of what has hitherto passed in the Senate. Both Hortensius
 “and Lucullus agreed in moving, that the prohibition of the Oracle “should be obeyed: And indeed it does not seem possible to bring this “matter to bear upon any other terms. But we proposed, at the same time, “that, in pursuance of the decree, which was made on your own motion,
 “you be appointed to re-establish Ptolemy in his kingdom; the situation “of your province lying so conveniently for that purpose. In a word,
 “we consented that army should be given up, in deference to the Oracle;
 “but insisted nevertheless, that you should be employed in effecting
 “this restoration. Crassus, on the other side, was for having this com“mission executed by three persons, to be chosen from among the Gene“rals: And, consequently, he did not mean to exclude Pompey. Marcus “Bibulus joined with him as to the number; but thought, that the per“sons to be nominated should not bear any military command. All the “rest of the Consulars were in the same sentiments, except Servilius

* One of the present Consuls.

Y. R. 697.
 Bef. Chr.
 55.
 296 Cons.

Y. R. 697. " Afrenius and Volcatius. The first absolutely opposed our engaging " in Ptolemy's restoration upon any terms whatsoever: But the two " last were of opinion, that, agreeable to the motion of Lupus, this " commission should be given to Pompey. This circumstance has in" creased the suspicion concerning the real inclination of the latter: As " his most particular friends were observed to concur with Volcatius,
 " they are labouring this point with great assiduity: And, I fear, it will " be carried against us. Libo and Hypsæus are openly soliciting for
 " Pompey: And, indeed, the conduct of all his friends at this juncture " make it generally believed, that he is desirous of the office. Yet the " misfortune is, those who are unwilling it should fall into his hands, are " not the more inclined to place it in yours: As they are much displeased
 " at your having contributed to the late advancement of his power.
 " For myself, I find I have the less influence in your cause, as it is sup" posed I am solely governed by a principle of gratitude: At the same " time, the notion which prevails, that this affair affords an opportunity
 " of obliging Pompey, renders my applications likewise not altogether so " effectual as they might otherwise prove. It is thus I am labouring in this " perplexed business: Which the King himself, long before you left
 " Rome, as well as the friends and dependants of Pompey, had artfully " embarrassed. To this I must add the avowed opposition I meet with
 " from the Consulars; who represent our assisting Ptolemy with an army, as " a measure that would highly reflect upon the dignity of the Senate: be " assured, however, I shall employ every means in my power of testifying
 " both to the world in general, and to your friends in particular, the sin" cerity of that affection I bear you. And were there any honour in those " who ought to have shewn themselves influenced by its highest and most
 " refined principles, I should not have so many difficulties to encounter.
 " Farewell."

To the same.

Lib. i. Ep.
 2. Ed.
 GRÆV.
 B. i. Let.
 14. Mem.

" The Senate met on the thirteenth of January, but came to no reso" lution; the greatest part of that day having been spent in some warm
 " contests which arose between Marcellinus the Consul, and Caninius,
 " one of the Tribunes of the People. I had myself also a very consider" able share in the debates: And I represented the zeal you have always " shewn towards the Senate, in terms that influenced them, I am per" suaded, much to your advantage. The next day, therefore, we thought
 " it sufficient briefly to deliver our opinions: as I perceived, not only by
 " the favourable manner in which I was heard the day before, but also
 " by enquiring into the sentiments of each particular member, that the

* Lentulus, during his Consulate, had proposed and carried that law, which, that Pom- pey might provide corn in a time of scarcity, invested him with the whole power of the Roman empire.

" majority

“ majority was clearly on our side. The business of the day opened with “ reporting to the house the several opinions of Bibulus, Hortensius, and “ Volcatius. The respective questions, therefore, were,

Y. R. 697.
 Bef. Chr.
 55.
 396 Conf.

“ In the first place, whether three commissioners should be nominated for “ restoring the King, agreeable to the sentiments of Bibulus?

“ In the next, whether, according to those of Hortensius, the office “ should be conferred upon you, but without employing any forces?

“ Or, lastly, whether, in conformity to the advice of Volcatius, this “ honour should be assigned to Pompey?

“ The points being thus stated, it was moved, that the opinion of “ Bibulus might be referred to the deliberation of the house in two sepa“ rate questions. Accordingly, as it was now in vain to oppose his mo“ tion so far as it related to paying obedience to the declaration of the “ Oracle, the Senate in general came into his sentiments: But as to his “ proposal of deputing three commissioners, it was rejected by a very confi“ derable majority. The opinion next in order was that of Hortensius.

“ But, when we were going to divide upon it, Lupus, a Tribune of the “ People, insisted that in virtue of his office he had the privilege of calling “ to a division of the House, prior to the Consuls; and therefore demand“ ed that the voices should be first taken upon the motion he had made “ in favour of Pompey. This claim was generally and strongly opposed: P. 476.

“ As indeed it was both unprecedented and unreasonable. The Consuls “ themselves, however, did not greatly contest that point: Nor did they “ absolutely give it up. Their view was to protract the debates: And “ they succeeded accordingly. They perceived indeed, that, notwith“ standing the majority affected to appear on the side of Volcatius, “ yet, upon a division, they would certainly vote with Hortensius.
 “ Nevertheless, several of the members were called upon to deliver their “ opinions; though, in truth, much against the inclinations of the Con“ suls, who were desirous that the sentiments of Bibulus should prevail.
 “ The debates continuing till night, the Senate broke up without coming “ to any resolution. I happened to pass the same evening with Pompey:
 “ And as I had that day supported your cause in the Senate with more “ than ordinary success, I thought it afforded me the most favourable op“ portunity of speaking to him in your behalf. And what I said, seem“ ed to make so strong an impression, that I am persuaded I have brought “ him wholly over to your interest. To say the truth, whenever I hear “ him mention this affair himself, I entirely acquit him of being secretly “ desirous of this commission. On the other hand, when I observe the “ conduct of his friends of every rank, I am well convinced, (and indeed “ it is now evident likewise to the whole world) that they have been gain“ ed by the corrupt measures which a certain party, with the consent of “ Ptolemy and his advisers, have employed.——I write this before sun“ rise on the 16th of January: And the Senate is to meet again on

“ this

Y. R. 697. " this very day. I hope to preserve my authority in that Assembly, as Bef. Chr. " far at least as is possible amidst such general treachery and corruption 395 Conf. 55. " which has discovered itself upon this occasion. As to what concerns
 " the bringing this matter before the People; I think we have taken such " precautions as will render it impracticable, unless by actual violence,
 " and in direct and open contempt both of our civil and religious institu" tions. For this purpose a very severe ORDER of the SENATE^c (which I " imagine was immediately transmitted to you) was entered yesterday in " our journals, notwithstanding the Tribunes, Cato and Caninius, inter" posed their negatives.
 " You may depend upon my sending you a faithful account of every " other occurrence which may arise in this affair: And be assured I shall " exert the utmost of my vigilance and my credit, to conduct it in the most " advantageous manner for your interest. Farewell."

To the same.

L. N. i. Ep.
 4. Ed.
 GREV.
 B. i. L. c.
 15. Melm.

" When the Senate met on the sixteenth of this month, your affair stood " in a very advantageous posture. We had succeeded the day before
 " against the motion of Bibulus for appointing three commissioners, and " had now only to contend with Volcatius; when our adversaries pre" vented the question from being put, by artfully protracting the debates:
 " For, they saw we had in a very full House, and amidst great contrariety " of opinions, carried our point, to the considerable mortification of those, " who were for taking the King's affairs out of your direction, and trans" ferring them to another hand. Curio opposed us upon this occasion
 " with great warmth; while Bibulus spoke with more temper, and indeed " seemed almost inclined to favour our cause. But Cato and Caninius ab" solutely refused to suffer any decree to pass, till a general Assembly of " the People should be convened.
 " By the Pupian law, as you well know, there cannot be another " meeting of the Senate till the first of February: Nor indeed throughout
 " that whole month, unless all the foreign Ambassadors should have re" ceived, or be refused, audience. In the mean while, a motion prevails
 " among the People, that your adversaries have insisted upon this pretend-
 " ed Oracle, not so much with an intent of obstructing your particular " views, as in order to disappoint the hopes of those who may be desi" rous of this expedition to Alexandria, merely from the ambition of " commanding an army. The whole world is sensible indeed of the regard

" When an al passed the Senate in a " full House, held according to the pre" scribed forms, and without any opposition
 " from the Tribunes, (who had the privi" lege of putting a negative upon all pro" ceedings in the Senate) it was called a Se-

" natus consultum, a decree of the Senate.
 " But if any of these essentials were wanting,
 " or a Tribune interposed, it was then only
 " styled a Senatus auctoritas, an order of the " Senate, and considered as of less authority."
 Melm. from Manutius.

" which

“ which the Senate has shewn to your character: And it is notoriously “ owing to the artifices of your enemies, that the House did not divide up“ on the question proposed in your favour. But should the same persons, “ under a pretended zeal for the public (though, in fact, upon the most “ infamous motives) attempt to bring this affair before a general Assem“ bly of the People, we have concerted our measures so well ^d, that they “ cannot possibly effect their design without having recourse to violence; “ or at least without setting the ordinances of our country, both civil and “ religious, at avowed defiance——But—if methods of violence should “ be employed, I cannot pretend, in this general contempt of all legal au“ thority, to answer for the event: In every other respect I will venture “ to assure you, that both the Senate and the People will pay the highest “ attention to your dignity and character. Farewell.”

To the same.

“ —— You are sensible, as I perceive by your last letter, that you “ have been treated with the same insincerity by those who ought to “ have concurred in supporting your dignities, as I formerly experienced “ from some of my pretended friends, in the affair of my banishment.
 “ Thus, whilst I was exerting the utmost efforts of my vigilance, my “ policy, and my interest, in order to serve you in the article relating to “ Ptolemy, I was unexpectedly alarmed in a point of much more important “ concern, by the infamous law which Cato has lately proposed to your “ prejudice.” [Caius Cato, to cut off all hopes at once from Lentulus of obtaining this commission, had proposed a law to the People for recalling him from his government.] “ Where affairs are thus embroiled, “ every thing is, undoubtedly, to be feared: Yet my principal apprehen“ sion, I confess, arises from the treachery of your false friends. But how“ ever that may be, I am earnestly endeavouring to counteract the male“ volent designs of Cato.”

“ As to the Alexandrian commission, both yourself and your friends “ will, I trust, have abundant reason to be satisfied with my conduct. But “ at the same time I must say, I greatly fear it will either be taken out of “ your hands, or entirely dropped: And I know not which of these al“ ternatives I should least chuse.”

To the same.

“ You are informed, I imagine, by many hands, of what passes here.
 “ I leave it therefore to your other friends to supply you with an account

^d i. e. They had engaged some Tribune to say Veto, or some Magistrate to observe the Heavens.

^e This and the foregoing letter are blended together in the common editions: But they are here separated upon the authority of Manutius and Gronovius. Melm.

“ of Lib. i. Ep.

5. Ed.
Græv.
Book i.
Let. 17.
Melm.

Ad Q. Fr.
i. 3.

Lib. i. Ep.
5. Ed.
Græv.
Book i.
Let. 18.
Melm.

Y. R. 697. " of our transactions, and content myself with only sending you my con-
 B. Chr. " jecture. To this end I must previously acquaint you, that, on the sixth 955 Conf. " of February, Pompey made a speech in a general Assembly of the Peo" ple in favour of Milo, during which he was insulted with much clamour
 " and abuse. Cato afterwards inveighed in the Senate against Pompey
 " with great acrimony, and was heard with the most profound silence and " attention: Both which circumstances seem to have affected him very
 " sensibly. Now from hence I surmise, that he has laid aside all thoughts
 " of being employed in the Alexandrian expedition. That affair remains as " yet entirely open to us: For the Senate has hitherto determined nothing to
 " your prejudice but what they are obliged, in deference to the Oracle, to re- " fuse to every other candidate for this office. It is my present hope therefore,
 " as well as endeavour, that the King may throw himself into your hands,
 " when he shall find that he cannot, as he expected, be restored by Pompey;
 " and that, unless he is replaced upon the throne by your assistance, his affair
 " will be entirely dropped. And this step he will undoubtedly take, if Pom- " pey should give the least intimation of its being agreeable to him. But " I need not tell you the difficulty of discovering the sentiments of a man of " his reserve. However, I shall omit no method in my power to effect
 " this scheme; as I shall easily, I trust, be able to prevent the injurious
 " designs of Cato.

" I do not find that any of the Consulars are in your interest, except " Hortensius and Lucullus: All the rest of that rank, either openly, or in " a more concealed manner, oppose your views. Nevertheless, my friend,
 " be not discouraged: On the contrary, let it be still your hope, not" withstanding the attempts of the worthless Cato, that you will again shine
 " out in all your former lustre. Farewell."

To the same.

L. I. Ep.
 vi. Ed.
 Græv.
 Book I.
 Let. xix.
 Melm.

" You will receive a full account from Pollio of all that has been trans-
 " acted in your affair, as he was not only present, but a principal manager.
 " Believe me, I am much concerned at the unfavourable aspect of this business.
 " However, it affords me a very sensible consolation, that there is strong " reason to hope the prudence of your friends will be able to elude the " force of those iniquitous schemes which have been projected to your pre" judice. Even time itself will probably contribute to this end; as it of" ten wears out the malevolence of those who either professedly or in a dis" guised manner mean one ill." —

Mald. p.
 433-

The Senate grew at length so weary of this affair, that they resolved to leave the King to shift for himself, without interposing at all in his restoration; and so the matter hung; whilst other affairs more interesting were daily rising at home, and engaging the attention of the City.

THE election of Ædiles, which had been industriously postponed through all the last summer, could not easily be kept off any longer: The City was impatient for its Magistrates, and especially for the plays and shews with which they used to entertain them; and several also of the new Tribunes being zealous for an election, it was held at last on the twentieth of January, when Clodius was chosen Ædile without opposition¹.

This Magistracy, which freed him from all apprehension of Judges, and a trial, gave him a great advantage over his antagonist Milo, who was become a private man. He now accused Milo of the same crime of which Milo had accused him, of public violence and breach of the laws, in maintaining a band of gladiators to the terror of the City. Milo made his appearance to this accusation on the second of February, when Pompey, Crassus, and Cicero appeared with him; and M. Marcellus, though Clodius's colleague in the Ædileship, spoke for Milo at Cicero's desire; and the whole passed quietly and favourably for him on that day. The second hearing was appointed on the ninth, when Pompey undertook to plead his cause; but no sooner stood up to speak, than Clodius's mob, by a continual clamour of reproaches and invectives, endeavoured to hinder him from going on, or at least from being heard: Yet Pompey, with a presence of mind which, in spite of their attempts, commanded silence, spoke for near three hours. When Clodius rose up to answer him, Milo's mob, in their turn, so disturbed and confounded him, that he was not able to speak a

Midd. p.
434.

¹ It may justly seem strange (says Dr. Middleton) how a man so profligate and criminal as Clodius, whose life was a perpetual insult upon all laws divine and human, should be suffered not only to live without punishment, but to obtain all the honours of a free City in their proper course; and it would be natural to suspect that we had been deceived in our accounts of him by taking them from his enemies, did we not find them too firmly supported by facts to be called in question: But a little attention to the particular character of the man, as well as of the times in which he lived, will enable us to solve the difficulty.

In Verr. v.
70.
Pro Sext.
9.

First, the splendor of his family — Cicero calls the nobles of this class Prætors and Consuls elect from their cradles by a kind of hereditary right, whose very names were sufficient to advance them to all the dignities of the state. [And therefore how worthless, how pestilent soever Clodius was, he did not fail to be defended and supported by the Honest, the Optimates, when his attempts were not against the interest of their faction.]

Secondly, his personal qualities were peculiarily adapted to endear him to all the meaner sort; his bold and ready wit, his talent at haranguing, his profuse expence, and his pursuing popular measures contrary to the maxims of his ancestors, who had [almost] all been stern asserters of the aristocratical power.

Thirdly, the contrast of opposite factions, who had each their ends in supporting him. — The Senate particularly, whose chief apprehensions were from the Triumvirate, thought that the rashness of Clodius might be of some use to perplex their measures, and stir up the People against them on proper occasions; or it humoured their spleen at least to see him insulting Pompey to his face. Videtis igitur hominem per seipsum jam pridem afflictum ac jacentem perniciosis Optimatum discordiis excitari. — Ne a Republica Reipub. pestis amoveretur, resisterunt; etiam ne causam diceret; etiam ne privatus esset: Etiamne in sinu atque in deliciis quidam optimi viri viperam illam venenatam ac pestiferam habere potuerunt? Quo tandem decepti munere? Volo, inquiunt, esse qui in concione detrahat de Pompeio. — De Harusp. Resp. 24.

Y. R. 697.
Bef. Chr.
396⁵⁵ Cons.

word; while a number of epigrams and lampoons upon him and his sister were thrown about, and publicly rehearsed among the multitude below, so as to make him quite furious: Till recollecting himself a little, and finding it impossible to proceed in his speech, he demanded aloud of his mob, who it was that attempted to starve them by famine? To which they presently cried out, Pompey: He then asked, who it was that desired to be sent into Ægypt? Pompey, they cried out again. But when he asked, who it was that they themselves had a mind to send? they answered, Crassus: For the old jealousy was now breaking out again between him and Pompey; and though he appeared that day on Milo's side, yet he was not, as Cicero says, a real well-wisher to him.

These warm proceedings among the chiefs brought on a fray below, among their partizans; the Clodians began the attack, but were repulsed by the Pompeians; and Clodius himself driven out of the Rostra: Cicero, when he saw the affair proceed to blows, thought it high time to retreat towards home; but no great harm was done; for Pompey, having cleared the Forum of his enemies, presently drew off his forces, to prevent any farther mischief or scandal on his side,

Ad Quint.
Fr. ii. 3.

The Senate was presently summoned, to provide some remedy for these disorders, where Pompey, who had drawn upon himself a fresh odium from his behaviour in the Egyptian affair, was severely handled by Bibulus, Curio, Favonius, and others: Cicero chose to be absent, since he must either have offended Pompey, by saying nothing for him, or the honest party, by defending him. The same debate was carried on for several days, in which Pompey was treated very roughly by the Tribune Cato, who inveighed against him with great fierceness, and laid open his perfidy to Cicero, to whom he paid the highest compliments, and was heard with much attention by all Pompey's enemies.

Pompey answered him with an unusual vehemence; and reflecting openly on Crassus, as the author of these affronts, declared, he would guard his life with more care than Scipio Africanus did, when Carbo murdered him^{*}.

—These warm expressions seemed to open a prospect of some great agitation likely to ensue: Pompey consulted Cicero on the proper means of his security; and acquainted him with his apprehensions of a design against his life; that Cato was privately supported, and Clodius furnished with money by Crassus; and both of them encouraged by Curio, Bibulus, and the rest, who envied him; that it was necessary for him to look to himself, since the meaner people were wholly alienated, the nobility and Senate generally disaffected, and the youth corrupted.

Cicero readily consented to join forces with him, and to summon their clients and friends from all parts of Italy. For, though he had no mind to fight his battles in the Senate, he was desirous to defend his person from all violence, especially against Crassus, whom he never loved: Y. R. 697. They resolved likewise to oppose with united strength all the attempts of Clodius and Cato against Lentulus and Milo. Clodius, on the other hand, was not less busy in mustering his friends against the next hearing of Milo's cause. But as his strength was much inferior to that of his adversary, so he had no expectation of getting him condemned, nor any other view but to teize and harass him: For, after two hearings, the affair was put off by several adjournments to the beginning of May; from which time we find no farther mention of it. Dio, p. 99.

* N. B. That Scipio was murdered by Carbo, there is no shadow of proof. See Vol. II. Book VI. Chap. IX.

The Consul Marcellinus, who drew his colleague Philippus along with him, was a resolute opposer of the Triumvirate, as well as of all the violences of the other Magistrates: For which reason he resolved to suffer no Assemblies of the People, except such as were necessary for the elections into the public offices: His view was to prevent Cato's law for recalling Lentulus, and the monstrous things (so Cicero calls them) which some were attempting at this time in favour of Cæsar. Cicero gives him the character of one of the best Consuls that he had ever known, and blames him only in one thing; for treating Pompey on all occasions so rudely; which made Cicero often absent himself from the Senate, to avoid taking part either on the one side or the other. For the support therefore of his DIGNITY and interest in the City, he resumed his old task of PLEADING CAUSES^a; which was always popular and respectable, and in which he was sure to find full employment. His first cause was the defence of L. Bestia on the tenth of February, who, after the disgrace of a repulse from the Prætorship in the last election, was accused of bribery and corruption in his suit for it; and, notwithstanding the authority and eloquence of his advocate, was convicted and banished. He was a man extremely corrupt, turbulent, and seditious, had always been an enemy to Cicero, and supposed to be deeply engaged in Catiline's plot; and is one instance of what Cicero says, that he was often forced, against his will, to defend certain persons who had not deserved it of him, by the intercession of those who had. Ad Q. Fr. ii. 6. Ibid. ii. 3. Ep. Fam. vii. 1.

Cicero was about this time engaged in the defence of P. Sextius, the late Tribune, accused of public violence, or breach of peace in his Tribunate: He had been a true friend to Cicero in his distress, and borne a great part in his restoration; but fancying himself afterwards neglected, or not sufficiently requited by him, and since his return been very cold to him, and even churlish. But Cicero, instead of resenting this, having heard that Sextius was indisposed, went in person to his house, and cured him of all his jealousies, by freely offering his assistance and patronage in pleading his cause; which he managed so well, that Sextius was acquitted, and in a manner the most honourable, by the unanimous suffrages of all the Judges; and with an universal applause of Cicero's humanity and gratitude. Ad Q. Fr. ii. 3. Ibid. 4.

^a It is very remarkable that Cicero, to preserve his DIGNITY, made himself Advocate-General for all STATE-FELONS.

Y. R. 697. Pompey attended this trial as a friend to Sextius; while Cæsar's creature, Vatinius, appeared not only as an adversary, but as a witness against him: Which gave Cicero an opportunity of exposing the whole course of his profligate life¹, (as Sextius particularly desired) with all the keenness of his raillery, to the great diversion of the audience². Vatinius made some attempt in his turn to rally Cicero, and contemptuously reproached him with the baseness of changing sides, and becoming Cæsar's friend, on account of the fortunate state of his affairs.

[For Cæsar, being in the career of his victories¹ in Gaul, had lately sent a request to the State, "that money might be decreed to him for the payment of his army; with a power of chusing ten Lieutenants, for the better managing of the war, and the conquered provinces." It seemed strange, that, after all his conquests, he should not be able to maintain his army without money from home, at a time when the treasury was greatly exhausted: and the renewal of a commission, obtained at first by the People's favour, against the inclination of the Senate, was of hard digestion. But Cæsar's interest prevailed, and Cicero himself was the promoter of it, and procured a decree to his satisfaction, yet not without disgusting the pretended patriots, those counterfeit Republicans, scrupulously zealous against all extraordinary grants: But Cicero "alleged the extraordinary services of Cæsar, and that the course of his victories ought not to be checked by the want of necessary supplies, while he was so gloriously extending the bounds of the empire, and conquering nations whose names had never been heard before at Rome: And though it were possible for him to maintain his troops without their help, by the spoils of the enemy, yet those spoils ought to be reserved for the splendor of his Triumph, which it was not just to defraud by their unseasonable parsimony."]

What Cicero says, he replied to Vatinius, will be seen in a long letter he wrote two years after this time to Lentulus Spintber, which will be inserted in its proper year, with some observations upon it.

Midd. 445. In the beginning of April, the Senate granted the sum of three hundred thousand pounds to Pompey, to be laid out in purchasing Corn for the use of the City, where there was still a great scarcity, and as great at the same time of money; so that the moving a point so tender could not fail of raising some ill humour in the Assembly: when Cicero, whose old spirit seems to have revived in him from his late success in Sextius's cause, surprized them by proposing, "that, in the present inability of the treasury to purchase the Campanian lands, which by Cæsar's act were to be divided to the People, the act itself should be reconsidered, and a day appointed for that deliberation:" The motion was received with an uni-

¹ We shall find that Cicero afterwards, notwithstanding the profligacy of Vatinius's whole life, appeared as a witness to his General Good behaviour.

² This speech against Vatinius is still remaining, under the title of The Interrogation; because it consists chiefly of a string of questions.

¹ Cæsar's progress in conquest will be related hereafter, in an uninterrupted summary of his exploits.

versal joy, and a kind of tumultuary acclamation: The enemies of the Y.R. 697.
Triumvirate were extremely pleased with it, in hopes that it would make a breach between Cicero and Pompey.

Pompey, whose nature was singularly reserved, expressed no uneasiness Midd. p. 446.
 upon it, nor took any notice of it to Cicero, though they met and supped together familiarly, as they used to do: But he set forward soon after towards Afric, in order to provide corn; and, intending to call at Sardi- nia, proposed to embark at Piso or Leghorn, that he might have an interview with Cæsar, who was now at Luca, the utmost limit of his Gallic government. He found Cæsar exceedingly out of humour with Cicero; for Crassus had already been with him at Ravenna, and greatly incensed him by his account of Cicero's late motion; which he complained of so heavily, that Pompey promised to use all his authority to induce Cicero to drop the pursuit of it; and for that purpose sent away an express to Rome, to entreat him not to proceed any further in it till his return; and when he came afterwards to Sardinia, where his Lieutenant Quintus, the brother of Cicero, then resided, he entered immediately into an expostulation with him about it.—But of the effect of this remonstrance we shall have a full account in the long letter to Lentulus, just now referred to for another particular.

Milo's trial being put off (as before mentioned) to the fifth of May, Mid. 453.
Cicero took the benefit of a short vacation to make an excursion into the country, and visit his estates and villas in different parts of Italy.—— During this tour, his old enemy Gabinus, the Proconsul of Syria, having gained some advantages in Judea against Aristobulus (who had been Ad Quint. Fr. ii. 8. dethroned by Pompey, and carried prisoner to Rome, but had thence made his escape). sent public letters to the Senate, to give an account of his victory, and to beg the decree of a Thanksgiving for it. His friends took the opportunity of moving the affair in Cicero's absence, from whose authority they apprehended some obstruction; but the Senate, in a full House, slighted Gabinus's letters, and rejected his suit: An affront which had never been offered before to any Proconsul. Cicero was infinitely delighted with it, calls the resolution divine, and was doubly pleased for its being the free and genuine judgment of the Senate, without any struggle or influence on his part.——

Many prodigies were reported to have happened about this time in the Midd. p. 454, 455.
 neighbourhood of Rome: Horrible noises underground, with clashing of arms; and on the Alban hill, a little shrine of Juno, which stood on a table, facing the east, turned suddenly of itself towards the west. These terrors alarmed the City, and the Senate consulted the haruspices, who were the public Diviners or Prophets of the State, skilled in all the Tuscan discipline of interpreting portentous events, who gave the following answer in writing,
 "That supplications must be made to Jupiter, Saturn, Neptune, and the "other Gods: that the solemn shews and plays had been negligently exhi"bited and polluted; sacred and religious places made profane; Ambassadors

N. R. 697. "dors killed contrary to law; faith and oaths disregarded; ancient and Ref. Chr. "hidden sacrifices carelessly performed and profaned.—That the Gods 395 Conf. "gave this warning, lest, by the discord and dissension of the better sort,
 "dangers and destruction should fall upon the Senate and the chiefs of the "City; by which means the provinces would fall under the power of a "single person, their armies be beaten, great loss ensue, and honours be
 "heaped upon the unworthy and disgraced."—

One may observe from this answer, that the Diviners were under the direction of those, who endeavoured to apply the influence of religion to the cure of their civil disorders: Each party interpreted it according to their own views: Clodius took a handle from it of venting his spleen afresh against Cicero; and, calling the People together for that purpose, attempted to persuade them, "that this divine admonition was designed particularly against him, and that the article of the civil and religious places referred to the case of his house, which, after a solemn consecration to religion, was rendered again profane; charged all the displeasure of the gods to Cicero's account, who affected nothing less than a tyranny, and the oppression of their liberties."

Cicero made a reply to Clodius the next day in the Senate, where, after a short and general invective upon his profligate life, "he leaves him," DeHarusp. be says, a devoted victim to Milo, who seemed to be given to them by Respons. "heaven for the extinction of such a plague, as Scipio was for the devi. 10—18. "struction of Carthage: He declares the prodigy to be one of the most "extraordinary which had ever been reported to the Senate; but laughs
 "at the absurdity of applying any part of it to him; since his house, as "he proves at large, was more solemnly cleared from any service or rela"tion to religion than any other house in Rome by the judgment of the "Priests, the Senate, and all the orders of the City. Then running through "the several articles of the ANSWER, he shews them all to tally so exactly
 "with the notorious acts and impieties of Clodius's life, that they could "not possibly be applied to any thing else:—particularly, as to the Midd. p. "violation of faith and oaths, that it related evidently to those Judges 447. "who had absolved Clodius, as being one of the most memorable and fla-
 "grant perjuries which Rome had ever known; that the answer itself
 "suggested this interpretation, when it subjoined that ancient and occult
 "sacrifices were polluted, which could refer to nothing so properly as to
 "the rites of the Bona Dea, which were the most ancient and the most occult
 "of any in the City, celebrated with incredible secrecy to that goddess,
 "whose name it was not lawful for men to know, and with ceremonies
 "which no man ever pried into but Clodius."

Midd. p. About the middle of summer, and before the time of chusing new
 459. Consuls, which was commonly in August, the Senate began to deliberate De Prov. on the provinces which were to be assigned to them at the expiration of Conf. 8, 9, their office. The Consular provinces, about which the debate singly turned, &c. were

were the two Gauls, which Cæsar now held; Macedonia, which Piso, and Syria, which Gabinus possessed. All who spoke before Cicero, excepting Servilius, were for taking one of both the Gauls from Cæsar; which was what the Senate generally desired: But when it came to Cicero's turn, he gladly laid hold on the occasion to revenge himself on Piso and Gabinus; and exerted all his authority to get them recalled, with some marks of disgrace, and their governments assigned to the succeeding Consuls; but as for Cæsar, his opinion was, “ that his command should be continued to him till he had finished the war, which he was carrying on with such success, and settled the conquered countries.” This gave no small offence; and the Consul Philippus could not forbear interrupting and reminding him, “ that he had more reason to be angry with Cæsar than with Gabinus himself; since Cæsar was the author and raiser of all that storm which had oppressed him.” But Cicero replied, “ that, in this vote, he was not pursuing his private resentment, but the public good, which had reconciled him to Cæsar; and that he could not be an enemy to one who was deserving so well of his Country: That a year or two more would complete his conquests, and reduce all Gaul to a state of peaceful subjection: That the cause was widely different between Cæsar and the other two: That Cæsar's administration was beneficial, prosperous, glorious to the Republic; theirs scandalous, ignominious, hurtful to their subjects, and contemptible to their enemies.” —In short, he managed the debate so, that the Senate readily consented to leave Cæsar in the possession of his government, and to recall Piso from Macedonia; but Gabinus was not now recalled from Syria.

All People's eyes and inclinations began now to turn towards Cæsar, who, by the eclat of his victories^a, seemed to rival the fame of Pompey himself; and by his address and generosity gained ground upon him daily in authority and influence in public affairs. After three prosperous campaigns, he spent the winter of 697 at Luca, whither a vast concourse of all ranks resorted to him from Rome. So great was the number of Magistrates and other persons in command, who came to wait on him, that the Lictors at his gate are reckoned to have amounted to 120.

At this interview of the Triumvirs, it was privately agreed among them, that Pompey and Crassus, who were now again made friends by Cæsar, should jointly sue for the Consulship, in order to defeat the hopes and designs of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, one of the competitors, a professed enemy of the Triumvirate; who, thinking himself sure of being elected, could not forbear boasting, “ that he would effect, when Consul, what he had not been able to do when Prætor, rescind the acts of Cæsar, and recall him from his government:” For Cæsar had no sooner surrendered the Consular fasces to his successors in that Magistracy (the Consuls of ^a Cæsar, in two campaigns (those of the years 695 and 696) had carried the Roman arms triumphantly through the very heart of Gaul, from the lake of Geneva to the German ocean; and in the present year (697) had subdued the Veneti.

Y. R. 697. 695) than he was affronted and attacked by this same Domitius and C. Memmius, two of the then newly-chosen Prætors, (than whom Rome perhaps never produced two more consummate knaves,) who called in question the validity of his acts, and made several rash efforts to get them annulled by public authority.

Sueton. in Cæsar. 24.

Dio, p.
103.

Ad Quint.
Fr. ii. 6.

Pompey and Crassus, the better to conceal their design upon the Consulship, let pass the time, when, according to custom, they should have put themselves among the candidates. And, because they thought it would be difficult to carry their point in an Assembly where the Consul Marcellinus presided, they laid a scheme to hinder all elections of Magistrates during his year: Their project happened to be favoured by the Tribune C. Cato, the same who had formerly been so active in opposing the desires of Pompey with relation to the affair of King Ptolemy, and in endeavouring to get Lentulus Spintber recalled from Cilicia. Cato, to revenge himself on Marcellinus for not suffering him to hold any Assemblies of the People^o, for promulgating certain laws of his own fashion (disliked probably by the Aristocratic worthies,) would not suffer the Consuls to hold any for the choice of the Magistrates; and in this resolution he was supported by two of his colleagues, as well as by the Triumvirate^o, till the year^o expired. The government fell into an interregnum.

CHAP.

* Of the impudent wickedness of these men we shall find a notable proof in one of Cicero's letters, when we come to the year 699. Yet, unworthy and detestable as Domitius was, Cicero thinks it a most sad thing, that this illustrious noble, a Consul designed ever since he was born, should not be able at this time to obtain the Consulship. Quid enim hoc miserius, quam eum qui tot annos quos habet, designatus Consul fuerit, Consulcm fieri non posse? Ad Att. iv. 8. Dio, p. 103.

* It is likely, that the means employed by Marcellinus was to proclaim all the days on which Assemblies of the People could lawfully be held, Holidays. Crevier.

Plut. in
Pomp.

* Plutarch tells us, that the secret treaty among the Triumvirs having transpired, the partisans of the Aristocracy were filled with indignation, and that the Consul Marcellinus, to unmask Pompey, interrogated him in an Assembly of the People whether he had any intention to stand for the Consulship? Pompey answered, that perhaps he would, and perhaps he would not: But Crassus, when the same question was put to him by the Consul, answered with more temper, that he would do what should appear to him to be most for the benefit of the Republic.

Valerius Maximus writes, that when Marcellinus was one day haranguing on the danger the City was in from the power of Pompey, and found himself encouraged by a general acclamation of the People, he said to them, Cry out, Citizens, cry out while you may; for it will not be long in your power to do so with safety. Val. Max vi. 2.

He reports likewise, that Cn. Piso, a young Nobleman, who had impeached Manilius Crassus, a man of Prætorian rank, and notoriously guilty, being provoked by Pompey's protection of him, turned his attack against Pompey himself, and charged him with many crimes against the State: Being asked therefore by Pompey, why he did not chuse to impeach him rather than the criminal, he briskly replied, that if he would give bail to stand a trial, without raising a civil war, he would soon bring him before his Judges. Ibid. 4.

* It was in this year, 697, that Cicero pleaded for Cornelius Balbus and M. Cælius.

Balbus

Midd.460. Balbus was a native of Gades in Spain, of a splendid family in that City, who, for his fidelity and services to the Roman Generals in that province, and especially in the Sertorian war, had the freedom of Rome conferred upon him by Pompey, in virtue of a law, which authorized him to grant it to as many as he thought proper. But Pompey's act was now called in question, as originally null and invalid, on a pretence, that the city of Gades was not within the terms of that alliance and relation to Rome which rendered the citizens capable of that privilege. Pompey and Crassus were his advocates; and, at their desire, Cicero also, who had the third place or post of honour assigned him, to give the finishing hand to the cause. The prosecution was projected, not so much out of enmity to Balbus as to his patrons, Pompey and Cæsar, by whose favour he had acquired great wealth; being at this time General of the artillery to Cæsar, and the principal manager or steward of all his affairs. The judges gave sentence for him, and confirmed his right to the City; from which foundation he was raised afterwards by Augustus to the Consulate itself: His nephew also, young Balbus, who was made free with him at the same time, obtained the honour of a triumph for his victories over the Garamantes; and, as Pliny tells us, they were the only instances of foreigners and adopted citizens, who had ever advanced themselves to either of these honours in Rome.

Pro Balb.
1, 2, &c.

Hist. N.
vii. 43.
Ibid. v. 5.

Midd.461. Cælius was a young gentleman of Equestrian rank, of great parts and accomplishments, trained under the discipline of Cicero himself, to whose care he was committed by his father upon his first introduction into the Forum. Before he was of age to hold any Magistracy, he had distinguished himself by two public impeachments; the one of C. Antonius, Cicero's colleague in the Consulship, for the male-administration of his province of Macedonia; the other of L. Atratinus, for bribery and corruption. Atratinus's son was now revenging his father's quarrel, and accused Cælius of public violence, for being concerned in the assassination of Dio, the chief of the Alexandrian embassy; and of an attempt to poison Clodia, the sister of Clodius: He was a true libertine, and had been this lady's gallant; whose resentment, for her favours slighted by him, was the real source of all his trouble. — He was acquitted of both charges.

Vid. supr.
p. 407.

Vid. supr.
p. 472.

VOL. III.

Cicero seems to have composed a little poem Y. R. 697. about this time, in compliment to Cæsar; — — — and excuses his not sending it to Atticus, Midd.462. “because Cæsar pressed to have it, and he Ad. Att. “had reserved no copy: Though, to con- iv. 5. “felt the truth, he says, he found it very Ad Quint. “difficult to digest the meanness of recanting ii. 15. “his old principles. But adieu, says he, to “all right, true, honest counsels: It is in- “credible what perfidy there is in those who “want to be leaders; and who really would “be so, if there was any faith in them. “[He speaks of THE HONEST.] I felt “what they were to my cost, when I was “drawn in, deserted, and betrayed by them: “I resolved still to act on with them in all “things; but found them the same as before; till, by your advice, I came at last “to a better mind. You will tell me, “that you advised me indeed to act, but “not to write; it is true; but I was willing to put myself under a necessity of adhering to my new alliance [with the Triumvirs] and preclude the possibility of returning to those who, instead of pitying me, as they ought, never cease envying me. — But since those, who have no “power, will not love me, my business “is to acquire the love of those who have. “You will say, I wish that you had done “it long ago; I know you wished it; “and I was a mere ass for not minding “you.”

In this year also, Cicero wrote that celebrated letter to Luceius, in which he presses him to attempt the history of his transactions. Luceius had just finished the history of the Italic and Marian civil wars; with intent to carry it down through his own times, and, in the general relation, to include, as he had promised, a particular account of Cicero's acts: But Cicero, who was pleased with his style and manner of writing, labours in this letter to engage him to postpone the design of his continued history, and enter directly on that separate period, “from the beginning of his Consulship to his restoration, “comprehending Catiline's conspiracy and “his own exile:” And he desires this historian friend, “to allow so much to friendship and affection, as not to confine himself to the strict laws of history and the “rules of truth, but to exceed those bounds “in his praises.” Ep. Fam. lib. v. 12.

Midd.463.

3 R

A little

C H A P. IV.

POMPEY and CRASSUS are elected Consuls for the year 698. The state of King PTOLEMY's affairs at this time. CATO repulsed from the Prætorship. Provinces assigned to the Consuls, by the law of TREBONIUS, for five years. They attempt reformatiōns at home. POMPEY's theatre. PISO returns to Rome ignominiously from his government of Macedonia. CRASSUS, in spite of bad omens, embarks for Syria, (the province fallen to him by lot) even before the year of his Consulship is expired. L. DOMITIUS AHENOBARBUS and APPIUS CLAUDIUS PULCHER are elected Consuls for the year 699.

Y. R. 698.
Bef. Chr.
54-397 Conf.

Plut. in
Cat.

OF all those who had intended to present themselves candidates for the Consulship of the year 698, L. Domitius alone persisted in the purpose of entering the lists against Pompey and Crassus; and his constancy perhaps was owing to Cato's management, whose sister Porcia he had married: Cato pressed him to perseverance, by saying, that not his own elevation, but the LIBERTY^a of the Romans, was the interest in question.

Plutarch reports, that when Domitius, accompanied by Cato, went before day to the Campus Martius to solicit votes, he fell into an ambush prepared by his rivals: The slave who carried the flambeau before him was killed, and Cato wounded in the arm: The latter nevertheless exhorted Domitius to fight it out to his last breath; but the intimidated candidate thought it more prudent to go home. So that Pompey and Crassus, without further opposition, were elected Consuls^b.

Pompey, when, in concert with his two associates, he had entertained new schemes of ambition, laid aside all thoughts of obtaining for himself the commission to restore King Ptolemy; and, in appearance at least, became willing to serve Lentulus in that affair. This change of his disposition gave occasion to the two following letters from Cicero to that Proconsul. The first was probably written (if not in the end of 697) in the beginning of 698, during the Interregnum, and before the election of Pompey and Crassus to the Consulship; the second after that election.

Midd. 450.
Ad Quint.
ii. 4.
Ep. Fam.
i. 7.

A little before Cicero's return from exile, his son-in-law Piso Frugi died. Tullia, having lived a widow about two months, was married this year to Furius Crassipes; who, though little is said of him, seems to have been a Nobleman of principal rank and figure. The wedding-feast was held at Cicero's house on the sixth of April.

^a What a worthy champion this Domitius was of the laws and liberties of Rome, we shall see presently: But the villain was Cato's brother-in-law, and Cæsar's enemy: And there we find his merit.

^b This was the second time of their being Consuls: In their first Consulship they were colleagues, as now.

To Publius Lentulus, Proconsul.

“ I have received your letter, wherein you assure me, that the frequent
 * accounts I send of your affairs, together with the convincing proofs I “ have given you of my friendship, are circumstances extremely agreeable “ to you.—If you do not hear from me as frequently as you wish, it is “ solely because I dare not trust my letters to every conveyance. ———

“ It is not easy to give a satisfactory answer to your enquiry concerning “ the sincerity of your professed friends, and the disposition of others in “ general towards you. This only I will venture to say, that a certain “ party, and particularly those who have the strongest obligations, as “ well as the greatest abilities, to distinguish themselves in your service, “ look upon you with envy : That (agreeable to what I have myself ex“ perience upon a different occasion) those whom, in justice to your “ Country, you have necessarily offended, are your avowed opposers ; as “ others, whose interest and honours you have generously supported, are “ much less inclined to remember your favours than to oppose your “ glory. These are circumstances indeed which I long suspected, and have “ often intimated to you ; but of which I am now most thoroughly con“ vinced. I observed upon the same occasion, (and I believe I told you so “ in a former letter) both Hortensius and Lucullus, to be extremely in your “ interest : As among those who were in the Magistracy, Lucius Rutilius * “ appeared very sincerely and affectionately to espouse your cause. But, “ excepting the two former, I cannot name any of the Consuls who dis“ covered the least degree of friendship towards you when your affair was “ before the Senate. As for my own endeavours, they might perhaps “ be generally considered as flowing rather from those singular favours
 “ I have received at your hands, than from the uninfluenced dictates
 “ of my real sentiments. With regard to Pompey, he seldom attended
 “ the house at that season : But I must do him the justice to say, he often “ takes an opportunity, without my previously leading him into the sub“ ject, of discoursing with me concerning your affair ; as well as very wil“ lingly enters into the conversation, whenever I start it myself. Your last “ letter, I perceived, was extremely agreeable to him : And I could not “ but observe, with equal admiration and pleasure, the polite and most “ judicious manner in which you addressed him. Before he received this “ Letter he seemed a little inclined to suspect, that the notion, which some “ had entertained, of his inclination to be your competitor, had alienated “ you from him. But you have now wholly fixed that excellent man in “ your interest ; who in truth had all the antecedent reasons for being so,
 “ that an uninterrupted series of the highest services could possibly give

* Tribune
in 697.
Pigh.

* Dr. Middleton dates this letter in 697, Mr. Melmoth in 698. If this was written in 697, it would seem to have been in December, after the Tribuneship of Rutilius was expired.

Y.R. 693. " him¹. I must confess he always appeared to me, even when the con" duct of Caninius had raised the strongest suspicions of the contrary^c,
 " to favour your interest: But I can now assure you, that I found him,
 " after he had perused your letter, intirely disposed to promote whatever " may contribute either to your interest or your honour. You may con" sider then what I am going to offer as his immediate sentiments and ad" vice: As indeed it is the result of frequent consultations which we have " held together.

" We are of opinion, that it may be proper for you to consider, whe" ther any advantages may be derived from your being in possession of " Cilicia and Cyprus. For if there should appear a sufficient probability " of being able to make yourself master of Alexandria and Egypt, we " think it equally for your honour, and that of the Republic, to march
 " thither with your army, supported by your fleet^d; having first left the " King at Ptolemais, or some other convenient place in that neighbourhood.
 " By these means, when you shall have quieted the disturbances in Alexan- " dria, and secured it by a proper number of forces, Ptolemy may safely " take possession of his kingdom. Thus he will be restored by you, as the " Senate had once decreed: And restored too without an army, agreeably to
 " the sentiments of those who insist upon observing the injunctions of the Oracle.
 " We are the rather confirmed in recommending this measure, as there is " no decree of the Senate subsisting, which particularly prohibits you from " replacing Ptolemy on his throne. As to the order, which absolutely " forbids all assistance whatever to be given to him, you know it was not

Vid. supr.
 p. 463.

^d Lentulus, during his Consulate, had proposed and carried that law in favour of Pompey, by which he was commissioned to provide corn in a time of scarcity, a commission which in effect invested him with the whole power of the Roman empire.

Melm.
 p. 95.

" It was an usual artifice with Pompey
 " to employ his friends in soliciting those ho" nours in his behalf, to which he affected to " appear himself perfectly indifferent, or even " averse. This was his policy in the present " instance: And at the same time that he pre" tended to serve Lentulus in this affair, his
 " creature Caninius, a Tribune of the People,
 " was practising every stratagem to procure
 " the commission for Pompey — But when
 " Pompey found that this was impracticable,
 " he pretended a friendship for Lentulus, and
 " joined with Cicero in giving the advice
 " which makes a great part of this letter."

Melm.
 p. 96.

^e It is very remarkable, that "Cicero makes
 " the very measures, which he here so strong" ly recommends to Lentulus, an article of his " charge against Antony. For when the Senate,

" after various debates, had resolved entirely
 " to drop the affair of the King's restoration,
 " Ptolemy applied himself to Gabinus, Pro-
 " consul of Syria, who, upon the promise of " ten thousand talents, and at the recommen" dation of Pompey, boldly undertook and
 " effected his restoration, without being au" thorised by any legal commission for that " purpose: And it was by the persuasion of " Antony, who commanded the Roman cavalry,
 " that Gabinus engaged in that enterprise.
 " This affords a topic of great indignation
 " in one of the Philippics; and Cicero there
 " speaks of this transaction as a most impu-
 " dent violation of all authority, both sacred
 " and civil: Inde iter (say, he) Alexandriam
 " contra Senatus auctoritatem, contra Repub-
 " licam & religiones. Philip. ii. 19. But " what opinion must every unprejudiced rea" der conceive of our author, when he finds
 " him condemning and approving the same
 " transactions, and advising his friends to " pursue a step which he afterwards publicly
 " and justly reproached in his adversary?"

" only

“ only protest against, when it was voted, but is generally looked upon “ rather as the warm dictates of an exasperated faction, than as having “ the full authority of a decree of the Senate. However, we deem it ne“ cessary to add, that we are sensible the world will judge of the propriety “ of this scheme entirely by the event. Should it succeed as we wish,
 “ your policy and resolution will universally be applauded: On the “ other hand, should it miscarry, it will undoubtedly be condemned as “ an action of ill-considered and unwarrantable ambition. How far this “ enterprize may be practicable, you, who are situated almost within “ view of Egypt, are the most competent judge. If therefore you are “ well satisfied of being able to render yourself master of that kingdom, “ we are clearly of opinion you should not delay your march one moment:
 “ But if you are doubtful of the success, it is our advice that you by no “ means make the attempt. This I will venture to assure you, that,
 “ should you execute this project in the manner we wish, there will be a “ very considerable party to give it applause, even during your absence;
 “ as all Rome will unite in the same approbation, the moment you shall re“ turn against us. Nevertheless I am persuaded, if this scheme should not “ take the desired effect, it may be attended with very disagreeable conse“ quences to yourself; not only upon account of that order of the Senate, “ which I just now mentioned, but likewise in regard to the Oracle. When “ therefore I recommend such measures as you shall have full assurance “ will terminate in your glory, I must at the same time strongly dissuade “ you from engaging in them, if you should have the least reason to “ apprehend an opposition. For (I repeated it again) the world will be “ determined in their opinion of this whole transaction, not as it is reason“ able, but as it shall be successful. If the method here proposed should “ appear too dangerous to be hazarded in your own person, we think it “ may at least be adviseable to assist the King with a number of your forces, “ provided he shall give sufficient security to your friends in the province, “ for repaying them the money they have advanced in support of his cause.
 “ And the circumstances and situation of your government render it ex“ tremely easy either to promote or obstruct his restoration, as you shall “ see proper. After all, you are the best judge what method will be most “ expedient to pursue: I thought it my part, however, to inform you of “ these our concurrent sentiments.” [N. B. Lentulus, wisely judging the “ affair too hazardous for one of his dignity and fortunes, left it to a man of a “ more desperate character, Gabinius.]

“ You congratulate me on the present situation of my affairs in general,
 “ and particularly on the friendship of Milo, together with the vain
 “ and ineffectual schemes of the worthless Clodius. It is no wonder “ you should rejoice in these the generous effects of your own amicable “ offices. But, to say truth, such an incredible perverseness (not to give “ it a more severe appellation) prevails amongst a certain party, that they “ rather

Y. R. 698.
 Bef. Chr.
 54.
 397 Conf.

Y. R. 698.
Bef. Chr.

54-
397 Conf.

“ rather chuse to alienate me by their jealousies from the common cause,
“ than to retain me in that interest by their favour and encouragement¹.
“ I will own to you, their malice has almost driven me from those prin“ ciples which I have so long and so invariably pursued. At least, if they “ have not provoked me so far, as to make me forget the dignity of my “ character, they have taught me that it is high time I should act with a “ view likewise to my own safety. I might, consistently with the highest “ views of patriotism, reconcile both these distinct ends, were there any “ honour or fortitude in those of Consular rank [the venerable bench of “ Consulars.] But such a meanness of spirit in general prevails among “ them, that, instead of applauding the resolutions with which my actions “ have been ever uniformly directed in the cause of the Commonwealth, “ they look with envy upon those dignities to which my public services “ have advanced me. I the rather mention this, as it is to you that I am “ principally indebted, not only for the happiness of being restored to my “ Country, but almost for my very first successful steps in the paths of pa“ triotism and of glory.—

“ As to your enquiry concerning the situation of public affairs, there “ are great divisions amongst us: But the zeal and prudence of the respec“ tive parties are by no means equal. Those who enjoy the largest “ share of wealth and power have gained a superiority of credit likewise
“ by the folly and instability of their antagonists; they have obtained “ from the Senate, with very little opposition, what they had no hopes “ of receiving even from the People, without raising great distur“ ances. Accordingly the House has voted Cæsar a sum of money for “ the payment of his army, together with a power of nominating ten “ Lieutenants: As they have also, without the least difficulty, dispensed
“ with the *Sempronian law*² for appointing him a successor¹. [—Et sibi

Melm.

¹ Cicero at this time was falling into the measures of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus; measures which he thought to be contrary to the true interest of his country: He endeavours here therefore to palliate, as well as he can, this unworthy conduct: But as he enters more fully into the motives of it in Ep. Fam. lib. i. 9. the reader is referred to that epistle, which will be presently inserted.

² What Cicero here means by saying the Senate had dispensed with the Sempronian law for appointing a successor to Cæsar, I confess I understand not. The government of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum had been granted to Cæsar, at the motion of the Tribune Pulchellus, by a law of the People, for the term of five

¹ Vid. sup.

p. 415.

Plut. in
Cæf.

years¹. It would seem therefore, that the Senate could have no right, in virtue of the Sempronian law, or any other law, to appoint him a successor before the expiration of that term.

¹ — “ Cicero was the chief adviser and promoter of these very measures, which he here condones. If this were a fact which stood upon the credit of historians, the passage before us would strongly incline one to suspect that they had misrepresented the truth. But we have a testimony to produce, which, though of undoubted authority, is the last one should have expected in the case: For it is the testimony of Cicero himself. In a speech which he pronounced at the bar, either a little before or soon after the date of this letter, he mentions each of these particular grants, which he enumerates to Lentulus, and then adds: Hæc sunt sententiarum principis et auctor sui. Orat. pro Balb. 27.

“ pendium

pendium Cæsari decretum est, et decem legati; et ne lege Sempronia succederetur, facile perfectum est. Y. R. 693. Bef. Chr.

" I do but slightly touch upon these particulars, as I cannot reflect on " our affairs with any satisfaction. However I mention them as suggest" ing an useful caution to both of us, to preserve a proper poise between our " interest and our honour, and not to advance one by an undue depression of the " other. A maxim this, which I have learned, not so much from my fa" vourite philosophy, as from sad experience; and which I would recom" mend to you, ere you are taught it by the same unpleasing method of " conviction."——

To the same.

" Marcus Platorius will fully inform you of the promises we have re" ceived from Pompey, together with every thing that has hitherto been " attempted or affected in your favour. He was not only present indeed,
 " but a principal agent throughout the whole proceedings; as he acted
 " in every article of your concerns agreeably to what might be expected " from a judicious, vigilant, and an affectionate friend. To him like" wise I must refer you for an account of public affairs; as I know not " well what to say of them myself. Thus much, however, I can assure " you, that they are in the hands (and in the hands they are likely to re" main) of your professed friends¹. As for myself, both gratitude and " prudence, together with your particular advice, have determined me,
 " as they ought, to join in *his*² interest, whom you were formerly desirous " of associating with you in mine. You are sensible, nevertheless, how " difficult it is to renounce our old and habitual notions of politics; espe- " cially under a full persuasion of their rectitude. However, I conform
 " myself to his system, since I cannot with any decency oppose him:
 " And, whatever some may perhaps imagine, I am by no means acting " in this a counterfeit part. The truth of it is, Pompey has gained such " an absolute possession of my esteem, that I begin to look upon every thing as
 " just and reasonable which falls in with his interest or inclination. I " should think too it would be no imprudent resolution, even in his ad" versaries themselves, to desist from an opposition to which they are evi" dently unequal. In the mean time, I have the satisfaction to find the " world in general agreed, that my character requires I should support, or " at least not obstruct, the measures of Pompey: Whilst some are even of " opinion, I may reasonably retire from all public business to my favou" rite pursuits of a literary kind. And, indeed, were I not prevented by " my friendship to Pompey, I should most certainly adopt this latter " scheme, as of all others the most suitable to my inclinations. For I can " now no longer maintain that dignity in the Senate, and that freedom

Lib. i. Ep.
 8. Ed.
 Græv.
 B. ii. Let.
 4. Melm.

¹ Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus.

² Pompey.

" in

Y. R. 698. " in the Commonwealth, which was the single motive of my ambition, Bef. Cmr. " and the sole end I proposed to myself in all my labours: A misfortune, 54-397 Conf. " however, which is not peculiar to myself, but extends to every Roman
 " in general. In a word, I am under the sad necessity, either of tamely " submitting to the sentiments of those few who lead the Republic, or of " imprudently joining in a weak and fruitless opposition". I the rather " mention this, that you may deliberate, before your return amongst us,
 " what part it may be advisable for you to act in the present conjuncture.
 " To speak freely, the measures both of those of Senatorian and Equestrian
 " rank, and indeed the whole system of the Commonwealth in general, are " totally changed. All therefore that I have now to wish, is the prefer" vation of the public tranquillity; which those who are in the administra" tion seem to give us a prospect of enjoying, if a certain party could be " prevailed upon to submit with less impatience to their power. As to " any hopes of supporting in the Senate that true Consular character of a " firm and inflexible patriot, it is in vain now to expect it: Every means
 " for that purpose is totally lost, by the mistaken conduct of those who " disobliged Pompey", and dissolved that strong union which subsisted be" tween the Senate and the Equestrian order.
 " But to return to what more immediately relates to your own private " affairs:—Pompey is extremely your friend: And, by all that I can " observe, you may obtain any thing you shall desire during his Consul-
 " ship°. At least I shall solicit him very strenuously for that purpose: As " you may rely on my most active offices in every instance where you are " concerned. I am well persuaded my assiduity on this occasion will not " be disagreeable to him: On the contrary, he will receive it with plea" sure, were it for no other reason than as affording him a proof of my " grateful disposition. In the mean time I intreat you to believe, that " whatever bears the least connection with your interest, is of more im" portance to me than my own. From these sentiments it is that I des" pair, not only of being able to return, but, even sufficiently to acknow" ledge, the infinite obligations I owe you. Though at the same time I " am conscious of having exerted, on all occasions, the most unwearied en" deavours in your service.

Vid. supr.
 p. 397, &
 394-

Melm. p.
 213.

" A determined patriot could not have been reduced to the alternatives which Cicero here mentions, as there was a third expedient, which every man of strict political integrity, who dared to act up to his principles, would undoubtedly have embraced. An honest Physician (says Sir William Temple) is excused for leaving his patient when he finds the disease grown desperate, and can, by his attendance, expect only to receive his own fees, without any hopes or appearance of deserving them. Our Author, in one of his orations, mentions it to the immortal honour of the celebrated Metellus, that de civitate decedere quam de sententia maluit: And he who is actuated by the same sublime patriotism, will never find himself under the poor necessity of justifying wrong measures by the impossibility of enforcing right ones.

" Cato, Metellus, Celer, Lucullus, and others, had opposed Pompey's desire of having his acts in Asia confirmed by the Senate.

" Pompey and Crassus were at this time Consuls.

Vid. supr.
 p. 93.

“ It is rumoured here, that you have obtained a compleat victory * : Y. R. 698.
 “ And we impatiently expect an express with the confirmation of this Bef. Chr.
 “ agreeable news. I have already talked with Pompey upon this subject : 54.
 “ And, as soon as your courier arrives, I shall employ my utmost dili- 397 Conf.
 “ gence in convening the Senate. In fine, were I to perform much more
 “ for your interest than lies within the narrow compass of my present “ power, I should still think I had fallen far short of what you have a right “ to expect. Farewell.

DURING the continuance of the tumults occasioned by the election of new Consuls, Cicero retired into the country to one of his villas on the delightful shore of Baiæ, the chief place of resort and pleasure for the great and rich. Pompey came thither in the month of April, and no sooner arrived, than he sent his compliments to Cicero ; and he spent his whole Ad Att. time with him : They had much discourse on public affairs, in which Pompey vi. 10. expressed great uneasiness, and owned himself dissatisfied with his own part in them : But Cicero, in his account of the conversation, intimates some Ibid. 9. suspicion of his sincerity. — In the same letter he mentions a current report Midd. at Puteoli, that King Ptolemy was restored, and desires to know what account 469. they had of it at Rome. The report was very true : For Gabinus, tempted by Ptolemy's gold, and the plunder of Ægypt, and encouraged Dio, lib. also, as some write, by Pompey himself, undertook to replace him on the xxxix. p. throne with his Syrian army[†] ; which he executed with a high hand and the 116. &c. destruction of all the King's enemies, in open defiance of the authority of the Senate,

* Ep. Fam. i. 9.

† By a posterior * letter from Cicero to Len- tulus it appears, that this Proconsul was saluted Imperator by his soldiers : It was probably for the victory here mentioned : But against what power the battle was fought is no where said.

† Vid. sup. p. 269 & 395. note (a).

† Scaurus, whom Pompey left in Syria †, did nothing there to gain him much honour. Neither did Philippus nor Marcellinus, who had the province of Syria successively after Scaurus, distinguish themselves by any considerable exploits. The incursions and depredations of the Arabs, whom those commanders could not totally suppress, served for a pretext to Clodius to make Syria a Consular province, and he recompensed Gabinus with it, who, during his Consulship, had so well served him in his attack upon Cicero.

Supra,

p. 261,

267, 269.

Judæa, dependent on the government of Syria, was agitated by great commotions when Gabinus arrived there. It has been mentioned that Pompey decided the quarrel between the two brothers, Hyrcaus and Aristobulus, in Vol. III.

favour of the former, to whom he gave the office of High-Priest, and the authority of command, but without the diadem ; and that he carried away Aristobulus, with his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, and two daughters, prisoners. Alexander made his escape on the road, returned into Judæa, and after concealing himself some time, got together a sufficient number of his father's party to dispossess Hyrcaus. He thought likewise of fortifying himself against the power of the Romans, by building the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had thrown down.

Gabinus quickly reduced Alexander to sue for favour ; nor did he refuse him his life and liberty. But though he brought back Hyrcaus to Jerusalem, and put him again in possession of the High-Priesthood, he gave a new form to the government of the nation, Jos. Antiq. making it Aristocratical. He divided all the l. iv. 10. country into five provinces, and in each of & de Bell. these created a Sovereign Council. Jud. i. 6.

Y. R. 698. Senate and the direction of the Sibyl. This made a great noise at Rome ;
 Bef. Chr. and irritated the People to such a degree, that they resolved to make him 397 Conf. feel their displeasure for it very severely at his return.

— Cicero staid in the country till the beginning of May, much out of Midd. humour, and disgusted both with the Republic and himself. Atticus's
 467. constant advice to him was, to consult his safety and interest, by uniting him- self with the men of power ; and they, on their part, were as constantly inviting him to it, by all possible assurances of their affection : But in his Ad Ant. answers to Atticus he observes, “ that their two cases were very different ;
 iv. 6. “ that Atticus, having no peculiar character, suffered no peculiar in-

V. d. supr. It was on his pacification of Judea, that
 p. 485. Gabinus made application to the Senate to be honoured with a public thanksgiving, called supplicationes, and met with a refusal.

He was preparing to carry the war into the country of the Arabs, when the hopes of a richer booty than he could find among them, made him turn towards Parthia.

Dio, lib. Phraates, King of Parthia, had been murxxxix. dered by his own sons, Orodes and Mitridates, App. in who afterwards contended with one another
 Parth. & for the crown. Mitridates, finding himself
 Syr. the weaker, had recourse to Gabinus. He came Plut. in to the Roman camp, accompanied by Orsanes, Craff. & the most illustrious of the Parthian nobles ;
 in Anton. and by presents and promises he engaged the Proconsul to undertake his cause : But when Gabinus had passed the Euphrates with his army, the prospect of a yet richer prey, and more easy to be acquired, brought him quickly back again. For Ptolemy Auletes came to him with recommendatory letters from Pom- pey, and with a promise from himself of ten thousand talents, on condition that he would replace him on the throne of Egypt. The greater part of the Roman officers did not approve of the enterprize, as being prohibited by a decree of the Senate, and the Oracle of the Sibyl. But Marc Antony [the future Triumvir] who commanded the cavalry, being gained by Ptolemy, and not being religiously scrupulous, counselled and determined Gabinus to the undertaking.

V. d. supr. After the death of Seleucus Cybiosactes,
 p. 471. whom his Queen Berenice put to death, as has note (m) been before mentioned, Archelaus (the son of that Archelaus who had commanded Mi- tridates's army, but pretending to be that King's son) offered himself to the Alexan- drians to be their King, and was accepted of by them. The only difficulty was how to get away from the Roman army, which he had joined, with the intention of accompanying Gabinus into Parthia ; for Gabinus, having been informed of what was in agitation, kept a watch upon him. However, he made his escape ; and, if we may believe Dio, by connivance of the Roman commander, who was willing that Egypt, by possessing an able General, might be in a condition to make the greater resistance, and thereby furnish him with a pretence to raise the price of his services. Archelaus came to Alexandria, married Queen Berenice, was recognized King, and made preparations to defend his crown.

On Gabinus's arrival on the borders of Egypt, he detached Antony with the horse to seize the passes, and open the way for the army to follow. Antony was greatly assisted by Antipater the Idumean, who not only furnished him with money, arms, and provisions, but made the conquest of Pelusium *, the key of Egypt on that side, easy to him, by gaining the Jews, who were settled in the neighbourhood of it †. The Proconsul arrived at this place, entered Egypt with all his forces, fought several battles, and at length, by the death of Archelaus, who was killed in the last action, remained master of Alexandria, and the whole kingdom of Egypt, which he surrendered to Ptolemy. Antony caused funeral honours to be performed for Archelaus : But the King put his own daughter, Queen Bere- nice, to death ; as also the richest of the Alex- andrians, that with their spoils he might be the better able to satisfy the engagements he had entered into with Gabinus.

* Darietta.

† They had here a Temple, built by Osiris, after the model of that at Jerusalem.

“ dignity ;

“ dignity ; nothing but what was common to all the Citizens ; whereas “ his own condition was such, that if he spoke what he ought to do, he “ should be looked upon as a madman ; if what was useful only to him“ self, as a slave ; if nothing at all, as quite oppressed and subdued :
 “ That his uneasiness was the greater, because he could not shew it with“ out being thought ungrateful. — Shall I withdraw myself then, says he,
 “ from business, and retire to the port of ease ? That will not be allowed “ me. Shall I follow these leaders to the wars, and, after having refused “ a command, submit to be commanded ? I will do so ; for I see that “ it is your advice, and wish that I had always followed it. Or shall I “ resume my post, and enter again into affairs ? I cannot persuade myself “ to that, but begin to think Philoxenus in the right, who chose to be “ carried back to prison, rather than commend the tyrant’s verses. This “ is what I am now meditating, to declare my dislike at least of what they “ are doing.”

Y. R. 698.
 B. f. Chr.
 54.
 397 Conf.

Diod. Sic.
 l. xv.
 p. 331.

The City continued, for a great part of this summer, without its inferior annual Magistrates : For the elections, which had been postponed from the last year, were still kept off by the Consuls till they could settle them to their minds, which they effected at last, excepting in the case of two Tribunes. But the most remarkable repulse was of M. Cato from the Prætorship : For the Consuls, apprehending the trouble which in that office he might give them, resolved to disappoint him, if possible : And, in order to secure his competitors from impeachments for bribery, engaged the Senate to decree, that the new Prætors should enter upon their office without an interval of sixty days between the nomination and the taking possession ; an interval usually allowed for examining whether bribery had been practised in the election, and for prosecuting the guilty. The pretence of this decree was, that, so much of the year being spent, the whole would pass without any Prætors at all, if a liberty of impeaching was allowed. “ From this moment, says Cicero, they have given the exclu- “ sion to Cato, and, being masters of all, resolve that all the world shall “ know it.”

Midd.
 p. 476.

Plut. in Cat.

Ad Quint.
 ii. 9.

The first century, without a bribe, gave their votes for Cato. Pompey hereupon pretended that he saw something inauspicious in the Heavens, and broke up the Assembly. The two Consuls afterwards bestirred themselves so successfully, as to get Cato excluded, and Vatinius chosen, who had been repulsed the year before with disgrace from the Ædileship.

Plut. in
 Cat. & in Pomp.

Val. Max.
 vii. 5.

In the Assemblies for the election of Ædiles, the conflict between the contending parties proved to be a bloody one. It is said, that Pompey’s robe was stained with the blood of some that were slain near him ; and that sending it home, when they had brought him another, his wife was so frightened at the sight of it, that she miscarried.

Plut. in
 Pomp.

When all the Magistrates were chosen, the Tribune Trebonius proposed to the People a law for the assignment of provinces to the Consuls

Dio,
 l. xxxix.
 p. 109.
 for

Y. R. 693. for the term of five years, with the power of raising what forces they thought fit. Pompey took upon himself to propose a law in favour of Cæsar, that, after the expiration of the five years which had been already granted him, he should hold the government of the Gauls for five years more. This law was opposed by the generality of the Senate, and above all by Cato, Favonius (his great admirer and imitator) and two of the Tribunes, C. Ateius Capito, and P. Aquilius Gallus: But the superior force of the Consuls and the other Tribunes prevailed.

The Consuls applied themselves, in the beginning of their administration, to the work of reformation. With a view to remedy the most scandalous practice of corruption in judiciary affairs, they made several new laws, and with more rigorous penalties than those already denounced; and they ordained, that the Judges should be taken from the richest of the Citizens; imagining, doubtless, that poverty had induced some Judges to suffer themselves to be gained by presents: But could a strict regard to justice be with more reason expected from those who were become rich by all sorts of crimes? The Consuls prepared likewise certain sumptuary * laws. What animated their zeal in this particular, was perhaps the excessive luxury in which their principal adversaries lived, the chiefs of the Aristocratic faction. Hortensius did not conceal his taste, but took upon him boldly to defend the excess in question, by calling it magnificence and nobleness becoming the grandeur of the Commonwealth. Notwithstanding this spirit of reformation, which animated the Consuls, Pompey transgressed the ancient discipline by the construction, at his own expence, of a permanent theatre: For, till that time, there had never been any theatre built in Rome to continue longer than while the shews lasted that were to be then exhibited.

It

Midd. 473. Pompey's theatre is much celebrated by the Plin. Hist. ancients for its grandeur and magnificence:
vii. 3. The plan was taken from the theatre of Mytilene, but greatly enlarged, so as to receive commodiously forty thousand people. It was surrounded by a portico, to shelter the company in bad weather, and had a curia or senate-house annexed to it; with a basilica also, or grand hall, proper for the sitting of Judges, or any other public business: which were all finished at Pompey's cost, and adorned with a great number of images of men and women, famed for something very remarkable or prodigious in their lives and characters. Atticus undertook the care of placing all these statues; for which Pompey charged Cicero with his thanks to him. What made this fabric the more surprizing and splendid, was a beautiful temple, erected at one end of it to Venus, the Conqueress; and so contrived, that the seats of the theatre might serve as stairs to the temple. This was designed, it is said, to avoid the reproach of making so vast an expence for Dio, the mere use of luxury; the temple being so placed, p. 107.

that those who came to the shews might seem to Plut. in come to worship the Goddess. At the solemnity Pomp-of this dedication, Pompey entertained the People with the most magnificent shews, which had ever been exhibited in Rome: In the theatre, were stage-plays, prizes of music, wrestlings, and all kinds of bodily exercise: In the circus, the horse-races, and huntings of wild beasts for five days successively, in which five hundred lions were killed; on the last day, twenty elephants; whose lamentable howlings when mortally wounded, raised such a commiseration in the multitude, from a vulgar notion of their great sense and love to man, that it destroyed the whole diversion of the shews, and drew curses upon Pompey himself for being the author of so much cruelty. So true De Off. it is, what Cicero observes of this kind of pro- ii. 16.
digality, that there is no real dignity or lasting honour in it; that it satiates while it pleases,
and

Ad Art.
iv. 9.
A. Gell.
x. 1.
Vid Tert.
de Spectac.
Plin.
l. viii. 7.

It has been mentioned, that a decree of the Senate had passed for recalling Piso from his government of Macedonia. He returned to Rome about this time, after an inglorious administration of a province, whence no Consular Senator had ever returned but to triumph. For though, on account of some trifling advantage in the field, he had procured himself to be saluted Emperor by his army, yet the occasion was so contemptible, that he durst not send any letters upon it to the Senate : but, after oppressing the subjects, plundering the allies, and losing the best part of his troops against the neighbouring barbarians, who invaded and laid waste the country, he ran away in disguise from a mutiny of the soldiers, whom he disbanded at last without their pay. When he arrived at Rome, he stripped his fasces of their laurels, and entered the City obscurely and ignominiously, without any other attendance than his own retinue. On his first appearance in public, trusting to the authority of his son-in-law Cæsar, he had the hardiness to attack Cicero, and complain to the Senate of his injurious treatment of him : But when he began to reproach him with the disgrace of his exile, he was interrupted by a loud and general clamour of the Assembly.

Y.R. 698.
Supra,
p. 487.
Midd. 470.
In Pison.
16, &c.

The Consuls having drawn lots for the provinces assigned them by the law of Trebonius, Syria fell to Crassus, agreeably to his wishes ; Spain to Pompey, who was no less pleased with his fortune, having no mind to a command that would carry him far out of the way. His scheme was constantly to conduct the affairs of the City ; and this scheme he pursued so faithfully, that for the six years, during which he was Proconsul of Spain, he never set foot in his province, but governed it by his Lieutenants ; a thing without example in the Commonwealth : But the superintendence of provisions, with which he was charged, furnished him with a specious pretence to continue at Rome.

Dio. Plut. in Crass. &
in Pomp.

As for Crassus, whose heart was now fixed on the imagined boundless wealth of Partbia, he was in such haste to set forward on his Eastern expedition, that he left Rome above two months before the expiration of his Consulship : But his eagerness to involve the Republic in a desperate war, for which the Partbians had given no pretext, was generally detested.

Midd.
p. 478.

and is forgotten as soon as it is over. It gives us, however, a genuine idea of the wealth and grandeur of those principal subjects of Rome, who, from their private revenues, could raise such noble buildings, and provide such shows, from the several quarters of the world, which no Monarch on earth is now able to exhibit.

Among other things with which he upbraided Cicero, he told him, that it was not any envy for what he had done, but the vanity of what he had said, which had driven him into exile ; and that a single verse of his,

Cedant arma Togæ, concedat laurea linguæ. was the cause of all his calamity ; by provoking Pompey to make him feel how much the power of the General was superior to that of the Orator : He put him in mind also, that it was mean and ungenerous to exert his spleen only against such whom he contemned, without daring to meddle with those who had more power, and where his resentment was more due. Cicero made a reply to him upon the spot, in an invective speech, the severest perhaps that ever was spoken by any man, on the person, the parts, the whole life and conduct of Piso.

The

Y. R. 698 The Tribune Ateius declared it impious, and prohibited by all the auspices :
 Plut. in
 Crass. And when he found Crassus determined to march, he waited for him at the gates of the City, and having there ready a kind of chafing-dish, with fire in it, he threw thereon perfumes, and poured libations : and invoking certain Gods with frightful names, devoted him, as he prayed by, to destruction¹.

Midd 479. Crassus was desirous, before he left Rome, to be reconciled to Cicero : They had never been real friends, but generally opposite in party ; and Cicero's early engagements with Pompey kept him of course at a distance from Crassus : Their coldness was still increased on account of Catiline's plot, of which when Crassus was, by some, strongly suspected, he charged Cicero with being the author of that suspicion : They carried it however on both sides with much decency, out of regard to Crassus's son, Publius, a professed admirer and disciple of Cicero ; till an accidental debate in the Senate blew up their secret grudges into an open quarrel. The debate was upon Gabinus, whose conduct in relation to King Ptolemy, Crassus undertook to defend, and, in that defence, made many severe reflections upon Cicero ; who replied with no less acrimony, and gave a free vent to that old resentment of Crassus's many injuries, which had been gathering, he says, several years, but lain dormant so long, that he took it to be extinguished, till, from this accident, it burst out into a flame. The quarrel gave great joy to the chiefs of the Senate, who highly applauded Cicero, in hopes to embroil him with the Triumvirate : But Pompey laboured hard to make it up ; and Cæsar also, by letter, expressed his uneasiness upon it, and begged it of Cicero, as a favour, to be reconciled with Crassus : So that he could not hold out against an intercession so powerful, and so well enforced by his affection to young Crassus : Their reconciliation was confirmed by mutual professions of a

Ep. Fam.
 l. 9.

Midd 479. ¹ Ateius was afterwards turned out of the Senate by Appian, when he was Censor, for falsifying the auspices on this occasion ; but the miserable fate of Crassus supported the credit of them ; and confirmed the vulgar opinion of the inevitable force of those ancient rites, in drawing down the divine vengeance on all who presumed to contemn them. Appian was one of the Augurs, and the only one of the college who maintained the truth of their auguries, and the reality of divination ; for which he was laughed at by the rest ; who charged him also with an absurdity in the reason which he subscribed for his censure upon Ateius, viz. that he had falsified the auspices, and brought a great calamity on the Roman People : For if the auspices, they said, were false, they could not possibly have any effect, or be the cause of that calamity. But, tho' they were undoubtedly forged,

De Divin.
 l. 16.

it is certain, however, that they had a real influence on the overthrow of Crassus : For the terror of them had deeply possessed the minds of the soldiers, and made them turn every thing which they saw, or heard, to an omen of their ruin ; so that, when the enemy appeared in fight, they were struck with such a panic, that they had not courage or spirit enough left to make a tolerable resistance.

No people were ever more superstitious than the ancient Romans. When Crassus embarked his troops at Brundisium, there happened to be a man at the port who cried Figs of Cannas to sell, in Latin Cannas, a word which, by the manner of pronouncing, might be mistaken for Cave ne eas, "Beware of going." This was thought to be a warning from the Gods to Crassus not to pursue his enterprise. Cic. de Divin. xi. 40.

sincere

sincere friendship for the future ; and Crassus, to give a public testimony of it to the City, invited himself just before his departure, to sup with Cicero, who entertained him in the gardens of his son-in-law Crassipes, which were upon the banks of the Tiber, and seem to have been famous for their beauty and situation.

Y. R. 698.

Ad Quint.

iii. 7.

Ad Att.

iv. 12.

The Consuls, Pompey and Crassus, having reaped all the fruit which they had proposed from the Consulship, the securing to themselves the provinces which they wanted, were not much concerned about the choice of their successors ; so that, after postponing the election to the end of the year^a, they gave way at last to their enemy, L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, being content to have joined with him their friend, Appius Claudius Pulcher.

Midd. 484.

C H A P. V.

CICERO defends, in the Senate, the interests of CRASSUS absent, and enters into a correspondence and intimacy of friendship with CÆSAR. Unprecedented knavery of the Consuls and Consular candidates. The Tribunitian candidates do honour to CATO's virtue. CICERO defends several persons accused ; and, among the rest, VATINIUS : In justification of this, and of the whole change of his political conduct, he writes a long letter to LENTULUS SPINTHER.

CRASSUS had been gone but a very little time, when he was attacked in the Senate by his enemies : Their design was, probably, to revoke his commission^a, or at least abridge it of the power of making war upon the Parthians : But Cicero exerted himself so strenuously in his defence, that he baffled their attempts, after a warm contest with the Consuls themselves, and several of the Consular Senators. He gave Crassus an account of the debate by the following letter.

Y. R. 699.

Bef. Chr.

53.
398 Conf.

Midd. 483. ^a Cicero, being a great part of the summer of this year in the country, put the last hand to his piece on the Complut Orator. This admirable work remains entire, a standing monument of Cicero's parts and abilities ; which, while it exhibits to us the idea of a Perfect Orator, and marks out the way by which Cicero formed himself to that character, explains the reason likewise why nobody has since equalled him, or ever will, till there be found again united, what will hardly be found single in any man, the same industry, and the same parts.

He returned to Rome about the middle of November, to assist at Milo's wedding, who married Fausta, the daughter of Sylla the Dictator, a rich and noble lady, with whom, as some writers say, he found Sallust the historian in bed not long after, and had him soundly lashed, before he dismissed him.

^a Manutius is of this opinion.

Ad Att. iv. 13, & v. 8.

Y. R. 695.

Fp. Fam.
l. v. Ep. 8.
Ed. Græc.
B. vi. Let.
- Mem.

To Marcus Licinius Crassus.

" I am persuaded that all your friends have informed you of the zeal
" with which I lately both defended and promoted your dignities ; as in" deed it was too warm and too conspicuous to have been passed over in " silence. The opposition I met with from the Consuls, as well as from " several others of Consular rank, was the strongest I ever encountered :
" And you must now look upon me as your declared advocate upon all oc" casions where your glory is concerned. Thus have I abundantly compen" sated for the intermission of those good offices, which the friendship between " us had long given you a right to claim ; but which, by a variety of acci- " dents, have lately been somewhat interrupted. There never was a time, believe
" me, when I wanted an inclination to cultivate your esteem, or promote your " interest. Though, it must be owned, a certain set or men ^b, who are
" the bane of all amicable intercourse, and who envied us the mutual ho" nour that resulted from ours, have, upon some occasions, been so unhap-
" pily successful, as to create a coolness between us ^c. It has happened,
" however, (what I rather wished than expected) that I have found an " opportunity, when even your affairs were in the most prosperous train,
" of giving a public testimony, by my services to you, that I always most
" sincerely preserved the remembrance of our former amity. The truth is,
" I have approved myself your friend, not only to full conviction of your " family in particular, but of all Rome in general : In consequence of " which, that most valuable of women, your excellent wife, together with
" those illustrious models of virtue and filial piety, your two amiable
" sons, have perpetual recourse to my assistance and advice : As the whole " world is sensible, that no one is more zealously disposed to serve you than " myself.

" Your family correspondents have informed you, I imagine, of what " has hitherto passed in your affair, as well as of what is at present in " agitation. As for myself, I intreat you to do me the justice to believe,
" that it was not any sudden start of inclination, which disposed me to embrace
" this opportunity of vindicating your honour : On the contrary, it was my

^b He means, I presume, those whom he often styles THE HONEST.

Mem.

^c " How effectually soever Cicero might " have served Crassus upon the occasion to " which this letter relates, it is most certain
" his good offices did not proceed from a prin" ciple of friendship. It is extremely pro" bable indeed, that his supporting the cause
" of Crassus in the Senate is one of those in" stances of our author's subjection, of which " he complains" in some of his letters : " And " that it was entirely in compliance with the " inclinations of Cæsar and Pompey, with " whom Crassus was now united."—" It is " certain that Crassus, from the time of Cati-

" line's conspiracy, conceived a strong and " lasting aversion to our author ; as, on the " other hand, that Cicero, after the death of " Crassus, published an oration, in which he
" expressly charged him with being engaged
" in that conspiracy."

“ ambition, from the first moment I entered the Forum, to be ranked in the “ number of your friends. And I have the satisfaction to reflect, that I have “ never, from that time to this hour, failed in the highest sentiments of esteem
 “ for you^a: As I doubt not you have always retained the same affectionate “ regard for me. If the effects of this mutual disposition have been inter“ rupted by any little suspicions (for suspicions only I am very sure they “ were,) be the remembrance of them for ever blotted out of our hearts.
 “ I am persuaded indeed from those virtues which form your character,
 “ and from those which I am desirous should distinguish mine, that our “ friendly union in the present conjuncture cannot but be attended with “ equal honour to us both. What instances you may be willing to give “ me of your esteem, must be left to your own determination: But they “ will be such, I flatter myself, as may tend most to advance my dignities.
 “ For my own part, I faithfully promise the utmost exertion of my best “ services in every article wherein I can contribute to increase yours.
 “ Many, I know, will be my rivals in these amicable offices: But it is a “ contention in which all the world, I question not, and particularly your “ two sons, will acknowledge my superiority. Be assured, I love them “ both in a very uncommon degree: Though I will own Publius is my “ favourite: From his infancy he discovered a singular regard to me; as “ he particularly distinguishes me at this time with all the marks even of “ filial respect and affection.

“ Let me desire you to consider this letter, not as a strain of unmeaning “ compliment, but as a sacred and solemn covenant of friendship, which I shall “ most sincerely and religiously observe. I shall now persevere in being the “ advocate of your honours, not only from a motive of affection, but “ from a principal of constancy: And without any application on your “ part, you may depend on my embracing every opportunity, wherein “ I shall think my services may prove agreeable to your interest, or your “ inclination. Can you once doubt then, that any request to me for this “ purpose, either by yourself or your family, will meet with a most “ punctual observance? I hope therefore you will not scruple to employ me “ in all your concerns, of what nature or importance soever, as one who is “ most faithfully your friend: And that you will direct your family to apply “ to me in all their affairs of every kind, whether relating to you or to “ themselves, to their friends or their dependants. And be assured, I “ shall spare no pains to render your absence as little uneasy to them as “ possible. Farewell.”

^a What credit is it possible to give to the professions, asseverations, or even oaths, of this Saint of Dr. Middleton's canonization? In a letter to Atticus, written soon after this to Crassus, Cicero thus expresses himself concerning the latter: “ Our friend Crassus, they say, did not set out from Rome in his Gene-
 VOL. III,

“ ral's robe, with so much dignity as Paulus Æmilius heretofore, though, like him, a second “ time Consul. O the worthless man!” Crassum quidem nostrum minore dignitate aiunt profectum paludatum, quam olim æqualem L. Paulum iterum Consulem. O hominem nequam! Ad Att. iv. 13.

Y. R. 699. Cicero, whose brother Quintus was one of Cæsar's Lieutenants in Gaul, began now likewise to enter into a particular intimacy and correspondence with Cæsar. Quintus, to pay his court the better to his General, had earnestly pressed his brother to an union with Him, instead of adhering so obstinately to Pompey, who, as he tells him, was neither so sincere nor so generous a friend as Cæsar. To Cæsar therefore Cicero, not disliking the advice, wrote a letter in the familiar stile; which Cæsar answered with all imaginable kindness, and the offer of every thing in which his power could serve him.——Cicero, in his account of this letter to his brother, says, “It is kind in you, and like a brother, to press me to this friendship; though I am running that way apace myself, and shall do what often happens to travellers, who, rising later than they intended, yet, by quickening their speed, come sooner to their journey’s end, than if they had set out earlier; so I, who have overslept myself in my observance of this man, though you were frequently rousing me, will correct my past laziness, by mending my pace for the future.”——With regard to Cæsar's professions of service, he adds, “Believe me, you who know me, I have from him already, what I most value, the assurance of his affection, which I prefer to all the great things he offers me. In another letter he says [doubtless with equal sincerity,] I lay no great stress on his promises, want no farther honours, nor desire any new glory, and wish nothing more than the continuance of his esteem; yet live in such a course of ambition and fatigue, as if I were expecting what I really do not desire.”

But, though he made no use of Cæsar's generosity for himself, yet he used it freely for his friends: Cæsar nevertheless was chiding him all the while for his reservedness in asking.

Cicero had sent Cæsar a Greek poem, in three books, on the history of his Consulship, and Cæsar's judgment upon it was, that the beginning of it was as good as any thing which he had ever seen in that language; but the following lines to a certain place were not equal in accuracy and spirit. Cicero desires therefore to know of his brother, what Cæsar really thought of the whole, whether the matter or the stile displeased him; and begs that he would tell him the truth freely; since, whether Cæsar liked it or not, he should not, he says, be a jot the less pleased with himself. He began however another poem, at his brother’s earnest request, to be addressed to Cæsar; but, after some progress, was so dissatisfied with it, that he tore it: Yet, Quintus still urging, and signifying, that he had acquainted

* Particularly for Trebatius the lawyer, Orfius and Carinus. For the last of these he procured a regiment. Cicero, concerning Cæsar's kindness to his brother Quintus, writes thus to Atticus: Perſpice — cum Cæſare ſuaviſſimam conjunctionem (hæc enim me una ex naufragio tabula delectat) qui quidem Quin- tam meum, tuumque, Dii boni! quemadmodum tractat honore, dignitate, gratia! non ſecus ac ſi ego eſſem imperator. Hibernam legionem eligendi optio delata commodum, ut ad me ſcribit. Hunc tu non ames? Quem igitur iſtorum? Ad Att. iv. 18.

Cæſar

Cæsar with the design, he was obliged to resume it, and actually finished an Epic poem in honour of Cæsar! which he promises to send, as soon as he could get a proper conveyance, that it might not be lost, as Quintus's tragedy of ERIGONE was in coming from Gaul; the only thing, says he, which had not found a safe passage, since Cæsar governed that province.

Y. R. 679.

Ad Quint. l. 9.

In a letter, which Cicero wrote this summer to his brother, he tells him, that there were some hopes of an election of Magistrates, but those uncertain; some suspicion of a Dictator, yet that not more certain; a great calm in the Forum; the calm of a City, that seemed to be quieted, rather by age and decay, than concord: That his own conduct, as well in public as in private, was just what Quintus had advised, softer than the lip of his ear; and his votes in the Senate such as pleased others rather than himself——That bribery was never 'carried so high as at this time by the Consular candidates, Memmius, Cn. Domitius, Scaurus, Messala; that they were all alike; no eminence in any; for money levelled the dignity of them all: That above eighty thousand pounds was promised to the first tribe; and money grown so scarce by this profusion of it, that interest was risen from four to eight per cent.

Midd. p. 499--504. Ad Quint. ii. 15.

Add Att. iv. 15, & 18.

Memmius, and Cn. Domitius, who joined their interests, made a strange sort of contract with the Consuls, L. Domitius and Appius Claudius, which was drawn up in writing, and attested in proper form by many of their friends on both sides; by which the Consuls obliged themselves to serve them with all their power in the ensuing election; and they on their parts undertook, when elected, to procure for the Consuls what provinces they desired; and gave a bond of above three thousand pounds to provide three Augurs, who should testify, that they were present at making a law for granting them those provinces, when no such law had ever been made; and two Consular Senators, who should affirm, that they were present likewise at passing a decree of the Senate for furnishing the same provinces with arms and money, when the Senate had never been consulted about it.

* Ambitus rediv immanis. Nunquam fuit par.

Midd. p. 501.

Montesquieu, chap. x. sur les causes de la grandeur, &c.

" This detestable bargain of forging laws and decrees at pleasure, in which so many of the first rank were concerned, either as principals or witnesses, is alledged by an ingenious French writer, as a flagrant instance of that libertinism which hastened the destruction of Rome. This great Republic, of all others the most free and flourishing, owed the loss of its liberty to nothing else but a general defection of its Citizens from the probity and the discipline of their ancestors. Cicero often foretells their approaching ruin from this very cause."

I confess, I see not the propriety of these expressions, hastened the destruction of Rome, the approaching ruin of the Roman Citizens. Was not Rome already totally ruined? But by the ruin of the State Cicero seldom means any thing else but the loss of his own influence in the government. To an impartial eye, was Rome in a worse condition, were the Roman Citizens more ruined, when Julius Cæsar became their Lord and Master, than they were at this time? Cicero himself, as we shall see presently, intimates that a Dictator was really wanted; [but then he must be a Dictator, who would so regulate matters, that Cicero might resume his former dignity.]

Y. R. 699.

Dio, l.
xxxix. p.
113.
Ad Ant.
iv. 18.

Memmius, finding some reason to dislike his bargain resolved to break it, and, by Pompey's advice, gave an account of it to the Senate. Pompey was pleased with the opportunity of mortifying the Consul Domitius, and willing likewise to take some revenge on Appius, who, though his near relation, did not enter so fully as he expected into his measures. Appius never changed countenance, nor lost any credit by the discovery; but his Colleague Domitius, who affected the character of a patriot¹, was extremely discomposed; and Memmius, now grown desperate, resolved to promote the general disorder, and the creation of a Dictator.

Ad Quint.
iii. 1.

Quintus sent his brother word from Gaul, that it was reported there, that he was present at this contract: But Cicero assures him that it was false; and that the bargain was of such a nature, as Memmius had opened it to the Senate, that no honest man could have been present at it. The Senate was highly incensed; and, to check the insolence of the parties concerned, passed a decree, that their conduct should be enquired into by what they called a private or silent judgment; where the sentence was not to be declared till after the election, yet so as to make void the election of those who should be found guilty: This they resolved to execute with rigour, and made an allotment of Judges for that purpose: But some of the Tribunes were prevailed with to interpose their negative, on pretence of binding all inquisitions not specially authorized by the People.

Ad Ant.
iv. 16.Ad Quint.
iii. 2.
Ad Ant.
iv. 16.

The candidates however were all publicly impeached by different prosecutors, and the City was now in a great ferment about them; since, as Cicero says, either the men or the laws must necessarily perish; yet they will all, says he, be acquitted; for trials are now managed so corruptly, that no man will ever be condemned for the future, unless for murder. But Q. Scævola, one of the Tribunes, took a more effectual way to mortify them, by resolving to hinder any election of Consuls during his Magistracy, in which he persevered, and by his authority dissolved all the assemblies convened for that purpose. The Tribunician candidates however were remarkably modest this year: For they made an agreement among themselves, which they all confirmed by an oath, that, in prosecuting their several interests, they would submit their conduct to the judgment of Cato, and deposit four thousand pounds apiece in his hands, to be forfeited by those whom he should condemn of an irregular practice. If the election proves free, says Cicero, as it is thought it will, Cato alone can do more than all the Laws and all the Judges.

Ibid. 15.
& 16.
Ad Quint.
ii. 15.Ad Ant.
iv. 15. &
16.

A great part of this year was taken up in public trials: Suffenas and C. Cato, who had been Tribunes two years before, were tried in the beginning of July, for violence and breach of peace in their Magistracy, and both acquitted: But Proculus, one of their colleagues, was condemned for killing a Citizen in his own house: Whence we are to collect, says

Vid. supr.
p. 487, &
490.

¹ Cæsar had the honour to have this worthy patriot (Cato's friend and brother-in-law)

for his avowed enemy, as we have formerly seen.

Cicero,

Cicero, that our Areopagites value neither bribery, nor elections, nor inter-regnums, nor attempts against the State, nor the whole Republic a rush: We must not murder a man indeed in his own house, though that perhaps might be done moderately, since twenty-two acquitted Procilius, when twenty-eight condemned him.

Y. R. 699.
Bef. Chr.
53.
398 Conf.

Cicero had no concern in these trials; yet he was continually employed in others through the rest of this summer. He defended Messius, one of Caesar's Lieutenants, who came from Gaul on purpose to take his trial: Then Drusus, accused of prevaricating, or betraying a cause which he had undertaken to defend; of which he was acquitted by a majority only of four voices. After that, Vatinius, the last year's Prætor, and Æmilius Scaurus, one of the Consular candidates, accused of plundering the province of Sardinia; and about the same time likewise his old friend Cn. Plancius, who had entertained him so generously in his exile, and, being now chosen Ædile, was accused by a disappointed competitor, M. Laterensis, of bribery and corruption. All these were acquitted; but the orations for them are lost, except that for Plancius.

Ad Att.
iv. 15.
Ad Quint.
ii. 16.
Ibid. iii. 1.

The reasons which induced Cicero to defend Vatinius, who had been one of his fiercest enemies, and against whom he had made that bitter ^{} invective before mentioned, we shall find in the following letter ^{} from the Orator to his friend Lentulus; a most curious piece, where he gives us his own picture at full length as a patriot and politician. We have already had him admirably well drawn by himself as a casuist in points of religious scruple.

* Vid. sup.
P. 484.

Vid. supra,
P. 492.

To Lentulus.

“ — Though I had much rather you should gain experience by my misfortunes than your own, yet it affords me some consolation under your present disappointment¹, that you have not paid so severe a fine as I did for being taught the little dependence there is upon the professions of the world. A reflection this, which may very properly serve as an introduction to the account you require of the motive of my late transactions. You are informed then, it seems, that I am reconciled with Cæsar, and Appius: A step, you assure me, you do not disapprove. But you are at a loss to guess what reasons could induce me to appear at the trial of Vatinius, not only as an advocate, but as a witness in his favour². To set this matter in the clearest light, it will be necessary to trace

Ep. Fam.
Lib. I Ep.
ix. Ed.
Græv.
Book II.
Lett. xvii.
Melm.

^{*} N. B. This is the letter above referred to, in p. 494.

¹ In not obtaining a commission to replace Ptolemy on his throne.

Melmoth.

² A very learned and polite author, [Dr. Middleton,] whose just esteem for Cicero's writings has betrayed him perhaps into some partiality towards his actions, acknowledges that “ the defence of Vatinius gave a plausible handle for some censures upon Cicero.” The truth of it is, the censure was more than plausible: For nothing certainly could discover more meanness of spirit than thus, in compliance with those in power, not only to defend Vatinius as an advocate, but to bear public testimony likewise to his general good conduct.

“ back

Y. R. 699. " back the motives of my conduct to their original source. Let me ob-Bet. Chr. " serve then, my Lentulus, that, when I was recalled from exile by your 53.
 398 Conf. " generous offices, I considered myself as restored, not only to my friends " and to my family, but to the Commonwealth in general. And as you " had a right to the best returns of my affection and gratitude for the " distinguished part you acted in that affair, so I thought there was some" thing more than ordinary due from me to my Country, which had so " singularly co-operated with you upon this occasion. I often took an " opportunity, during your Consulate, of publicly declaring these my " sentiments in the Senate: As I always, you well know, expressed my" self to the same purpose in our private conversation. Nevertheless I had " many reasons at that time to be highly disgusted. I could not, in truth,
 " but observe the disguised malice of some, and the coolness of others,
 " when you were endeavouring to procure a decree for restoring the in" scription of that honourable monument of my public services, which " had been erected by the Senate. But it was not only in this instance,
 " that those who had many obligations to concur in your good offices
 " towards me, acted a part I had little reason to expect. They looked " indeed with much ungenerous indifference on the cruel outrage which " was offered to my brother and myself under our own roof; and the " estimate they made, in pursuance of the Senate's order, of the damages
 " I had sustained by these acts of violence, was far unequal to my " real loss. This last article of their injustice, though least indeed
 " in my concern, I could not but very sensibly feel amidst the general
 " wreck of my fortunes. But, though these mortifying marks of their " disposition towards me were much too notorious to escape my observa" tion, they could not efface the more agreeable impressions of their " former friendship. For this reason, notwithstanding those high obli" gations I had to Pompey, of which you yourself were witness, and have " often mentioned; notwithstanding also the affection and esteem which " I always entertained for him, yet I still firmly adhered to my political " principles; nor suffered these considerations of private amity to influence
 " me in favour of his public measures. Accordingly, when Vatinius
 " (who at the trial of P. Sextius was examined as a witness against him)
 " intimated that Cæsar's successes had reconciled me to his party, I told " him, in the presence of Pompey, that I preferred the fate of Bibulus,
 " unhappy as he might esteem it, to all the splendid triumphs of the most " victorious general¹. I asserted likewise upon another occasion (and " asserted too in the hearing of Pompey) that the same persons who con" fined Bibulus to his house had driven me from mine. Indeed the " whole series of those interrogatories, which I put to Vatinius at this ¹ N. B. This letter was written two years after the trial of Sextius; and perhaps Cicero never said what he here pretends to have said, " That he preferred the glory of Bibi- lus to the glory of Pompey and that of Cæsar, &c." I cannot think he had the boldness to speak so.

" trial,

“ trial, was entirely designed as an invective against his Tribunate: And “ I particularly exposed, with much freedom and indignation, his con“ tempt of the auspices, his corrupt distribution of foreign kingdoms, “ together with the rest of his violent and illegal proceedings. But it was “ not only upon this occasion that I spoke thus unreservedly: I frequently “ avowed my sentiments with the same resolute spirit in the Senate.
 “ Thus, when Marcellinus and Philippus were Consuls, I carried a mo“ tion, that the affair of the Campanian lands should be referred to the “ re-consideration of a full House on the fifteenth of May following. Vid. supra, “ Now tell me, my friend, could I possibly have made a bolder or more P. 484.
 “ formidable attack upon this party? Could I possibly have given a more “ convincing evidence that I had not departed from my old principles, not“ withstanding all I had formerly suffered for their sake? The truth of it “ is, this motion greatly exasperated not only those whom it was reasonable
 “ to expect it would offend, but others upon whom I did not imagine it “ would have had any such effect. Pompey, soon after this decree had “ passed, set forward upon his expedition into Sardinia and Africa, without “ giving me the least intimation of his being disgusted. In his way thither “ he had a conference with Cæsar at Luca, who made great complaints of “ this motion. He had before, it seems, been informed of it by Crassus
 “ at Ravenna, who took that opportunity of incensing him against me.
 “ And it appeared afterwards, that Pompey was much dissatisfied upon
 “ the same account. This I learnt from several hands, but particularly “ from my brother, who met him in Sardinia a few days after he had left “ Luca. Pompey told him he was extremely glad of that accidental inter“ view, as he wanted much to talk with him. He began with saying,
 “ that, as my brother stood engaged for my conduct, he should expect him
 “ to exert all his endeavours to influence me accordingly. Pompey then “ proceeded very warmly to remonstrate against my late motion in the “ Senate, reminding my brother of his services to us both, and particu“ larly of what had passed between them concerning Cæsar’s edicts, “ and of those assurances, he said, my brother had given him of the “ measures I would pursue with respect to that article. He added, that “ my brother himself was a witness, that the steps he had formerly taken “ for procuring my recall were with the full consent and approbation of “ Cæsar. Upon the whole therefore, he intreated him, if it were either “ not in my power or my inclination to support the interest and dignity “ of the latter, that he would at least prevail with me not to oppose them.
 “ The account which my brother gave me of this conversation, together “ with a message I had before received from Pompey by Vibullius, to

Melm.

“ This alludes to those engagements
 “ which Quintus Cicero entered into in behalf “ of his brother, in order to induce Pompey to “ favour his recall from banishment. And it “ appears by what follows, that he promised,

 “ on the part of Cicero, an unlimited resigna“ tion to the measures of that ambitious “ chief.”

Y. R. 699. " request that I would not proceed any farther in the affair of the Campa-
 Eef. Car. " nian lands till his return, threw me into a very serious train of reflec-398⁵³ Conf. " tions. I could not but think, after having performed and suffered so " much for my Country, that I might now at least be permitted to con" sider what was due to gratitude and to the honour of my brother: And,
 " as I had ever conducted myself with integrity towards the Republic, I " might be allowed, I hoped, to act the same honest part in my more " private connexion".

" During the time I was engaged in these votes, and other proceedings
 " with which Pompey appeared thus dissatisfied, I was informed of what " passed in the conversation of a set of men, whom you will now guess
 " without my naming them. This party, though they approved of my " public measures, as being agreeable to what had ever been their pro" fessed sentiments, were yet so ungenerous as to express great satisfaction
 " in believing, that my conduct would by no means please Pompey, at " the same time that it would highly exasperate Cæsar. Well might
 " I resent, indeed, so injurious a treatment; but much more when I saw " them, even before my face, maliciously encouraging and caressing my " avowed enemy:—Mine I do call him? rather let me say, an enemy to " the laws and tranquillity of his Country, and to every character of worth
 " and virtue amongst us.

" Their malevolence, however, had not the effect intended, and it could " not warm me into those transports of indignation, of which my heart " is now, indeed, no longer susceptible. On the contrary, it only induced " me to examine my situation in all its various circumstances and relations, " with the greatest coolness and impartiality: The process and result of " which I will lay before you in as few words as I am able.

" There have been times, as experience no less than history has taught me,
 " when the power of the Commonwealth was in worthless and wicked hands.
 " In such a conjuncture, no hope of interest (which I have at all times most " heartily condemned) nor fear of danger (which upon some occasions,

Melm.

" Had Cæsar and Pompey indeed been
 " never so much his real friends, no considera" tions of amity ought to have prevailed with " him to have acquiesced in a scheme which " was contrary to the sentiments of all the real
 " patriots of the Republic, and contrary like" wise to his own: A scheme which he him" self tells Atticus was formed for the destruc" tion of the Commonwealth. Ad Att. ii.
 " 17. Had he attended to the indisputable
 " maxim which he himself lays down in one " of his Philosophical Treatises, it would have " decided at once the conduct which became
 " him to observe upon an occasion where pri" vate friendship interfered with more exten" sive obligations: Hæc prima lex in amicitia

" fanciatur (says he) ut neque rogemus res tur-
 " pet, nec faciamus rogati. But the truth of it " is, private friendship was not concerned in " the case: For he well knew that neither
 " Pompey nor Cæsar had any attachments to " him of that kind. It was fear alone that " determined his resolution: And having " once already suffered in [what he called] the " cause of liberty, he did not find himself
 " disposed to be twice a martyr. The auk-
 " ward manner, however, in which he at" tempts to justify himself throughout this " letter, very evidently shews, how impossible
 " it is to bid farewell to integrity with a good
 " grace."

“ however, has influenced the greatest minds) should prevail with me to “ co-operate in their measures: No, not though I were attached to them by “ the strongest ties of friendship and gratitude. But, when a man of Pom- “ pey's distinguished character presides over the Republic, a man who has “ acquired that eminence of power and honour by the most heroic actions,
 “ and the most signal services, I could not imagine it would be imputed to me
 “ as a levity of disposition, if in some few instances I declined a little from my “ general maxims, and complied with his inclinations”. But my justification, “ I thought, would still rise in its strength, when it should be remembered “ that I favoured his credit and dignity even from the earliest part of my “ life; as I particularly promoted them in my Prætorship * and Consul- * Vid. sup.
 “ late †: When it should be remembered, that he not only assisted me p. 222.
 “ with his voice and his influence in the Senate during my adversity, but † 271.
 “ joined his counsels and his efforts with yours, for the same generous pur“ pose: In a word, when it should be remembered, that he has no other “ enemy in the whole Commonwealth except [Clodius] the man who is “ my professed adversary. In consequence of these sentiments it was ab“ solutely necessary for me, you see, to unite with Cæsar, as one who was “ joined in the same views and the same interest. His friendship likewise, “ which you are sensible my brother and I have long shared together with “ his humane and generous disposition, which I have abundantly experienced “ both by his late letters and his good offices towards me, contributed greatly “ to confirm me in these resolutions. To which I must add, that the “ Commonwealth in general seemed to be most strongly averse from giving any “ opposition to these extraordinary men; more especially after Cæsar had per“ formed such glorious exploits for the honour of his Country. But what had “ still a farther and very powerful weight in my deliberations, was Pom-“ pey's having engaged his word for me to Cæsar, as my brother had given the “ same assurances to Pompey.

“ Plato, I remember, lays it down as a maxim in his divine writings, “ that “ the people generally model their manners and their sentiments
 “ by those of the great: ” A maxim which at this juncture, I thought, “ merited my particular attention. I was convinced indeed of its truth, “ when I reflected on the vigorous resolutions which were taken in the “ Senate on the memorable nones of December: And it seemed no wonder “ so noble a spirit should appear in that Assembly, after the animating

Melm.

“ —Cicero's compliance can by no means “ be considered in the favourable light where-
 “ in he represents it; but was in reality a “ confession most injurious to his honour.—
 “ It is certain likewise, that it was not from “ any advantageous opinion of Pompey's poli“ tical character and designs that he was in“ duced to fall in with his measures. On the “ contrary, Cicero most undoubtedly had no “ esteem for him: And as to his political

VOL. III.

“ views, he saw and acknowledged, long be“ fore the date of this letter, that they were “ turned on the destruction of the Republic.
 “ Ομολογούμενος (says he in one epistle to Atti“ cus) τυραννίδα συσκευάζειν; as in another, “ written upon the breaking out of the civil “ war, he calls him hominem avoδελικωτάτον, a “ man utterly unacquainted with the arts of “ government.” Ad Att. ii. 17, viii. 26.

3 U

“ example

Y.R. 699.
 Bef. Chr.
 53.
 398 Cons.

“ example I had given them upon my first entering on the Consular office.
 “ I recollected also, that, during the whole time which intervened between “ the expiration of my Consulship and that of Cæsar and Bibulus, when I “ still retained a very considerable authority in the Senate, all the better “ part of the Republic were united in their sentiments. On the other hand, “ about the time you took possession of your government in Spain, the “ Commonwealth could not so properly be said to be under the admini“ stration of Consuls as of infamous barterers of provinces ¹, and the mean “ vassals and ministers of sedition. It was then that discord and faction “ spread through all ranks amongst us : And I was marked out as the “ victim of party and rage. In this critical season, however, not only every “ man of worth, but the greater part of the Senators, and indeed all Italy “ in general, rose up with remarkable unanimity in my cause ². What the “ event proved I forbear to mention ; as, in truth, it is to be imputed to “ a complication of errors and artifices. But this I will say, it was not “ forces, so much as leaders to conduct them, that were wanting to me “ in this crisis. I must add, that whatever censure may justly fall on “ those who refused me their assistance, most certainly they who first pro- “ mised it, and then deserted me, are not less to be blamed ³. In a word, if “ some of my friends may well be reproached for the timid though sincere “ counsels they gave me, how much more severe must their condemnation “ prove, who artfully alarmed me with their pretended fears ? Let it be “ noted at the same time to my honour, that, zealous as my fellow Citi“ zens shewed themselves to rise up in the defence of a man who had for“ merly stood forth in theirs, yet I would not suffer them to be exposed “ (unsupported as they were by those who ought to have been their pro“ tectors) to the barbarous insults of lawless banditti. On the contrary, I “ rather chose the world should judge, by the power of my friends in recal“ ling me from my exile, what their honest humanity could have effected, “ had I permitted them to have drawn their swords to prevent it.

“ You were sensible of this general zeal in my favour, when you under“ took my cause. And you not only encouraged but confirmed it by “ your influence and authority. I shall always most willingly acknow“ ledge, that you were assisted upon this occasion by some of the most

¹ Piso and Gabinus. Vid. supra, p. 428.

² It is strange, that being thus defended, he should nevertheless be banished.

Meim.

“ In this number was Pompey himself, who, though he had given Cicero the most solemn assurances that he would at the hazard of his life protect him against Clodius, yet, when afterwards our author solicited the execution of this promise, he absolutely

Vid. supr.
 P. 431.

“ refused to concern himself in the affair. Ad Att. ii. 20. x. 4. It seems altogether unac-“ countable, that Cicero should be so injudi“ cious as to touch upon a circumstance that “ destroys the whole force of his apology ; so “ far, I mean, as he intended to justify his “ conduct by his friendship to Pompey. For it “ exceeds all power of credulity to imagine, “ that he could really be influenced by a “ motive of that kind with respect to a man “ whose insincerity he had so lately and so “ severely experienced.”

“ considerable

“ considerable persons in Rome ; who, it must be owned, exerted them“ selves with much greater vigour in procuring my return, than in prevent“ ing my banishment : And had they persisted in the same resolute dispo“ sition, they might have recovered their own authority at the same time “ that they obtained my restoration. The spirits, in truth, of the Ari“ stocratical part of the Republic were at this time greatly raised and ani“ mated by the inflexible patriotism of your conduct during your Consul-“ ship, together with Pompey’s concurrence in the same measures.
 “ Cæsar likewise, when he saw the Senate distinguishing his glorious “ actions by the most singular and unprecedented honours, joined in ad“ ding weight to the authority of that Assembly. Had these happy cir“ cumstances therefore been rightly improved, it would have been im“ possible for any ill-designing Citizen to have violated the laws and liber“ ties of the Commonwealth. But let me intreat you to reflect a moment “ on the subsequent conduct of my political associates. In the first place, “ they screened from punishment that infamous intruder on the matron-“ mysteries, who shewed no more reverence for the awful ceremonies of “ the Goddess, in whose honour these secret solemnities are celebrated, “ than for the chastity of his three sisters. And thus, by preventing a “ worthy Tribune * of the People from obtaining that justice upon Clodius * “ which he endeavoured to procure, they deprived future times of a most “ salutary example of chastised sedition. Did not they suffer likewise that “ monument, that glorious monument, which was erected, not indeed “ with the spoils I had gained in foreign wars, but by the generosity of “ the Senate for my civil services ; did they not most shamefully suffer it “ to be inscribed with the name of the cruel and avowed enemy of his “ Country ? Obligated most certainly I am to them for having restored me “ to the Commonwealth : But I could wish they had conducted themselves, “ not only like physicians whose views terminate merely in the health of “ their patients, but like the Aliptæ * also, who endeavour to establish the “ spirits and vigour of those under their care. Whereas they have acted “ with regard to me, as Apelles did in relation to his celebrated picture of “ Venus ; they have finished one part of their work with great skill and ac“ curacy, but left all the rest a mere rude and imperfect sketch.
 “ In one article, however, I had the satisfaction to disappoint my “ enemies. They imagined my banishment would have wrought the “ same effect on me, which they falsely supposed a calamity of a like kind.

Y.R. 699.
 B.C. Chr.
 53.
 398 Conf.

Vid. supr.
 484 & 487.

* MULO.

* “ After the suppression of Catiline’s con“ spiracy, the Senate decreed that a temple “ should be erected to LIBERTY, as a public “ monument of their late happy deliverance.
 “ This temple was raised at the foot of Mount “ Palatine, near Cicero’s house. And as the “ inscription fixed thereon undoubtedly men“ tioned Cicero with honour, Clodius erased

“ those words, and placed his own name in “ their stead.” Melm. from Mammius.
 “ The Aliptæ were persons who prepared “ the athletic combatants by unctions, and “ other proper methods, for rendering them “ vigorous and active in their gymnastic ex“ ercises.” Melm.

Y. R. 699. " produced formerly in Quintus Metellus. This excellent person, whom
 " I look upon to have been a man of the greatest fortitude and magnani-
 " mity * of any in his time, they represented as broken and dispirited after " his return from exile. But if broken he really were, it could not be the " effect of his adversity, as it is certain he submitted to his sentence with" out the least reluctance, and lived under it, not only with indifference,
 " but with cheerfulness. The truth is, no man ever equalled him in the " strength and heroism of his mind : No, not even the celebrated Marcus
 " Scaurus * himself. Nevertheless, such as they had heard, or at least
 " chose to imagine Metellus to have been, they figured me to themselves :
 " Or, if possible indeed, even yet more abject. The reverse, however,
 " proved to be the case : and that general concern, which the whole Re" public expressed at my absence, inspired me with more vigorous spirits
 " than I had ever before enjoyed. The truth is, the sentence of banish" ment against Metellus was repealed by a law proposed only by a single " Tribune of the People : Whereas I was recalled from mine upon the " motion of the Consul himself, and by a law in which every Magistrate
 " of Rome concurred. Let me add likewise, that each order and degree in " the Commonwealth, headed by the Senate and supported by all Italy, zea-
 " lously united in one common effort for recovering me to my Country ". Yet,
 " high as these unexampled honours were, they have never elated my " heart with pride, or tempted me to assume an air which could give just " offence even to the most malevolent of my enemies. The whole of " my ambition is, not to be wanting either in advice or assistance to my " friends ; or even to those whom I have no great reason to rank in that " number : It is this, perhaps, which has given the real ground of com" plaint to those who view only the lustre of my actions, but cannot be " sensible of the pains and solicitude they cost me. But whatever the " true cause may be, the pretended one is, my having promoted the honours
 " of Cæsar : A circumstance which they interpret, it seems, as a renun" ciation of my old maxims. The genuine motives however of my con" duct in this instance are, not only what I just before mentioned, but " particularly what I hinted in the beginning of my letter, and will now " more fully explain.

" You will not find then, my friend, the Aristocratical part of the " Republic disposed to pursue the same system as when you left them :
 " That system, I mean, which I endeavoured to establish when I was " Consul, and which, though afterwards occasionally interrupted, and
 " at length entirely overthrown, was again fully restored during your " administration. It is now, however, totally abandoned by those who " ought most strenuously to have supported it. I do not assert this upon

* As infamous a Hypocrite and Traitor as ever lived. Vid. supra, p. 20 and 23.

* If this was the case ; Whom had his friends to struggle with, in order to obtain his restoration.

" the

“ the credit only of appearances, in which it is exceedingly easy to dis- Y. R. 699.
 “ semble : I speak it upon the unquestionable evidence of facts, and the Bef. Chr.
 “ public proceedings of those who were stiled patriots in my Consulate. 398 Conf.
 “ The general scheme of politics, therefore, being thus changed, it is time “ most certainly for every man of prudence (in which number I have the “ ambition to be justly accounted) to vary likewise his particular plan.
 “ Accordingly, that chief and favourite guide of my principles, whom “ I have already quoted, the divine Plato himself, advises, not to press any “ political point farther than is consonant to the general sense of the com- “ munity : For methods of violence, he maintains, are no more to be used “ towards one’s Country than one’s parent. Upon this maxim, he tells us, “ he declined engaging in public affairs : And as he found the People of “ Athens confirmed by long habit in their mistaken notions of government, “ he did not think it lawful to attempt by force what he despaired of ef“ fecting by persuasion. My situation, however, is in this respect dif“ ferent from Plato’s : For, on the one hand, as I have already embarked “ in public affairs, it is too late to deliberate whether I should now enter “ upon them or not ; so, on the other, the Roman people are by no “ means so incapable of judging of their true interests as he represents “ the Athenians. It is my happiness indeed to be able, by the same measures,
 “ to consult at once both my own and my Country’s welfare *. To these “ considerations I must add those uncommon acts of generosity, which Cæsar
 “ has exerted both towards my brother and myself : So much indeed beyond all “ example, that even whatever had been his success, I should have thought it “ incumbent on me at least to have defended him. But now, distinguished “ as he is by such a wonderful series of prosperity, and crowned with so “ many glorious victories, I cannot but esteem it a duty which I owe to the “ Republic, abstracted from all personal obligations to himself, to promote his “ honours as far as lies in my power. And believe me, it is at once my “ confession and my glory, that next to you, together with the other generous “ authors of my restoration, there is not a man in the world from whom I have “ received such amicable offices.

“ And now, having laid before you the principal motives of my conduct “ in general, I shall be the better able to satisfy you concerning my beha“ viour with respect to Crassus and Vatinus in particular : For, as to “ Appius and Cæsar, I have the pleasure to find that you acquit me of all “ reproach.

* It is not very easy to see how Cicero can be justified, according to his own principles, in being accessory to the cementing an union between Pompey and Cæsar. “ For he assures “ Atticus, in a letter which was written at “ the breaking out of the civil war, that he “ foresaw the storm that had been gathering “ to destroy the Republic fourteen years before it fell ; and calls the union of these “ ambitious chiefs, sceleratæ confœtionis fides,

 “ a wicked confederacy. To which he adds,
 “ that they had upon all occasions preferred
 “ the interest of their families, and the ad“ vancement of their power, to the honour
 “ and welfare of their country.” Plut. in vit.
Pomp. Ad Att. x. 4.

“ My

Y. R. 699.

Ber. Chr.

53.
108 Conf.

“ My reconciliation then with Vatinius was effected by the mediation of “ Pompey, soon after the former was elected Prætor. I must confess, when “ he petitioned to be admitted a candidate for that office, I very warmly “ opposed him in the Senate : But it was much less from my resentment “ to the man himself, than in order to support the honour and interest of “ Cato. Soon after this he was impeached : And it was in compliance “ with the earnest solicitation of Cæsar that I undertook his defence. But “ you must not enquire why I appeared at this trial, or indeed at any “ other of the same kind, as a witness in favour of the accused, lest I “ should hereafter have an opportunity of retorting the question upon you.
 “ Though, to say truth, I may fairly ask it even now : For do you not “ remember, my friend, in whose behalf it was that you formerly trans“ mitted certain honourable testimonials even from the utmost limits of “ the Roman empire ? You need not scruple, however, to acknowledge “ the fact : For I have acted, and shall continue to act, the same part to“ wards those very persons. But to return to Vatinius : Besides the reasons “ I have already assigned, I was provoked to engage in his defence by an “ opposition of the same sort which the parasite recommends to the amo“ rous soldier in the play. The obsequious Gnatbo, you know, advises “ his friend the captain, whenever his mistress endeavours to pique his “ jealousy by mentioning his rival Phædria, to play off Pamphila upon her “ in return. Thus, as I told the Judges at this trial, since certain ho“ nourable persons, who were formerly much in my interest, had thought “ fit, by many little mortifying instances in the Senate, to careſs my avow“ ed enemy before my face, I thought it but equitable to have a Clodius “ on my part, in opposition to the Clodius on theirs. Accordingly I have, “ upon many occasions, acted suitably to this declaration : And all the “ world acknowledges I have reason.

“ Having thus explained my conduct with regard to Vatinius, I will “ now lay before you those motives which determined me in respect to “ Crassus. I was willing, for the sake of the common cause, to bury in “ oblivion the many and great injuries I had formerly received from him.
 “ Agreeably to this disposition, as we were then upon good terms, I should “ have borne his unexpected defence of Gabinus (whom he had very lately “ with so much warmth opposed) if he had avoided all personal reflections “ on myself. But when, with the most unprovoked violence, he broke in “ upon me whilst I was in the midst of my speech, I must confess it raised “ my indignation : And perhaps I took fire so much the sooner, as possibly “ there remained in my heart some latent sparks of my former resentment.
 “ However, my behaviour in the Senate upon this occasion was much and “ generally applauded. Among the rest, I was complimented likewise “ by the same men whom I have often hinted at in this letter ; and who “ acknowledged I had rendered a very essential service to their cause,
 “ by the spirit which I had thus exerted. In short, they affected to speak

“ of

“ of me in public, as being now indeed restored to the Commonwealth “ in the best and most glorious sense. Nevertheless, they had the malice “ in their private conversations (as I was informed by persons of un“ doubted honour) to express singular satisfaction in the new variance
 “ that had thus happened between Crassus and myself: As they pleased “ themselves with imagining it would for ever throw me at a distance from “ those who were joined with him in the same interest. Pompey in the “ mean time employed incredible pains to close this breach: And Cæsar
 “ also mentioned it in his letters as an accident that gave him much con“ cern. Upon these considerations, therefore, I thought it expedient to “ act agreeably both to the dictates of my natural temper, and to that “ experience which I had gained by my former misfortunes. In pursu“ ance of these sentiments, I consented to a reconciliation: And, in order “ to render it more conspicuous to the world, Crassus set out for his “ government almost from under my roof: For having invited him“ self to spend the preceding night with me, we supped together in the “ gardens of my son-in-law Crassipes. It was for these reasons that I “ thought my honour obliged me to defend his cause in the Senate: And “ I confess I mentioned him with that high applause of which, it seems, you “ have been informed.

Y. R. 699.
 Ref. Chr.
 53.
 398 Conf.

“ Thus I have given you a full detail of the several views and motives by “ which I am governed in the present conjuncture, as well as of the particular “ disposition in which I stand with respect to the slender part I can pretend “ to claim in the Administration of public affairs. And, believe me, I should “ have judged and acted in the same manner, had I been totally free from every “ sort of amicable bias. For, on the one hand, I should have esteemed “ it the most absurd folly to have attempted to oppose so superior a force;
 “ and, on the other, supposing it possible, I should yet have deemed it imprudent “ to weaken the authority of persons so eminently and so justly distinguished “ in the Commonwealth. Besides, it appears to me to be the dictates of “ sound

Melm.

“ It will appear very evident perhaps from “ the foregoing observations, that what Cicero
 “ here asserts could not possibly be his real “ sentiments. That it was not practicable to “ bring down Cæsar and Pompey from that “ height of power to which they were now ar“ rived, will not, probably, be disputed: Tho’
 “ at the same time it is very difficult to set li“ mits to what prudence and perseverance may “ effect. This at least seems undeniable, that,
 “ if their power were absolutely immoveable, “ Cicero’s conduct was in the number of those “ causes which contributed to render it so.
 “ However one cannot but be astonished to “ find our author seriously maintaining, that, “ granting it had not been impossible, it would “ yet have been impolitic, to have checked

 “ these towering chiefs in their ambitious “ flight. For it is plain, from a passage al“ ready cited out of his letters to Atticus, that “ he long foresaw their immoderate growth
 “ of power would at last over-run the liberties “ of the Commonwealth*. It had already in“ deed destroyed his own, and this too by the “ confession of himself. For in a letter which “ he writes to his brother, taking notice of “ the strong application that Pompey had made “ to him to defend Gabinus, he declares he

Ad Att.

x. 4.

* i. e. would extinguish the detestable Aristocratical tyranny under which Rome had unhappily fallen.

“ never

Y. R. 699. " found policy to act in accommodation to particular conjunctures, and not
 Bef. Cnr. " obstinately persevere in one invariable scheme, when public circumstan-35⁵³ Cnr. " ces, together with the sentiments of the best and wisest members, of the " community, are evidently changed.

" In conformity to this notion, the judicious reasoners on the great art
 " of government have universally condemned an inflexible perseverance " in one uniform tenor of measures. The skill of the pilot is shewn in " weathering the storm at least, though he should not gain his port: But " if shifting his sail, and changing his direction, will infallibly carry him " into the intended harbour, would it not be an instance of most unrea" sonable tenaciousness, to continue in the more hazardous course wherein
 " he began his voyage? Thus (and it is a maxim I have often had occa" sion to inculcate) the point we ought all of us to keep in view, in our ad- " ministration of the Commonwealth, is the final enjoyment of an honourable
 " repose; but the method of securing to ourselves this dignity of retreat, is by
 " having been inflexible in our intentions for the public welfare, and not by a " positive perseverance in certain favourite modes of obtaining it *. To repeat,
 " therefore, what I just now declared, Had I been absolutely uninfluenced by
 " every motive of friendship, I should still have pursued the same public mea- " sures in which I am now engaged. But when gratitude and resentment both
 " conspire in recommending this scheme of action to me, I cannot hesitate
 " a moment in adopting it; especially since it appears most conducive to " the interest of the Republic in general, as well as to my own in parti" cular. To speak freely, I act upon this principle so much the more frequently,
 " and with the less reserve, not only as my brother is Lieutenant under Cæsar,
 " but as the latter receives the slightest action, or even word of mine in his
 " favour, with an air that evidently shews, that he considers them as obliga- " tions of the most sensible kind. And, in fact, I derive the same benefit from
 " that popularity and power which you know he possesses, as if they were so
 " many advantages of my own. The sum of the whole in short is this:
 " I imagined I had no other method of counteracting those perfidious designs
 " with which A CERTAIN PARTY were secretly contriving to undermine me,

" never will comply with that unworthy re" quest so long as he retained the least spark
 " of liberty. But comply however he actually " did: Equally, in truth, to his own dis" grace and the confutation of the doctrine he
 " here advances." Ad Q. Fr. iii. 1.

Melm.

" The reasoning which Cicero here employs
 " is certainly just, considered abstractedly:
 " But by no means applicable to the present
 " case. The QUESTION between the Aristocra-" tical party and those who were favourers of " Cæsar and Pompey, was not what road should " be taken to the same end; but whether
 " Rome should be FREE or ENSLAVED."

I must here take the liberty to differ from the ingenious and judicious Gentleman, to whom I am so much indebted for these translations and remarks. The QUESTION, at this time, does not seem to have been, whether Rome should be FREE or ENSLAVED; but whether Rome should be under the domination of the TRIUMVIRATE, or of the FISH-POND-MEN, the VENERABLE BENCH of CONSU-LARS, such monsters as the CONSULS and CONSULAR CANDIDATES of this year 699; or, if you please, whether ANARCHY should prevail in the empire, or a GOVERNMENT BY THREE MEN.

Vid. supra,
 p. 507.

" than

*“ than by thus uniting the friendship and protection of the men in power with those internal aids which have never yet been wanting to my support .”

Y. R. 699.
Bef. Clu.

53.
398 Conf.

C H A P. VI.

The trial of GABINIUS for treasonable conduct in King PTOLEMY's affair. He is brought to trial a second time for plundering his province of Syria. CICERO defends him at this second trial; and defends likewise RABIRIUS, accused of being an accomplice in GABINIUS's treason. JULIA, the daughter of CÆSAR, and wife of POMPEY, dies. PONTINIUS fights his way to the Capitol in triumph. CICERO accepts, and presently after resigns, a Lieutenantcy under POMPEY. The election of new Consuls is obstructed by the Tribunes. A design is started to create POMPEY DICTATOR, but is quickly dropt. An Inter-regnum during the first six months of the year 700. M. MESSALA and CN. DOMITIUS are chosen Consuls.

CICERO's English Historian observes, that the long and elaborate answer of the Patriot to his friend Lentulus's enquiry, concerning the change in his political conduct, was written before Cicero's defence of Gabinus: Otherwise he would have had a still harder task to make an apology for himself.

The recall of Gabinus from his government of Syria had been decreed the last year; but he did not return to Rome till about the end of September in the present year. He boasted every where on his journey that he was going to demand a triumph; and, to carry on that farce, continued a while without the gates, till, perceiving how odious he was to all within, he stole privately into the City by night to avoid the disgrace of being insulted by the populace. There were three different impeachments provided against him: The first, for treasonable practices against the State; the second, for plundering his province; the third, for bribery and corruption: And so many persons offered themselves to be prosecutors, that there was a contest among them before the Prætor, how to adjust their several claims.

Midd. p.
506--510.
Ad Quint.
Frat. iii. 1.
Ibid 2.

Melm.

* “ There is no character in all antiquity
“ that lies so open to discovery as that of Cicero, and yet there is none at the same time “ which seems to be less generally understood.
“ Had there been no other of his writings “ extant, however, but this single letter, the “ Patriot-character, one should have imagined, “ would have been the last that the world “ would ever have ascribed to our author. It “ is observable, (and it is an observation for “ which I am obliged to a gentleman, who,
“ amidst far more important occupations, did “ not refuse to be the censurer of these papers) “ that “ The principles by which Cicero at- “ tempts to justify himself in this epistle, are such
VOL. III.

“ as will equally defend the most abandoned pro“ stitution and desertion in political conduct.
“ Personal gratitude and resentment; an eye to “ private and particular interest, mixed with a “ pretended regard to public good; an attention “ to a brother's advancement and farther fa“ vour; a sensibility in being caressed by a great “ man in power; a calculation of the advan“ tages derived from the popularity and credit of “ that great man to one's own personal self; are “ very weak foundations indeed, to support the “ superstructure of a true patriot's character.
“ Yet these are the principles which Cicero here “ expressly avows and defends!”

3 X

The

Y. R. 699.
Bet. Chr.
398 Conf.

The first indictment fell to L. Lentulus, who accused him the day after he entered the City, that, in defiance of religion and the decree of the Senate, he had restored the King of Egypt with an army, leaving his own province naked, and open to the incursion of enemies, who had made great devastations in it.—Gabinus durst not shew his head for the first ten days, till he was obliged to come to the Senate, in order to give them an account, according to custom, of the state of his province and the troops which he had left in it. As soon as he had told his story, he was going to retire; but the Consuls detained him, to answer to a complaint brought against him by the publicans, or farmers of the revenues, who were attending at the door to make it good. This drew on a debate, in which Gabinus was so urged and teized on all sides, but especially by Cicero, that, trembling with passion, and unable to contain himself, he called Cicero a banished man: Upon which, says Cicero, in a letter to his brother, nothing ever happened more honourable to me: The whole Senate to a man left their seats, and with a general clamour ran up to his very face; while the publicans also were equally fierce and clamorous against him, and the whole company behaved themselves just as you yourself would have done.

Ad Q. Fr.
iii. 2.

Cicero had been deliberating for some time, whether he should not accuse Gabinus himself; but, out of regard to Pompey, was content to appear only as a witness against him, and, when the trial was over, gives the following account of it to his brother.

Ibid. 4.

“Gabinus is acquitted: Nothing was ever so stupid as his accuser L. Lentulus; nothing so fordid as the bench: Yet, if Pompey had not taken incredible pains, and the rumour of a Dictatorship had not infused some apprehensions, he could not have held up his head even against Lentulus: Since, with such an accuser and such judges, of the seventy-two, who sat upon him, thirty-two condemned him. The sentence is so infamous, that he seems likely to fall in the other trials; especially that for plundering. But there is no Republic, no Senate, no justice, no dignity in any of us: What can I say more of the Judges? There were but two of them of Prætorian rank; Domitius Calvinus, who acquitted him so forwardly, that all the world might see it; and C. Cato, who, as soon as the votes were declared, ran officiously from the bench, to carry the first news to Pompey. Some say, and particularly Sallust, that I ought to have accused him: But should I risk my credit with such Judges? What a figure should I have made, if he had escaped from me? But there were other things which influenced me: Pompey would have considered it as a struggle, not about Gabinus's safety, but his own dignity: It must have made a breach between us: We should have been matched like a pair of gladiators; as Pacidianus with Æternus the Samnite; he would probably have bit off one of my ears, or have been reconciled at least with Clodius.—For, after all the pains which I had taken to serve him, when I owed no“ thing

“ thing to him, he every thing to me, yet he would not bear my differing “ from him in public affairs, to say no worse of it; and when he was less “ powerful than he is at present, shewed what power he had against me “ in my flourishing condition, why should I now, when I have lost even “ all desire of power, when the Republic certainly has none, when he “ alone has all, chuse him of all men to contend with? For that must “ have been the case: I cannot think that you would have advised me to “ it. Sallust says, that I ought to have done either the one or the other,
 “ and in compliment to Pompey have defended him; who begged it of me “ indeed very earnestly.—A special friend this Sallust! to wish me to “ involve myself in a dangerous enmity, or perpetual infamy. I am de“ lighted with my middle way; and when I had given my testimony faith“ fully and religiously, was pleased to hear Gabinus say, that, if it should “ be permitted to him to continue in the City, he would make it his busi“ ness to give me satisfaction; nor did he so much as interrogate me.”—

He gives the same account of this trial to his other friends; how Lentulus Ad Att. iv. 16.
acted his part so ill, that people were persuaded that he prevaricated—and that Gabinus's escape was owing to the indefatigable industry of Pompey and the corruption of the bench.

About the time of this trial there happened a terrible inundation of the Tiber, which did much damage at Rome; many houses and shops were carried away by it, and the fine gardens of Cicero's son-in-law, Crassipes, Ad Q. Fr. iii. 7. demolished. It was all charged to the absolution of Gabinus, after his daring violation of religion, and contempt of the Sibyl's books: Cicero applies to it the following passage of Homer:

*As when in autumn JOVE his fury pours,
 And earth is loaden with incessant showers;
 When guilty mortals break th' eternal laws,
 And Judges brib'd betray the righteous cause;
 From their deep beds he bids the rivers rise,
 And opens all the flood-gates of the skies.*

MR. POPE, Il. xvi. 466.

But Gabinus's danger was not yet over: He was to be tried a second time, for the plundering his province, where C. Memmius, one of the Tribunes, was his accuser, and M. Cato his judge, with whom he was not likely to find any favour: Pompey pressed Cicero to defend him, and would not admit of any excuse; and Gabinus's humble behaviour in the late trial was intended to make way for Pompey's solicitation. Cicero stood firm Ibid 1.
 for a long time: Pompey, says he, labours hard with me, but has yet made no impression; nor, if I retain a grain of liberty, ever will;

*Ob! ere that dire disgrace shall blast my fame,
 O'erwhelm me, earth.—*

Il. iv. 218.

But

Y. R. 699. But Pompey's incessant importunity, backed by Cæsar's earnest request, made it vain to struggle any longer; and forced him against his judgement, his resolution, and his dignity, to defend Gabinus; at a time when his defence at last proved of no service to him; for he was found guilty by Cato, and condemned of course to a perpetual banishment.

The trial of C. Rabirius Posthumus, a person of Equestrian rank, was an appendix to that of Gabinus. It was one of the articles against Gabinus, that he had received about two millions for restoring King Ptolemy; yet all his estate that was to be found was not sufficient to answer the damages in which he was condemned; nor could he give any security for the rest: In this case, the method was, to demand the deficiency from those, through whose hands the management of his money affairs had passed, and who were supposed to have been sharers in the spoil: This was charged upon Rabirius, and "that he had advised Gabinus to under" take the restoration of the King, and accompanied him in it, and was " employed to solicit the payment of the money, and lived at Alexandria
" for that purpose, in the King's service, as the public Receiver of the " taxes, and wearing the Pallium or habit of the Country."

Cicero urged in defence of Rabirius, "that he had borne no part in " that transaction; but that his whole crime, or rather folly, was, that " he had lent the King great sums of money for his support at Rome;
" and ventured to trust a prince, who, as all the world then thought,
" was going to be restored by the authority of the Roman people: That
" the necessity of going to Egypt for the recovery of that debt, was the " source of all his misery; where he was forced to take whatever the King
" would give or impose: That it was his misfortune to be obliged to " commit himself to the power of an arbitrary monarch: That nothing " could be more mad, than for a Roman Knight, and Citizen of a Re" public of all others the most free, to go to any place where he must
" needs be a slave to the will of another; and that all who ever did so,
" as Plato and the wisest had sometimes done too hastily, always suffered
" for it: This was the case of Rabirius; necessity carried him to Alexan- " dria; his whole fortunes were at stake, which he was so far from im" proving by his traffic with that King, that he was ill treated by him,
" imprisoned, threatened with death, and glad to run away at last with
" the loss of all: And at that very time, it was wholly owing to Cæsar's
" generosity, and regard to the merit and misfortunes of an old friend,
" that he was enabled to support his former rank and Equestrian dig" nity." ... —

Gabinus's trial had so near a relation to this, and was therein so often referred to, that the prosecutor could not easily neglect the fair opportunity of raising Cicero for the part which he had acted in it: Memmius observed, that the deputies of Alexandria had the same reason for appearing in behalf of Gabinus, which Cicero had for defending him, the command of a master.—“No, Memmius,” replied Cicero, “my reason for defending him, was “a reconciliation with him; for I am not ashamed to own, that my quarrels “are mortal, my friendships immortal: And if you imagine that I undertook “that cause for fear of Pompey, you neither know Pompey nor me; for Pom- “pey would neither desire it of me against my will, nor would I, after I had “preserved the liberty of my Citizens, ever give up my own.”

Whatever Cicero might say for himself in the flourishing stile of an orator, it is certain, that he knew and felt his defence of Gabinus to be, what it really was, an indignity and dishonour to him, which he was forced to submit to by the iniquity of the times, and his engagements with Pompey and Cæsar, as he often laments to his friends in a very passionate strain:
 “I am afflicted,” says he, “my dearest brother, I am afflicted, that there is “no Republic, no justice in trials; that this season of my life, which ought “to flourish in the authority of the Senatorian character, is either wasted in “the drudgery of the bar, or relieved only by domestic studies; that what “I have ever been fond of from a boy,

“In every virtuous act and glorious strife
 “To shine the first and best—”

“is wholly lost and gone; that my enemies are partly not opposed, partly even “defended by me; and neither what I love nor what I hate left free to me.”

About this time, and while Cæsar was engaged in his second expedition into Britain, his daughter Julia, Pompey’s wife, died* in child-bed at Rome, having been first delivered of a son, which died also soon after her. Her loss was not more lamented by the husband and father, who both of them tenderly loved her, than by all their common friends, and the well-wishers to the public peace, who considered it as a source of fresh disturbance to the State, from the ambitious views and clashing interests of the two chiefs, whom the life of one so dear, and the relation of son and father, seemed hitherto to have united by the ties both of duty and affection.—
 The jealousies and separate interests of the Triumvirs had obliged them to manage their power with some decency, and to extend it but rarely beyond the then customary forms; but whenever that league, which had made them already too great for private subjects, should happen to be dissolved, it was thought that the next contest must of course be for dominion, and the single mastery of the empire.

On the second of November, C. Pontinius triumphed over the Allobroges:
 He had been Prætor when Cicero was Consul, and, at the end of his magistracy, obtained the government of that part of Gaul, which some time after, provoked by oppression, broke out into rebellion, but was reduced by the vigour of this General. For this service he demanded a Triumph, but met with great opposition, which he surmounted with incredible

* Cæsar is said to have borne the news of her death with an uncommon firmness. Senec.
Consol. ad Helv. p. 116.

Y. R. 699.
Bef. Chr.
53.
398 Conf.

patience: For he persevered in his suit for five years successively; residing all that while, according to custom, in the suburbs of the City, till he gained his point at last by a kind of violence. Cicero was his friend, and continued in Rome on purpose to assist him; and the Consul Appius served him with all his power; but Cato protested that Pontinius should never triumph while he lived; though this, says Cicero, like many of his other threats, will end in nothing. The Prætor Galba, who had been Pontinius's Lieutenant, having procured by stratagem an act of the People in his favour, he entered the City in his triumphal chariot, where he was so rudely received and opposed in his passage through the streets, that he was forced to make his way with his sword, and the slaughter of many of his adversaries.

Ad Art.
iv. 18.

In the end of the year Cicero consented to be one of Pompey's Lieutenants in Spain, which he began to think convenient to the present state of his affairs, and resolved to set forward for that province about the middle of January: But this seeming to give some umbrage to Cæsar, who in his

Ad Quint.
ii. 15.

letters desired him to continue at Rome, he soon changed his mind, and resigned his Lieutenantcy: To which he seems to allude in a letter to his brother, where he says, that he had no second thoughts in what concerned Cæsar; that he would make good his engagements to him; and being entered into his friendship with judgment, was now attached to him by affection.

Ibid. iii. 1.

The prodigious unprecedented knaveries of the Consuls and Consular candidates, and what followed thereupon, so retarded the elections, that the year expired before the State was provided with new Consuls; and the Tribunes, whose authority, while there were no Consuls to controul them, was in a manner absolute, did for that reason, perhaps, keep off all Assemblies for the election of those Magistrates: But it seems more probable that Pompey was at the bottom of this opposition, having entertained the fond desire of being appointed Dictator. He chose however to keep himself out of sight; and retired into the country, to avoid the suspicion of affecting a sovereignty which Sylla had made so odious. "The ru-

Midd. 522.

Ad Quint.
iii. 8.

"mour of a Dictatorship, says Cicero, is disagreeable to the Honest; but the other things which they talk of are more so to me. The whole affair is dreaded, but flags: Pompey flatly disclaims it, though he never denied it to me before. The Tribune Hirrus will probably

What these other things were does not appear. Dio says, That some of the Tribunes proposed, that, instead of Consuls, military Tribunes with Consular power should be once again placed at the head of the Republic. But if by other things he meant nothing worse than this proposal, I cannot guess why Dr. Middleton says, that Cicero judged rightly in thinking, that there were other things, which, in the present situation of the Senate and the honest, were of more dangerous consequence than a Dictatorship. Indeed the Doctor is of opinion, that there was no great reason to be afraid of a Dictatorship at this time. "For the Republic (says he) was in so great a disorder, that nothing less than the Dictatorial power could reduce it to a tolerable state." [I pray the Reader to remember this concession.]

524-

" be

“ be the promoter: Good Gods! How silly and fond of himself without “ a rival! At Pompey’s request I have deterred Crassus Junianus, who “ pays great regard to me, for meddling with it. It is hard to know “ whether Pompey really desires it or not; but he will not convince “ us that he is averse to it, if Hirrus stir in the affair.” In another letter———“ Nothing is yet done as to the Dictatorship; Pompey is “ still absent; Appius in a great bustle; Hirrus preparing to propose it;
 “ but several are named, as ready to interpose their negative: The People “ do not trouble their heads about it; the chiefs are against it; I keep “ myself quiet.”

The Tribune *Hirrus, mentioned in these letters, did actually drop some hints leading to a Dictatorship; for which Cato treated him so roughly, that he was almost reduced to throw up his office. Q. Pompeius Rufus, another of the Tribunes, the grandson of Sylla, and the most warm espouser of a Dictator, was, by a decree of the Senate, committed to prison^c. This checked all proceeding in that project: And Pompey himself, finding the greater part of the leading men utterly averse to his Dictatorship, he yielded at last, after an Inter-regnum of six months, that Cn. Domitius Calvinus and M. Messala, two of the four candidates (who, Cicero tells us, were all alike) should be declared Consuls. Domitius was one of the contractors for forging decrees, and was without doubt supported in this election by the interest of his kinsman, L. Domitius, the Consul, another of the Contractors: As for Messala, Cicero had particularly recommended him to Cæsar; as appears by what he writes to his brother Quintus: “ As to your reckoning Messala and Calvinus sure “ Consuls, you agree with what we think here; for I will be answerable to “ Cæsar for Messala.”

Y. R. 699.
 Bef. Chr.
 53.
 398 Conf.

Ad Quint.
 iii. 9.

* called Lucius
 by Plut. in Pomp.
Dio, lib.
 xl. p. 141.

Vid. supr.
 P. 507.

Ad Quint.
 iii. 8.

C H A P. VII.

CRASSUS makes war upon the Parthians: The enterprize unjust, the event unfortunate. CICERO, at Rome, is elected into the college of AUGURS.

THE first news from abroad, after the inauguration of the Consuls, was of the ill success of Crassus’s hostile expedition into the Par- thian^a territories; a war commenced without any order or explicit permission

Y. R. 700.
 Bef. Chr.
 52.
 399 Conf.

^c This is a fact, says M. Crevier, I can scarce believe, as it is not to be paralleled in all the history of the Roman Republic. The persons of the Tribunes were sacred.—Besides it is clear from the testimony of Afconius Pe- dianus, that this Pompeius Rufus was Tribune the year following the present. Now it was no longer the custom for the same Magistrates to be continued in office several years; and if there had been an exception in favour of Rufus, Afconius would probably have taken notice of it.

^a We are told that the Parthians were originally a people of Scythia, from whence being banished, they for that very reason called themselves Parthians, which word in the Scythian language

Justin.
 lib. xli. c.
 1.

Y. R. 790. mission from the Senate, and to which the insatiable avarice of the Roman General was the sole motive. The Republic had, first by Sylla, and afterwards by Pompey, made leagues of peace and amity with the Parthians, and had never complained of any infraction of them; so that this people, having no reason to apprehend an invasion, had made no preparations against it. Crassus therefore, beginning his march^b soon after his arrival in the East, passed the Euphrates, over a bridge of boats, without opposition, over-ran a great part of Mesopotamia, and possessed himself of several towns; which being most of them Græcian colonies, averse to the Parthian government, readily submitted to him.

Plut. in Crass.
Appian in Parth.
Dio, lib. xl.
Prid. vol.
III. p.
460--464.

It is said, that for vanquishing a small body of horse, commanded by a Parthian officer, and for reducing by force an inconsiderable fortress, called Zenodotia, Crassus had the weakness to suffer himself to be saluted IMPERATOR by his soldiers, who at the same time despised him for his vanity.

But his greatest folly (says Plutarch) next to the enterprise itself, was, that, instead of pursuing his advantage, and pushing on to Seleucia and Babylon, he repassed the Euphrates, leaving behind him only 7000 foot and 1000 horse to garrison the places he had taken, and retired into Syria, for his winter-quarters; thereby giving leisure to the Parthians to prepare an army against the next year's campaign. Nor did Crassus, during the winter, take the prudent care to see his troops well exercised, and well provided for the war, but acted the part of a Publican rather than a General, examining into the revenues of the province, screwing them up to the utmost height, and using all other methods of exaction whereby to enrich himself. Being told of immense treasures deposited in the temple of Jeru-

language signifies exiles. The country to which they retired for a settlement, was a small tract, lying to the South of Hyrkania, and to the east of Media, and consisted chiefly of barren mountains and sandy plains. During the empires of the Affyrians, Medes, and Persians, and the first Macedonian Kings of Syria, scarce any mention is made of the Parthians. It was about the year of Rome 502, 250 years before the beginning of the Christian æra, and while Antiochus, surnamed The God, was King of Syria, that wearied out with the oppressive tyranny of the Macedonian governors, the Parthians revolted, under the leading of Arfaces. Who Arfaces was, is not agreed, but it is certain that he was always considered as the founder of the Parthian empire, and that his memory was in such veneration among them that all his successors took his name. Arfaces extended the Parthian dominion beyond the limits of Parthia; and in length of time it became so far enlarged, by the conquests of

Just. lib.
xli. c. 4. & 5.

the following Kings, as to include almost all the Country between the Oxus and the Euphrates. Its royal cities were Ctesiphon upon the Tygris, and Ecbatana in Media. The Parthian soldiery were almost all horsemen. Some, clad in compleat armour, made use of long spears in fight. The rest had scarce any other offensive weapons than the bow and arrow: But they were so dextrous in the management of these, as to be no less formidable when they turned their backs upon their enemies than when they faced them.

^b Plutarch relates, that Crassus, crossing Galatia in the way to his province, and finding King Dejotarus, who was advanced in years, employed in building a new city, said to him pleasantly, Why, King, you begin your day's work at the twelfth hour. The King instantly replied, And you, General, methinks you are not too early in your expedition against the Parthians. Crassus was past sixty, and looked much older than he was.

Salem,

Strabo,
xvi. 743.

salem, thither he impatiently hasted, with a part of his army, to seize so delicious and so easy a prey. Eleazer, one of the priests, was then treasurer of the Temple. Among other things, which he had under his charge, was a bar of gold of the weight of three hundred Hebrew minæ. This, for the better securing of it, he had put into a beam, which he had caused to be made hollow for that purpose; and placing this beam over the entrance, which was from the Holy Place into the Holy of Holies, caused the veil, which parted these two places, to be fastened to it, and to hang down from it. Perceiving Crassus's design of plundering the Temple, he endeavoured to compound the matter with him, and therefore telling him of such a bar of gold in his custody, promised to discover and deliver it to him, upon condition that he would be satisfied with it, and spare all the rest: Crassus accepted of the proposal, and solemnly promised, with an oath, that, on having this bar of gold delivered to him, he would be contented with it, and meddle with nothing else. Relying on this promise, Eleazer put him in possession of the gold. Crassus had no sooner received it, but, forgetting his oath, he not only seized the two thousand talents which Pompey had left untouched, but ransacked the temple all over, and robbed it of every thing he thought worth taking away, to the value of eight thousand talents more; so that the whole of what he took from thence amounted to ten thousand talents, which is above two millions of our money^c. [Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. & de Bell. Jud. lib. i.]

As soon as the season of the year permitted, Crassus, strengthened by a thousand Gallic horse, which his son Publius brought him from Cæsar's army, drew all his forces together, in order to prosecute the war against the Parthians, who had now got ready a very great army for their defence. But, before they entered upon action, Ambassadors were sent from Orodes, the Parthian King, to the Roman General, to ask, For what reason he made war upon him? Crassus answered with haughtiness, that he would declare his reason when he should come to Seleucia. The King, on the return of his Ambassadors, finding war to be unavoidable, divided his army into two parts, marched in person with one of them towards the borders of Armenia, and sent the other under the command of Surenas^d, the most illustrious of all his nobles, and a most accom-

^c The plundering of the Temple at Jerusalem [which I do not find any where mentioned by the Greek historians] was not the only sacrilege committed by Crassus. He acted the like part all over the province, wherever any riches were to be got, particularly at Hierapolis. For there being in that city an ancient temple of the Syrian Goddess, called Atergetis, where much treasure was laid up, as having been the collection of many years, he seized it all, and was so greedy of securing the whole of that, lest any should be detained or embezzled, he spent a great deal of his time to see it all told out and weighed before him. On his last coming out of this temple, his son going before him stumbled at the threshold, and he immediately after it upon him. This was afterwards interpreted as an ill omen, that foreboded what soon happened.

^d This is said to be the name, not of a person, but of a dignity, and equivalent to that of Grand Vizir.

Y.R. 700.
 Bel. Chr.
 52.
 399 Conf.

* or Artabazdes.

plished general, into Mesopotamia; who, immediately after his arrival there, retook some of those places of which Crassus had possessed himself the year before. The garrisons, that escaped to the Roman camp, filled it with a terrible report of the number, power, and strength of the enemy; which cast a damp upon the whole army, and sunk the courage, not only of the common soldiers, but of the general officers. Cassius (the same who was afterwards concerned in the murder of Cæsar) was at this time Crassus's Quæstor, and endeavoured to dissuade him from proceeding any further in his enterprise, till he had well considered it again. At the same time came to him *Artabazes, King of Armenia, who had lately succeeded his father Tigranes in that kingdom. He brought with him six thousand horse, which were only his lifeguard. Besides these, he told Crassus, he had ten thousand Cuirassiers, and thirty thousand foot ready for his service: But advised him by no means to march his army through the plains of Mesopotamia, but to take his way through Armenia into the Parthian dominions. His reasons for it were, that Armenia being a rough mountainous country, the Parthian horse, of which their army almost wholly consisted, would there be useless; and he could take care that the Roman army should be there plentifully provided with all necessaries: both which advantages he would fail of, if he led his army through Mesopotamia, where he would often meet with sandy deserts, and be distressed for want both of water and other provisions. This was the best advice that could be given him; yet Crassus answered, that, having left many brave Romans to garrison the towns which he had taken last year in Mesopotamia, he was under a necessity of going that way, that they might not be abandoned to the mercy of the enemy: But he accepted of the auxiliaries which the King offered him, and desired they might be speedily brought to him. The prospect of so considerable a reinforcement was, perhaps, what chiefly encouraged Crassus, contrary to the advice of the wisest about him, to proceed on his expedition. and without further delay, to pass the *Euphrates, and again enter Mesopotamia with his army. But Artabazes, on his return, finding Orodes with a great army near his borders, was forced to stay at home to defend his own country, and therefore could not give Crassus the assistance he had promised him.

After Crassus had thus re-entered Mesopotamia, Cassius advised him to put in at some of his garrisoned towns, and there rest and refresh his army till he should have got certain intelligence of the number and strength of the enemy, and in what place and posture they were; or, if he thought not fit to make that delay, he should at least take his march to Seleucia, along the banks of the Euphrates. For, by keeping close to that river, he would avoid being surrounded by the Parthians, and might be constantly supplied with provisions, and all other necessaries, from his barks

* He passed the river at a town in the province of Camagena, called Zengma, which word signifies a bridge.

that

that were upon it : But, while Crassus was considering on this advice, there came to him a crafty Arabian, who diverted him entirely from following it. He was the head of an Arabian tribe (such as the Greeks called Phylarchs, and the present Arabs, Sbeks) and having formerly served under Pompey, was well known to many in the Roman army, and looked on as their friend ; for which reason he had been made choice of, and sent by Surenas to act this part. He is, by different authors, called by different names¹ ; but whatever his name was, he effectually dissuaded Crassus from following the good advice given him by Cassius. He told the Roman General, that the Partbians durst not stand before him ; that he had nothing to do, for the gaining an absolute victory over them, but to march on ; and he offered himself for a guide to conduct him the shortest way to the enemy. Crassus, deceived by the fair words, and fooled by the flattery of this man, accepted of his offer ; and so was led by him into the open plains of Mesopotamia : And although Cassius and others suspected the guide of treachery, and therefore pressed Crassus to follow him no longer, but to retreat to the mountains, where he might best be able to baffle the power of the Partbian horse ; and though messengers came to his camp from Artabazes, on purpose to persuade him to the same thing, yet he still continued in his delusion, till at length the traitor, having brought him into a sandy desert, where the Partbians might have all the advantage in a battle, rode off to Surenas, and acquainted him with what he had done : adding, that now was the time to attack the Romans, who were come to deliver themselves into his hands. Nor was it very long before Crassus perceived his error. While he was making forced marches, fearing nothing but that the enemy should escape him, his scouts came back full speed to inform him, that the Partbians were advancing in prodigious numbers, in good order, and with much confidence.

This report threw the whole army into a consternation², and especially the General, who now began, though with a good deal of irresolution, to put his troops in order of battle. At first, following the advice of Cassius, he drew up his infantry in one line, extended to a great length, that the Partbian horse might not be able easily to surround it ; and he placed all his cavalry in the wings : Then, altering his mind, he formed the foot into a square body, having twelve cohorts in each of its four sides ; and he flanked each cohort with a squadron ; to the end that every part of his battalion, being supported by cavalry, might charge with the more

¹ By Dio Cassius he is called Angarus, or Abgarus ; by Plutarch, Ariannes ; by Florus, Maxerus ; and by Appian, Acbarus.

² According to Plutarch (whom Appian copies all along) the Roman soldiers had been already terrified with about a dozen bad omens ; of which the most worthy to be remembered

(or, if you please, most worthy to be forgot) was, that, when, in order to begin their march, they were going to pull up the foremost standard, the eagle upon it turned its head about, and looked back, as if it had no mind to go forward.

Y. R. 700. safety and confidence. To his son he gave one of the wings, to Cassius the Bel. Chr. other, and placed himself in the center.

^{52.}
 399 Conf. In their march towards the enemy, they came to a rivulet, the sight of which, though its waters were not very abundant, greatly comforted and rejoiced the soldiers, after their long march over so parched and sandy a soil. Most of the officers were for passing the night in that place, and for endeavouring, before they proceeded farther, to get more exact information of the number and posture of the enemy : But Publius Crassus, full of ardour and confidence, persuaded his father to advance : So that he only made a short halt, to give those who needed refreshment, time for a scanty meal, as they stood in their ranks : After which he pursued his march, pushing on with great haste and precipitation.

When the two armies were near enough to engage, the Parthian pikemen soon perceived, that the Roman battalion, which they had hoped to break by the force of their ponderous and well-steeled lances, was too deep, compact, and firm, to be by them easily penetrated and dissolved. They retreated therefore, and, by their dispersion and feigned confusion, seemed as if they meant to quit the field : But the Romans, presently after, to their great astonishment, found themselves entirely surrounded by the Parthian cavalry. Crassus ordered out against them his dartmen, and other light-armed infantry. These, meeting with a flight of arrows, quickly recoiled, fell back on the legions, disordered them in some degree, and terrified them still more : For the Romans now became sensible that they had no defensive armour that was proof against the force of those murderous arrows, which the enemy incessantly showered upon them. Nor had they any means to revenge themselves ; because, as soon as they advanced with that intent, the enemy fled, and even in flying continued to gall them with the same weapons.

The Romans for some time entertained hopes, that the Parthians would at length exhaust their stock of arrows, and then be obliged either to run away or come to a close fight ; hopes ill-grounded : for the bowmen were supplied with arrows as fast as they wanted them, from a great number of camels loaded with them, and placed in the rear of the army for that purpose : Which, when Crassus understood, he ordered his son to attempt, at all hazards, a close engagement with those troops of the enemy which had approached the nearest to him. Publius, therefore, with the thousand Gallie horse he had brought from Cæsar, three hundred other horse, five hundred archers, and eight cohorts of legionary foot, advanced to the attack. The Parthians instantly gave ground, and even fled before him ; and the sanguine young warrior, imagining himself victorious, pursued them with his whole detachment, horse and foot. Soon he perceived that the enemy's flight had been only feigned. The runaways stopt on a sudden, and, rallying, boldly returned upon him. The pikemen, in good order, faced the Romans ; while the bowmen, without observing any order, galloped galloped round them, and raised such a mighty dust, as deprived them at once both of sight and respiration : Exposed to the Parthian arrows, and unable to make any defence against enemies whom they saw not, they now perished in great numbers, and by very painful deaths ; and those who remained alive were in no condition to fight. When their commander urged them to advance against the pikemen of the enemy, some shewed him their hands nailed to their bucklers, other their feet pinned to the ground, so that they could neither defend themselves nor fly.

In this extremity, young Crassus, who manifested throughout the engagement an heroic bravery, had recourse to his Gallic cavalry as his last resource ; and so well managed, as with these to force the Parthian pikemen to a close fight. But the match was very unequal. The Gallic javelins or half-pikes, had little effect on troopers covered almost from head to foot with iron : Whereas the long, stout lances of the Parthians proved fatal to the Gauls, whose defensive armour, if indeed they had any, was very slight. They are said to have performed wonders in the action ; but being distressed by the excessive heat and drought, to which they were not accustomed, and having lost most of their horses (transfixed by the Parthian lances) they at length resolved to rejoin, if possible, the main body of the army. Carrying with them young Crassus, grievously wounded in many places, they made to a small sandy hill, not far from them. Here tying their horses one to another, and placing them in the midst, they formed themselves into a circle, and made a rampart of their shields, hoping to find it an effectual defence against the arrows of the Barbarians. But herein they fatally mistook : For on even ground the foremost rank in some measure defended those that were behind it, whereas on an ascent, the hinder ranks standing necessarily higher than those before, all were equally exposed to the enemies arrows : So that they quickly found their case desperate, and that they must perish without glory, and almost without resistance. The young General, disdaining to desert his troops, and attempt a precipitate flight, to which some advised him, and being deprived by a wound of the use of his own hand, commanded his armour-bearer to run him through^b. Most of the nobles who had accompanied him killed

Y. R. 700.
Bef. Chr.
52.
399 Conf.

Melm.
527.

^b “ Publius Crassus was a youth of an amiable character ; educated with the strictest care, and perfectly instructed in all the liberal studies ; he had a ready wit and easy language ; was grave without arrogance, modest without negligence, adorned with all the accomplishments proper to form a principal Citizen and Leader of the Republic : By the force of his own judgment he had devoted himself very early to the observance and imitation of Cicero, whom he perpetually attended, and revered with a kind of filial

“ Piety. Cicero conceived a mutual affection for him, and observing his eager thirst of glory, was constantly instilling into him the true notion of it, and exhorting him to pursue that sure path to it, which his ancestors had left beaten and traced out to him, through the gradual ascent of civil honours. But, by serving under Cæsar in the Gallic wars, he had learnt, as he fancied, a shorter way to fame and power than what Cicero had been inculcating ; and having signalized himself in a campaign or two as a soldier,

Y. R. 700. killed themselves. The rest were all slain by the enemy, except about
 B. f. Chr. five hundred, who fell alive into their hands. The Partbians cut off the 52.
 599 Conf. head of young Crassus, and, taking it with them, marched to attack the Proconsul.

Publius, from the beginning of his distress, had dispatched messengers to his father, to give him notice of the difficulties and dangers he had run himself into, by his inconsiderate pursuit of the Partbians. The first messengers were intercepted and killed: Others reached the army. Crassus remained awhile unresolved what to do. He feared the loss of all, if he marched to the succour of his son; yet his affection for his son urged him irresistibly to it. He moved forward; the enemy presently appeared, and, by their terrible shouts and exulting noises, proclaimed their recent victory. Before them, as they approached, was carried, upon the end of the lance, the head of Publius Crassus, whilst scoffingly they asked aloud—Of what family was that young man? who were his parents?—a scene which sunk the spirits of the Roman soldiers more than all the calamities they had before suffered. Crassus is reported to have acted the hero upon this occasion. Riding through the ranks, as the army marched on, he said aloud: “This misfortune, fellow-soldiers, concerns me only: The glory and felicity of our country remains yet entire, so long as you are in a condition to defend it. And, if you compassionate me for having lost so brave a son, let your concern be shewn, by punishing the cruelty of our enemies.” The soldiers gave a shout; but with a voice so faint and languid, as spoke more of dejection than courage.

The fight presently began. The Partbian bowmen, wheeling about the Romans, galled them in flank with showers of arrows, while the pikemen, assailing them in front, made them recoil and crowd closer together, which hastened their destruction. Night coming on, the Partbians retired, it being contrary to their custom to pass the night near an enemy, because they never fortified their camps, and because their horses and arrows could be but of little use in the dark. Their retreat, however, did not kindle in the Romans the least spark of hope. Giving all for lost, they had no attention to bury their dead, or console the dying, or succour the wounded: Every one bewailed his own fate: For, should they remain where they then were till day-light, or should they set forward in the dark, to traverse an almost boundless plain; in neither supposition did they see any chance of escaping. They were much perplexed likewise on account of their wounded men.

“soldier, was in too much haste to be a General; when Cæsar sent him at the head of a thousand horse to the assistance of his father in the Partbian war.”—But, “while he aspired, as Cicero says, to the fame of another Cyrus or Alexander, he fell short of

“that glory which many of his predecessors had reaped from a succession of honours conferred by their country as the reward of their services.” Ep. Fam. iii. 8. & ib. xiii. 16. Vid. Brut. p. 407. It. Plut. in Crass.

If they took these with them, it would retard their flight; if they forsook them, the cries of the wretched, so abandoned, would publish the departure of the army. Though the soldiers knew their General to be the faulty cause of all their calamities, yet they wished to see him, and to hear him. But Crassus had not the confidence to appear. He had cast himself on the ground, and there he lay, as a man quite stunned and senseless¹. Octavius and Cassius, (the one his Lieutenant, and the other his Quæstor) having found him in this posture of dejection, endeavoured to rouse him to a more manly deportment; but without success. They took upon themselves therefore to hold a council of war; and it was resolved to retire immediately. The troops decamped in silence. Doleful and affecting were the lamentations of the miserable men, whom necessity constrained their fellows to abandon. The care of such of the wounded, who, having some strength left, dragged themselves along with the army; the apprehension of being pursued and overtaken; and the drawing up frequently in battalia upon false alarms, made the march of the army very slow. A certain officer, named Egnatius, at the head of three hundred horse, leaving the main body, and pushing forward with all diligence, arrived under the walls of Carræ^{*} about midnight. Calling out to the guard, he bad them tell Coponius, the Governor, that there had been a great battle between the Romans and the Parthians. He said no more, nor discovered himself, but immediately pursued his route to Zeugma: And by this he saved indeed his three hundred horse; yet was much blamed for deserting his General. The message, however, which he sent to Coponius, proved of service to the army: For the Governor, conjecturing from the words and manner of Egnatius, that affairs went ill, sallied out with his garrison, met Crassus and his troops, and conducted them safely into the City.

The Parthians, though apprized of Crassus's retreat, waited for day, according to their custom. Then entering the Roman camp, they massacred the sick and wounded to the amount of about four thousand men. Many of the Roman soldiers they likewise overtook and slaughtered in the plain; particularly four cohorts, which had lost their way in the dark. Out of these, only twenty men escaped. It is said, that the invincible

In Crass.

¹ What a striking example of the short-sightedness of man, the instability of human grandeur, and the madness of unbounded ambition! Plutarch tells us, that when the province of Syria fell by lot to Crassus, he thought, that Fortune had never, in any instance, been so favourable to him. Transported with his good luck, he could not, even in the company of strangers, contain his joy; but, to his familiar friends and confidants, he blurted out many extravagant and childish boastings; a folly, which he had never been guilty of in the former part of his life. Lucullus had done nothing against Tigranes; Pompey nothing against Mithridates: But, as for himself, the limits of Parthia should not be the limits of his conquests; the Roman eagles, under his conduct, were to fly triumphant over Bactria and India, quite to the great Ocean and the extremities of the East.

^{*} The Haran or Charran of the Holy Scriptures, where Abraham sojourned.

courage,

Y. R. 700
B. C. Chr.
52.
399 Conf.

courage, with which they defended themselves, struck their assailants with such admiration, that they voluntarily opened to them a free passage to Carrae.

Surena being told, as he approached that city, of a rumour which prevailed, that Crassus and the principal men of the Romans had all made their escape, began to fear the loss of what he esteemed the chief fruit of his victory. To know the truth, he ordered one of his people, who could speak Latin, to go near the walls; and in his name invite Crassus and Cassius to a conference with him. This messenger was attended by some Arabians, who having formerly served in the Roman army, knew the persons of both. Cassius appeared upon the walls, and was told, that Surena consented to make peace with the Romans, on the condition of their evacuating Mesopotamia. The proposal, as affairs then stood, appeared to the Roman Quæstor far from being disadvantageous: He promised therefore to report it to the General. The Parthian, having thus learnt what he wanted to know, laughed at the credulity of the Romans; and the next day, while he was preparing to attack the place, gave them to understand, that, if they would obtain leave to retire in safety, they must deliver up to him Crassus and Cassius. No thought remained now but of running away in the dark; and it was necessary to keep this resolution concealed till the moment of execution. Crassus, once more fatally deceived, imparted the secret to a traitor, named Andromachus, and even took the same traitor for his guide. Andromachus sent advice to Surena of what was intended; and, in order to complete the destruction of the Roman army, contrived to lead them by ways so indirect, such windings and turnings, that they gained but little ground in a long march; and at length he brought them into a place full of ditches and enclosures. Many began now to suspect treachery, and would follow him no farther. Cassius, with five hundred horse, returning to Carrae, provided himself there with some Arabian guides¹, who faithfully conducted him and his followers into Syria. Octavius too, the General's Lieutenant, convinced of Andromachus's perfidy, made a timely retreat, leading off five thousand men to a hilly ground, where they could not be much annoyed by the enemy's cavalry. Yet, when he learnt that Crassus had some how gained an eminence, about a mile off, where he was in great danger from the Parthians, whom daylight had brought upon him, he boldly marched thither, followed by his five thousand men; who, encompassing Crassus, and making a rampart for him of their shields and bodies, vowed, that no arrow should reach their General, so long as a man of them remained alive to defend him. Surena, perceiving the ardor of his own soldiers to abate, and apprehend-

¹ It is related, that these Arabians being superstitious about the moon, exhorted Cassius earnestly not to advance, till the moon had passed Scorpio. To which Cassius answered, that he was much more afraid of Sagittarius; alluding to the Parthian arrows.

ing, that, if the Romans should spin out the battle till night, they might then gain the mountains and be safe, for the future, from his attacks, had again recourse to his wonted craft. He suffered some prisoners to escape, before whom the Parthians, discoursing with one another, had designedly said, that their King was far from intending an implacable war with the Romans, and would be glad to regain their friendship by treating Crassus with generosity. That this stratagem might more easily take effect, he ceased hostilities, and, attended by his principal officers, advanced in pacific guise toward the hill, having his bow unbent, and holding out his hand, as a friend to Crassus, whom he invited to a treaty of accommodation. The King, he said, having, much against his will, made the Romans sensible of his power, and of the bravery of his troops, is now disposed to give them proofs of his clemency and goodness, by suffering them to retire in safety. Crassus, who saw no reason for so sudden a change, was not deceived; his soldiers were: And, notwithstanding all he could say to persuade them to have patience till night, when they might make a retreat to the mountains, they seditiously, and with threats, compelled him to accept of Surena's invitation: (A behaviour strangely ill suiting with what has been just related of their zeal and fidelity.) At going from them, he is reported to have said; "Octavius and Petronius, and you the rest of the commanders here present, you are witnesses of the violence offered me: Nevertheless, for the honour of the Roman name, I desire you will declare to all the world, that Crassus perished by the craft of his enemies, not by the perfidy of his soldiers and fellow-citizens."

Octavius and Petronius, and some other officers, not enduring the thought, that their General should go alone, descended the hill with him; but he sent back his Lictors. Certain heralds from Surena, having accosted him with profound respect, desired him, in the Greek language, to send some body before, to see that the Parthian General and his retinue were without arms. Crassus answered, that, if he had retained the least concern for his life, he would never have put himself into their hands. However, to learn what appearance things had, he sent forward two men, who were to bring him word. These were instantly seized, by Surena's order; who then, attended by his principal officers, coming up to him, with an air of astonishment, said; How! what an indecent sight is this! a Roman General on foot, and we on horseback! "No error committed on either side (answered Crassus,) each follows the custom of his country." "From this moment (said the Parthian) there is a league of amity between the King my master and the Roman People; but it must be put in writing; for you, Romans, are very apt to forget your engagements and covenants. Let us go, therefore, and finish the treaty on the banks of the Euphrates." Crassus hereupon ordered a horse to be brought him. There is no need, said Surena, the King makes you a present of one; and immediately a horse, with rich trappings, was led to him; and he

Y. R. 700.
bef. Chr.
52.
105. Conl.

was forcibly put into the saddle: some of Surena's attendants switching the horse, to hasten him forward. The Romans now saw plainly, that the purpose of the Parthian was to take Crassus alive. Octavius therefore seized the bridle of the horse, and stopp'd him. Petronius and the other officers surrounded their General, putting themselves in a posture to defend him. A tumult and scuffle ensued. Octavius killed one of the Parthian grooms, and was himself killed by a stroke of a lance run into his back. Crassus himself fell dead quickly after; but whether he was dispatched by the hand of an enemy, or of a friend who would preserve him from the disgrace of becoming a prisoner, is uncertain.

Surena, by fair words, notwithstanding the experience which the Romans had of his perfidy, decoyed many of those who had remained on the hill to surrender themselves prisoners. The most courageous waited for the night, to attempt a retreat; but of these few escaped, the rest being intercepted by the Arabs, who scoured the country with that intent. In the several actions and disasters of this war, the Romans are said to have lost twenty thousand men killed, and ten thousand taken prisoners. It was one of the greatest blows that Rome had ever received from a foreign enemy, and for which she was ever after meditating revenge.

Dio, lib.
xl.
Florus, iii.
11.

Orodes, at the time of Crassus's death, was in Armenia, having there made peace with Artabazes. For this prince, on the return of the messengers, which he last sent to the Roman camp, finding, by the account which they brought of the measures which Crassus took in the Parthian war, that he must necessarily be undone, compounded all matters with Orodes; and by giving one of his sisters in marriage to Pacorus, the son of the Parthian, restored himself to full amity with him. And while they were sitting together at the nuptial feast, in came a messenger, who presented Orodes with the head and hand of Crassus, which Surena had caused to be cut off with that intent*. This much increased the mirth and joy of the feast. And it is said, that melted gold was then poured into the mouth of the lifeless head by way of mockery; as if they would thus satiate that thirst after riches, for which Crassus had been so remarkable.

Mid. 526. The chief and immediate concern which the City felt on the news of Crassus's death, and the destruction^a of his forces, was for the detriment that

* Surena did not long rejoice in his victory: For Orodes, envying him the glory of it, and growing jealous of the great augmentation of his power and interest from his late successes, soon after caused him to be put to death. Plut in Crass.

^a The Roman writers generally imputed this disaster to Crassus's contempt of the auspices; as some Christians have since charged it to his sacrilegious violation of the temple of Je“ rusalem — both of them with equal superstition (says Dr. Middleton) pretending to unfold the counsels of heaven, and to fathom those depths, which are declared to be unsearchable. Ibid.

D. Prideaux is one of the Christians here referred to; his words are these: “ Crassus made a great number of false steps in the whole conduct of this war; and although he was often warned, yet, being deaf to all good Connect.

part. ii. p.
465. 8vo.
Ed. 1713.

that the Republic had suffered, and the dangers to which it was exposed, by the loss of so great an army; yet the principal mischief lay in what they did not at first regard, and seemed rather to rejoice at, the loss of Crassus himself. For, after the death of Julia, Crassus's authority was the only means left of curbing the power of Pompey and the ambition of Cæsar, being ready always to support the weaker against the encroachments of the stronger, and keep them both within the bounds of a decent respect to the laws: But this check being now taken away, and the power of the empire thrown, as a kind of prize, between two, it gave a new turn to their several pretensions, and created a fresh competition for the larger share.

By the death of young Crassus, a place became vacant in the college of Augurs, for which Cicero declared himself a candidate: Nor was any one so hardy as to appear against him, except Hirrus the Tribune, who, trusting to the popularity of his office, and Pompey's favour, had the vanity to pretend to it: But a competitor so unequal furnished matter of raillery only to Cicero, who was chosen without any difficulty or struggle, with the unanimous approbation of the whole body °.

Y. R. 703.
Bef. Chr.
52.
399 Col. 1.

Midd. 529.

Philip. ii.
2.
Ep. Fam.
83.

CHAP.

“good advice, he obstinately followed his “own delusions till he perished in them,
“For, being, for his impious sacrilege at Jeru“salem, justly destined to destruction, God did “cast infatuations into all his counsels, for “the leading him thereto.”

Prideaux,
part ii. p.
474.
Vid. supr.
p. 269.

The same author, speaking afterwards of the deplorable end of Pompey the Great, writes thus: “No man had enjoyed greater prosperity till he profaned the temple of God at Jerusalem: After that, his fortunes were in a continual decline, till at length, to expiate for that impiety, he was thus vilely murdered in the confines of that country where he had committed it.”

Tom.
XIII. p.
71.

M. Crevier, another Christian, speaks to the same effect with regard to both these Roman Generals. But it would seem, that D. Prideaux delivered these opinions not as peculiar to a believer of the Holy Scriptures, but as proper to every religious philosopher: For, having related how Cambyfes, King of Persia, in a rage, drew out his dagger, and ran it into the thigh of the sacred bull, the Ægyptian God Apis, of which wound the God died, he afterwards relates the death of Cambyfes in the following words—“As he mounted his horse, his sword, falling out of the scabbard, gave him a wound in the thigh, of which he died a few days after. The Ægyptians remarking, that it was in the same part of Prideaux,

part i. p.
171. p.
173.

“the body where he had wounded the Apis, “reckoned it as an especial judgment from heaven “upon him for that fact; and perchance they “were not much out in it. For it seldom hap“pening in an affront given to any particular “mode of worship, how erroneous soever it may “be, but that RELIGION is in general wounded “hereby; there are many instances in history “wherein God hath very severely punished the “profanations of RELIGION in the worst of “times, and under the worst mode of heathen “idolatry.”

° This college, from the last regulation of Midd. 529. it by Sylla, consisted of fifteen, who were all De Leg. persons of the first distinction in Rome: It was Agr. ii. 7. a priesthood for life, which no crime or forfeiture could efface: The priests of all kinds were originally chosen by their colleges, till Domitius, a Tribune, about fifty years before, transferred the choice of them to the people, whose authority was held to be superior in sacred as well as civil affairs. This act was reversed by Sylla, and the ancient right restored to the colleges; but Labienus, when Tribune, in Cicero's Consulship, repealed the law of Domitius, to facilitate Cæsar's advancement to high priesthood. It was necessary however, that every candidate should be nominated to the People by two Augurs, who gave a solemn testimony upon oath of his dignity and fitness for the office: This was done in Cicero's case

C H A P. VIII.

Scandalous proceedings of the candidates for the Consulship. MILO, who is one of them, has a fatal rencounter with CLODIUS on the Appian way, which occasions terrible tumults and mischiefs in the City. To remedy these disorders, POMPEY is elected SOLE CONSUL: He publishes several new laws, MILO is brought to trial, and, though defended by CICERO, is condemned. CICERO's conduct in relation to the sale of MILO's effects. Two of the late candidates for the Consulship are tried for bribery by POMPEY's new laws. His shameful partiality on this occasion. Two of the late Tribunes are sentenced to banishment, for their riotous proceedings in their magistracy. The government of Cilicia falls by lot to CICERO. The usurious extortion practised by M. BRUTUS [the renowned patriot-assassin.] CICERO's military achievements, His excellent conduct in the civil government of his province. APPIUS and PISO are chosen CENSORS, the last who bore that office during the Republican state of Rome.

Y. R. 701.
Mid. 530.
Plut. in
Cat.
THE candidates for the Consulship of the coming year were T. Annius Milo, Q. Metellus Scipio, and P. Plaucius Hypsæus, who pushed on their several interests with such open violence and bribery, as if the Consulship was to be carried only by money or arms. Clodius was putting in at the same time for the Prætorship, and employed all his credit and interest to disappoint Milo. Pompey was wholly averse to Milo, who did not pay him that court which he expected, but seemed to affect an independency, and to trust to his own strength, while the other two competitors were wholly at his devotion: Hypsæus had been his Quæstor, and always his creature; and as for Scipio, Pompey designed to become his son-in-law, by marrying his daughter Cornelia, a lady of celebrated accomplishments, the widow of young Crassus. Cicero, on the other hand, served Milo to the utmost of his power, and ardently wished his success.——In the heat of this competition, Curio was coming home from Asia, and expected shortly at Rome; whence Cicero sent an express to meet him on the road, or at his landing in Italy, with a most earnest and pressing letter to engage him to Milo's interest.

Ad Quint.
iii. 9.
Ep. Fam.
ii. 6.
Mid. 534. The Senate and the Aristocratical party were generally for Milo: But three of the Tribunes were violent against him, Q. Pompeius Rufus, Manatius Plancus Bursa, and Sallust the Historian; the other seven were his fast friends, but above all M. Cælius, who, out of regard to Cicero, served Milo with a particular zeal. But, while all things were proceeding very prosperously in his favour, and nothing seemed wanting to crown his success, but to bring on the election, which his adversaries for that reason laboured to keep back, all his hopes and fortunes were blasted at once by an unhappy rencounter with his old enemy Clodius.
Brut. in ii. case by Pompey and Hortensius, the two most eminent members of the college; and, after the election, he was installed with all the usual formalities by Hortensius.

Their meeting was wholly accidental on the Appian road, not far from the City; Clodius coming home from the country towards Rome, Milo going out about three in the afternoon; the first on horseback, with three companions, and thirty servants well armed; the latter in a chariot, with his wife and one friend, but with a much greater retinue, and among them some gladiators. The servants on both sides began presently to insult each other; when Clodius, turning briskly to some of Milo's men, who were nearest to him, and threatening them with his usual fierceness, received a wound in the shoulder from one of the gladiators; and, after receiving several more in the general fray, which instantly ensued, finding his life in danger, was forced to fly for shelter into a neighbouring tavern. Milo, heated by this success, and the thoughts of revenge, and reflecting that he had already done enough to give his enemy great advantage against him, should he be left alive to pursue it, resolved, whatever was the consequence, to have the pleasure of destroying him, and ordered the house to be stormed, and Clodius to be dragged out and murdered: The master of the tavern was likewise killed, with eleven of Clodius's servants, while the rest saved themselves by flight: So that Clodius's body was left in the road where it fell, till S. Tadius, a Senator, happening to come by, took it up into his chaise, and brought it with him to Rome; where it was exposed in that condition, all covered with blood and wounds, to the view of the populace, who flocked about it in crowds to lament the miserable fate of their leader. The next day the mob, headed by S. Clodius, a kinsman of the deceased, and one of his chief incendiaries, carried the body naked, so as all the wounds might be seen, into the Forum, and placed it on the Rostra, where the three Tribunes, Milo's enemies, were prepared to harangue upon it, in a stile suited to the lamentable occasion; by which they inflamed the multitude to such a height of fury, that, snatching up the body, they ran away with it into the Senate-house, and, tearing up the benches, tables, and every thing combustible, dressed up a funeral pile upon the spot, and, together with the body, burnt the house itself, with a Basilica also, or public hall adjoining, called the Porcian; and in the same fit of madness proceeded to storm the house of Milo, and of M. Lepidus the Inter-rex, but were repulsed in both attacks with some loss.

These extravagancies raised great indignation in the City; and gave a turn in favour of Milo; who, looking upon himself as undone, was meditating nothing before but a voluntary exile: But now taking courage, he appeared in public, and was introduced into the Rostra by Cælius, where he made his defence to the People; and to mitigate their resentment, distributed through all the tribes above three pounds a man to every poor Citizen,

Y. R. 701.

Quintil. l.

vi. c. 5.

Dio, l. xl.

p. 143.

Alcon.

Argum.

in Mil.

Y. R. 701. 51. 400 Conf. Citizen. But all his pains and expence were to little purpose; for the three Tribunes made it their business to keep up the ill-humour of the populace; and what was more fatal, Pompey would not be brought into any measures of accommodating the matter; so that the tumults still encreasing, the Senate passed a decree, that the Inter-rex, assisted by the Tribunes and Pompey, should take care that the Republic received no detriment; and that Pompey in particular should raise a body of troops for the common security; which he presently drew together from all parts of Italy. In this confusion the rumour of a Dictator was again industriously revived, and gave a fresh alarm to the Senate, who, to avoid the greater evil, came to the resolution of creating Pompey Consul without a colleague. Bibulus had made the motion; assigning for his reason, that by this means the Commonwealth would be freed from its present confusion; or, if it must be enslaved, would have the best master it could hope for. Every body was surprized at this language from Bibulus, who had always shewed himself an enemy of Pompey: But they were yet more surprized by what Cato said on this occasion: He declared, that, though he could never have prevailed with himself to be the author of such an advice, nevertheless, since it had been moved by another, his opinion was, that it should be followed. That any government was preferable to ANARCHY; and that he thought no man better qualified than Pompey to hold the reins of government in a time of so great disorder. Hereupon the Senate passed a decree, that Pompey should be sole Consul; and accordingly, on the twenty-fifth of February, he was, by Servius Sulpicius, the Inter-rex, declared elected alone to that magistracy. Pompey, highly pleased with the honour which Cato had done him, returned him abundant thanks for it; requesting at the same time, that he would in private give him his advice and assistance for the worthy discharge of his office. Cato answered; Pompey, you owe me no thanks: What I said in the Senate was with a view to serve the Commonwealth, not to serve you; if you consult me in private, I will freely give you my advice: And, in public, I shall always speak my opinion, though you should not ask it.

Plut. in Pomp. &
in Cat.

Dio tells us that the Senate, and Bibulus in particular, were apprehensive, at this time, lest Cæsar should be chosen one of the Consuls at the next election, and for that reason took this unprecedented step: Which, if true, sufficiently accounts for Cato's favour to Pompey: For the reader must have already observed, and will hereafter have fresh occasion to observe, that the main spring of some of Cato's political movements was neither the love of virtue, nor the love of his Country, but a personal hatred to Cæsar.

Midd. 537. Dio, xl. 143. Acon. Argum. in Mil. Midd. 548. Pompey applied himself immediately to calm the public disorders, by the promulgation of several new laws*, prepared by him for that purpose. One of them was, to appoint a special commission to enquire into Clodius's death, the burning of the Senate-house, and the attack on M. Lepidus;

* Cicero seems to have written his Treatise on Laws soon after the death of Clodius.

and

and to appoint an extraordinary Judge of Consular rank to preside in it: Y. R. 701. Bcf. Chr. 51. 400 Cons. A second was against bribery and corruption in elections, with the infliction of new and severer penalties on those who had been guilty. Cato, according to Plutarch, objected to this law, as unjust with regard to past offences; and he advised him to provide only for the future. Appian reports, that, by Pompey's new law, all who, from the time of his first Consulate, (twenty years before) had been in any public office, might be called to account for corruption in obtaining it, or male-administration in the exercise of it. At this space of time comprised the Consulate of Cæsar, those of his party imagined there was a design to affront him; and they hinted what they thought to Pompey. He answered them, that their suspicion was injurious to Cæsar, whose conduct, being out of the reach of censure, secured him from all danger. Appian adds, that Pompey shortened the retrospect to his second Consulate; but would not entirely drop the new law. [App. de Bell. Civ. lib. ii. p. 441.]

By these laws the method of trials was altered, and the length of them Mid. 537. limited: Three days were allowed for the examination of witnesses, and the fourth for the sentence; on which the accuser was to have two hours only to enforce the charge; the criminal three for his defence^b. Cælius opposed his negative to these laws, as being rather privileges than laws, and provided particularly against Milo; but he was soon obliged to withdraw it, upon Pompey's declaring that he would support them by force of arms.

Pompey was the only man in Rome who had the power to bring Milo to Ibid. 539. a trial. He was not concerned for Clodius's death, or for the manner of it, but rather pleased that the Republic was freed from so pestilent a demagogue; yet he resolved to take the benefit of the occasion for getting rid of Milo too, from whose ambition and high spirit he had cause to apprehend no less trouble. He would not listen therefore to any overtures from Milo's friends; and when Milo offered to drop his suit for the Consulship, if that would satisfy him, he answered, That he would not concern himself with any man's suing or desisting, nor give any obstruction to the power and inclination of the Roman People. He attended the trial in person with a strong guard, to preserve peace and prevent any violence from either side.

When the examination was over (in which many clear and positive truths were produced against Milo) Manutius Plancus called the People together, and exhorted them to appear in a full body the next day, when judgment was to be given, and to declare their sentiments in so public a manner, that the criminal might not be suffered to escape; which Cicero

Mid. 537. ^b Tacitus seems to consider this regulation as the first step towards the ruin of the Roman eloquence, by imposing reins, as it were, upon its free and ancient course. Primus

tertio consulatu Cæ. Pompeius astrinxit, imposuitque veluti frænos eloquentiæ — &c. Dialog. de Orator. 38.

Y. R. 701. in his defence of Milo, reflects upon as an insult on the liberty of the bench.

Afron. Early in the morning, on the eleventh of April, the shops were all shut, and the whole City gathered into the Forum, where the avenues were possessed by Pompey's soldiers, and he himself seated in a conspicuous part, to overlook the whole proceeding, and hinder all disturbance.

The accusers were young Appius, the nephew of Clodius, M. Antonius, and P. Valerius; who, according to the new law, employed two hours in supporting their indictment.

Cicero was the only advocate on Milo's side; but, as soon as he rose up to speak, he was received with so rude a clamour by the Clodians, that he was much discomposed and daunted at his first setting out; yet recovered spirit enough to go through his speech of three hours; which was taken down in writing, and published as it was delivered; though the copy of it now extant is supposed to have been retouched and corrected by him afterwards [or rather a new composition] for a present to Milo in his exile.

In the council of Milo's friends, several were of opinion, that he should defend himself by avowing the death of Clodius, and pleading that it was an act of public benefit: But Cicero thought that defence too desperate, as it would disgust the grave, by opening so great a door to licence; and offend the powerful, lest the precedent should be extended to themselves. But young Brutus [discovering from his early years, an apt and promising genius for the glorious business of assassination] in an oration, which he composed and published in vindication of Milo, maintained the killing of Clodius to be right and just, and of great service to the Republic.

Mid. 541. It was notorious that they had often threatened death to each other:
Pro Mil. Clodius had declared several times, both to the Senate and the People,
9. that Milo ought to be killed, and that, if the Consulship could not be taken from him, his life could: And when Favonius asked him once, what hopes he could have of playing his pranks while Milo was living; he replied, that in three or four days at most he should live no more; which was spoken just three days before the fatal rencounter, and attested by Favonius. Since Milo then was charged with being the contriver of their meeting, and the aggressor in it, and several testimonies were produced to that purpose, Cicero chose to risk the cause on that issue, in hopes to persuade, that Clodius actually laid wait for Milo, and contrived the time and place; and Milo's part was but a necessary act of self-defence. This had somewhat of a plausibility, from the nature of the equipage, and the circumstances in which they met: For though Milo's was the more numerous, yet it was much more encumbered and unfit for an engagement than his adversary's; he himself being in a chariot with his wife, and all her women along with her; while Clodius with his followers were on horseback, as if prepared and equipt for fighting. He did not preclude himself however ever by this from the other plea^c, which he often takes care to insinuate, Y. R. 701.

that if Milo had really designed and contrived to kill Clodius, he would have deserved honours instead of punishment, for cutting off so desperate and dangerous an enemy to the peace and liberty of Rome. Pro Mil. 28, &c.

Of one-and-fifty Judges, who sat upon Milo, thirteen only acquitted Midd. 544.
 and thirty-eight condemned him: The votes were usually given by ballots;
 but Cato, who absolved him, chose to give his vote openly; and, if he had done it earlier, says Velleius, would have drawn others after him.

Milo went into exile at Marseilles a few days after his condemnation; and his whole estate was sold by public auction for the satisfaction of his creditors^d.

Philotimus, a freedman of Cicero's wife, bought this estate, in partner- Melm.
 ship with some others, at an under value. It was thought strange, that vol. I. p. 298.
Cicero should suffer Philotimus, who acted as a sort of steward in his family, to engage in the purchase of a banished man's estate, such purchases being always looked upon as odious; and this was particularly so, Cicero having received great obligations from Milo. Accordingly the latter complained of it in the letters he wrote to his friends at Rome. This alarmed Cicero for his reputation; and he seems to have written to Cælius, as he did to several others of his correspondents, to accommodate this affair in the way that would be most for his honour. He pleaded in his justification an intent of serving Milo; yet it appears very evidently, from the following letters to Atticus on this subject, that he shared with Philotimus in the advantages of the purchase.

“ They write to me from Rome, that they have seen letters from Milo, Ad Att. v. 8.
 “ who complains of my having suffered Philotimus to enter into partner“ ship with those who bought his estate: Yet I did it by the advice of “ Duronius, Milo's particular friend, and whom you know to be an ho“ nest man. Our view was to hinder his falling into the hands of stran“ gers, and oppressive people, who might have demanded a great num“ ber of slaves that he has with him. We were, in the next place, de“ sirous, that the provision which he intended should be made for his “ wife might be secured. We likewise thought, that, if there was a “ possibility of saving any thing for him, we could manage that matter

^c Asconius speaks as if Cicero approved neither the use of this plea in the present case, nor the doctrine itself whereon the plea is founded. — Respondit his [accusatoribus] unus M. Cicero, & cum quibusdam placuisset, ita defendi crimen, interfici Clodium pro Republica fuisse (quam formam Marcus Brutus secutus est in ea oratione quam pro Milone composuit & edidit, quamvis non egisset) Ciceroni id non placuit, quod quis bono publico damnari, idem etiam occidi indemnatus posset.

Nevertheless Cicero, in the case of Catiline's accomplices, seems to have followed this maxim, That whoever may, for the public good, be justly condemned, may, for the same public good, be justly put to death without trial and condemnation.

^d Milo had wasted three estates in giving Midd. 531.
 plays and shews to the People; and when he went into exile was found to owe above half a million of our money. Plin. lib. xvi. 15.
Ascon. Argum. in Milon.

Y R 701. " better than any body else. Endeavour, I beseech you, to search this Bef. Chr. " whole matter to the bottom; for things are often magnified in the rela-400 Cens. " tion. But if it be true that Milo complains, and writes to his friends on " this head, and if Fausta be of the same mind, Philotimus shall not have " any concern in the purchase; for I made him promise, before I left " Rome, that, without Milo's consent, he would not. The profit has not " been any thing considerable: But you will judge. Talk with Duronius.
 " I have writ to Camillus and to Lamia, being uncertain whether you were " at Rome. In a word, you will resolve to act as honesty, reputation, and " my interest shall require."

Mong.
Tome III.
p. 22. [We see here, says an ingenious writer, Cicero's reasons for his friendly officiousness; but I doubt whether they will convince any body, that interest was not his principal motive; and the rather, as Milo's goods were sold greatly under value. It appears by two other letters to Atticus, and by one from Cælius to Cicero, that Philotimus restored to Milo the estates he had bought, on condition of allowing him a certain profit, in which Cicero was a sharer.]

Ad Att.
vi. 4. " I have one thing more to mention to you. I shall write mysteriously,
 " but you will guess my meaning. My wife's freedman (you know whom
 " I speak of) has embezzled, as I judge by his lame account, part of the " profit made by the purchase of the estate of the Crotoniate Tyrant-killer *.
 " If you guess the meaning of this last word, you will understand all the " rest. I dare not be more explicit."

Ibid. 5. " Do not forget the affair I wrote to you about in my last letter; where
 " I told you, that I have for some time suspected, from the confused in" consistent talk of my wife's freedman in several companies, that he " has not given me a faithful account of the profits arising to me from the " purchase of the Crotoniate's estate.——While I suffered him to be " here, I was constantly upon my guard: For he came to sound me, in " the hopes that I would remit somewhat of what he owes me; but, find" ing himself disappointed, he flung away at once——I will be gone; it " would be shameful to me for stay any longer, and at last go away with empty
 " hands: And he twitted me with the old proverb, A gift admits of no ac-
 " counting;" or, as Mongault translates the passage, We should be content
 " with what is given. By this (says the ingenious French writer) Philotimus
 " intimated to Cicero, that he ought to be satisfied with his yielding to him
 " part of the profit he had made by the purchase of Milo's estate, since " his name had never been mentioned in the purchase. The proverb, of which " Cicero cites here only the first words, τα μὴ δίδωμεν——is in the Gorgias of Plato,
 " and answers to the English proverb, We should not look a Gift-horse in the " mouth. From all this, I think, we may conclude, that Philotimus had " Cicero in his power.

* Milo, who carried an ox upon his back at the Olympic games, was of Crotona. The Milk, now in question, is called Tyrant-killer, because he killed Clodius.

—“ As to what concerns the behaviour of Philotimus, in relation to “ Milo’s estate, I have endeavoured that he shall act in such a manner as to “ give full satisfaction to Milo and his friends, and at the same time clear “ your character from all imputation.”

Ep. Fam.
 l. viii.
 Ep. 3.

The next trial before the same tribunal, and for the same crime, was of M. Sausenius, one of Milo’s confidants, charged with being the ringleader in storming the house, and killing Clodius. Cicero defended him, and he was acquitted by one vote only: But being accused a second time on the same account, though for a different fact, and again defended by Cicero, he was acquitted by a great majority. But Sex. Clodius, the Captain of the other side, was condemned and banished, with several others of that faction, for burning the Senate-house, and the other violences committed upon Clodius’s death.

Midd. p.
 545--547.

Pompey no sooner published his new law against bribery, than the late Consular candidates, Scipio and Hypsæus, were severally impeached upon it, and, being both of them notoriously guilty, were in great danger of being condemned: But Pompey, calling the Judges together, begged it of them as a favour, that out of the great number of state criminals they would remit Scipio to him: Whom, after he had rescued from the prosecution, he declared his colleague in the Consulship for the last five months of the year; having first made him his father-in-law, by marrying his daughter Cornelia, a lady of fine accomplishments. The other candidate Hypsæus, was left to the mercy of the law, and being likely to fare the worse for Scipio’s escape, he watched an opportunity of access to Pompey, as he was coming out of his bath; and, throwing himself at his feet, implored his protection: But, though he had been his Quæstor, and ever obsequious to his will, yet Pompey is said to have spurned him away with great haughtiness and inhumanity, telling him, that he would only spoil his supper by detaining him.¹

Before

Midd. 550. * Pompey was preparing an inscription this summer for the front of the new temple, which he had lately built to Venus the Conqueress, containing, as usual, the recital of all his titles: But, in drawing it up, a question happened to be started about the manner of expressing his third Consulship, whether it should be by Consul, Tertium, or Tertio. This was referred to the principal critics of Rome, who could not, it seems, agree about it. Pompey therefore left it to Cicero to decide the matter: But Cicero, being unwilling to give judgment on either side, when there were great authorities on both, and Varro among them, advised Pompey to order TEXT. only to be inscribed, which fully declared the thing, without determining the dispute.

A Gell.
 x. 1.

¹ Cn. autem Pompeius quam insolenter? Qui balneo egressus ante pedes suos prostratum Hypsæum ambitus reum & nobilem virum & sibi amicum, jacentem reliquit, contumeliosa voce proculcatum. Nihil enim eum aliud agere, quam ut convivium suum moraretur, respondit.—Ille vero P. Scipionem socerum suum, legibus noxium quas ipse tulerat, in maxima quidem reorum & illustrium ruina muneris loco a iudicibus deposcere—Val. Max. ix. 3. It. Plut. in Pomp.

This is that Pompey of whom Cicero says, that he knew him to be a man of integrity,

Y. R. 701. Before the end of the year, two of the late Tribunes, whose office was Bef. Chr. just expired, Q. Pompeius Rufus, and T. Munatius Plancus Bursa, were
51. tried, condemned, and banished, for the violences of their Tribunate, and 400 Conf. burning the Senate-house. Cælius accused the first, Cicero the second, the only cause, excepting that of Verres, in which he ever acted the part of an accuser. It seems Bursa had been formerly defended by him, and had proved ungrateful. Pompey, before Judges of his own appointing, pleaded the cause of Bursa: Yet he was condemned by an unanimous vote of the whole bench.

Midd. 550. Among the other acts of Pompey, in this his third Consulship, there
Dio, p. was a new law against bribery, contrived to strengthen the old ones
142. that were already subsisting against it, by disqualifying all future Consuls and Prætors from holding any province till five years after the expiration of their Magistracies: For this was thought likely to give some check to the eagerness of suing and bribing for those great offices, when the chief fruit and benefit of them was removed to such a distance. But, before the law passed, Pompey took care to provide an exception for himself, and to Ad Ant. get the government of Spain continued to him for five years longer, with an
vii. 1. appointment of money to pay his troops: And, lest this should give offence Suet. J. to Cæsar, if something of an extraordinary kind was not provided for him
Cæf. 26. too, he proposed a law to dispense with Cæsar's presence in suing for the Consulship, of which Cæsar at that time seemed very desirous. Cælius was the promoter of this law, engaged to it by Cicero, at the joint request of Pompey and Cæsar; and it was carried with the concurrence of all the Tribunes, though not without difficulty and obstruction from the Senate.

Midd. 551. By Pompey's law, just now mentioned, it was provided, that, for a supply of governors for the interval of five years, in which the Consuls and Ad Ant. Prætors were disqualified, the Senators of Consular and Prætorian rank, who
v. 15. had never held any foreign command, should divide the vacant provinces among themselves by lot: In consequence of which, Cicero, who was obliged to take his chance with the rest, obtained the government ² of Cilicia, now
in

Ad. Ant. an honest, sincere, and grave man — hominem
xi. 6. integrum, & castum, & gravem, cognovi.
Vol. II. P. And Dr. Middleton is of opinion, that this 132. was his true character. Nevertheless the Reader, I imagine, will not judge that this grave Pompey was a proper Person to be invested with that DICTATORIAL POWER, Vid. supr. which the Doctor thinks was necessary, in the
p. 556. present disorders of the Republic, to reduce it to a tolerable state.

Midd. These preferments were, of all others,
vol. II. p. the most ardently desired by the Great, for 1 and 2. the advantages which they afforded both of acquiring power and amassing wealth: For their command, though accountable to the Roman People, was absolute and uncontrollable in the province; where they kept up the state and pride of sovereign princes, and had all the neighbouring Kings paying a court to them, and attending their orders. If their genius was turned to arms, and fond of martial glory, they could never want a pretext for war, since it was easy to drive the subjects into rebellion, or the adjoining nations to acts of hostility by their oppressions and injuries, till, from the destruction of a number of innocent people, they had acquired the title of Emperor, and with it the pretension to a triumph,

in the hands of Appius, the late Consul. This province included also Pisidia, Pamphilia, and three dioceses, as they are called, or districts of Asia, together with the island of Cyprus; for the guard of all which a standing army was kept of two legions, or about twelve thousand foot, with two thousand six hundred horse. But, whatever benefit or glory this government seemed to offer, it had no charms for Cicero: The thing itself was disagreeable to his temper, nor worthy of his talents, which (in his own opinion) were formed to sit at the helm, and shine in the administration of the whole Republic: So that he considered it only as an honourable exile, or a burden imposed by his Country, to which his duty obliged him to submit. His first care therefore was to provide, that this command might not be prolonged to him beyond the usual term of a year. Before his departure he solicited all his friends not to suffer such a mortification to fall upon him. He left the City about the first of May, attended by his brother, and their two sons: For Quintus, in order to accompany him in the post of Lieutenant, had quitted his Lieutenantcy under Cæsar.

When Cicero arrived at Tarentum, he made a visit to Pompey, who was taking the benefit of that soft air for the recovery of his health at one of his villas in those parts, and had invited and pressed him to spend some days with him upon his journey: They proposed great satisfaction on both

umph, without which scarce any Proconsul was ever known to return from a remote and frontier province*. Their opportunities of raising money were as immense as their power, and bounded only by their own appetites: The appointments of the treasury, for their equipage, plate, and necessary furniture, amounted, as it appears, from some instances, to near a hundred and fifty thousand pounds: And besides the revenues of kingdoms, and pay of armies, of which they had the arbitrary management, they could exact what contributions they pleased, not only from the cities of their own jurisdiction, but from all the states and princes around them, who were under the protection of Rome. But, while their primary care was to enrich themselves, they carried out with them always a band of hungry friends and dependents, as their Lieutenants, Tribunes, Praefects, with a crew of freedmen and favourite slaves, who were all likewise to be enriched by the spoils of the province, and the sale of their master's favours. Hence flowed all those accusations and trials for the plunder of the subjects, of which we read so much in the Roman writers: For as few or none of the Proconsuls behaved themselves with that exact justice as to leave no room for complaint, so the factions of the City, and the quarrels of families, subsisting from former impeachments, generally excited some or other to revenge the affront in kind, by undertaking the cause of an injured province, and dressing up an impeachment against their enemy.

* While the ancient discipline of the Republic subsisted, no General could pretend to a triumph who had not enlarged the bounds of the empire by his conquests, and killed at least five thousand enemies in battle, without any considerable loss of his own soldiers. This was expressly enacted by an old law: In support of which, a second was afterwards provided, that made it penal for any of their triumphal Commanders to give a false account of the number of slain, either on the enemies side or their own, and obliged them, upon their entrance into the City, to take an oath before the Quæstors, or public Treasurers, that the accounts which they had sent to the Senate of each number was true. [Val. Max. ii. 8.] But these laws had long been neglected, and treated as obsolete; and the honour of a triumph usually granted, by intrigue and faction, to every General of any credit who had gained some little advantage against pirates or fugitives, or repelled the incursions of the wild barbarians who bordered upon the distant provinces.

Y. R. 701.
Bef. Chr.
51.
400 Conf.
Midd.
vol. II. p.
3.
Ep. Fam.
ii. 11.
Ad. Att.
v. 10 &
15.
Y. R. 702.
S. Sulpicius and
M. Marcellus,
Consuls.
Midd. p.
7.
Ad Att.
v. 6, 7, 8, 9.

Y. R. 702
Bef. Cui.
52.
407. Conf. sides from this interview, for the opportunity of conferring together with all freedom on the present state of the Republic, which was to be their subject: And Cicero expected likewise to get some lessons of the military kind from this renowned Commander. He promised Atticus an account of this conference; but, the particulars being too delicate to be communicated by letter, he acquainted him only in general, that he found Pompey an excellent Citizen, and provided for all events that could possibly be apprehended.

Vid. supra.
P. 555. After three days stay with Pompey he proceeded to Brundisium, where he was detained for twelve days by a slight indisposition, and the expectation of his principal officers, particularly of his Lieutenant Pontinius, an experienced leader, the same who had triumphed over the Allobroges, and on whose skill he chiefly depended in his martial affairs. From Brundisium he sailed to Atinum on the fifteenth of June; whence partly by sea, and partly by land, he arrived, on the twenty-sixth, at Athens, where he spent ten days, and where Pontinius at length joined him.

Midd. p.
12. Upon leaving Italy he charged his friend Calius with the task^a of sending him the news of Rome; and, while he was at Athens, he received from him the first letter of intelligence.

Calius to Cicero.

Ep. Fam.
viii. 1.
Melm.
iii. 25. " AGREEABLY to my promise when we parted, I have sent you a full account of every event that has happened since you left Rome. For this purpose I employed a person to collect the news of the Town, and am only afraid you will think he has executed his office much too punctually, &c. &c.

" M. Marcellus [the Consul] not having yet moved that Cæsar may be recalled from his government in Gaul, and intending to defer it, as he told me himself, to the first of June, it has occasioned the revival of those suspicions to his disadvantage, which so strongly prevailed when you were here. If you saw Pompey, as you designed to do, pray send me word in what temper you found him; what conversation he had with you; and what you could discover of his designs: For, though he seldom speaks his real sentiments, he has not wit enough to conceal them.

^a Calius (who, by his father, had been introduced to Cicero's acquaintance and friendship) performed the task very punctually, in a series of letters, which made a considerable part in the collection of his Familiar Epistles; and as they contain the jealousies and fears which gave birth to the civil war which soon broke out, it may not be disagreeable to the Reader to present him with some extracts of them. He had been Tribune of the People in 701, the year before this letter was written, and had distinguished himself in that office, by zealously supporting the interests of the Aristocratical Faction. His morals were suitable to the degenerate age in which he lived; luxurious and dissolute; and his temper was remarkably inflammable, and apt to kindle into the most implacable resentment. Vid. Ad. Att. v. 2. Melm.

" As

“ As for Cæsar, there are many ugly reports about him; but propagated
 “ only in whispers: some say that he has lost all his cavalry; which I “ take indeed to be true: others, that the seventh legion has been beaten,
 “ and that he himself is so surrounded and besieged by the *Bellovaci,
 “ that he cannot receive succours from the main body of his army. There “ is nothing yet certain; nor are these uncertain stories publicly talked of;
 “ but among a few, whom I need not name, told openly by way of se“ crets: *Domitius*¹ never mentions them without clapping his hand to his “ mouth, &c.”

Y R. 702.
 * A people of the Bel-gic Gaul.

M. T. Cicero to M. Calius.

“ Could you seriously then imagine, my friend, that I commissioned “ you to send me the idle news of the town; matches of gladiators, ad-“ journments of causes, robberies, &c. — ? Far other are the accounts “ which I expect from your hand, as I know not any man whose judgment
 “ in politics I have more reason to value. ——— I passed several days with “ Pompey, conversing with him on nothing else but the Republic: But it “ is neither prudent nor possible to give you the particulars in a letter.
 “ Take this only from me, that *Pompey is an excellent Citizen*², prepared “ both with courage and counsel for all events which can be foreseen: Where“ fore give yourself up to the man; believe me, he will embrace you;
 “ for he now holds the same opinion with us of good and bad Citizens.
 “ I have been ten days at Athens, and am just now leaving it, this sixth of “ July. As I earnestly recommend all my affairs to your care, so no“ thing more particularly, than that the time of my provincial command “ be not prolonged. ——— Farewel.”

Ep. Fam.
 ii. 8.
 Melm. iii.
 28. [dated
 July 6.
 702.]

Cicero set sail for Asia the sixth of July, and landed at Ephesus on the “ twenty-second, after a slow¹ but safe passage of fifteen days. Having re“ posed himself for three days at Ephesus, he marched forwards towards his “ province; and on the last of July arrived at Laodicea, one of the capital

Midd. 14.
 Ad Att. i.
 13 & 15.

¹ This is Domitius, the decree-forging Consul, and the declared enemy of Cæsar. Vid.
supra, p. 507.

² “ Cicero so often changed his opinion, or “ at least his language, in regard to Pompey, “ that it is difficult to determine what his “ true sentiments of him were. It is pro“ bable, however, that he here speaks the “ dictates of his real thoughts, not only as he “ gives the same account to Atticus, but be“ cause Pompey received him with particular “ civility; a circumstance which seems at all “ times to have had a very considerable in“ fluence upon Cicero’s judgment concerning

“ the characters and designs of men.” Vid.
Ad. Att. v. 6, 7.

¹ The tediousness of this voyage was agreeably relieved by touching on the way at several of the islands of the Ægean sea, of which he sends a kind of journal to Atticus. Many deputations from the cities of Asia, and a great concourse of people, came to meet him as far as Samos; but a much greater still was expecting his landing at Ephesus: The Greeks flocked eagerly from all parts to see a man, so celebrated through the empire for the fame of his learning and eloquence; so that all his boastings, as he merrily says, of many years past were now brought to the test.

Midd. p.
 14.

Melm.
 vol. I. p.
 290.

Y. R. 702. cities of his jurisdiction. From this moment the date of his government
 Bef. Chr. commenced; which he bids Atticus take notice of, that he might know 401 50. how to compute the precise extent of his annual term.

Midd. p. 14. It was Cicero's resolution, in his provincial command, to practise those admirable rules which he had drawn up formerly for his brother; and from an employment wholly tedious and disagreeable to him, to derive fresh glory upon his character, by leaving the innocence and integrity of his administration as a pattern of governing to all succeeding Proconsuls.

Ad Att. 7. 9, 10, 11. When any governors went abroad to their provinces, the custom had always been, that the countries through which they passed should defray the charges of their journey: But Cicero no sooner set his foot on foreign ground, than he forbade all expences whatsoever, public or private, to be made either upon himself or any of his company; which raised a great admiration of him in the cities of Greece. In Asia he did the same, not suffering his officers to accept, what was due to them even by law, forage and wood for firing, Ibid. 16, 17. nor any thing else, but mere house-room, with four beds; which he remitted also, as oft as was practicable, and obliged them to lodge in their tents; and by his example and constant exhortations, brought his Lieutenants, Tribunes, and Præfects, so fully into his measures, that they all concurred with him, he says, wonderfully in a jealous concern for his honour.

Midd. 16. About the twenty-fourth of August he went to the camp of Iconium in Lycaonia, where he had no sooner reviewed the troops than he received an Ep. Fam. account from Antiochus, King of Comagene, which was confirmed from the
 xv. 1. other princes of those parts, that the Parthians had passed the Euphrates with a mighty force under the conduct of Pacorus, the King's son, in order to invade the Roman territory. Upon this news he marched towards Cilicia, to secure his province from the inroads of the enemy, or any commotions within: But as all access to it was difficult, except on the side of Cappado- cia, an open country, and not well provided, he took his route through that Kingdom, and encamped in that part of it which bordered upon Cilicia, near to the town of Cybistra, at the foot of mount Taurus. His army, as it is said above, consisted of about twelve thousand foot and two thousand six hundred horse, besides the auxiliary troops of the neighbouring states, and especially of Dejotarus, King of Galatia, the most faithful ally of Rome, and Cicero's particular friend; whose whole forces he could depend upon at any warning.

Ibid. 2, 3, 4. While he lay in this camp he had an opportunity of executing a special commission, with which he was charged by the Senate; to take Ariobar- zanes, King of Cappadocia, under his particular protection; and provide for the security of his person and government: In honour of whom the Senate had decreed, what they had never done before to any foreign Prince, that his safety was of concern to the Senate and People of Rome.
 His father had been killed by the treachery of his subjects, and a conspiracy

spiracy of the same kind was apprehended against the son: Cicero therefore, in a council of his officers, gave the King an account of the decree of the Senate, and that, in consequence of it, he was then ready to assist him with his troops and authority in any measures that should be concerted for the safety and quiet of his Kingdom.—The King, after great professions of his thanks and duty to the Senate for the honour of their decree, and to Cicero himself for his care in the execution of it, said, that he knew no occasion for giving him any particular trouble at that time, nor had any suspicion of any design against his life or crown: Upon which Cicero, after congratulating him upon the tranquillity of his affairs, advised him however to remember his father's fate, and from the admonitions of the Senate, to be particularly vigilant in the care of his person; and so they parted.
 But the next morning the King returned early to the camp, attended by his brother and counsellors, and with many tears implored the protection of Cicero, and the benefit of the Senate's decree, declaring, “ that he had “ received undoubted intelligence of a plot, which those, who were privy
 “ to it, durst not venture to discover till Cicero's arrival in the Country;
 “ but, trusting to his authority, had now given him information of it;
 “ and that his brother, who was present, and ready to confirm what he “ had said, had been solicited to enter into it by the offer of the crown:
 “ He begged, therefore, that some of Cicero's troops might be left with “ him for his better guard and defence.” Cicero told him, “ that, under “ the present alarm of the Parthian war, he could not possibly lend him “ any part of his army; that, since the conspiracy was detected, his own “ forces would be sufficient for preventing the effects of it; that he should “ learn to act the King, by shewing a proper concern for his own life,
 “ and exert his regal power in punishing the authors of the plot, and par“ doning all the rest; that he need not apprehend any farther danger,
 “ when his people were acquainted with the Senate's decree, and saw a “ Roman army so near to them, and ready to put it in execution.” And having thus encouraged and comforted the King, he marched towards Ci- licia, and gave an account of this accident, and of the motions of the Par- thians, in two public letters to the Consuls and Senate^m.

While

^m He added a private letter also to Cato who was a particular favourer of Ariobar- zanes, in which he informed him “ that he “ had not only secured the King's person from “ any attempt, but had taken care, that he “ should reign for the future with honour and “ dignity, by restoring to his favour and ser“ vice his old Counsellors, whom Cato had re“ commended, and who had been disgraced by “ the intrigues of his court; and by obliging
 “ a turbulent young priest of Bellona, who
 VOL. III.

“ was the head of the malecontents, and the “ next in power to the King himself, to quit
 “ the country.”

This King, Ariobarzanes, seems to have been poor even to a proverb: Midd. 18.

Manicipiis locuples, eget æris Cappadocum rex.
 Hor. Ep. i. 6.

For he had been miserably squeezed and drained by the Roman Generals and Governors, to whom he owed vast sums, either actually

4 B

Y. R. 701.

Ad Ant.
v. 23.

While he lay encamped in Cappadocia, expecting what way the Parthians would move, he received an account that they had taken a different route, and were advanced to Antioch in Syria, where they held C. Cassius blocked up; and that a detachment of them had actually penetrated into Cilicia, but were routed and cut off by those troops which were left to guard the country. Upon this he presently decamped, and, by great journeys over Mount Taurus, marched in all haste to possess himself of the passes of Amanus, a great and strong mountain, lying between Syria and Cilicia, and the common boundary of them both. By this march, and the approach of his army to the neighbourhood of Syria, the Parthians, being discouraged, retired from Antioch, which gave Cassius an opportunity of falling upon them in their retreat, and gaining a considerable advantage, in which one of their principal commanders, Olaces, was mortally wounded.

In the suspense of the Parthian war, which the late disgrace of Crassus had made terrible at Rome, Cicero's friends, who had no great opinion of his military talents, were in some pain for his safety and success, as appears by the following letter from Calpurnius.

ly borrowed, or stipulated to be paid for particular services. It was a common practice with the great men of Rome, to lend money, at an exorbitant interest, to the Princes and Cities dependent on the empire. The ordinary interest of the provincial loans was one per cent. by the month, with interest upon interest: This was the lowest; but it was frequently four times as much. Pompey received monthly, from this very King, above six thousand pounds sterling; which yet was short of his full interest. Brutus also had lent him a very large sum, and earnestly desired Cicero to procure the payment of it, with the arrears of interest: But Pompey's agents were so pressing and the King so needy, that, though Cicero solicited Brutus's affair very heartily, he had little hopes of getting any thing for him. When Ariobarzanes came, therefore, to offer him the same present of money which he had usually made to every other Governor, he generously refused, and desired only, that, instead of giving it to him, he would pay it to Brutus: But the poor Prince was so distressed, that he excused himself by the necessity which he was under of satisfying some other more pressing demands; so that Cicero gives a sad account of his negotiation in a long letter to Atticus, who had warmly recommended Brutus's interest to him.

Ad Ant.
vi. 1.
Y. 703.

"—I come now to Brutus, whom, by your authority, I embraced with inclination, and begun even to love: But—what am I going to say? I recall myself, lest I offend you.—Do not think that I ever entered into any thing more willingly, or took more pains, than in what he recommended to me. He gave me a memorial of the particulars which you have talked over with me before: I pursued your instructions exactly: In the first place I pressed Ariobarzanes to give to Brutus that money which he promised to me. As long the King continued with me, all things looked well; but he was afterwards seized by six hundred of Pompey's agents; and Pompey, for other reasons, can do more with him than all the world besides; but especially when it is imagined that he is to be sent to the Parthian war: They now pay Pompey thirty-three Attic talents per month out of the taxes; though this falls short of a month's interest: But our friend Calpurnius takes it calmly; and is content to abate somewhat of the interest without pressing for the principal. As for others, he neither does nor can pay any man: For he has no treasury, no revenues: He raises taxes by Appian's method of capitation: But these are scarce sufficient for Pompey's monthly pay: Two or three of the King's friends are very rich; but they hold their own as closely as either you or I.—I do not forbear however to ask, urge, and chide him by letters: King Demetrius also told me, that he had sent people to him on purpose to solicit for Brutus; but they brought him word back, that he had really no money: Which I take indeed to be the case; that nothing is more drained than his Kingdom; nothing poorer than the King."

Marcus Cælius to Cicero.

Y. R. 702.

“ We have received an express from Caius Cassius, and another from “ Deiotarus, which greatly alarm us. The former writes that the Par- “ thian army had passed the Euphrates, and the latter, that they are “ actually marching towards your province, by the way of Comagene.
 “ As I well know how ill provided you are with troops, the principal “ concern I feel from this invasion, with respect to you, is, lest you should “ be a loser by it in point of reputation. Had you been better prepared “ indeed to receive the enemy, I should have been in great pain for your “ life: But, as the very small number of your forces will incline you,
 “ I imagine, rather to think of a retreat than an engagement, I am only “ anxious concerning your honour. For how far the world may consider “ the necessity of the case, and approve of your thus declining a battle, “ is a point, I confess, which gives me much uneasy reflection. In short,
 “ I shall be in continual anxiety, till I hear of your arrival in Italy.
 “ In the mean time, this news of the Parthians has occasioned a variety “ of speculations. Some are of opinion, that Pompey ought to be sent “ against them: And others, that it is by no means convenient that he “ should leave Rome. A third party is for assigning this expedition to “ Cæsar and his army; whilst a fourth names the Consuls as the most “ proper persons to be employed. But all agree, however, in being silent “ as to any decree of the Senate for placing this command in private hands.
 “ The Consuls, in the apprehension that they shall either be nominated “ to a commission which they do not relish, or suffer the disgrace of its “ being given from them, forbear to convene the Senate: And by this “ means incur the censure of neglecting the public interest. But whether “ indolence or pusillanimity be the real motive of their declining the “ conduct of this war, it is concealed under the specious appearance how“ ever of modesty.

“ As we have received no courier from you, it was suspected, till the “ dispatch from Deiotarus arrived, that the whole was an invention
 “ of Cassius, who, it was thought, in order to colour his own rapine,
 “ had suffered a parcel of Arabs to make an incursion into the province,
 “ and then represented them to the Senate as a formidable body of Par- “ thians. Whatever therefore may be the true state of the affair, let me “ persuade you to be extremely circumspect in giving a faithful and ac“ curate account of it to the Senate: That you may neither be reproached “ with magnifying matters, in order to gratify the private purposes of “ Cassius, nor with concealing any thing which may be of importance for “ the public to know.

“ It is now the eighteenth of November; and as we are advanced thus far “ towards the end of the year, I do not see that any thing can be done

Ep. Fam.
viii. 10.
Melm. iv.
138 (dated 18th Novemb.)

Y. R. 702.
Bel. Chr.
50.
421 Conf.

* One of the Consuls elect.

“ in this affair till the first of January. For you know how slow and in“ active Marcellus is upon all occasions, and are no stranger to the “ dilatory disposition of Sulpicius: You will easily judge therefore what is “ to be expected from two men of this unperforming cast; and that those “ who usually act with so much coldness as to make one doubt their in“ clinations, even in points they really desire to effect, will not be very “ warm in forwarding a business to which they are certainly averse.

“ If the Partbian war should become a serious matter, the new Magi“ strates will be engaged for the first two or three months of their office in “ adjusting the proper measures to be taken in this conjuncture. On the “ other hand, if it should appear to be an invasion of no consequence, “ or such at least, as, with the supply of a few additional troops, may “ easily be repelled by you and the other Proconsuls already in those pro“ vinces, or by your successors: Curio, I foresee, will begin to play his “ double game; that is, he will in the first place attempt to weaken the “ authority of Cæsar; and in the next, endeavour to throw some little “ advantages on the side of Pompey. As for *Paullus, he declares most “ vehemently against suffering Cæsar to continue in Gaul; And our “ friend Furnius is the only Tribune whom I suspect of obstructing his “ measures for that purpose. You may depend upon these articles as “ certain: But beyond these I cannot with any assurance pronounce.
“ Time indeed may produce much; as many schemes I know are con“ certed: But they all turn upon the points I have already specified.—
“ I forgot to mention, that Curio designs to make an attempt to procure “ a division of the lands in Campania. It is pretended that Cæsar does “ not concern himself in this matter: Certain, however, it is, that Pom- “ pey is very desirous of having the distribution settled before Cæsar’s “ return, that he may be precluded from applying them to his own “ purposes.

“ As to what concerns your leaving the province, I dare not promise “ that you shall be relieved by a successor; but you may rely upon my “ endeavouring all I can, that your administration shall not be prolonged.
“ Whether you will think proper to remain in your government, if affairs “ should be so circumstanced as to render it indecent for me to oppose any “ decree of the Senate for that purpose, depends upon yourself to deter“ mine: As it does upon me to remember, how warmly you made it your “ request, when we parted, that I would prevent any such resolution from “ being taken. Farewell.”

It is no wonder that Cicero’s friends should be in pain for him, when they thought he would have to do with the Partbians: Nevertheless, when he found himself engaged, and pushed to the necessity of acting the General, he wanted (by his own account) neither the courage nor conduct of an experienced leader. In a letter to Atticus, dated from his camp:

“ We

“ We are in great spirits, says he ; and, as our counsels are good, have “ no distrust of an engagement : We are securely encamped, with plenty “ of provisions, and in sight almost of Cilicia ; with a small army indeed, “ but, as I have reason to believe, intirely well affected to me : which “ I shall double by the accession of Deiotarus, who is upon the road “ to join me. I have the allies more firmly attached to me than any “ Governor ever had : They are wonderfully taken with my easiness and “ abstinence : We are making new levies of Citizens, and establishing “ magazines : If there be occasion for fighting, we shall not decline it ;
 “ if not, shall defend ourselves by the strength of our posts. Wherefore “ be of good heart ; for I see, as much as if you were with me, the sym“ pathy of your love for me.”

The danger of the Parthians being over, Cicero, unwilling to dismiss his army without attempting something, led it against an untamed race of banditti, or freebooters inhabiting the mountains, close to which he now lay. They had never submitted to the Roman power, but lived in defiance of it. Cicero thought the reduction of them a matter of importance. To take them unprovided, he drew off his forces, on pretence of marching to the distant parts of Cilicia ; but, after a day's journey, stopped short, and, having refreshed his army and left his baggage behind, turned back again in the night with the utmost celerity, and reached Amanus before day on the thirteenth of October. Coming upon the natives by surprise, he easily killed or made them all prisoners. Erana, indeed, the capital of the mountain, made a brave resistance ; for it held out almost a whole day. Upon this success, Cicero was saluted EMPEROR.

It appears, by a letter from the VICTORIOUS EMPEROR, that he thought his victory gave him a just claim to a Triumph.

Cicero to M. Calius, Curule Ædile elect.

“ I wish you would enquire the reason that your letters miscarry ; for “ I cannot be induced to think that you have not once written to me since “ your election. But to turn to the principal purpose of this Epistle—“ Your wish has succeeded, and I have just had employment enough of the “ military kind to entitle me to a Triumph. You were under some appre“ hensions, I perceive, about the Parthians, as being diffident of my “ forces. I must acquaint you then, that, having received advice, that “ the Parthians had committed hostilities, I took the advantage of some “ defiles, and of the neighbouring mountains, to lead my army, sup“ ported by a tolerable number of auxiliaries, to Amanus. The reputation “ of my name was of some benefit to me likewise in my march : As you “ cannot imagine of what importance it is, in places of this kind, to have “ the populace ask, Is this the Consul that saved Rome ? Is this he that “ was

Y. R. 702.

Ad Att.

v. 15.

Ep. Fam.
Melm. iv.
13. [written about the end of Novemb-
ber.].

Y. R. 703. " was so benourred by the Senate? Together with other questions of the Bef. Chr. " same import, which I need not add. When I approached to Amanus, 451 Conf. 50. " a mountain which separates Cilicia from Syria, I had the satisfaction to " hear that Cassius had obliged the enemy to abandon the siege of Antioch;
 " and that Bibulus had taken upon himself the command of the " province. However, I employed my army in harassing the Amanienses,
 " our eternal enemies: And, having put many of them to the sword,
 " as well as taken a great number of prisoners, and entirely dispersed
 " the rest, I surprized and burnt some of their fortresses. Having thus " obtained a compleat victory, I was saluted with the title of Imperator
 " by the whole army at Iffus, the very place where Alexander defeated
 " Darius. From thence I marched into the most infested parts of " Cilicia, where I am now before Pindenissum; a city of great strength,
 " and which I have already been battering above these three weeks". The " garrison makes a most obstinate and vigorous defence: So that nothing
 " seems wanting to complete the glory I shall here obtain, but that the " name of this place were less obscure".

" If I should make myself master of it, as I trust I shall, I will send " an immediate express to the Senate. In the mean time, I have given
 " this general account of my operations, to let you see there is some " foundation to hope that your good wishes will be accomplished. But " to return to the Parthians: This summer's campaign has proved, you " find, tolerable successful: I am in great pain, however, for the next.
 " Let me intreat you, therefore, my dear friend, to endeavour that a " successor be appointed to my government: But, if that should prove
 " a matter of too much difficulty (as you intimate in one of your letters,
 " and as I am myself inclined to suspect) be careful at least to guard " against what may easily be prevented, I mean the prolongation of my " residence".

" I ex-

* The siege was begun about the first of November: So that this letter was written towards the end of November, if he began to batter in a few days after his investing the place.

be steady to the interests of the Senate, and to employ his Tribunitian power in his favour, that he may not be continued in his government beyond his year.

Ad Att.
v. 20.

° Cicero in a letter to Atticus, speaking of this siege, writes thus: " What the plague, you will say, are these Pindenissians? I never heard their names before.—How can I help that? Could I turn Cilicia into Ætolia or Macedonia? Take this however for certain, that no man could do more than I have done with such an army, &c."

† Cicero wrote, about the same time, a letter of congratulation to Curio, on his being elected to the Tribunate; and presses him to Cicero to Curio, Tribune of the People.

" The congratulations of a friend are not Ep. Fam.
 " usually considered as too late, if they are ii. 7.
 " paid as early as possible: My great distance Melm. iv.
 " therefore from Rome, together with the slow 16.
 " progress with which news travels into this " corner of the world, will excuse me for not " sooner sending you mine. But now I fin-
 " cerely give them you: And most ardently
 " wish you may obtain immortal honour by your

“ I expect from your letters (as I mentioned in one of my former) not “ merely on account of what is at present going forward in the Republic,
 “ but a clear prospect of what is likely to happen—Farewell.”

Y. R. 702.
 Bef. Chr.
 50.
 401 Conf.

To satisfy the earnest desire which Cicero had formerly expressed (and which he here again expresses) of being informed of what passed at Rome in his absence, his correspondent wrote several letters to him concerning the state of public affairs; particularly one of the first of August, and, a short time after, another, which refers to it, and which Cicero, by some words in the beginning of the letter now before us, appears to “ your administration of the Tribune. To “ this end, I must exhort you not to suffer your“ self to be turned aside from your natural bias,

 “ in compliance with the sentiments and ad“ vice of others: On the contrary, let me “ intreat you to be directed in your ministry
 “ by the faithful light of your own superior “ wisdom. No man indeed is capable of “ giving you more prudent counsels than will “ arise from the suggestions of your own good “ sense: And, believe me, you can never be “ misguided, so long as you pursue the honest “ dictates of your uninfluenced judgment.
 “ I say not this inconsiderately, but as per“ fectly well knowing the genius and prin“ ciples of him to whom I am addressing “ myself. Yes, my friend, I can never be “ apprehensive that you will act either weakly
 “ or irresolutely, whilst you support the mea“ sures your heart approves. It was neither “ chance nor ignorance that led you to solicit “ the Magistracy in so important a crisis. It was “ a deliberate and well-considered resolution “ that engaged you in this design: And you “ were perfectly sensible of the great and ge“ neral confusion in which the Commonwealth “ is involved, together with the utter uncer“ tainty in what manner these our unhappy “ divisions will finally be terminated. You “ frequently reflect, I doubt not, on the vain,
 “ the treacherous, and the pliant dispositions
 “ of the present generation. To repeat then “ what I just now mentioned: Let me con-“ jure you to persevere stedfastly in your old “ principles, to consult the dictates of your “ own breast, and faithfully to comply with “ its wise and worthy admonitions. Hardly, “ perhaps, is any man more qualified than “ yourself to direct the conduct of others:
 “ None, I am sure, to steer your own. Good “ God! why am I thus prevented from being “ a witness of your glorious actions, and an “ associate of your patriot designs? The lat“ ter, I am persuaded, you are far from want“ ing: However, the strength and warmth of “ my affection might possibly render the con“ junction of my counsels with yours not al“ together unprofitable.

“ You will hear from me again very soon, as “ I purpose in a few days to send an express
 “ to the Senate, with particulars of the success “ of my arms during the last summer’s cam“ paign. In the mean time you will per“ ceive, by the letter which I delivered to “ your freedman Tiraso, with what zealous “ pains I have solicited your election to the “ Pontifical Dignity: An election indeed “ which will be attended with much difficulty.
 “ I conjure you in return, my dear Curio, not “ to suffer this my very troublesome provin“ cial administration to be lengthened out be“ yond the usual period: And I intreat it by “ all the strong and tender ties of our mutual “ friendship. When I first made this request “ to you in person, and several times after“ wards repeated it by letter, I had not the “ least imagination of your being Tribune. I “ then indeed only intreated your good offices
 “ as an illustrious Senator, and one who stood “ high in the favour and esteem of every Ro- “ man. But I now apply to Curio, not only “ as my noble friend, but as a powerful Tri- “ bune. I do not desire however (what indeed “ would be more difficult to obtain) that any “ thing unusual should be decreed in my fa“ vour: But, on the contrary, that you would “ support that decree, and maintain those “ laws, by which I was appointed to this go“ vernment. In a word, my single and most “ earnest request is, that the terms upon “ which I set out for this province may not “ be changed. Farewell.”

have

Y. R. 702. have received : But it is not improbable, that a letter from Calius, dated ——— the second of September, and another written in October, full of intelligence,
 * p. 555. were not yet come to Cicero's hands ; and as to that (above * transcribed) of the eighteenth of November, he had unquestionably not received it ; and this perhaps occasioned his apprehensions, that some of Calius's letters had miscarried.

I doubt not but the Reader has a portion of the same curiosity which Cicero had ; nor do I know how it can be better gratified, than by adding here, to the letter of the eighteenth of November, the other Four, just above mentioned, of dates prior to that ; or so much of them, at least, as is to the purpose. There will be occasion hereafter to refer to them as the best vouchers of the facts they relate.

M. Calius to Cicero.

Ep. Fam.
 viii. 4.
 Melm. iii.
 32. [dated
 Aug. 1.
 702.]

——— “ Curio is a candidate [for the Tribuneship.] This greatly “ alarms those who are unacquainted with the real good qualities of “ Curio's heart. I hope, and indeed believe, he will act agreeably to “ his professions, and join with the Senate in supporting the friends of the “ Republic : I am sure, at least, he is full of these designs at present ; in “ which Cæsar's conduct has been the principal occasion of engaging “ him. For Cæsar, though he spares no pains or expence to gain over “ even the lowest of the People to his interest, has thought fit to treat “ Curio with singular contempt. The latter has behaved himself with “ so much temper upon this occasion, that he, who never acted with “ artifice in all his life, is suspected to have dissembled his resentment, “ in order the more effectually to defeat the schemes of those who oppose “ his election ; I mean the Lelii and the Antonii, together with the rest of “ that wonderful party.

“ I have been so much engaged by the difficulties, which have retarded
 “ the several elections, that I could not find leisure to write to you sooner :
 “ And indeed, as I every day expected they would be determined, I waited “ their conclusion, that I might give you at once an account of the whole.
 “ But it is now the first of August, and they are not yet over ; the elections “ of Prætors having met with some unexpected delays. As to that in which “ I am a candidate [the Curule Ædileship] I can give no account which “ way it is likely to be decided : Only it is generally thought that Hirrus
 “ will not be chosen. This is collected from the fate that has attended “ Vincianus, who was a candidate for the office of Plebeian Ædile.
 “ That foolish project of his, for the nomination of a Dictator¹, “ (which we formerly, you may remember, exposed to so much ridicule)

¹ Vincianus and Hirrus, elected Tribunes for the year 700, were the chief promoters of the project of making Pompey Dictator.

Vide supra, p. 526 & 542. And Vid. Ad Q.
Fr. iii. 8.

“ suddenly turned the election against him; and the People, by the loud“ est acclamations, expressed their joy at his repulse. At the same time “ Hirrus was universally called upon by the populace to give up his pre“ tensions at the ensuing election. I hope therefore you will very soon hear,
 “ that this affair is determined in the manner you have wished with regard “ to me, but have scarce^r dared to wish with regard to him.”

——“ As to the state of the Commonwealth, we begin to give up all “ expectation that the face of public affairs will be changed. However,
 “ at a meeting of the Senate, held on the twenty-second of the last month, “ in the Temple of Apollo, upon a debate relating to the payment of the “ forces commanded by Pompey^s, mention was made of that legion, “ which, as appeared by his accounts, had been lent to Cæsar: And “ he was asked of what number of men it consisted, and for what purposes
 “ it was borrowed. In short, Pompey was pushed so strongly upon this “ article, that he found himself under a necessity of promising to recall
 “ this legion out of Gaul: But he added at the same time, that the cla“ mours of his enemies should not force him to take this step too pre“ cipitately.

“ It was afterwards moved, that the question might be put concerning “ the election of a successor to Cæsar. Accordingly the Senate came to “ a resolution, that Pompey (who was just going to the army at Arimi- “ num^t, and is now actually set out for that purpose) should be ordered “ to return to Rome with all expedition; That the affair relating to a “ general election of Governors for all the provinces might be debated in his “ presence. This point, I imagine, will be brought before the Senate on “ the thirteenth of this month, when, if no infamous obstacles should be “ thrown in the way by the Tribunes^u, the House will certainly come to “ some resolution: For Pompey, in the course of the debate, let fall an “ intimation, that he thought every man owed obedience to the authority of “ that Assembly. However, I am impatient to hear what Paullus, the se“ nior Consul elect, will say, when he delivers his opinion upon this que“ stion, &c. — Farewell.”

^r Because Hirrus was supported by Pompey.
Melm.

Melm.
 vol. I. p.
 309.

“ Pompey, though he remained in Rome,
 “ was at this time Governor of Spain; which “ had been continued to him for four years “ at the end of his late Consulship. It was “ the payment of his troops in that province “ which was under the consideration of the “ Senate.” Plut. in Pomp.

^t “ Now called Rimini, situated upon the “ Rubicon, a river which divides Italy from “ that part of the Roman province called Cis- “ alpine Gaul. The army here mentioned is “ supposed to be part of those four legions, “ which were decreed to Pompey for the sup“ port of his government in Spain.” Plut.

ibid.

^u “ Some of the Tribunes, together with Melm.
 “ Sulpicius, one of the present Consuls, were “ wholly in Cæsar’s interest. They thought, “ or pretended to think, that it was highly “ unjust to divest Cæsar of his government be“ fore the time was compleated for which it “ had been decreed; of which there remained
 “ about two years unexpired.” Dio, xl. p.
 148.

Y. R. 702.
 Bef. Chr.
 50.
 491 Conf.

Y. R. 702.

Marcus Cælius to Cicero.

Ep. Fam.

viii. 5.

Melm. iii.

35. written

22 August.

“ How far you may be alarmed at the invasion which threatens your province and the neighbouring countries, I know not: But for myself, I confess, I am extremely anxious for the consequence. Could we contrive indeed, that the enemies forces should be only in proportion to yours, and just sufficient to entitle you to the honour of a Triumph, there could not be a more desirable circumstance. But the misfortune is, if the Partians should make any attempt, I well know it will be a powerful one: And I am sensible at the same time, that you are so little in a condition to oppose their march, that you have scarce troops to defend a single defile. But the world in general will not be so reasonable as to make the proper allowances for this circumstance. On the contrary, it is expected from a man in your station, that he should be prepared for every occurrence that may arise: Without once considering whether he be furnished with the necessary supplies for that purpose. I am still the more uneasy on your account, as I foresee the contest concerning affairs in Gaul will retard the nomination of your successor: And, though I dare say you have already had this contingency in your view, yet I thought proper to apprize you of its probability, that you might be so much the more early in adjusting your measures accordingly. I need not tell you the usual artifices will undoubtedly be played off. A day will be appointed for considering of a successor to Cæsar; upon which some Tribune will interpose his negative; and that a second will probably declare, that, unless the Senate shall be at liberty to put the question freely concerning all the provinces in general, he will not suffer it to be debated with regard to any in particular. And thus shall we be trifled with for a considerable time: Possibly indeed two or three years may be spun out by these contemptible arts.

“ If any thing new had occurred in public affairs, I should, as usual, have sent you the account, together with my sentiments thereupon: But at present the wheels of our political machine seem to be altogether motionless. Marcellus is still pursuing his former designs concerning the provinces: But he has not yet been able to assemble a competent number of Senators. Had this motion been brought on the preceding year, and had Curio at the same time been Tribune, it would probably have succeeded: But, as affairs are now circumstanced, you are sensible how easy it will be for Cæsar, regardless as he is of the public interest, when it stands in competition with his own, to obstruct all our proceedings. Farewell.”

Ep. Fam.

viii. 9.

Melm. iii.

34. [dated

Sept. 2.

702.]

Vol. i. 3p.

p. 561.

M. Cælius to Cicero.

——“ I mentioned, in one of my former, that the affair of the provinces would come before the Senate on the thirteenth of the last month: Nevertheless,

“ theless, by the intervention of [Caius] Marcellus, the Consul elect, it “ was put off to the first of this instant. But, when the day arrived, they “ could not procure a sufficient number of Senators to be present. It is “ now the second of September, and nothing has yet been done : And I am “ persuaded it will be adjourned to the following year. As far as I can “ see therefore, you must be contented to leave the administration of your “ province in the hands of some person whom you shall think proper to “ appoint for that purpose, as I am well convinced you will not soon be “ relieved by a successor. For, as Gaul must take the same fate with “ the rest of the provinces, any attempt that should be made for settling
 “ the general succession will certainly be obstructed by Cæsar’s party.
 “ Of this I have not the least doubt : And therefore I thought it necessary “ to give you notice, that you might be prepared to act accordingly.

Y.R. 702.
 Bef. Chr.
 50.
 401 Conf.

“ Your friend Pompey openly declares, that Cæsar ought not to be admit“ ted as a candidate for the Consulship while he retains his command in “ the province *. He voted however against the passing a decree for this “ purpose at present. Scipio moved, that the first of March next might be “ appointed for taking into consideration the nominating a successor in the “ Gallic provinces ; and that this matter should be proposed to the House “ separately, and without blending it with any other question. Balbus
 “ Cornelius was much discomposed at this motion : And I am well assured
 “ he has complained of it to Scipio in very strong terms.”

M. Cælius to Cicero.

“ As to public affairs, we had waited several days in ex“ pectation that something would be determined concerning Gaul ; fre“ quent motions having been made in the Senate for this purpose, which “ were followed by very warm debates. At length, however, it plainly ap“ pearing agreeable to Pompey’s sentiments, that Cæsar’s command in Gaul
 “ should not be continued longer than the first of March, the SENATE passed
 “ the following ORDERS and DECREES *.

Ep. Fam.
 viii. 8.
 Melm. iv.
 7. written in October.

“ By AUTHORITY OF THE SENATE, held in the Temple of APOLLO, on “ the thirtieth day of September. Signed ; L. Domitius Ahenobarbus ; Q.

Melm.

“ Pompey, who contributed more than “ any man to the advancement of Cæsar’s “ power, had lately procured a law, by “ which the personal appearance of the latter “ was dispensed with, in soliciting the Con“ sular office. But Pompey now began to re“ pent : — Not that his own designs were “ more favourable to the liberties of Rome
 “ than those of Cæsar ; but as discovering at “ last, that they could not both subsist toge“ ther.”

* When an act passed the Senate in a full Melm.
 House, held according to the prescribed forms, vol. I.
 and without any opposition from the Tri- p. 64.
 bunes (who had the privilege of putting a negative upon all proceedings in the Senate) it was called a Senatus consultum, a decree of the Senate. But if any of those essentials were wanting, or a Tribune interposed, it was then only styled a Senatus auctoritas, an ORDER of the Senate, and considered as of less authority. Maunt.

4 C 2

Cæcilius ;

Y. R. 702. " Cæcilius ; Metellus Pius Scipio ; L. Villius Annalis ; C. Septimius ; Ref. Chr. " Caius Lucceius Hirrus ; C. Scribonius Curio ; L. Atteius Capito ; M.
 50. " Oppius. WHEREAS a motion was made by Marcus Marcellus, the Consul, 409 Conf. " concerning the Consular provinces ; it is ORDERED, that Lucius Paullus
 " and Caius Marcellus, Consuls elect, shall, on the first of March, next fol" lowing their entering upon their office, move the Senate concerning the Consu" lar provinces : At which time no other business shall be proceeded upon, nor " any other motion made in conjunction therewith. And for this purpose the " Senate shall continue to assemble, notwithstanding the Comitial days, and
 " until a decree shall be passed.

" ORDERED, That, when the Consul shall move the Senate upon the question
 " aforesaid, they shall be empowered to summon such of the three hundred
 " Judges, who are members of the Senate, to attend.

" RESOLVED, That if any matters shall arise upon the question aforesaid,
 " which shall be necessary to be laid before the People, that Servius Sulpicius
 " and Marcus Marcellus, the present Consuls, together with the Prætors
 " and Tribunes of the People, or such of them as shall be agreed upon, shall
 " call an Assembly of the People for that purpose : And if the Magistrates
 " aforesaid shall fail herein, the same shall be proposed to the People by their " successors.

" THE THIRTIETH DAY OF SEPTEMBER, in the temple of APOLLO. Sign" ed ; L. Domitius Ahenobarbus ; Q. Cæcilius ; Metellus Pius Scipio ;
 " L. Villius Annalis ; C. Septimius ; C. Scribonius Curio ; M. Oppius.

" The Consul, Marcus Marcellus, having moved the Senate concerning the " provinces,

" RESOLVED, That it is the opinion of the Senate, that it will be highly " unbecoming any Magistrate, who has a power of controuling their proceed" ings, to occasion any hindrance, whereby the Senate may be prevented from " taking the aforesaid motion into consideration as soon as possible : And that " whosoever shall obstruct or oppose the same, shall be deemed an enemy to the " Republic.

" ORDERED, That if any Magistrate shall put a negative upon the foregoing
 " resolution, the same shall be entered as an ORDER of the Senate, and again
 " referred to the consideration of this House.

" This resolution was protested against by Caius Cælius, Lucius Vinicius,
 " Publius Cornelius, and Caius Vibius Pansa.

Memo.

" The Comitial days were those on " which the Comitia or Assemblies of the " People were held : And on these days the " Law prohibited the Senate to be convened.
 " The Senate, however, in the present in" stance, and upon many other occasions,
 " took upon themselves to act with a dispensing
 " power. See Midd. on the Rom. Sen.
 " p. 121. They had the impudence, as we " see, to resolve, That, if the Tribunes made use of their legal privilege, they should be deemed enemies to the Republic. And, what is worthy to be observed, the Tribunes, in the present case, were using their legal privilege in support of Justice ; the Senate were dispensing with the laws, in order to injure and oppress. The Reader will remark, that Curio is one of those who sign this resolution of the House.

RESOLVED,

“ RESOLVED, That the Senate will take into consideration the case of such of ^{Y. R. 702.}
 “ the soldiers under Cæsar’s command who have served out their legal time ^{Bef. Chr.} z, or “ who, for other reasons, are entitled to a discharge; and make such order ^{50.}
 “ thereupon as shall be agreeable to equity. ^{401 Conf.}

“ RESOLVED, That, if any Magistrate should put his negative upon the fore- “ going DECREE, the same shall stand as an ORDER of the Senate, and be again
 “ referred to the consideration of this House.

“ This resolution was protested against by Caius Cælius and Caius Pansa, “ Tribunes of the Peoples.

— “ In the debates which preceded these decrees, Pompey let fall an “ expression that was much observed, and gave us confident hopes of his “ good intentions. He could not, without great injustice, he said, determine “ any thing in relation to the provinces under Cæsar’s command, before the “ first of March: But after that time, he assured the Senate, he should “ have no sort of scruple. Being asked, what if a negative should then be “ put upon a decree of the Senate for recalling Cæsar? Pompey answered,
 “ he should look upon it as just the same thing, whether Cæsar openly refused
 “ to obey the authority of the Senate, or secretly procured some Magistrate to “ obstruct their decrees. But suppose, said another member, Cæsar should “ insist upon being a candidate for the Consulship, and at the same time, of “ retaining his command?” “ Suppose, replied Pompey with great temper,
 “ my own son shall take a stick and beat me?” From expressions of this “ kind the world has conceived a notion, that a rupture will undoubtedly “ ensue between Pompey and Cæsar. I am of opinion ^a however, that “ the latter will submit to one of these two conditions: Either to give up “ his present pretensions to the Consulship, and continue in Gaul; or to “ resign his command of the province, provided he can be assured of his “ election. Curio is preparing most strongly to oppose his demands. What “ he may be able to effect I know not; but sure I am, that a man who “ acts upon such patriot principles must gain honour at least, if he gain “ nothing else ———.”

FROM Amanus, Cicero led his army to another part of the Highlands, ^{Midd. 27.}
 the most disaffected to the Roman name, possessed by a stout and free peo- ^{Ep. Fam.} ple, who had never been subject even to the Kings of that country. Their ^{xv. 4.}
 chief town was called Pindenissum, situated on a steep and craggy hill:
 It was the constant refuge of all deserters, and the harbour of foreign

M. Im.

^a As the strength of Cæsar’s army in Gaul consisted principally in his veterans, this clause was added, as Gronovius observes, with a view of drawing off those soldiers from his troops.

Vid. supr.
 p. 551 &
 559.

^a It is remarkable that Cælius, the writer of this Letter, whom Cicero judged to be an able politician, and to have a longer foresight than any body, was mistaken in almost all his conjectures; mistaken concerning Cæsar, concerning Curio, and concerning himself. For Cæsar did not submit, &c. and Curio took Cæsar’s part; and so did Cælius himself in the beginning of the civil war. Cælius obtained the Ædileship this year [702] from his competitor Hirrus, formerly Cicero’s competitor for the Augurate.

I

enemies,

Y. R. 702. enemies, and at that very time was expecting and prepared to receive the Bel. Chr. Partians. Cicero laid siege to it in form; and though he attacked it with
 4. 1. C. 1. all imaginable vigour, and a continual battery of his engines, yet it cost him above six weeks to reduce it to the necessity of surrendering at discretion. The inhabitants were sold for slaves; all the other plunder, excepting the horses, was given to the soldiers.

After this action, another neighbouring nation, called Tiburani, terrified by the fate of Pindenissum, voluntarily submitted, and gave hostages; so that Cicero sent his army, under the command of his brother, into winter-quarters, in those parts of the province which were thought the most turbulent.

Ad. A. 1. 29
 Ad. A. 1. 29
 p. 557.

These martial exploits spread Cicero's fame into Syria, where Bibulus was just arrived to take upon him the command; but kept himself close within the gates of Antioch till the country was cleared of all the Partians: His envy of Cicero's success, and title of EMPEROR, made him impatient to purchase the same honour by the like service on the Syrian side of the mountain Amanus: But he had the misfortune to be repulsed in his attempt, with the intire loss of the first cohort, and several officers of distinction, which Cicero calls an ugly blow, both for the time and the effect of it.

Ad. A. 1. 29
 vii. 1. and
 Vid. supra,
 p. 557.

Though Cicero, for his victory (which he calls a just victory) at Amanus, had been saluted EMPEROR, and had ever since assumed that appellation, yet he sent no public account of it to Rome till after the affair of Pindenissum, an exploit of more eclat and importance; for which he expected the honour of a Thanksgiving, and began to entertain hopes even of a Triumph. His public Letter is lost, but that loss is supplied by a particular narrative of the whole action in a private letter to Cato. His design, in paying Cato this compliment, was to engage his vote and concurrence to the decree of the supplication ¹.

Y. R. 703.
 Melm.
 B. v. Let.
 1. Ep. Fam.
 xv. 4. Ed.
 Gray.

After a detail of his proceedings, and successes from the time of his arrival in the province, he thus continues——“ And now, if a motion “ should be made in the Senate concerning the honours due to the success “ of my arms, I shall esteem it the highest glory to be supported in my “ pretensions by your suffrage. I am sensible it is usual for the gravest “ characters to request, as well as to be requested for, favours of this nature, “ in the strongest terms: But I persuade myself it will be more proper “ for me to remind than solicit you in the present instance. You have “ frequently indeed, not only distinguished me with your vote, but with “ your highest applause, both in the Senate and the Assemblies of the “ People. And, believe me, I have ever thought there was so much “ weight and authority in all you uttered, that a single word of yours in “ my favour was the highest honour I could possibly receive. I remember “ upon a certain occasion, when you refused to vote for a public thanksgiving, “ which was proposed in favour of a very worthy and illustrious Citizen,

¹ Cicero wrote at the same time, for the same end, to C. Claudius Marcellus, and P. Æmilius Paullus, the two Consuls of the present year 703.

“ you

“ you told the Senate, you should willingly have given your suffrage in “ support of the honour in question, had it been designed as a reward for “ any civil services which that Consul had performed in Rome. Agreeably “ to this maxim, you formerly concurred in voting that a public thanks- “ giving should be decreed to me, not indeed for having advanced the glory “ of our Country by my military achievements (for that would have been “ a circumstance nothing uncommon) but for having, in a most singular
 “ and unexampled manner, preserved the liberties of the whole Common“ wealth without drawing a sword. I forbear to mention the general share “ you have taken in all the envy, the difficulties, and the dangers, to “ which my life has been exposed : And a far greater you were willing to “ have taken, if I could have been prevailed upon to have consented’. I for“ bear to mention likewise that you considered my enemy * as your own :
 “ And that, in order to give me a convincing proof of your great regard,
 “ you scrupled not to shew your approbation even of his death, by defend“ ing Milo in the Senate. In return, (and I speak of it, not as a favour “ for which you are indebted to me, but as a tribute which I owed to “ truth) I have been no silent admirer of your virtues : For who indeed “ can suppress his applause of them ? In all my speeches, both in the “ Forum and in the Senate, as well as in the several pieces I have pub“ lished, either in our own language or in Greek, I have ever represented “ your character as superior, not only to the noblest amongst our con“ temporaries, but to the most celebrated in history.

Y. R. 703.
Bet. Chr.

49.
402 Conf.

Vid. supra.
P. 434, 5.
6, 7.

* Clodius.

“ After all, you will wonder, perhaps, what should induce me to set “ so high a value upon these little transient honours of the Senate. I will “ acknowledge then the whole truth, and lay open my heart before you “ with a freedom becoming that philosophy we cultivate, and that friend“ ship we profess : A friendship delivered down to us from our parents,
 “ and improved by many reciprocal good offices.

“ Let me previously observe, that, if ever any man was a stranger to the “ desire of empty applause and vulgar admiration, it is myself : And this “ frame of mind which I possess by temper, has been still strengthened “ (if I am not deceived) by reason and philosophy. As an evidence of “ this, I appeal to my Consulship ; in which, as in every other part of my “ life, though I pursued that conduct, I confess, from whence true honours “ might be derived, yet I never thought they were of themselves an ob“ ject worthy of my ambition. On the contrary, I refused the govern“ ment of a very noble province : And, notwithstanding it was highly “ probable I might have obtained a Triumph, yet I forbore to prosecute “ my pretensions of that kind. I forbore too the offering myself as a “ candidate for the office of Augur : Though you are sensible, I dare say,

* This seems to import, that Cato would have concurred in measures to defend Cicero by arms, against the sovereign authority of the People, if Cicero had followed that counsel. But Plutarch reports, that Cato advised Cicero to submit. Plut. in Cat.

I

“ that

Y. R. 703.
Bel. Chr.
49.
402 Conf.

“ that I might have succeeded without much difficulty. But I will acknowledge, that the injurious treatment I afterwards suffered, though you always speak of it indeed as a circumstance which reflects the highest honour upon my character, and as a misfortune only to the Republic, has rendered me desirous of receiving the most distinguished marks of my Country’s approbation. For this reason I solicited the office of Augur, which I had before declined : And, as little as I once thought the military honours deserved my pursuit, I am now ambitious of that distinction which the Senate usually confers on its successful Generals. I will own, I have some view by this means of healing the wounds of my former unmerited disgrace : And therefore, though I just now declared that I would not request your aid on this occasion, I recall my words, and do most earnestly request your suffrage and assistance ; upon the supposition, however, that what I have performed in this campaign shall not appear contemptible in your eyes, but, on the contrary, far superior to the actions of many of those Generals who have obtained the most glorious rewards from the Senate.

“ I have observed (and you are sensible I always listen with great attention whenever you deliver your opinions) that as often as any question of this nature has come before the Senate, you were less inquisitive into the military than civil conduct of the Proconsul. It was the political ordinances he had established, and the moral qualities he had displayed, that seemed to have the principal weight in determining your vote. If you should examine my pretensions in this view, you will see, that with a weak and inconsiderable army, I found a strong defence, against the danger of a very formidable invasion, in the lenity and justice of my government. By these aids I effected what I never could by the most powerful legions : I recovered the friendship of our alienated allies, firmly strengthened their allegiance to the Republic, and conciliated their affection at a time when they were waiting the opportunity of some favourable revolution to desert us. But perhaps I have expatiated farther upon this subject than was necessary ; especially to you, before whom all our allies in general are accustomed to lay their complaints. To them therefore I refer you for an account of the benefits they have received by my administration. They will all of them as with one voice, I am persuaded, give you the most advantageous testimony in my favour ; but particularly those illustrious clients of yours, the Cyprians and

“ Cappa-

Vid. supra, p. 554. the note. Midd. p. 21--27. “ The debt above mentioned, that was owing from Arisbarxanes to Brutus, was not the only affair which the latter had recommended to Cicero : He had burdened him with another much more troublesome.

The city of Salamis in Cyprus owed to two of his friends, as he pretended, Scaptius and Martinus, above twenty thousand pounds sterling upon bond, at a most extravagant interest ; and he begged of Cicero to take their persons and concerns under his special protection. Appius, who was Brutus’s father-in-law, had granted every thing which was asked to Scaptius, a Præfecture in Cyprus, with some troops of horse, with which he miserably harassed the poor Salaminians, in order to force them to comply “ Cappadocians : To whom I may likewise add your great and royal friend, “ Prince Deiotarus. If thus to act is a merit of the most superior kind, “ if,

Y. R. 701
 Bef. Chr.
 49.
 402 Cor.f.

Ad Att.
 vi. 1.

comply with his unreasonable demands : For he shut up their whole Senate in the Council-room, till five of them were starved to death with hunger. Brutus laboured to place him in the same degree of favour with Cicero : But Cicero, being informed at Ephesus of this violence, by a deputation from Salamis, made it the first act of his government to recall the troops from Cyprus, and put an end to Scaptius's Prefecture, having laid it down for a rule, to grant no command to any man, who was concerned in trade, or negotiated money in the province : To give satisfaction however to Brutus, he enjoined the Salaminians to pay off Scaptius's bond, which they were ready to do according to the tenor of his edict, by which he had ordered, that no bond in his province should carry above one per cent. by the month. Scaptius refused to take the money on those terms, insisting on four per cent. as the condition of his bond expressed ; which by computation almost doubled the principal sum ; while the Salaminians, as they protested to Cicero, could not have paid the original debt, if they had not been enabled to do it by his help, and out of his own dues, that he had remitted to them, which amounted to somewhat more than Scaptius's legal demand.

Ad Att.
 v. 21.

This extortion raised Cicero's indignation ; and, notwithstanding the repeated instances of Brutus and Atticus, he was determined to over-rule it ; though Brutus, in order to move him the more effectually, thought proper to confess, what he had all along dissembled, that the debt was really his own, and Scaptius only his agent in it. This surprized Cicero still more, and though he had a warm inclination to oblige Brutus, yet he could not consent to so flagrant an injustice, but makes frequent and heavy complains of it in his letters to Atticus. In one of them he says, “ You have “ now the ground of my conduct ; if Brutus

 “ does not approve it, I see no reason why “ we should love him ; but I am sure it will “ be approved by his uncle Cato.” In another, “ If Brutus thinks, that I ought to allow him four per cent. when by edict I have decreed but one through all the provinces, and that to the satisfaction of the keenest usurer ; if he complains, that I denied a Prefecture to one concerned in trade, which I denied for that reason to your friend Lanius, and to Sex. Statius, though Torquatus solicited for the one, and Pompey himself for the other, yet without disgusting either of them ; if he takes it ill, that I recalled the troops out of Cyprus, I shall be sorry indeed, that he has any occasion to be angry with me ; but much more, not to find him the man that I took him to be.— I have not forgot, however, what you intimated to me in several of your letters, that if I brought back nothing else from the province but Brutus's friendship, that would be enough : Let it be so, since you will have it so ; yet it must always be with this exception, as far as it can be done, without my committing any wrong.”—In a third,
 “ How, my dear Atticus, you, who applaud
 “ my integrity and good conduct, and are “ vexed sometimes, you say, that you are not “ with me, how can such a thing, as Ennius “ says, come out of your mouth, to desire me “ to grant troops to Scaptius, for the sake of “ extorting money ? Could you, if you were “ with me, suffer me to do it, if I would ?—
 “ If I really had done such a thing, with “ what face could I ever read again, or touch
 “ those books of mine, with which you are so “ much pleased ? He tells him likewise in confidence, that all Brutus's letters to him, even when he was asking favours, were un-

Ad Att.
 vi. 2.

Ibid. vi. 1
 & 3.

See Melm. Vol. I. p. 426, note 12 and 13. Vid. supra. p. 568.

* It is very difficult to suppose that Cato was ignorant of his nephew's infamous extortion, and the horrible proceedings of his nephew's agent. For Cato (as Plutarch informs us) having settled a correspondence throughout all the Roman provinces, received constant intelligence of the conduct of the several Governors in their respective commands. And the Cyprians had a particular claim to the patronage of Cato, as he had been employed in executing a commission, by which the island was annexed to the dominions of the Republic. Cicero, in a letter to Cato, calls them (as we see) those illustrious clients of yours—and refers him to them for a testimony of his good conduct in his government, of which Cyprus was a part.

VOL. III.

4 D

mannerly.

Y. R. 703
Bef. Chr.49.
Conf.

“ if, in all ages, the number has been far less considerable of those who “ knew how to subdue their desires than to vanquish their enemies, he “ that has given an instance of both, cannot certainly but be deemed, in “ Cato's estimation at least, to have strengthened his claim to the honours “ of his country, and to have improved the splendor of his military at-“ chievements, by the more unusual lustre of his civil conduct.

“ Let me in the last place, and as in diffidence of my own solicitations, “ call in Philosophy for my advocate; than which nothing has afforded “ me a more valuable satisfaction. The truth is, she is one of the noblest “ blessings that the Gods have bestowed on man. At her shrine we have “ both of us, from our earliest years, paid our joint and equal adorations :
 “ And, while she has been thought, by some, the companion only of in“ dolent and secluded speculatists, we (and we alone I had almost said) have “ introduced her into the world of business, and familiarized her with the “ most active and important scenes. She therefore it is that now solicits “ you in my behalf; and when Philosophy is the suppliant, Cato, surely,
 “ can never refuse. To say all in one word: Be well assured, if I should “ prevail with you to concur in procuring a decree I so much wish to ob“ tain, I shall consider myself as wholly indebted for that honour to your “ authority and friendship. Farewell.”

Mid. p.
29.

But Cato was not to be moved from his purpose by these compliments, or motives of friendship: He was an enemy by principle to all decrees of this kind, and thought them bestowed too cheaply, and prostituted to occasions unworthy of them; so that, when Cicero's letters came under deliberation, though he spoke with all imaginable honour and respect of Cicero, and highly extolled both his civil and military administration, yet he voted *against the supplication*¹, which was decreed however, without any other dissenting voice, except that of Favonius, who loved always to mimic Cato, and of Hirrus, who had a personal quarrel with Cicero: Yet, when the vote was over, Cato himself assisted in drawing up the decree, and had his name inserted in it, which was the usual mark of a particular approbation of the thing, and friendship to the person in whose favour it passed. But Cato's answer to Cicero's letter will shew the temper of the man, and the grounds on which he acted on this occasion.

Ep. Fam.
xv. 6.

mannerly, charliffe, and arrogant, without regarding either what or to whom he was writing; and, if he continued in that humour, you may leave him alone, says he, you shall have no rival of me; but he will come, I believe, to a better mind. But, to shew, after all, what a real inclination he had to oblige him, he never left urging King Ariobarzanes till he had squeezed from him a hundred talents, in part of Brutus's debt, or about twenty thousand pounds;

the same sum, probably, which had been destined to Cicero himself.

¹ Cicero had undoubtedly no claim to the Melm. honour he demanded; and for this reason, Vol. II.
 among others, because the number of the p. 51.
 slain, on the side of the enemy, was not so great as the laws in these cases required; as is evident from a letter of Cælius to Cicero
 on the subject. Vid. Ep. Fam. VIII. ii.
 Melm. vi. 6.

M. Cato to M. T. Cicero, Emperor.

Y. R. 703.
Ref. Chr.

“ Not only my regard for the Republic, but my affection for you, “ makes me very sincerely rejoice in finding, that you exercise the same “ integrity and vigilance in the conduct of our arms abroad, as distin“ guished your administration of our most important affairs at home. I “ have therefore paid your actions that honour, which, according to my “ best judgment, was due to them : And, in speaking of them before the “ Senate, as well as afterwards, when I assisted in drawing up the decree
“ in your favour, I ascribed to your probity and prudent conduct the de“ fence of your province, the preservation of the crown and person of “ Ariobarzanes, and the recovery of the allies to their duty and affection
“ to our empire. If you rather chuse, however, that we should ascribe “ to the Gods those advantages, for which the Republic is not at all in“ debted to fortune, but wholly to your moderation and consummate wis“ dom, I am glad that the Senate has decreed a thanksgiving. But if your “ willingness to let fortune have the credit of your actions be for this “ reason, that you imagine a thanksgiving necessarily opens your way to “ a triumph, I must observe, that the latter is not always a consequence “ of the former. Yet granting it were, is it not far more to the honour of “ a General to have it declared, by a vote of the Senate, that he preserved “ his province by the mildness and equity of his administration, than that he “ owed it either to the strength of his troops, or to the favour of the Gods?
“ such, at least, were my sentiments when this question came before the “ House : And, if I have employed more words than usual in explaining “ them, it was from a desire of convincing you, that, though I proposed “ to the Senate what I thought would be most for the advantage of your “ reputation, I rejoice that they have determined what is most agreeable “ to your wishes. I have only to request the continuance of your friend“ ship ; and to intreat you steadily to persevere in those paths of integrity “ which you have hitherto pursued, both in respect to our allies and to the “ Republic.” Farewell.”

Caesar

Melm.
Vol. I. p.
31. n. 1.

“ This letter (to speak in Virtuoso lan“ guage) is an unique, and extremely valuable,
“ as being the only composition that has been “ transmitted to us from the hands of Cato.
“ It confirms what Plutarch expressly asserts,
“ that Cato's manners were by no means of a “ rough and unpolished cast, as no refusal “ could have been drawn up in more decent and “ civil terms. A judicious eye, however, can“ not but discern, through this veil of polite“ nefs, the nice touches of a delicate and con“ cealed raillery.”—Nevertheless, as Cicero had a farther suit to make to the Senate, in the demand of a triumph, he chose to dissemble his resentment, and returned the following civil answer to Cato.

To Marcus Cato.

“ Praise from thy lips 'tis mine with joy to boast :
“ He best can give it, who deserves it most :
Ep. Fam.
xv. 6.
Melm. v.
10.

4 D 2

“ As

Y. R. 703.

Midd. 31.

Ad Att.

i. i. 2.

Cæsar was not displeased, perhaps, to hear of Cato's stiffness, as it might naturally create a coldness between him and Cicero: For, in a congratulatory letter to Cicero upon the success of his arms, and the supplication decreed in his honour, he aggravated the rudeness and ingratitude of Cato. Cicero himself was highly disgusted at it, especially when Cato soon afterwards voted a supplication to his son-in law Bibulus. Cato, says Cicero, was shamefully malicious; he gave me what I did not ask, a character of integrity, justice, and clemency, but denied me what I did.—Yet this same man voted a supplication of twenty days to Bibulus: Pardon me if I cannot bear this usage.

Midd. 38.

Ad Att.

vi. 8.

Vid. supr.

p. 406 &

413

Ad Att.

vii. 2.

Cicero, in writing afterwards to Atticus on the same subject, says, “Consider what you would advise me with regard to a Triumph, to which my friends invite me: For my part, if Bibulus, who, while there was a Parthian in Syria, never set a foot out of the gates of Antioch, any more than he did upon a certain occasion out of his own house”, “had not solicited a triumph, I should have been quiet; but now it is a shame to sit still.” Again, “As to a Triumph, I had no thoughts of it before Bibulus's most impudent letters, by which he obtained

“As Hætor, I think, says to the venerable Priam in one of Nævius's plays. Honourable indeed is that applause which is bestowed by those who have themselves been the constant object of universal approbation. Accordingly, I esteem the encomiums you conferred upon me in the Senate together with your congratulatory letter as a distinction of the highest and most illustrious kind. Nothing could be more agreeable to my wishes, as nothing could be more glorious for my reputation, than your having thus freely given to friendship whatever you could strictly give to truth. Were Rome entirely composed of Catos, or could it produce many (as it is surprizing it can furnish even one) of that venerable character, my desires would be amply satisfied: And I should prefer your single approbation to all the laurels and all the triumphal cars in the universe. In my own judgment, indeed, and according to the refined estimate of true philosophy, the compliments you paid me in the Senate, and which have been transmitted to me by my friends, are undoubtedly the most significant distinction I can possibly receive. I acquainted you, in my former letter, with the particular motives which induced me to be de-ferous (for I will not call it ambitious) of a triumph: And if the reasons I have assigned will not, in your opinion, justify a warm pur-

“suit of that honour, they must prove, at least, that I ought not to refuse it, if the Senate should make me the offer. And I hope that Assembly, in consideration of my services in this province, will not think me undeserving of a reward so usually conferred. If I should not be disappointed in this hope, my only request is, (what indeed you kindly promise) that, as you have paid me the honour you thought most to my glory, you would rejoice in my obtaining those which are most to my inclination. And this disposition you have already very sincerely shewn, not only by your letter, but by having signed the decree that has passed in my favour. For decrees of this kind, I know, are usually subscribed by those who are most in the interest of the person to whose honour they are voted. I will only add, that I hope to see you very soon: And may I find the Republic in a happier situation than what my fears presage! Farewell.”

* N. B. This is that Bibulus, of whose lot, when the contempt he met with abroad made him shut himself up in his own house, Cicero once said, or pretends to have said, even in the presence of Pompey, that he preferred it, unhappy as it might appear, to all the splendid Triumphs of the most victorious General. Vide supra, p. 510.

“ an

“ an honourable supplication. If he had really done all that he has “ written, I should rejoice at it, and wish well to his suit; but for him “ who never stirred beyond the walls while there was an enemy on this side
 “ the *Euphrates*⁴⁹, to have such an honour decreed; and for me, whose “ army inspired all their hopes and spirits into his, not to obtain the same,
 “ will be a disgrace to us; I say to us, joining you to myself: Wherefore
 “ I am determined to push at all, and hope to obtain all.”

Y. R. 703
 Bef. Chr.
 49.
 402 Conf.

The remaining part of Cicero's government was employed in the civil affairs of the province, where his whole care was to ease the several cities and districts of that excessive load of debts, in which the avarice and rapaciousness of former Governors had involved them. He laid it down for the first rule of his administration, not to suffer any money to be expended either upon himself or his officers: And when one of his Lieutenants, L.
Tullius, in passing through the country, exacted only the forage and firing which was due by law, and that but once a-day, and not, as all others had done before, from every town and village through which they passed, he was much out of humour, and could not help complaining of it, as a stain upon his government, since none of his people besides had taken even a single farthing.
 All the wealthier cities of the province used to pay to all their Proconsuls large contributions, for being exempted from furnishing winter-quarters to the army: Cyprus alone had paid yearly, on this single account, two hundred talents, or about forty thousand pounds: But Cicero remitted this whole tax to them, which alone made a vast revenue; and applied all the customary perquisites of his office to the relief of the distressed province: Yet for all his services and generosity which amazed the poor people, he would accept no honours but what were merely verbal, prohibiting all expensive monuments, as statues, temples, brazen horses, &c. which, by the flattery of Asia, used to be erected of course to all Governors, though never so corrupt and oppressive. While he was upon his visitation of the Asiatic districts, there happened to be a kind of famine in the country; yet, wherever he came, he not only provided for his family as his own expence, but prevailed with the merchants and dealers, who had any quantity of corn in their storehouses, to supply the people with it on easy terms; Ad Att.
 living himself all the while splendidly and hospitably, and keeping an open table, v. 15.
not only for all the Roman officers, but the gentry of the province. In the Midd. 33.

 Ad Att.
 v. 21.

Midd. 15. ² After the contemptible account which Ci- cero gives of Bibulus's conduct in Syria, it must appear strange to see him honoured with a supplication, and aspiring even to a triumph:
 But this was not for any thing that he himself had done (for he had suffered ^{*} a defeat)
 but for what, before the arrival of Bibulus, his Lieutenant Cassius had performed against the Parthians; the success of the Lieutenants being ascribed always to the auspices of the General, who reaped the reward and glory of it: And as the Parthians were the most dangerous enemies of the Republic, and the more particularly dreaded at this time for their late victory over Crassus, so any advantage gained against them was sure to be well received at Rome, and repaid with all the honours that could reasonably be demanded.

following

V.R. 703. following letter to Atticus he gives him a summary view of his manner of governing.

Ad Att.
vi. 2.

" I see, says he, that you are much pleased with my moderation and
" abstinence; but you would be much more so, if you were with me;
" especially at Laodicea, where I did wonders at the sessions, which I have
" just held, for the affairs of the dioceses, from the thirteenth of February
" to the first of May. Many cities were wholly freed from all their debts;
" many greatly eased; and all, by being allowed to govern themselves
" by their own laws, have recovered new life. There are two ways,
" by which I have put them in a capacity of freeing, or of easing
" themselves at least from their debts; the one is by suffering no expence
" at all to be made on the account of my government. When I say
" none at all, I speak not hyperbolically; there is not so much as a far-
" thing: It is incredible to think, what relief they have found from this " single article. The other is this; their own Greek Magistrates had " strangely abused and plundered them. I examined every one of them
" who had borne any office for ten years past: They all plainly confessed;
" and, without the ignominy of a public conviction, made restitution
" of the money, which they had pillaged: So that the people, who had " paid nothing to our farmers for the present lustrum, have now paid the " arrears of the last, even without murmuring. This has placed me in " high favour with the publicans: A grateful set of men, you will say;
" I have really found them such.—The rest of my jurisdiction shall be " managed with the same address, and create the same admiration of my " clemency and easiness'. There is no difficulty of access to me, as there " is

Cibb. p.
178.

Surely a corrupt and vicious taste for glory was never more visible in any man than it is in Cicero, when he effects to despise* his provincial government of Cilicia; where he had done more good and deserved more praise, than in any one scene of his life; having, agreeably to his determined purpose, when he entered upon that employment, so conducted himself as to leave the innocence and integrity of his administration for a pattern of government to all succeeding Proconsuls. But, though he had there (as our late Laureate observes) " thrown into " actual practice those various virtues, of " which, as a private man, he had hitherto on" ly recommended the precepts; yet so quiet,
" so confined an eminence, such simplicity of
" virtue, alas! had no charms for Cicero.

" The thing itself was quite disagreeable to his Vid. supr.
" temper. And truly a temper more delicately p. 549.
" difficult to please we seldom meet with;
" yet was not this distaste more extraordinary
" than the reasons for it. — The whole affair
" is too inconsiderable for a man of my strength
" and capacity, who am able to sustain, as I " used to do, the weightier business of the Re-
" public. [Istum negotium non est dignum viri-
" bis nostris, qui majora onera, in Republica,
" sustinere et possem et soleam."]

This weightier business of the Republic, if we consider the whole political conduct of Cicero, we must observe to be mere party-business; nothing more than employing his utmost eloquence to defend the Senate in its usurpations upon the rights of the People,

Ep. Fam.
L. 12.
Mém. iv.
4.

* When just setting out from his province for Italy, he writes thus to Caesar: " Rome, my friend, Rome alone, is the object that merits your attention: And may you ever live within the splendor of that illustrious scene! All foreign employments (and it was my sentiment from my first entrance into the world) are below the ambition of those who have talents to distinguish themselves on that more conspicuous theatre. And would to God, as I was ever well convinced of this truth, I had always acted accordingly."

and

“ is to all other provincial Governors; no introduction by my Chamberlain: I am always up before day, and walking in my hall, with my doors open, as I used to do when a candidate at Rome: This is great and gracious here; though not at all troublesome to me, from my old habit and discipline, &c.—”².

But Cicero's method of governing gave no small umbrage, it seems, to his predecessor Appius, who considered it as a reproach upon himself, and sent several querulous letters to Cicero, because he had reversed some of his constitutions: “ And no wonder, says Cicero, that he is displeased with my manner; for what can be more unlike than his administration and mine? Under him the province was drained by expences and exactions; under me, not a penny levied for public or private use: What shall I say of his Praefects, Attendants, Lieutenants? Of their plunders, rapines, injuries? Whereas now, there is not a single family governed with such order, discipline, and modesty, as my province. This some of Appius's friends interpret ridiculously, as if I was taking pains to exalt my own character, in order to depress his; and doing all this, not for the sake of my own credit, but of his disgrace.”

Cicero's letters to Appius make one book of his familiar epistles, the greatest part of which are of the expostulatory kind, on the subject of their mutual jealousies and complaints. In this slippery state of their friendship, an accident happened at Rome, which had like to have put an end to it. His daughter Tullia, after parting from her second husband Crassipes, as it is probably thought, by divorce, he being alive at and to defend every super-egregious villain who professed himself his admirer, or to be of the Aristocratical faction; because, so long as the Senate governed with sovereign authority, so long Cicero, by the means of that same eloquence, had a considerable share in the government.

For, as to what the Laureate imagines, that Cicero's great object was “ to mend the morals of Rome, an enterprize not within the reach of human policy, benevolence, or wisdom to effect,” it does not appear that Cicero had any such chimerical project. Ill qualified must he have been for a Reformer of manners, who made it his business to screen from punishment the most notorious violators of the laws, even corrupt Judges, that sold decrees. Vid. supra, 394 & 399. He employed his eloquence to defend Antonius, of whose robberies he shared the profit: He defended Vatinius and Gabinius, men whom he himself had branded for knaves; and, as we have seen, was ready to defend Catiline, if Catiline would have requested that favour. Vid. supra, p. 318. Even in the suppression of Catiline's Conspiracy, which he for ever boasts of as the most glorious of all exploits, his manner of doing it was absolutely illegal and inexcusable, and of so pernicious a tendency, that he seems richly to have deserved the banishment to which he was condemned on that account. Vide supra, p. 368. the note; and 379.

² What pity it is that a man who knew so well what was right, and could occasionally confirm his conduct so strictly to it, should appear, even by his own account of himself, to have had no better motive for so doing than mere vain-glory, and the desire of applause; and should be all the while a detestable hypocrite, a villain in his heart, and so shameless as to make no scruple to own to his intimate friend, that he practised falshood and hypocrisy without scruple, and as a necessary means to the living comfortable in the world. We shall meet with this confession very soon, in one of his letters.

this

Y. R. 703. this time, and under Cicero's displeasure, was married, in her father's absence, to a third, P. Cornelius Dolabella: Several parties had been offered to her, and, among these, Tib. Claudius Nero, who afterwards married Livia, whom Augustus took away from him: Nero made his proposals to Cicero in Cilicia, who referred him to the women, to whom he had left the management of that affair; but, before these overtures reached them, they had made up the match with Dolabella, being mightily taken with his complaisant and obsequious address. He was a nobleman of Patrician descent, and of great parts and politeness; but of a violent, daring, ambitious temper, and, by a life of pleasure and expence, greatly distressed in his fortunes; which made Cicero very uneasy when he came afterwards to know it. Dolabella, at the time of his marriage, for which he made way also by the divorce of his first wife, gave a proof of his enterprizing genius, by impeaching Appius Claudius of practices against the state in his government of Cilicia, and of bribery and corruption in his suit for the Consulship. This put a great difficulty upon Cicero, and made it natural to suspect that he privately favoured the impeachment, where the accuser was his son-in-law: But, in clearing himself of it to Appius, though he dissembled in disclaiming any knowledge of that match, yet he was very sincere in professing himself an utter stranger to the impeachment, and was in truth, for his own sake, greatly disturbed at it. But as, from the circumstance of his succeeding to Appius in his government, he was of all men the most capable of serving or hurting him at the trial, so Pompey, who took great pains to screen Appius, was extremely desirous to engage Cicero on their side, and had thoughts of sending one of his sons to him for that purpose: But Cicero saved them that trouble, by declaring early and openly for Appius, and promising every thing from the province that could be of any service to him: So that Appius, instead of declining a trial, contrived to bring it on as soon as he could; and with that view, having dropt his pretensions to a Triumph, entered the City, and offered himself to his Judges, before his accuser was prepared for him: He was acquitted, without any difficulty, of both the indictments.

The following letters not only lay before the base hypocritical conduct of Cicero, with regard to Appius and Dolabella, but contain several important particulars of what at this time was doing at Rome in relation to Pompey and Cæsar, and the approaching breach between them.

Marcus Cælius to Cicero.

Ep. Fam. vii. 6. " You have been informed, I doubt not, that Dolabella has exhibited Mem. v. 5. " articles of impeachment against Appius: And this prosecution seems to be " more agreeable to the world in general than I imagined. Appius however " has acted with great prudence upon the occasion: For, as soon as his ad" versary

“ versary had lodged his information, he withdrew his petition for a “ Triumph, and immediately entered the City. By this means he silenced
 “ the reports to his disadvantage; as he appeared more willing to take his “ trial than his prosecutor expected. Appius relies greatly, in this con“ juncture, upon your assistance: And, I am persuaded, you are not disinclined
 “ to serve him. You have it now in your power to do so, as far as you “ shall think proper: Though I must add, you would be more at liberty “ to limit your good offices toward him, if you and he had never been “ ill together. But, as the case now stands, were you to measure out “ your services by the right he has to demand them, it might be suspected “ that you were not sincere in your reconciliation: Whereas you can “ hazard no censure by obliging him, as you will shew that you are not “ to be discouraged from acting a generous part, even where friendship “ might incline you to the contrary. This reminds me of acquainting
 “ you, that Dolabella's wife obtained a divorce just upon the commence“ ment of this prosecution. I remember the commission^a you left with me,
 “ when you set out for the province: As, I dare say, you have not forgotten
 “ what I afterwards wrote to you concerning that affair. I have not time “ to enlarge upon it at present: Only let me advise you, how much soever you “ may relish the scheme, to wait the event of this trial, before you discover “ your sentiments. If, indeed, your inclinations should be known, it will raise
 “ a very invidious clamour against you: And should you give Dolabella
 “ the least intimation of them, they will certainly become more public than “ will be convenient either for your interest or your honour. He would “ undoubtedly be unable to conceal a circumstance so advantageous to his “ present views, and which would give so much credit to the prosecution
 “ in which he is engaged: And, I am persuaded, he would scarce refrain “ from making it the subject of his conversation, notwithstanding he was “ sure the discovery would prove to his prejudice.

“ Pompey, I am told, interests himself extremely in behalf of Appius; “ inasmuch that it is generally imagined he has a design of sending one “ of his sons to solicit you in his favour. Mean while we are in the “ humour here of acquitting all criminals: Nothing, in truth, so base and so “ villainous can be perpetrated, that is not sure of escaping punishment.
 “ You will perceive how wondrously active our Consuls are in their office, “ when I tell you that they have not yet been able to procure a single “ decree of the Senate, except one for appointing the Latian festivals.
 “ Even our friend Curio has not hitherto acted with any spirit in his “ Tribunate: As indeed it is impossible to describe the general indolence that “ has seized us. If it were not for my contest with the vintners, and the

^a It seems very evident from this passage, that there was some prospect of a divorce between Dolabella and his wife before Cicero left Rome; and that Cicero had commissioned Cœ-lius, in case this event should happen, to take some measures for procuring a match between Dolabella and his daughter Tullia. Melm. Vol. I. p. 438.

Y. R. 23. " surveyors of the public acqueducts, all Rome would appear in a profound B. f. Ch. " lethargy. In short, I know not to what degree the Parthians may have 40. " animated you: But as for us, in this part of the world, we are fast asleep.
 — " But how much soever we may want to be awakened, I hope it will not " be by the Parthians. It is reported, nevertheless, though I know not on V. f. 23. " what foundation, that they have gained some slight advantage over the
 1. f. 10. " troops of Bibulus near mount Amanus.

" Since I wrote the above, I must recall what I said concerning Curio:
 " The cold fit is at length expelled by the warmth of those censures to " which the levity of his conduct has exposed him. For, not being able " to carry his point with respect to the intercalation [for which he had ap- " plied himself to the Pontifical college, in order to lengthen out the period
 " of his Tribunician ministry] he has deserted the interest of the Senate,
 " and harangued the People in favour of Cæsar. He threatens likewise
 " to propose a Viarian Law, somewhat of the same tendency with the " Agrarian, which was formerly attempted by Rullus: As also another,
 " empowering the Ædiles to distribute corn among the People.

" If you should determine (as I think you ought) to employ your good " offices in behalf of Appius, I beg you would take that opportunity
 " of recommending me to his favour. Let me prevail with you likewise
 " not to declare yourself with respect to Dolabella; as your leaving that " point at large will be of singular importance, not only to the affair I hint
 " at, but also in regard to the opinion the world will entertain of your justice
 " and honour.

" Will it not be a high reflection upon you, if I should not be furnished " with some Grecian panthers? Farewell."

To Marcus Cælius.

R. p. E. m.
 B. 11.
 N. m. 7.
 12.

" Would you imagine I should ever be at a loss for words? I do not " mean of that chosen and elegant kind which are the privilege of you " celebrated Orators, but those of ordinary and common use. Yet,
 " believe me, I am utterly incapable of expressing the solicitude I feel
 " concerning the resolutions that may be taken in the Senate in regard " to the provinces. I am extremely impatient indeed to return to my " friends at Rome: Among which number you are principally in my " thoughts. I will confess likewise, that I am quite satiated with my " government. For, in the first place, I have more reason to apprehend
 " that some reverse of fortune may deprive me of the glory I have here acquired,
 " than to expect I should be able to raise it higher: And, in the next place,
 " I cannot but look upon the whole business of this scene as much inferior to
 " my strength; which is both able and accustomed to support a far more " important weight. I will acknowledge too, that I am uneasy in the ex- " pectation of a very terrible war [with the Parthians] which is like to be
 " kindled

" kindled in this part of the world; and which I may probably escape, if I " should obtain my dismissal at the stated time. Y. R. 703.
Bef. Ch.

" I do not forget the panthers you desired; and have given my orders 29.
402 Cons.
 " to the persons usually employed in hunting them: But these animals are " exceedingly scarce with us. They take it so unkind, you must know, " that they should be the only creatures in my province for whom any
 " snares are laid, that they have withdrawn themselves from my govern" ment, and are gone into Caria.—Be well assured the honour of your
 " Ædileship is much my care: And this day particularly reminds me of it,
 " as it is the festival of the Megalensian games," [which were under the " conduct of the Curule Ædiles, of whom Coelius was now one. The festival
 " began on the fourth of April, and continued six days.

" I hope you will send me a minute detail of our public affairs; as I " have an entire dependance on the accounts which are transmitted to me
 " by your hand. Farewell."

To Marcus Caelius Curule Ædile.

" YOUR very agreeable letters visit me but seldom: Perhaps by some Ep. F. m.
 " accident or other they lose their way. How full was the last * which came 1. 13.
N. m.
 " to my hands of the most prudent and obliging advice! I had determined in- v 15.
 " deed to act in the manner you recommend: But it gives an additional strength * Vid. sup.
P. 576.
 " to one's resolution, to find them agreeable to the sentiments of so " faithful and so judicious a friend. I have often assured you of my extreme
 " affection for Appius: And I had reason to believe, after our mutual " reconciliation, that he entertained the same favourable disposition to" wards me. For he distinguished me, in his Consulate, with great marks
 " of honour and amity.—I appeal to you, that I was not wanting, on " my part, in a suitable return And, indeed, he stood so much the higher
 " in my esteem, as I was sensible of the affection he had conceived for you.
 " Add to this, that I am, as you well know, wholly devoted to Pompey,
 " and tenderly attached also to Brutus. Can I then want a reason of " uniting myself with Appius, thus supported, as he is, by the most " powerful friends and alliances, and flourishing in every other advantage
 " that can be derived from affluent possessions, in conjunction with great
 " abilities?—Believe me, I have never said or done the least thing,
 " throughout the whole course of my government, with a view of pre" judicing his reputation. And now, that my friend Dolabella has " so rashly attacked him, I am exerting all my good offices to dissipate
 " the rising storm with which he is threatened. You mentioned some" thing of a lethargic inactivity that had seized the Republic. I rejoiced,
 " no doubt, to hear that you were in a state of such profound tranquillity,
 " as well as that our spirited friend* was so much infected with this gene- * Curio.
 " ral indolence, as not to be in a humour of disturbing it. But the last

Y. R. 703. " paragraph of your letter, which was written, I observed, with your own Bef. Chr. " hand, changed the scene, and somewhat indeed discomposed me. Is Cu-
 43. " rio really then become a convert to Cæsar? But, extraordinary as this 402 Cæf. " event may appear to others, believe me, it is agreeable to what I al" ways suspected. Good Gods! how do I long to laugh with you at the " ridiculous farce which is acting in your part of the world!

" I have finished my juridical circuit; and not only settled the finances
 " of the several cities upon a more advantageous basis, but secured to the " farmers of the revenues the arrears due to their former agreements,
 " without the least complaint from any of the parties concerned. In short,
 " I have given entire satisfaction to all orders and degrees of men in this " province. I propose, therefore, to set out for Cilicia on the seventh of " May. From whence, after having just looked upon the troops in their " summer cantonment, and settled some affairs relating to the army, I in" tend, agreeably to the decree of the Senate for that purpose, to set for" ward to Rome. I am extremely impatient, indeed, to return to my friends;
 " but particularly to you, whom I much wish to see in the administration " of your Ædileship.—Farewell."

To Appius Pulcher.

Ep. Fam.
 lib. 10.
 Melm.
 1. 1.

" WHEN I first received an account of the ill-judged prosecution which " had been commenced against you, it gave me great concern; as nothing " could possibly have happened that I less expected. But, as soon as I " had recovered from my surprise, I was well satisfied that you will easily
 " disappoint the malice of your enemies; as I have the highest confi" dence in your own judicious conduct for that purpose; as well as a very " great one in that of your friends. I see many reasons, indeed, to be" lieve, that the envy of your adversaries will only brighten that character
 " they meant to sully. Though I cannot but regret, that they should have " thus snatched from you an honour you so justly merit, and of which " you had so well-grounded an assurance; the honour I mean of a Tri- " umph. However, you will shew your judgment, if you should consider this
 " pompous distinction in the light it has ever appeared to my own view;
 " and at the same time enjoy a triumph of the completest kind, in the confu" sion and disappointment of your enemies: As I am well convinced, that the " vigorous and prudent exertion of your power and influence will give " them full reason to repent of their violent proceedings. As for myself,
 " be well assured (and I call every God to witness the sincerity of what I pro" mise) that I will exert my utmost interest in support, I will not say of your
 " person, which I hope, is in no danger, but of your dignities and honour.
 " To this end, I shall employ my best good offices for you in this province,
 " where you once presided; and employ them with all the warmth of an " intercessor, with all the assiduity of a relation, with all the influence
 " of

Vid. Supr.
 P. 575.

“ of a man, who, I trust, is dear to those cities, and with all the authority “ of one who is invested with the supreme command. In a word, I hope “ you will both ask and expect of me every service in my power: And, “ believe me, I shall give you greater proofs of my affection than you “ are disposed, perhaps to imagine. Notwithstanding, therefore, the letter
 “ I received from you by the hands of Quintus Servilius was extremely “ short, yet I could not but think it much too long: For it was doing an “ injury to the sentiments of my heart, to suppose you had any occasion to so- “ licit my assistance. I am sorry you should have an opportunity of ex“ perienicing, by an incident so little agreeable to you, the rank you bear
 “ in my affection, the esteem which I entertain for Pompey, whom I justly “ value above all men, and the measure of my unfeigned regard for Brutus:
 “ Circumstances, I should hope, of which our daily intercourse had ren“ dered you sufficiently sensible. However, since it has so happened, I “ should think I acted a most unworthy, not to say a criminal part, if I were “ to omit any article wherein my services can avail you.

“ Pontinius remembers the singular instances of friendship he has re“ ceived from you, and of which I myself was a witness^b, with all the “ gratitude and affection to which you have so undoubted a right. The “ urgency of his affairs had obliged him, though with great reluctance, to “ leave me. Nevertheless, having been informed, just as he was going to “ embark at Ephesus, that his presence in this province might be of ad“ vantage to your cause, he immediately returned back to Laodicea. I am “ persuaded you will meet with numberless such instances of zeal upon “ this occasion: Can I doubt then that this troublesome affair will prove,
 “ in the conclusion, greatly to your credit?

“ If you should be able to bring on an election of CENSORS, and should “ exercise that office in the manner you certainly ought, and for which you are “ so perfectly well qualified, you can never want that authority in the “ Republic which will afford at once a protection both to yourself and “ your friends. Let me intreat, therefore, your most strenuous endeavours “ to prevent my administration from being prolonged: That, after having “ filled up the measure of my affectionate services to you here, I may have “ the satisfaction also of presenting them to you at Rome.

“ I read with pleasure, though by no means with surprize, the account
 “ you gave me of that general zeal which all orders and degrees of men “ have shewn in your cause: A circumstance of which I had likewise been “ informed by my other friends*. It affords me great satisfaction to find, “ * Vid. sup.
 “ P. 576.

^b Pontinius met with so strong an opposition to his claim of a triumph for quelling
 the Allobroges, and particularly from Cato, that it was four years before his petition was granted. Appius was then Consul, and favoured him. Vid. supra, p. 576.

^c N. B. Cicero, while he wrote this, thought no man less qualified for the office than Appius; whose projects of reformation are a subject of ridicule to him and his correspondent Calpurnius. Ep. Fam. viii. 14.

Y. R. 703. " that a man, with whom I have the honour and pleasure to be so intimately Bef Chr. " united, is thus distinguished with that universal approbation he so justly
 49. " deserves. But I rejoice in this upon another consideration likewise; 400 Conf. " and as it is a proof that there still remains a general disposition in Rome
 " to support the cause of illustrious merit: A disposition, which I have " myself also experienced, upon every occasion, as the honourable recom-
 " pence of my pains and vigils in the public service. But I am asto" nished that Dolabella, a young man whom I formerly rescued with " the utmost difficulty from the consequences of two capital impeach-
 " ments, should so ungratefully forget the patron to whom he owes all
 " that he enjoys, as to be the author of this ill-considered prosecution
 " of my friend. And what aggravates the folly of his conduct is, that " he should thus adventure to attack a man, who is distinguished with the " highest honours, and supported by the most powerful friendships; at " the same time that he himself (to speak of him in the softest terms) is " greatly deficient in both these respects. I had received an account from " our friend Caelius, before your letter reached my hand, of the idle and " ridiculous report he has propagated, and on which you so largely expatiate.
 " There is so little ground, however, for what he asserts, that he assured I " would much sooner break off all former friendship with a man who had thus " declared himself your enemy, than he prevailed upon to engage with him in " any new connexions".

" You

M. Ann. " The illustrious merit of Appius we have " seen above. Ibid. supra, 575.

" Nothing could be more distant from Ci" cero's heart than what he here pretends. For " there is the strongest evidence to believe " that it was his fixed intention, at this very " time, to enter into an alliance with Dela-
 " bella: And, in fact, Tullia was married to " him soon after the date of this letter. Cicero
 " affirms, I must acknowledge, in an epistle
 " to Atticus, that this transaction was entirely " without his knowledge: But he seems to " have dealt as insincerely upon this occasion
 " with his bosom friend, as he too frequently
 " did with all the world beside. Accordingly
 " he assures Atticus, he so little expected the " news of his daughter's match, that he was " actually in treaty for the disposal of her to " another person. But, if the latter part of " this assertion were true, it aggravates his dis-
 " simulation: For the former most evidently " was false. For, not to mention the great " probability there is that he left a commission
 " with Caelius, when he set out for the province,
 " relating to the marriage in question, it appears
 " that he had received more than one letter

" from him upon this subject, before he wrote
 " the last mentioned to Atticus; and conse" quently that he could not have been so much
 " a stranger to the affair as he chose to repre" sent himself. For Cicero's answer to the " letter of Caelius, concerning this treaty with
 " Dolabella, is extant, and it cannot be dated
 " later than the beginning of May in the pre" sent year; because he mentions the seventh
 " of that month as a future day, on which " he proposed to return from another part of " his province into Cilicia. But the letter " to Atticus must have been written in the " latter end of the same year, because he takes
 " notice in it of the death of Hortensius.
 " Now he was not informed of that event
 " till he came to Rhodes, in his voyage from
 " Cilicia; as he himself tells us in the intro" duction of his oratorical treatise, inscribed " to Brutus. If Cicero then was capable of
 " thus disguising the truth concerning Dola-
 " bella, to the nearest and most valuable of " his friends; it is no wonder he should not
 " scruple to act a still more counterfeit part
 " in all that he says of him to Appius.

" And

“ You have not the least reason to doubt of my zeal to serve you ; of “ which I have given many conspicuous testimonies in this province, as “ well as at Rome : Your letter nevertheless intimates some sort of suspi“ cion of the contrary. — — — — —

Y R 703.
 Bel. Chr.
 49.
 402 Conf.

“ If ever you experienced the probity of my heart, or observed a disposition
 “ in me worthy of those sublime contemplations to which I have devoted myself “ from my earliest youth ; if ever you discovered, by my conduct in the “ most important transactions, that I was neither void of spirit nor desti“ tute of abilities, you ought to have believed me incapable of acting
 “ a low and little part towards my friends, much more a base and a “ treacherous one — — — — —

“ But abstracted from these numerous and powerful motives, there is “ one, which, of itself, might be sufficient to evince the disposition in which “ I stand towards you. For, tell me, did ever any man entertain, or

“ And this dissimulation he very freely ac“ knowledges to Cælius, who indeed was in “ the whole secret of the affair ; as it was by “ his intervention that it seems to have been “ principally conducted. Accordingly Cicero, “ taking notice to Cælius of the letter now “ before us, which he tells him was written “ in consequence of the information he had “ received from him, expresses himself in the “ following remarkable words : “ What would “ you have said, had you seen the letter I “ wrote to Appian after my receiving yours “ upon that subject ? Quid si meam (sc. episto- “ lam) legas quam ego tui ex tuis literis misi ad
 “ Appianum ? sed quid agas ? sic vivitur :
 “ Which, in plain English, amounts to this,
 “ That, if a man will live in the world, he “ must submit to the lowest and most contemptible “ hypocrisy *. And it must be owned that “ Cicero, in the present instance, as well as in “ most others, acted up to the full extent of “ his maxim.” Ad Att. vi. 6. Ep. Fam.
viii. 6. De Clar. Orator. i. Ep. Fam. ii.
15.

Vid. infra,
 p. 584.

Ep. Fam.
 ii. 15.
 Melm.
 vi. 15.

The letter to Cælius, in which we find this convenient maxim, contains the following passage.

— “ It is with great pleasure I find that “ Dolabella enjoys the happiness of your “ esteem and friendship. I was at no loss to “ guess the circumstance to which you alluded “ when you mentioned your hopes, that the “ prudence of my daughter Tullia would temper

 “ his conduct.” M. Bayle observes, that Cæ- Article lius's letter to Cicero, concerning Dolabella Tullie.
 (whom Cælius knew to be a rake and a spendthrift) is exactly in the stile of compliment that would now be used in the like case.
 “ On excuseroit le passé sur la jeunesse ; et si “ l'on n'osoit pas assurer que toutes les im“ perfections de cet âge fussent corrigée, on “ dirait que le mariage avec une personne si “ accomplie, avec la fille d'un si excellent père, “ acheveroit la guérison.” The letter runs thus :

Marcus Cælius to Cicero.

“ I congratulate you on your alliance with Ep. Fam.
 “ so worthy a man as Dolabella : For such I viii.
 “ sincerely think him. His former conduct, Melm.
 “ it is true, has not been altogether for his vi. 1.
 “ own advantage. But time has now worn “ out those little indiscretions of his youth :
 “ At least, if any of them should still remain,
 “ the authority and advantage of your ad“ vice and friendship, together with the “ good sense of Tullia, will soon, I am con“ fident, reclaim him. He is by no means, “ indeed, obstinate : And it is not from any “ incapacity of discerning better, whenever “ he deviates from the right path. To say all “ in one word, I infinitely love him.” —

* How admirably well does this maxim accord with those words in the above Letter—The probity of my heart, a disposition in me worthy of those sublime contemplations to which I have devoted myself from my earliest youth !

“ had

Y. R. 703. " had ever any man reason to entertain, so high an esteem for another, Bef. Chr. " as that which you know I am filled with for the illustrious father-in-law 402 Cor. " of your daughter? If personal obligations indeed can give him a title ——— " to these sentiments; do I not owe to Pompey the enjoyment of my " Country, my family, my dignities, and even my very self? ——— ——— " Upon the whole, as you are united, not only by alliance, but
 " by affection to my illustrious friend; what are the sentiments, do you " imagine, that I ought to bear towards you? The truth of it is, were
 " I your professed enemy, as I am most sincerely the reverse, yet, after the " letter which I lately received from Pompey, I should think myself obliged to " sacrifice my resentment to his request, and be wholly governed by the inclinations
 " of a man to whom I am thus greatly indebted.——I expect every day to " hear that you are chosen CENSOR, &c.——Farewell."

In a subsequent letter to Appius he writes thus ——

Ep. Fam. " WHILST I lay encamped on the banks of the Pyramus [a river in 11. 11. " Cilicia] I received two letters from you, and both at the same time.—
 Mem. " One of them was dated on the fifth of April; but the other, which 11. 11. " seemed to have been written later, was without any date. I will answer
 " the former therefore in the first place, wherein you give me an account
 " of your having been acquitted of the impeachment exhibited against you for " male-administration in this province. I had before been apprised of many Vid. supr. " circumstances of this event by various letters and expresses, as well as by
 P. 555. " general report.——But, notwithstanding your letter was in some " measure anticipated, yet it heightened my satisfaction to receive the same
 " good news from your own hand. My information was by this means Vid. supr. " not only more full than what I had learnt from common fame, but it
 P. 555. " brought you nearer to my imagination, and rendered you in some sort pre" sent to those sentiments of joy which arose upon this occasion in my heart.
 " Accordingly, I embraced you in my thoughts, and kissed the letter that gave " me so much reason to rejoice upon my own account as well as upon yours.
 " I say, upon my own account, because I look upon those honours, which are " thus paid by the general voice of my Country to VIRTUE, industry, and " genius, as paid to myself; being too much disposed, perhaps, to ima" gine that these are qualities to which my own character is no stranger.
 " But, though I am by no means surprised that this trial should have " ended so much to your credit, yet I cannot forbear being astonished at " that mean and unworthy spirit which carried your enemies to engage in
 " this prosecution." [Hinting at Dolabella, whose friendship and alliance

Mem. " Cicero by no means thought himself so " it must be owned) to make Pompey believe
 " much obliged to Pompey as he here pre- " that he had forgotten the ill-usage he had
 " tends: And all these extravagant profes- " formerly received from him." Vid. ad
 " sions were a mere artifice (and a thin one Att. ix. 13.

Cicero

Cicero was at this time courting.] —“ Farewell: And if you are (as I sincerely hope) in the possession of the Censorial office, reflect often on the virtues of your illustrious ancestor*.”

In a little time after Appius's trial he was chosen CENSOR, together with Piso, Cæsar's father-in-law, the last men who bore that office during the Aristocracy, or rather the Anarchy of Rome. Clodius's Law, mentioned above, which had greatly restrained the power of these Magistrates, was repealed the last year by Scipio the Consul (Pompey's father-in-law,) and their ancient authority restored to them, which was now exercised with great rigour by Appius: Who, though really a Libertine, and remarkable for indulging himself in all the luxury of life, yet, by an affectation of severity, hoped to retrieve his character, and pass for an admirer of that ancient discipline, for which many of his ancestors had been celebrated. But this vain and unseasonable attempt of reformation served only to alienate people from Pompey's cause, with whom Appius was strictly allied: Whilst his Colleague Piso, who foresaw that effect, chose to sit still, and suffer him to disgrace the Knights and Senators at pleasure, which he did with great freedom, and, among others, turned Sallust the Historian out of the Senate, and was hardly restrained from putting the same affront upon Curio. This added strength to Cæsar; of whom both the SENATE and Pompey were at this time become extremely jealous: The SENATE, because of Cæsar's amazing victories, which made him idolized more than ever by the PEOPLE: Pompey, because Cæsar, as in all other accomplishments, so even in military virtue, appeared now to be his superior beyond compare.

* App.
Claud.
Cæcus.
Dio, p.
147.
Vid. supr.
p. 429.
Midd. p.
42.
Ep. Fam.
viii. 14.

Dio, p.
150.

C H A P. IX.

The war of CÆSAR in Gaul, commenced in the year 695, and continued to the year 703

G A U L (without including the Roman province) was, at the time of Cæsar's going thither, divided into three principal parts, Aquitain, Celtic Gaul and Belgic Gaul.

C. J. Cæs.
de Bell.
Gall. Com.
lib. i.

Aquitain, the smallest of the three, was bounded on the North by the river Garrone, on the South by the Pyrenees, on the West by the Ocean, and on the East by the Roman province*.

Aquitania.

The largest of the three, named Celtic Gaul, because inhabited by a people who called themselves Celtæ, though by the Romans they were called* Galli [Gauls,] had for its boundaries the Ocean on the West, the Rhine on the East, the Garrone on the South, and the Seine and the Marne on the North.

* Containing almost all Provence and Languedoc
Gallia Celtica.

* Cæsar very rarely, if ever, gives the name of Gauls to the people of Aquitania or of Gallia Belgica. Crev.

Gallia Belgica.

The two last named rivers made the Southern boundary of Belgic Gaul. On its other sides it was encompassed by the British channel and the Lower Rhine.

Each of these nations had its distinct language, customs, and laws. Of the three, the Belgæ (or Belgic nation) were the most warlike, because situated the most remote from the refinements and luxury of the Roman province, and because continually engaged in war with their neighbours, the Germans, on the other side the Rhine.

The people of Switzerland.

For the same reason the Helvetii were distinguished above the rest of the Celtæ for their bravery, being almost constantly, either as aggressors, or as acting on the defensive, at war with the Germans.

In the Consulship of M. Messala and M. Piso [Y. of R. 692.] Orgetorix, the most opulent and most illustrious of the Helvetian nobles, formed a singular project of ambition. Having first gained to his purpose the principal men of the state, he exhorted the people to remove all together in a body out of their own country; representing to them, that, as they surpassed all the other Celtæ in bravery, they would find it easy to acquire the sovereignty over the whole country of Celtic Gaul. To this proposal the Helvetii listened the more readily, not only because they thought themselves confined within limits too narrow for their number (their territory being only 140 miles in length, and 80 in breadth) but because, being bounded on one side by the Rhine, a broad and deep river; on another by *Mount Jura, a high ridge of hills that runs between them and the Sequani†; and on the side of the Roman province by the lake ‡ Leman and the river Rhone, they could not easily make hostile incursions on their neighbours, which restraint was a great grievance, a ground of much discontent to a numerous people that took delight in war.

* Mount St. Claude.
† Inhabitants of Franche-Comte.
‡ Lake of Geneva.

Moved by these considerations, and by the authority and persuasions of Orgetorix, they presently resolved to set about the providing of all necessaries for the projected migration. They imagined two years would be sufficient for these preparations, and they obliged themselves by a law to begin their march on the third. The whole management of this design was committed to Orgetorix, who undertook an embassy to two of the neighbouring states, the Sequani and Ædui, in order to establish peace and amity with them. As his aim was to make himself King of his own nation, he took this opportunity to persuade Casticus, whose father had for many years reigned over the Sequani, and been stiled Friend by the Senate and People of Rome, to possess himself of the same regal authority which his father had held. He likewise persuaded Dumnorix the Æduan (brother of Divitiacus, at that time the leading man in the state, and greatly beloved of the people) to aspire to Royalty, and he gave him his daughter in marriage.

The people of Ayr.

These three entered into strict engagements to assist and support one another in their respective schemes; and they entertained the flattering hope, that, having once brought those to effect, they should afterwards, with their united forces, easily get possession of all Celtic Gaul.

It happened, that the ambitious design of Orgetorix, to raise himself to empire at home, became known to his countrymen: Upon which discovery his person was seized, and a capital process commenced against him. Had he been found guilty, the law condemned him to be burnt alive: But, on the day appointed for his trial, his relations, servants, clients, and debtors, assembling in a body to the number of ten thousand, rescued him out of the hands of justice. The people, provoked at this contempt of the laws, resolved to support the authority of them; and the Magistrates had collected a considerable force for that purpose, when Orgetorix died suddenly: It was given out he perished by his own hand.

The Helvetii, notwithstanding the death of the projector, continued to pursue the project of migration with the same diligence as before: When they had furnished themselves with provisions for three months, and completed their other preparations, they burnt all their towns, twelve in number; their boroughs and villages, amounting to four hundred; and what corn they could not carry off; that, having thus banished all thoughts of returning to their own country, they might proceed in their enterprize with the more determined courage. Before their departure, they strengthened themselves by allies and companions (who after their example, and at their persuasion, burnt and destroyed their respective dwellings) the Rauraci, Tulingi, Latobrigi, and a swarm of Boii from Norica^b.

There were only two ways by which they could march out of their own country: One through the territories of the Sequani, between mount Jura and the Rhone, narrow and difficult, insomuch that in some places a single file of waggons could hardly pass. The impending mountain was besides very high and steep, so that a handful of men would be sufficient to stop them. The other lay through the Roman province, far easier and readier, because the Rhone, which flows between the confines of the Helvetii and the *Allobroges, a people lately subjected to the Romans, but seemingly not yet well affected to their government, was in some places fordable: And Geneva, a frontier town of the Allobroges, had a bridge which be-

* Inhabitants of Savoye and Dauphiné.

^b The first were the people of Basil, who then made part of the Helvetic body. The second and third were neighbours of the Helvetii. This is all we know of them with certainty. The Boii were originally inhabitants of the Bourbonnois, colonies of whom had settled in Germany and in Italy. Norica was Bavaria, and part of Austria. Crev.

After the total defeat of this multitude, a roll, written in Greek characters, was found in their camp, and brought to Cæsar. It contained a list of all who had set out upon this expedition, not only of those who were able to bear arms, but of the children, women, and old men. By this list it appeared, that the number of the Helvetii was 263,000; of the Tulingi 36,000; of the Latobrigi 14,000; of the Rauraci 23,000; of the Boii 32,000; in all 368,000.

longed to the Helvetii, whose country bordered upon theirs. The Helvetii therefore doubted not of obtaining a passage, either by persuasion or by force, through the territories of the Allobroges. Their general rendezvous was to be on the banks of the Rhone; and the day they fixed for it was the twenty-eighth of March, in the Consulship of Piso and Gabinus.

[Year of Rome 695.]

Cæsar, having notice of these proceedings, and that it was the design of the Helvetii to attempt a passage through the Roman province, hastened his departure¹ from Rome; and, posting by great journeys into Farther Gaul,

¹ We see by this account, which is from Cæsar himself, that the reason of his sudden and expeditious journey, from his quarters near Rome into Transalpine Gaul, was the intelligence he received of the motions and purposes of the Helvetii; who had fixed upon the twenty-eighth of March for their rendezvous on the banks of the Rhone, which they were to pass by the bridge at Geneva: And that he arrived at Geneva time enough to prevent their passage, by breaking down the bridge, receive an embassy from the Helvetii, and, by deferring his answer to the thirteenth of April, gain time sufficient to assemble forces out of the province, and draw up lines sixteen feet high, and nineteen miles in length, before the said thirteenth of April: We cannot, therefore, well suppose, that he left the neighbourhood of Rome much later than the middle of March.

Nevertheless M. Crevier, who all along seems (like Dr. Middleton) to be strongly biassed by prepossession and prejudice against Cæsar, finds a different reason from what Cæsar himself gives, for his going suddenly and in haste to his province; and gives that journey a different date. He writes thus:—" Cæsar, having driven from the Commonwealth the two men he most feared [Cicero and Cato,] had no longer any reason to stay in the neighbourhood of the City, but had reason to remove from it: For the partisans of the Aristocracy, beginning to recover from the consternation they had been thrown into by the Consulship of Cæsar, and the violence exercised towards Cicero, thought of bestirring themselves to do something against the oppressor of the public liberty. Two of the Prætors, L. Domitius and C. Memmius, would have the acts of Cæsar's Consulship submitted to the examination of the Senate, in order to their being annulled. His Questor was prosecuted, and he himself attacked by the Tribune Antistius; but he implored the aid of the other Tribunes, that he might have the benefit of the law which sheltered from all prosecutions those who were absent in the service of the State: And he made haste to get away."

Cæsar is here represented as running away from the neighbourhood of Rome, like a criminal who feared to be arrested and brought to punishment;—not a word of the Helvetii:—And this running away, which (as was just now observed) could not well be later than about the middle of March, was, according to M. Crevier, some time in April: For Crevier, he tells us that Cicero went from Rome by night in the beginning of April, and that Cæsar did not leave the neighbourhood of Rome till he had driven Cicero from thence. tom. xii. p. 181, 182.

Now what authority has M. Crevier for contradicting Cæsar's account of the reason which induced him to go away on a sudden, and in haste, to his province, and of the time when he went? Suetonius is the only author cited, an Historian remarkable for delighting in detraction, and for having no regard to the order of events, nor even to probability, in many things which he relates. But it happens in the present instance, that, though Suetonius says something not true, he does not say that for which he is cited. He does not say that Cæsar staid in the neighbourhood of Rome till he had driven Cicero out of it*, that

* Plutarch is, till the month of April; he does not postpone to that time the motion made in the Senate by the two Prætors; but speaks of it as made in the beginning of January: Nor does he represent Cæsar as having any apprehension of danger from that motion; but, on the contrary, as consenting to have the Senate take cognizance of the acts of his Consulship

[cogni-

Crevier,
tom. xii.
p. 202.

Gaul, came to Geneva. He began with breaking down the bridge over the Rhone; and, as there was at that time but one Roman legion in Transalpine Gaul, he ordered great levies to be made throughout the whole province. The Helvetii, being informed of his arrival, deputed several Noblemen of the first rank to wait upon him in the name of the State, and represent, "That they meant not to offer the least injury to the "Roman province; that necessity alone had determined them to the design "of passing through it, because they had no other way by which to direct "their march; that they therefore intreated they might have his per- "mission for that purpose." But Cæsar did not think proper to grant their request: However, that he might gain time, till the troops he had ordered to be raised could assemble, he told the Ambassadors he would consider of their demand; and that, if they returned by the thirteenth of April, they should have his final answer. Mean while, with the legions he then had, and the soldiers that came in to him from all parts of the province, he raised a rampart sixteen feet high, and nineteen miles in length, with a ditch from the lake Lemanus, into which the Rhone discharges itself, to mount Jura, which divides the territories of Sequani

[cognitionem Senatui detulit.] And, according to Suetonius, the prosecution, begun against Cæsar's Quæstor, and the attack, made by the Tribune Antistius upon Cæsar himself, were not before his sudden departure from the neighbourhood of Rome, but after it. —

Sueton. J. Functus Consulatu, C. Memmio, Lucioque Domitio Prætoribus, de superioris anni actis referentibus, cognitionem Senatui detulit; nec illo suscipiente, triduoque per irritas altercationes abjuncto, in provinciam abiit: Et statim quæstor ejus in præjudicium aliquot criminibus accusatus est. Mox et ipse a L. Antistio tribuno plebis postulatus, appellato denique collegio, obtinuit, cum reip. causa abesset, reus non fieri. Ad securitatem ergo posteritatis, in magno negotio habuit obligare semper annuos magistratus, et in competitibus non alios adjuvare, aut ad honorem pati pervenire quam qui sibi pepigissent, propugnatos absentiam suam: Cujus pacti non dubitavit a quibusdam jusjurandum, atque etiam syngrapham exigere. [The last part of this tale appeared, I presume, too ridiculous to Dr. Middleton and M. Crevier, to be adopted by them, notwithstanding their great dislike of Cæsar.]

Doctor Middleton conforms his relation to Suetonius, as to the time when the motion was made in the Senate by the two Prætors; but does not conform it either to Suetonius, or to Cæsar, as to the TIME when Cæsar went to his province: For the Doctor places this journey after Cicero's departure into banishment, that is, in the month of April; whereas Suetonius places it in January, and Cæsar himself, manifestly, not later than about the middle of March.

The Doctor's words are these: "Cæsar Mid. 337. "continued at Rome till he saw Cicero driven "out of it [i. e. according to the Doctor, "till about the end of March †:] But had no † See "sooner laid down his Consulship [on the last Midd. p. "day of December preceding] than he began to 350. "be attacked and affronted himself by two Sueton. J. "of the new Prætors, L. Domitius and C. Cæf. 23. "Memmius, who called in question the vali- "dity of his acts, and made several efforts in the "Senate to get them annulled by public autho- "rity. But the Senate had no stomach to "meddle with an affair so delicate; so that "the whole ended in some fruitless debates "and altercations [which had lasted only three "days:] And Cæsar, to prevent all attempts "of that kind in his absence, took care al- "ways, by force of bribes, to secure the leading "Magistrates in his interests; and so went off "to his province of Gaul." — I do not see how these last words, and so went off, &c. can be reconciled with Cæsar's continuing at Rome till he saw Cicero driven out of it. The Doctor seems not consistent with himself.

from

from those of the Helvetii. This work finished, he strengthened it with redoubts from space to space, and manned them with troops. When the Ambassadors, on the appointed day, returned for an answer, he told them, that he could not, consistently with the usages of the People of Rome on the like occasions, grant any foreign troops a passage through the province: And he let them see, that, should they attempt it by force, he was prepared to oppose them.

The Helvetii, driven from this hope, endeavoured, some by the means of boats fastened together, and of floats which they had prepared in great abundance, others by the fords of the Rhone, where was the least depth of water, to force a passage over the river; sometimes by day, oftener in the night: But, being constantly repulsed by the strength of the works thrown up, and by flights of darts, they at last abandoned the attempt. One way still remained, which was through the territories of the Sequani, but so narrow, that, without the consent of the natives, they could not pass. Not able to prevail by their own persuasions, they sent Ambassadors to Dumnorix the Æduan, that, through his intercession, they might obtain this favour of the Sequani. Dumnorix, by his popularity and generosity, had great influence with the Sequani, and was also well affected to the Helvetii, because he had married an Helvetian, the daughter of Orgetorix. Besides, he was framing to himself schemes of ambition, and wanted to have as many states as possible bound to him by offices of kindness. He readily therefore undertook the negotiation, and he obtained for the Helvetii the liberty of passing through the territories of the Sequani, the two nations mutually giving hostages to secure their not molesting or injuring each other during the march.

* Saint-
onge.
† People of To-louze.

Cæsar had intelligence of their design; which was to pass through the countries of the Sequani and Ædui into the territories of the *Santones, which border upon those of the Tolosati†, a state that made part of the Roman province. He foresaw many inconveniencies likely to arise to the Romans, should they have for their neighbours, in an open and plentiful country, a people ill-affected to them, and of a martial disposition. Leaving, therefore, the care of the new works he had raised to T. Labienus, his Lieutenant, he himself hastened by great journeys into Italy. There he raised two legions, and drew three more, that were cantoned round Aquileia, out of their quarters; and with these five legions took the nearest way over the Alps into Farther Gaul. The mountaineers opposed his passage, but without effect: He descended into the country of the Vocontii‡, traversed the territories of the Allobroges, crossed the Rhone, entered upon the lands of the Segusi§, and all this with such expedition, that he overtook the Helvetii at the passage of the Arar||.

† Le Di-
ois.
‡ Le Ly-
onnois.
§ The Sa-
one.

They had marched their forces through the narrow pass of mount Jura, and the territories of the Sequani; and were at this time actually employed in passing the Arar. Cæsar, informed by his scouts, that three parts

of

of their forces were got over the river, and that the fourth, which was the canton of the Tigurini, still remained on this side, left his camp about midnight, with three legions, and came up with the troops of the enemy that had not yet passed. As he found them unprepared for fighting, and encumbered with their baggage, he attacked them immediately, and put a great number of them to the sword: The rest fled, and sheltered themselves in the nearest woods.

The people of Zurich.

The forces of this very canton, about fifty years before, had vanquished and killed the Consul L. Cassius, and obliged his army to pass under the yoke. Thus, says Cæsar, whether by chance or the direction of the immortal Gods, that part of the Helvetic state, which brought so signal a calamity upon the Roman People, was the first to feel the weight of their resentment. In this case, Cæsar revenged not only the public, but likewise his own domestic injuries; because in the same battle where Cassius fell, was slain also his Lieutenant, L. Piso, the grandfather of L. Piso, Cæsar's father-in-law.

Vid. supra, P. 72.

After this victory, Cæsar, throwing a bridge over the river, led his army, without delay, in pursuit of the enemy. The Helvetii, dismayed at his sudden approach, as he had spent only one day in crossing the river, which they had not, without the utmost difficulty, accomplished in twenty, sent an embassy to him, at the head of which was Divico, who had been General of the Helvetii in the war against Cassius. He addressed Cæsar in words to this effect:

“ If you are disposed to conclude a peace, we are willing to go and settle in what country you shall think fit to assign us. But, if you persist in the resolution of making war, you will do well to call to mind the disgrace which befell the Romans heretofore, and the experienced bravery of the Helvetic nation.”

Cæsar answered: “ I have the less doubt concerning what will be the issue of a war, as I do bear in mind that disaster to which you refer, and which I well know to have happened to the Romans undeservedly. Had they been conscious of any injury by them committed, had they done any thing which could give them cause to fear, they would have kept themselves upon their guard; a conduct which admitted of no difficulty.— But, were I inclined to forget old injuries, can you expect I should forget likewise your late insult in attempting, against my will, to force a passage through the Roman province, and your ravaging the territories of the Ædui, Ambarri, and Allobroges? Your boasting so insolently of the victory over Cassius, is an additional provocation of my resentment. However, if you will make satisfaction to the Ædui and their allies, for the devastations committed in their countries, as also to the Allobroges, and will give hostages for the performance of your promises, I am ready to conclude a peace with you.” Divico replied ::

* Of this injury the sufferers had sent complaints to Cæsar.

replied: “ The Helvetii are accustomed to receive hostages, not to give them; and no people are better apprized of this than the Romans.” He said, and retired.

The next day the Helvetii decamped: Cæsar did the same; and, to observe their motions, sent forward all his horse, which, to the number of four thousand, he had drawn together from the province, and the countries of the Ædui and their allies. The cavalry pressing too close upon the rear of the enemy, the latter seized a moment, when they had the advantage of the ground, turned suddenly upon their pursuers, and put them to the rout, with some slaughter of the most advanced. Elated by this success, as having, with no more than five hundred horse, repulsed so great a multitude, they began to assume a bolder appearance, and frequently to face the Romans. Cæsar kept back his men from fighting, thinking it sufficient for the present to straiten the enemy’s foragers. In this manner the armies marched for fifteen days together: Between the Roman van and the rear of the Helvetii the distance did not exceed five or six miles.

In the mean time Cæsar daily pressed the Ædui for the corn which they had promised in the name of the public: For, by reason of the coldness of the climate, he was so far from finding the corn ripe in the fields, that there was not even sufficient forage for the horses. Neither could he receive those supplies which were coming to him by the Arar; because the Helvetii had turned off from that river, and he was determined not to quit the pursuit of them. The Ædui, to conceal from him the motive of their conduct, sometimes pretended that the corn was bought up, and ready to be sent; sometimes that it was actually on the way: But, when he saw no end of these delays, and that the day approached for delivering corn to the troops, he called together the Æduan chiefs, of whom he had a great number in his army, and among the rest Divitiacus, and their supreme Magistrate¹ Liscus. Cæsar reproached them severely for not having taken care to supply him in so pressing a conjuncture, and while the enemy was so near: Adding, that, as he had engaged in that war chiefly at their request, he had the greater reason to complain of their neglect.

Hereupon Liscus thought proper to declare what he had hitherto concealed, “ That there were some among them, who, though but private men, had yet more authority with the people than the Magistrates themselves: That those men had, by artful and seditious speeches, alarmed the multitude, and persuaded them to keep back their corn; insinuating, that, if their own state could not obtain the sovereignty of Gaul, it would be better for them to obey the Helvetii, Gauls like themselves, than the Romans; there not being the least reason to question but the Romans, after having subdued the Helvetii, would deprive the Ædui too, with

¹ This supreme Magistrate, styled Vergobret in the language of the country, was created annually, and had a power of life and death.

“ all the rest of the Gauls, of their liberty : That the very same men gave intelligence to the enemy of whatever the Romans designed or transacted in their camp ; his authority not being sufficient to restrain them : That he was not ignorant of the danger to which he exposed himself by the discovery he now made, compelled to it by necessity ; his silence being no longer consistent with the safety of the state.”

Cæsar perceived that Dumnorix, the brother of Divitiacus, was pointed at by this speech : But not thinking it adviseable that these matters should be debated in the presence of so many witnesses, he speedily dismissed the council, retaining only Liscus ; whom he then questioned on what he had just said ; and was answered with great courage and freedom. He put the same questions to others ; who all confirmed the truth of what Liscus had told him, that Dumnorix was a man of an enterprising spirit, fond of revolutions, and in great favour with the people, because of his liberality : That he had for many years farmed the customs, and other public revenues of the Edui, at a very low price ; no one daring to bid against him : That by this means he had considerably increased his estate, and was enabled to extend his bounty to all about him : That he constantly kept a great number of horsemen in pay, who attended him wherever he went : That his influence was not confined merely to his own country, but extended likewise to the neighbouring states : That, the better to support his interest, he had married his mother to a man of principal rank and authority among the Bituriges *, matched his sister, and the rest of his kindred, into other the most powerful states ; and had himself taken a wife from among the Helvetii : That he favoured and wished well to the Helvetii on the score of that alliance, and personally hated Cæsar, and hated the Romans, because by their arrival his power had been diminished, and his brother Divitiacus restored to his former credit and authority : That, should the Romans be overthrown, he was in great hopes of obtaining the sovereignty by means of the Helvetii. On the contrary, should they prevail, he must not only give up these hopes, but even all expectation of retaining the influence he had already acquired.

Cæsar learnt also, that, in the late engagement, Dumnorix, who commanded the Æduan cavalry, was the first who fled, and by his flight struck a terror into the rest of the troops ; that it was he who had procured for the Helvetii a passage through the territories of the Sequani ; and had effected an exchange of hostages between the two nations : And that he had done these things not only without permission from his own state, but even without their knowledge : All this, together with his being accused by the chief Magistrate of the Ædui, seemed to Cæsar a sufficient ground for taking cognizance of the matter himself, or ordering the state to proceed against him. One thing, however, restrained him a while from coming to any resolution, his regard for Divitiacus, the delinquent's brother, a man of singular probity, a faithfull ally of the Roman

People, and a friend of Cæsar's. That he might not wound a man or whom he had so great a value, Cæsar sent for him, and, having removed the usual interpreters, spoke to him by C. Valerius Procillus, a Prince of the Roman province, his intimate friend. He reminded Divitiacus of what, in his own presence, had been said of his brother Dumnorix, in the council of the Gauls, adding the later informations which he had received against him in private; and Cæsar earnestly requested of Divitiacus to consent, that either he himself or the state might take the matter into consideration. Divitiacus, embracing Cæsar, begged of him, with many tears, not to come to any severe resolution against his brother. "What you have heard is all true, and I myself have more reason than any man to be dissatisfied with him. At a time when my authority was great, both at home and in the other provinces of Gaul, and my brother, because of his youth, but little considered, I employed my interest to bring him into credit: And though Dumnorix has made use of the power he acquired by my means to diminish my favour with the people, yet I still find myself swayed by my affection for him, and by my regard for the public esteem: For, should my brother meet with any rigorous treatment from you, while I myself possess so large a share of your favour, all men will believe it done with my consent, and the minds of the Gauls be for ever alienated from me."

Cæsar, observing his concern, took him by the hand, bid him say no more, comforted him, and assured him that, for his sake, he would overlook not only the injuries done to himself, but to the Republic. He then sent for Dumnorix, and, in his brother's presence, declared the subjects of complaint he had against him, and admonished him to avoid for the future giving any ground for suspicion; adding, that he would pardon what was past for the sake of his brother: Cæsar appointed, however, some persons to have an eye over his behaviour, and to observe what company he frequented.

The same day having learnt by his scouts, that the enemy had posted themselves under a hill, eight miles from his camp, he sent out a party to view the ground, and examine the ascent of the hill. These reporting it to be extremely easy, he detached, about midnight, his Lieutenant Labiens, (to whom he imparted the design he had formed) with two legions, and with the same men for guides, who the day before had examined the ground to take possession of the summit of the hill. At three o'clock in the morning, having first sent forward his cavalry, he himself followed with the foot. He had directed Considius, an officer of reputation, who had served in the army of Sylla, and afterwards in that of Marcus Crassus, to go with the scouts to reconnoitre.

At day break, when Labiens had executed his commission, and Cæsar was within a mile and a half of the enemy's camp, they knowing nothing yet either of his or Labiens's approach, Considius came galloping ing back, and assured Cæsar, that the summit of the hill was possessed by the enemy, and that he had seen the Gallic ensigns there.

Cæsar retired to a rising ground, and drew up his men in order of battle. Labienus, whose instructions were not to engage the enemy till he saw the rest of the army approaching, that the attack might be made on all sides at the same time, having gained the top of the hill, waited the arrival of the Roman main body, without stirring from his post. The day was far spent before Cæsar learnt from his scouts that Corfidius, blinded by his fear, had made a false report, and that the enemy had decamped. The rest of that day Cæsar followed the enemy, and pitched his camp within three miles of them.

The next day, as the time drew near for delivering out corn to the army, and as he was not above eighteen miles from Bibracte *, the capital of the Ædui, where he hoped to find sufficient supplies for the subsistence of his troops, he quitted the pursuit of the Helvetii, and directed his march thither. The enemy informed of this motion by some deserters, and either ascribing it to fear, because Labienus, though possessed of the higher ground, had not attacked them the day before; or flattering themselves with the hopes of intercepting Cæsar's provisions, all on a sudden changed their resolution, and, instead of continuing their march, began to pursue and harass the rear guard of the Romans. Cæsar retired to a hill, and sent his cavalry to sustain the charge, while he drew up his forces in battalia. His four veteran legions he ranged in three lines towards the middle of the ascent; and above them he posted his two legions newly raised in Cisalpine Gaul, and all the auxiliaries; in such wise, that the whole hill was covered with his troops: The baggage was committed to the care of those on the upper ground. The Helvetii repulsed the Roman cavalry, formed themselves into a phalanx, and advanced in close order to attack the Roman van.

Cæsar, having sent away first his own horse, and then the horses of all his officers, that, by making the danger equal, no hope might remain but in victory, encouraged his men, and began the charge. The Romans, who fought from the higher ground, pouring their darts upon the enemy, easily broke their phalanx, and then fell upon them sword in hand. The battle was bloody, and continued for a long time doubtful; but the enemy being at length obliged to give way, one part withdrew towards a hill, and the rest sheltered themselves behind their carriages, which they had drawn together into one place before they began the battle. During this whole action, though it lasted from one o'clock in the afternoon till evening, no man saw the back of an enemy. The fight was renewed with great obstinacy at the carriages, and continued till the night was far spent. After a long dispute, the Romans got possession of the baggage and camp of the enemy. A son and daughter of Orgetorix were found among the prisoners. Only one hundred and twenty thousand of the Helvetii survived this defeat; who, retreating all that night, and continuing their march without intermission, arrived on the 4th day in the territories of the Lingones *. The Romans, detained by the care of looking after their wounded, and of burying their dead, continued upon the spot three days : But Cæsar sent messengers and letters to signify to the Lingones, that, if they would avoid drawing upon themselves the same calamities which the Helvetian fugitives were under, they must not furnish them with corn or other necessaries : And, after three days repose, he set forward to pursue the enemy.

* The people of Langres.

The Helvetii, compelled by an extreme want of all things, sent Ambassadors to him to treat about a surrendry. These meeting him on the way, and throwing themselves at his feet, in suppliant terms, and with many tears, begged for peace. Cæsar gave them no express answer at that time ; he only ordered that the Helvetii should wait for him in the place where they then were ; which they accordingly did. Upon his arrival, he demanded hostages, their arms, and the slaves who had deserted to their camp. Upon their complying with these terms, they were admitted to a surrendry. The Helvetii, Tulingi, and Latobrigi, he ordered to return to their own countries, and rebuild the towns and villages they had burnt : And because, having lost all the corn, they were utterly destitute of subsistence, he gave it in charge to the Allobroges to supply them. Cæsar's design, in sending the Helvetii home, was, that their lands might not be left unoccupied, and the Germans, dwelling on the other side the Rhine, be thereby tempted to pass over and take possession of them ; by which they would become neighbours to the Allobroges, and the Roman province in Gaul. The Boii, at the request of the Ædui themselves, who esteemed them highly on account of their courage, were permitted to settle in the Æduan territories, where lands were assigned them, and they were, by degrees, admitted to all the rights and privileges of natives.

The war with the Helvetii being ended, Ambassadors from all parts of Gaul, men of principal consideration in their several states, waited upon Cæsar to congratulate his success, which they said, had been highly advantageous to Gaul in general, the Helvetii having left their own country with a view to make all the other states tributary to them ; and these Ambassadors requested, on the part of their constituents, “ that they “ might have his permission to hold, on a day prefixed, a general assembly “ of all the provinces of Gaul ; there being some things, which they “ wanted to propose to him, which concerned the whole nation in common.” Their request was granted ; they fixed a day for the assembly ; and they bound themselves by an oath not to disclose what should be transacted there, but to such persons as should be named for that purpose by general consent.

Upon the rising of the council, the same chiefs of the state, who had come before to Cæsar, came again to him, and begged to be admitted to confer with him in private, concerning matters that regarded their own and the common safety. Cæsar complying, they all threw themselves at his feet, and with tears represented to him, that it was of no less importance to them to have their present deliberations kept secret, than to succeed in the petition they were going to make; because, should any discovery happen, they were in danger of being exposed to the extremest cruelties. Divitiacus, the Æduan, in the name of the rest, spoke thus:

“ Two factions divide all Gaul: At the head of one are the Ædui;
 “ of the other the Arverni. After a contention of many years between “ these for the superiority, the Arverni, in concert with the Sequani, came “ at last to a resolution of calling in the Germans: Of these fifteen thou“ sand only came over the Rhine at first; but, finding Gaul an agreeable “ and plentiful country, others soon followed, insomuch that, at present, “ there are no less than 120,000 of them here. The Ædui and their “ dependants have frequently tried their strength against them in battle,
 “ but, by successive defeats, have lost all their nobles, senate, and cavalry.
 “ Broken by these calamities, they, who formerly held the chief sway in “ Gaul, both by their own bravery and the favour and friendship of the “ Roman People, are now reduced to the necessity of sending some of the “ principal men of their state to the Sequani, to remain with them as “ hostages; and of obliging themselves by an oath, neither to demand
 “ their hostages back, nor to implore the assistance of the Roman People, “ nor to refuse a perpetual submission to the dominion and authority of the “ Sequani. I alone, of all the Ædui, refused to take the oath, or give my “ children for hostages; and on that account I fled my country, and went “ to Rome to implore the assistance of the Senate, as being the only man “ in the state who had not laid himself under the restraints of hostages and “ an oath. After all, it has fared worse with the Victorious Sequani than “ with the vanquished Ædui; because Ariovistus has seated himself in “ their territory, seized a third part of their lands, the most fertile in Gaul,
 “ and has lately ordered them to yield up another third to the Harudes,
 “ who, to the number of 24,000, came over the Rhine a few months ago, “ wanting habitations and a settlement. In a few years all the native Gauls
 “ will be driven from their territories, and the Germans be transplanted “ hither from the other side of the Rhine; our climate far excelling that of “ their country, and our different ways of living not admitting a compari“ son.—Ariovistus is a man of a savage, passionate, and tyrannical disposi“ tion, whose government is no longer to be borne; and unless we find some “ resource in you and the People of Rome, the Gauls must, like the Helve- “ tians, abandon their country, and seek some other settlement remote from “ the Germans, wherever fortune shall point it out. Were these complaints
 “ and representations to come to the knowledge of Ariovistus, I doubt “ not but he would exercise the greatest cruelties upon all the hostages in “ his hands: But it will be easy for you, by your own authority, the dread
 “ of

“ of the army you command, the fame of your late victory, and the terror “ of the Roman name, to hinder any more Germans from coming over the “ Rhine, and to defend Gaul from the insults of Ariovistus.”

When Divitiacus had made an end of speaking, all who were present began, with many tears, to implore Cæsar's aid. He observed, that the Sequani alone did nothing of all this; but pensive, and with downcast looks, kept their eyes fixed on the ground. Wondering what might be the cause, he questioned them upon it. Still they made him no answer, but continued silent, as before, with the same air of dejection. When he had interrogated them several times, without being able to obtain one word in return, Divitiacus, the Æduan, resumed the discourse, and observed, “ that the “ condition of the Sequani was by much more deplorable and wretched “ than that of the rest of the Gauls; as they alone durst not, even in se“ cret, complain of their wrongs, or apply any where for redress, and no “ less dreaded the cruelty of Ariovistus when absent, than if actually pre“ sent before their eyes: That the other states had it still in their power “ to escape by flight; but the Sequani, who had received him into their “ territories, and put him in possession of all their towns, were exposed to “ suffer every kind of torment.”

Cæsar encouraged the Gauls, and promised to have regard to their complaints; he told them he was in great hopes that, out of regard to him, and to the authority of the Roman People, Ariovistus would put an end to his oppressions. Having returned this answer, he dismissed the assembly.

Many urgent reasons occurred upon this occasion to Cæsar, why he should consider seriously of the grievances which the Gauls had complained of, and undertake their redress. He saw the Ædui, friends and allies of the People of Rome, held in subjection and servitude by the Germans, and compelled to give hostages to Ariovistus and the Sequani; which, in the present flourishing state of the Roman affairs, seemed highly dishonourable both to himself and the Commonwealth. He saw it likewise of dangerous consequence to suffer the Germans to accustom themselves to come over the Rhine in great multitudes and settle in Gaul: For this fierce and savage people, having once possessed themselves of the whole country, were but too likely, after the example of the Cimbri and Teutoni, to break into the Roman province, and thence advance even into Italy.

These considerations induced Cæsar to send Ambassadors to Ariovistus with the proposal of an interview, and to desire that he would appoint a place for it, in order to their conferring upon certain public affairs of the highest importance to them both. Ariovistus answered, “ That, if he had “ wanted any thing of Cæsar, he would have gone to him in person; and “ that Cæsar, if he had any business with him, must come to him: That “ he could neither venture, without any army, into those provinces of “ Gaul where Cæsar commanded, nor bring an army into the field without “ great

“ great trouble and expence. That he wondered extremely what business “ either Cæsar or the People of Rome could have in that part of Gaul
“ which he had conquered.”

On the report of this answer, Cæsar sent another embassy, with commission to speak thus to the King: “ Since you have so little sense of the “ great obligations you lie under to the Roman People and to Cæsar, in “ whose Consulship you were stiled King and friend by the Senate, as to “ refuse a conference with him, and decline treating of affairs that regard “ the common interest, he sends you the particulars of what he requires of “ you: First, not to bring any more Germans over the Rhine into Gaul. In “ the next place, to restore the hostages you have received from the Ædui,
“ and permit the Sequani likewise to restore the hostages given to them.
“ Lastly, to forbear all injuries towards the Ædui, and neither make war “ upon them nor upon their allies. If you comply with these conditions, it “ will establish a perpetual amity between you and the Roman People:
“ But, if you do not comply, Cæsar will think himself bound to have re“ gard to the just complaints of the Ædui, and the other allies of Rome
“ in this country; the Senate having decreed, in the Consulship of M.
“ Messala and M. Piso [Y. of R. 692.] that whoever should have in charge
“ the province of Gaul, should, so far as was consistent with the interest of “ the Republic, protect and defend them.”

To this Ariovistus sent the following reply: “ That, by the laws of war, “ the conqueror had a right to impose what terms he pleased upon the “ conquered: That the People of Rome did not govern the vanquished by “ the prescriptions of other nations, but according to their own pleasure:
“ That he did not intermeddle with their conquests, nor interrupt them in “ the free enjoyment of their rights; nor ought they to concern them“ selves with what regarded him: That the Ædui, having tried the for“ tune of war, had been overcome and rendered tributary to him, and that “ Cæsar would be highly unjust if he attempted to deprive him of his re“ venues, or to diminish them. That he was resolved not to part with the “ hostages which the Ædui had put into his hands; but would, neverthe“ less, engage, not to make war either upon him, or upon their allies, “ provided they observed the treaty he had made with them, and readily “ paid the tribute agreed upon: If otherwise, they would find the title of “ friends and allies of the People of Rome of little advantage to them: That “ as to Cæsar’s menace of not neglecting the complaints of the Ædui, he “ would have him to know, that none had ever entered into a war with “ Ariovistus but to their own destruction.”

At the same time that Cæsar received this reply, Ambassadors arrived from the Ædui and Treviri; from the Ædui, to complain that the Harudes, who had lately come [from Germany] into Gaul, were plundering their territories, so that even by their submissions and hostages they could not obtain peace of Ariovistus; from the Treviri, to inform him
that

• Begin-ion.

that a hundred cantons of the Suevi, headed by two brothers, were arrived upon the banks of the Rhine, with design to come over that river. Cæsar, deeply affected with this intelligence, determined to begin the war without delay: And fearing lest this new band of Suevi should strengthen the forces of Ariccistus, he advanced expeditiously towards the King, and the third day was informed, that he approached with all his forces to seize *Vesontio, the capital of the Sequani. Cæsar judged it by all means necessary to prevent him in this design, as the town was well fortified by nature, and stored with all sorts of ammunition. Marching, therefore, day and night, without intermission, he possessed himself of the place, and put a garrison into it.

While he continued here a few days, to settle the affair of his convoys and supplies, a sudden terror seized his whole army. It was occasioned by the curiosity of his men, and the reports of the Gauls, who talked much of the prodigious stature of the Germans, their invincible courage, and wonderful skill in arms. The terror first began among certain young officers of the Roman army, who had voluntarily and gaily followed Cæsar into Gaul, and were but little acquainted with military affairs. Some of these, under various pretences, desired leave to return home; and others, though, out of shame, they seemed willing to continue in the camp, were not able to put on a chearful countenance, or to refrain from lamenting, with their companions, the dangers to which they fancied themselves exposed. Wills were made all over the camp, and the consternation began to seize even the veteran soldiers, the Centurions, and the officers of the cavalry: Only, to avoid the reproach of cowardice, they said, “it was not the enemy they feared, but the narrow passes and forests that lay between them and Ariccistus, and the difficulty they should find in getting provisions.” Some even intimated to Cæsar, that when he gave orders for marching, he would not be obeyed.

Cæsar hereupon called a council of war, and, having summoned thither all the Centurions of the army, spoke to them to the following effect: —“Ariccistus, during my Consulship, earnestly sought the alliance of the Roman People, why then should any one imagine he will so rashly and hastily depart from his engagements? On the contrary, so soon as he comes to know my demands, and the reasonable conditions I am about to propose to him, he will, I am firmly persuaded, be very far from rejecting either my friendship or that of the Roman People. But if, urged on by madness and rage, he should resolve upon war, what, after all, have you to be afraid of? Why should you distrust either your own courage or my conduct? You are to deal with enemies of whom, in the memory of our fathers, trial has been already made. By our victory over the Teutoni and Cimbri, the army itself acquired no less glory than Caius Marius, the General who commanded it.—They are the very same Germans with whom the Helvetii, though not a match “ for

“ for our army, have so often fought, and whom they have so often “ vanquished. The defeat which the Gauls suffered, was rather by the “ conduct and craft of the Germans, than by their superior bravery. But “ though the King, by a stratagem, might baffle a rude and undisciplined “ soldiery, he cannot hope to prevail by such means against a Roman army.
 “ As to those who shelter their cowardice under the pretence of narrow “ passes, and the difficulty of procuring provisions, it argues, I think, no “ small presumption to betray such a distrust of their General’s conduct, “ or to prescribe to him what he ought to do. These things fall properly “ under my care: The Sequani, *Luci, and Lingones, are to furnish me
 “ with provisions: The corn is now ripe in the fields: As to the ways, “ you yourselves will soon be judges of them.

* People
 of the land, about Toul.

“ I am not in the least disturbed by what is whispered about, that the “ army will not obey me; for no General was ever so slighted by his soldiers,
 “ when neither ill success, nor rapacious covetousness, nor other crimes,
 “ had drawn that misfortune upon him: In all these respects I imagine “ myself secure, as the whole course of my life bears witness to my inte“ grity; and my good fortune has shewn itself in the war against the “ Helvetii. I am therefore resolved to execute, without delay, what I had “ intended to put off a little longer. I shall give orders for decamping this “ very night, three hours before day, that I may know as soon as possible, “ whether honour and a sense of duty, or an ignominious cowardice, have “ the ascendant in my army: Nay, should all the rest of the troops abandon “ me, I will nevertheless march with the Tenth Legion alone, of whose fidelity “ and courage I had not the least doubt, and who shall serve me for my “ Prætorian guard.” [Caesar had always favoured and chiefly confided in this legion, remarkable for its intrepid bravery.]

This discourse made a wonderful change in the minds of all, and produced an uncommon alacrity, and eagerness for the war. The tenth legion, in particular, returned him thanks, by their Tribunes, for the favourable opinion he had expressed of them; and assured him of their readiness to follow him. Nor were the other legions less industrious, by their Tribunes and principal Centurions, to reconcile themselves to their General, protesting that they had never entertained either doubt or fear, nor had ever imagined that it belonged to them, but to him alone, to direct in matters of war. Cæsar, having accepted of their submission, and being informed by Divitiacus (in whom of all the Gauls he most confided) that, by taking a circuit of about forty miles, he might avoid the narrow passes, and lead his army through an open country, he set forward three hours after midnight, as he had said; and, after a march of seven days, understood by his scouts, that he was within four and twenty thousand paces of Ario- vistus’s camp.

The King, informed of Cæsar’s arrival, sent Ambassadors to acquaint him, that, as they were come nearer to each other, he was willing to have an interview with him, which he believed might now be without danger. Cæsar did not decline the proposal, imagining that the German, now offering of his own accord what he had before refused, when requested, might perhaps be disposed to hearken to reason. The fifth day after was appointed for the interview; and, in the interval, frequent deputations passed and repassed from one side to the other, to regulate the circumstances and conditions of it. Ariovistus, under pretence that he feared an ambush, demanded that Cæsar should bring no infantry with him: Both he and the King were to be attended by their cavalry only. To this Cæsar consented; yet, not caring to trust his safety to the Gauls, he dismounted all the Gallic cavalry, and gave their horses to the men of the tenth legion, that, in case of danger, he might have a guard on which he could rely.

In the midst of a large plain, there was a rising ground equally distant from both camps: At this place, by appointment, the conference was to be held. Cæsar stationed the legionary soldiers, whom he had converted into troopers, two hundred paces from the mount. Ariovistus did the same with the German cavalry. The two Commanders advanced to meet one another, each accompanied by ten friends, or principal officers; for so Ariovistus had desired it might be. The conference was on horseback. Cæsar began by reminding the King of his obligations to the Republic. "You have been stiled friend and ally by the Senate, and very considerable presents have been sent you: These honours, conferred by the Romans on very few, and only for signal services to the State, have been bestowed on you, not on account of any just claim you had to them, but merely by my favour and the bounty of the Senate." He mentioned likewise the ancient alliance which had subsisted between the Romans and Ædui, in whose favour the Senate had made many honourable decrees. He added: "The Ædui always held the first rank and authority in Gaul, even before their alliance with Rome; and it is the inviolable maxim of the Roman People, not only to defend their friends and allies in the possession of their just rights, but likewise to study the increase of their honour, interest, and dignity: Therefore it can never be supposed that they will submit to see their friends stripped of those privileges, which had belonged to them before the commencement of that friendship." And he concluded with repeating the same demands which he had before made by his Ambassadors; That the King should not make war upon the Ædui or their allies; that he should restore to them their hostages; and that, if he could not oblige the Germans to repass the Rhine, at least he should suffer no more of them to come into Gaul.

Ariovistus answered: "I crossed the Rhine, not of my own motion, but by invitation and intreaty from the Gauls. The great hopes and expectations they gave me were my only inducement to quit my country: The settlements I have in Gaul were assigned to me by the Gauls themselves;

“ themselves ; the hostages were voluntarily sent ; and the tribute I receive “ is in consequence of the rights of war : I did not make war upon the “ Gauls, they made war upon me : Their several states brought their “ united forces against me ; but I found means to vanquish and disperse “ them : One battle sufficed : If they are again resolved to try the fortune
 “ of war, I am prepared to receive them ; but, if they chuse peace, it “ will be unjust in them to refuse a tribute which they have hitherto vo“ luntarily paid. The friendship of the Roman People ought not to be a “ detriment to me, but an honour and a security ; I courted it in no other “ view : But if, on account of my alliance with them, I must submit to “ lose my tributes, and my rights over the people I have subdued, I am “ no less willing to give up that alliance than I was ambitious to obtain it.
 “ I have indeed brought over a multitude of Germans into Gaul, yet not “ with any design of disturbing the country, as appears by my not coming “ but at the request of the natives. My arrival in Gaul was prior to that “ of the Romans, whose armies have never till now passed the boundaries “ of their own provinces. What can they mean by coming into a coun“ try that belongs to me ? why do they concern themselves with a part “ of Gaul that is no less my property than the province itself is theirs ?
 “ As to the pretence of alliance between the Romans and Ædui, I am not “ so much a barbarian, or so wholly a stranger to the affairs of the world,
 “ as not to know, that the Ædui neither assisted the Romans in their late “ war against the Allobroges, nor received any assistance from them in their “ many conflicts with me and the Sequani. I have reason to be jealous of “ your pretended regard for the Ædui, and have but too much reason to “ suspect, that the continuance of the Roman army in Gaul can be with “ no other design than that of oppressing me. If you do not therefore “ withdraw your troops out of these parts, I shall no longer look upon “ you as a friend, but as an enemy. And I am well assured, that, should “ I happen to kill you in battle, I should do a pleasure to many of the “ nobles and great men at Rome, who have explained themselves to me
 “ by couriers, and whose favour and friendship I might procure by your “ death : But if you will retire, and leave me in the undisturbed possession
 “ of Gaul, I will not only amply reward you, but will engage, at my own “ cost and hazard, to put a happy conclusion to any war you shall think “ fit to undertake.”

In answer to this discourse, Cæsar offered many reasons why he could not depart from his first demands : “ That neither his own honour, “ nor that of the Roman People, would suffer him to abandon allies, who “ had deserved so well of the Republic. That it no way appeared to him, “ that Ariovistus had a juster claim to Gaul than the Romans : That “ the Arverni and Ruteni † had been subdued by Q. Fabius Maximus ; † La Rou“ who yet, contented with their submission, had neither reduced their ergue, “ country into a province, nor subjected it to a tribute : That if antiquity

“ of title was to decide the question, the Romans had an undoubted right “ to the sovereignty of Gaul: Or, if the decree of the Senate was to take “ place, Gaul must remain free, and subject only to its own laws.

Whilst these things passed at the interview, Cæsar was informed that Ariovistus's cavalry were drawing nearer the eminence, and had even cast some darts at his horsemen. Hereupon he immediately broke off the conference, retreated to his own men, and strictly charged them to forbear all acts of hostility. He did not fear the success of an engagement between his chosen legion and the German cavalry; but he was desirous to maintain a conduct perfectly clear, and not give the enemy the least ground to assert, that they had been treacherously drawn into an ambush by a pretended conference. When it was known in the camp that Ariovistus, at the interview, had haughtily ordered the Romans to depart out of Gaul; that his cavalry had insulted Cæsar's guard; and that this had put an end to the conference; it spread throughout the whole army an ardent desire of coming to a battle.

Two day after, Ariovistus sent Ambassadors to Cæsar, to propose a renewal of the negociation; and that he would either appoint a day for their meeting again, or depute some one to bring the treaty to a conclusion. Cæsar saw no reason for granting a second interview, especially when he considered that the Germans, as experience had taught him, could not be restrained from falling upon his men. Neither was he inclined to send any of his principal officers; it seemed too great a venture, to expose them to the perfidy of these barbarians. He therefore cast his eyes upon *C. Valerius Procilius, a young man of eminent virtue and gentle manners, and whose knowledge of the Gallic language, which Ariovistus, by long residence in the country had learnt to speak readily, fitted him in a particular manner for this embassy: And as the Germans could have no motive to insult him, Cæsar thought him safe from that danger. With him was joined, in the same commission, M. Mettius, a person who had a connexion with Ariovistus by the ties of hospitality. Their instructions were, to hear the King's proposals, and bring a report of them to Cæsar. But no sooner were they arrived in Ariovistus's camp, than, in presence of the whole army, calling out to know their business, and whether they were come as spies, he commanded them to be put in irons, without suffering them to make any reply.

The same day he came forward with all his forces, and lodged himself under a hill, six miles from the Roman camp. The day after, he went two miles beyond it, to cut off their communication with the Ædui and Sequani, from whom they received all their provisions. Cæsar, for five days successively, drew up his men in order of battle before the camp, that, if Ariovistus had a mind, he might not be without an opportunity of coming to an engagement. The Germans kept all that time within their lines; only between the cavalry of the two armies there were daily skirmishes. The German manner of fighting was this: They had about six thousand horse, who chose a like number out of the foot, each his man, and all remarkable for strength and agility. These continually accompanied them in battle, and served as a rear-guard, to which, when hard pressed, they might retire: If the action became dangerous, these advanced to their relief: If any horseman was wounded, and fell from his horse, these gathered round to defend him: If speed was required, either for a hasty pursuit or sudden retreat, so nimble and active were they by continual exercise, that, laying hold of the manes of the horses, they could keep pace with them in running.

* He was the son of C. Valerius Caburus, who, being made free of the City by C. Valerius Flaccus, had, according to custom, taken the name of his Patron.

Cæsar, finding that Ariovistus declined a battle, turned his thoughts chiefly to provide for the freedom of his convoys. With this view he marked out a place for a camp, six hundred paces beyond that of the enemy; and thither he marched with his whole army, drawn up in three lines. The first and second line had orders to continue under arms, while the third was to employ themselves in fortifying this new camp. Ariovistus detached sixteen thousand light-armed foot, and all his horse, to hinder the work, but without effect: The intrenchments were finished, and Cæsar, leaving two legions there, with part of the auxiliaries, led back the remaining four to his other camp. The next day, drawing out all his troops from both camps, he again offered the enemy battle, which Ariovistus still declined: Cæsar retired about noon. Ariovistus then detached part of his forces to attack the lesser camp. A sharp conflict ensued, which lasted till sun-set: when Ariovistus founded a retreat. Cæsar enquiring of the prisoners, why Ariovistus declined an engagement, learnt, that it was the custom among the Germans for the women to decide by lots and divination, when it would be proper to hazard a battle: And that these had declared, that the army could not be victorious if they fought before the new moon.

Cæsar hereupon resolved to force the enemy, without delay, to a battle: At the head of all his forces, in three lines, he advanced quite up to the head of their camp. The Germans now appeared before their intrenchment: They were distributed by nations, and disposed at equal distances one from another, and the whole army encompassed with a line of carriages, to take away all hope of safety by flight. The women, mounted upon these carriages, weeping and tearing their hair, conjured the soldiers, as they moved forwards, not to suffer them to become slaves to the Romans. Cæsar began the battle in person at the head of his right wing, having observed the enemy to be weakest on that side. Their left wing was soon routed and put to flight, but their right had the advantage, and were like to overpower the Roman left wing by numbers. Young Crassus, who commanded the cavalry, observing this, made the third line advance to support them. The battle was renewed, and the enemy every where put to the rout: Nor did they cease their flight till they had reached the banks of the Rhine, about fifty miles distant from the place of combat. There only a few escaped: some by swimming, others by boats. Of the latter was Ariovistus, who, embarking in a small vessel which he found by the edge of the river, got safe to the other side. All the rest were cut to pieces by the Roman cavalry. Ariovistus had two wives; one a Sueve, whom he had brought with him from Germany, the other a Norican, King Vocion's sister, whom he had married in Gaul. Both perished in this flight. Of his two daughters, one was killed, and the other taken prisoner. Procilius, whom, bound with a triple chain, his keepers had dragged after them in their flight, fell in with Cæsar in person as he was pursuing the German cavalry. Cæsar's joy for his victory was exceedingly heightened by his good fortune in recovering, out of the hands of the enemy, his intimate and familiar friend, universally esteemed for his probity. Procilius told him, that lots had been thrice drawn in his own presence, to decide whether he should be burnt alive upon the spot, or the execution be deferred to another time; and that the lot, three times favourable, had preserved his life. Mettius was likewise recovered and brought to Cæsar.

This battle being reported beyond the Rhine, the Suevi, who were advanced as far as the banks of that river, thought it adviseable to return to their own country; but, retreating in disorder and confusion, were attacked by the Ubii, a people bordering upon the Rhine, who put many of them to the sword.

Cæsar, having thus, in one campaign, given a happy conclusion to two very considerable wars, went into winter-quarters somewhat sooner than the season of the year required. He distributed his army among the Sequani, and, leaving Labienus to command in his absence, set out for Cisalpine-Gaul, to preside in the assembly of the states.

J. C.
Comm.
lib. ii.
= The people of the Netherlands.

In the winter, whilst Cæsar was in that country, he was alarmed by frequent reports, confirmed by letters from Labienus, that all the *Belgæ had joined in a league against the Roman Republic, and ratified it by an exchange of hostages.

The causes of this confederacy were: First, their fear, lest the Romans, having subdued all the rest of Gaul, should afterwards turn their arms against them: In the next place, the persuasions and importunity of some among the Celtæ; many of whom, as they had greatly disliked the neighbourhood of the Germans in Gaul, so were they no less displeased to see a Roman army take up its winter-quarters, and grow habitual, in the country; Others from a levity and inconstancy of temper, fond of every project that tended to a revolution. Lastly, some were influenced by ambitious views; it being usual in Gaul for those who were the most powerful in their several states, and had men and money at command, to exercise over their fellow-subjects a kind of sovereignty, which they foresaw would be greatly checked by the authority and credit of the Romans in Gaul.

[Year of Rome 696 *.]

Cæsar, upon receiving these messages and reports, levied two new legions in Cisalpine Gaul, and early in the spring sent Q. Pedius, his Lieutenant, to conduct them over the Alps; and he himself, as soon as there began to be forage in the fields, went to the army. He commissioned the Senones† and other Gauls, who bordered on Belgic Gaul, to inform themselves of the motions and designs of the confederates, and send him from time to time an exact account. They all agreed in reporting, that the Belgæ were levying troops, and drawing their forces to a general rendezvous. Whereupon Cæsar, thinking he ought no longer to delay marching against them, decamped, and in fifteen days arrived on the confines of the Belgæ.

As his approach was sudden, and much earlier than had been expected, the Rbemi‡, who of all the Belgæ lay the nearest to Celtic Gaul, dispatched the two principal men of their state to represent to Cæsar: “That they put themselves and fortunes under the power and protection of the Romans, as having neither approved of the designs of the rest of the Belgæ, nor had any share in their confederacy against the People of Rome: That, on the contrary, they were ready to give hostages, execute his commands, receive him into their towns, and furnish him with corn, and other provisions for his army: That indeed the rest of the Belgæ were all in arms, and that the Germans, on this side the Rhine, had associated with them: Nay, that so universal was the infatuation, that the Rbemi had not been able to dissuade from entering into the confederacy the Suessones, a people united to them by the nearest ties of blood and friendship, both being subject to the same laws, living under the same form of government, and acknowledging one common Magistrate.”

Cæsar learnt from the Rbemi, that the Belgæ were for the most part Germans originally, who, inticed by the fertility of the country, had crossed the Rhine, driven out the ancient inhabitants of that part of Gaul, and settled themselves there.—That, as to their numbers, the Bellovaci, the most considerable of the several states, were able to muster 100,000 fighting men, and out of that number had promised to select 60,000 for the war: That next to them in dignity were the Suessones, over whom, of late years, Divitiacus, the most powerful prince of Gaul, had been King; but that their present sovereign was Galba, whose singular prudence and justice had procured him, by the consent of all the confederates, the supreme command of the war: That these had within their territories twelve fortified towns, and had promised to bring into the field 50,000

* Gn. Corn. Lentulus Spintber, and Q. Metellus Nepos, Consuls.

men ::

men: That the like number had been stipulated by the Nervii^b, esteemed the most fierce and warlike of all the Belgic nations; and that the lesser states were to furnish troops proportionably.

Cæsar, exhorting the Rbemi to continue firm in their alliance, and promising amply to reward their fidelity, ordered the whole body of their Senate to repair to his camp, and the sons of the principal nobility to be brought him as hostages; all which was accordingly performed by the day appointed. He then addressed himself to Divitiacus, the Æduan, representing, in the warmest manner, of what consequence it was to the common cause to divide the forces of the enemy, that the Romans might not be under the necessity of encountering so great a multitude at once. This division, he told him, might easily be effected, if the Ædui would march their forces into the country of the Bellovaci, and begin to plunder it and lay it waste. With these instructions he dismissed him.

Being soon after informed by his scouts and by the Rbemi, that the united forces of the Belgæ were marching towards him in a body, and that they were even advanced within a few miles, he, with all the expedition he could

The Aisne. passed his army over the Axona, which divides the Rbemi from the rest of the Belgæ, and encamped on the farther side of it; putting himself in such a situation as to secure all behind him, cover one side of his camp with a river, and render the communication with the Rbemi, and those other states whence he expected to be supplied with provisions, safe and easy.

The Belgæ, having been disappointed in an attempt upon Bibrax, a town belonging to the Rbemi, and likewise in an attempt to pass the Axona; and finding that provisions began to be scarce, and that the Romans could not be drawn to fight at a disadvantage, called a council of war. It was there judged most expedient to separate, and return every man to his own country, with a resolution, however, to assemble from all parts in defence of that state whose territories should be first invaded by the Romans: For they concluded it much safer to carry on the war at home, where they might have provisions, and every thing at command, than venture a battle within the confines of a foreign state. These reasons were at the same time backed by a still more powerful consideration: For the Bellovaci, upon advice that their territories would quickly be invaded by Divitiacus and the Ædui, could not be restrained from marching directly homewards.

^b The Nervii possessed the country between the Scheld and the Sambre. Their chief cities are thought to have been Cambrai, Valenciennes, and Tourney. The Atrebates (people of Artois) were to furnish 15,000: The Ambiani (people of Amiens) 10,000: The Morini (people of Termans and Boulogne) 25,000: The Menapii (people of Ghent, Antwerp, and the sea-coast of Brabant) 9000: The Caletes (people of Caux) 10,000: The Valocasses and Vermandui (people of Vexis and St. Quentin) the like number: The Aduatici (people of Namur) 29,000: And the Condrusi, Eburones, Cerefi, and Panani, all comprehended under the common name of Germans, 40,000.

In pursuance of the resolution above-mentioned, the Belgæ broke up their camp about the second watch of the night. All was noise and tumult: Not regarding either order in their march or the command of their officers, each man pressed to be in the foremost rank, that he might get the sooner home; insomuch that their retreat had all the appearance of a precipitate flight. Cæsar, who had immediate notice of this from his scouts, apprehending some stratagem, because he knew not yet the reason of their departure, would not stir out of his trenches in the night: But early in the morning, upon more certain intelligence of their retreat, detached his Lieutenants, Pedius and Cotta, with all the cavalry, after them. Labiænus had orders to follow with three legions. The enemy suffered a great slaughter in their flight, the Romans little or no loss. The latter, about sun-set, gave over the pursuit, and returned to the camp, in obedience to the orders they had received.

The next day, before the enemy had time to rally, or recover out of their consternation, Cæsar led his army into the territories of the Suessones, which joined to those of the Rbemi, and, after a long march, reached Noviodunum. He was in hopes of carrying the town by assault, as being destitute of a sufficient garrison: But, as the ditch was broad, and the wall very high, the defendants, though few in number, withstood all his efforts. Wherefore, having fortified his camp, he began to provide engines, and get every thing in readiness for a siege. Mean time, such of the Suessones as had escaped the late slaughter, threw themselves, during the night, into the town. But Cæsar advancing his preparations with great expedition, and approaching, under cover of his mantlets, to the very walls, where he cast up a mount, and planted his battering towers, the Gauls, astonished at the greatness of the works, as having never seen nor heard of any such before, and at the dispatch wherewith they were carried on, sent deputies to treat about a surrendry; and the Rbemi interceded for them.

Cæsar, having received the principal men of the Suessones as hostages (amongst whom were two sons of Galba the King) and obliged them to deliver up all their arms, admitted them to a surrendry, and led his army against the Bellovaci. These, retiring with their effects into *Bratupantium, their capital city, and, understanding that Cæsar was advanced within five miles of it, sent a deputation of their old men, who came forth in venerable procession to meet him, signifying by outstretched hands, and the most submissive terms, that they put themselves under his power and protection, and did not pretend to appear in arms against the People of Rome: And when he approached nearer the city, and encamped within view of the walls, the women and children from the ramparts, with extended arms, according to the custom of their country, besought the Romans for peace. Hereupon Divitiacus, who, after the retreat of the Belgæ, had dismissed the Æbui, and returned to Cæsar's camp, interposed Noyon.

* Beauvais.

posed in behalf of the Bellovaci, pleading : “ That they had always lived “ in strict friendship with the Ædui, and, by the artful insinuations of “ their chiefs, had been seduced to forsake their ancient allies, and take “ up arms against the Romans, whom they had represented as holding the “ Ædui under an ignominious tyranny and oppression : That the authors
 “ of that advice seeing its pernicious effects, were retired into Britain.”
Cæsar, out of regard to Divitiacus and the Ædui, promised pardon and protection to the Bellovaci ; but as these were possessed of very extensive territories, and surpassed in power, and number of forces, all the other Belgic states, he demanded six hundred hostages.

These being accordingly delivered, together with all their arms, Cæsar left their city and advanced into the country of the Ambiani *, who, upon his approach, immediately submitted. Adjoining to these were the Ner-
 * People of Amiens.
 † People of Cambresis.
vii † ; of whose manners and genius Cæsar, enquiring, learnt : “ That they “ suffered no resort of merchants into their city, nor the importation of “ wine, or of any thing tending to luxury, which, they thought, enfeebled
 “ the mind, and extinguished its martial fire : That they were men of a “ warlike spirit, and were continually reproaching the rest of the Belge
 “ for ignominiously submitting to the Roman yoke ; and had openly decla“ red their resolution of neither sending Ambassadors to Cæsar, nor accept“ ing any terms of peace.”

Cæsar, after a march of three days through their territories, understood from some prisoners : “ That he was now advanced within ten miles of the “ Sambre, on the other side of which the enemy had posted themselves, “ and there waited the coming of the Romans : That they had been joined “ by the Atrebatæ ‡ and Vermandui §, neighbouring nations, whom they “ had persuaded to take part in the fortune of the war : That they ex“ pected also to be reinforced by the Aduaticæ, who were already on their “ march : And that all their women, and such as, on account of age, were “ unfit to bear arms, had been conveyed to a place of safety, inaccessible
 “ by reason of the marshes that surrounded it.” The two armies posted themselves on two hills, opposite to each other, the Sambre running between, which was not, in that part, above three feet in depth.
 The battle which ensued was bravely and resolutely fought on both sides, and with great variety of fortune : Each army possessed itself of the enemy's camp : The Roman cavalry were once broken and put to flight : The twelfth and the seventh legions reduced to the utmost distress : Nor was there any body of reserve from which they could expect succour. In this extremity, Cæsar, snatching a buckler from one of the soldiers, and, pressing to the front of the battle, called upon the Centurions by name, and encouraged the rest. His arrival inspired the legionaries with new hope ; and, every one being ambitious of distinguishing himself in the presence of his General, they redoubled their efforts, and checked the progress of the enemy. In the mean-time, two new-raised legions, that had been

‡ People of Atrebatæ.
 § People of Vermandois, a part of Picardy.

been placed in the rear of the Roman army, and been appointed to follow and guard the baggage, hearing of the battle, advanced with all possible speed : And Labienus, who had made himself master of the enemy's camp, observing from the hill on which that stood, how matters went with Cæsar, detached the tenth legion to his assistance.

The arrival of this detachment produced so great a change in favour of the Romans, that many of the soldiers, who, before lay oppressed with wounds, now resuming courage, renewed the fight : Nay, the very servants of the camp, unarmed as they were, observing the consternation of the enemy, rushed among their armed battalions. The cavalry too, striving by extraordinary efforts, to wipe off the ignominy of their late flight, charged the enemy in all places where the void spaces between the legions suffered them to advance. Mean time, the Nervii, now very hard pressed, exerted themselves with such determined courage, that, their front ranks being cut off, those who stood behind mounted the bodies of the slain, and thence continued the fight : And when these too, by their fall, had raised a mount of carcases, those who remained, ascending the pile, poured their javelins upon the Romans as from a rampart, and even returned the darts thrown at them by their enemies. Fame therefore (says Cæsar) did not deceive in proclaiming so loudly the bravery of this people.

In a battle, maintained with such obstinacy, the loss of the vanquished must necessarily be prodigious : The very name and nation of the Nervii were in a manner quite extinguished : The old men, who, with the women and children (as above related) had been conveyed into a place surrounded with bogs and morasses, upon the report of this terrible overthrow, resolved, with the consent of all that survived the late destruction, to send a deputation to Cæsar, and surrender themselves. These deputies, in reciting the calamities of their country, represented, that of six hundred Senators there remained only three ; and that from sixty thousand fighting men their soldiers were reduced to five hundred. Cæsar readily took them under his protection, allowing them free and full possession of their towns and territories, and strictly commanding all the neighbouring nations to abstain from doing them any injury.

The Aduatici, of whom mention has been made above, being upon their march with all their forces to join the Nervii, and hearing of their total defeat, immediately returned home, and then abandoning all their other towns and castles, conveyed themselves and their riches into a place which nature had strongly fortified : For it was on every side surrounded with high rocks and precipices, having only one avenue of about two hundred feet broad, that led to the town by a gentle rising. Here they raised a double wall of prodigious height, whereon, as a farther security, they laid great numbers of huge stones and strong-pointed beams.

This people were descended from the Helvetii, who, in their march towards the Alps and Italy, left their heavy baggage on this side the Rhine, with a detachment of six thousand men to guard it. These, after the final overthrow of their countrymen, being for many years in wars with the neighbouring States, sometimes acting on the offensive, sometimes on the defensive, at length, with the consent of all the bordering nations, obtained peace, and settled themselves in the place.

On the first arrival of the Roman army before the town, the inhabitants made frequent sallies from it, and engaged the besiegers in slight skirmishes. But Cæsar having drawn a line of contravallation twelve feet high, fifteen miles in circumference, and every where well fortified with redoubts, they kept themselves within their walls. When the Romans had finished their approaches, and cast up a mount, and were preparing a tower of assault behind their works, the besieged from their battlements at first derided them, and in contemptuous language asked the meaning of that prodigious engine raised at such a distance! With what hands or strength, men of the size and make of the Romans (whose small stature the Gauls, who were for the most part very tall, despised) could hope to bring forward so unwieldy a machine against their walls? But when they saw it removed, and approaching near the town, astonished at the new and strange appearance, they sent Ambassadors to Cæsar to sue for peace. These, being introduced, told him, "That they doubted not but the Romans were assisted in their wars by the Gods themselves; it seeming a more than human task to transport, with such facility, an engine of that amazing height, by which they were brought upon a level with their enemies, and enabled to engage them in close fight. That they therefore put themselves and their fortunes into his hands, requesting only, that if his clemency, of which they had heard much, should determine him to spare them, he would not deprive them of their arms: That the neighbouring nations were almost all their enemies, against whom they could not defend themselves if their arms were taken away; and that they would chuse to undergo any fortune from the hands of the Romans, rather than expose themselves to be cruelly slaughtered by those, over whom they had been wont to exercise dominion."

To this Cæsar answered, "That, to conform himself to his usual conduct on such occasions, and not for any merit of theirs, he was willing to grant them peace, provided they submitted before the battering-ram touched the walls; but that no surrendry would be accepted, unless they delivered up their arms: That he would take the same care of them as he had before done of the Nervii, and lay his express commands upon the neighbouring nations to abstain from all injuries towards a people who had put themselves under the protection of the Romans." The Ambassadors returning with this answer, their countrymen accepted, in appearance, the conditions offered them; and threw so vast a quantity of arms into the ditch before the town, that the heap almost reached to the top of the wall. Nevertheless, as was afterwards known, they retained about a third part, and concealed them within the town. The gates being thrown open, there was peace for the remaining part of that day.

In

In the evening, Cæsar ordered the gates to be shut, and his soldiers to quit the town, that no injury might be offered to the inhabitants during the night. The Aduatici, imagining that the Romans, after the surrendry of the place, would either set no guard at all, or, at most, keep watch with little care, armed themselves partly with those weapons they had secretly retained, and partly with targets, made of bark or wicker, and covered over hastily with hides, and made a furious sally about midnight with all their forces, on that side where the Roman works seemed to be of easiest access. The alarm being immediately given by lighting fires, as Cæsar had directed, the soldiers ran from the neighbouring forts to the place of action. A very sharp conflict ensued: For the enemy now driven to despair, and having no hope but in their valour, fought with all possible resolution; though the Romans had the advantage of the ground, and poured their javelins upon them both from the towers and the top of the rampart. About four thousand were slain upon the spot; the rest retired into the town. Next day the gates were forced, no one offering to make the least resistance, and the army having taken possession of the place, the inhabitants, to the number of fifty-three thousand, were sold for slaves.

About the same time Publius Crassus, whom Cæsar had sent with a legion against the Veneti *, and six other neighbouring states †, inhabiting the sea-coast, dispatched messengers to acquaint him, that all those states had submitted to the dominion of the Romans.

* The people of Vannes.

The campaign being ended, and all the provinces of Gaul subdued, such was the opinion conceived of this war among the Barbarians round about, that even the nations beyond the Rhine sent Ambassadors to Cæsar, offering to give hostages, and submit to his commands: But he, being then in haste to return to Italy and Illyricum, ordered them to attend him next spring. Having put his army into winter-quarters, in the territories of the Andes, Turones, and Carnutes, which states lay nearest to the provinces that had been the seat of the war, he himself set out for Italy.

The people of Anjou, Touraine, and Chartrain.

The Senate, informed by letter from Cæsar of his successes, decreed a thanksgiving of fifteen days, a number never granted before to any General †.

Cæsar, upon his departure for Italy, sent Sergius Galba, with the twelfth legion, against the Nantuates †, Veragri, and Seduni, whose territories extended from the confines of the Allobroges, the lake Lemanus, and the river Rhone, to the top of the Alps. His design, in this expedition, was to open a free passage over those mountains for the Roman merchants,

J. C. Comm. lib. iii.

* The Ucelli, Osismii, Carisolytæ, Sesuvii, Aulerci, and Rhedones. The exact situation of these is unknown.

† Pompey was the first General to whose honour so many as ten days had been decreed. Vid. supra, p. 271.

* The Nantuates are said to have been the ancient inhabitants of that part of Switzerland now called Lechthal. The chief town of the Veragri, was Aganthy, now St. Maurice. The capital of the Seduni was Sion, in Switzerland.

who had hitherto travelled them with great danger, and subject to many grievous exactions. Galba executed his commission, made himself master of several forts, received Ambassadors from the nations all around, and, having settled the terms of peace with them, received hostages for their fidelity. Having quartered two cohorts among the Nantuates, he himself, with the rest of the troops, took up his winter-quarters in a town of the Veragri, called Oedurus. It was situated in the midst of a valley, upon a plain of no great extent, and bounded on all sides with very high mountains.

As the city was divided into two parts by a river, he left one to the Gauls, and assigned the other to his soldiers, commanding them to fortify it with a ditch and rampart. After many days spent here, he was suddenly informed, that the Gauls had abandoned, in the night, that part of the city which had been allotted to them; and that the impending mountains were covered with the Viragri and Seduni. Upon this intelligence, Galba, who had neither completed the fortifications of his camp, nor laid in a sufficient store of corn and other provisions, as little apprehending an insurrection of this kind among the people who had submitted and given hostages, speedily assembled a council of war: The danger was imminent and unexpected; there was no room to hope for succours, or for supplies of provision, the enemy being in possession of all the avenues to the camp. Some of the council, thinking the case desperate, declared for abandoning the baggage, and attempting by a sally to recover their old quarters: But the greater number were for reserving this expedient to the last extremity, and in the mean time defending the camp in the best manner they could. It was not long before the enemy came rushing down upon them from all parts, and began the assault with a shower of stones and darts. When the battle had lasted upwards of six hours without intermission, the Romans not only found their strength greatly exhausted, but even began to be in want of weapons wherewith to annoy the enemy. The Gauls, on the other hand, urged the combat with greater fury than ever; and, meeting with but a faint resistance, fell to demolishing the rampart, and filling up the ditch. All was giving way before them, when P. Sextius Baculus, a Centurion of the first rank, and highest reputation for courage, who had received many wounds in the battle against the Nervii; as likewise Volsenus, a man equally distinguished for his conduct and his bravery, came to Galba, and represented to him that the only expedient now left was to make a sudden sally, and put all upon the issue of one bold attack. Accordingly Galba, calling the Centurions together, directed them immediately to signify to the soldiers, that they should for some time keep only upon the defensive, and when they had a little recovered their strength, and furnished themselves with the weapons thrown at them by the enemy, upon a signal given, to sally out of the camp, and place all their hopes of safety in their valour. The orders were punctually obeyed: The Romans, rushing

rushing furiously upon the enemy, gave them no time either to comprehend the meaning of so unexpected an attack, or to recover out of the confusion into which it threw them : And thus fortune changed sides. Of thirty thousand fighting men, who had been engaged in the assault, more than 10,000 perished upon the spot : The rest fled in terror and confusion. Galba, seeing the enemy entirely dispersed, quitted the pursuit and retired within his intrenchments. The next day, unwilling to expose himself a second time to the inconstancy of fortune, and being in great want of corn and forage, set fire to the town, and began his march back into the province. As there was no enemy in the field to molest or oppose him in his retreat, he brought the legion safe into the country of the Nantuates, and thence into the territories of the Allobroges, where he put them into winter-quarters.

The insurrection being thus entirely quelled, Cæsar, who believed that tranquillity was now re-established in Gaul (the Belgæ being subdued, the Germans expelled, and the inhabitants of the Alps compelled to submit) made a journey, in the beginning of the winter, into Illyricum ; when all on a sudden a new war broke out in Celtic Gaul. The occasion of it was this : The seventh legion, commanded by young Crassus, had been quartered among the Andes, a people bordering upon the ocean. As there was a great scarcity of corn in those parts, Crassus sent some officers of the cavalry to solicit a supply from the neighbouring states. Of these states the Veneti were by far the most powerful, not only on account of their abundant shipping, wherewith they drove a mighty traffic to Britain, but because most of the nations that trade on those seas were tributaries to them. They began to revolt by detaining the officers sent to them by Crassus, hoping, by this means, to recover the hostages put into his hands. The neighbouring states, moved by their example and authority, (as the Gauls are in general very sudden and forward in their resolves) detained, for the same reason, the officers sent to them, and speedily dispatching embassies from one to another, entered into a strict confederacy for supporting the common cause ; earnestly soliciting, at the same time, the inland provinces to rise in defence of that liberty they had received from their ancestors, and not tamely submit to the ignominious yoke of the Romans. All the states upon the sea-coast coming readily into his alliance, they jointly sent Ambassadors to Crassus to acquaint him, that he must first restore to them their hostages, if he expected to have his officers restored to him.

Cæsar, receiving intelligence of these things from Crassus, and being then at a great distance from Gaul, sent orders for building a great number of galleys upon their Loire, and for drawing together, from the province, mariners, rowers, and pilots. These orders were executed with good dispatch ; and he himself, as soon as the season of the year permitted, went to the army.

[Year

[Year of Rome 697^c.]

The Veneti and their allies, not ignorant of the greatness of their crime, in detaining and loading with irons, Ambassadors, a name ever looked upon, among all nations, as sacred and inviolable, made preparations in proportion to the danger that threatened them. The natural situation of their country gave them confident hopes of being able to defend themselves: For the passes by land were every where cut asunder by many friths and arms of the sea; and the approach by sea was not less difficult on account of the small number of harbours, the little knowledge the Romans, accustomed only to the navigation of the Mediterranean, had of the art of governing ships on the ocean, and their total ignorance of the coast. Neither did the Veneti believe it practicable for the Roman army to continue long in that country, by reason of the great scarcity of corn; and they had a mighty confidence in the strength and number of their shipping.

Cæsar, to restrain those of the Gauls who had not yet declared themselves, and to hinder the confederates^a from uniting their forces into one army, divided his troops, and dispersed them into different parts of Gaul. He sent Labienus towards Treves with a body of cavalry. P. Crassus, at the head of twelve legionary cohorts, passed the Garonne, and entered into Aquitain, to prevent the enemies receiving any supplies from that quarter. Another of his Lieutenants, Titurius Sabinus, with three legions, found employment for the people who inhabited the coasts of Basse-Bretagne, and of Normandy, as far as Lisieux. To D. Brutus was given the command of the fleet, and Cæsar himself conducted the land forces.

Most of the enemies towns were built upon promontories, and points of land, whose feet were washed by the sea at high water, and left dry at ebb. So that neither his land forces nor his ships could stay long before them.

Cæsar, duly considering this, perceived plainly, that he should never be able to reduce the Veneti but by a naval battle. He resolved therefore to wait for his fleet. His fleet arrived; and the enemy did not delay to come out of their ports to fight. Full of confidence in their naval strength and skill, they, with 220 tall vessels, fell furiously upon the Romans. The construction of their ships, which were much higher than the Roman galleys, gave the Gauls a considerable advantage in throwing their darts; and the Romans suffered much at first from this circumstance. But Cæsar had fortunately provided a great number of sharp crooked kythes, like those that were used in sieges. With these, fixed to the end

^a Cæ. Corn. Lentulus Marcellinus, and L. Marcianus Philippus, Consuls.

^b Cæsar tells us, that the Veneti brought into their alliance the Osismi, Latavii, Nan- netes, Andriani, Morini, Diabliques, and Mannapii; and dispatched Ambassadors into Britain, which lies over-against their coast, to solicit assistance from thence.

of long poles, the Romans, laying hold of the tackle of the enemy's vessels, towed them away by force of rowing; then, cutting the cables, the main-yards fell down, whereby the enemy, who relied on their sails and rigging, were at once deprived of the use of them: And now, the dispute depending wholly on courage and manhood, the Roman soldiers, who fought under the eye of their General, and of a vast number of witnesses (for all the hills that looked upon the sea were covered with spectators) easily obtained the victory.

The Veneti, observing that the Romans had already boarded and made themselves masters of a great part of their fleet, began to think of providing for the safety of the rest by flight. Accordingly they tacked about to run before the wind: But all on a sudden there ensued so dead a calm, that not a vessel could stir out of its place; and then the Romans took them with great ease. After a conflict that had lasted from nine in the morning, a very few escaped under favour of the night.

This victory put an end to the war with the Veneti; for they had lost the whole body of their youth, as well as the most eminent men among them for rank or authority, and all their naval strength. Those who survived this defeat, having no resource left, surrendered themselves to Cæsar's mercy; who thought it necessary to proceed against them with severity, that he might impress upon the minds of the Gauls for the future a proper regard to the sacred character of Ambassadors. He condemned therefore all their Senators to death, and sold the people for slaves.

The arms of Cæsar prospered on every side. At the same time that he vanquished the Veneti, Titurius Sabinus obtained a great victory over the united forces of the Unelli, Eburones, and Lexovii†. The two last mentioned nations were so furiously bent upon the war, that they massacred their Senate for opposing it. After this cruel execution, they joined their troops to those of the Unelli, whose conductor Viridovix was recognized for Generalissimo of the army of the three nations. Under his command they advanced against the Romans, and, approaching near their camp, defied them to battle. Sabinus pretended fear, kept close within his intrenchments, and, by means of a pretended deserter, deceived the enemy into a belief that he was the next night to steal privately out of his camp, in order to go to the succour of his General, much distressed by the Veneti. By this stratagem he drew the Gauls to attack him in his camp, which was upon an eminence. Mounting it with precipitation, they arrived quite out of breath. Sabinus instantly caused all his troops to sally out upon them by two gates at once. The assailants, not able to support the very first shock, took to flight; the Roman cavalry pursued them, and almost finished the destruction of that numerous army.

† Inhabitants of Coutance, Evreux, and Lisieux.

Much about the same time, P. Crassus arrived in Aquitan; Having made due provision of corn, raised some cavalry, assembled his auxiliary troops, and strengthened his army with a select body of volunteers from

• Inhabiting the country
about Aire.

Tolouse, Carcasson, and Narbonne, states in that part of the Roman province that lies nearest to Aquitain, he advanced with all his forces to the territories of the *Sotiates. Crassus, with great slaughter, put them to the rout, and presently after invested their capital. They made a brave resistance for some time; but finding that the Romans would surmount all the difficulties that could be thrown in their way, they sent to Crassus, requesting that they might be admitted to a surrendry.

The defeat of the Sotiates, and the reduction of their city, roused the other states of Aquitain to unite themselves against the conqueror: And they procured assistance from the Spaniards their neighbours. Crassus attacked them in their camp, and of fifty thousand men, of which their strength consisted, scarce a fourth part escaped being cut in pieces. The fruit of this victory was the submission of all Aquitain.

[This was the last service performed by P. Crassus in the war of Gaul; for, with Cæsar's permission, he went soon after to Rome, and the next year into Asia, taking with him a thousand Gallic horse, to assist his father in his expedition against the Parthians.]

When Cæsar had finished the war against the Veneti, the season was far advanced: Nevertheless, as the *Morini*¹ and Menapii, who were situated in the northern part of Gaul, and who, though they had entered into the league which was just dissolved, had taken no step yet to shew their submission, to the Romans, Cæsar, who thought nothing done, while there remained any thing to do², marched against them in order to finish his conquest. At his approach they retired, with all their effects, into the woods and morasses, with which their country abounded, hoping to find there a safe shelter. But Cæsar resolved to lay low those immense forests; and with the trees which he cut down he made a kind of rampart to cover the flanks of his army against any sudden incursions of the Barbarians. He had made a considerable progress in this work, when, the bad weather coming on, and the continual rains requiring that he should find some shelter for his army, necessity compelled him to leave his conquest incomplete. Having ravaged the country and burnt the villages, he retired, and distributed his troops into winter-quarters in the territories of the Auleri-Eburovices, Lexovii, and the other newly subdued states³.

[Year of Rome 698.]

1 C. Cæsar.
lib. 17.

THE next year [when Pompey and Crassus were Consuls] a great body of the Usipetes and Tenctheri, German nations, passed the Rhine, not far from its mouth. The hostilities of their neighbours the Suevi, who had for many years harraised them with continual wars, and hindered ¹ The Morini probably inhabited the sea-coast from the Somme to the Scheld: The Menapii, both banks of some part of the lower Rhine.

² Nil actum credens, dum quid superesset agendum. Lucan. ii. 657.

³ For what passed at Rome this year, 697, in relation to Cæsar, see above, p. 484, 485, and 487.

them

them from cultivating their lands, were the cause of their making this emigration.

The Suevi, by far the most warlike and considerable of all the Germans, were divided into a hundred cantons, each of which used to send yearly into the field a thousand armed men. The rest, who continued in their several districts, employed themselves in cultivating the lands. These husbandmen became the next year soldiers, and were succeeded in the care of the lands by the troops that had served the year before. Thus they lived in the continual exercise of agriculture and war alternately. In the distribution of the lands, no such thing was allowed among them as property or private possession, their residence in any place being confined to one year. They had little trade, having nothing to sell but spoils taken in war. They suffered no wine to be imported into their territories, as thinking that it both enervated the mind, and unfitted the body for exercise and labour.

Having tried the strength of their neighbours, the Ubii, in many wars, they found them too numerous and potent to be dispossessed of their territories; yet they prevailed so far as to impose a tribute upon them, and very much reduce their power.

But the Uspetes and Tenchtheri, before mentioned, after many years resistance, were at length totally driven out of their possessions by the Suevi. Having wandered over many regions of Germany during the space of three years, they arrived at last upon the banks of the Rhine, where the Menapii had houses, lands, and villages, on both sides the river. These, alarmed at the approach of so prodigious a multitude (for they were not an army, but two nations, who marched in a body, men, women, and children, to the number of above 430,000) they abandoned all their habitations on the right bank of the Rhine, and, retiring to the left side, disposed their troops in a proper manner, to hinder the passage of their invaders. The Germans tried every expedient; and finding they could neither force a passage, because of their want of shipping, nor steal over privately, by reason of the strict watch kept by the Menapii, had recourse to stratagem. They gave out, that they would, without delay, go back to their own country; and, to gain credit to this report, they, in fact, thitherward made a three-days march. The Menapii were deceived. Such of them as had dwelt on the farther bank of the Rhine returned to their habitations, secure and fearless of danger. Surprized by the German cavalry, who in one night recovered the whole ground of the three days march, they were all put to the sword: And the Germans, having seized the shipping before the Menapii on this side had intelligence of their approach, passed the river, took possession of towns and villages, and supported themselves the rest of the winter with the provisions there found.

Cæsar, informed of these things, and dreading the levity of the Gauls, who were very changeable in their councils, and fond of novelties, made

The people
about Liege and Namur.
† People
of Treves.

all the haste he could to join his army. Upon his arrival he found that things were fallen out exactly as he had apprehended: Some of the states of Gaul had sent Ambassadors to the Germans, inviting them to leave the banks of the Rhine, and assuring them that all their demands should be readily complied with. The Germans, allured by these hopes, had already penetrated into the territories of the Eburones and Condrusi, both which nations were under the protection of the Treviri †. Cæsar assembled the chiefs of the Gauls, dissimulated his knowledge of their secret designs, and by soft words endeavoured to confirm them in their alliance with the people of Rome: He then demanded of them a certain number of horse, and prepared to march against the Germans.

When he came within a few days march of their camp, Ambassadors arrived from them, who addressed him in words to the following effect: "The Germans have no design of beginning a war with the People of Rome; they are come into these parts against their inclination, having been forcibly driven from their former dwellings. If the Romans are disposed to accept of their friendship, they will rest satisfied with the quiet possession of those lands they have already conquered, or with such as the Romans shall think proper to assign them: In bravery they yield to the Suevi alone, for whom the immortal Gods themselves are not an equal match."

Cæsar made such reply as best suited his present views: But the conclusion of his speech was of the following purport: "That he could enter into no treaty of friendship with them, so long as they continued in Gaul: That men unable to defend their own territories were not likely to make conquests in other countries: That there were no uncultivated lands in Gaul, sufficient for so great a multitude, without invading the properties of others: But that, if they pleased, they might incorporate themselves with the Ubi, whose Ambassadors were then in his camp to complain of the injuries done them by the Suevi, and request his aid against their encroachments: And this he promised to obtain for them from the Ubi."

The Ambassadors replied, "That they would report to their countrymen what he had said, and in three days return with an answer, requesting that in the mean time he would not advance with his army."

But this Cæsar refused, as knowing that, a few days before, they had sent a great body of cavalry over the Meuse, to forage and plunder in the territories of the Ambivari †. He thence concluded, that they asked for delay, because they waited the return of that party. Cæsar therefore still advanced. When within twelve miles of the enemy, he was met by the Ambassadors on the day appointed: They were very earnest in their request that he would advance no farther; but not being able to prevail, intreated him, that he would restrain the cavalry of his advanced guard from doing any act of hostility: And in the mean time permit them to send Ambassadors to the Ubi; from whose Senate and Magistrates if they could obtain

† Probably the people of Breda and Boile-duc.

obtain, under the sanction of a solemn oath, the conditions proposed by Cæsar, they declared themselves ready to accept them: Only they desired, that he would allow them the space of three days to bring matters to a final issue. Cæsar believed that they had no other view in what they said, than to gain time till their cavalry should arrive: He told them, nevertheless, that, for the sake of water, he would that day advance four miles, and no farther; but desired that their chiefs would attend him the day after to acquaint him with their demands. In the mean time he sent orders to the officers of his cavalry not to attack the enemy: and, in case they should be attacked themselves, only to maintain their ground till he should come up with the rest of the army.

But the Germans, though their cavalry did not exceed eight hundred, by reason of the absence of those who had been sent to forage, yet, seeing the Roman horse advance without caution, fell suddenly upon them. These amounted to five thousand, but having no apprehension of an attack, because they knew that the German Ambassadors had been with Cæsar a little before, and had obtained a day's truce, were easily thrown into disorder and put to flight. The Romans lost seventy-four men". And

NOW

Tom. III.
p. 506.

" " This battle," says M. Crevier, " is of " very great importance, on account of the " circumstance of its being fought at a time
" when there was a negotiation actually on " foot between Cæsar and the Germans. By " whom the hostility was begun, and conse" quently upon whom the reproach of perfidy
" ought to fall, is a problem, that labours
" under some difficulty. Cæsar threw the " fault upon the Barbarians: But several per" sons at Rome were persuaded, that it was he
" who had violated the faith of the negotia" tion: And when the Senate were decreeing
" him honours for his exploits in this cam" paign, Cato gave it as his opinion, that
" Cæsar should be delivered up to the Germans;
" to the end that he alone might suffer the " punishment of his breach of faith, and the " Commonwealth not be answerable for it to " Gods or men.

" It is difficult to decide upon a point so " obscure, and concerning which the interest of " Cæsar, on one hand, lessens the weight of " his evidence; and hatred and partiality, on " the other, may have carried Cato beyond
" due bounds. It is known that Cæsar was " not scrupulous in morals" [for he was too
" much addicted to gallantry] " but his pro" ceedings were frank and generous, at least
" outwardly so; and how little care soever

" he took to have truth and justice really on " his side, he always affected to have the ap" pearances of them. Is must, nevertheless,
" be allowed, that appearances are not for him
" here. It is not probable, that eight hundred
" horsemen should think of attacking five thou- " sand." Surely it is less probable, that eight " hundred horse should beat five thousand, un" less the latter were " surprised and unpre" pared (as Cæsar says they were) because " trusting to the truce granted at the enemy's " request." M. Crevier proceeds: " And " what seems to prove the good faith of the " Germans is, that, the day after the battle,
" they sent their deputies again to Cæsar, to " make apologies, and to continue the nego" tiation." If they were perfidious in attack" ing the Roman cavalry, it is no wonder that
" Cæsar shewed no regard to their apology, but " considered them as no less perfidious in their " new deputation. But, with relation to the notable " advice said to have been given by Cato to the " Senate, what evidence is there of the fact, that " Cato did deliver that opinion? Is it sufficiently " warranted? Who is the historian, that records
" it? Plutarch, the only writer we have who " mentions the matter, gives us Tanufius Gemi-
" nus for his authority. And who was this Ta-
" nufius or Tanufius? (He is cited by Suetonius
" for several tales of the flanderous kind, that " carry

now Cæsar resolved neither to give audience to the Ambassadors of the Germans, nor admit them to terms of peace, seeing they had treacherously solicited for a truce, and afterwards broke it themselves. He likewise considered that it would be downright madness to delay coming to an action, till the German army should be augmented by their cavalry, then absent; and, besides, he was perfectly well acquainted with the levity of the Gauls, among whom the successful attack made by the Germans had given them a considerable reputation. A very lucky accident fell out to bring about Cæsar's purpose: For the very next morning the Germans, persisting in their treachery and dissimulation, came in great numbers to his camp; all their nobility making part of the embassy. Their pretended design in coming was to vindicate themselves in regard to what had happened the day before; but their real motive was to obtain, if possible, another insidious truce. Cæsar, overjoyed to have them thus in his power, caused them to be secured; and immediately drew his forces out of the camp. The cavalry, whom he supposed terrified by the late disaster, were commanded to follow in the rear.

Having drawn up his army in three lines, and made a very expeditious march of eight miles, he appeared before the enemies camp. Their consternation was not a little increased by the unexpectedness of his appearance, and the absence of their own officers; they had hardly time to take counsel, or to arm: Their camp was presently forced: The women and children betook themselves to flight on all sides. Cæsar sent the cavalry in pursuit of them: The Germans, hearing a noise behind them, and seeing their wives and children put to the sword, threw down their arms, and fled out of the camp. Being arrived at the conflux of the Rhine and Meuse, and finding it impossible to continue their flight any farther, they threw themselves into the river; where, through fear, weariness, or the force of the current, they almost all perished. And thus the Romans, without the loss of a man, put an end to this formidable war. Cæsar offered those of the Germans whom he had detained in his camp liberty to depart: But they, dreading the resentment of the Gauls, whose lands they had ravaged, chose rather to continue with him, and they obtained his consent.

Cæsar had various reasons for resolving to lead his army over the Rhine. But what chiefly swayed him was, that, seeing the Germans were so easily induced to transport their forces into Gaul, he thought it might be of no small service to let them see that the Romans wanted neither resolution nor ability to transport an army into Germany. Add to this,

De Hist. carry no face of probability.) Possius, con-
Lat. lib. i. taining him, writes thus: Et Seneca verbis
cap. xii. liquet, fuisse annales Tamesi, quales illi Volusi;
qui eodem vixit tempore. De eo fit Catullus:
Annales Volusi cacata charta.

Add to this, the great unlikelihood that Cæsar, envious and malicious as he was, even almost to madness, whenever Cæsar's name was in question, should yet expose his weakness to so great a degree, as, in the Consulship of Crassus and Pompey, to give an advice concerning Cæsar, which at any time must appear senseless and impracticable.

that

that the cavalry of the Usipetes and Tenctheri, who, having passed the Meuse (as was above related) to forage and plunder, and escaped thereby the disaster of the late defeat, had, upon receiving the news of it, repassed the Rhine, and retired into the territories of the Sicambri†; and Cæsar, having demanded that these troops should be delivered up to him, had received for answer, “ That the Rhine was the boundary of the Roman “ empire: That if he thought it unjustifiable in the Germans to pass over “ into Gaul without his leave, upon what pretence could he claim any “ power or authority on the German side of that river?”

† From whom the Franks were descended.

But Cæsar had a third reason: For the Ubii, who alone, of all the nations beyond the Rhine, had sent Ambassadors to him, entered into alliance with him, and given him hostages, earnestly entreated him to come to their assistance, they being very hard pressed by the Suevi. They said, that his shewing himself in Germany would be alone sufficient to secure repose to them for the future; and they offered him boats to transport his legions.

Cæsar thought that it was neither safe, nor for the dignity of the Roman name, to make use of boats for crossing the Rhine. To build a bridge would be difficult, on account of the breadth, depth, and rapidity of the river: Nevertheless he undertook it; and the work was completed in ten days, reckoning from the time they began to bring the timber to the bank of the river. Cæsar led over his army; and leaving a strong guard on each side the stream, marched directly into the territories of the Sicambri; who, so soon as they heard that the bridge was begun, had, by advice of the Usipetes and Tenctheri, withdrawn, with their effects, into the neighbouring woods and deserts. Cæsar made but a short stay in their country, burnt their villages, cut down their corn, and marched into the territories of the Ubii. The Suevi, in pursuance of an order of their national council, acted as the Sicambri, only with this difference, that all such as were able to bear arms met, by command, at a place of general rendezvous, in the very heart of their country, there to wait the arrival of the Romans, and give them battle. But Cæsar, having accomplished all he intended, in carrying his arms over the Rhine, which was to spread an universal terror among the Germans, take vengeance of the Sicambri, and set the Ubii at liberty, after a stay of only eighteen days in Germany, led back his army into Gaul, and broke down the bridge.

Cæsar builds a bridge over the Rhine.

Though but a small part of the summer now remained, Cæsar resolved to pass over into Britain, having certain intelligence that, in all his wars, with the Gauls, they had constantly received assistance from thence. He foresaw that the season of the year would not permit him to finish the enterprize; yet he thought it would be of no small advantage, should he only take a view of the island, learn the temper and manners of the inhabitants, and acquaint himself with the coast, harbours, and landing-places, to all which the Gauls were perfect strangers. The merchants who traded thither, and of whom he enquired, could neither tell him what was the extent of the island, nor what was the strength of the nations that inhabited it, nor their skill in war, nor what harbours they had, fit to receive large ships. For which reason, before he embarked, he thought proper to send C. Volusenus with a galley, to get some knowledge of these things; commanding him to return with all expedition, when he had informed himself as fully as opportunity would allow. Cæsar himself marched with his whole army into the territories of the Morini; because thence was the nearest passage into Britain. Here he ordered a great many ships from the neighbouring ports to attend him, and the fleet which he had made use of the year before in his war with the Veneti.

Cæsar prepares to pass into Britain.

Mean while the Britons, having notice of his design by the merchants that resorted to their island, Ambassadors from many of their states came to him, with an offer of hostages, and submission to the authority of the People of Rome. To these Ambassadors he gave a favourable audience, and, exhorting them to continue in the same mind, sent them back into their own country. With them he dispatched Comius, whom he had constituted King of the Atrebates, a man, in whose virtue, wisdom, and fidelity, he greatly confided, and whose authority in the island was very considerable. To him he gave it in charge to visit as many states as he could, and persuade them to enter into an alliance with the Romans; letting them know, at the same time, that Cæsar designed, as soon as possible, to come over in person into their island.

Volusenus, having taken a view of the country, so far as it was possible for a man who was resolved not to quit his ship, or trust himself in the hands of the Barbarians, returned on the fifth day, and acquainted Cæsar with his discoveries.

While Cæsar continued in the country of the Morini, for the sake of getting ready his fleet; deputies arrived from almost all their cantons, to excuse their late war with the People of Rome, and to promise an entire submission for the future. This fell out very opportunely; because a war with these people would have obliged him to postpone his expedition into Britain. He therefore ordered them to send him a great number of hostages; and, on their compliance, received them into his friendship. Having got together about eighty transports, he thought these would be sufficient for carrying over two legions. His galleys he distributed to his Quæstor, Lieutenants, and chief officers of the navy. Eighteen vessels, which he had appointed to transport his cavalry, were detained by contrary winds at a port about eight miles off. The rest of the army, under the command of Titurius Sabinus and L. Aurunculeius Cotta, were sent against the Menapii, and those cantons of the Morini, which had not submitted. P. Sulpicius Rufus had the charge of the harbour where he embarked, with a strong garrison to maintain it.

Things

Things being in this manner settled, and the wind springing up fair, Cæsar weighed anchor about midnight, ordering the cavalry to embark at the other port, and follow him. About nine in the morning he himself, with a part of the fleet, reached the coast of Britain, where he saw all the cliffs covered with the enemies forces. From those cliffs it was easy for them to pour down their javelins upon the Romans. Not thinking this, therefore, a convenient landing-place, he cast anchor at three in the afternoon, purposing to wait the arrival of the rest of his fleet. Mean while, having called the Lieutenants and military Tribunes together, he informed them of what he had learnt from Volusenus; instructed them in the part they were to act; and particularly exhorted them to do every thing with readiness and upon a signal given, agreeably to the rules of military discipline; expedition and dispatch being more especially requisite in sea-affairs, because of all the most liable to sudden changes. Having dismissed them, and finding both the wind and weather favourable, he made the signal for weighing anchor, and, after sailing about eight miles farther, he arrived at a smooth open shore.

Cliffs of Dover.

Deal.

But the Barbarians, perceiving his design, had sent before them their cavalry, and their chariots, such as they commonly made use of in battle; and, following with the rest of their forces, endeavoured to oppose his landing. And indeed the difficulty of effecting it was great on many accounts: For the Roman ships drew so much water, that they could not come very near the shore; and it was a painful service for the soldiers, loaded with a weight of armour, and unacquainted with the place, to leap from the ships, and, wading breast-high through the waves, encounter an enemy, who, standing upon dry ground, or advancing only a little way into the water, had the free use of their arms; and, knowing perfectly the ground, could also boldly spur on their horses against the invaders. All these circumstances spread a terror among the Romans, wholly strangers to this way of fighting, they shewed not their wonted alacrity, and cheerful readiness to advance against the enemy. Cæsar, observing this, ordered some of his galleys, which drew less water than his transports, to draw nearer the shore, and endeavour, by showers of darts from the engines which they carried, to drive the enemy to some distance. This proved of considerable service to them: For the surprize occasioned by the make of the galleys, the motion of the oars, and the playing of the engines, made the Barbarians halt, and presently after begin to give back. But the Roman soldiers still demurring to leap into the sea, chiefly because of the depth of the water in those parts, the standard-bearer of the tenth legion, having first invoked the Gods for success, cried out aloud: "Follow me, fellow-soldiers, unless you will betray the Roman eagle into the hands of the enemy: For my part, I am resolved to discharge my duty to Cæsar and the Commonwealt^h." Instantly he jumped into the sea, advanced with the eagle, and was followed by all that were in the ship: which being perceived by those in the other vessels, they also did the like, and boldly approached the enemy.

Balistas.

The Britons defended themselves with resolution ; nor were the Romans able to get firm footing till Cæsar ordered some small boats to be manned with recruits, and go to the assistance of the foremost ranks ; by which means they were soon enabled to put the enemy to the rout. But, as the cavalry were not yet arrived, Cæsar could not pursue the runaways, nor advance far into the island.

The vanquished, soon after their defeat, dispatched Ambassadors to Cæsar to sue for peace, offering hostages and an intire submission to his commands. With these Ambassadors came Comius, whom Cæsar (as above related) had sent before him into Britain. The natives had seized him as soon as he landed, and, though charged with a commission from Cæsar, thrown him into irons. Upon the late defeat, they thought proper to release him and send him back ; casting the blame upon the multitude. Cæsar, after some reproaches for having begun the war against him after they had sent Ambassadors to him into Gaul to sue for peace, at length told them he would forgive their fault ; and commanded them to send a certain number of hostages. Part were delivered immediately, and the rest, as living at some distance, they promised to send in a few days. In the mean time they disbanded their troops ; and the several chiefs came to Cæsar's camp, to negotiate their own concerns and those of the states to which they belonged : A peace being thus concluded four days after Cæsar's arrival in Britain.

* P. 624. The eighteen transports appointed to carry the calvary, of whom we have spoken above *, put to sea with a gentle gale : But, when they had so near approached the coast as to be within view of the camp, so violent a storm all on a sudden arose, that, being unable to hold on their course, some were obliged to return to the port whence they set out, and others driven to the farther end of the island westward, not without great danger. There they cast anchor : But the waves rising very high, so as to fill the ships with water, they were again, in the night, obliged to stand out to sea, and make for the continent of Gaul. That very night it happened to be full moon, when the tides upon the sea-coast always rise highest, a thing, in those days, wholly unknown to the Romans. Thus, at one and the same time, the galleys, which Cæsar had caused to be drawn up on the strand, and the transports that were at anchor in the road, were raised up, tossed about, and beat to pieces by the tempestuous waves. Nor was it possible to attempt any thing for their preservation. This disaster spread a general consternation through the camp : For there were no other ships to carry back the troops, nor any materials to repair those that had been disabled by the tempest. And, as it had been all along Cæsar's design to winter in Gaul, he was wholly without corn to subsist the troops.

All

All this being known among the British chiefs, who, after the battle had repaired (as was just now said) to Cæsar's camp, they began to hold conferences among themselves. They plainly saw that the Romans were destitute of cavalry, shipping, and corn; and judged, from the smallness of their camp, that the number of their troops was but inconsiderable; in which notion they were the more confirmed, because Cæsar, having brought over the legions without baggage, had occasion to inclose but a small spot of ground. They thought therefore they had now a fair opportunity to rid themselves of the invaders, and effectually put a stop to all future attempts upon Britain. Having therefore entered into a confederacy, they gradually left the camp, and began to draw the islanders together. But Cæsar, though he was not yet apprised of their design, yet conjecturing their intention, from the disaster which had befallen his fleet, and the delays formed in relation to the hostages, made preparations accordingly. He sent reapers every day into the field and stored his camp with corn. The timber of the ships that had been most damaged he ordered to be made use of in repairing the rest, sending to Gaul for what other materials he wanted. As the soldiers were indefatigable in this service, his fleet was soon in a condition to sail, being diminished only by twelve ships. During these transactions, a cloud of dust appeared suddenly on the side where the seventh legion was supposed to be foraging. As but one field remained unreaped, the enemy suspected that the Romans would go thither to forage; and had therefore hid themselves, during the night, in the woods, there waiting till the reapers had quitted their arms, and dispersed themselves for the work in hand: Then sallying out on a sudden they began to surround them with horses and chariots. Cæsar, conjecturing how matters went, marched away with the cohorts that were upon guard, and ordered those that were in the camp to follow him as soon as possible. He had gone but a little way, when he saw his men with great difficulty sustaining the fight, being driven into a small compass, and exposed on all sides to the darts of the assailants. Upon his approach the enemy made a stand, and the Romans recovered from their fear. However, Cæsar, not thinking it a proper time for a general engagement, stood a while facing the enemy, and then led back his legions to the camp. The continual rains that followed for some days, both kept the Romans within their intrenchment, and withheld the enemy from attacking them. Mean time the Britons dispatched messengers into all parts to make known to their countrymen how favourable an opportunity they had of enriching themselves with spoil, and of securing themselves for ever from all future invasions, by forcing the camp of the Romans, whose number was very small. By this means having drawn together a great body of horse and foot, they boldly advanced towards the Roman intrenchments. Cæsar drew up his legions in order of battle before the camp, and gave the Britons so warm a reception, that they presently turned their backs and fled. He pursued them, with great slaughter, till his men were out of breath ; and then returned to his camp. The Britons, disheartened by the loss they had sustained, dispatched Ambassadors the same day to sue for peace ; which Cæsar readily granted, upon their promising to send him over into Gaul double the number of hostages he had required before. His want of horse, and the fear of exposing his fleet to another storm, if he staid till the equinox, made him hasten his departure. The same night therefore, the wind proving favourable, he weighed anchor, and arrived safe in Gaul ; whence he immediately wrote to the Senate, acquainting them with his exploits in Britain ; for which a supplication, or general thanksgiving, was decreed for twenty days *.

The Britons, it would seem, were not much awed by Cæsar's arms ; for of all the states who had promised to send him hostages, two only performed their engagements. He resolved therefore to make a new descent the following spring with a more powerful fleet and army. With this view, before he returned to Italy, where he usually passed a part of the winter, he ordered his Lieutenants to refit the old ships, and build as many new ones as they could.

When he had finished what he had to do in Cisalpine Gaul, he set out for Illyricum, upon advice that the Pirustæ, a people of that country, were making devastations in the province [that is, in those parts of Illyricum which recognized the Roman government.] When he arrived there, he ordered the several states to furnish their contingents, and appointed a place of general rendezvous. Cæsar was put to no other trouble than that of appearing in the country to compel the injurious Barbarians to give hostages, and make satisfaction for the damage they had done.

[Year of Rome 699 *.]

J. Cæf.
Comm.
l. v.

The order which Cæsar had left with his Lieutenants had been executed with such diligence during his absence, that, at his return into Gaul, he found six hundred transport ships, and twenty-eight galleys, ready to be launched in a few days. He ordered the whole fleet to rendezvous at port Itius, the island being there not above thirty miles distant from the continent : But because the Treviri seemed disposed to rebellion, having neither appeared at the general diets of Gaul, nor submitted to the orders of the Republic, and were reported to have even solicited assistance from Germany, he marched into their territories with four legions and eight hundred horse ; being desirous totally to quiet Gaul before he engaged in his enterprize against Britain. Two of the principal men of the Treviri, Indutiomarus and Cingetorix, were at this time competitors for the supreme authority. The latter, so soon as he heard of the arrival of

* See above, p. 494, and 500, for those transactions at Rome of the year 698, wherein Cæsar was interested.

* L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and App. Claudius Pulcher, Consuls.

Cæsar,

Cæsar, came to him and assured him, that he and all his party would continue firm to their duty. The other soon after submitted, finding himself deserted by some principal men of his own party. Cæsar exacted of him two hundred hostages, among whom were to be his son, and all his nearest relations, specified by name. Indutiomarus complied : Nevertheless, Cæsar, assembling all the principal men of Treves, reconciled them one after another to Cingetorix, thinking it of importance to establish thoroughly the authority of a man, of whose inviolable attachment he had received convincing proofs.

This affair being settled, Cæsar hastened with his legions to port Itius °, where he found four thousand Gallic horse, and all the prime nobility of the several states assembled. Cæsar's design was to leave behind him a few only of these nobles, on whose fidelity he could rely, and to take the rest into Britain as hostages, in order to prevent any commotions in Gaul during his absence.

Among those whom he resolved to carry away with him, was Dumnorix the Æduan ; because he knew him to be a lover of novelties, ambitious, enterprizing, and of great interest and authority among the Gauls. Dumnorix at first earnestly requested to be left behind ; sometimes pre-° Calais or Boulogne.

Midd.
p. 494.

" Cæsar was now upon his second expedition into Britain, which raised much talk and expectation at Rome, and gave Cicero no small concern for the safety of his brother, who, as one of Cæsar's Lieutenants, was to bear a considerable part in it. But the accounts which he received from the place soon eased him of his apprehensions, by informing him, that there was nothing either to fear or to hope for from the attempt ; no danger from the people, no spoils from the country. In a letter to Atticus : We are in suspense, says he, about the British war : It is certain that the access of the island is strongly fortified ; and it is known also already, that there is not a grain of silver in it, nor any thing else but slaves ; of whom you will scarce expect any, I dare say, skilled in music or letters. In another to Trebatius : I hear that there is not any gold or silver in the island : If so, you have nothing to do but to take one of their chariots and fly back to us.

Ad Quint.
i. 16.
Ad Att.
iv. 16.

Ep. Fam.
vii. 7.

" From their raileries of this kind (says Dr. Middleton) one cannot help reflecting on the surprizing fate and revolutions of kingdoms : How Rome, once the mistress of the world, the seat of arts, empire, and glory, now lies sunk in sloth, ignorance, and poverty ; en-

" slaved to the most cruel as well as to the most contemptible of tyrants, superstition and religious imposture : While this remote country, antiently the jest and contempt of the polite Romans, is become the happy seat of liberty, plenty, and letters, flourishing in all the arts and refinements of civil life ; yet running, perhaps, the same course which Rome itself had run before it ; from virtuous industry to wealth, from wealth to luxury, from luxury to an impatience of discipline and corruption of morals ; till, by a total degeneracy and loss of virtue, being grown ripe for destruction, it falls a prey at last to some hardy oppressor, and, with the loss of liberty, losing every thing else that is valuable, sinks gradually again into its original barbarism."

This reflection is undoubtedly very judicious, as far as it regards the danger to which our country, with respect to its liberties, is exposed by the corruption of its morals : But who would not imagine that, in the opinion of the Author, Ancient Rome was free from superstition and religious imposture ? Who would imagine that the author had written a book with this title : The religion of the present Romans derived from that of their Heathen Ancestors ?

tending that he was unused to the sea, and afraid of it; sometimes, that religious engagements required him to stay at home: But, finding his reasons had no weight with Cæsar, he began to cabal among the Gallic nobles, advising them not to leave the continent, and telling them that Cæsar's intention was undoubtedly to destroy them all; but that, not daring to do it in their own country, he was carrying them into Britain, where he hoped to find a favourable opportunity of executing his cruel purpose.

Cæsar, though fully informed of these practices, yet, in consideration of the Ædvi, a nation for which he had a singular regard, satisfied himself with endeavouring to traverse the designs of the malecontent; being determined, nevertheless, to continue inflexible, and to prefer the interest of the Commonwealth to every other consideration. While detained at the port about five and twenty days, during which the North-west wind, very common on that coast, hindered him from sailing, he studied to keep Dumnorix in his duty by ways of gentleness and persuasion, not neglecting, however, to watch all his motions. At length, the wind springing up fair, he ordered both horse and foot to embark, as the execution of this order universally engaged the attention of the camp, Dumnorix seized the opportunity to draw off the Ædvan cavalry; and he began his march homeward. Cæsar had early notice of it, instantly put a stop to the embarkation, and, postponing every other business, sent out a strong party of horse to pursue the Ædvan, and bring him back. Their orders were to kill him in case of disobedience or resistance. They overtook him; he refused to return, defended himself sword in hand, and implored the assistance of his followers, often crying out to them, that he was free, and the subject of a free state. The Romans, pursuant to the orders they had received, surrounded and slew him; upon which all the Ædvan cavalry returned to Cæsar.

Cæsar's
second invasion of Britain.

And now Cæsar, leaving Labienus, with three legions and two thousand horse to secure the port, provide corn, and have an eye upon the transactions of the continent, embarked on board his vessels the same number of horse, together with five legions; and, weighing anchor about sun-set, arrived with his whole fleet, the next day by noon, on the British coast, where he landed without opposition, in the same place which he had found so convenient the year before. The Britons had assembled in vast multitudes to oppose his landing, as he afterwards understood by the prisoners; but, being terrified at the sight of so numerous a fleet, which, with the vessels that private persons had provided for their own use, amounted to eight hundred and upward, had quitted the shore, and retired to the hills. Cæsar left ten cohorts and three hundred horse to secure the fleet; and with the rest marched in quest of the enemy, whom, agreeably to the intelligence he had received, he found posted on the farther side of a river*, about twelve miles from the place where he had landed. They made

* Supposed to be the Stour.

some

some efforts to hinder his passage, but were quickly driven from their post, and put to flight. However, the day being far spent, Cæsar, who was wholly unacquainted with the country, would not pursue them, but chose to employ the rest of the day in fortifying his camp.

Early the next morning he sent out, in pursuit of the enemy, his troops both horse and foot, divided into three bodies : These were but just come within sight of the British army, when they received orders from Cæsar to proceed no farther, but return to the camp. Some horsemen, dispatched by Q. Atrius, had brought him word that, by a dreadful storm in the night before, his fleet was in a manner destroyed. This made him hasten back to the sea-side. Forty of his ships, he saw, were entirely lost, and the rest so damaged as to seem almost irreparable. Nevertheless he set all the carpenters of both the fleet and the army to work, and sent over to Gaul for others, ordering, at the same time, Labienus to build as many ships as he could, by the labour of the legions that were with him. And, to prevent the like misfortune thereafter, he drew all his ships on shore, and enclosed them within the fortifications of his camp. This stupendous work was completed in ten days, the soldiers labouring the whole time without intermission. The ships being thus secured, and the camp strongly fortified, he left the same troops to guard it as before, and returned to the place where he had ceased the pursuit of the enemy.

Upon his arrival he found their numbers greatly increased, The chief command and administration of the war had, by common consent, been conferred upon Cassibelanus, King of the *Trinobantes, whose territories (says Cæsar) were divided from the maritime states by the river Thames, at eighty miles distance from the sea. This prince had hitherto been engaged in almost continual wars with his neighbours : But the terror, caused by the arrival of the Romans, making the Britons unite among themselves, they intrusted him with the whole conduct of the war.

* The people of Middlesex and Essex.

The Britons, in the beginning, gained some slight advantage over the Romans, surprized and astonished at their manner of employing their chariots in battle ; but in an attempt which they afterwards made to cut off the Roman foragers, they suffered so terrible a slaughter from the Roman cavalry whom Cæsar sent to the assistance of the foragers, that the auxiliary troops of Cassibelanus abandoned him, returning to their respective countries : Nor did the Britons any more, with their united forces, engage the Romans.

Cæsar marched towards the Thames, in order to penetrate into the kingdom of Cassibelanus. The river was fordable but in one place, and not there without much difficulty ; and the enemy were drawn up in great numbers on the other side : They had likewise fortified the bank with sharp stakes, and driven a great number of these into the bed of the river, so as to be covered by the water. Of this Cæsar had intelligence from prisoners and deserters : Nevertheless he undertook to force his passage, passage, and he succeeded. The legions advanced with so much expedition and alacrity, though up to their necks in water, that the enemy, unable to sustain the charge, betook themselves to flight.

Cassibelanus from that time determined to avoid a general action: Disbanding his other forces, he kept with him only four thousand chariots, with which he watched opportunities to cut off the Roman stragglers; or, when he had enticed the Romans, by a prospect of booty, to a disadvantageous ground, to start from his ambush, and fall upon them by surprise. These frequent alarms obliged Cæsar to order his cavalry to keep always so near the foot, as to be sure of having the support of these when necessity required.

And now several of the states round about sent ambassadors to make their submission to Cæsar. Of these the Trinobantes were the first. Their King Imanuentius had been put to death by Cassibelanus, and Mandubratius, the son of that unfortunate Prince, was now in Cæsar's army, to whom he had fled, even into Gaul, for shelter and protection. The Trinobantes desired Cæsar to send him back to govern them. They obtained their request; and, in compliance with Cæsar's demands, sent him forty hostages, and supplied him with corn.

The protection granted to the Trinobantes securing them from the insults of the soldiers, several other petty states sent Ambassadors to Cæsar, and submitted. From them he had intelligence, that he was not far from the capital^{*} of Cassibelanus, which was situated amidst woods and marshes, and whither great numbers of men and cattle were retired. Thither Cæsar marched his legions: And though the place appeared to be exceeding strong, both by art and nature, he nevertheless attacked it in two several quarters, and after a short resistance carried it; the Britons retiring to another part of the wood.

While these things passed on the North-side of the Thames, four petty Kings of Kent, by order from Cassibelanus, drew all their forces together, purposing to fall by surprise on the naval camp of the Romans: But these, sallying out against them as they approached, put them to the rout with great slaughter, took one of the four Kings prisoner, and returned safe to the camp. Cassibelanus, discouraged by so many losses, the devastation of his territories, and, above all, the revolt of the provinces, sent Ambassadors to Cæsar to sue for peace, by the mediation of Comius of Arras.

Cæsar, designing to pass the winter in Gaul, because of the frequent commotions in that country, and reflecting that but a small part of the summer remained, during which it would be easy for the Britons to protract the war, demanded hostages, and appointed the yearly tribute which

* A town among the Britons was nothing more than a thick wood, fortified with a ditch and a rampart, to serve as a place of retreat against the incursions of their enemies.

Britain should pay to the Romans. At the same time he took Mandubratius and the Trinobantes under his protection, strictly charging Cassibellanus to give them no molestation. Having received the hostages, he led his forces back to the sea-side, where he found his fleet repaired. The time of the equinox drew near: He seized therefore the opportunity of a favourable gentle breeze, weighed anchor about ten at night, and brought his whole fleet safe to the continent. He was the first of the Romans, says Tacitus, who transported an army into Britain: He terrified the natives, and became master of the coast; yet it would seem, that he only gave his countrymen a view of Britain, not the possession of it. Tac. Agric. n. 13.

Having laid up his fleet, and held a general assembly of the Gauls at *Samarobriua, his next affair was to put his legions into winter-quarters; and as the crop this year had been very thin, by reason of the great droughts, he was obliged to quarter his men in different provinces. One legion he quartered on the Morini†, under the command of C. Fabius: Another among the Nervii‡, under Q. Cicero: A third with the Ædui§, under L. Roscius: And a fourth in the country of the Rhemi, on the borders of the Treviri, under Labienus. Three were sent into Belgium||, over whom he appointed three commanders, his Quæstor M. Crassus, L. Munatius Plancus, and C. Trebonius. The eighth and last, which Cæsar had newly raised on the other side of the Po, were sent, together with five cohorts, among the Eburones†, between the Rhine and the Meuse, where Ambiorix and Cativolcus reigned. At the head of this last body were two of Cæsar's Lieutenants, Q. Titurius Sabinus and L. Aurunculeius Cotta. By this distribution of his legions, Cæsar thought he had found a remedy against the scarcity of corn; and yet they lay all within the compass of one hundred miles, except the legion under L. Roscius, for which he was in no pain, as being quartered in a very quiet and friendly country. He resolved, however, not to leave Gaul till he had received assurances that their quarters were established, fortified, and secured.

Among the Carnutes‡ lived Tasgetius, a man of distinguished birth, and whose ancestors had been possessed of the sovereignty of that state. Cæsar had restored him to the dignity of his forefathers, in consideration of the many services he had done him in all his wars. It was now the third year of his reign, when he was openly assassinated. The affair was laid before Cæsar, who, fearing lest the great number concerned in the plot might draw the state into a revolt, ordered L. Plancus, with a legion from Belgium, to march speedily into the country of the Carnutes, fix his winter-quarters in that province, seize all who had been concerned in the murder, and send them to him.

* In the text of Cæsar we read Effui [an unknown people] but Vossius thinks we should read Ædui, the Autunois.

† People of Ternois in Artois.

‡ People of Cambresis.

§ The present Picardy, a part of Belgic Gaul.

† People of Liege.

‡ People of Chartres.

Scarce fifteen days had elapsed since the arrival of the legions in their appointed quarters, when a general conspiracy of the Gauls broke out, discovering itself first in the revolt of the Eburones. Their two chiefs or Kings, Ambiorix and Cativulcus, had been to meet, in a friendly manner, on their frontiers, Sabinus and Cotta; and had supplied them with corn: But now, instigated by Indutiomarus of Treves, they excited their people to take up arms; and, having fallen by surprize on some Roman soldiers who were cutting wood, and put them to the sword, came with a great body of troops to attack the camp where the legion was entrenched. Repulsed with loss, they had recourse to cunning and perfidy, demanding a conference, and pretending that they had something to say which concerned the common interest, and might put an end to the present differences.

Accordingly Arpinus, a Roman Knight, a friend of Sabinus; and Junius of Spain, who had frequently before been sent to Ambiorix; were deputed to treat. Ambiorix, addressed them in words to this effect: “ I have in no sort forgot the many obligations I am under to Cæsar, who freed me from the tribute I was wont to pay to the Aduatici, and restored to me my son and nephew, whom that people, after receiving them as hostages, had treated as slaves. The hostilities I have just now committed were not the effect of my own private animosity against the Romans, but were the act of the whole state; where the government is of such a nature, that the people have as much power over me as I have over the people. Even the state itself in a manner has been forced into this war: I can appeal to my own weakness for the truth of what I say, being not so very unskilled in affairs, as to imagine that the Eburones are a match for the Romans. It is a scheme concerted by all the states of Gaul, to assault in one day, this very day, all the quarters of the Roman army, so that no one may be able to succour another. It was not easy for us to resist the importunity of those of our own nation, especially when the proposal was to act in concert, for the recovery of liberty. But, having performed what the common voice of my country demanded, I think I may now listen to that of gratitude: I find myself compelled by my attachment to Cæsar, and by my friendship for Sabinus, to give you notice of the extreme danger to which your legion is exposed. A great body of Germans has actually passed the Rhine, and will be here in two days at farthest: Sabinus and Cotta therefore are to consider, whether it will be advisable to retire with their troops, and, before the neighbouring states can be apprized of their design, go and join Labienus or Cicero, who are neither of them distant above fifty miles. As for myself, I promise, by all that is sacred, to secure your retreat through my territories; and I undertake this the more readily, as I shall thereby not only discharge my duty to my country, in delivering it from the inconvenience of wintering the Romans, but at the

“ the same time I shall manifest my gratitude to Cæsar.” Having made this speech, he withdrew.

Arpinus and Junius reported what they had heard to the Lieutenants, who thought the information not to be neglected, though it came from an enemy: For it appeared to them altogether incredible, that the Eburones, a weak and inconsiderable people, should, unsupported, presume to rise up in arms against the Romans: They laid the matter therefore before a council of war. Cotta, with a great number of the military Tribunes, and Centurions of the first rank, were against undertaking any thing hastily, or quitting their winter-quarters, before they had received orders from Cæsar so to do. They alledged that their camp was well fortified, and might be defended against all the forces of the Germans: That it was well stored with provisions, so as to be in no danger of distress on that account. And lastly, that nothing could be more dishonourable or injudicious, than, in affairs of the greatest moment, to take measures upon the information of an enemy.

Sabinus, on the other hand, exclaimed, that it would be too late to think of retiring, when the enemy, strengthened by the accession of the Germans, should come against them; or when the Romans in the nearest quarters to them should have received some considerable blow: That Cæsar was unquestionably gone into Italy; and that the enemy knew it, which gave the Carnutes the boldness to think of assassinating Tasgetius, and the Eburones of assaulting the Roman camp. “ Who could imagine Ambiorix, without a certainty of being supported, would have embarked in so dangerous an enterprize?” He added, “ My advice is in all respects safe; because, if no such confederacy has been formed, we have nothing to apprehend in marching to the nearest legion; if, on the contrary, all Gaul and Germany are united, expedition alone can save us from destruction: Whereas, by following the advice of Cotta, though we may defend ourselves for a while, we are sure in the end of perishing by famine.” The dispute grew warm, and continued long: Cotta and the principal officers strongly opposing the march of the troops. At last Sabinus raising his voice, that he might be heard by the soldiers without: “ Be it so then (says he) since you seem so resolved: I am not the man who is afraid of death. But if any misfortune happen, those who hear me will know whom to blame. In two days, did not you oppose it, we might easily reach the quarters next us; and there, in conjunction with our fellow-soldiers, confront the common danger: Whereas, by keeping the troops separate, and at a distance, you reduce them to the necessity of perishing by sword or famine.”

The officers, surrounding their Generals, conjured them not to put all to hazard by their dissension.—That, whatever resolution was taken, whether to go or stay, the danger was by no means great, provided they acted in concert; but their disagreement threatened the troops with inevitable destruction. The debates continued till midnight: When at length Cotta, vanquished by importunity, yielded to Sabinus. Orders were given for marching by break of day. The remainder of the night was none of it passed in sleep, each man being taken up in chusing what things to carry with him; so that their want of rest rendered them incapable of a vigorous defence, in case of being attacked upon their march. At day-break they left their camp, not like men acting by the advice of an enemy, but as if Ambiorix had been their particular friend; marching in a very extended column, and followed by a great train of baggage.

The enemy, judging, from the hurry and bustle in the camp, that the Romans intended to leave it, placed themselves in ambush in a wood, and there waited for them at about two miles distance; and, when the greater part of the army had entered a large valley, suddenly appeared, and attacked them both in front and rear.

Then Sabinus, like one conscious of having neglected all the necessary precautions, and unable to hide his concern, ran up and down among the troops, beginning to dispose them in order of battle; but with an air so timid and disconcerted, that it appeared he had no hopes of success, as happens for the most part to those who leave all to the last moment of execution. But Cotta, who had foreseen that this might happen, and had therefore opposed the departure of the troops, omitted nothing in his power for the common safety, calling to and encouraging the men like an able General, and at the same time fighting with the bravery of a common soldier: And, because the great length of the column rendered it difficult for the Lieutenants to remedy all disorders, and repair expeditiously enough to the places where their presence was necessary, orders were given to quit the defence of the baggage, and form into an orb. This disposition, though not improper in these circumstances, was nevertheless attended with very unhappy consequences; for, being considered as the effect of terror and despair, it discouraged the Romans, and augmented the confidence of the enemy. Besides, as unavoidably happens on such occasions, many of the soldiers, quitting their ensigns, hurried away to fetch from the baggage the things they most valued, and filled all parts with uproar and lamentation.

The Gauls conducted themselves with great prudence: Their officers proclaimed through the ranks: "Let no man stir from his post; the baggage of the Romans and every thing they have shall be yours: but let your first care be to secure the victory." The Romans, not being fewer in number or less brave than the enemy, cherished a hope, though they had neither a General nor fortune on their side, that yet by their bravery they should be able to surmount all difficulties; and whenever any of the cohorts sallied out, so as to come to close fighting with the enemy, a considerable slaughter of the Gauls ensued. This being observed by Ambiorix, he ordered his men to cast their darts at a distance, avoid a close fight, retire before the Romans when they advanced, and pursue them when returning

returning to their standards. These orders were exactly followed, much to the advantage of the enemy. The Romans however still maintained their ground; and, though the fight had continued from sun-rise till two in the afternoon, they had done nothing, in all that time, unworthy of the Roman name. At length Balventius, who the year before had been made first Centurion of a legion, a man of distinguished courage, and great authority among the troops, had both his thighs pierced through with a dart. Lucanius, an officer of the same rank, endeavouring to rescue his son, whom he saw surrounded by the enemy, was killed after a brave resistance: And Cotta, the Lieutenant, encouraging the several cohorts and companies, received a blow on the mouth from a sling.

These disasters totally dispirited Sabinus; who, perceiving Ambiorix at a distance animating his troops, sent his interpreter, Cn. Pompey, to beg quarter for his soldiers and for himself. Ambiorix answered: "That if Sabinus desired a conference, he was ready to grant it, and to pledge his faith, that no hurt should befall his person; and that, as to the Roman soldiers, he hoped to prevail with the multitude to spare them too." This answer Sabinus communicated to Cotta, proposing to him that they should go and confer with Ambiorix, from whom he hoped to obtain quarter both for themselves and their men. Cotta absolutely refused to go to an armed enemy, and persisted in that resolution. Sabinus, attended by such of the officers as were then about him, set forward; and when he drew near to Ambiorix, being commanded to lay down his arms, obeyed; ordering those that were with him to do the same: After which, being gradually surrounded, while Ambiorix purposely spun out a long discourse, he was perfidiously murdered. Then the Gauls, according to their custom, raising a shout and crying out victory, charged the Roman troops with great fury, and put them into disorder. Cotta, fighting manfully, was slain, with the greatest part of the soldiers. The rest retreated to the camp they had quitted in the morning; of these, Petrofidius, the standard-bearer, finding himself sore pressed by the enemy, threw the eagle within the intrenchments, and was killed fighting bravely before them. Those that remained, with much difficulty, sustained the attack till night; but, having no hope of preservation, killed one another to the last man. A few, who had escaped out of the battle in the field, got by different ways to Labienus's camp, and brought him the news of this sad event.

Ambiorix, elated with his victory, marched immediately, at the head of his cavalry, into the country of the Aduatici, which bordered upon his territories. Having informed them of his success, and roused them to arms, he the next day arrived among the Nervii, and urged them not to lose the favourable opportunity of freeing themselves for ever from the yoke of slavery, and revenging the injuries they had received from the Romans. He added: "Two of their Lieutenants have been slain, and " a great

“ a great part of their army cut to pieces : It will be an easy matter, by “ a sudden attack, to destroy the legion quartered in your country, under “ the command of Cicero ; and I myself am ready to assist you in the en“ terprize.” By this speech he drew in the Nervii. They dispatched messengers forthwith to the cantons dependent on their state, and, having assembled what forces they could, came unexpectedly upon Cicero’s quarters, who had heard nothing yet of the fate of Sabinus. Here it unavoidably fell out, that, by the sudden arrival of the cavalry, the Roman soldiers who had been sent out to cut wood for firing, and for the fortification of the camp, were intercepted and put to the sword ; after which the Eburo- nes, Aduatici, and Nervii, with their allies and tributaries, amounting to a formidable army, came and attacked the camp. The Romans instantly flew to arms, mounted the rampart, and sustained that day’s assault, though with difficulty ; for the enemy placed all their hopes in dispatch, and firmly believed, that, if they came off conquerors upon this occasion, they could not fail of victory every where else.

Cicero’s first care was to write to Cæsar, promising the messengers great rewards if they carried the letters safe : But, as all the ways were beset with the enemies troops, most of his couriers were intercepted. Of the materials which had been brought for fortifying the camp, 120 towers were built with incredible dispatch during the night, and the works about the rampart completed. Next day the enemy, much stronger than before, attacked the camp and filled up the ditch, but were again repulsed by the Romans. This continued for several days together. The night was wholly employed in repairing the breaches made by day ; insomuch that neither the sick nor the wounded were exempted from labour. Cicero himself, though much out of order, would take no repose even during the night, unless when the soldiers constrained him to it.

In the mean time some officers of the Nervii, who were well acquainted with Cicero, desired a conference with him : To this he having given consent, they addressed him in the same strain that Ambiorix had used to Sabinus : They said that all Gaul was in arms : That the Germans had passed the Rhine : That Cæsar and the rest of the Romans were besieged in their winter-quarters. They told him likewise of the fate of Sabinus, and, to gain credit, produced Ambiorix, adding : “ It is in vain for you to “ expect relief from those who are in the utmost distress : We mean not, “ however, any injury to you or to the Romans ; but only to prevent their “ wintering in this country, and bringing that practice into a custom :
 “ You are at liberty therefore to leave your quarters, and may retire, in “ safety and without molestation, whithersoever you please.” To this Cicero made a short answer : “ It is not usual with the people of Rome to ac“ cept conditions from an army enemy : But, if you will lay down your “ arms, I promise to be your mediator, and will permit you to send Ambassa“ dors to Cæsar, from whose justice you may reasonably expect redress.”

The Nervii, not succeeding by this stratagem, surrounded the camp with a line, the rampart of which was eleven feet high, and the ditch fifteen deep. They had learnt something of this in their former wars with Cæsar, and they got further instructions from their prisoners: But, being unprovided of the tools necessary in this kind of service, they were obliged to cut the turf with their swords, dig up the earth with their hands, and carry it in their cloaks. And hence it will be easy to form some judgment of their number: For in less than three hours they completed a line of fifteen miles in circuit. The following days were employed in raising towers proportioned to the height of the Roman rampart; and in preparing scythes and wooden galleries, in which they were again assisted by the prisoners.

On the seventh day of the attack, a very high wind arising, they began to throw red-hot balls of clay, and burning javelins, upon the barracks of the Romans, which, after the manner of the Gauls, were thatched with straw. These soon took fire; and the flames were in a moment spread by the wind into all parts of the camp. The enemy falling on with a mighty shout, as if already secure of victory, advanced their towers and galleries, and prepared to scale the rampart. But such was the constancy of the Roman soldiers, that though the flames surrounded them on every side, and they were oppressed with showers of darts, and saw their huts, their baggage, and their whole fortunes in a blaze, yet not only did they continue firm in their posts, but scarce a man offered so much as to look behind him; so intent were they on fighting and repelling the enemy. This was by much the hardest day for the Roman troops; but had nevertheless this fortunate issue, that the greatest number of the enemy were on that day wounded or slain: For, as they had crowded close up to the ramparts, those behind prevented the front ranks from retiring. The flames abating by degrees, and the enemy having brought forward one of their towers even to the foot of the rampart, the Centurions^{*} of the third cohort drew

^{*} In this legion were two Centurions of distinguished valour, T. Pulpio and L. Varenus, who stood fair for being raised to the first rank of their order. These were perpetually disputing with one another the pre-eminence in courage, and at every year's promotion contended with great eagerness for precedence. In the heat of the attack before the rampart, Pulpio said to Varenus: "What hinders you now, or what more glorious opportunity would you desire of signaling your bravery? This, this is the day for determining the controversy between us."—Instantly he sallied out of the camp, and rushed amidst the thickest of the Gauls. Nor did Varenus decline the challenge; but, thinking his honour at stake, followed at some distance. Pulpio darted his javelin at a Gaul in the enemy's van, and transfixing him: He fell dead; the multitude covered him with their shields, and all poured their darts upon Pulpio, giving him no time to retire. A javelin pierced his shield, and stuck fast in his belt. This accident gave the enemy time to surround him, before he could make use of his right hand to draw his sword. Varenus flew to his assistance, and endeavoured to rescue him. Immediately the whole multitude, quitting Pulpio, as fancying the dart had dispatched him, turned upon Varenus. He met them with his sword drawn, charged them hand to hand; and having laid one dead at his feet, drove back the rest: But pursuing drew off their men a little, beckoning to the Gauls, and challenging them to enter: But, as not a man of them would run the hazard, the Romans attacked them on all sides with stones, drove them from the tower, and set it on fire.

As the defence every day became more difficult, chiefly by the great multitude of killed and wounded, which considerably lessened the number of defendants, Cicero sent letter after letter to inform Cæsar of his danger. Many of these couriers, falling into the enemies hands, were tortured to death within view of the Roman soldiers. There was at this time in the Roman camp a Nervian of distinction, by name Vertico, who in the beginning of the siege had fled to Cicero, and given ample proofs of his fidelity. This man engaged one of his slaves, by the hope of liberty and a promise of great rewards, to carry a letter to Cæsar. The slave passed through the camp of the Gauls unsuspected, as being himself of their nation, and arrived safe at Cæsar's quarters.

Cæsar, receiving the letter about five in the afternoon, immediately dispatched a messenger to Marcus Crassus, who was quartered among the Bellovaci twenty-five miles off, ordering him to draw out his legion at midnight, and march with all possible expedition to join him. Crassus came away with the courier. Cæsar sent likewise to C. Fabius, who wintered with the Morini, to lead his legion into the country of the Atrebates, which was in the way to Cicero: And he wrote to Labienus to meet him upon the frontiers of the Nervii, if it could be done with safety. He himself, in the mean time, assembled about four hundred horse from the nearest garrisons, resolving not to wait for those parts of his army which lay at too great a distance.

At nine in the morning he had notice from his scouts of the arrival of Crassus. That day he marched twenty miles, leaving Crassus with a legion at *Samarobriva, where he had deposited the baggage, hostages, public papers, and all the provisions which had been laid up for the winter. Fabius, in consequence of his instructions, having made all the haste he could, met him with his legion. Labienus, who had been informed of the death of Sabinus, and the destruction of the troops under his command, and who saw all the forces of Treves advancing against him, fearing, lest, if he should quit his quarters, the enemy might construe it into a flight, and that it would be impossible for him to sustain their attack, especially as they were flushed with their late success against Sabinus, wrote to Cæsar, informing him of that disaster, and the danger that would attend the quitting his camp; and that all the forces of the Treviri, both horse and foot, were encamped within three miles of him.

puruing them with too much eagerness, stepped into a hole, and fell down. Pulso hastened to his relief; and both together, after having slain a multitude of the Gauls, and acquired infinite applause, retired unhurt within the intrenchments. This fortune gave such a turn to the dispute, that each owed his life to his rival; nor was it possible to determine which of them had the better title to the prize of valour.

Cæsar

Cæsar approved his reasons, though he thereby found himself reduced from three to two legions: And well knowing that all depended upon expedition, he made forced marches, reached the territories of the Nervii, and there learnt from some prisoners the state of the siege, and the danger the legion was in. Immediately he engaged a Gallic horseman, by the promise of great rewards, to carry a letter to Cicero: It was written in Greek characters, that, if it fell into the enemies hands, it might not be intelligible to them. The messenger had orders, in case he found it impracticable for him to get into the Roman camp, to tie the letter to a javelin, and throw it in. In this letter Cæsar sent word to Cicero, that he was already on the march to relieve him, and would be up very soon: exhorting him to defend himself in the mean time with his wonted bravery. The Gaul, fearing to be discovered and intercepted, threw the letter in the camp as he had been ordered: But the javelin, accidentally sticking in a tower, remained there two days unperceived: On the third a soldier saw it, took it down, and brought it to Cicero; who immediately read it in full assembly, and thereby diffused universal joy through the camp. Presently after, they perceived the smoke of the villages fired by Cæsar in his march, which put the arrival of succour beyond all doubt.

The Gauls, having notice of it also by their scouts, thought proper to quit the siege and march away to meet Cæsar. Their army consisted of about 60,000 men. Cicero, now at liberty, applied himself again to Vertico, for the slave above spoken of, whom, having admonished him to use the utmost diligence and circumspection, he dispatched with a letter to Cæsar, informing him, that the enemy had raised the siege, and were advancing against him with all their forces. Cæsar received the letter about midnight, communicated the contents to his army, and exhorted them to meet the enemy with courage. Next day he decamped early, and, after a march of four miles, discovered the Gauls on the other side of a large valley, with a rivulet in front. As the siege of Cicero's camp was now raised, Cæsar had no longer any reason to be in a hurry: He encamped, therefore, in the most convenient spot he could find, and compleated his intrenchments. His army, consisting of no more than seven thousand men, without baggage, required but a very small camp; nevertheless, to inspire the enemy with the greater contempt of him, he contracted it as much as possible; and, in the mean time, sending out scouts on all sides, he endeavoured to find where he might cross the valley with safety.

The rest of the day passed in slight skirmishes near the brook; but the main body of the army on both sides kept within their lines; the Gauls, in expectation of more forces, which were not yet come up; Cæsar, that, by pretending fear, he might draw the enemy to his side of the valley. Early the next morning, the enemy's cavalry, approaching the camp of the Romans, charged their cavalry; which, by Cæsar's orders, purposely gave ground and retired behind the works. At the same time he ordered the ramparts to be raised higher, and the gates to be barricaded ; and that the soldiers, in the execution of these orders, should run up and down tumultuously, and affect an appearance of timidity and concern. The enemy, invited by all these appearances, crossed the valley, and drew up in a very disadvantageous place. The Romans in the mean while retiring from the rampart, the Nervii approached still nearer, cast their darts on all sides within the trenches, and sent heralds round the camp to proclaim, that, if any of the Gauls or Romans had a mind to come over to them, they should be at liberty so to do till nine o'clock, after which no quarter would be granted. Nay, so far did they carry their contempt, that, thinking they could not break in by the gates (which, to deceive them, were stopped up with a single row of turf) some began to scale the rampart, and others to fill up the ditch. But then Cæsar, sallying forth by all the gates at once, and charging them briskly with his cavalry, put them to so precipitate a flight, that not a man offered to make the least resistance. Great numbers were slain, and the rest obliged to throw down their arms. The same day he joined Cicero with all his forces, when, beholding the towers, galleries, and other works of the Gauls, he could not help being struck with admiration. He then reviewed Cicero's legion, and found that not a tenth man had escaped unwounded ; which gave him a just idea of the greatness of the danger to which they had been exposed, and of the vigorous defence they had made. He bestowed great commendation on the legion and its commander ; and addressed himself to the Centurions and military Tribunes by name, of whose valour Cicero made honourable mention.

In the mean time, the report of Cæsar's victory flew with incredible speed, through the country of the Rbemi, to Labienus. For, though he lay at the distance of fifty miles from Cicero's camp, where Cæsar did not arrive till past three in the afternoon, yet before midnight a shout was raised by the Rbemi at the gates of Labienus's camp, by which they notified Cæsar's victory, and their congratulations on that success. This news being carried to the Treviri, Indutiomarus, who had determined to attack the camp of Labienus the next day, made off in the night, and retired with all his forces into his own country. Cæsar sent back Fabius with his legion to his former quarters, resolving to take up his own for the winter near Samarobriæ with three legions, and to continue in person with them, Gaul being then universally in motion. For the defeat and death of Sabinus spreading every where, the states of Gaul were almost every one of them meditating a revolt ; with which view they sent messengers and deputies into all parts, to concert measures, and agree upon the properest place where to begin the war.

But Cæsar, having summoned the principal noblemen of every state to attend him, and having made them sensible that he was no stranger to their designs, prevailed, partly by menaces, and partly by exhortations, to keep the greatest part of Gaul in its duty. The Senones, however, a People Sen. potent state, and of great authority among the Gauls, formed the design of assassinating Cavarinus, whom Cæsar had given them for a King; whose brother Moritagus had held the sovereignty at the time of Cæsar's arrival in Gaul, and whose ancestors had long been in possession of that dignity. Cavarinus, having intelligence of the plot, thought proper to fly; whereupon pursuing him to the very frontiers, they drove him from his kingdom, and sent Ambassadors to Cæsar to justify their conduct: But, upon his ordering their whole Senate to repair to him, they refused to comply. And of such influence was this example among the Barbarians, that some at last became hardy enough to declare open war; and so great a change did it produce in the inclinations of all, that, except the Ædui and Rhemi, who had always been particularly distinguished and favoured by Cæsar (the first, on account of their ancient and inviolable fidelity to the People of Rome; the last, for their late services in the Gallic war) scarce was there a single state in all Gaul that did not give cause of suspicion. Nor is it, in truth, to be much wondered at, that a people of high spirit, and framed above all other nations for their military virtues, could not with patience see themselves so fallen from their former height of glory, as to be forced to bend under the yoke of Roman domination.

to

Indutiomarus and the Treviri ceased not, during the whole winter, to send Ambassadors over the Rhine, soliciting the German states, offering them money, and assuring them that the greater part of the Roman army was already cut off: But no one of those states could be persuaded to come into their designs: Because, having twice before tried their fortunes with the Romans, first in the war of Ariovistus, and then in the defeat of the Tenctheri, they were resolved, they told them, to run no more hazards. Indutiomarus, disappointed of this hope, was not less active in drawing forces together, soliciting recruits from the neighbouring states, providing horses, and encouraging even out-laws and convicts, by the promise of great rewards, to engage in his service. And so great credit and authority had he by this means acquired in Gaul, that, from all parts, embassies and messages were sent to solicit his alliance and friendship.

Finding himself thus voluntarily courted; on one side by the Senones and Carnutes, whom a consciousness of guilt incited thereto; on another by the Nervii and Aduatici, who were actually preparing for a war with the Romans; so that if he once took the field, forces would not be wanting; he called an assembly of the states in arms. This, according to the custom of the Gauls, implies an actual commencement of war; and, by a standing law, obliges all their youth to appear in arms at the assembly; in which they are so very strict, that whosoever has the misfortune to come last, is put to death, in sight of the multitude, with all manner of torments. In this assembly, Cingetorix, the son-in-law of Indutiomarus, 4 N 2 and

and who (as related above) had declared for Cæsar, and still continued firm to him, was proclaimed a public enemy, and his estate confiscated. After which Indutiomarus acquainted the council, That the Senones, Carnutes, and several other states of Gaul, had solicited his assistance; that he accordingly intended to join his forces with theirs, taking his route through the territories of the Rbemi, and giving up their lands to be plundered; but that, before he began his march, he was desirous of mastering the camp of Labienus: And, to effect this, he gave the necessary directions.

Labienus, whose camp, both by the nature of the ground, and the fortifications he had added, was extremely strong, feared nothing; but was wholly intent upon a project to give the enemy some considerable blow. Informed by Cingetorix and his adherents of the speech made by Indutiomarus in the general council of Gaul, he sent deputies to the neighbouring states, to solicit them for a recruit of horse, and appointed a day of rendezvous for the cavalry they should send: In the mean time, by an affectation of fear, the Roman was contriving to beget presumption and security in the mind of his enemy. The stratagem succeeded. The King at the head of his cavalry, came every day quite up to the camp of the Romans, insulting them with opprobrious language, and challenging them to fight. The Romans making no answer, the Gauls retired towards night, and, without observing any order, dispersed themselves. Labienus had, unknown to the enemy, received into his camp by night all the horse he had sent for. One evening, therefore, when the enemy had retreated in their careless manner, he ordered all his cavalry to make a sally on a sudden, strictly cautioning and charging his men, that, as soon as they had put the Gauls to flight (which happened according to his expectation) they should every one single out Indutiomarus, nor attempt to kill or wound any other, till they saw him slain: For Labienus was unwilling that any delay, occasioned by the slaughter of the rest, should give the General an opportunity to escape; and he promised great rewards to the man who should kill him. This measure succeeded: For, as they were intent upon the destruction of Indutiomarus alone, he was overtaken and slain in passing a river, and his head brought to the camp. The Roman cavalry, in their return, put all to the sword that came in their way. Upon the news of this defeat, the forces of the Eburones and Nervii returned home; and Gaul was somewhat quieter the rest of the winter.

J. C.
Comm.
lib. vi.

Cæsar, for many reasons, expecting greater commotions in Gaul, ordered his Lieutenants, M. Silanus, C. Antistius Reginus, and T. Sextius, to levy recruits. And as Pompey, now Proconsul, had, during his second Consulship (688) enlisted, in Cisalpine Gaul, a considerable number of soldiers, to the amount of a legion, but had not put them into that form, (the public affairs detaining him near the city) Cæsar requested of him to set those forces on foot, form them into a legion, and send it to him: For he thought

it

it of the utmost importance, towards securing a proper respect from the Gauls for the time to come, to give them such an idea of the power of Italy, as might convince them, that it was not only able speedily to repair any losses sustained, but even to bring a greater force into the field. "Friendship and the good of the Commonwealth, says Cæsar, equally determined Pompey to comply with this request:" And the Lieutenants having with great diligence executed their commissions, three new legions, containing double the number of cohorts lost with Sabinus, were brought into Gaul before the end of winter.

After the death of Indutiomarus, slain as related above, the Treviri conferred the command on his relations. They persisted likewise in soliciting the Germans, and gained them by force of money; and they associated Ambiorix in the confederacy. Cæsar found that he was threatened with war on all sides: The Nervii, Aduatici, Menapii, with all the Germans on that side the Rhine, were actually in arms: The Senones refused to attend him, pursuant to his orders; and were tampering with the Carnutes, and other neighbouring states: and that the Treviri were soliciting the Germans by frequent embassies: He judged therefore that it would be necessary to open the campaign early. Accordingly, without waiting till the winter was over, he drew together the four nearest legions, and fell unexpectedly into the territories of the Nervii, before they could either assemble in a body, or find means to save themselves by flight. Having carried off a great number of men and cattle, enriched the soldiers with booty, and laid waste the country, he compelled the inhabitants to give hostages, and then led back his legions into their winter-quarters.

[Year of Rome 700'.]

YEARLY in the spring, Cæsar summoned a general assembly of Gaul. No deputies from the Senones, or the Carnutes, or the Treviri, appearing, he looked upon this as the beginning of a revolt, adjourned the session, and transferred it to Lutetia; whose inhabitants, though they had been united with the Senones for one hundred years past, did not appear to be concerned with them in their present measures. The same day in which he declared the adjournment, he set out with his legions against the Senones, and made such haste, that Acco their chief, not having time to collect his forces, ordered the multitude to shelter themselves in their towns: But before this could be done, the Romans appeared. Intreaties were now the only resource left to the Senones. Cæsar, at the request of his faithful allies the Ædui, whose clients they were, pardoned them; but demanded of them one hundred hostages; and these he committed to the custody of the Ædui. The Carnutes likewise submitted, and obtained the same conditions by the mediation of the Rbemi, their patrons. Cæsar then went to Lutetia, put an end to the session of the states, and ordered the Gauls to furnish him with a body of cavalry.

* For the events and transaction, at Rome, in this year 699, see above, p. 525, 526.

† N. B. Cn. Domitius Calvinus, and M.

Valerius Messala, the Consuls of the year 700, did not enter on their magistracy before the middle of July.

Celtic Gaul being thus restored to a state of tranquillity, Cæsar turned his thoughts to the war with the Treviri, and with Ambiorix, King of the Eburones, purposing to revenge, by his death, the slaughter of the Roman cohorts.

He knew that Ambiorix was in friendship with the Menapii, a fierce nation, who, living in a country full of woods and morasses, had hitherto eluded the efforts of the Roman army, and had never made the least step towards a submission to Cæsar: He knew likewise, that, by means of the Treviri, he had entered into an alliance with the Germans. Cæsar thought it adviseable, therefore, to deprive him of those two supports, before he attacked him in person. This resolution being taken, he sent the baggage of the whole army to Labienus in the country of the Treviri, ordered him a reinforcement of two legions, and marched himself against the Menapii with five legions, who carried nothing with them but their arms. The Menapii were soon constrained to submit, and gave hostages. Cæsar granted them peace, on condition of their engaging not to admit Ambiorix, or any one from him, into their territories. These things settled, he left Cornius of Arras there, with a body of horse, to keep them in awe, and set out himself against the Treviri.

In the mean time Labienus, by pretending fear and flight, had drawn the Treviri over a river, that was between him and them; and had then with great ease put them to the rout. The Germans, who were coming to their assistance, hearing of their defeat, returned home; and the relations of Indutiomarus, who had been the authors of the revolt, chose likewise to retire with them: And within a few days the whole state submitted. Cingetorix, who had always continued faithful to the Romans, was thereupon invested with the supreme authority.

Cæsar, after his arrival at Treves from the country of the Menapii, resolved, for two reasons, to pass the Rhine a second time; to punish the Germans for sending succours to the Treviri, and to deter them from giving or promising a retreat to Ambiorix. In consequence of this resolution, he set about making a bridge, which was finished in a few days. Upon his arrival on the German side of the river, Ambassadors came to him from the Ubi, to assure him that they had neither sent troops to the assistance of the Treviri, nor in any instance departed from their engagements; and they requested he would spare their territories, and not, out of a general hatred to the Germans, involve the innocent in the punishment of the guilty. Cæsar, upon enquiry, found that the Ubi were wholly innocent, and that the aids sent to the Treviri were from the Suevi. These, upon certain information of the arrival of the Roman army, had retired to the remotest part of the country with all their forces, and those of their allies ; and there they waited the coming of the enemy at the entrance of an immense forest, called *Bacenis, which served as a barrier between the Cherusci and the Suevi, to prevent their mutual incursion^w.

Cæsar,

* Cellarius takes it to be the forest of Hartz in Lower Saxony, in the principality of Wolfenbutel.

^w On this occasion, says Cæsar, it may not be improper to say somewhat of the manners of the Gauls and Germans, and the difference of customs between these two nations. A spirit of faction prevails throughout Gaul, and that not only in their several states, districts, and villages, but almost in every private family. -- When Cæsar arrived in the country, the Ædui were at the head of one faction, and the Sequani of the other. The latter being the weaker, because the Ædui had several considerable states in their dependance, they united with Ariovistus and the Germans, whom, by great presents and promises, they drew over the Rhine to their assistance. This alliance made them so powerful, that having worsted their enemies in several battles, and killed almost all their nobility, they forced the states dependent upon the Ædui to have recourse to them for protection; obliged the Ædui themselves to give the children of their principal nobility as hostages, swear publicly not to attempt any thing against the Sequani, and resign up to their possession a part of their territories; and by this means they rendered themselves in a manner sovereigns of all Gaul. Divitiacus, in this necessity, applied himself to the Senate of Rome for relief, but without effect. Cæsar's arrival soon changed the face of affairs. The Æduan hostages were sent back, their former clients restored, and new ones procured them by Cæsar's interest; it appearing, that such as were under their protection, enjoyed a more equal and milder lot than others: By all which their fortune and authority being considerably enlarged, the Sequani were obliged to resign the sovereignty. The Rhemi now held the second place: And, as they were known to be in the same degree of favour with Cæsar, such of the Gauls as could not get over their old animosity to the Ædui, put themselves under the protection of the Rhemi. These were extremely attentive to the interests of their clients, and thereby both preserved their old authority, and that which they had newly acquired. Such therefore was the then situation of Gaul: The Ædui possessed indisputably the first rank, the Rhemi were next in consideration and dignity.

Over all Gaul, there are only two orders of men in any degree of honour and esteem: For the common people are little better than slaves; attempting nothing of themselves, and having no share in the public deliberations. As they are generally oppressed with debt, heavy tributes, or the exactions of their superiors, they make themselves vassals to the great, who exercise the same jurisdiction over them as masters do over slaves. The two orders of men, with whom, as we have said, all authority and distinction are lodged, are the Druids and the Nobles. The Druids preside in matters of religion, have the care of public and private sacrifices, and interpret the will of the Gods. They have the direction and education of the youth, by whom they are held in great honour. In almost all controversies, whether public or private, the decision is left to them: And if any crime is committed, any murder perpetrated; if any dispute arises touching an inheritance, or the limits of adjoining estates; in all such cases they are the supreme judges. They decree rewards and punishments: and if any one refuses to submit to their sentence, whether Magistrate or private man, they interdict him the sacrifices. This is the greatest punishment that can be inflicted among the Gauls; because such as are under this prohibition, are considered as impious and wicked: All men shun them, and decline their conversation and fellowship, lest they should suffer from them by contagion. They can neither have recourse to the law for justice, nor are capable of any public office. The Druids are all under one chief, who possesses the supreme authority in that body. Upon his death, if any one remarkably excels the rest, he succeeds: But if there are several candidates of equal merit, the affair is determined by a plurality of suffrages. Sometimes they have even recourse to arms before the dispute can be decided. Once a year they assemble at a consecrated place in the territories of the Carnutes, whose country is sup- Le pays posé Chartrain.

Cæsar, fearing the want of provisions, because Germany was but ill cultivated, resolved not to advance any farther : But, to keep the enemy still posed to be in the middle of Gaul. Hither such as have any suits depending flock from all parts, and submit implicitly to the decrees of the Druids. Their institution is supposed to have come originally from Britain ; and even at this day, such as are desirous of being perfect in it, travel thither for instruction. The Druids never go to war, are exempted from taxes and military service, and enjoy all manner of immunities. These mighty encouragements induce many to put themselves, of their own accord, under the discipline of this order ; and many are made to enter into it by their parents and relations. They are taught to repeat a great number of verses by heart, and often spend twenty years upon this institution : For it is deemed unlawful to commit their statutes to writing ; though in other matters, whether public or private, they make use of Greek characters. They seem to me (adds Cæsar) to follow this method for two reasons : To hide their mysteries from the knowledge of the vulgar ; and to exercise the memory of their scholars, which would be apt to be neglected, had they letters to trust to, as we find is often the case. It is one of their principal maxims, that the soul never dies, but after death passes from one body to another ; which, they think, contributes greatly to exalt mens courage, by disarming death of its terrors. They teach likewise many things relating to the stars and their motions, the magnitude of the world and our earth, the nature of things, and the power and prerogatives of the immortal Gods.

The other order of men are the Nobles [Cæsar calls them Equites, Cavaliers ; doubtless because they fought on horseback, as at this time the Polish nobility do, and as those among us formerly did, whom our ancestors called Men of arms ;] who, when any war breaks out (and before Cæsar's arrival the Gauls were almost every year engaged in war, either offensive or defensive) all take the field, at the head of their clients and dependents ; and the greater number of these, the more honourable the leader ; for the Gauls have no other measure of dignity and grandeur.

The whole nation is extremely addicted to superstition : Whence, in threatening distempers, and the imminent dangers of war, they make no scruple to sacrifice men, or engage themselves by vow to such sacrifices ; in which they make use of the ministry of the Druids : For it is a prevalent opinion among them, that the life of one man cannot be ransomed but by the life of another ; inso-much that they have established even public sacrifices of this kind. Some prepare huge Colossuses of osier twigs, into which they put men alive, and setting fire to them, those within expire amidst the flames. They prefer for victims such as have been convicted of theft, robbery, or other crimes ; believing them the most acceptable to the Gods : But, when criminals are wanting, the innocent are often made to suffer. Mercury is the chief deity with them : Of him they have many images, account him the inventor of all arts, their guide and conductor in their journeys, and the patron of merchandize and gain. Next to him are Apollo, and Mars, and Jupiter, and Minerva. Their notions in regard to them are pretty much the same with those of other nations. Apollo is their God of physic ; Minerva of works and manufactures ; Jove holds the empire of heaven ; and Mars presides in war. To this last, when they resolve upon a battle, they commonly devote the spoil. If they prove victorious, they offer up all the cattle taken, and set apart the rest of the plunder in a place appointed for that purpose : And it is common in many provinces to see these monuments of offerings piled up in consecrated places. Nay, it rarely happens, that any one shews so great a disregard of religion, as either to conceal the plunder, or pillage the public oblations ; and the severest punishments are inflicted upon such offenders.

The Gauls fancy themselves to be descended from the god Pluto ; which, it seems, is an established tradition among the Druids. For this reason they compute their time by nights, not by days ; and in the observance of birth-days, new moons, and the beginning of the year, always commence the celebration from the preceding night. In one custom they differ from almost still in some fear of his return, and to prevent their sending succours into Gaul, after his repassing the river, broke down only about two hundred feet almost all other nations; which is, that they never suffer their children to come openly into their presence, until they are of age to bear arms: The appearance of a son in public with his father, before he has reached the age of manhood, is accounted dishonourable.

Whatever fortune the woman brings, the husband is obliged to equal it out of his own estate. This whole sum, with its annual product, is left untouched, and goes always to the survivor. The men have power of life and death over their wives and children: And when any father of a family of illustrious rank dies, his relations assemble, and, upon the least ground of suspicion, put even his wives to the torture like slaves. If they are found guilty, iron and fire are employed to torment and destroy them. Their funerals are magnificent and sumptuous, according to their quality. Every thing that was dear to the deceased, even animals, are thrown into the pile: And formerly, such of their slaves and clients as they loved most, sacrificed themselves at the funeral of their Lord.

In their best regulated states they have a law, that whoever hears any thing relating to the public, whether by rumour or otherwise, shall give immediate notice to the magistrate, without imparting it to any one else: For the nature of the people is such, that rash and unexperienced men, alarmed by false reports, are often hurried to the greatest extremities, and take upon them to determine in matters of the highest consequence. The Magistrates stifle things improper to be known, and only communicate to the multitude what they think needful for the service of the Commonwealth: Nor do the laws permit to speak of state affairs, except in public councils.

THE Germans differ widely in their manners from the Gauls. For neither have they Druids to preside in religious affairs, nor do they trouble themselves about sacrifices. They acknowledge no Gods but those that are objects of sight, and by whom they are apparently benefited, the Sun, the Moon, and Vulcan [Fire.] Of others they know nothing, not even by report. Their whole life is addicted to hunting and war; and from their infancy they are inured to fatigue and hardships. They esteem those most who continue longest strangers to women, as imagining nothing contributes so much to stature, strength, and vigour of body: But to have any commerce of this kind before the age of twenty, is accounted in the highest degree ignominious. Nor is it possible to conceal any irregularity this way, because they bathe promiscuously in rivers, and are clothed in skins, or short mantles of fur, which leave the greatest part of their bodies naked.

VOL. III.

Agriculture is little regarded amongst them, as they live mostly on milk, cheese, and the flesh of animals. Nor has any man lands of his own, or distinguished by fixed boundaries. The Magistrates, and those in authority, portion out yearly, to every canton and family, such a quantity of land, and in what part of the country they think proper; and the year following remove them to some other spot. Many reasons are assigned for this practice; Left, seduced by habit and continuance, they should learn to prefer tillage to war: Left a desire of enlarging their possessions should gain ground, and prompt the stronger to expel the weaker: Left they should become curious in their buildings, in order to guard against the extremes of heat and cold: Left avarice should get footing amongst them, whence spring factions and discords. Finally, to preserve contentment and equality among the people, when they find their possessions nothing inferior to those of the most powerful.

It is accounted honourable for states to have the country all around them lie waste and depopulated. For they think it a proof of bravery to expel their near neighbours; and a part of prudence thus to provide against sudden incursions. When a state is engaged in war, either offensive or defensive, they make choice of Magistrates to preside in it, whom they arm with power of life and death. In time of peace there are no public Magistrates; but the chiefs of the several provinces and clans administer justice, and decide differences within their respective limits. Robbing has nothing infamous in it, when committed without the territories of the state to which they belong: They even pretend that it serves to exercise their youth, and prevent them feet of his bridge on the German side; and, to secure the rest, built at the extremity a tower of four stories, where he left a garrison of twelve cohorts, and strengthened the place with all manner of works. To C. Volcatius Tullus he gave the charge of the fort and garrison. He himself, as soon as the corn began to be ripe, marched against Ambiorix and the Eburones, taking his way through the forest of Arden. Basilus, whom he sent before him with all the cavalry, pushed on with such expedition, and so well concealed his approach from the enemy, that he surprized great numbers of them in the field. Being informed by them of the place whither Ambiorix had retired with a few horse, thither he without delay directed his course.

Fortune, says Cæsar, has a considerable share in all human concerns, and particularly in those of war. For, as it was a very extraordinary chance, that Basilus should come upon Ambiorix before he had the least notice of his approach, so was it equally an effect of fortune, that the Gaul, after having lost his arms, horses, and chariots, should yet find means to escape. This was principally owing to the situation of his house, which was surrounded with a wood; it being customary among the Gauls, in order to avoid the heats, to build in the neighbourhood of woods and them from falling into sloth. When any of their princes offers himself publicly in council to be the leader of an expedition, such as approve of it rise up, declare themselves ready to follow him, and for this are applauded by the whole multitude. They who go back from their engagement, are looked upon as traitors and deserters, and lose all esteem and credit for the time to come. The laws of hospitality are held inviolable among them. All that fly to them for refuge, on whatever account, are sure of protection and defence; their houses are open to receive them, and they plentifully supply their wants.

Formerly the Gauls exceeded the Germans in bravery, often made war upon them, and, as they abounded in people beyond what the country could maintain, sent several colonies over the Rhine. Accordingly, the more fertile parts of Germany, in the neighbourhood of the Hercynian forest (which I find mentioned by Eratosthenes and other Greek writers under the name of Orcinia) fell to the share of the *Volce Teutofages, who settled in those parts, and have ever since kept possession. They are in the highest reputation for justice and bravery, and no less remarkable than the Germans for poverty, abstinence, and patience of fatigue, conforming themselves to the German customs both in habit and way of living. But the neighbourhood of the Roman province, and an acquaintance with commerce, have introduced luxury and plenty among the Gauls: Whence, becoming gradually an unequal match for the Germans, and being worsted in many battles, they no longer pretend to compare with them in martial prowess.

The Hercynian forest, of which mention was just now made, is about nine days journey in breadth: For as the Germans are ignorant of the art of measuring land, they have no other way of computing. It begins from the borders of the Helvetii, Nemetes, and Rauraci, and, following directly the course of the Danube, extends to the territories of the Anartes and Daci: Thence, turning from the river to the left, it runs through a multitude of different regions: And though there are many in the country who have advanced six days journey into the forest, yet no one pretends to have reached the extremity of it, or to have discovered how far it extends.

* A people of Galie Narbonensis, of whom whole armies passed not only into Germany, but into Asia.

rivers. His attendants and friends, possessing themselves of a narrow pass, sustained the attack of the Roman cavalry for some time; during which, one of his servants having provided him with a horse, he got safely off.

Ambiorix, seeing the storm that was going to break on his country, and knowing that he could not possibly assemble an army strong enough to make head against Cæsar, dispatched messengers privately through the country, to signify to the Eburones, that every one should shift for himself as well as he could. They followed his advice, and dispersing themselves, retired, some into woods, others to inaccessible morasses, others to places near the sea, which at high water became islands. Many, abandoning their country altogether, trusted themselves and their fortunes to the faith of foreigners. Cativolcus, who had shared the rule with Ambiorix, being very old and infirm, and therefore incapable of supporting the fatigues of either war or flight, poisoned himself, after venting bitter imprecations against his colleague for drawing him into so fatal an enterprize.

Cæsar's intention was utterly to extirpate the Eburones: The difficulty was how to find them. With this view he divided his forces, and deposited the baggage of the whole army in the fort of Aduatica^{*}, which was situated in the heart of their country, the late quarters of the unfortunate Sabinus and Cotta. As its works were still entire, the labour of the soldiers would be the less. The fourteenth legion, one of the three lately levied in Italy, he left to guard the fort, under the command of Q. Cicero. Dividing the rest of his army, he sent Labienus with three legions towards the sea-coast, and the provinces that bordered upon the Menapii: Trebonius, with the like number of legions, he commissioned to lay waste the country adjoining to the Aduatici; and resolved to march himself with the other three towards the Scheld, and to the extremities of the forest of Arden, whither he was informed that Ambiorix had retired with a few horse. Cæsar, at his departure, promised to return at the end of seven days, the legion which he had left in garrison being provided with corn only for that time: And he exhorted Labienus and Trebonius, if they found it consistent with the public advantage, to return with their legions at the same time; that consulting together, and taking their measures from the conduct of the enemy, they might resolve whither next to carry the war.

Tongres,
in the country of Liege.

The Eburones, as was before observed, had no formed body of troops, no garrison, no fortified town to defend by arms, but were a dispersed multitude. Wherever a cave, or a thicket, or a morass, offered them shelter, thither they retired. This made it difficult for Cæsar and his army to take their revenge on this perfidious race; whom he could not

^{*} The Aduatici were a distinct people from the Eburones; and their capital, according to many geographers, was Namur. Crevier.

Vid. supr.
p. 623.

attack with his united forces, nor, without great danger to his men, suffer them in small parties to seek out the enemy in their hiding-places. He sent messengers therefore to the neighbouring states, inviting them all, by the hopes of plunder, to join in the extirpation of the Eburones. Accordingly, great numbers flocked suddenly thither from all parts. The Eburones were attacked on all sides, and the havock continued till the seventh day, which Cæsar had appointed for returning to his camp. It then evidently appeared, says Cæsar, what influence fortune has in war. The report being spread among the Germans beyond the Rhine, that the territories of the Eburones were given up to be plundered, and that all without distinction were invited to share in the spoil, the Sicambri, who had afforded a retreat to the Usipetes and Tenctheri (spoken of above) assembled immediately a body of two thousand horse, passed the river in barks, about thirty miles below Cæsar's bridge and fort, and advanced directly towards the territories of the devoted nation. Many of the scattered people fell into their hands, and abundance of cattle, and the invaders, allured by this success, pushed on still farther. Inquiring of the prisoners concerning Cæsar, they understood that he had left the country with his whole army, and was a great way off. “What makes you lose your time” (says one of the prisoners) in the pursuit of acquisitions trifling and insignificant, when fortune offers you so rich a booty? In three hours you may reach Aduatica, where the Romans have deposited all their wealth. The garrison is hardly sufficient to line the rampart, much less to make sallies.” The Sicambri, full of hope, marched directly towards Aduatica, under the guidance of the captive who had given them the information.

Cicero, who hitherto had kept his soldiers strictly within the camp, according to Cæsar's orders, nor had suffered so much as a servant to straggle beyond the lines, seeing the seventh day arrive, began to despair of Cæsar's return; who, he heard, was marched farther into the country. Wearied out therefore with the continual murmurings of the soldiers, who complained that he kept them up like men besieged; and not suspecting that any accident could befall him within the small extent of three miles, especially from an enemy in a manner totally dispersed, he sent out five cohorts to forage in a field, separated from the camp by only a single hill. About three hundred men, who had been sick, and were now pretty well recovered, joined the detachment: These were followed by almost all the servants of the camp, together with a vast number of carts and carriage horses. In that very instant the German cavalry arrived, and, without discontinuing their course, endeavoured to force an immediate entrance by the Decuman gate. As their march had been covered by a wood, they were not perceived till they were just upon the camp; insomuch that the sutlers, who kept their booths under the rampart, had not time to retire within the intrenchments. The cohort upon guard could scarce sustain the

the first onset, so surprized and struck were the soldiers by the sudden and unexpected attack. The whole camp was in an uproar, every one enquiring of another the cause of the confusion; nor could they determine which way to advance the standards, or where to post themselves. Some reported, that the camp was already taken; others, that the Germans, having destroyed Cæsar and his troops, were come victorious to assault it. The greater number, full of imaginary fears, called to mind the fate of Cotta and Sabinus, who perished on that very spot.

Among the sick in the garrison was P. Sextius Baculus, a Centurion of the first rank, of whom honourable mention has been already made. This officer, though he had not tasted food for five days, rushed unarmed out of his tent. Seeing the enemy at hand, and the danger extreme, he snatched up the first arms that offered, and posted himself in the gate of the camp. The Centurions of the cohort upon guard followed his example, and for a while sustained the enemies charge. Sextius expired under a multitude of wounds, and was with difficulty carried off by the soldiers. But the Romans now had begun to resume their courage; so far at least as to mount the rampart, and make a shew of defending themselves.

Mean time the foragers, returning, heard the noise at the camp. They sent some horsemen before to learn the cause of it, who were quickly apprized of the danger. The new levies, unexperienced in matters of war, fixed their eyes upon the officers, waiting their orders. Not a man was found so hardy and resolute as not to be disturbed and disconcerted by the unexpected accident. The Germans, when they perceived the Roman ensigns at a distance, gave over the attack of the camp, imagining at first that it was Cæsar with the legions; but discovering in a short time how few they were whom they had to deal with, fell upon them on all sides.

The servants of the camp fled to the nearest rising ground; whence being presently driven, they threw themselves amongst the ranks of the cohorts, and thereby increased their terror. Some retired to a hill, there to defend themselves in the best manner they could: But the veteran soldiers of the detachment, mutually encouraging one another, and being led on by their commander C. Trebonius, a Roman Knight, broke through the midst of the enemy, and all to a man arrived safe at the camp. The servants and cavalry followed them, and assisting their retreat, were likewise by their bravery preserved. But the troops which had retired to the hill, being unexperienced in military affairs, did not persist in the resolution they had taken of defending themselves there, but in a short time, quitting the advantage of the situation, endeavoured to gain the camp: But they failed in the attempt: A few only escaped; the rest were surrounded and cut to pieces by the Barbarians.

The Germans, despairing now to force the camp, repassed the Rhine with the booty which they had deposited in the woods: But, even when they

they were gone, the terror the Romans were under continued to be so great, that Volusenus, arriving in the camp the same night with the cavalry, could not persuade them that Cæsar and the army were safe: They persisted in believing that the infantry was wholly destroyed, and that the cavalry alone had escaped, it seeming to them altogether incredible, that the Germans would have dared to attack the camp, had no misfortune befallen the Roman army. Cæsar's arrival quickly put an end to their fears.

Being informed of what had happened, he only complained of the sending out the cohorts to forage: Observing, that in war nothing ought to be left to fortune, whose power had shewed itself evidently in the sudden arrival of the enemy, and much more in their coming up unperceived to the very gates of the camp. But nothing in this whole affair appeared to him more wonderful than that the Germans, having crossed the Rhine with the purpose of plundering the territories of Ambiorix, should do him a most acceptable service, by falling upon the Roman camp.

Cæsar marched a second time to harass and distress the enemy, and having drawn a great number of troops together from the neighbouring states, sent them into all parts upon this service. Such devastation was made, that it seemed likely, if the enemy escaped the sword for the present, they would afterwards perish by famine. Nothing was left unattempted to take Ambiorix prisoner, the parties that were sent out in search of him believing they should thereby gain the highest favour with Cæsar, whose good fortune waited only this to render it complete. But all their endeavours were fruitless: Ambiorix found means to hide himself in the woods and morasses; whence removing privately in the night, he escaped into other countries, accompanied only by four horsemen, in whom alone he durst confide, Cæsar in this expedition had lost only two cohorts; and, having laid waste the whole country, led back his army into the territories of the Rhemi. There he summoned a general assembly of Gaul, to examine into the affair of the Senones and the Carnutes; and having passed sentence against Acco, the author of the revolt, ordered him to be executed on the spot. Some, fearing a like fate, fled; whom having banished by a decree of the assembly, he quartered two legions in Treves, two among the Lingones, and the remaining six in the country of the Senones: And, having provided the army with corn, he went, pursuant to his design, into Italy, to hold the assemblies of Cisalpine Gaul.

J. C.

Comm. lib.
vii.

While Cæsar was on the Italian side of the Alps, the Gauls on the other side plotted a general revolt, and made a more vigorous effort, than they had ever done before, to shake off the Roman yoke. The execution of Acco, chief of the Senones, had alarmed all the great men, each thinking himself exposed to the same treatment. And what more especially encouraged their making an attempt at this time to recover their freedom, were the

the intestine commotions and seditions at Rome, which the death of Cleodius had occasioned, and which they thought would detain Cæsar a long time in Italy. Besides, as his ten legions were stationed in the remote extremity of Gaul, on the north and the east, if the country between him and them revolted, it would not be easy for him to rejoin them when he should be at leisure to do it; nor would the legions, without their General, dare to leave their winter quarters. And lastly, they came to this conclusion, that it was better to die bravely in the field, than not regain their former martial glory, and the liberty derived to them from their ancestors.

Such were the debates and resolutions in the private councils of the Gauls, held in woods and remote places for the sake of secrecy. The Carnutes, declaring themselves ready to submit to any danger for the common safety, offered to be the first to take up arms against the Romans; and because the exchanging of hostages might occasion a too early discovery of their design, they proposed, that the other states should bind themselves by a solemn oath, sworn before the military ensigns collected together (which is the most sacred obligation among the Gauls) not to abandon them during the course of the war. This offer of the Carnutes was received with universal applause, and the oath taken by all present: after which, the time for action being fixed, the assembly separated.

When the appointed day came, the Carnutes, headed by two men of desperate resolution, flew on a sudden to Genabum, massacred the Roman Citizens who had settled there on account of trade, and seized their effects. Among the slain was C. Fufius Cotta, a Roman Knight of eminence, to whom Cæsar had committed the care of supplying the army with provisions. The fame of this massacre soon spread into all the provinces of Gaul: for, when any thing extraordinary and important happened, it was their custom to publish it from place to place by outcries, which, being successively repeated by men stationed on purpose, were carried with incredible expedition over the whole country. And thus it was on the present occasion; what had been done at Genabum about sun-rising, was known before nine at night in the territories of the Arverni, a distance of one hundred and sixty miles.

Instigated by this example, Vercingetorix, the son of Celtillus, of the nation of the Arverni, a young nobleman of great power and interest (whose father had presided over all Celtic Gaul, and for aiming at the sovereignty had been put to death by his countrymen) calling his clients and followers together, easily persuaded them to a revolt. His design being discovered, the people immediately flew to arms; and Gobanitio his uncle, with the other principal men of the state, dreading the consequences of so rash an enterprize, united all their authority against him, and expelled him the city of *Gergovia*¹. But Vercingetorix, not discouraged by this opposition, having engaged in his service a considerable number of outlaws and fugitives, soon made himself master of Gergovia, and drove out of the country all those who had so lately forced him to leave that city. He was, upon this, saluted King by his followers, and immediately dispatched Ambassadors into all parts to exhort the confederate states to continue firm to their engagements. The Senones, Parisii, Pictones, Cadurci, Turones, Aulerci, Lemovices, Andes, and the nations bordering upon the ocean, readily came into the alliance, and with unanimous consent declared him Generalissimo of the league. Invested with this authority, he demanded hostages of the several states, ordered them, at a prefixed time, to furnish him with a certain number of men and arms; and more particularly applied himself to the raising of a numerous cavalry. To an extreme diligence, he joined an extreme rigour of command: For greater faults, the criminals, after having been tortured, were burnt alive; and for lighter offences, they had their ears cut off, or one of their eyes put out, and were in that condition sent home to serve as an example to the rest. Thus by the severity of his punishments he obliged the irresolute to declare themselves in his favour.
and

* The inhabitants of Rouergue.

Having assembled a considerable army, he sent Luterius of Quercy, a bold and enterprising man, with part of the forces, against the Rutheni^{*}; and marched himself into the territories of the Bituriges. This people, upon his arrival, dispatched Ambassadors to the Ædui, under whose protection they were, to demand succours against the enemy. The Ædui, by the advice of the Lieutenants Cæsar had left with the army, ordered a body of horse and foot to the assistance of the Bituriges; but those troops advanced no farther than the banks of the Loire, which divides their country from that of the Bituriges, and after halting there a few days, returned home, pretending that they had received information, that in case they had passed the river, they would be treacherously attacked on one side by the Bituriges, whom they went to assist, and on the other by the Arverni. On their departure, the Bituriges immediately joined the forces of the revolted states.

[Year of Rome 701².]

Cæsar, upon the first report of this insurrection, left Italy, and set out for Transalpine Gaul. On his arrival there he found it very difficult to resolve, in what manner to join the army; for should he order the legions to repair to the Province, he foresaw they would be attacked on their march in his absence; and should he himself proceed to the quarters of the legions, he was not without apprehension of danger, even from those states, that seemingly continued faithful to the Romans.

¹ City of Auvergne, the ruins of which are visible two leagues south-east of Clermont: the mountain is still called Gergaie.

² For the events and transactions at Rome in the year 700, see above, p. 527, 540.

In the mean time Luterius of Quercy, who had been sent by Vercingetorix into the territories of the Rutbeni, brought over that state to the alliance of the Arverni. Advancing from thence among the Nitobrigi * and Gabali †, he received hostages from both nations; and having got together a numerous body of troops, drew towards Narbonne, to attack the Romans on that side. Cæsar, informed of his design, thought it incumbent on him first to provide for the security of the Province. He therefore flew to Narbonne, secured that town, placed garrisons in the towns of the Rutbeni, subject to the Romans, also in those of the Volci, Tolosani, and other states bordering upon the enemy. Luterius, not daring to march forwards among so many Roman garrisons, thought proper to retire. Thus Cæsar was left at liberty to execute the project he had formed of penetrating into the country of the Arverni, through the territories of the Helvii, which were separated from each other by the high mountain Cebenna. With this view he joined a part of the provincial forces, and the recruits he had brought from Italy, whom he had before ordered to rendezvous on the frontiers of the Helvii, and proceeding on his march, opened a way over the Cebenna, with infinite labour to the soldiers, the mountain being covered with snow to the depth of six feet. The Arverni, who looked upon the Cebenna as an impenetrable barrier, impassable in that season even to single men, were altogether unprepared on the arrival of the Romans; and Cæsar, to strike a general terror among them, ordered his cavalry to spread themselves on all sides over the country.

Fame and messengers from the state soon informed Vercingetorix of the calamity of his country. The Arverni gathered round him, and, with looks full of dismay, conjured him to have regard to their fortunes, and not abandon them to the ravages of the enemy; especially as he now saw that the whole war was pointed against them. Vercingetorix, moved by their intreaties, broke up his camp, and marched towards Auvergne. This Cæsar had foreseen: and his scheme being to amuse the enemy on that side, while he stole off to his legions, he staid only two days in the camp; and leaving young Brutus to command in his absence, with orders to disperse the cavalry as wide as he could, he set out on pretence of going for a reinforcement, promising to return, if possible, in three days. But posting by great journies to Vienne, he there joined the new levied cavalry, whom he had sent thither some time before. From thence travelling day and night, without taking any rest, through the country of the Ædui, to prevent by his expedition any designs they might form against his person, he at length reached the confines of the Lingones, where two of his legions wintered; and sending immediately to the rest, he drew them all together, before the Arverni could be apprized of his arrival in those parts.

* People of the Agennais.
† Those of the Gavaudan.

Vercingetorix, upon notice of this junction, led back his army into the territories of the Bituriges, and invested Gergovia, a town belonging to the Boii, where they had been settled by Cæsar after the defeat of the Helvetii, and made subject to the Æduan state. This motion of the enemy greatly perplexed the Roman General. If he continued incamped with his legions during the rest of the winter, and abandoned the subjects of the Ædui to the attempts of the enemy, he had reason to apprehend that the Gauls, seeing him afford no protection to his friends, would universally revolt. On the other hand, if he took the field too early, he risked the want of provisions and forage, by the great difficulty of procuring convoys. Resolving, however, not to submit to an affront that must for ever alienate the minds of his allies, he in the strongest terms enjoined the Ædui to be diligent in supplying him with the necessary provisions, dispatched messengers to the Boii to inform them of his approach, and exhort them to continue firm to their duty: then leaving two legions with the baggage of the whole army at Agendicum *, he began his march to the relief of Gergovia.

* Sens.

† Bezune in Gati-nois.

He arrived the next day before Vellaunodunum †, a city of the Senones, which surrendered after a siege of two days. In two days more he reached Genabum, where the Roman citizens had been lately massacred by the Carnutes. Cæsar's sudden approach had not left the enemy time to prepare for a defence; they therefore attempted to make their escape in the night by a bridge over the Loire. To prevent the execution of such a design, Cæsar had ordered two legions to be in readiness under arms: and about midnight, being informed by his scouts that the enemy were stealing off, he set fire to the gates of the town; the legions entered, pursued the fugitives over the bridge, and almost intirely destroyed them. The town was plundered and burnt.

‡ Novan.

Here Cæsar passed the Loire, and, marching into the territories of the Bituriges, sat down before Noviodunum ‡. The inhabitants sent deputies to treat of a surrendry, but before the articles agreed upon could be put into execution, the cavalry of Vercingetorix appeared at a distance. This General of the Gauls, informed of Cæsar's approach, had raised the siege of Gergovia, and marched to meet the Romans. The besieged, on this prospect of relief, though they had already given hostages, and received into the town some centurions and soldiers of the Roman army, with great clamours flew to arms, shut the gates, and manned the walls. The centurions in the town judging, from the noise among the Gauls, that they had some new project in view, had cautiously posted themselves at one of the gates, and getting all their men together, retreated without loss to the camp. Cæsar soon dispersed the enemies horse, which was not supported by the body of the army; and the people of Noviodunum, disappointed and terrified at the defeat of their friends, seized immediately on all those who had been instrumental in breaking the capitulation, sent them prisoners to Cæsar's camp, and delivered up the town. From thence Cæsar marched on to Avaricum, the strongest and most considerable city of the Bituriges.

Vercingetorix, alarmed at the loss of so many towns in so short a time, called a general council of his followers, and represented to them : “ That “ it was necessary to resolve upon a very different plan of war, from that “ which they had hitherto pursued ; and, instead of giving battle to the “ Romans, they should bend their whole aim to intercept their convoys
“ and foragers : That this might be easily effected, as they themselves “ abounded in cavalry, and in the present season of the year, there being “ no forage in the fields, the enemy must unavoidably disperse them“ selves into the distant villages for subsistence, and thereby give daily “ opportunities of destroying them. That, where life and liberty were at “ stake, property and private possession ought to be little regarded ; that “ therefore the best resolution they could take was, at once to burn all “ their houses and villages, from the territories of the Boii to wherever “ the Romans might extend their quarters for the sake of forage : That “ they themselves had no reason to apprehend scarcity, as they would be “ plentifully supplied by those states, whose territories they were ready to “ defend at so great loss ; whereas, the enemy must either be reduced “ to the necessity of starving, or making distant and dangerous excursions “ from their camp ; that it equally answered the purpose of the Gauls, to “ defeat the Roman army, or seize upon their baggage and convoys ; be“ cause without these last, it would be impossible for them to carry on the “ war : That, in his opinion, they would do well to set fire even to the “ towns themselves, which were not strong enough to be perfectly secure “ against all danger ; as by this means they would neither become places “ of retreat to their own men, to screen them from military service ; nor “ contribute to the support of the Romans by the supplies and plunder
“ they might furnish : He added, that though these things were indeed “ grievous, yet they ought to reflect that it was still more grievous to see “ their wives and children dragged into captivity, and be themselves put “ to the sword, the unavoidable fate of the conquered.”

This proposal being approved by all, more than twenty cities of the Bituriges were burnt in one day ; the like was done in other states ; nothing but conflagrations were seen over the whole country ; and though the natives bore this desolation with extreme regret, they comforted themselves with the hopes, that it was the sure way to a speedy victory, which would amply recompence their losses. The fate of Avaricum was solemnly debated in council, whether it should be burnt or defended ; the Bituriges falling prostrate on the ground, earnestly begged that they might not be obliged to burn with their own hands one of the most beautiful cities of Gaul, the ornament and the security of their state ; especially as the town itself, almost wholly surrounded by a river and morass, and affording but one very narrow approach, was from the nature of its situation, capable of an easy defence. Vercingetorix at first opposed their request, but at length moved by their prayers, and the generous compassion of the army, he yielded, and sent a strong garrison to defend the town.

This affair determined, he followed Cæsar by easy marches, and chose for his camp a place surrounded with woods and marshes, about fifteen miles distant from Avaricum. There he had hourly intelligence by his scouts, of all that passed before the town; and sent his orders from time to time to the garrison. He kept a constant watch upon the Roman convoys, and foragers, whom, notwithstanding their vigilance, he frequently cut off, when necessity obliged them to seek for provisions at too great a distance.

Cæsar having incamped on that side, where the river and morasses left a narrow access to the town, began to raise a mount, bring forward his battering engines, and prepare two towers of assault; without attempting to make lines of circumvallation, which the nature of the ground rendered impossible. He was continually soliciting the Æduans and Boii for corn, but received no great supplies from either; partly through the negligence of the Æduans, who were not zealous in the affair; partly through the inability of the Boii, who possessing an inconsiderable territory, soon consumed all the corn their land produced. The army were for many days altogether without bread, and had nothing to appease their hunger but the cattle brought from distant villages: yet not an expression was heard among the soldiers unworthy the majesty of the Roman name, or the glory they had acquired by former victories. And when Cæsar visited the different quarters of the legions in person, and offered to raise the siege, if they found the famine insupportable; they with one voice requested him not to do it, adding, "That, during the many years they had served under him, they never yet had met with any check, or formed any enterprize in which they had not succeeded; that they could not but look upon it as inglorious to abandon a siege they had once begun; and had rather undergo the greatest hardships, than not revenge the blood of the Roman Citizens, perfidiously massacred by the Gauls in Genabum."

And now the towers began to approach the walls, when Cæsar was informed by some prisoners, that Vercingetorix, having consumed all the forage round him, had removed his camp nearer to Avaricum, and was gone himself at the head of the cavalry, and the light-armed troops accustomed to fight in their intervals, to form an ambuscade for the Romans, in a place where it was supposed they would come the next day to forage. Upon this intelligence, setting out about midnight in great silence, he arrived the next morning at the enemy's camp. But they having had timely notice by their scouts, instantly conveyed their baggage and carriages into a thick wood, and drew up in order of battle on an open hill. Cæsar immediately ordered all his soldiers to prepare for an engagement.

The

The hill itself where the enemy stood, rising all the way with an easy ascent, was almost wholly furrounded by a morass difficult and dangerous to pass, though not above fifty feet over. Here the Gauls, confiding in the strength of their post, and having broke down all the bridges over the morass, appeared with an air of resolution. They had formed themselves into different bodies, according to their several states; and planting select detachments at all the avenues and fords, waited with determined courage, that, if the Romans should attempt to force their way through, they might fall upon them from the higher ground, while embarrassed in the morass. The Romans, full of indignation, that the enemy should dare to face them, loudly demanded to be led to battle. Cæsar checked their ardour, and endeavoured to make them sensible, that in attacking an army so strongly posted, the victory would be attended with the loss of many brave men; adding, that he could not be too tender of the lives of those, whom he found ready to encounter every kind of danger for his glory. Having by this speech comforted the soldiers, he led them back the same day to Avaricum and applied himself wholly to the carrying on of the siege.

Vercingetorix, upon his return to the camp, was accused by the army of treason. The removal of his quarters nearer to those of the enemy, his departure at the head of all the cavalry, his leaving so many troops without a commander in chief, and the opportune and speedy arrival of the Romans during his absence; all these things, they said, could not easily happen without design, and gave great reason to believe, that he had rather owe the sovereignty of Gaul to Cæsar's favour, than to the free choice of his countrymen. To this charge he replied: “ That the removal of his “ camp was occasioned by the want of forage, and made at their own ex“ press desire: That he had posted himself nearer to the Romans, on ac“ count of the advantage of the ground, which secured him against all “ attacks: That cavalry were by no means wanted in a morass, but might “ have been extremely serviceable in the place to which he had led them:
“ That he purposely forbore naming a commander in chief at his departure, “ lest the impatience of the multitude should have forced him to give bat“ tle; to which he perceived they were all strongly inclined, through a “ certain weakness and effeminacy of mind, that rendered them incapable “ of bearing long fatigue: That whether accident or intelligence brought “ the Romans to their camp, they ought to thank, in the one case fortune, “ in the other the informer, for giving them an opportunity of discovering,
“ from the higher ground, the inconsiderable number of the enemy, and “ despising their feeble efforts; for not daring to hazard an engagement, “ they had ignominiously retreated to their camp: That for his part, he “ scorned treacherously to hold an authority of Cæsar, which he hoped “ soon to merit by a victory, of which both he and the rest of the Gauls had “ now a certain prospect: That he was willing to resign the command, “ if they thought the honour, done him by that distinction, exceeded the “ advantages

“ advantages procured by his conduct.” He added : “ To convince you of “ the truth of what I have said, hear the Roman soldiers themselves.” Instantly he produced some slaves, whom he had made prisoners a few days before, and whom by severity and hard usage he had brought to his purpose. These, according to the instructions they had received, declared, “ That they were legionary soldiers : That, urged by hunger, they had “ privately stolen out of the camp, to search for corn and cattle in the fields :
 “ That the whole army was reduced to so weak a condition, as no longer “ to be capable of supporting fatigue : That the General had therefore “ resolved, if the town held out three days longer, to draw off his men
 “ from the siege.” “ Such (said Vercingetorix) are the services you receive from the man, whom you charge with treason. To him it is owing, that, without drawing a sword, you see a powerful and victorious “ army almost wholly destroyed by famine. He has moreover taken effectual care, that, when necessity compels them to seek refuge in a shameful flight, no state shall receive them into its territories.”

The whole multitude set up a shout ; and, as their manner was, clashing their arms, to denote their approbation of the speaker, proclaimed Vercingetorix a consummate General, whose fidelity ought not to be questioned, and whose conduct deserved the highest praise. They decreed that ten thousand men, chosen out of all the troops, should be sent to reinforce the garrison of Avaricum ; it seeming too hazardous to rely upon the Bituriges alone for the defence of a place, whose preservation, they imagined, would necessarily give them the superiority in the war.

Though the Romans carried on the siege with incredible vigour, yet was their progress greatly obstructed by the address and contrivance of the Gauls. For they were a people of singular ingenuity, quick of apprehension, easily imitating whatever they saw practised by others. They turned aside with ropes, the hooks made use of by the Romans, and after having seized them, drew them into the town with engines. They likewise endeavoured to undermine the mount ; an art they were perfectly skilled in, as their country abounded with iron-mines. At the same time they raised towers on all parts of the wall, covered them with raw hides, and in frequent sallies by day and night, either set fire to the mount, or fell upon the workmen. In proportion as the Roman towers increased in height, by the continual addition to the mount, in the same proportion did they advance the towers upon their walls *, raising one story above another. And counter-

* The fortified towns among the Gauls, had their walls mostly built in the following manner. Long massy beams of wood were placed upon the ground, at the distance of two feet one from another, and so as to constitute by their length the thickness of the wall. These being again crossed by others, which served to bind them together, had their intervals on the inside filled up with earth, and on the outside with large stones. The first rank thus completed and firmly joined, a second was laid over it, with the same distance between the beams : but these did not rest upon the beams of the order below, but were placed above their intervals, counter-working the mines with the utmost diligence, they either filled them with great stones, or poured melted pitch into them, or repulsed the miners with long stakes, burnt and sharpened at the end.

Such were the obstacles the Romans met with in this siege. But the soldiers, though much incommoded, during the whole time, with cold and perpetual rains, yet, by dint of labour, overcame all difficulties, and at the end of twenty-five days, had raised a mount three hundred and thirty feet broad, and eighty feet high. When it was brought almost close to the walls, Cæsar, according to custom, attended the works, and encouraged the soldiers to labour without intermission; a little before midnight it was observed to smoke, the enemy having undermined and fired it. At the same time they raised a mighty shout, and sallying from two of their gates, vigorously attacked the works. Some threw lighted torches and dry wood from the walls upon the mount, others pitch and all sorts of combustibles; so that it was not easy to know on which side it was proper first to send relief. But as Cæsar kept always two legions upon guard in the trenches, besides great numbers employed in the works, who relieved one another by turns, his troops were soon in a condition, some to oppose those that sallied from the town, others to draw off the towers, and make openings in the mount; whilst the rest endeavoured to extinguish the flames.

The fight continued with great obstinacy during the remaining part of the night. The enemy still entertained hopes of victory, and persisted with the more firmness, as they saw the mantlets that covered the towers burnt down, the Romans being unable to rescue them for want of shelter. Fresh troops were continually advancing from the town to relieve the fatigued, the enemy believing, that the safety of Gaul depended on that critical moment. Here (says Cæsar) I cannot forbear mentioning a remarkable instance of intrepidity, to which I was myself a witness upon this occasion. A certain Gaul, posted before the gate of the city, threw, into the fire, balls of pitch and tallow to feed it. This man being exposed to the discharge of a Roman battery, was struck through the side with a dart, and expired. Another striding over his body, immediately took his place. He also was killed in the same manner. A third succeeded; to the third a fourth; nor was this dangerous post left vacant, till the fire of the mount was extinguished, the enemy repulsed on all sides, and an end put to the conflict.

The Gauls having in vain tried all methods of defence, consulted the next day about leaving the town, in consequence of the orders they had received from Vercingetorix. This they hoped easily to effect in the tervals, and filled up as before with earth and stones. In this manner the work was carried to a proper height, and the building was as useful as beautiful. For as the variety and regular intermixture of the materials pleased the eye, so the stone was proof against fire, and the beams against the battering-ram; for being fastened on the inside with continued planks, they could neither be disjointed, nor thrown down.

night;

night ; as that General's camp was not far off, and the morafs between them and the Romans would ferve to cover their retreat. Night came, and the befieged were preparing to put their fcheme in execution ; when fuddenly the women running out into the ftreets, and throwing themfelves at their husbands feet, conjured them, with many tears, not to abandon to the fury of an enraged enemy them and their common children, whom nature and weaknefs rendered incapable of flight. Finding their entreaties ineffectual (for, in extreme danger, fear often excludes compaffion) they began to fet up a loud cry, to inform the Romans of the intended efcape. This alarmed the garrifon, who, apprehending the paffages would be feized by the enemy's cavalry, delifted from their attempt.

Next day Cæfar brought forward the tower, and gave the neceffary directions concerning the works. A heavy rain chancing juft then to fall, he thought it a favourable opportunity of effecting his purpofe, efpecially as he obferved that the walls were negligently guarded. Wherefore, ordering the foldiers to abate a little of their armour in the works, and having inftructed them in what manner to proceed, he exhorted the legions, who advanced under cover of the machines, to feize at laft the fruit of fo many toils. Then promifing rewards to thofe who fhould firft fcale the town, he gave the fignal of attack. The Romans rufhed fuddenly upon the enemy from all parts, and in a moment poffeffed themfelves of the walls. The Gauls terrified at the vigour of the affault, and driven from their towers and battlements, drew themfelves up in the form of a triangle in the market-place, expecting that the Romans would advance to attack them. But obferving that they ftill kept upon the walls, and were endeavouring to get poffeffion of their whole circuit, they began to fear left they fhould be fhut up on every fide. Therefore, throwing down their arms, they ran tumultuoufly to the fartheft part of the town, where many of them were flain by the legionaries, the narrownefs of the gates obftructing their flight. Others were flaughtered by the cavalry without the walls. The Romans, regardless of plunder, but eager to revenge the mafacre of Genabum, and exafperated by the obftinate defence of the place, fpared neither old men, women, nor children ; infomuch that of all that multitude, amounting to about forty thoufand, fcarce eight hundred, who had quitted the town upon the firft alarm, efaped fafe to Vercingetorix. He received them into his camp in the dead of the night : For, fearing left their entrance by day, and in a body, fhould occafion a tumult among the troops ; he had fent out his friends, and the principal noblemen of each province, to meet them by the way, and conduct them to the quarters of their feveral ftates.

Vercingetorix having called a council, comforted the foldiers, and exhorted them not to be difcouraged by their late misfortune. He faid, “ The Romans had not overcome by bravery, or in the field, but “ by their addrefs and fkill in fieges, an art the Gauls were little acquaint“ ed with ; that they deceived themfelves, who in war expected fuccefs

“ to

“ to attend every enterprize; that he himself, as they all knew, had never “ advised the defence of Avaricum, and could not but impute the present “ disaster to the imprudence of the Bituriges, and the too easy compliance
 “ of the rest: That he hoped, however, soon to compensate their loss by su“ perior advantages, as he was using his utmost endeavours to bring over “ the other states, which had hitherto refused their concurrence, and to “ form one general confederacy of all Gaul, against whose united strength, “ not the whole world would be able to prevail: That he had even in a “ great measure effected his design, and in the mean time only required of “ them, for the sake of the common safety, immediately to fortify their “ camp, the better to secure themselves from the sudden attacks of the “ enemy.” This speech was not displeasing to the Gauls, and the rather, that, notwithstanding so great a blow, Vercingetorix neither retired from public view, nor seemed to have lost any thing of his wonted courage.
 They even entertained a higher opinion of his prudence and foresight; as from the first he had advised the burning of Avaricum, and at last sent orders to abandon it. Thus ill success, which usually sinks the reputation of a commander, served only to augment his credit, and give him greater authority among the troops. At the same time, from the assurances he had given them, they were full of hopes that the other states would accede to the alliance. And now for the first time the Gauls set about fortifying their camp; being so humbled by their late misfortunes, that, though naturally impatient of fatigue, they submitted to every task imposed upon them by their General.

Vercingetorix on his side was extremely active to bring over to the confederacy the other provinces of Gaul, endeavouring, by presents and promises, to gain the leading men in each state. For this purpose he made choice of fit agents, who, by their address, or peculiar ties of friendship, were most likely to influence those to whom they were sent. He provided arms and cloathing for the troops that had escaped from Avaricum, and to repair the loss sustained by the taking of that place, gave orders to the several states in alliance to furnish a certain number of men, and send them to the camp, by a day prefixed. At the same time he required of them, that all the archers, of which there were great numbers in Gaul, should be sought out and sent to the army. By these measures he soon filled up the places of those he lost at the siege of Avaricum. In the mean time Theuto- matus, the son of Ollovico, and King of the Nitobrigi, whose father had been stiled friend and ally by the Senate of Rome, came and joined Vercinge- torix with a great body of horse, which he had raised in his own territories, and in the province of Aquitain.

Cæsar finding great plenty of corn and other provisions at Avaricum, stayed there several days to refresh his troops, after their late sufferings from scarcity and fatigue. Spring was now approaching, and as the season invited him to take the field, he resolved to march against the enemy, either to draw them out of the woods and marshes, or besiege them in their fortresses. While he was preparing for this expedition, deputies arrived from the Ædii to beg he would interpose his authority to settle the differences in their state. “ Every thing there, they told him, threatened “ an intestine war. That as it was their custom to be governed by a “ single magistrate, who possessed the supreme power for one year, two “ Noblemen contended for that office: each affirming his election was “ according to law. The one was Conviſtolitanis, an illustrious and “ popular young man; the other Cotus, of an ancient family, great “ authority, and powerful relations, whose brother Videliacus had held

 “ the same magistracy the year before: That the whole state was in “ arms, the senate and people divided; nor had they hopes of escaping a “ civil war, but in his care and timely endeavours to put an end to the “ contest.”

Although Cæſar was sensible it would greatly prejudice his affairs, to quit the pursuit of the war, and leave the enemy behind him; yet reflecting on the mischiefs that arose from divisions, and desirous if possible to prevent so powerful a state, in strict amity with the people of Rome, and which he had always in a particular manner cherished and befriended, from having recourse to violence and arms, which might drive the party that least confided in his friendship, to seek the assistance of Vercingetorix, he resolved to make it his first care, to put a stop to the progress of those disorders. And because, by the constitutions of the Ædii, it was not lawful for the supreme magistrate to pass beyond the limits of the state, that he might not seem to infringe their privileges, he resolved to go thither in person, and summoned the senate and the two candidates to meet him at Decetia. The assembly was very numerous, and it appeared that Cotus had been declared chief magistrate by his own brother, in presence of only a few electors privately called together, without regard to time or place, and even contrary to the express laws of the state, which prohibited two of the same family to hold the supreme dignity, while he who first obtained it was alive, or so much as sit together in the senate. Cæſar therefore obliged Cotus to resign in favour of Conviſtolitanis, who, upon the expiration of the office of the preceding magistrate, had been elected in due form by the priests.

This sentence being passed, Cæſar exhorted the Ædii to lay aside their quarrels, and apply themselves solely to the business of the present war; to expect with confidence the full recompence of their services, as soon as the reduction of Gaul should be compleated; and to send him immediately all their cavalry, and 10,000 foot, to form a chain of posts for the security of his convoys. He then divided his army into two parts. Four legions, under the conduct of Labienus, he sent against the Senones and Parisi, and the other six he led in person along the banks of the Allier, towards the territories of the Arverni, with a design to invest Gergovia.

Part

Part of the cavalry followed Labienus; part remained with Cæsar. Vercingetorix having notice of these motions, broke down all the bridges upon the Allier, and marched along the other side of the river.

As both armies were continually in view, encamped almost over-against each other, and the enemies scouts so stationed, that it was impossible for the Romans to make a bridge for carrying over their forces, Cæsar began to be uneasy, lest he should be stopped in his progress the greatest part of the summer by the river, the Allier being seldom fordable till towards autumn. But he soon found means to compass his end. He encamped in a place covered by woods, over-against one of those bridges which Vercingetorix had caused to be broke down. The next day remaining there concealed with two legions, he sent forward with all the baggage the other four, dividing them into six corps, that the number of the legions might appear complete, and ordered them to march as far as they could. When, by the time of the day, he judged they were arrived at the place of their encampment, speedily he rebuilt the bridge upon the old piles, the lower part of which the enemy had left standing; marched over the troops he had with him, and, having chose a proper place for his camp, recalled the rest of his forces. Vercingetorix being informed, that the Romans had passed the river, marched on before them by long journeys, that he might not be forced to a battle against his will.

Cæsar, after five days march, came before Gergovia, where he had a slight engagement with the enemy's cavalry. Having taken a view of the place, which he found situated on a very high hill, all whose approaches were extremely difficult, he not only despaired of reducing it by storm, but resolved not to invest it, till he had secured a supply of provisions for his army. Vercingetorix was encamped near the town, where he had disposed the forces of the several states in different divisions, separated from one another by moderate intervals. As his army covered the whole summits of the hill, it made a very formidable appearance. Every morning, by day-break, the chiefs of each state, who composed his council, assembled in his tent, to advise with him, and receive his orders: and he scarcely let a day pass, without detaching some cavalry, intermixed with archers, to skirmish with the Romans, that he might make trial of the spirit and courage of his men. There was a rising ground, that joined to the foot of the hill on which the town stood, well fortified by nature, being very steep on all sides. This eminence, though of such importance to the Gauls, that if the Romans should get possession of it, they could in a great measure deprive them of water and forage, was yet but indifferently guarded. Cæsar therefore leaving his camp about midnight, dislodged the enemy before any assistance could arrive from the town, seized the hill, and having placed two legions to defend it, drew a double ditch twelve feet deep from the greater to the lesser camp, that the soldiers might pass and repass without danger.

While these things were transacted at Gergovia, Conviſolitanis the Ædun, to whom, as we have before related, Cæſar had adjudged the ſupreme magiſtracy, being bribed by the Arverni, endeavoured to engage in the confederacy ſome young noblemen, the chief of whom were Litavicus and his brothers, of the moſt diſtinguiſhed family in the country. With theſe he ſhared the money he had received, and exhorted them to conſider, “ That they were free, and born to command: That the Ædui “ alone obſtructed the victory of the league, that their authority reſtrained “ the other ſtates from joining in the common cauſe, and that their “ concurrence in it would not leave the Romans a poſſibility of ſupporting “ themſelves in Gaul. That he himſelf indeed was under ſome obligation to “ Cæſar, at leaſt ſo far as an equitable deciſion deſerved that name, but “ he ſtill owed more to his country; adding, that the Ædui had no greater “ reaſon to have recourſe to the Roman General, in what regarded their “ laws and cuſtoms, than the Romans had in the like caſe to apply themſelves to the Ædui.” The representations of the magiſtrate, and the rewards he beſtowed, ſoon prevailed with the young noblemen. They offered to become the chief conductors of the enterprize; and nothing remained but to conſult on the proper means for accompliſhing their deſign; for they well knew, that the ſtate would not be eaſily induced to engage in the war. It was agreed, that Litavicus ſhould have the command of the 10,000 foot appointed to join Cæſar, and that his brothers ſhould be ſent before. They alſo concerted in what manner the reſt of the project ſhould be executed.

Litavicus having taken the command of the army, and led them within thirty miles of Gergovia, ſuddenly called the troops together, and addreſſing them with tears: “ Whither ſoldiers, ſaid he, are we going? “ All our cavalry, all our nobility are ſlain. Eporedorix and Virdumarus, “ men of the firſt quality in the ſtate, accuſed by the Romans of treaſon, are put to death without a trial. But learn theſe things of thoſe “ who have eſcaped the ſlaughter; for, as to me, overwhelmed with grief “ for the loſs of my brothers and kiſmen, I am unable to utter our calamities.” He then produced ſome, whom he had before inſtructed for that purpoſe, who repeated to the multitude, “ That the greateſt part of “ the Ædun cavalry had been put to the ſword, under pretence of their “ holding intelligence with the Arverni; and that they themſelves had eſcaped with great difficulty by mixing with the Roman ſoldiers.” Hereupon the whole army called aloud to Litavicus, entreating him to provide for their ſafety; “ As if, ſaid he, there was room for counſel, or any choice “ left, but that of marching directly to Gergovia, and joining the Arverni. “ Can we doubt, after ſo black an inſtance of Roman perfidy, but that they “ are already on their way to deſtroy us? Let us, therefore, if any ſpirit “ or courage remains in us, revenge the death of our countrymen, ſo unworthily ſlain, and put theſe inhuman ſpoilers to the ſword.” He then pointed pointed to some Roman Citizens, who had taken the opportunity of their march to bring a large supply of corn and provisions to the camp. Instantly the convoy was plundered, the Romans put to death with cruel torments, and messengers dispatched through all the territories of the Ædui, to spread the same forgery of the massacre of the cavalry and princes, and excite them to take the like vengeance on the common enemy.

Eporedorix, the Æduan, a young nobleman of distinguished birth, and great interest in the state; as likewise Virdumarus, of the same age and equal authority, though not so well descended (whom Cæsar, on the recommendation of Divitiacus, had raised from a low condition to the highest dignities) were both at this time in the Roman camp. Between these two was a competition for greatness; and in the late dispute about the magistracy, the one had declared warmly for Convictolitanus, the other for Cotus. Eporedorix, having notice of Litavicus's design, came at midnight to Cæsar's tent, discovered the whole plot, and entreated him not to suffer the state, through the mischievous counsels of a few young men, to fall off from the alliance of the Romans, which he foresaw must happen, if they should join the enemy with so many thousand men, whose safety would neither be neglected by their relations, nor disregarded by the state.

This intelligence gave Cæsar extreme concern, because he had always had a particular regard for the Ædui. He therefore immediately drew out four legions, together with all the cavalry; nor had he time to contract his camp, because the affair seemed wholly to depend upon expedition. He left C. Fabius, his Lieutenant, to command in his absence with two legions. Litavicus's brothers, whom he ordered to be seized, had some time before escaped to the enemy. Having exhorted the soldiers to bear the fatigue cheerfully in so pressing a conjuncture, they marched with great alacrity, and about five and twenty miles from Gergovia came within sight of the Ædui. Cæsar immediately detached the cavalry to retard and stop their march; but with strict charge to abstain from slaughter. He ordered Eporedorix and Virdumarus, whom the Ædui had lamented as dead, to ride up and down among the squadrons, and call to their countrymen. They were soon known, and Litavicus's forgery being detected, the Ædui stretched out their hands, offered to submit, and throwing down their arms, begged their lives might be spared. Litavicus, with his clients (who by the custom of the Gauls cannot without infamy abandon their patrons, even in the greatest extremity of fortune) fled to Gergovia.

Cæsar, having dispatched messengers to the Ædui to inform them, that from a regard for their state he had spared those, whom by the right of war he might have put to the sword, after allowing the army three hours rest, marched back to Gergovia. About half way he was met by a party of horse, sent by Fabius, to acquaint him with the danger that threatened his his camp. They told him, “ That the enemy had attacked it with all their “ forces, relieving the fatigued with supplies of fresh men, while the “ Romans were kept to continual labour ; for the vast extent of ground “ they had to defend, obliged them to be perpetually upon the rampart.

 “ That the multitude of arrows and darts discharged by the Gauls had “ wounded many of the soldiers, notwithstanding the protection received “ from the engines, which yet had been of good service in repelling the “ assailants : That Fabius, upon the retreat of the enemy, had closed up “ all the gates of the camp except two, carried a breastwork quite round
 “ the rampart, and made preparation for sustaining the assault the next “ day.” Cæsar, upon this news, hastened his march with all diligence, and seconded by the ardour of the troops, arrived in the camp before sun-rising.

While these things passed at Gergovia, the Ædui, upon receipt of the first dispatches from Litavicus, staid not for the confirmation of the report ; but prompted, some by avarice, others by revenge, and many hurried on by a levity and rashness, natural to that people, who are always ready to give credit to every flying rumour, ran immediately to arms, plundered the Roman Citizens, killed some of them, and sold others for slaves. Convidolitanus incited to the utmost this fury of the multitude, that, by engaging them in desperate acts of violence, he might render a return to right measures the more difficult. At his instigation, they obliged M. Ariftius, a military Tribune, who was upon his way to join the army, to quit Cabillonum, promising not to molest him in his journey : They engaged also several Roman merchants, who resided there on account of traffick, to quit their habitations ; then attacking them trea-cherously on the road, they stripped them of their baggage, and invested day and night those who made resistance. But as soon as they had intelligence, that all their troops were in Cæsar’s power, they ran to Ariftius, assured him that nothing had been done by public authority ; ordered informations to be brought against those, who had been concerned in pillaging the Romans ; confiscated the estates of Litavicus and his brothers, and sent Ambassadors to Cæsar, to excuse what had happened.
 This they did with a view to recover their troops, but unwilling to part with the plunder, in which great numbers had shared, conscious of guilt, and dreading the punishment they deserved, they began privately to concert measures of war, and by their Ambassadors solicited other states to join them. Though Cæsar was not ignorant of those practices, he spoke with the greatest mildness to the Ædian deputies, assuring them that he would not consider the imprudence and levity of the multitude as a crime of the whole nation, nor upon that account lessen his regard for the state.
 Apprehending however an universal revolt of Gaul, and that he might be furrounded by all the forces of the states at once, he began to think of retiring from Gergovia, and drawing his whole army again into a body ;

yet in such a manner, that the retreat, occasioned by the fear of a general insurrection, should not carry with it the appearance of a flight.

While he was intent on these thoughts, fortune seemed to present him with an opportunity of acting against the enemy with success. For coming into the lesser camp, to take a view of the works, he observed a hill quite destitute of troops, that for some days before was scarce to be seen for the multitude that covered it. Wondering what might be the cause, he inquired of the deserters, who flocked daily in great numbers to his camp. They all agreed with Cæsar's scouts, that the back of the hill was almost an even ground, but narrow and woody in that part where a passage led to the other side of the town: That the enemy were extremely afraid of losing this post, because the Romans, who had already possessed themselves of one hill, if they should seize the other, would in a manner quite surround them, become masters of all the outlets, and entirely cut off their forage: That Vercingetorix had therefore drawn all his forces on that side, in order to fortify the passage.

Cæsar, upon this intelligence, dispatched some squadrons of cavalry towards that place about midnight, ordering them to ride up and down with as much noise as possible. At day-break he drew a great number of mules and carriage-horses out of the camp, without the usual harness, and furnishing the grooms and waggoners with helmets, to make them appear like cavalry, commanded them to march round the hill. With these he joined some squadrons of horse, who, for the greater shew, were to range a little more freely. The whole detachment had orders to move towards the same place, taking a very large circuit. All these dispositions were seen from the town, which commanded a full view of the Roman camp, though the distance was too great to distinguish objects with certainty. At the same time Cæsar, the more effectually to deceive the enemy, detached a legion towards the eminence; and when it was advanced a little way, stationed it at the foot of the hill, affecting to conceal it in the woods. This increasing the suspicion of the Gauls, they immediately led all their forces to defend that post. Cæsar seeing their intrenchments abandoned, made his soldiers cover the military ensigns and standards, and file off in small parties from the greater to the lesser camp, that they might not be perceived from the town. He then opened his designs to his Lieutenants, whom he had appointed to command the several Legions, directing them above all things to moderate the ardour of the soldiers, that the hope of plunder, or desire of fighting, might not carry them too far. He represented to them the danger they were exposed to by the disadvantage of the ground, for which there was no remedy but dispatch; and that he intended only to make a sudden attack, not to fight a battle. These precautions taken, he gave the signal to engage, and at the same time dispatched the Ædui by another ascent, to charge the enemy on the right.

The

The wall of the town was about twelve hundred paces distant from the foot of the hill, without reckoning the breaks and hollows. The compass the troops were obliged to take, to moderate the steepness of the ascent, added still to this space upon the march. About half way up the hill, the Gauls had run a wall of large stones, six feet high, the better to defend themselves against the attacks of the Romans. Between this and the plain, the enemy had no troops; but the upper part of the hill, to the very walls of the town, was crowded with the camps of their several states.

The signal being given, the Romans immediately mounted the hill, scaled the nearest wall, and possessed themselves of three of the enemies camps. Such too was the expedition wherewith they carried them, that coming suddenly upon Teutomatus, King of the Nitobrigi, as he was reposing himself in his tent about noon, he very narrowly escaped being taken: he was obliged to fly half naked, and had his horse wounded under him.

Cæsar, having accomplished all he had in view, ordered a retreat to be sounded; and the tenth legion, which fought near his person, obeyed, the other legions did not hear the signal, being separated from him by the valley; but the Lieutenants and military Tribunes, according to the instructions given by Cæsar in the beginning, commanded them to halt. Nevertheless, elated with the hopes of a speedy victory, and the remembrance of their former successes, they thought nothing impracticable to their valour; nor did they desist from the pursuit, till they had reached the walls and gates of the town. Upon this a great cry arising from all parts, those that were farthest from the place of assault, terrified by the noise and tumult, and imagining the enemy already within the gates, quitted the town with precipitation. The women throwing their money and clothes from the walls, with naked breasts, and extended arms, conjured the Romans to spare their lives, and not, as at Avaricum, sacrifice all to their resentment, without distinction of age or sex. Some being let down from the wall, delivered themselves up to the soldiers. L. Fabius, a Centurion of the eighth Legion, told his troop, that he had not yet forgot the plunder of Avaricum, and was resolved no man should enter the place before him. Accordingly, having with the assistance of three of his company got upon the town-wall, he helped them one after another to do the like.

In the mean time the Gauls, who, as we have before related, were gone to defend the post on the other side of the town, excited by the cries of the combatants, and the repeated accounts that the enemy had entered the place, sending all the cavalry before to stop the progress of the Romans, advanced in great crowds to the attack, and as they arrived drew up under the walls. They soon became formidable by their multitude, and the women, who a little before had implored the compassion of the Romans, now began to encourage their own troops, shewing their dishevelled hair, and producing their children according to the custom of the Gauls. The contest was by no means equal either in respect of numbers, or of the ground; and the Romans already fatigued with their march, and the length of the combat, were little able to sustain the attack of fresh and vigorous troops.

CÆSAR perceiving the disadvantages his troops laboured under, began to fear the event: sending therefore to SEXTUS his Lieutenant, whom he had left to guard the lesser camp, he ordered him to draw out the cohorts with all expedition, and post them at the foot of the hill upon the enemy's right: that if the legions engaged should give way, the cohorts might deter the Gauls from pursuing them. He himself advancing a little with the tenth legion, waited the issue of the combat.

While the conflict was maintained with the utmost vigour on both sides; the enemy trusting to their post and numbers, the Romans to their courage; suddenly the Ædui, whom CÆSAR had detached by another ascent on the right to make a diversion, appeared on the open flank of his men. As they were armed after the manner of the Gauls, this sight greatly terrified them, and though the Ædui extended their right hands in token of peace, yet still the Romans imagined it a stratagem to deceive them. At the same time L. FABIVS the Centurion, and those who had mounted the wall with him, being surrounded and slain, were thrown down by the enemy from the battlements. M. PETREIVS, a Centurion of the same legion, who had endeavoured to force the gates, finding himself overpowered, and despairing of safety, because he was already covered with wounds, turned to the soldiers that followed him, and said: "Since I find I am unable to save both myself and you, I will do my utmost to preserve your lives, which, through too eager a desire of glory, I have brought into this danger; seize the opportunity, and retire." Then rushing on, killed two of the enemy, drove the rest from the gate, and seeing his men approach to his assistance, he cried: "In vain do you endeavour to preserve my life: my blood and strength forsake me. Go therefore, while you may, and rejoin your legion." Continuing still to fight, he expired soon after, generously sacrificing his own life to the safety of his followers.

The Romans, thus pressed on all sides, were at length driven from the place. But the tenth legion, which had been posted on a more advantageous ground to cover their retreat, checked the impetuous pursuit of the Gauls, and was sustained by the cohorts of the thirteenth legion, who had quitted the lesser camp under SEXTIVS, and possessed themselves of an eminence. The legions having reached the plain, immediately halted, and faced about towards the enemy; who advancing no farther than the foot of the hill, returned back to their intrenchments. The Romans lost forty-six centurions, and about seven hundred men.

CÆSAR having assembled the army the next day, severely blamed the temerity and avarice of the soldiers, "That they had taken upon them“ selves, to judge how far they were to proceed, and what they were to “ perform; regarding neither the signal to retreat, nor the orders of their “ officers. He represented to them the danger of fighting on disadvantage“ ous ground, and reminded them of his own conduct at the siege of Ava- “ ricum, when, having surprized the enemy without a General, and with“ out cavalry, he had chosen rather to give up a certain victory, than, by “ attacking them in a difficult post, hazard a considerable loss: That as “ much as he admired their courage, which neither the intrenchments of “ the camps, nor the height of the hill, nor the walls of the town could “ check; so much did he blame their licentiousness and arrogance, who “ thought they knew more than their General, and could see better than “ him the way to conquest: That he looked upon obedience and mo“ deration, as virtues no less essential to a good soldier, than valour and “ magnanimity.” In the end he exhorted them “ not to be discouraged “ by their late misfortune, nor ascribe that to the bravery of the enemy, “ which was entirely owing to the disadvantage of the ground, on which “ they fought.” He still persisted in his design of retiring from Gergo- vic, but first drew out his legions on the plain, and offered battle to the enemy; which Vercingetorix declined, not thinking it adviseable to quit the advantage of his situation; and Cæsar returned to his camp after a small but successful skirmish between the cavalry. The following day he again drew out his army, and thinking he had done enough to confirm the courage of his own men, and abate the pride of the Gauls, he decamped and marched towards the territories of the Ædui. The enemy made no attempt to pursue him. He arrived the third day on the banks of the Allier, and having repaired the bridge, passed over with his whole army.

Here Heporedorix and Viridomarus informed him, that Litavicus was gone with all the cavalry to solicit the Ædui to revolt; and that it imported greatly, that they should be there before him, to confirm the state in their attachment to the Romans. Though Cæsar was by many proofs fully convinced of the perfidy of the Ædui, and foresaw that the departure of these men would hasten the revolt, yet not to give ground of offence, or betray any fear, he did not think it advisable to detain them.
 After enumerating the many services he had done the Ædui; “ That “ having found them low and depressed, shut up within their towns, “ deprived of their lands, without troops, tributaries to their enemies,
 “ and ignominiously obliged to give hostages, he had not only restored “ them to their former condition, but had raised them to a degree of “ power and authority beyond what they had ever possessed;” he dismissed them.

Noviodunum was a town belonging to the Ædui, conveniently situated on the banks of the Loire. Here Cæsar had lodged all the hostages of Gaul, his provisions, the public money, and great part of his own
 and

and his army's baggage : here also he kept the horses brought from Italy and Spain for the service of the war. When Eporedorix and Viridomarus arrived at this place, and were informed how the Ædunan state was disposed : " That Litavicus had been received into Bibracte ; that Con-
" victolitanes, the chief magistrate, and almost all the senate, had repair" ed thither to meet him ; that Ambassadors had been publicly sent to
" Vercingetorix, to conclude a treaty of alliance ; " they thought the present favourable opportunity was by no means to be neglected. Having therefore put to the sword the garrison of Noviodunum, with all the Romans found in the place, they divided the money and horses, ordered the hostages to be conducted to Bibracte, and set fire to the town. Then drawing together the troops cantoned in the neighbourhood, they placed guards along the banks of the Loire, and began to scour the country with their cavalry ; in order to cut off Cæsar's convoys, and oblige him, through want of provisions, to return into the Roman Province. This they thought the more easy to effect, as the Loire was then considerably swelled by the melting of the snow, and did not appear to be any where fordable.

Cæsar, sensible that a retreat into the Roman Province over the Cebenna would be both inglorious and difficult, and that it was necessary to rejoin Labienus with the legions under his command, and come to an action with the enemy before they could draw all their forces together, resolved to cross the Loire, though he should be under a necessity of building a bridge over it. Therefore, marching day and night with the utmost diligence, he arrived unexpectedly on the banks of the river. His cavalry very opportunely having found a ford, which however was so deep that the water reached to the shoulders of his men, he placed his horse higher up in order to break the stream, and carried over his army without loss ; the enemy being so terrified at his boldness, that they did not dare to make any opposition. Finding an abundance of corn and cattle in the fields, he plentifully supplied his army, and directed his march towards the country of the Senones.

While Cæsar was thus employed, Labienus on his side, leaving at Agendicum, to guard his baggage, the new levies lately arrived from Italy, marched with four legions to Lutetia, a town of the Parisii, situated in an island of the Seine. Upon notice of his approach, the enemy drew together a great army from the neighbouring states ; which was commanded by Camulogenus, an Aulercian, who, though very much advanced in age, was raised to that honour for his singular knowledge in the art of war. This General pitched his camp near the town behind a large morass, whose waters ran into the Seine, and obstructed all the passages on that side. Labienus attempted, by the means of hurdles covered with mold, to make a passage through it ; but not succeeding, he silently made off in the night, and retired as far as Melodunum, a city of the Senones, situated also in an island of the Seine. There having seized about fifty boats, and filled them with soldiers, with a view of storming the town; the inhabitants terrified at this new manner of attack, and being too few to defend the place, because the greater part of them had joined CAMULOGENUS, yielded without making any resistance. LABIENUS immediately repaired the bridge, which had been cut down on his approach, crossed the Seine, and following the course of the river, marched back to Lutetia. The Gauls informed of his motions set fire to the town, broke down the bridges, and encamped on the other side of the river over-against the Romans.
4 R 2 the

It was now every where known, that CÆSAR had left Gergovia, and that the Ædui, with many other states of Gaul, had joined in the revolt. It was likewise reported that CÆSAR had been obliged to return into the Roman Province. At the same time the Bellovaci, who bordered upon the territories of the Parisii, were raising troops with all diligence. In this situation of affairs, LABIENUS, menaced on one side by this war-like people, and pressed on the other by the army of CAMULOGENUS, saw it was no proper time to think of making conquests, but rather in what manner to secure his retreat to Agedincum, where he had left all his baggage, with the rest of his troops, and from which place he was now separated by a large river. This he effected in the following manner:

He had brought from Melodunum the fifty boats found there, the command of which he gave to as many Roman Knights, and ordered them to fall down the river silently four miles below Lutetia, and there wait his arrival. Five cohorts, the least fit for action, were appointed to guard the camp, the other five of the same legion were directed to march up the river with all the baggage, making as much stir and noise as possible; while a few barks that attended them increased this noise with their oars. Soon after their departure, he marched with three legions to the boats that waited for him, and passed them over. CAMULOGENUS, informed at day-break of these motions, imagined that the legions were ordered to pass the river in three different places, and dividing his army into three corps, one he left to guard the passage over-against the Roman camp; another had orders to march up the river as far as the Romans should proceed that way; and the rest, being the greatest part of his troops, he led himself against LABIENUS. On his approach, the Roman General drew up his army, and gave the signal for battle. At the first charge, the seventh legion, which formed the right wing, routed the left of the Gauls. But their right wing, where CAMULOGENUS commanded in person, and which was engaged with the twelfth legion, maintained its ground with the utmost bravery; the conflict was long and doubtful, till the seventh legion, leaving the pursuit of the left, faced about and attacked the Gauls in the rear. Thus surrounded, they still obstinately maintained the fight, and were with their General cut to pieces. LABIENUS having gained a compleat victory, retired to Agendicum, and from thence marched with all his forces and joined CÆSAR.

The revolt of the Ædui gave great strength to the confederacy. Interest, money, authority, were all employed to procure the concurrence of the states, that still continued quiet. The hostages found at Noviodunum, were made a means to compel some of them. But it was with great reluctance that the Ædui submitted to the command of VERCINGETORIX, an Arvernian; they loudly demanded to have the chief conduct of the war, which not being consented to by VERCINGETORIX and his friends, the affair was referred to the decision of a general assembly of the revolted states, summoned to meet at Bibracte for that purpose, where the public voice declared VERCINGETORIX General in chief.

Confirmed in his command, he demanded of the states to furnish him with fifteen thousand horse. He told them, “ he was sufficiently provided “ with infantry, as he had no intention to refer the decision of the war to “ fortune, or hazard a pitched battle; but would endeavour to intercept “ the convoys of the enemy by the means of his superior cavalry; which “ he judged the easiest and safest way to ruin them: That the confederates “ must resolve to destroy their corn and houses, and patiently submit
“ to a present loss, which would be rewarded by perpetual liberty.” He ordered the Ædui and Segusi to raise ten thousand foot, to whom having joined eight hundred horse, he gave the command of them to EPOREDORIX’s brother, with directions to attack the Allobroges. On the other hand, he commissioned the Gabali, and some cantons of Auvergne, to make an irruption into the territories of the Helvii, and sent the Rutbeni, and Cadurci, into those of the Volsci-Arecomici. He neglected not, however, both by public ambassadors and private agents, to solicit the concurrence of the Allobroges; endeavouring to gain the leading men by presents, and allure the state by an offer of the sovereignty of the Roman Province.

L. CÆSAR, who commanded in those parts, had levied twenty-two cohorts in the Province, and with them prepared to make head on all sides. The Helvii venturing to come to an engagement with the enemy, were defeated, and forced to shelter themselves in their walled towns. But the Allobroges placing detachments at proper distances along the banks of the Rhone, guarded all the avenues of their country with great diligence.

CÆSAR, seeing that the enemy was much superior in cavalry, and that his communication with Italy and the Province was cut off, had recourse to his German allies beyond the Rhine, of whom he obtained a supply of cavalry, with some light-armed infantry accustomed to fight amongst them. On their arrival, finding that they were but indifferently mounted, he gave them the horses of the Tribunes and other officers of his own army, and marched through the frontiers of the Lingones into the country of the Sequani, in order to be at hand to succour the Roman Province.

The

The forces of the enemy from Auvergne, and the cavalry of all the confederate states, were now met at the general rendezvous, and formed a very numerous army. Vercingetorix, elated with the prosperity of his affairs, and suffering himself to be led into a contempt of Cæsar, whom he thought had no other view, but of retiring into the Roman Province, rashly deviated from that prudent plan of war, which he had hitherto so steadily pursued. He followed the Romans, and posted himself at about four miles distance from their army in three camps. Having assembled the officers of the cavalry, he endeavoured to persuade them that the time of victory was come. He told them, “ That the Romans were at last obliged to leave Gaul, and “ retreat into the Province: That this retreat secured liberty for the present, “ but did not ascertain future tranquillity; as the Romans would doubtless “ soon return with greater forces, and persist in the design of enslaving “ them: That it was therefore highly expedient to attack them now, while “ they marched encumbered with their baggage: That in this attack their “ cavalry would never dare to stir from the main body of the army; and “ if the infantry faced about, in order to assist them, they would thereby “ be unable to continue their march: If, as was more likely, they “ abandoned the baggage to provide for their own safety, they would “ be deprived of every conveniency, and return home covered with “ ignominy and reproach: That to strike a greater terror into the “ enemy, he would, during the action, keep all his infantry under arms
 “ before the camp.” These words were followed by the acclamations of all the cavalry, who proposed taking an oath never to return home, nor see again their parents, wives or children, if they did not twice pierce through the Roman army.

This proposal being approved, and the oath administered to all, Vercingetorix the next day attacked the Romans on their march; he had divided his cavalry into three bodies, two of which moved towards the flanks of the enemy’s army, while the third began to charge and harass them in front. Cæsar formed also his horse into three divisions, and ordered them to advance against the Gauls, while the infantry halted, and covered the baggage, which was received into the center. Wherever the Roman cavalry gave way, or appeared hard pressed, thither Cæsar sent detachments from the legions, which both checked the progress of the Gauls, and confirmed the courage of his own men. At last the Germans on the right, having driven the enemy from an eminence, pursued them with great slaughter to the river, where Vercingetorix was posted with the infantry. The rest of the Gallie cavalry perceiving the defeat of their countrymen, and apprehensive of being surrounded, betook themselves likewise to flight. Three Æduan noblemen of distinguished rank were brought prisoners to Cæsar: Cotus, General of the cavalry, who the year before had been competitor with Convidolitanes for the supreme magistracy; Cavarillus, who after Litavicus’s revolt, was appointed to command the infantry, and Eporodoricx, who had been Generalissimo of the Æduan forces in the war against the Sequani before Cæsar's arrival in Gaul.

Vercingetorix seeing his cavalry routed, drew off the infantry, and immediately retreated towards Alesia, a town belonging to the Mandubii. Cæsar pursued him till night, cut three thousand of his rear to pieces, and arrived the next day before Alesia. After examining the situation of the town, he resolved to take advantage of the consternation of the enemy, and lay siege to it.

Alesia was situated on the top of a very high hill, at the bottom of which ran two rivers that washed it on two sides. Before the town was a plain extending about three miles in length, but on every other side the place was surrounded, at a moderate distance, by a ridge of hills, whose summits were nearly of an equal height. Under the walls, on the side facing the East, lay encamped all the forces of the Gauls, which were defended by a ditch, and a rampart six feet high. The line of circumvallation made by the Romans took in a circuit of eleven miles. Their camp was conveniently situated, and strengthened with three and twenty redoubts, in which centinels were placed by day, and a strong guard by night.

Whilst the Romans were employed in these works, Vercingetorix ventured another engagement with the cavalry, in the plain between the hills. The battle was sharply maintained on both sides, but the Romans beginning to give ground, Cæsar detached the Germans to their assistance, and drew up the legions in order of battle before the camp, that he might be ready to oppose any sudden irruption of the enemy's infantry. The sight of the legions encouraged his men; the Gauls were put to the rout, and crowding upon one another in their flight, obstructed their entrance at the gates of their camp, and gave the Germans, who pursued them to their intrenchments, an opportunity of destroying great numbers, and carrying off a multitude of prisoners.

Vercingetorix now resolved to dismiss his cavalry, before Cæsar had completed his lines. At their departure he enjoined them, "To repair to their respective states, and assemble all the men capable of bearing arms. He set forth the many services he had done them, and conjured them not to neglect his safety, or abandon to the cruelty of the enemy one who had deserved so well of the common liberty. He told them, that, if they were dilatory in the execution of his orders, 80,000 chosen men must perish with him: That he had scarce corn for thirty days, and that with the utmost œconomy it could not be made to last much longer." After giving these instructions, he sent them away silently about nine at night, on the side where the Roman line was not yet finished. He then distributed among his soldiers all the cattle in the place, but ordered the corn to be brought in to him, resolving to deliver it out sparingly and by measure. He entered the town with all his forces, and having prepared for an obstinate defence, waited for the expected succours.
his

Cæsar, informed of these dispositions by the prisoners and deserters, constructed his fortifications in the following manner : He first drew a perpendicular ditch twenty feet wide. All the other works he made four hundred feet farther from the town than that ditch. This he did to secure his workmen from the darts of the enemy by day, and his works from sudden and nocturnal sallies. Observing therefore the distance above-mentioned, he made two other ditches, each fifteen feet broad, and as many deep, and filled the innermost, which lay in a low and level ground, with water from the river. Behind these he raised a rampart twelve feet high, strengthened with a parapet and battlements ; and to prevent the enemy from getting over, a fraile ran along the foot of the parapet, made of long stakes, with branches cut into points, like the horns of a stag. On the whole work were placed turrets, eighty feet distant one from another.

But as the soldiers were employed to fetch provisions, bring materials, and work at the fortifications, which considerably lessened the number of troops left to defend them, and as the enemy sometimes sallied out to attack the lines, Cæsar judged it necessary to make the following addition to his works, that they might not require so many men to guard them. Between the first and second ditches that were nearest the town, he run a trench five feet deep, and fixed in it small trees and strong branches, the tops of which he had caused to be sharpened. He then filled the trench with earth, so that nothing appeared above ground but the sharp points of the branches, which must necessarily run into those who attempted to pass them : and as there were five rows of them, interwoven in a manner with each other, they could not be avoided. In the front of these he caused pits to be dug three feet deep, and something narrower at bottom than at top. In these pits he fixed strong stakes, about the thickness of a man's thigh, burnt and sharpened at the top, which rose only four inches above the level of the ground, into which they were planted three feet deeper than the pits, to keep them firm. The pits were covered with bushes to deceive the enemy. There were eight rows of them at the distance of three feet from each other, and disposed in the form of a Quincunx. The whole space between the pits and the advanced ditch was sowed with crows-feet, or Caltrops, of an extraordinary size.

These works compleated, he drew another line fourteen miles in compass, constructed in the same manner as the former, and carried through the most even places he could find, to serve as a barrier against the enemy without ; that if the Gauls should attack the camp, they might not be able to surround it with their troops, or charge with equal vigour in all parts. To prevent the danger his men might be exposed to, when in quest of provisions and forage, he laid in a sufficient store of both for thirty days.

Whilst these things passed before Alesia, a general council being held by the chiefs of the Gauls, it was not thought adviseable to assemble all that were able to bear arms, as Vercingetorix had desired; but to order each nation to furnish a contingent; lest so great a multitude should occasion a scarcity of provisions, and render the observance of military discipline impracticable. The Ædui, with their vassals the Segusii, Ambivareti, Aulerci Brannovices, and Branuari, were rated at thirty-five thousand men. A like number was demanded of the Arverni, in conjunction with their dependents the Cadurci, Gabali, and Velauni. The Senones, Sequani, Bituriges, Xantones, Rutbeni, and Carnutes, were ordered each to furnish twelve thousand; and Bellovaci, ten thousand; the Lemovices, the same number; the Piætones, Turoni, Parisii, Helvii, Suessiones, each eight thousand; the Ambiani, Mediomatrici, Petricorii, Nervii, Morini, Nitobrigi, Aulerci Cenomani, each five thousand; the Atrebatæ, four thousand; the Bellocazii, Lexovii, and Aulerci Eburvices, each three thousand; the Rauraci, and Boii, thirty thousand; the maritime and Armorican states, of which number were the Curioselites, Rhedones, Caletes, Osismii, Lemovices, Veneti, and Unelli, each six thousand. The Bellovaci alone refused to furnish the troops required, declaring that it was their design to wage an independent war with the Romans, without being subject to the command of any foreign General or state: However, at the request of Comius, they sent a body of two thousand men.

Comius, as has been before related, had been singularly faithful and serviceable to Cæsar in his Britannic expedition: In consideration of which, his countrymen had been exempted from tribute, restored to the full enjoyment of their laws and privileges, and had their territories enlarged by the addition of the country of the Morini. But such was the present zeal of the Gauls to vindicate their liberty, and recover their ancient military glory, that neither friendship nor benefits received had any influence on them, but all with one consent devoted themselves and their fortunes to the support of this war. They raised an army of two hundred and forty thousand foot, and eighty thousand horse, and the country of the Ædui was the place of general rendezvous. Four commanders in chief were appointed, Comius the Atrebatian, Viridumarus and Eporedorix, Æduans, and Virgafillaunus of Auvergne, cousin-german to Vercingetorix. To these were added a select number of men, chosen from among the several states, to serve as Counsellors to the Generals in the conduct of the war. The whole army advanced towards Alesia with great alacrity, confident that the Romans would not so much as sustain the sight of so vast a multitude, especially as they would be attacked by another numerous army from the town.

The troops shut up in Alesia, having consumed all their provisions, finding the day appointed for the arrival of succours expired, and knowing nothing of what was transacted among the Ædui, summoned a council of war to debate on what was requisite to be done in the present extremity. Various were the opinions proposed: some advised a surrendry; others were for falling forth, while yet their strength would permit, in order to break through the enemy, or die bravely in the field. Amongst the rest, Critognatus, a man of the first rank and authority in Auvergne, addressed the assembly in a speech, which, says Cæsar, deserves to be mentioned for its singular and detestable inhumanity. He said, “ I shall take little notice of the opinion of those, who, under the name of a surrendry, advise you to an ignominious servitude. Such should neither be esteemed Gauls, nor suffered to come into this assembly. Let me rather apply myself to them who approve of a general fall. In this proposal you seem to think there is something worthy of our ancient bravery. It is not courage that aspires such thoughts, but weakness and an effeminacy of mind, which render us unable to bear want for a few days. It is easier to find men who will voluntarily rush on death, than such as can patiently endure pain. I should not however be against this proposal, which has something generous in it, if only our own lives were at stake. But on our present determination depends the fate of all Gaul, which we have stirred up to our assistance. How would it dishearten our relations and friends to see eighty thousand of their countrymen slaughtered in one place, and be obliged to fight in the midst of their dead bodies! Deprive not then of your assistance those, who, to save you, have exposed themselves to the greatest dangers; nor, through folly and rashness, or imbecillity of mind, destroy at once the expectations of Gaul, and condemn her to perpetual servitude. If the expected succours are not arrived exactly at the appointed time, ought you therefore to suspect the fidelity and constancy of your countrymen? Can you think that it is for amusement only that the Romans labour on those lines towards the country? Though you hear not from your friends, because all communication is interrupted, yet you may learn their approach from your enemies, who, through fear of them, work day and night on those fortifications. What then do I propose? What, but to do as our ancestors did in the war with the Teutones and Cimbri; a war much less important than the present? Compelled to shut themselves up in their towns, and reduced to a distress equal to what we now suffer, rather than surrender to their enemies, they fed upon the bodies of those whom age had rendered useless in war. Had we no such precedent to follow, yet still I should esteem it glorious, in the noble cause of liberty, to give one to posterity. The Cimbri, after spreading desolation over the country, at length withdrew their forces, and repaired to other regions; leaving us in the full enjoyment of our lands, laws, and liberties. But the Romans, envying a people so renowned and powerful in war, aim at nothing less than to take possession of our cities and territories, and reduce us to perpetual servitude. This has ever been the object of “ their

“ their wars. If you are unacquainted with what passes in distant countries, “ cast your eyes upon the adjoining Gaul, which, reduced into the form of “ a Province, deprived of its laws and privileges, and subjected to the arbi“ trary sway of Rome, groans under the yoke of endless slavery.” When all had delivered their opinions, it was resolved, that such as were unfit for war should be obliged to quit the town, and every expedient be tried, rather than agree to the proposal of Critognatus: but if relief were long deferred, and necessity urged, they determined to submit to his advice, rather than consent to a surrendry. The Mandubii, natives of the town, were ordered to leave it with their wives and children. When they came to the Roman lines, they with tears petitioned to be received as slaves, and to be saved from perishing by famine: but Cæsar having planted guards along the rampart, refused to admit them into his camp.

At length Comius and the other Generals of the Gauls appeared with their army before Alesia, and encamped on a hill not above five hundred paces from the Roman lines. The next day they drew out their cavalry, and covered the whole plain under the hill: the infantry were stationed at some distance on the heights. Great was the joy of the besieged at this sight; they immediately came forth with all their forces, posted themselves before the town, and having filled up the nearest ditch with earth and fascines, prepared for a vigorous attack.

Cæsar, having disposed his troops along both his lines, ordered the cavalry to march out and charge the enemy. The Gauls had interspersed among their horse some archers and light-armed troops, to sustain them, and check the impetuosity of the Roman cavalry. Many of these being wounded at the first onset, were obliged to quit the battle. The Gauls seeing they had the advantage, and that the Romans were hard pressed by numbers, set up a general shout, both within and without the place, to give new life to their troops. As the action passed in view of both armies, the desire of applause and fear of ignominy spurred on both parties to exert their utmost bravery. After a conflict that lasted from noon till near sun-set, victory still continuing doubtful, the Germans in close order charged furiously the Gauls upon one side, and routed them. Their flight leaving the archers exposed, they were all surrounded and cut to pieces.
 The success was equal in other parts of the field, where the Romans, pursuing the runaways to their camp, gave them no time to rally. The troops on the side of the town, despairing of victory, retired disconsolate within the walls.

After the interval of a day, which was spent in providing a great number of fascines, scaling-ladders, and iron hooks, the Gauls issued out of their camp about midnight, and approaching the Roman lines, set up a shout, to give notice to the besieged of their arrival, threw the fascines into the ditch, and endeavoured by a discharge of stones, darts, and arrows, to drive the Romans from the rampart. At the same time Vercingetorix gave the signal, and led forth his men to the attack. While the Gauls kept at a distance from the Roman lines, they did great execution by the multitude of their darts; but in proportion as they advanced, they either entangled themselves among the Caltrops, or tumbling into the pits, were wounded by the pointed stakes, or were pierced by the darts discharged from the towers and rampart. Finding, when day appeared, that they had not forced any post in the lines, and fearing to be taken in flank by some troops that were falling from the redoubts on the eminence, they retreated to their camp. The besieged, on their side, after much time spent in making preparations for the assault, and filling up the advanced ditch, seeing their countrymen were retired, before they could so much as approach the works, returned into the town without effecting any thing.

The Gauls, thus twice repulsed with great loss, thought it proper to change the plan of their attack. North of the town was a hill of too great compass to be taken into the Roman lines, and Cæsar had been obliged to place a camp on the ascent, in a disadvantageous situation, as it was commanded by the summit. C. Antistius Reginus and C. Caninius Rebilus guarded this quarter with two legions. The Gallic Generals, informed by their scouts of the situation of this camp, resolved to form the attack on that side. Having concerted their plan, they selected fifty-five thousand of their best men, and assigned the command of them to Vergasillaunus of Auvergne, with directions to begin the assault at noon. This General, marching out in the evening, arrived before day-break at the back of the hill on which the Roman camp above-mentioned was situated. There lying concealed, he ordered his troops to take refreshment. About noon he approached the quarters of the two legions. At the same time the Gallic cavalry advanced into the plain, and the rest of the army drew out before their camp. Vercingetorix, observing these motions, led forth his troops from Alesia, carrying with him fascines, covered galleries, long poles, hooks, and other instruments prepared to force the lines. The fight began on all sides at once, and was maintained by the Gauls with great ardour. The Romans, having such extensive works to guard, scarcely sufficed for the defence of them all. What greatly contributed to disturb them was the cries of the combatants behind, which informed them that their safety depended on the valour of others.

The chief stress of the battle lay at the higher fortifications, where Vergasillaunus charged with his forces. The eminence which commanded the declivity of the hill gave his men great advantage. Some threw darts, others advanced under cover of their shields formed into a tortoise, fresh troops continually succeeded in the room of the fatigued. The earth they threw up against the lines not only enabled them to mount the rampart, but filled the pits and ditches, and frustrated the design of the works made in the ground. The Romans, thus continually pressed, had neither strength nor weapons left to make resistance.
of

Cæsar, who had chosen a post from whence he could see all that passed, observing the danger his men were in on that side, sent Labienus with six cohorts to their assistance; ordering him, if he was not able to defend the works, to draw off the troops, and sally out upon the enemy; yet this only in case of extremity. He went in person to the rest of his men, and exhorted them to bear up courageously under the present fatigue, representing that the fruit of all their former victories depended upon the issue of that critical moment.

The Gauls under the command of Vercingetorix, despairing to force the intrenchments in the plain, on account of the great strength of the works, attacked them in the higher and uneven ground, whither they brought all the instruments for the assault. They soon drove the Romans from the towers by a discharge of darts, filled up the ditches and pits with earth and fascines, and began to pull down the rampart and breast-work with their hooks.

Cæsar first sent young Brutus, with six cohorts, to the aid of his men; after him, C. Fabius, with seven more; and, as the contest grew warmer, led in person fresh troops to their assistance. Having restored the battle, and forced the enemy to retire, he hastened to the side where Labienus was engaged. He drew four cohorts from the nearest fort, ordered part of the cavalry to follow him, and commanded the rest to take a circuit round the outward works, and fall upon the enemy's rear. Labienus, finding that neither the rampart nor ditch were sufficient to stop the progress of the Gauls, drew together about thirty-nine cohorts from the nearest forts, and sent to inform Cæsar of his design to sally out upon the enemy. Cæsar immediately quickened his march, that he might be present at the action.

His arrival being known from the colour of his garments, by which he used to distinguish himself in a day of battle, and the troops and cohorts he had ordered to follow him appearing, the fight was renewed. The Gauls raised on all sides a mighty shout, which, being returned from the rampart, was carried quite round the lines. The Romans having cast their darts, fell furiously upon the enemy sword in hand. At the same time the cavalry appeared unexpectedly in their rear; fresh cohorts flocked continually to the assistance of those already engaged; the Gauls, unable to sustain the violent shock, took to flight, and being met by the Roman cavalry, a dreadful slaughter ensued. Sedulius, chief and general of the Lemovices, was slain upon the field of battle; Vergasillaunus of Auvergne was made prisoner in the pursuit; seventy-four colours were taken; and, of so numerous an army, very few regained their camp. The rout and slaughter being observed from the town, the besieged, on their side despairing of success, drew off their troops from the attack. The rest of the Gauls instantly abandoned their camp; and had not the Romans been exhausted by the continual fatigue of the day, the whole Gallic army might have been destroyed. However, about midnight, Cæsar detached the cavalry to pursue them, who falling in with their rear, slew and took great numbers. The rest fled to their several cities.
the

The next day, Vercingetorix, assembling a council, represented to the besieged; "That he had undertaken that war, not from a motive of private interest, but to recover the common liberty of Gaul; and that, since there was a necessity of yielding to fortune, he was willing to become a victim for their safety, whether they should think proper to appease the anger of the conqueror by his death, or to deliver him up alive."

Deputies were immediately sent to Cæsar to receive his commands. He ordered them to surrender their arms, and deliver up all their chiefs. Having seated himself at the head of his lines, their leaders were brought before him, and Vercingetorix was delivered up, together with their arms. Cæsar, reserving the Ædui and the Arverni, as a means to recover those two nations, divided among his soldiers the rest of the prisoners.

These affairs dispatched, he marched into the territories of the Ædui, and received the submission of their state. There he was addressed by the Ambassadors of the Arverni, who promised an entire obedience to his commands. Having exacted a great number of hostages, and restored to those two states twenty thousand captives, he sent his legions into different parts of Gaul to keep the country in subjection. T. Labienus, with two legions and the cavalry, was quartered among the Sequani, jointly with M. Sempronius Rutilus. C. Fabius and L. Minutius Basilus were ordered with two legions into the country of the Rhemi, to defend it against the attempts of the Bellovaci, their neighbours. C. Antistius Reginus had his station assigned him among the Ambivareti; T. Sextius among the Bituriges; and C. Caninius Rebilus among the Rutbeni; each with one legion. Q. Tullius Cicero and P. Sulpicius were placed at Cabillo and Matisco upon the Arar in the country of the Ædui, and were charged with the care of the provisions. He himself took up his winter-quarters at Bibracte.

Thus ended this memorable campaign, in which Cæsar gave those proofs of military skill and valour which have been the object of the admiration of the greatest Generals in all ages. Having sent an account of his victory to the Roman Senate, they decreed a Thanksgiving of twenty days.

The unsuccessful event of this campaign had convinced the Gauls, that they were not able to resist the Romans by any army they could bring together into one place; but they persuaded themselves, that if many states revolted at once, and set on foot many separate wars, the Romans would have neither time nor troops sufficient to oppose them all.

And though some of those states must be sufferers, yet that misfortune, they thought, should be borne with, since their particular loss would purchase the liberty of the rest. Many states therefore agreed to this plan, and began to make preparations for renewing the war. To disappoint their views, Cæsar judged it necessary to use the utmost expedition. Leaving M. Antony, the Quæstor, to command in his winter-quarters, he set out on the last of December from Bibraëte with his cavalry, and went to the camp of the thirteenth legion, which he had placed among the Bituriges, not far from the territories of the Ædui. To these he joined the eleventh legion, whose quarters lay nearest; and, leaving two cohorts to guard the baggage, marched with the rest of the army into the most fertile parts of the country of the Bituriges. By this sudden and unexpected arrival he found them unprepared, and dispersed up and down in the fields. He forbade setting fire to the houses, the usual sign of an invasion, that he might neither alarm the enemy nor expose himself to the want of corn and forage, if it should be necessary to advance far into the country. Many thousands of the Bituriges were made prisoners, surprized by the Roman cavalry before they could retreat into their towns. Such as escaped fled in great terror to the neighbouring states. But Cæsar pursued them with great expedition, and those states, anxious for their own safety, submitted, gave hostages, and were received into his protection. The Bituriges, seeing that his clemency left the way still open to his friendship, followed their example, and were pardoned. Cæsar, to recompence the fatigue and labour of his soldiers, gave two hundred sesterces to every private man, and two thousand to every Centurion; and, having sent back the legions to their winter-quarters, returned again to Bibraëte, after an absence of forty-days. He had not been there above eighteen days, when Ambassadors arrived from the Bituriges to implore his assistance against the Carnutes, who were laying waste their country. Cæsar set out to their relief with the sixth and fourteenth legions, which had not been engaged in the last expedition. The Carnutes, hearing of his approach, abandoned their towns and villages, consisting then mostly of little cottages, ran up in haste to defend them from the cold, and fled different ways. Cæsar, thinking it sufficient, in that severe season of the year, to have dispersed the forces that began to assemble, and prevented their rekindling the war, encamped at Genabum during the remaining part of the winter.

A new and more difficult war gave him more serious employment in the beginning of the spring. The Rhemi, by frequent embassies, informed him, that the Bellovaci, the most distinguished for bravery of all the Belgic or Gallic nations, with some of the neighbouring states, under the conduct of Correus, General of the Bellovaci, and Comius the Atrebatian, were raising an army, and drawing their forces to a general rendezvous, with design to invade the territories of the Suessiones, a people subject to the jurisdiction of the Rhemi. Honour and interest required of him to undertake the defence of allies, who had deserved so well of the Commonwealth. He marched therefore immediately, with four legions, into the country of the Bellovaci, which he found abandoned by its inhabitants. The few prisoners his cavalry made had been left as spies. These informed him, “ That all those capable of bearing arms had assembled in “ one place, and been joined by the Ambiani, Aulerci, Caletes, Vellocassi,

* For what passed at Rome this year, see p. 549.

 “ and Arrebates; that they had chosen for their camp a rising ground, “ surrounded with a difficult morass, and disposed of their baggage in “ woods that lay behind them; that many of their chiefs were in the “ army, but the principal authority rested in Correus, because he was “ known to bear an implacable hatred to the Roman name; that a few “ days before, Comius had left the camp to solicit aid of the Germans, “ who were their nearest neighbours, and abounded in troops; that it “ had been resolved among the Bellovaci, with consent of all the chiefs,
 “ and at the earnest desire of the people, to offer battle to Cæsar, if,
 “ as was reported, he came at the head of only three legions, lest they “ should be afterwards obliged to fight upon more unequal terms, when “ he had got his whole army together; but, if he brought greater forces “ with him, to continue within their camp, intercept his convoys, and cut “ off his forage, which in that season of the year was extremely scarce.”

In consequence of this information, Cæsar resolved to try every method to draw the enemy into a contempt of his numbers, and thereby induce them to hazard a battle. He had with him the seventh, eighth, and ninth legions, all veterans of approved valour; and though the eleventh, which he had also drawn out of its winter-quarters, was not of equal standing, nor had attained the same reputation of bravery, they were yet chosen men, of great hopes, and had served under him eight campaigns. Calling therefore the army together, he laid before them the advices he had received, and exhorted the soldiers to behave themselves with their usual courage. He arrived before the enemy's camp much sooner than they expected, and, as he approached, disposed the legions in the following order. The seventh, eighth, and ninth legions marched in front, the baggage followed, and the eleventh legion formed the rear. Thus there appeared in view no more than three legions, the number the Gauls had determined to encounter. But, when they saw the Romans advancing against them with a steady pace, they did not think it proper to follow the resolution which had been reported to Cæsar; and either fearing the event of a battle, or surprized at his sudden approach, or desirous to penetrate further into his intentions, they would not descend from the higher ground, but drew up in arms before their camp. Cæsar, though earnest to come to an engagement, yet, considering the multitude of the enemy, and the advantage of their situation, contented himself for the present to encamp directly over-against them, being separated from them by a deep but narrow valley. He threw up before his camp a rampart twelve feet high, strengthened

strengthened by a proportionable breast-work, and secured it by two ditches, each fifteen feet wide, with perpendicular sides. Upon the rampart he raised, at small distances, turrets of three stories, and joined them to each other by galleries, which had little parapets of osier before them. Thus the works were defended by a double range of soldiers; one of which fighting from the galleries, and secured by their height, would with more boldness and advantage launch their darts against the enemy; the other, though nearer danger, and placed upon the rampart, were yet screened by the galleries from the impending darts. All the entrances of the camp were secured by strong gates, over which he placed turrets of a greater height than the rest.

Cæsar had a twofold design in these fortifications; one, by the greatness of the works to make the enemy believe he was afraid of them, and thereby increase their presumption; the other, to enable him to defend his camp with a few troops, when it should be necessary to go far in quest of corn and forage. There happened frequent skirmishes between the two camps, carried on for the most part with missive weapons at a distance, by reason of a morass that separated the combatants. Sometimes the auxiliary Gauls and Germans in the Roman army crossed the morass and pursued the enemy; sometimes the Bellovaci, having the advantage, passed in their turn and drove back the Roman auxiliaries. And as the Romans daily sent out parties to forage, who were obliged to disperse themselves over the country, their men were sometimes surprized and cut to pieces by the detachments of the enemy. In one of these encounters, the Rbemi, auxiliaries in Cæsar's army, lost a great part of their cavalry. The Bellovaci, having observed the daily stations of the horse destined to guard the Roman foragers, placed a chosen body of foot in ambush in a wood, and sent some squadrons of cavalry to draw the enemy into the snare. The cavalry of the Rbemi, upon guard that day, suddenly discovering the Gallic horse, and despising their small numbers, attacked and pursued them with such eagerness, that, being surprized and almost surrounded by the foot, they fled with precipitation, lost many of their men, and, among the rest, their commander Vertiscus, the chief man of their state. This General, though so far advanced in years that he could hardly sit on horseback, yet, according to the custom of the Gauls, would neither decline the command on account of his age, nor suffer his people to fight without him.

Cæsar, finding that the enemy kept within their camp, and considering that he could neither force their entrenchments without great loss, nor with so small an army inclose them within lines, wrote to C. Trebonius to join him with three legions. Upon their arrival, the Generals of the Bellovaci, fearing a siege like that of Alesia, ordered all those who were weak, and less fit for service, to be sent away by night, and with them the baggage of the army. But, before this confused and numerous train could be put in order, day-light appeared; and the Gauls, to hinder the the Romans from disturbing the march, drew up in arms before their camp. Cæsar did not think it proper to attack them in so advantageous a post, nor was he willing to let them retire without loss. To be in readiness for the pursuit, he passed the morass with his legions, and seized an eminence which commanded the enemy's camp, and was separated from it only by a small valley. The Gauls, confiding in the strength of their post, did not decline fighting, if they were attacked, and both armies remained in order of battle the whole day. At night the Bellovaci, seeing the Romans prepared for the pursuit, made use of the following stratagem to secure their own retreat. Having collected and placed at the head of their line all the falcines in the camp, they set fire to them at once, and, being concealed by the smoke, marched off with the utmost diligence to another advantageous post ten miles distant. Cæsar, though he suspected that this was a contrivance to cover their flight, yet fearing also an ambuscade, and that they might possibly continue in the same post, to draw his men into a place of disadvantage, followed but slowly with his army, and suffered the enemy to escape.

The Bellovaci from their new camp carried on the same defensive war; and in frequent ambuscades attacked and cut to pieces the Roman foragers. Cæsar, having suffered many losses of this kind, was at last informed by a prisoner, that Correus, General of the Bellovaci, had chosen six thousand of his best infantry, and a thousand horse, to form an ambuscade in a place abounding in corn and grass, and where it was therefore presumed the Romans would come to forage. Upon this intelligence he sent the cavalry, who formed the ordinary guard of the foragers, before, intermixed them with platoons of light-armed foot, and he himself followed with some legions to support them. The Gauls had disposed their forces in ambush round the plain where the Romans were to forage, which extended a mile every way, and was environed with thick woods or a deep river. The Roman cavalry entered the plain, troop by troop, with great resolution, knowing that the legions were behind to sustain them. Correus immediately appeared, but with a few men, and fell upon the nearest squadrons. The Romans, prepared for the attack, did not flock together in crowds, which frequently happens among the cavalry on occasions of sudden surprize, and often throws them into confusion; but, preserving the proper distances, received the enemy in good order; not did they suffer themselves to be taken in flank. The rest of the Gallic cavalry then broke from the woods, and advanced to the aid of those who fought under Correus. The contest was maintained with great heat and equal advantage, till the infantry of the Gauls, advancing slowly in order of battle, obliged the Romans to give way; but their light-armed infantry, marching up speedily, and posting themselves in the intervals of the squadrons, restored and continued the fight. Soon after, both sides had notice that Cæsar was approaching with his forces in order of battle. The Roman cavalry then redoubled their efforts, lest the legions should share with them the honour of the victory. The enemy, on the other hand, lost courage, and fled different ways: But, being obstructed by the same difficulties of the ground in which they hoped to have entangled the Romans, the greatest part of them were put to the sword. Correus, whose resolution no misfortune could abate, would neither quit the field nor accept of quarter; but, fighting to the last with invincible courage, and wounding several of his enemies, forced them at length to transfix him with their javelins.
the

The Bellovaci, and the other states in their alliance, finding that their General was slain, their cavalry and the flower of their infantry destroyed, and dreading the approach of the Roman army, speedily assembled a council, in which it was resolved, by common consent, to send Ambassadors and hostages to Cæsar. Comius alone refused to join in the treaty, from a distrust of the Romans, who had attempted the year before, by the order of Labienus, to assassinate him treacherously at an interview with Volusenus Quadratus, where he was grievously wounded by a Roman Centurion.

Cæsar granted peace to the Bellovaci and their allies, and, having thus subdued the most warlike nations of Gaul, he divided his troops into several bodies, under the command of his Lieutenants, and sent them into different parts, to keep the whole country in subjection. He himself marched into the territories of the Eburones, with a view to get Ambiorix into his power. But the Gaul flying before him, Cæsar destroyed the country with fire and sword, killing or taking prisoners great numbers of the inhabitants, that he might render Ambiorix odious to his people, as the cause of so great a calamity, and preclude his being again received into the state. He then dispatched Labienus, with two legions, against the Treviri, who bordering upon Germany, and being exercised in continual wars with that nation, differed but little from them in barbarity and fierceness; nor ever submitted to his commands, unless enforced by the presence of an army. Leaving M. Antony, with fifteen cohorts, in the country of the Bellovaci, to prevent any new insurrection among the Belgæ, he marched into the country of the Carnutes. They had been lately reduced by his Lieutenant Fabius, who had defeated Dumnacus, the General of the Gauls in those parts, destroyed or dispersed his army, and expelled him out of that and the neighbouring countries. Cæsar pardoned the Carnutes, on their delivering up Gutervaulus, the prime mover and incendiary of the war. This man had hid himself, even from his countrymen; but, being diligently sought after by the people, desirous to appease Cæsar's resentment, they soon found him, and brought him to the camp, where he was beaten with rods and beheaded.

Caninius, one of Cæsar's Lieutenants, had defeated the Cadurci in battle, under their Generals Drapes and Luterius, and was besieging Uxellodunum, a strong fortress in that country. Thither Cæsar repaired, and found the circumvallation completed. Many reasons determined him to continue the siege. He could not raise it without dishonour; the obstinacy of the garrison, which consisted of only two thousand men, deserved exemplary punishment; and, if the place were not reduced, the Gauls might imagine that not strength but constancy had been wanting to enable them to resist the Roman arms; a persuasion which might perhaps induce other states, who had the advantage of strong towns, to endeavour again to assert their liberty; especially as it was generally known that only one year of his government remained, during which if they could but hold out, they had no farther danger to apprehend. Cæsar, understanding from the deserters that the besieged were well stored with provisions, determined, if possible, to deprive them of water.

Uxellodunum stood upon a steep rock, which was almost surrounded by a river, where the townsmen used to water. There was no possible way to turn the course of this river, because it flowed so near the foot of the rock, and in so low a channel, that ditches could not be sunk deep enough to receive it. But the descent to it from the town was so difficult and steep, and lay so open, that the people, in coming to it, could be easily annoyed by the Romans. Cæsar, taking advantage of this circumstance, posted archers and slingers, with some engines, over-against all the places of access. This forced the townsmen to water at a fountain which issued close under the walls, on the side where the town was not surrounded by the river. To deprive them of this resource, Cæsar undertook to raise a terrace over-against the fountain, which could not be performed without incredible fatigue, almost continual fighting, and much danger to the soldiers; for they were exposed to the assaults of the enemy, who fought in safety, at a distance, and from the higher ground. A terrace notwithstanding was raised, sixty feet high, and a tower of ten stories placed upon it; not indeed equal to the height of the walls, for which no works were sufficient, but to command the fountain. From this tower the Romans continually played their engines upon all the accesses to the spring, which made it extremely dangerous to water there; insomuch that not only cattle and beasts of burthen, but great numbers of people, perished by thirst.

The besieged were not dismayed by this distress. They filled many barrels with tallow, pitch, and dry wood, and, having set them on fire, rolled them down upon their works; and at the same time charged the Romans with great fury. The machines soon were on fire: But Cæsar, to give his men time to extinguish it, and to draw off the enemy, ordered some troops to ascend the hill on all sides, and raise a great shout, as if preparing to scale the walls. This alarming the inhabitants, they recalled their men to the defence of the town; and the Romans, being relieved from the attack, soon put a stop to the flames. The place continued to hold out with great obstinacy, till Cæsar contrived to drain the fountain by mines. When the besieged saw it suddenly become dry, they imagined it an event brought about not by human wisdom but by the will of the Gods; and therefore, despairing of success, they immediately surrendered themselves.
the

Cæsar, satisfied that his clemency was known to all, and no way fearing that his severity on this occasion would be imputed to cruelty; as he perceived there would be no end of the war, if other states of Gaul should in like manner revolt; resolved, by a signal example of punishment, to deter them from such projects. He ordered the hands of all those whom he found in arms to be cut off; granting them their lives, that their punishment might be the more conspicuous. Drapes, who had been made prisoner by Caninius, either out of indignation for his captivity, or dreading a severer fate, put an end to his life by abstaining from food. Luterius, who had escaped out of the battle when Drapes was taken prisoner, falling into the hands of Eparnaëtus of Auvergne, a faithful friend to the Romans, was by him delivered bound to Cæsar.

About this time Labienus sent intelligence that he had engaged the cavalry of the Treviri with success, killed a great number on the field of battle, with many Germans who had joined them, and made prisoners the greatest part of their chiefs; amongst the rest Surus the Æduan, a man of distinguished birth and valour, and the only one of that nation who had till then continued in arms. Thus the whole country being pacified, Cæsar marched with two legions into Aquitain, which P. Crassus had in a great measure reduced to his obedience. On his arrival, the states sent Ambassadors to him, and delivered hostages. At Narbonne he ordered his army into winter-quarters, under the command of his Lieutenants. M. Antony, C. Trebonius, P. Vatinius, and Q. Tullius, were quartered in Belgium with four legions; two were sent into the country of the Ædui; two into that of the Turones, bordering upon the Carnutes, to hold the maritime states in awe; and the remaining two were stationed amongst the Lemovices, not far from Auvergne. He held at Narbonne the usual assemblies of the province, decided the differences subsisting among the states, recompensed those who had distinguished themselves by their fidelity and services, and, after dispatching all those affairs, repaired to the legions in Belgium, and took up his winter-quarters at Nemetocenna *.

* Arras.

Here he found all quiet; even Comius, that bitter enemy to the Romans, had been received into friendship. This Atrebatian General, who had headed the armies of the Bellovaci, retired to his German allies, when matters were compounded with Cæsar, but always kept a watchful eye upon the motions of his countrymen, that, in case of a war, he might be ready to offer them his counsel and assistance. Finding that the state now submitted quietly to the Romans, he employed the troops that remained with him to support himself and his followers by plunder, and frequently carried off the convoys that were going to the Roman winter-quarters. M. Antony sent against him C. Volusenus Quadratus, an officer of distinguished valour; the man who, by the order of Labienus, had lately attempted.

attempted to kill him at an interview, and who still preserved a particular hatred to him. These two mortal enemies soon met in battle: Volusenus, after a successful engagement, urged by an eager desire of making Comius prisoner, rashly pursued him with only a few attendants. The Gaul, by a precipitate flight, drew the Roman a considerable way from the main body of his army; then, turning to his own men, he called upon them to revenge the wound he had so treacherously received. They instantly faced about, charged their pursuers, and repulsed them. Comius, clapping spurs to his horse, ran furiously against Volusenus, and drove his spear through his thigh. The Romans, seeing their Commander dangerously wounded, fought with redoubled fury, and put the enemy to flight a second time, with considerable slaughter. Comius escaped by the swiftness of his horse; but, as he had lost the greatest part of his men, he sent a deputation to Antony, offering to retire wherever he should order him, to submit to any terms that should be imposed on him, and to give hostages for his good behaviour; requesting only that so much regard might be had to his fears, as that he should not be obliged to appear in the presence of any Roman. Antony, before the arrival of Cæsar, consented, took hostages, and granted him peace.

This campaign effectually completed the reduction of Gaul and put an end to the Gallic war, in the course of which it is said that Cæsar either took by force eight hundred towns, or made them yield to the terror of his arms; that he subdued three hundred different nations; that he defeated in battle three millions of men, of which more than one million were killed in the field, and another million made prisoners^c.

[Year of Rome 703^d.]

The ninth and last year of his government was quite pacific. In his winter-quarters at Nemetocenna in Belgium, and in the following year, he made it his business to ingratiate himself with the Gauls, and deprive them of all pretence for a revolt. He treated the several states with respect, imposed no new burthens upon them, and was extremely liberal to their chiefs. By these means he prevailed with them, wearied and exhausted by long and unsuccessful wars, to embrace the ease and quiet, attendant on their present submission. Thus he had leisure, in this last year, to fix his attention on Rome, where a contest for and against him was carried on with great vehemence; a contest which ended in that memorable civil war, that changed the form of the Roman government into Monarchic Despotism.

^c Plut. in Cæf. Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 25.

^d For the transactions at Rome in this year, 703, see p. 566.

The END of the THIRD VOLUME.

1501/170.

THE ROMAN HISTORY,

FROM THE Building of Rome to the Ruin
of the Commonwealth.

Illustrated with MAPS and other Plates.

VOL. IV.

By N. HOOKE, Esq;

L O N D O N :

Printed for G. HAWKINS, W. STRAHAN, J. and F.
RIVINGTON, W. JOHNSTON, T. LONGMAN,
T. CADELL, and R. BALDWIN.

MDCCLXXI.

T H E

Roman History.

T E N T H B O O K.

From the end of the Year 703, when the Civil War broke out between POMPEY and CÆSAR, to the Second Triumvirate, or the League which was formed between LEPIDUS, ANTONY, and OCTAVIUS, in the Year 710.

C H A P. I.

A Brief relation of the rise and progress of the contest between POMPEY and CÆSAR. Page 1

C H A P. II.

CÆSAR is ordered by a decree of the Senate to disband his army, and, in case of refusal, is declared a public enemy. The Consuls and other Magistrates are vested with extraordinary powers. CÆSAR passes the Rubicon with one legion, and in two months time makes himself master of all Italy. 18

C H A P. III.

CÆSAR, after settling every thing in the South of Italy, and taking measures to secure Sicily and Sardinia, sets out for Rome. In his way he has a conference with CICERO, who soon after retires to POMPEY's camp. At Rome he seizes the public treasure, and, finding the Senate unwilling to assist any part, he takes upon himself the public administration. After a stay of six or seven days, he sets out for Spain. 53

CHAP. IV.

The reduction of Sardinia by VALERIUS, of Sicily by CURIO, and of Spain by CÆSAR. 71

CHAP. V.

The siege of Marseilles. CAIUS ANTONIUS and DOLABELLA, CÆSAR's Lieutenants in Illyricum, are defeated by M. OCTAVIUS and SCRIBONIUS LIBO. CURIO's unfortunate expedition into Africa. 90

CHAP. VI.

CÆSAR is created Dictator: He returns to Rome, where he holds the assembly for the election of Magistrates, and settles the affairs of the city. He follows POMPEY into Greece. The disturbances raised by COELIUS and MILO are quieted. The famous campaign between CÆSAR and POMPEY before Dyrrhachium and in Thessaly. The battle of Pharsalia. POMPEY's flight and death. The dispersion of his followers. 104

CHAP. VII.

CÆSAR follows POMPEY into Egypt. The Alexandrian war. The war against PHARNACES. Illyricum saved by VATINIUS. CÆSAR returns to Italy. CICERO's disquietudes at Brundisium during CÆSAR's absence. CÆSAR puts an end to the disturbances raised by DOLABELLA in the city: He quells a mutiny in his army, and sets out for Africa. 149.

CHAP. VIII.

The war of CÆSAR in Africa against SCIPIO, CATO, and JUBA. 171.

CHAP. IX.

CÆSAR returns to Rome: The honours decreed him: His four triumphs: His civil administration and clemency. 190

CHAP. X.

CÆSAR's war in Spain against POMPEY's sons. The honours decreed him by the Senate. His triumph, and those of his two Lieutenants Q. FABIUS and Q. PEDRUS. CICERO's grief for the death of his daughter TULLIA. His writings during his retreat at this time. 210.

CHAP.

Book XI. CONTENTS.

v

CHAP. XI.

CÆSAR's grand designs for the good of the Roman empire. His death and character. 238

CHAP. XII.

The general consternation of the Senate, Consul, and People, upon the death of CÆSAR. The treaty between ANTONY and the conspirators. ANTONY's artful management. The conspirators are obliged to leave Rome. ANTONY gathers an army about him, and disposes of every thing according to his pleasure. SEXTUS POMPEY makes his peace by the mediation of LEPIDUS, and is declared Admiral of the Republic. OCTAVIUS appears upon the stage: Is thwarted by ANTONY in every thing: Raises an army to make good his claim: Courts the Senate and ANTONY's enemies, whom he protects. ANTONY sets out from Rome to take possession of Cisalpine Gaul, and besieges D. BRUTUS in Mutina. He is followed by young OCTAVIUS, who, at CICERO's motion, is authorised by the Senate to raise troops and make war against ANTONY. 257

CHAP. XIII.

The Senate sends an embassy to ANTONY with peremptory orders to raise the siege of Mutina: And HIRTIUS marches at the head of an army to join OCTAVIUS. ANTONY refuses to comply with the orders of the Senate, and his proposals are reciprocally rejected: It is voted that there is a tumult; that ANTONY is an adversary; and that the town shall take the Sagum. M. BRUTUS's success in Macedonia: TREBONIUS surprised and killed by DOLABELLA in Asia, who is voted an enemy by the Senate. CASSIUS makes himself master of Syria, and all the forces in the East. LEPIDUS exhorts the Senate to pacific measures; and ANTONY endeavours to draw off the Consuls and OCTAVIUS from the interest of CICERO and his party without effect. Two successive battles in which ANTONY is defeated and both the Consuls lose their lives. 287

CHAP. XIV.

The Senate decrees honours to the two deceased Consuls, and to D. BRUTUS and OCTAVIUS. ANTONY is not pursued; OCTAVIUS wanting the will, and BRUTUS the means of following him. He is received by LEPIDUS, who writes to the Senate to justify his behaviour: On the other side D. BRUTUS joins PLANCUS, Governor of farther Gaul. LEPIDUS is declared, by the influence of CICERO, an enemy to the State. OCTAVIUS treats secretly with ANTONY and LEPIDUS, and demands the consulship by a depudeputation of his officers. CICERO appears no more upon the stage of action: His correspondence with the several Generals abroad. 305

CHAP. XV.

*OCTAVIUS is chosen Consul with PEDIUS, his coheir to CÆSAR. POL-LIO and PLANCUS join ANTONY and LEPIDUS. D. BRUTUS is killed in his flight. The conspirators are impeached in form, and condemned at Rome.
The law against DOLABELLA is repealed: His end. OCTAVIUS joins ANTONY and LEPIDUS; and settles with them the plan of a triple league.
They enter Rome; are chosen Reformers of the State under the name of TRIUMVIRI, for five years. They publish an edict of proscription. The death of CICERO.* 351

ELEVENTH BOOK.

*From the Establishment of the Second Triumvirate
to the Settlement of the Empire on OCTAVIUS.*

CHAP. I.

*BRUTUS and CASSIUS reduce the Lycians and Rhodians, and march their armies into Macedonia. ANTONY and OCTAVIUS carry over their legions into the same province. The first battle of Philippi and the death of CASSIUS. The second battle of Philippi and the death of BRUTUS.
The Triumvirs make a new division of the empire.* 368

CHAP. II.

ANTONY's progress through Greece and Asia. CLEOPATRA's magnificence. She obtains of ANTONY all her requests, and is followed by him into Egypt. OCTAVIUS's behaviour in Italy: He is crossed in his operations by FULVIA and L. ANTONIUS, who raise a civil commotion. He forces L. ANTONIUS to surrender himself at discretion in Perugia, and his enemies to leave Italy. 374

CHAP. III.

ANTONY carries over his troops into Italy, and is joined in his passage by DOMITIUS with his fleet. SEXTUS POMPEY, courted by OCTAVIUS, offers his
his

his assistance to ANTONY. The differences of the two Triumvirs are composed by their common friends, and ANTONY marries OCTAVIA. An agreement is made with POMPEY. A new division is made of the empire. VENTIDIUS's exploits against the Parthians. 382

CHAP. IV.

The renewal of the war between the Triumvirs and SEXTUS POMPEY. OCTAVIUS's preparations. His bad success in several naval engagements. He at last destroys SEXTUS's fleet, and obliges him to quit Sicily. He dispossesses LEPIDUS of his army and the triumviral power, and applies himself to gain the affections of all orders of men. 386

CHAP. V.

ANTONY's behaviour in the East: His inglorious expedition against the Parthians, and SEXTUS POMPEY's behaviour in Asia, and his death. 400

CHAP. VI.

ANTONY makes himself master of Armenia and puts the King in chains. His alliance with the King of the Medes. His extravagant deportment at Alexandria. He refuses to receive OCTAVIA, and orders her back to Rome. AGRIPPA's edileship. 415

CHAP. VII.

The rupture between ANTONY and OCTAVIUS: Their preparations for war. The decisive battle of Actium. ANTONY's land-forces submit with reluctance, and all the Kings and provinces pay obeisance to the Conqueror. ANTONY's last efforts. His death; that of CLEOPATRA: And the settlement of the empire on OCTAVIUS. 420

THE Roman History.

TENTH BOOK.

From the End of the Year 703, when the Civil War broke out between Pompey and Cæsar, to the SECOND TRIUMVIRATE, or the League which was formed between Lepidus, Antony, and Octavius, in the Year 710.

CHAP. I.

A brief relation of the rise and progress of the Contest between POMPEY and CÆSAR.

FROM the year 693, the Triumvirate reigned in Rome: The whole management of the public affairs was in the hands of the three most powerful men of the State, Crassus, Pompey, and Cæsar. The latter, during his consulship in 694, had cemented and established the power of the confederacy; and Pompey directed it in his absence for his own, and the purposes of his associates. Vid. supr. Vol. III. p. 415. He was, therefore, in a manner, the Sovereign of the Republic, while Cæsar was employed in the conquest of Gaul. In the year 696, he was invested, on the proposal of Cicero, whose motion was approved of by the Senate, with an absolute power for five years over all the public stores and corn-rents of the Empire; * by which means all those who were concerned in the naval, the commercial, and landed interest, be-
VOL. IV: B came

* This law was moved and carried by the Consul Lentulus Sпинther, one of the heads of the aristocratical party, with a view to his own designs, and to divert Pompey from the thoughts of being employed in re-establishing Ptolemy on the throne of Egypt; an of-
2 Vid. supr. Vol. III. p. 463 477. fice

Vil. supr.
Vol. III.
in ix. ch.
3 and 4.

Vol. III. p.
542.

came his tributaries and dependants. Another law, proposed at the same time by the Tribune Messius, * gave him the additional power of raising what fleets and armies he thought fit ; with a greater command through all the provinces than their proper Governors had in each. These extraordinary concessions to Pompey created a jealousy in Crassus, who, perceiving himself quite eclipsed by his old enemy and rival, now his partner in power, encouraged Publius Clodius to put some public affronts upon him, which Pompey openly resented, and complained of. A reconciliation, however, was speedily effected by Cæsar ; and, in 697, the triple league was renewed at Lucca ; where the Governor of the two Gauls, after three successful campaigns, spent the winter season in the greatest splendor, attended by almost all the Magistrates and great men of the Republic. It was agreed upon by the Triumviri that Pompey and Crassus should sue for the consulship of the following year, take to themselves what provinces they liked best, and continue Cæsar in his government of Gaul for five years more. How all this was effected has been formerly related. Crassus, before the expiration of his consulship, set out for his government of Syria and the Partbian war : but Pompey remained in Italy, though invested with the command of an army and the government of Spain ; and there continued to influence all the public transactions. His commission for the providing of corn, which expired not till the year 701, furnished him with a pretence for not going to his province. He is universally accused of having given way to all the disorders of the city, and of having inflamed public discord with a view of forcing the Senate to create him Dictator ; in which scheme he succeeded so far as to get himself elected sole Consul by the unanimous vote of the Senate, and the consent even of Cato. But, while he was invested with the whole public authority in the year 701, in order to settle the State, he employed it to a very different purpose. † Before his law

Ere which the Consul was solicitous should be assigned to himself.

* Licero, though he thought the law of Messius insufferable, yet held his peace, because the Pontifices had yet decreed nothing concerning his house ;—Nos taceamus ; et eo magis, quod de domo nostra nihil adhuc Pontifices responderunt. Melm. Vol. I. p. 56. Thus were the liberties of Rome sacrificed to the private purposes of her pretended Patriots.

† Cicero often extols Pompey's third consulship, so far as to call it divine ; yet he influenced the Judges to condemn Milo, whom Cato loudly acquitted, while Sansoni was absolved, who headed Milo's gladiators in forcing the inn where Clodius was killed : Milone rem non magis invidia facti, quam Pompeii damnarunt voluntas : Quem

quidem M. Cato palam lata absolvit sententia. Vel. Pat. ii. 47. He employed his authority to save Scipio, though notoriously guilty, while he let Hypseus be condemned by an ex post facto law, who had been his Quæstor, and ever obsequious to his will. He abandoned Seaurus, who had served under him, and to whom he left the government of Syria after the Mithridatic war ; because, says Asconius, he took offence at Seaurus's marrying Mutia, his divorced wife ;—in eo judicio neque Pompeius propensum adjutorium præbuit, videbatur enim apud animum ejus non minus offensionis contraxisse, quod judicium ejus in Mutiam, crimine impudicitie ab eo dimissam, levius fecisse existimaretur, cum eam ipse probasset, quam gratia acquisisse necessitudinis jure, quod ex eadem uterque liberor ba.

law took place for disqualifying all future Consuls and Prætors from holding any province till five years after the expiration of their magistracy, he was careful to provide an exception for himself, and got the government of Spain continued to him for five years longer. His chief intention, after he had secured his own interest and power, was to quell the passions, and stop the ambitious pursuits of his Fellow-grandeës. He was under a necessity, however, of providing something extraordinary for his partner Cæsar; and he consented to a law dispensing with his absence in suing for the Consulship. Calpurnius, Tribune of the people, who promoted this law, had been engaged to it by Cicero, at the joint request of Pompey and Cæsar; and it was carried with the concurrence of all the other Tribunes, though not without difficulty and obstruction from the Senate. This last measure in favour of Cæsar was entered into by Pompey against his inclination, and he soon had reason to repent of it. Julia's death had broken all his ties with her father, and that of Crassus had given a new turn to their several pretensions: His commission over the corn-rents of the Empire was expired, and the laws loudly ordered him away to Spain, where he had no mind to go. He had been greatly caressed of late by the Senate, who had trusted him with the whole power of the State; but the popular party was, with very good reason, better inclined to Cæsar. In these circumstances he thought it advisable to change his scheme of politics: And, by Cicero's account to Calpurnius in the very beginning of the year 702, Pompey

B 2

was

haberet. In Arg. Or. pro Scauro. He, with his father-in-law Scipio, restored also the censorship; but who were elected to this office? Two of the most notoriously profligate citizens of Rome, Appius and Piso. How infamous must have been the character of Scipio himself, whom Pompey took for his father-in-law and colleague in the consulship, if the following story from Valerius Maximus be true: Æque flagitiosum illud convivium, quod Gemellus Tribunicius viator ingenui sanguinis, sed officii intra servilem habitum deformis, Metello Scipioni Consuli, ac Tribuni Plebis, magno cum rubore civitatis comparavit. Lupanari enim domi sue instituto, Mutiam et Fulviam, tum a patre tum a viro utramque abductam, et nobilem puerum Saturninum in eo prostituit. Lib. ix. c. 1. Cæsar, in the beginning of the third book of the civil war, affirms, that many of the decisions given at this time were so little conformable to law, that sentence was often pronounced by a party of Judges different from those who attended the pleadings. Tacitus, it may likewise be added, is far from giving us a favourable idea of Pompey's third Consulship: Cn. Pompeius tertium Consul, corrigendis moribus delectus, et gravior remediis quam delicta erant, suarumque legum auctor idem ac subversor.—An. iii. c. 28.

° Well then: Shall I declare against Cæsar? Where then is the faith I plighted him? For I Ad. Att. was the means of the dispensation being granted vii. 1. him; and, when Cæsar solicited for my vote at RAVENNA, at his request, I brought over Cælius to his party. But what do I say of Cæsar? I was solicited to the same purpose by our darling Pompey in that immortal third consulate of his. Yet Cicero, in his second Philippic, affirms that he endeavoured to dissuade Pompey from suffering this law to pass. There are many such contradictions in Cicero's writings.

* Septimo ferme anno Cæsar morabatur in Gallis, cum medium jam ex invidia Pompeii male coherentis inter Cn. Pompeium et C. Cæsarem concordia pignus, Julia uxor Magni decessit; atque omnia inter destinatos tanto discrimini duces dirimente fortuna, filius quoque parvus Pompeii, Julia natus, intra breve spatium obiit. Tum in gla-

Philipp. ii. c. 10.

was quite alienated from his father-in-law^f, and associate in power, without having received the least provocation either real or pretended, and had resolved to act in concert with his enemies. Hitherto, Pompey and Cæsar had joined their interests against the chief of the Nobility, and obtained from the people what the Senate would not grant; but, now that the whole power of the Empire was thrown as a kind of prize between two, it was natural that they should divide, and head, respectively, the two permanent and distinct parties in the Republic, the Aristocracy and the People.

Eight years successively had Cæsar conducted the Roman arms in Gaul with such amazing success as intitled him to a triumph for the actions of every campaign^g; no wonder, therefore, that his enemies among the Nobles should feel an apprehension of his growing power with the people, who, before the recent proofs he had given of his superior military abilities, and of his amiable qualities, had in many instances distinguished him by singular marks of their esteem, affection, and confidence. Pompey too was undoubtedly jealous of his glory as a Captain, which, it must be confessed, exceeded his own; and he easily foresaw that, if Cæsar was permitted to sue for the consulship, and to enter upon it at the expiration of his military command, he would become master of the Republic; and, after his magistracy, procure, by a law of the people, the most considerable province, with a powerful army; while he himself in the mean time would be obliged to withdraw to his government of Spain. Thus Pompey and the Aristocracy, though agreeing in little else, were induced to unite their strength against the conqueror of Gaul.

A coalition was therefore formed, and a resolution taken to revoke Cæsar's command before the time was out, and to oblige him to come gladios cædesque civium furente ambitu, cujus neque finis reperiebatur, nec modus, tertius consularis soli Cn. Pompeio, etiam adversantium antea dignitati ejus judicio delatus est: Cujus ille honoris gloria, veluti reconciliatis sibi optimatibus, maxime a C. Cæsare alienatus est. Vell. Pat. lib. ii. 47.

^f "I passed several days with Pompey,
" conversing with him on nothing else but
" the Republic:—Take this from me,
" that Pompey is an excellent citizen, prepa" red both with courage and counsel for all " events which can be foreseen: Where" fore give yourself up to the man; believe " me, he will embrace you; for he now " holds the same opinion with us of good and
" bad citizens." Ep. Fam. xi. 8. Melm. III.
28. "I left Pompey an excellent citizen,
" and in readiness against all events which
" we may dread." Ad Aus. iv. 8.

^g Novemque æstatibus vix ulla non justissimus triumphus emeritus. Vell. Pat. L. ii. c. 47. Dicam enim ex animo, Patres conscripti, quod sentio, et quod vobis audientibus sæpe jam dixi. Si mihi nunquam amicus C. Cæsar fuisset, sed semper iratus: Si, aspernaretur amicitiam meam, seseque mihi implacabilem inexpiabilemque præberet, tamen ei, cum tantas res gessisset gereretque quotidie, non amicus esse non possem. Cujus ego imperio non Alpium vallum contra adscensam transgressionemque Gallorum, non Rheni fossam, gurgitibus illis redandantem, Germanorum immanissimis gentibus objicio et oppono. Perfecit ille, ut, si montes resedissent, amnes exaravissent non naturæ præsidio, sed victoriâ suâ, rebusque gestis Italiam munitam haberemus. Cic. in Pis.

as a private man to sue for the consulship; in which case he had been exposed to the mercy of his enemies, and Cato had threatened publicly to bring him to a trial. But this resolution was very difficult to be put into practice, as it would necessarily occasion, as a previous step, the repeal of two laws, the one made by the Senate itself, the other by the people, with the unanimous concurrence of the Tribunes, and with the approbation of Pompey.

The Consuls for the year 702 were Servius Sulpitius and M. Claudius Marcellus, who had been elected by the joint interest of Pompey and Cæsar. Cato had stood candidate with them; but, having displeased the people by an ill-timed severity, he was rejected. Plutarch informs us, that he had obtained a decree from the Senate, ordering the candidates to make interest by themselves, and not by their friends; so that the people were deprived not only of their usual bribes, but of the satisfaction of being courted: And he refused also, says the same author, to condescend to that submissive manner of soliciting which is common on such occasions, and behaved with great state, choosing rather to preserve the dignity of his character, than to acquire the dignity of Consul. On the very day he had lost his election, as if quite unconcerned for what had happened, he was seen in the Campus Martius playing at tennis; a behaviour which Plutarch greatly extols, but which might have been nothing else but an affectation of singularity, or a consequence of that haughty rage, which made him declare, that he would no more stand candidate for any magistracy.

Marcellus, intirely devoted to Pompey, was no sooner entered into office, than he began the attack upon Cæsar, by declaring his intention to abrogate immediately his command, and to appoint him a successor, alleging that the war in Gaul was now brought to a conclusion. But he was stopped for some months in this pursuit, probably by Pompey's falling ill soon after his promotion to the consulship, and by the opposition of his colleague Sulpitius, who, being of a more moderate temper, and

Suet. in Cæf. cap.
xxviii.
Dio. l. xl.
p. 148.

^a Dr. Middleton, Vol. II. p. 196, has given the following character of him: "He was the head of a family, which, for a succession of many ages, had made the first figure in Rome; and was himself adorned with all the virtues that could qualify him to sustain that dignity which he derived from his noble ancestors. He had formed himself in a particular manner for the bar, where he soon acquired great fame; and, of all the orators of his time, seems to have approached the nearest to Cicero himself in the character of a complete speaker. His manner of speaking was elegant, strong, and copious; with a

"sweetness of voice, and propriety of action, that added a grace and lustre to every thing that he said. He was a constant admirer and imitator of Cicero; and of the same principles in peace, and on the same side in war." His fierceness, however, it may be remarked, against Cæsar, so ill-timed, gives us no great idea of his prudence or his honour: It was this probably which procured the consulship successively to two of his relations.

ⁱ "Sulpitius was of a noble and patrician family, of the same age, the same studies, and the same principles with Cicero, with whom he kept up a perpetual friendship.

"They

Caes. 13.

and addicted to neither faction, over-ruled his motions. The enemies of Caesar contented themselves therefore with making vows for the success of the Bellovaci, with whom he was engaged in war; and for the destruction of the Roman General. Marcellus had also made some attempt to deprive Novum Comum, a colony, which Caesar, when Consul, had settled at the foot of the Alps, of the freedom of the city, granted to it by a law preferred by Vatinius. He was likewise frustrated in this design, yet resolved to have no regard to the privilege of the colony; and, having caught a Comensian Magistrate, who was acting the citizen at Rome, he ordered him to be seized, and publicly whipped; an indignity from which all citizens were exempted by law; bidding the man go, and shew these marks of his citizenship to Caesar ^k.

The elections of Magistrates for the ensuing year engaged the attention of the city in the months of July and August; and Pompey's faction ge-

“ They went through their exercises toge“ ther when young, both at Rome, and at “ Rhodes, in the celebrated school of Melo:
 “ Whence he became an eminent pleader of “ causes, and passed through all the great “ offices of the State, with a singular repu“ tation of wisdom, learning, and integrity;
 “ a constant admirer of the modesty of the “ ancients; and a reprover of the insolence of “ his own times. When he could not arrive “ at the first degree of fame, as an Orator, “ he resolved to excel in what was next to “ it, the character of a Lawyer; choosing “ rather to be the first, in the second art, “ than the second only in the first: Leaving “ therefore to Cicero the field of eloquence,
 “ he contented himself with such a share of “ it as was sufficient to sustain and adorn the “ profession of the law. In this he suc“ ceeded to his wish; and was far superior “ to all who had ever professed it in Rome;
 “ being the first who reduced it to a proper “ science, or rational system; and added
 “ light and method to that which all others “ before him had taught darkly and con“ fusedly. Nor was his knowledge con“ fined to the external forms, or the effects “ of the Municipal laws; but enlarged by “ a comprehensive view of universal equity, “ which he made the interpreter of its sanc“ tions, and the rule of all his decisions; “ yet he was always better pleased to put an “ amicable end to a controversy, than to di“ rect a process at law. In his political be“ haviour he was always a friend to peace “ and liberty; moderating the violence of “ opposite parties, and discouraging every “ step towards civil dissension; and, in the “ wars which ensued, he was so busy in con“ triving projects of an accommodation, that “ he gained the name of the peace-maker.

 “ Through a natural timidity of temper, “ confirmed by a profession and course of “ life averse from arms, though he preferred
 “ Pompey's cause as the best, he did not care “ to fight for it; but, taking Caesar's to be “ the strongest, suffered his son to follow
 “ that camp, while he himself continued “ quiet and neuter: For this he was ho“ noured by Caesar, yet could never be in“ duced to approve his government. From “ the time of Caesar's death, he continued “ still to advise and promote all measures “ which seemed likely to establish the pub“ lic concord; and died at last, as he lived, “ in the very act and office of peace-mak- “ ing.” Middl. p. 361.

“ ^k “ All the other colonies on that side of “ the Po had before obtained from Pom- “ pey's father the rights of Latium, [Jus “ Latii] that is, the freedom of the city of “ Rome to those which had borne an annual “ magistracy in them. Hence Cicero blames
 “ this act of Marcellus as violent and unjust.
 “ Marcellus, says he, behaved shamefully “ in the case of the Comensian; for, if the “ man had never been a Magistrate, he was “ yet of a colony beyond the Po; so that Pom- “ pey will not be less shocked at it than Caesar “ himself.” Middl. p. 44. Those who had not been Magistrates might give their votes in the assemblies of Rome, if ordered by the presiding Magistrate to vote in such a tribe: But only the Magistrates could pretend to any office.

generally prevailed. C. Claudius Marcellus and *L. Paulus*¹ were chosen Consuls. The first, who was cousin-german to M. Marcellus, carried his suit in competition with Calidius, an eminent orator and friend to Cæsar, and was zealously attached to Pompey. The second set out also in his administration with principles agreeable to those of his colleague.

Marcus Cælius, Cicero's friend and correspondent, obtained the ædileship this year. He had been Tribune of the people in Pompey's third consulship, and had distinguished himself in that office by his zeal for Milo, and was reputed of the aristocratical faction^m.

Curio likewise obtained the tribunate, which he sought with no other design, as many imagined, than for the opportunity of mortifying Cæsar, against whom he had hitherto acted with great fierceness. Heⁿ was a young Nobleman of great parts, spirit, and eloquence; but addicted be-

¹ Cicero wrote congratulatory letters to them both from Cilicia, and another to M. Marcellus, which, as it informs us how the Consuls' thoughts were taken up before the elections, we shall insert it here:

To Marcus Marcellus, Consul.

"I very warmly congratulate you on your relation Caius Marcellus being elected to succeed you: As I sincerely rejoice in your having received this happy fruit of your pious affection to your family, of your patriot-zeal to your country, and of your illustrious deportment in the consular office. I can easily imagine the sentiments which your address on this occasion has created in Rome; and as to myself, whom you have sent to these far distant parts of the globe; believe me, I speak of it with the highest and most unfeigned applause. I can with strict truth assure you, that I have ever had a particular attachment to you from your earliest youth: As I am sensible, you have always shewn by your generous offices in promoting my dignities, that you deemed me worthy of the most distinguished honours. But this late instance of your judicious management in procuring the consulship for Marcellus, together with the proof it affords of the favour in which you stand with the Republic, has raised you still higher in my esteem. It is with great complacency, therefore, I hear it observed by men of the first distinction for sense and merit, that, in all our words and actions, our tastes and studies, our principles and pursuits, we bear a strong resemblance to each other. The only circumstance, that can render your glorious consulship still more agreeable to me, will be your procuring a successor to be nominated to this province as soon as possible. But if this cannot be obtained; let me intreat you at least not to suffer my continuance here to be prolonged beyond the time limited by your decree, and the law which passed for that purpose. In a word, I hope upon all occasions to experience in my absence the benefit of your friendship and protection. Farewell." Ep. Fam. xv. 9. Melm. iii. 35.

^m See some account of him, Vol III. p. 483. and 550.

ⁿ "The circumstance of Curio's standing candidate for the tribuneship", says Cælius "in a letter to Cicero, in 702, greatly alarms those who are unacquainted with the real good qualities of Curio's heart. I hope, and indeed believe, he will act agreeably to his professions, and join with the Senate in supporting the friends of the Republic. I am sure, at least, he is full of these designs at present; in which Cæsar's conduct has been the principal occasion of engaging him. For Cæsar, though he spares no pains or expence to gain over even the lowest of the people to his interest, has thought fit to treat Curio with singular contempt. The latter has behaved with so much temper upon this occasion, that he, who never acted with artifice in all his life, is suspected to have dissembled his resentment, in order the more effectually to defeat the schemes of those who oppose his election; I mean the Lalii and the Antonii, together with the rest of that wonderful party."

yond

beyond all measure or modesty to the prevailing luxury and gallantries of a most dissolute age. In his youth, he had been the leader of the young Nobility, and a warm assertor of the authority of the Senate against the power of the Triumvirate. Upon his first taste of public honours, his ambition and thirst of popularity had engaged him in such expence and prodigality, that, to supply the magnificence of his shews and plays, he had contracted an immense debt.

Ep. Fam.
viii. 4.
Melm. iii.
31. [Dated
Aug. 1,
702.]

The Consul Marcellus, who, when taken up in these elections, had seemed to have dropped the design of abrogating Cæsar's proconsular power*, upon which he was so intent in the beginning of his magistracy, resumed the affair after the Consuls were chosen. "At a meeting of the Senate [says Cælius to Cicero] held on the 22d of July, in the temple of Apollo", upon a debate relating to the payment of the forces commanded by Pompey, mention was made of that legion, which, as appeared by his accounts, had been lent to Cæsar; and he was asked of what number of men it consisted, and for what purpose it was borrowed? In short, Pompey was pushed so strongly upon this article, that he found himself under a necessity of promising to recal this legion out of Gaul; but he added at the same time, that the clamours of his enemies should not force him to take this step too precipitately. It was afterwards moved, that the question might be put concerning the election of a successor to Cæsar. Accordingly the Senate came to a resolution that Pompey (who was just going to the army at Ariminum), and did immediately after set out for that purpose)

* "Marcellus, says Cælius to Cicero, has dropped the design upon which he was lately so intent: But not so much from indolence, I believe, as prudence." Ep. Fam. viii. 2. Melm. iii. 29

The temple of Apollo was situated without the town, and the Senate was assembled there, that Pompey, who was actually Governor of Spain, and commanded a considerable army, might be present: And all the matter of this deliberation had been probably concerted with him.

This army was probably part of the four legions which were decreed to Pompey for the support of his government of Spain. He feigned at this time a resolution of going to that province which was opposed by Cæsar's enemies and Cicero himself.

Ad. Att.
v. 11.

The last writes thus to Atticus on the 6th of July: "It appeared to me likewise as if Pompey (according to what you wrote me Varro had said) would most certainly go to Spain. This resolution by no means met with my approbation. I easily made *Phœnaces sensible that he could do nothing better than to remain where he was. That Gracian therefore will do all he can to detain him, and indeed I know that Pompey has a great deference for his opinion." From this it appears that Cicero and all the Aristocrats thought, that on Pompey's presence rested the safety of what they called the Republic.

In another letter to his friend Atticus, he writes: "As to the affairs of Rome, we have ugly accounts of Curio and Paulus; not that I see any danger while we have Pompey: Let him only keep his health, and we are safe." [Non quo ullum periculum videam stante Pompeio, vel etiam sedente; valeat modo.] "But I am concerned for my friends Curio and Paulus." Ad Att. vi. 3 Yet the same Cicero has the confidence, in a subsequent letter, written to Aulus Cæcina, in 707.

* A learned Greek of Asiatic, who was Pompey's constant companion, and wrote his life.

“ purpose) should be ordered to return to Rome with all expedition; “ that the affair relating to a general election of new governors for all the “ provinces might be debated in his presence. This point, adds Calpurnius, I “ imagine will be brought before the Senate on the 13th of this month;
 “ when, if no infamous obstacles should be thrown in the way by the “ Tribunes, the House will certainly come to some resolution; for “ Pompey, in the course of the debate, let fall an intimation, that he “ thought every man owed obedience to the authority of that Assem“ bly.”

Thus the Senate threw themselves precipitately into the arms of Pompey. The affair was not debated on the 13th of August, because Marcellus, though he had exerted himself in the pursuit of his design, was not able to assemble a complete number of Senators. Many absented themselves, being in Cæsar's interest; others were backward, because they saw that these motions tended to a rupture, and that nothing could be legally determined; the Tribunes of Cæsar's party being always ready to interpose their negative. At last, an Assembly was held on the 30th of September; and Pompey, who, in a preceding meeting, had opened himself so far as to declare, that Cæsar ought not to be admitted as a candidate for the consulship, whilst he retained his command in Gaul, now let fall an expression which was much observed, and gave, says Calpurnius to Cicero, confident hopes of his good intentions; that he could not, without great injustice, determine any thing in relation to the provinces under Cæsar's command before the 1st of March; but that, after that time, he should have no sort of scruple. It was resolved accordingly by the Senate, that the Consuls elect, L. PAULUS and C. METELLUS, should move them on the 1st of March to settle the consular provinces; and, if any Magistrate should interpose to hinder the effect of their decrees, that he should be deemed an enemy to the Republic; and, if any one actually interposed, that this vote and resolution should be entered into the journals as an order of the

Marcellus

707, to affirm solemnly, that he always advised Pompey to go to his government, and boasts, at the same time, of his having never been deceived in the foresight of future events. “ Now, if the principles” says he, “ of the Etruscan science, in which you were instructed by your illustrious and excellent father, did not deceive you with respect to me; neither will my presages be less infallible with regard to you. They are derived, indeed, not only from the maxims and records of the most distinguished sages, whose writings, you well know, I have studied with great application; but from a long experience in public affairs, and from having passed through various scenes both of prosperity and adversity. I have the stronger reason to

VOL. IV.

“ confide in this method of divination, as “ it has never once deceived me, during all these “ dark and distracted times: Insomuch that,
 “ were I to mention my predictions, I am afraid
 “ you would suspect that I framed them after “ the events I pretend to have foretold.—
 “ I always gave it as my opinion, that Pompey
 “ should go to his government of SPAIN:
 “ With which if he had happily complied,
 “ we should never have been involved in “ this fatal civil war.”—Ep. Fam. vi. 6.
Mém. ix. 34. This is most evidently false; and we shall see him out in his politics in almost every circumstance: Yet Cornelius Nepos, and all Cicero's Commentators, have taken his word for it, and are astonished at his prophetic discernment.

C

Senate,

Senate to be considered some other time by the House, and laid before the people. In this same Assembly, Pompey being asked, what if a negative should be put on the 1st of March, upon the decree for recalling Cæsar? He declared, that he looked upon it just as the same thing, whether Cæsar openly refused to obey the orders of the Senate, or secretly procured some Magistrate to obstruct them. What, said another, if he should insist on being Consul, and holding his province also? What, replied Pompey, if my son should take a stick, and beat me? From expressions of this kind, it was generally conceived that a rupture would undoubtedly ensue between Pompey and Cæsar: And indeed the votes of the Senate, and the measures taken at the same time by Pompey, were no less than a declaration of war against Cæsar, who lost no time to prepare himself against this attack of his enemies. As soon as he had vanquished the Bellovaci, he applied himself to quiet the affairs of his province, that he might be able to give all his attention to the city, and have his army in readiness to support him. At the same time he left no stone unturned to procure friends among the Magistrates of the ensuing year. He first attempted to gain C. Marcellus; but, finding him too rigid, he addressed himself to L. Paulus, to whom he is said to have given 1500 talents, or about three hundred thousand pounds, which he employed in building a noble palace adjoining to the Forum. He gave a much greater sum to the Tribune Curio, who, by his prodigalities, had not only wasted his immense fortune, but had contracted a debt of six hundred thousand sesterces, or about half a million*. The Consul and Tribune agreed therefore, secretly, to suffer nothing prejudicial to Cæsar's interest to pass during their magistracy; but both continued to appear in the party of Pompey*.

Ep. Fam.
viii. 10.
Melm. iv.
14.

In the last months of this year, the city was greatly alarmed by the news sent them by Cassius of an invasion of the Parthians. As the Senate had no opinion of the military skill of Bibulus and Cicero, who governed in Syria and Cilicia, the two frontier provinces, some were of opinion that the command should be given to Pompey; and he himself seemed to relish the proposition*. This project would serve his ends in Asia, and would furnish a pretext for staying in Italy, and taking from Cæsar two of his legions. Others were for assigning this expedition

* Momentumque fuit mutatus Cariorerum, Gallorum captus spoliis, et Cæsaris auro.

Lucan. Lib. iv. 819.

Caught by the spoils of Gaul, and Cæsar's gold,

Curio turn'd traitor, and his country sold.

The vendidit hic auro Patriam of Virgil is also applied to the case of Curio. Servius.

"As for Paulus," says Cælius, in a letter to Cicero, dated the 18th of Nov. "he declares most vehemently against suffering Cæsar to continue in Gaul, and our friend Furnius is the only Tribune, whom I suspect of obstructing his measures for that purpose: Curio," says he, in the same letter, "I foresee will undertake two things; he will in the first place attempt to weaken the authority of Cæsar; and in the next endeavour to throw some little advantages on the side of Pompey." Ep. Fam. viii. x. Melm. iv. 14.

"I shall be able," says Cicero to Atticus, "with the reinforcement of Deiotarus, to keep the Parthians in play till Pompey arrives: His letter informs me that he will be appointed to that command." Ad Att. vi. 1.

to Cæsar and his army; and many named the Consuls as the most proper persons to be employed. And these Magistrates, in the apprehension that they would either be nominated to a commission, which they did not relish, or suffer the disgrace of its being delegated to others, forbore to convene the Senate; though they thereby incurred the censure of neglecting the public interest. But whether indolence, or pusillanimity, was the real motive of their declining the conduct of the war, it was concealed under the specious appearance of modesty; and thus the year was spun out without doing any effectual business. The Senate, however, with a view to weaken Cæsar, taking advantage of the general apprehension of an irruption of the Parthians into Syria, ordered that Pompey and Cæsar should each of them furnish a legion to be sent into that province. But Pompey, instead of giving one of his, called for that which he had formerly lent to Cæsar; and Appius was dispatched to take the command of it, and to bring it into Italy. Cæsar, though he easily saw through the policy of his enemies, obeyed without demur the decree of the Senate, and not only delivered to Appius Pompey's legion, but also the 15th cantoned at that time in bitber Gaul, which was immediately replaced by the thirteenth. Plutarch says that he gave to each soldier of the two legions 250 drachms, about 8l. sterling; a circumstance which Cæsar himself has not mentioned. These troops were no sooner arrived in Italy, but they had quarters assigned them in Campania, near Capua, instead of being sent into Syria.

L. ÆMILIUS PAULUS, } Consuls.
C. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, }

The beginning of the year 703 was very quiet, but the calm soon ended in a mighty tempest. Curio, who had already sold himself to Cæsar, and who had hitherto acted insidiously with the friends of Pompey, and even signed the decrees of the Senate against Cæsar, was now looking out for a pretext to quarrel with his party: With this view he applied to the Pontifical College for an intercalation, in order to lengthen out the period of his tribunitian ministry; and, the priests rejecting his demand, their refusal furnished him with the pretence he wanted, and gave a colour, such as it was, to the desertion he had long meditated. He instantly declared against the Senate, and harangued the people in favour of Cæsar, threatening, at the same time, to propose not only an agrarian and a viarian law*, but a law also which would

Year of
R O M E
703.
Before Chr.
49.
402 Conf.

C 2

im-

* Consules autem habemus summa diligentia: Adhuc senatusconsultum nisi de feriis Latinis nullum facere potuerunt. Curioni nostro tribunatus congelat: Sed dici non potest quomodo hic omnia jaceant: Nisi ego cum tabernis et aquariis pugnarem, veteranus civitatem occupasset. . . . Quod tibi supra scripsi Curionem frizere, jam calet. Nam ferventissime concerpitur. Levissime enim, quia de intercalando non obtinuerat, transfugit ad populum et pro Cæsare loqui cepit; legemque viariam non dissimilem agrariæ Rulli et aliam mentariam, quas jubet ædiles metiri, jactavit. Hoc nondum fecerat, cum priorum epistolæ partem scripsi. Cælius Ciceroni. He threatens likewise to propose a viarian law, somewhat of the same tendency with the agrarian one which was formerly attempted by Rullus.

Ep. Fam.
viii. 16.
Melm. v.
5.

2

This

Year of
R O M E, 723.
Before Chr.
43.
Consul.
App. 27.
Before Chr.
43.

impower the ædiles to distribute corn among the people. These motions, however, soon gave way to one that was more important and interesting. C. Marcellus proposed, on the 1st of March, the affair of the consular provinces, as it had been ordered by the vote of the Senate of the 30th of September. Paulus, the other Consul, was silent; but Curio, after giving his approbation to the proposition, demanded that Pompey should likewise be ordered to renounce the government of Spain, and the command of the legions allotted to him; declaring, that the Republic could never be free, till both he and Cæsar were reduced to the condition of private citizens; and that, if the one was continued in command, the other ought not to be stripped of his authority; which, in that case, was necessary to preserve the balance, and to prevent the Republic from being at the disposal of one man. The Senate, not being willing to make a decree so contrary to the interest of Pompey, rejected the Tribune's proposal; who, in return, put his negative on every other resolution.

Isid.

When the news of the debate reached Pompey, who was then in Campania, he wrote, with a false modesty which deceived no-body, "that, whatever honours had been heaped upon him, they had been freely granted him by the good-will of his fellow-citizens, without his ever soliciting any: That, lately, he had been forced into a third consulship, and to take the government of Spain for another five years; and that they should always find him ready to resign, at their will, an employment which he had received with reluctance." These protestations he even renewed on his return to Rome; but Curio, who was not to be put off with fair words, insisted upon his carrying his promises into execution, assuring him of a like submission from Cæsar.

Ep. Fam.
viii. 12.
Melm. vi.
6.

There were fresh debates upon this subject; and Cælius has given the following accounts of them to Cicero: "As to political affairs; the efforts of all parties are at present directed to a single point: And the general contest still is, in relation to the provinces. Pompey seems to unite in earnest with the Senate, that the 13th of November may be limited for Cæsar's resigning his government. Curio, on the contrary, is determined to oppose this to the utmost; and, accordingly, has relinquished all his other schemes, in order to apply his whole strength to the

This place must be corrupted; for the viarian and agrarian laws were different. The former regarded the keeping of the high roads in repair, and regulated the equipages of travellers, imposing a tax on them; and the latter is thus explained by Cælius, in a letter written in the end of the year 702: "I forgot to mention that Curio designs to make an attempt to procure a division of the lands in Campania: it is pretended that Cæsar does not concern himself in this matter; certain however it is, that Pompey is very desirous of having the distribution settled before Cæsar's return, that he may be precluded from applying them to his own purposes." Ep. Fam. viii. 10. Melm. iv. 14. Cæsar's agrarian law had not probably been executed in its whole extent, and Curio meant to carry the remaining part into execution. Cælius compares the agrarian law of Curio to that of Rullus, to shew his disapprobation of it.

“ the affair in question. As to our party, you well know their irreso“ lution ; and consequently will readily believe me when I tell you they “ have not the spirit to push their opposition to the last extremity. The “ whole mystery of the scene in short is this : Pompey, that he may not “ seem to oppose Cæsar, or to aim at any thing but what the latter shall “ think perfectly equitable, represents Curio as acting in this affair “ merely upon his own authority, and with no other view than to create “ disturbances. It is certain, at the same time, that Pompey is much “ averse to Cæsar’s being elected Consul before he shall have delivered “ up his government, together with the command of his army : And “ indeed he seems to be extremely apprehensive of the consequences, if “ it should prove otherwise. In the mean time he is severely attacked “ by Curio : Who is perpetually reproaching him with deviating from “ the principles on which he acted in his second consulship. Take my “ word for it, notwithstanding all the difficulties they may throw in “ Curio’s way, Cæsar will never want a friend to rise up in his cause :
 “ And if the whole turns, as they seem to fear, upon his procuring
 “ some Tribune to interpose his negative to their decrees, I will venture
 “ to pronounce that he may remain in Gaul as long as he shall think “ proper.”

“ Do you know, my dear Cicero, what a victory Curio has lately ob“ tained in relation to the provinces ? The Senate, in pursuance of a “ former order, having assembled to consider of the obstruction which “ some of the Tribunes had given to their decree ; M. Marcellus moved “ that the application might be made to those Magistrates to withdraw “ their protest : But it was carried in the negative by a considerable ma- “ ajority. Pompey is at present in such delicate circumstances, that he “ will scarce find any measures, I believe, perfectly to his satisfaction.
 “ The Senate, however, seem to intend, by the resolution I just now “ mentioned, that Cæsar shall be admitted as a candidate for the consulship, “ notwithstanding he should refuse to resign his government.” Cicero speaks of this resolution in a letter to Atticus, and produces it as a proof that the intentions of the Senate were not true to the interest of the Commonwealth : “ For, had the motion,” says he, “ of Marcellus been vigo“ rously supported, Curio’s opposition would have been vain, and “ Cæsar must necessarily have resigned his command.” But this measure had been certainly unconstitutional : And Pompey, who had often shewn himself ungrateful to his friends, and cruel to his enemies, had no merit with the greater part of the Senate, comparatively with Cæsar, who never courted them, but relied intirely upon the people, while his antagonist, as induced by his interest, had applied to the one and to the other.

“ As to political affairs ; I have often mentioned to you, that I ima“ gined the public tranquillity could not possibly be preserved beyond
 “ the present year : And the nearer we approach to those contentions, “ which

Year of
R O M E,
703.
Before Chr.

49.
402 Cons.

Ep. Fam.
viii. 13.
Melm. vi.

Ad. Att.
vii. 7.

Ep. Fam.
viii. 14.
Melm. vi.
15.

Year of R O M E, 703.
Before Chr. 49.
402 Conf.

“ which must inevitably arise, the more evident this danger appears. For Pompey is determined most strenuously to oppose Cæsar’s being Consul, unless he resigns his command: And Cæsar, on the contrary, is persuaded that he cannot be safe upon those terms. He has offered, however, to throw up his commission, provided Pompey will do the same. And thus their very suspicious alliance will probably end at last in an open war With respect to our present divisions, I foresee that the Senate, together with the whole order of Judges, will declare in favour of Pompey: And that all those of desperate fortunes, or who are obnoxious to the laws, will list themselves under the banners of Cæsar. As to their armies, I am persuaded there will be a great inequality. But to answer your question in a few words, concerning my sentiments of public affairs; if one or other of our Chiefs should not be employed against the Partians, I am persuaded great diffensions will soon ensue: diffensions, my friend, which nothing can terminate but the sword, and which each of them seem well inclined and prepared to draw.”

The consular elections were carried by Pompey and his party. Sergius Galba, a Lieutenant of Cæsar, who stood candidate, was rejected; and L. Lentulus Crus and C. Marcellus, his fiercest enemies, were chosen.

Cæsar, after the campaign of the year 702, had made it his bu-

* These accounts are the most authentic we have: What Suetonius, or Plutarch, or Appian, add to them, cannot be depended upon, being full of blunders and absurdities. The relations, nevertheless, of these authors, are copied by almost every writer of Roman history. Appian talks of a debate in the Senate, in which the Consul C. Marcellus having put the question separately, first, whether they were of opinion that Pompey should lay down his command, the majority answered in the negative: Then putting the question, whether a successor should be named to Cæsar? All agreed to it. But that Curio, re-uniting what the Consul had separated, put to the vote another question, Whether they should not both be ordered to dismiss their armies; twenty-one rejected it, and 370 answered in the affirmative; all, says he, affectionate to the public good: Whereupon the Consul dismissed the Assembly, crying, Well then, take Cæsar for your master. He adds, that soon after, a false rumour coming that Cæsar had passed the Alps, and was marching directly to Rome, the city was alarmed, and the Consuls proposed to the Senate to send for the legions at Capua, to employ them against him as an enemy to the State; but that, upon Curio’s declaring the report to be false, the Consul, in great wrath, said: Since, in consulting with the Senate, I am hindered to provide for the safety of the common-wealth, I will provide alone, according to the power I am intrusted with. Then, rushing out of the city with his colleague, [who was L. Emilius Paulus, Cæsar’s fast friend] and presenting a sword to Pompey, we order you, said he, my colleague and I, to march against Cæsar, and fight for your country; and, to that end, we give you the command of the army at Capua, and all the forces in Italy; with power to raise troops at your discretion. Pompey declared he would obey them, because it was their command; adding, however, these words, if no better expedient can be found. Plutarch has much the same tale, but has added, most ridiculously, that the Senate followed the Consul, and that the whole city put on mourning. Dio has adopted only a part of the story, and tells us that the subject of the debate was, whether Curio should be turned out of the Senate; Appian, the Censor, having declared that, in his judgment, he ought to be degraded. He observes, that only C. Marcellus and the two Consuls elect went to Pompey. Lib. x. p. 151.

finis

finest in the winter-season to pacify his province, and to take away all occasion of future insurrections. He treated the cities honourably; rewarding generously the Noblemen and Leading-men, and did not burden the country with new impositions. In the spring, he hastened into Italy, under the pretence of assisting his Quæstor Antony in his suit for the augurate; but in reality to take a nearer view of the transactions in the city, and to encourage his party there. The news therefore which he received of Antony's success, before he reached Italy, did not stop him. It was then time to thank the municipal towns for the assistance they had given his friend upon his recommendation, and to recommend unto them his own case touching the consulate, which he purposed to apply for the next year. He was received with extraordinary respect and affection: All the people came forth to meet him; sacrifices were offered over the whole country; and the gates where he was to pass, the market-places, and the temples were adorned as in a day of triumph. After making his tour through the municipal towns, and agreeing with his friends at Rome, he left T. Labienus to command in Italy, and went himself into Gaul to review his army and put it in readiness to act on the first call.

In the end of the year 703, he returned to Italy: And, when he came thither, he found that the two legions which he had dismissed, and which, by the decree of the Senate, should have been employed against the Parthians, had been delivered to Pompey by C. Marcellus, the Consul, and were kept in the neighbourhood of the city, and that every measure had been taken to abrogate his command, and reduce him to the state of a private citizen. Here he was joined by Curio, who, after some fruitless attempts to prohibit Pompey's levies, seeing the opposite party greatly incensed against him, had left the city before the expiration of his office.

*Mark Antony*² succeeded him in the tribunate on the 10th of November, and in all his zeal for Cæsar. He was no sooner in possession of his

¹ We have an account of this election in a letter from Calpurnius to Cicero: "If you had taken the King of Partbia himself prisoner, and sacked his metropolis, it could not make you amends for your absence.— You have lost indeed a subject of inexpressible mirth, by not being spectator of the very ridiculous figure which the luckless [L.] Pomptinus displayed, when he lately found himself disappointed in his election. The assembly of the people was exceedingly numerous upon this occasion; but the force of party bore down all before it, and even carried away many of the friends of Domitius from his interest. This circumstance he imputes to my management; and as he considers the preference which has been given to his competitor Antony, as a real injury done to himself, he honours me with the same marks of his displeasure with which he distinguishes the most intimate of his friends. He is at present indeed a very diverting compound of wrath and indignation; which he impotently discharges, in the first place against myself for promoting the election of M. Antony; and in the next against the people, for expressing too much satisfaction in his repulse." Ep. Fam. viii. 14. Melm. vi. 15.

² Dr. Middleton has collected, from Cicero's writings, the history of M. Antony's life.

Year of
R O M E,
703.
Before Chr.
49.
402 Conf.

Year of
R O M E,
703.
Before Chr.
49.

492 Concl.

his office, than he proposed that the two legions taken from Cæsar should be sent into Syria; that all new levies should be stopped, and that life to the commencement of the civil wars; and the reader will allow me to transcribe this article from that intelligent historian.

"M. Antony, who now began to make a figure in the affairs of Rome, was of an ancient and noble extraction; the grandson of that celebrated statesman and orator who lost his life in the massacres of Marinus and Cinna: His father had been honoured with one of the most important commissions of the Republic; but, after an inglorious discharge of it, died with the character of a corrupt, oppressive, and rapacious Commander. The son, trained in the discipline of such a parent, whom he lost when he was very young, launched out at once into all the excesses of riot and debauchery, and wasted his whole patrimony before he had put on the manly gown; shewing himself to be the genuine son of that father, who was born, as Salust says, to squander money, without ever employing a thought on business, till a present necessity urged him. His comely person, lively wit, insinuating address, made young Curio infinitely fond of him; so that, in spite of the commands of a severe father, who had often turned Antony out of doors and forbidden him his house, he could not be prevailed with to forsake his company; but supplied him with money for his frolics and amours, till he had involved himself on his account in a debt of fifty thousand pounds. This greatly afflicted old Curio; and Cicero was called in to heal the distress of the family; whom the son intreated, with tears in his eyes, to intercede for Antony, as well as for himself, and not suffer them to be parted: But Cicero, having prevailed with the father to make the son easy, by discharging his debts, advised him to insist upon it as a condition, and to enforce it by his paternal power, that he should have no farther commerce with Antony. This laid the foundation of an early aversion in Antony to Cicero, increased still by the perpetual course of Antony's life, which fortune happened to throw among Cicero's inveterate enemies: For, by the second marriage of his mother, [Julia, a relation of Cæsar's] he became son-in-law to that Lentulus who was "put to death for conspiring with Cataline, by whom he was initiated into all the cabals of a traiterous faction, and infected with principles pernicious to the liberty of Rome. To revenge the death of this father [in-law] he attached himself to Clodius; and, during his tribunate, was one of the ministers of all his violences; yet was detected at the same time in some criminal intrigue in his family, injurious to the honour of his patron. From this education in the city, he went abroad to learn the art of war under Gabinus, the most profligate of all Generals;" [Plutarch tells us, that Antony not being able to endure the madness of Clodius, and apprehensive of the power of his enemies, withdrew himself, and retired into Greece, where he inured his body to warlike exercises, and applied his mind to the study of eloquence; and that it was with difficulty that he was prevailed upon by Gabinus to serve under him.] who gave him the command of his horse in Syria; where he signalised his courage in the restoration of King Ptolemy, and acquired the first taste of martial glory, in an expedition undertaken against the laws and religion of his country." [an expedition which Cicero encouraged his great and noble friend Lentulus Siple to undertake.] From Egypt, instead of coming home, where his debts would not suffer him to be easy, he went to Cæsar into Gaul, the sure refuge of all the needy, the desperate, and the audacious:" [This is not a fair manner of representing Antony's behaviour. Was not Cæsar's camp the school of military skill, and the field of glory? Had not Cæsar, among his Lieutenants, P. Crassus, so much extolled by Cicero: Quintus Cicero, M. Brutus, and many other Officers of great merit: And where could Antony spend his youth better?] And, after some stay in that province, being furnished with money and credit by Cæsar, he returned to sue for the *quæstors*hip. Cæsar recommended him in a pressing manner to Cicero, intreating him to accept Antony's submission, and pardon him what was past, and to assist him in his present suit: With which Cicero readily complied, and obliged Antony so highly by it, that that all those who had already given in their names, and taken the oath, should be released from their obligation, and even be forbid to serve. On the 21st, he made a speech to the people, which was a perpetual invective on Pompey's conduct from his first appearance in public, with great complaints against the violent and arbitrary condemnation of citizens, and the terror of his arms; and it was probably on this occasion that he read Cæsar's letter to the people, mentioned by Plutarch, in which he expressed a desire that both Pompey and he, quitting their governments and dismissing their armies, should submit to their judgment. According to Suetonius, Plutarch, and Appian, Cæsar made other equitable overtures, proposing to part immediately with eight of his legions and Transalpine Gaul, provided he might keep two legions with the Cisalpine province, or but one legion with Illyricum and Cisalpine Gaul, till he was made Consul. Plutarch and Appian add, that Pompey was satisfied with these conditions, but that they were rejected by the Consuls; a circumstance extremely improbable: For Pompey, it is certain, was as averse to peace as the most determined of Cæsar's enemies. In an interview that Cicero had with him, on the 10th of December, Pompey told him, that there was no hope of an accommodation, and that war was inevitable; and, finding Cicero wholly bent on peace, he contrived to have a second conference with him at Lavernium, on the 27th, before he reached the city, in hopes to allay his fears, and to turn him from the vain project of an accommodation, which might contribute to cool the zeal of his friends in the Senate. He declared, that there could be no pacification, but such as was treacherous and dangerous; and that, if Cæsar should resign the command of his army, and take the consulship, he would throw the Republic into confusion. At this time he was even actually disposing of all the governments; and he tried to engage Cicero to go to Sicily, though neither the resolution of the Senate nor the orders of the People had given him any command in that quarter. He farther assured Cicero, that, when Cæsar heard of the earnest and mighty preparations that were making against him, he would throw up his pretensions to the consulship, and stick by his army and government: "But supposing," added he, "that Cæsar should act like a madman, and fly to extremities, I should despise every thing he could

" he declared war presently against Clodius,
 " whom he attacked with great fierceness in
 " the Forum, and would certainly have killed,
 " if he had not found means to hide himself
 " under some stairs. Antony openly gave out,
 " that he owed all this to Cicero's generosity,
 " to whom he could never make amends for
 " former injuries, but by the destruction of his
 " enemy CLODIUS. Being chosen Quæstor,
 " he went back immediately to Cæsar, with" out expecting his lot, or a decree of the Se" nate, to appoint him his province; where,

VOL. IV.

" though he had all imaginable opportu" nities of acquiring money, yet, by squan-
 " dering, as fast as he got it, he came, a se" cond time, empty and beggarly to Rome, to " put in for the tribunate; in which office,
 " after the example of his friend Curio,
 " having sold himself to Cæsar, he was, as
 " Cicero says, as much the cause of the ensu" ing war, as Helen was of that of Troy." Phil. ii. 21, 22. Midd. p. 64.

* He means the Aristocratic faction.

D

" do,

Y. R. 703. "do, and should place an intire confidence in my own and the Re-Bef. Chr. "public's forces". "In short," says Cicero, "though I was fre-49
 403 Conf. "quently checked by reflecting on the doubtful events of war, yet I "was made the more easy, when I heard a General, of such courage Ad An. vii. "and such experience and authority, discoursing, like a Statesman, up-
 8. "on the dangers that might attend an insincere accommodation."

^b This extravagant confidence betrays great weakness in Pompey, and the historians bring several reasons to account for it. He looked upon himself, it is said, as the idol of the people of Italy: For, having fallen dangerously ill, in the beginning of this same year, in Campania, the whole country made sacrifices to the gods for his recovery, and the example was followed by the rest of Italy: And, when he appeared in public, such multitudes came forth to see him, that no place could contain them. Plutarch, it may likewise be observed, has informed us, that Atticus and those who brought him the two legions from Gaul very much vilified Cæsar's actions there, and gave out scandalous reports in derogation of his honour, telling Pompey that he was unacquainted with his own strength and reputation, if he made use of any other forces against Cæsar than his own; for such was the soldiers' hatred to Cæsar and their love to Pompey, that they would all come over to him upon his first appearance. Whatever were the causes which raised in him so favourable an opinion of his power and security, certain it is that he proceeded so far as to laugh at those who seemed to dread the war; and somebody telling him, that, if Cæsar determined to march to Rome, there was nothing to oppose him, Pompey answered: In whatever part of Italy I stamp with my foot, there will rise up legions.

^c Cicero, in a letter to Atticus on the subject of his interview with Pompey on the 10th of December, writes thus: "Pompey said, that he had long perceived Cæsar to be alienated from him, but had received a very late instance of it: For that Hirtius came from Cæsar a few days before, and did not come to see him; and, when Balbus promised to bring Scipio an account of his business the next morning before day, Hirtius was gone back to Cæsar in the night: This he takes for a clear proof of Cæsar's resolution to break with him." Ad Att. vii. 4. Had not Pompey given Cæsar sufficient provocation? If Cæsar had acted with the perfidious insincerity of Pompey, it had been an eternal blemish upon his character.

CHAP. II.

Cæsar is ordered, by a Decree of the Senate, to disband his army, and, in case of refusal, is declared a public enemy. The Consuls and other Magistrates are vested with extraordinary powers. Cæsar passes the Rubicon with one legion, and, in two months time, makes himself Master of all Italy.

C. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, } Consuls.
 L. LENTULUS CRUS,

Y. R. 704. ON the 1st of January^d, Cæsar came to Rome, and produced letters
 Bef. Chr. from Cæsar to the Senate, in which, after enumerating his ma-48.
 403 Conf. ny services to the Republic, and answering the accusations of his enemies,

^d The months of the Roman calendar, at this time, did not perfectly correspond with those of our Julian year; but the difference was not so great as our learned Bishop Usher has made it. Annals, p. 639 According to him the 1st of January of this Roman year answered mies, he declared, "that he was willing to lay down his command, if Pompey should also consent to that measure; and that, as there could be no safety for him upon any other terms, he would immediately, if his demand was not complied with, march into Italy, and revenge the injuries done to himself and the Commonwealth." It was with great difficulty that the Tribunes procured these letters to be read; but nothing could prevail with the Consuls to permit their contents to come under the deliberation of the House: And they proposed to debate on the state of the Commonwealth. Lentulus declared that he would not be wanting to the Senate and the common cause, if they would deliver their opinions with freedom and courage: But that, if they continued to regard Cæsar, and affected to court his friendship, he would disclaim intirely their authority. Scipio, father-in-law to Pompey, spoke to the same purpose: He said that Pompey was firmly bent not to abandon the Republic, if he found the Senators ready to support him: But that, if they cooled or were remiss in their resolves, it would be in vain for them to expect his aid, if they should afterwards find it necessary to apply for it. The speech of Scipio was considered as proceeding from Pompey, who was at that time in the suburbs. Others proposed milder councils. M. Marcellus objected to any deliberation on this matter till troops were raised over all Italy, and an army got ready, under whose protection the Senate might proceed with freedom and safety in their debates. It was moved by Callidius, that Pompey should be sent to his government of Spain, in order to take away all occasion of discord; because Cæsar, it was said, had reason to fear that the two legions, taken from him, were retained by Pompey in the neighbourhood of Rome, to be employed against him. M. Cælius spoke to the same purpose. But they were all severely reprimanded by the Consul Lentulus, who expressly refused

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.
Cæsar de
Bell. Civ.
Com. lib. i.

answered to the 22d of October of the Julian year, 50 before Christ; so that the autumnal months were carried back into summer, and the winter months into autumn. It is impossible to reconcile this way of reckoning with the unanimous testimony of the ancient historians. And the Primate pretends that they were deceived by Cæsar's reformation of the Kalendar. But it is also irreconcilable with the facts related by them; and it is astonishing that Abbé Mongault, Dr. Middleton, and M. Cævier, who have examined so narrowly into every thing relating to these times, did not perceive this mistake. Cicero, in a letter to Tiro, whom he had left sick beyond seas, dated the 29th of January, charges him not to fail during winter: Carve festines aut committas, ut aut æger aut hieme naviges; and he adds, that he imagines the hard winter has prevented his letters from reaching him: Neque enim meas puto ad te litteras tanta hieme perferre. Ep. Fam. xvi. 11. Could Cicero, then in the Southern parts of Italy, call the beginning of November hard winter? No; he speaks of letters written in the end of December. In a letter dated the 7th of April, ad Att. x. 2. he says, the swallow is come, garrula [hirundo] en adest, or the spring is come. The 1st of April therefore could not answer to any part of the month of January; it was certainly March. The ingenious M. de la Nauze, Member of the Royal Academy of Literature in Paris, has proved the first day of this Roman year to be the 16th of December of the Julian year, which is fifty-five days later than our learned Primate.

Y. R. 704
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

to put Callidius's motion to the vote: And M. Marcellus, awed by the Consul's rebuke, retracted what he had said. Thus the clamours of Lentulus, the dread of an army at the gates of Rome, and the menaces of Pompey's friends, intimidating the greatest part of the Senate, it was carried, though with great difficulty, that Cæsar should be ordered to disband his army before a certain day then fixed; and that, in case of disobedience, he should be declared an enemy to the Republic. This is Cæsar's account, and it appears to be a true one, from the conduct of the Senate in the last year, and from Cicero's letters*. The boasted advantage of Pompey's having the support of the Senate must be considered, of consequence, as nothing more than a fair appearance; and was in reality a new infringement of the liberty of his country; since it was procured by the most illegal and tyrannical means.

404. De
h. l. Civ.
Com. lib. i.

M. Antony and Q. Cassius, Tribunes of the People, put their negative on the decree of the Senate; but their prerogative was disputed, and a debate ensued, in the course of which many severe speeches were made against them. He who spoke with the greatest warmth and passion was most applauded by the Pompeian faction. The assembly broke up without coming to any determination; and Pompey, in the evening, sent for all those who were of his party, and commended the forward, and reproved and animated the more moderate. Multitudes of veterans, who had formerly served under him, flocked to Rome from all parts, allured by the expectation of rewards and dignities: And a great number of Officers belonging to the legions lately returned by Cæsar had likewise orders to attend him. The city was filled with troops.

11.1.

The contest between the Consuls and the Tribunes was renewed the following days, and continued till the 7th, during which time Piso, the Censor, father-in-law to Cæsar, and L. Roscius, the Prætor, who had served under Cæsar in Gaul, offered to go to him and acquaint him with the state of affairs, demanding only six days for that purpose. Others proposed to send Deputies to him: But all these pro-

* He writes to Atticus in the end of December: "I am daily more apprehensive of the public commotions, for even our patriots are not so unanimous as they ought to be. How many Knights, how many Senators have I seen, who have bitterly inveighed against the whole of Pompey's conduct, and especially the unreasonable journey he has undertaken?" Ad Att. l. vii. 5. [This journey was probably to give directions for the raising of troops.] Ibid. 6. "I am in great concern about the public, nor have I hitherto found a Man, who did not think it better to yield to Cæsar all he demands, than enter upon a civil war." Cicero himself was of the same opinion, as he declares in the same letter: "You will ask me then, what are my real sentiments? Why, truly, they are not the same with my words. My sentiments are, that any concession is preferable to a civil war: But I will talk, and that too from no servile motive, in the same strain that Pompey does. For indeed it would be of the worst consequence to the public, and particularly unbecoming in me, should I differ from Pompey at this important juncture." Unbecoming to speak his real sentiments, and to advise what he thought was for the public good! This, it must be confessed, is a very strange morality.

posals

posals were rejected by the Consuls, and by Scipio, Cato, and the other chiefs of the Aristocratical faction. The tribunes were threatened, or, according to *Appian*¹, were ordered to leave the House: And the Senate had recourse to that decree, which was never used but in the greatest extremity, *that the Consuls, Prætors, Tribunes of the People, and the Proconsuls that were near Rome, should take care that the Commonwealth received no detriment*². Antony and Cassius left the city that same night, disguised like slaves, in a hired carriage, and stopped not till they got to Rimini. Curio and M. Cælius soon followed them.

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

The following days the Senate assembled without the city, where Pompey confirmed every thing he had before intimated by the mouth of Scipio: He applauded the resolution and courage of the Senators, and acquainted them, that he had ten legions already in arms, and was besides well informed that Cæsar's troops were by no means satisfied with their General, and had even refused to support and follow him. It was then proposed that troops should be raised all over Italy; that Faustus Sylla should be sent Proprætor to Mauritania; and that King Juba should have the title of King and Ally to the people of Rome. Marcellus, the Consul, opposed the last of these motions, and Philippus, Tribune of the people, would not agree to the proprætorship of Sylla. The other motions were approved of. The affair of the provinces, two of which were consular, and the rest prætorian, came next to be canvassed. Syria was allotted to Scipio, and Transalpine Gaul to L. Domitius. To the prætorian provinces Governors were assigned without the privacy or approbation of the people, and they instantly departed for their several commands. Thus war was in effect declared against Cæsar; and measures were taken to arm the whole empire in order to crush him. The Pompeians flattered themselves that, before Cæsar could draw his forces together from the several quarters of Gaul where they

Cæs. de
Bell. Civ.
Com. lib. i.

Ep. Fam.
xvi. 12.
Melm 7. 5.

¹ Appian says, "that Marcellus and Lentulus ordered Antony and Cassius to leave the Senate, lest no regard should be had to their dignity: That Antony, leaping from his seat in great rage, invoked the faith of the gods and men, and lamented that an authority, which had been hitherto held sacred, was no longer a security; and that those who proposed salutary advice were driven out of the Senate, as if they had been guilty of murder or some other crime: That, after pronouncing these words, he instantly departed in a fury, foretelling, in a prophetic strain, the wars, proscriptions, banishments, and confiscations with which the city was threatened, and making horrid impreca-

tions against those who were the cause of all these miseries." On the contrary, Cicero, in a letter to Tiro, dated the 12th of January, writes thus: " Curio in conjunction with Q. Cassius and M. Antony, without the least violence being offered to them, have withdrawn themselves to Cæsar. They took this step immediately after the Senate had given in charge to the Consuls, the Prætors, and the Tribunes of the People, together with those of us who are inveiled with proconsular power, to take care of the interest of the Republic. Ep. Fam. xvi. 11. Melm. vii. 1.

² Id Jan. or the 7th of January: The 28th of October according to Bishop Usher, but rather the 12th of December.

were

Y. R. 704- were quartered, Pompey would have a considerable army on foot, with Bof. Car. which he might possess himself of the principal parts of Italy, obstruct
 48. his access to Rome, and hold him continually employed, till the army 423 Conf. from Spain, consisting of five legions under the command of Afranius, Petreibus, and Varro, came up upon his rear, to complete his overthrow. They did not doubt but he would be deserted by great numbers of his Officers and soldiers, and that the two Gauls would rise against him; every part of those provinces, excepting only the colonies beyond the Po, being thought utterly averse to him.

Ep. Fam. Cicero arrived at Rome on the 4th of January, with all the pomp of
 vii. 11. his proconsular and imperial dignity: And, in this disordered state Melm. vii. of the city, he solicited a decree for his triumph, to which, as he in-
 1. forms us, in a letter to Tiro, "the Senate, in a very full House, im"mediately consented: But that the Consul Lentulus, in order to ap"propriate to himself a greater share in conferring this honour, told "them, that he would propose it himself in proper form as soon as "he should have dispatched the affairs that were necessary in the pre"sent conjuncture." In the same letter, which is dated the 12th of January, he adds, "I am unhappily fallen into the very midst of pub"lic dissension, or, rather indeed, I find myself surrounded with the "flames of a civil war. It was my earnest desire to have composed
 "these dangerous ferments: And I probably might, if the passions of "some in both parties, who are equally eager for war, had not ren"dered my endeavours ineffectual.——We are raising forces with "all possible diligence, under the authority and with the assistance of "Pompey: Who now begins, somewhat too late, I fear, to be ap"prehensive of Cæsar's power.——I act with great moderation:
 "And this conduct renders my influence with both parties so much
 "the stronger. The several districts of Italy are assigned to our re"spective protections: And Capua is the department I have taken for "mine." And in a letter, dated the 29th of January, he observes, "It has "been the perpetual purpose of all my speeches, my votes, and my ac"tions, ever since I returned to Rome, to preserve the public tranquillity,
 "but an invincible rage for war had unaccountably seized not only the "enemies, but even those who are esteemed the friends of the Commonwealth:
 "And it was in vain I remonstrated that nothing was more to be "dreaded than a civil war.——Upon my return to Rome, it was too "late to enforce my pacific sentiments: I was wholly unsupported in "my opinion, and not only found myself among a set of men, who "were madly inflamed with a thirst of war, but was considered likewise
 "as one, who, by a long absence, was quite unacquainted with the "true state of the Commonwealth."

It is remarkable that Cicero, in his letter to Tiro, talks of his influence with both parties, and that here he complains of his being totally disregarded.

Cæsar

Cæsar was at Ravenna, when he received the first intelligence of the proceedings against him. He assembled his troops, and acquainted them with the grateful requital which his long and glorious services had met with from the Senate. In his speech, he insisted on nothing so much as the violation of the tribunitian power in the persons of Antony and Cassius. He complained of the innovation introduced into the Commonwealth, which checked, by the terror of arms, the authority of the Tribunes: He said, "that Sylla, who had made it his business "to humble, and almost annihilate that magistracy, had yet left it "the liberty of opposition; but that Pompey, who valued himself for "having restored it to all its prerogatives, deprived it now of that "privilege which it had always enjoyed." His Officers and soldiers having testified their readiness to defend him and the Tribunes, he sent dispatches to his Lieutenants in Gaul to quit their winter-quarters and come to him with all expedition; and he himself entered immediately upon action, and marched to Ariminum. There he found Antony and Cassius, whom he produced in the servile disguise they had been forced to put on for their security: And the sight of them greatly exasperated the soldiers, who made fresh protestations to their General, that they would follow him wherever he should think proper to lead them¹.

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Cæf. de
Bell. Civ.
Com. lib. i.

Cæsar,

¹ Suetonius (in Vit. Cæs. c. 31.) mentions several particulars which I have not thought worthy of being inserted into the text of this history. He says, "that, as soon as Cæsar was informed that the interposition of "the Tribunes had been over-ruled, and "that they themselves had been forced to "save themselves by flight, he privately "dispatched away some battalions; and, to "prevent any suspicion of his design, he "attended at a public show, and examined "the model of a school for gladiators, "which he intended to build; and sat down "to table with his friends as usual: That "after sun-set, having caused mules from "a neighbouring mill to be put to his chaise, "he set out with all possible secrecy and a "small retinue; but, his lights going out, "he lost his way, and wandered a long "time in the dark, till, meeting at break "of day with a guide, he got on foot "through some narrow paths into the road "again, and came up with his troops on "the banks of the Rubicon, which was the "boundary of his province: And that there "he remained silent and pensive for some "time, musing on the greatness of his attempt; then, turning to those about him,

"we may still retreat, said he, but, if we "pass this little bridge, we must put all to the "decision of the sword." Cæsar mentions nothing of all this. The great secrecy so much insisted on could serve no purpose; nor is it consistent with Cæsar's speech to his soldiers at Ravenna. His hesitation on the banks of the Rubicon is quite ridiculous: His determination had been taken long before, and indeed was not free: But let us proceed with this curious narrative.

"Whilst Cæsar was demurring upon the "matter, a man of an extraordinary size "and shape appeared of a sudden, sitting "by the river, and playing on a rural flute. "The novelty of the sight drew together a "great many of the soldiers, and among "the rest a trumpeter, from whom the extraordinary man, snatching the trumpet, "leaped into the water, and, sounding a "charge, went over to the other side; "upon which Cæsar, without farther consideration, crossed the river, crying out "aloud, Let us go where the Gods so remarkably call us, and where the fury of our enemies drives us: The lot is cast.

The same historian adds, "and accordingly, passing the river with his army, "and

Y. R. 724.
B. f. Chr.
48.
403 C. C.

Arezzo.
Peters.
Fano.
Lugubro.

Ofmo.

Ascoli.

Mid. p. 69.

Cæsar, sensible of what importance celerity was in his present situation, to prevent the efforts of his enemies, and to raise the courage of his friends, did not lose a moment, but sent M. Antony with five cohorts to seize Arretium, and other Officers to secure Pisaurum, Fanum, and Ancona, while he himself remained at Ariminum to levy troops. And, being informed that the Prætor Thermus had entered Iguvium with five cohorts, and was endeavouring to fortify the town, whose inhabitants he knew to be well inclined to his interest, he detached instantly Curio to oppose him with three cohorts, drawn from the towns he had already got possession of. Thermus left the place on Curio's approach, and was deserted by his soldiers in his retreat. Attius Varus also, who commanded in Auximum, was obliged to abandon it, on account of the disaffection of the townsmen to his cause, and, being attacked in his retreat, was likewise deserted by his troops, part of which went to their homes, and the rest joined themselves to Cæsar.

The first report of this march towards Rome struck the Magistrates with such a panic, that they precipitately came to the shameful resolution of forsaking the city. Pompey had treated with contempt the menaces of his rival, but it plainly appeared that he was utterly unprepared to oppose him. Instead of marching towards Cæsar, and taking the command of the troops cantoned in Picenum and the neighbouring provinces, he withdrew to the two legions near Capua, whither he was soon followed by the Consuls and the chief Senators of his faction. Cæsar affirms that their consternation was so great, that, when the Consul Lentulus came to the treasury to deliver out the money to Pompey, in consequence of the decree of the Senate, he scarce waited the opening of the inner door, but hastily left the place, upon a false rumour that Cæsar was approaching, and that some of his cavalry were already in view. However, Pompey sent orders to the Commanders in the North of Italy, to stop Cæsar's progress as much as possible: And Lentulus Spinther threw himself into Asculum, a town of Picenum, with ten cohorts, while at the same time L. Domitius took possession of Corfinium, a strong town in the country of the Peliani, at the foot of the Apennine, on the Adriatic side, where he proposed to make a stand till Pompey could come up.

At Capua, the Consuls took courage, and began to renew their levies in the surrounding colonies. This town had always been the common seminary or place for educating gladiators for the great men of

“and having received the Tribunes of “the people, he, with tears in his eyes and “his cloaths torn away from his breast, im“plored the protection of the soldiers.”
Could Cæsar be ignorant of the attachment of his soldiers to him? Had they not followed him with an intire confidence for nine years? Had he not endeared himself to them by the unwearied care he had taken of their subsistence, and by his magnificent presents?

Did not both the soldiers and Officers ground the hopes of their fortunes upon his generosity and protection?

of Rome; and there Cæsar had a famous school of them at this time, which he had long maintained under the best masters, for the occasions of his public shews in the city. And, as they were very numerous and well furnished with arms, there was reason to apprehend that they would break out, and make some attempt in favour of their Master, which, in the present state of affairs, might be of dangerous consequence. Pompey therefore, we are told, thought it necessary to take them out of their school, and to distribute them among the principal inhabitants of the place, assigning two to each Master of a family, by which he secured them from doing any mischief. But Cæsar's account is very different; he tells us, "that Lentulus summoned the gladiators into the Forum, gave them their liberty, furnished them with horses, and commanded them to follow him: But, being admonished by his friends that this step was unanimously condemned, he dispersed them into the neighbouring towns of Campania to keep garrison there." It is probable that Lentulus had rashly employed, or thought of employing, the gladiators, in the manner here mentioned, but that Pompey, sensible of the impropriety of arming slaves against their Master, had disposed of them as we have just now related^{*}.

While preparations were thus making on the side of Pompey, and while Cæsar was pushing on the war with incredible vigour, messages were sent by the two Generals to each other concerning an accommodation. Before Cæsar left Ariminum, young L. Cæsar, whose father was one of his Lieutenants, came to him, and told him, that he was impowered to inform him, "that Pompey was desirous of clearing himself to Cæsar, lest he might interpret those actions as designed to affront him, which had no other aim but the good of the Commonwealth; the advantage of which it was Pompey's constant maxim to prefer to any private interest; and that Cæsar, in the opinion of Pompey, should sacrifice his passion and resentment to the same noble motive, and not prejudice his country by pushing too far his resentment against his private enemies." The Prætor Roscius, who had a commission of the like nature from Pompey, joined likewise in the negotiation. Cæsar made answer, "that the interest of the Commonwealth had always been dearer to him than life; and that, though he could not help being alarmed at the malice of his enemies, who had frustrated the good intentions of the Roman people in his favour, by cutting off

^{*} It appears from a letter of Cicero to Atticus, that, in relation to these gladiators, there were two different reports at different times: "I was misinformed," says he, "as to what I wrote to you, upon the strength of Torquatus's intelligence, with regard to Cæsar's gladiators at Capua: For Pompey has quartered them very judiciously

"among the inhabitants, two to each family. There were five thousand, and they threatened to break out. This was a measure greatly for the service of the public." Ad Att. vii. 14. I cannot think there could be five thousand gladiators in one school: Perhaps there may be an error in the number.

V. R. - 24. " six months from his command, and obliging him to return to Rome
 Bel. Chr. " to sue for the consulship, he had yet, for the sake of his country;
 48. " patiently submitted to this assault upon his honour. That his pro-403 Conf. " posal of disbanding the armies, on both sides, which he had made
 " in his letter to the Senate, had been rejected; and that new levies " were making all over Italy. That the two legions, which had been " taken from him under the pretence of the Parthian war, were still " retained in the service of his enemies; and that the whole State was " in arms. That all this aimed evidently at his destruction: But that,
 " nevertheless, he was ready to agree to any proposal, and expose him" self to any danger for the sake of his country. Let Pompey [he conti" nued] go to his government: Let all the armies be disbanded: Let every " one throughout Italy lay down his arms: Let everything that participates
 " of terror and force be removed: Let the elections of magistrates be made " with perfect freedom: And let the Republic be administered by the autho" rity of the Senate and People. And, the better to settle all these ar" ticles, and in order to corroborate them with an oath, let Pompey him" self draw nearer, or suffer Cæsar to approach him; as all differences
 " may most easily be determined by a conference ¹."

L. Cæsar

En. Fam. xvi. 12. ¹ Cicero, in a letter to Tiro, dated the 20th of January, gives a quite different account of Cæsar's proposals, which is followed by Dr. Middleton: "Cæsar is reported to have offered us [ferantur conditiones] the following conditions: In the first place, that Pompey shall retire to his government of Spain; in the next, that the army we have raised shall be disbanded, and our garrisons evacuated. Upon these terms he promised to deliver up the farther Gaul into the hands of L. Domitius, and the nearer into those of Confidius Novianus; the persons to whom these provinces have been respectively allotted. He farther engages to resign his right of suing for the consulship in his absence, and is willing to return to Rome in order to appear as a candidate in the regular form. We have accepted these propositions, provided he withdraws his forces from the several towns he has taken, that the Senate may assemble at Rome in order to pass a decree for that purpose. If he should think proper to comply with this proposal, there are hopes of peace; not indeed of a very honourable one, as the terms are imposed upon us; yet any thing is preferable to our present circumstances. But, if he should refuse to stand to his overtures, we are prepared for an engagement: But

" an engagement which Cæsar, after having incurred the general odium of retracting his own conditions, will scarce be able to sustain." It is not at all probable that Cæsar made the proposals here mentioned: because he would thereby have given himself up to his enemies. Cicero, therefore, was either ill informed, or L. Cæsar added to what Cæsar had proposed: And this, according to Dion. Cassius, was really the case. The following extracts from Cicero's letters to Atticus, concerning this whole negotiation, cannot, I think, be disagreeable to the reader, who may compare them with Cæsar's relation, to which I have given the preference:

" I saw L. Cæsar at Minturnæ on the 23d of January in the morning. This rope of sand, for I cannot call him a man, was charged with propositions so absurd, that I imagined Cæsar designed them as a ridicule upon all negotiations, especially as he gave so important a commission to so inconsiderable a creature. I cannot account for his conduct any other way, unless (which may possibly be the case) this Envoy has caught up some random expressions of Cæsar and converted them into a commission for himself." Ad Att. vii. 13. Guthrie's transl. It is plain, that L. Cæsar did not explain his commission to

L. Cæsar and Roscius, having received this answer, departed for Capua, near which place they found Pompey and the Consuls, and laid Cæsar's

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
473 Cont.

to Cicero on the 23^d, as Cicero explained it six days after to Tiro, or Cicero would not have treated it with such contempt.

"On the 23^d, L. Cæsar delivered Cæsar's proposals to Pompey, while he was at Theanum with the Consuls. The terms were approved of, on condition that he should withdraw his troops from all the places, not within his own government, that he had seized. If he would do that, it was agreed that we should return to Rome, and that the Senate should ratify the treaty. At present I am in hopes we shall have peace; because Cæsar thinks he has gone too far, and Pompey that his army is too weak." Ad Att. vii. 14 [dated the 25th.]

"Upon my arrival at Capua yesterday, being the 25th of January, I had a meeting with the Consuls and many others of the Senate. All of them wished that Cæsar would draw off his troops and stand to the terms he had proposed. Favonius was the only man who expressed his dislike of his imposing terms upon us; but he was very little regarded in the meeting. for Caro himself would now rather comply than fight. He declares, however, that he intends to be present in the Senate, where, I am afraid, he will do great hurt.—We have here great variety of opinions as to public matters. It is generally imagined that Cæsar will not stand to his proposals, which he is thought to have made to divert us from making the necessary preparations to oppose him in the field. For my own part, I am of opinion, that he will stand to them so far as to withdraw his troops from the towns not in his government. For he will have gained his ends, if he should be made Consul, and the conclusion of this scene will be less guilty than its commencement. But still we must be under his buffet; for we are scandalously unprovided both as to troops and money; having left to his mercy not only the private property, but the public treasury of Rome." Ad Att. vii. 15. [dated the 26th.]

"We are now in great suspense concerning two points. The one is, how Cæsar will proceed upon the answer which L.

Cæsar was charged with to lay before him.

"The other is, how Pompey will act, who writes to me, that, in a few days, he will be at the head of an effective army, and gives me hopes that, when he arrives at Picenum, we shall be in a condition to return to Rome. He has with him Labienus, who takes it for granted that Cæsar's army is but weak, and his desertion has put our friend Pompey into high spirits." Ibid. Ep. xvi. [dated the 29th.]

"Now you doubtless know the answer which Pompey sent to Cæsar by L. Cæsar, and the letter he sent him by the same hand: for they were written and delivered with a view of making them public. I have blamed Pompey in my own mind as he himself has a very perspicuous style, for employing our friend Settius in drawing up a writing of so great importance, especially as it is to be made public: Nor, to say the truth, did I ever see any thing more truly in the Settian style. But, from Pompey's letter, it is plain that Cæsar has been denied nothing; that he has obtained all, and more than he demanded: And, as he has obtained his demands, impudent as they are, he would be the worst of madmen should he break off the accommodation. For what right had he, or you, or any man to say, I will do so and so, if Pompey will go to Spain, and if he will withdraw his troops from Italy? Yet even this has been complied with, though I own the compliance does not now come with so good a grace, after the government has been attacked and hostilities commenced, as it would have done before, when he demanded the dispensation with his absence while he stood for the consulate. After all, I am apprehensive, that even these terms will not satisfy him. It was no good symptom that he continued his operations during the dependence of the treaty which he committed to L. Cæsar, and before he had any answer. At present, he is said to proceed more violently than ever." Ibid. Ep. xvii. [dated Feb. 2.]

"We hear that the city is wonderfully pleased with Pompey's answer, and that it was approved of in an assembly of the people.

Y. R. 704. Cæsar's proposals before them. After deliberating upon the affair, they sent a reply in writing by the same messengers, which informed Cæsar that he must quit Ariminum, return to Gaul, and disband his army; which conditions being performed, Pompey would go into Spain: And that, in the mean time, till he gave security for the performance of what he had promised, neither Pompey nor the Consuls would discontinue their levies.

It was by no means, in the opinion of Cæsar, a fair proposal, that he should be obliged to quit Ariminum and return to Gaul: whilst Pompey held provinces and legions that had not been legally allotted to him; and that he should dismiss his army, whilst Pompey was levying troops, and only promised to go to his government without fixing a day: An evasion by which, was he to be found in Italy even at the expiration of Cæsar's consulship, he could not be charged with a breach of faith. His forbearing to appoint a time for a conference, and his declining to approach nearer, gave little reason to hope for a peace^m.

T. Labienus,

"people. I always thought it would; and "that Cæsar would lose his interest, should "be reject it. But, should he accept it —
 "alas, say you, which is the lesser evil?
 "This is a question I cannot answer, unless
 "I knew in what forwardness our prepara"tions are. Ibid. Ep. 18, [dated Feb. 3.]
 "I am really so far from having any thing
 "to write, that I have withdrawn a letter
 "which I was to have sent you, because it "was so full of hopes for the best, founded
 "upon my informations of the dispositions
 "of the assembly of the people of Rome, and "upon my own suggestions that Cæsar would "never reject the terms that were granted
 "him, especially as they were proposed by "himself. Mean while, on the morning "of the 4th of February, I received letters
 "from you, from Philistinus and Furnius,
 "with one to the latter from Curius, ridi-
 "culing the whole of L. Cæsar's negotia"tion. We are indeed reduced to a despe"rate pass. — I am setting out for Capua,
 "where I can be better informed of Pompey's
 "situation." Ibid. Ep. xix. [dated Feb. 4.]
 "This juncture requires fewness of words.
 "I despair of peace: We are unprovided
 "for war. You cannot imagine two more "despicable creatures than our Consuls. After "coming, as I was ordered, to Capua,
 "through a deluge of rain upon the 4th in"stant, in hopes of hearing and understand"ing our preparations, I have missed them
 "here, and when they come they will come "unprovided and unprepared. As to Pom-
 "pey, he is said to be at Luccia to put himself at the head of some cohorts of Attius's

 "legions, who are thought to be wavering."
Ibid. Ep. xx. [dated Feb. 5.]

"It seems very evident," says the in"genious author of the life of Cicero, "that "Cæsar had no real thoughts of peace, by "his paying no regard to Pompey's answer,
 "and the trifling reasons which he gave for "slighting it. The sending a message so "important by a person so insignificant as "young L. Cæsar looked, says Cicero, as "if he had done it by way of contempt, or
 "with a view to disclaim it, especially "when, after offering conditions which "were likely to be accepted, he would not
 "sit still to wait an answer, but continued
 "his march with the same diligence; and "in the same hostile manners before." He "is therefore of opinion, "that Cæsar had a
 "double view in offering these conditions;
 "for by Pompey's rejecting them, as there "was reason to expect, from his known aver"sion to any treaty, he hoped to load him
 "with the odium of the war; or, by his em"bracing them, to slacken his prepara"tions and retard his design of leaving I- "taly; whilst he himself, in the mean
 "time, by following him with a celerity
 "that amazed every body, might chance to "come up with him, and give a decisive
 "blow to the war; from which he had no"thing to apprehend, but its being drawn "into length. I now plainly see, says Ci- "cero, though later indeed than I could have "wished, on account of the assurances given
 "me by Balbus, that he aims at nothing else,
 "nor

T. Labienus, Cæsar's principal Lieutenant in the Gallic war, who had not only eminently distinguished himself by his military exploits, but had raised an immense fortune, deserted his General about this time, and came over to Pompey. This added a new life to his cause, and raised an expectation that many more would follow the example. He was much caressed and carried about every-where by Pompey, who promised himself great service from his fame and experience, and especially from his credit in Cæsar's army, and his knowledge of his councils: But his account of things, like that of all deserters, was accommodated rather to please than to serve his new friends; representing the weakness of CÆSAR's troops, their aversion to his present designs, the disaffection of the two Gauls, and disposition to revolt; the contrary of all

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Midd. p.
70.

"nor has ever aimed at any thing from the beginning but POMPEY's life." Midd. p. 72, 73. But this is the conclusion of a man whose mind was confounded by continual disappointments, (for indeed he was no prophet, as he is commonly supposed to have been) and disturbed by a thousand vain fears. Cicero apprehended also that Cæsar would prove a Phalaris, sack Rome, and commit all manner of cruelties. Such passionate expressions are no authorities. Velleius Paterculus, (l. ii. c. 50.) has, from the consideration of Cæsar's conduct, inferred just the contrary: At Cæsar Domitio legionibusque Corfinii, quæ una cum eo fuerant, potitus, duce aliisque qui voluerant abire ad Pompeium, sine dilatione dimissis, persequitur Brundisium, ita ut appareret, malle, integris rebus & conditionibus, finire bellum, quam opprimere fugientes.—As to the arguments brought in proof of Cæsar's insincerity, they are very weak. 1. Cæsar's reasons for paying no regard to Pompey's answer are no ways trifling. If he had submitted to go back to his province, whilst Pompey remained in Italy to influence the public deliberations, his cause was discredited, and he was evidently undone. He would have been obliged to submit to every thing imposed upon him by Pompey and his adherents, backed by the forces he would soon have had at hand. 2. Cæsar's message was given not only to L. Cæsar, but also to the Prætor Roscius: And L. Cæsar was employed for no other reason, than because he had brought a message from Pompey. 3. It would have been folly in Cæsar, while his enemies were making preparations against him with the utmost diligence, to have suspended his military operations in a conjuncture when all depended upon expedition. And I oppose to the authority of Dr. Middleton that of Matius, of whom Cicero gives this character: (Ad Att. ix. 11.) "Indeed I think him a discreet, wise man, and he has been always reckoned an adviser of peaceable measures."—"As we had a great deal of conversation, says Cicero, I shewed him Cæsar's letter to me, and I begged to know what he meant by his expressions of his wanting to be directed by my advice, interest, authority, and assistance in all things. His answer was, that he made no doubt Cæsar applied to me for my assistance and interest in bringing about an accommodation.—He was very positive that Cæsar's sentiments were pacific, and promised to recommend the thing to him himself." Velleius Paterculus, who, in general, is not unfavourable to Pompey and his cause, intirely condemns the Pompeians in this negotiation. After saying: Alterius ducis causa melior videbatur, alterius erat firmitior: Hic omnia speciosa, illic valentia: Pompeium Senatus auctoritas, Cæsarem militum armavit fiducia:—Vir antiquus et gravis Pompeii partes laudaret magis, prudens sequeretur Cæsaris; et illa gloriosa, hæc terribiliora duceret: He adds, Nihil reliquum a Cæsare, quod servandæ pacis causa tentari posset: Nihil receptum a Pompeianis; cum alter Consul iusto esset feracior; Lentulus vero salva rep. salvis esse non posset; M. autem Cato moriendum ante, quam ullam conditionem civis accipiendam rep. contenderet: ut deinde spretis omnibus quæ Cæsar postulaverat, tantummodo contentus cum una legione titulum retinere provincie; privatus in urbem veniret, et se in petitione consulatus suffragiis pop. Rom. committeret decrevere. L. ii. c. 49.

which.

Y. R. 704. which was found to be true in the event: And as he came to them
 L. C. alone, without bringing with him any of those troops with which 403. Conf. he had acquired his reputation, so his desertion had no other effect than to ruin his own fortunes without doing any service to Pompey *. Cæsar behaved on this occasion with great magnanimity: He took very little notice of his Lieutenant's desertion, though the example might have been of dangerous consequence in the beginning of a war of this nature; and sent after him all his equipage, and every thing he had left behind.

There were now little hopes of an accommodation between the two ambitious Chiefs: Matters were too far engaged, and their enmity too openly declared. Their reciprocal proposals, which were drawn up in writing and immediately published, were no more than manifestoes to justify their conduct. Pompey, whose chief reliance was on his troops in Spain, and the forces of the East, which were absolutely in his interest, resolved to hazard nothing in Italy, and, while he remained there, his sole aim was to gain time. Cæsar, on the contrary, who had nothing to depend on but his army, and the present favourable dispositions of the people of Rome, was bent upon pushing his point, with all possible celerity. From Auximum, where we left him, he traversed the whole country of Picenum°, as far as Cingulum, with only

* Cicero thinks aloud in his letters to his friend Atticus, and it is entertaining to consider his various views of the same objects, and the shiftings of his mind. Ep. vii. 12.
ad Att. dated Jan. 22. "It is next to certain that Labienus has left Cæsar. In that case, if he had gone to Rome, while the Magistrates and the Senate were there, he would have been of great use to our party. It would have intimated that the best of Cæsar's friends had condemned him as a traitor to his country. The fact is indeed so, but, at the present juncture, it is of less use, because our party cannot avail itself of it; and I believe that Labienus himself repeats of what he has done. Yet, after all, there is a possibility that his leaving Cæsar is false; we, however, depend upon it as a certainty."

Ep. xiii. "I look upon Labienus to be a Hero. We have not for these many years had so noble an instance of Roman spirit. Had it no other effect, it has that of galling Cæ- sar, but I am in hopes of seeing it productive of more solid consequences."

Ibid. "Labienus, whom I think a truly great man, came on the 22d instant to Tbeaunum, where he had a conference with Pompey and the Consuls. What the "import and result of it was, I will write to you when I am better informed.— Labienus seems to have given us spirits." Yes, Pompey, encouraged by him, talked big, that he would soon be at the head of an effective army; that he would march into Pi- cenum, and put things into such a posture that the Senate might safely return to Rome.

Ad Att. viii. 2. Feb. 17. "There is no dignity in Labienus." And thus the Hero, the high-spirited Roman, sinks into a base deserter:

Fortis in armis
Cæsaris Labienus erat; nunc transfuga vilis.
Lucan. v. 345.

About the same time Piso, Cæsar's father-in-law, left the city: This step engages all Cicero's affection to him, and raises his prophetic spirit: I am in love with Piso, and I can foresee the dislike he has signified of his son-in-law's conduct will make a great impression on the public.

* Picenum was reduced before the 8th of Feb. for Cicero, in a letter to Atticus of that date, (vii. 21.) writes, "Picenum is lost;
 nobody knows it but myself, by letters I have received from Dolabella. I expect every moment to hear of Cæsar's being in Apulia, and Pompey on shipboard."

one legion. He was joyfully received in all parts by the inhabitants, who were dazzled undoubtedly by the splendor of his victories, and the reputation of his generosity: And they furnished his army with every thing necessary. Even Cingulum itself, a town founded by Labienus, and built at his own expence, sent deputies to him with an offer of their submission and services; and he demanded from it a certain number of soldiers, which were immediately sent to him. There he was joined by the 12th legion, and, with this additional force, he continued his march to Asculum, of which Lentulus Spinther had taken possession, with ten cohorts. Lentulus, on the first news of his approach, quitted the place, and, in his retreat, was almost intirely deserted by his men: He joined, with the few that remained, Vibullius Rufus, whom Pompey had sent into Picenum, to encourage his followers in those parts. This Commander, understanding the state of affairs, and seeing himself unable to make head against Cæsar, drew together, from the neighbouring provinces, as many of Pompey's levies as he could meet with, and, among the rest, six cohorts under the command of Ulcilles Hirrus, who were flying from Camerinam, where they had been quartered; and, having formed, out of all these, thirteen cohorts, he posted by great journeys to Corfinium, where Domitius had already got together twenty-two, well disposed to Pompey's cause.

Pompey's intention was not that those numerous cohorts should remain in Corfinium, and there become a prey to Cæsar: He wrote the most pressing letters to L. Domitius to bring them to him; and these, as their contents are both interesting and necessary for the understanding of Pompey's conduct, should not be omitted, I think, by any one who writes the history of these times.

CN. MAGNUS, Proconsul, to DOMITIUS, Proconsul.

“ I AM surpris'd at my not hearing from you, and that all my “ public intelligence comes through other hands than yours. With “ forces so disunited as ours are it is impossible for us to be a match “ for our enemies; but, were they united, I am in hopes we may “ be yet the means of saving our country and providing for our own “ safety. Therefore, as Vibullius wrote to me, on the 5th of Febru- “ ary, that you were about to march from Corfinium to join me with “ your army, I cannot comprehend why you have altered your resolu“ tion. The reason Vibullius intimated to me, viz. that you had intelli“ gence of Cæsar's march from Firmum to the castle of Truentum, was a “ trifling one: For, the quicker the enemy's advances were towards you,
 “ your dispatch ought to have been the greater to join me, before Cæsar
 “ could have the means of either obstructing your march, or of cutting “ off my communication with you. I therefore, in the most earnest “ manner, intreat you again to take the very first opportunity of marching

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Cæf. de
Bell. Civ.
Com. lib. i.

Ad Att.
viii. 12.

Y. R. 704-^{48.} ing to Luceria, before the troops which Cæsar proposes to draw together can cut off our communication with one another. Should
 48. any endeavour to persuade you to remain as a guard to their properties, you cannot refuse to send me the cohorts which came from Picensum and Camerinum, and which have left behind them all their fortunes."

CN. MAGNUS, Proconsul, to DOMITIUS, Proconsul.

Ad Ann.
 viii. 12.

"M. CALENIUS brought me a letter from you the 16th of February, informing me, that you intended to observe Cæsar's motions; and, should he point his march for me by the sea, that you would forthwith join me in Samnium; but, should he tarry about those parts, that you was resolved to check him, in case he should attempt to extend his quarters. I am sensible this resolution proceeds from your courage and magnanimity; but we must be upon our guard, lest our being divided may give the enemy a superiority, as his army, which is already strong, is hourly increasing. It is inconsistent with your wisdom to have an eye only to the number of cohorts which Cæsar at present commands against you, without reflecting upon the great force of cavalry and infantry which he will, in a very short time, assemble. The letter I received from Buſſenius is an evidence that his strength will be much more considerable soon; for he tells me, and his intelligence is confirmed by many other correspondents, that Curio has drawn all the garrisons out of Umbria and Tuscany, and is marching at their head to join Cæsar. Now should all these troops join, and part of them be detached towards Alba, while part of them defile towards you, you must be shut up, as the enemy needs not fight you but upon his own terms: Neither can you, singly, in the face of such an enemy, send out foraging parties to maintain your numbers. I therefore again earnestly conjure you forthwith to march all your troops hither, the Consuls having come to the same resolution.

"I ordered Metuscius to acquaint you, how necessary it was for me to take care, that the two legions should not, without the Picentine cohorts, come in sight of Cæsar's quarters. You are therefore to give yourself no concern, if you shall hear that I retreat upon Cæsar's advancing against me. I must take care not to engage myself too far; for both the season of the year, and the dispositions of my soldiers, render it impracticable for me to form a regular incampment; nor would it be adviseable for me to draw all our garrisons from the fortified places, lest I should be cut off from all retreat. I have, therefore, assembled no more than fourteen cohorts at Luceria. The Consuls are either to join me with the troops they have drawn from the fortified places, or they are to go to Sicily.
 "For

“ For, we must either have an army strong enough to force our way “ through the enemy, or we must take possession of such passes as they “ cannot force. Now, both these expedients are impracticable at this “ juncture, both because Cæsar is master of great part of Italy, and be“ cause our army is neither so well provided, nor so numerous as his.
 “ We are therefore to be the more cautious in exposing the interests of “ the Republic. I again conjure you instantly to join me with all your “ troops. We may yet restore the government, if we serve her in con“ cert with one another ; but, by being dissipated and disunited, we “ shall become weak. Such are my sentiments.

Y. R. 704.
 Bef. Chr.
 48.
 403. Conf.

“ P. S. When I had finished this letter, Sica delivered to me your “ letter and commission, exhorting me to march towards Corfinium ;
 “ but that, I think, is what I cannot venture to do, especially as I “ put no great trust in the fidelity of the legions I command.”

Pompey, who had become sensible of the impossibility of defending Rome, and of his error in leaving the public money a prey to *Cæsar, had sent, on the 7th of February, the Tribune C. Cassius to Capua with directions to the Consuls to return to the city, which they were to leave, after taking all the money out of the Sacred Treasury. But one of the Consuls wrote back to Pompey, that he should first make himself Master of Picenum. The thing was now become impracticable : “ Return to Rome,” says Cicero, “ where is their convoy ?” “ Return from Rome, how shall they obtain leave ?” Notwithstanding this testimony of Cicero, our modern Historians commonly suppose that Lentulus did venture to go to Rome, and that it was on this occasion, that, frightened by a false report of Cæsar’s approach, he betook himself to flight without waiting till the inner door was opened, which is also contrary to the express testimony of Cæsar.

Ad Att.
 vii. 21.

Cæsar, having made himself Master of Asculum, ordered the soldiers who had deserted Lentulus to be sought after, and new levies to be made. He remained there but one day, to settle what related to provisions, and pursued his march to Corfinium. His advanced parties found five cohorts employed in breaking down a bridge three miles

* “ The leaving the public treasure at “ Rome a prey to Cæsar is censured more “ than once by Cicero, as one of the blun“ ders of his friends : [See Ad Att. vii. 12.
 “ 15.] but it is a common case in civil dis-“ sentions, for the honest side, through “ the fear of discrediting their cause by any “ irregular act, to ruin it by an unseason“ able moderation. The public money was “ kept in the temple of Saturn, and the “ Consuls contented themselves with carry“ ing away the keys, fancying that the sanc-

“ tity of the place would secure it from vio“ lence ; especially when the greatest part of “ it was a fund of the sacred kind, set apart
 “ by the laws for occasions only of the last “ exigency, or the terror of a Gallie inva“ sion.” Dr. Middl. p. 104. Cicero says that he advised the carrying away of this sacred treasure. [Ad Att. ix. 2.] And it was all along the intention of Pompey and the Consuls so to do, and it would have been done, had not their fears deprived them of their senses.

Y. R. 704. distant from the town, who instantly retired upon the first attack ;
 Bef. Chr. and Cæsar brought his legions under the very walls where he pitched 42. his camp.
 403 Conf.

As this was the first place which dared to make head against Cæsar, every body expected with impatience what would be the success of the enterprise. The Pompeians,^a both at Rome and in other parts of Italy, conceived great hopes, and did not doubt but Pompey would advance to the assistance of Domitius, to which he was earnestly pressed by that Commander ; who represented by letters, “ that it would be easy in “ that close country to shut up Cæsar between two armies, and cut off “ all his provisions ; and that, unless this course was followed, a great “ number of Senators and Roman Knights would be exposed to immi- “ nent danger.” He, at the same time, made preparations for a vigorous defence : He disposed engines all round the walls, appointed every one his particular post, and, to animate his men, promised every soldier four acres of land out of his own estate, and in proportion to every centurion and volunteer.

Cæsar de Bell. Civ. Corn. lib. i. Cæsar, who was not without apprehensions of being attacked by Pompey, employed the three first days after his sitting down before Corfinium in strongly fortifying his camp, and in procuring corn from the neighbouring towns. He did not, however, keep altogether within his intrenchments. Being informed that the people of Sulmona, a town seven miles distant from Corfinium, desired to put themselves under his protection, but were hindered by Q. Lucretius, a Senator, and Attius, a Pelignian, who held them in subjection with a garrison of seven cohorts ; he sent thither M. Antony with five cohorts, whose ensigns were no sooner descried from the walls, than the gates were thrown open, and the whole people in a body, both soldiers and townsmen, came out to congratulate Antony on his arrival. Lucretius and Attius endeavoured to escape over the walls ; but Attius was taken. Antony returned the same day ; and Cæsar, having joined the cohorts to his army, set Attius at liberty.

“ a A letter from Philotimus informed me
 “ on the 9th of February, in the evening,
 “ that Domitius was at the head of a strong “ army, which had been joined by the “ cohorts from Picenum, under the conduct “ of Lentulus and Thermus ; that Cæsar
 “ was apprehensive his communication “ would be cut off, which could be easily “ effected ; and that the Patriot party at “ Rome had recovered their spirits, and that “ the rebels were in a manner thunder“ struck. Tho’ I am informed that this good “ news is little better than visionary ; yet
 “ this letter from Philotimus has brought to “ life M. Lepidus, L. Torquatus, and the “ Tribune C. Cassius, who are with me at “ Fernie. For my own part, I am afraid

 “ they are not so well founded as the ac“ counts are of our being almost surrounded “ by the enemy, and that Pompey is retiring “ from Italy.” Ad Att. vii. 23.
 “ At present I have a small gleam of “ hope, and it is chiefly occasioned by the “ letter which came from Rome concerning “ L. Domitius and the Picentine cohorts.
 “ Every thing since has put on a more “ cheerful aspect, and no-body thinks of “ flying, as they intended. Cæsar’s threat“ ening manifestos are despised ; in short,
 “ our reports concerning Domitius are good,
 “ those concerning Afranius still better.”
 Ibid. Ep. 26.

liberty. His army was now also considerably increased by the arrival of the eighth legion, with two and twenty cohorts of new levies, and about three hundred horse from the King of Noricum. This obliged him to form a second camp on the other side of the town under the command of Curio, who had brought up these recruits, as Pompey had foreseen, and foretold to Domitius. He employed the following days in drawing a line with redoubts round the place; which was nearly completed, when the messengers that had been sent by Domitius to Pompey returned with this answer:

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

CN. MAGNUS, Proconsul, to DOMITIUS, Proconsul.

“YOUR letter of the 17th of February came to my hands, advising me of Cæsar’s having incamped before Corfinium. I foresaw and forewarned you of what has happened; that, as things now stand, he would not venture to fight you; and that he would draw together all his forces to coop you up, to obstruct the communication between you and me, and to prevent your joining the well-affectioned troops you command with my suspected legions. Your letter alarms me the more, because I cannot stake the whole fortune of the Republic upon the loyalty of the troops that serve under me; nor am I yet joined by those the Consuls have levied. I therefore recommend it to you to do all you can, if it is now possible, to disengage yourself, and immediately to join me, before the enemy’s junction can be completed; for our new recruits cannot march time enough to this rendezvous; and, though they were already come up, you are sensible how little dependence there is on raw men, who are strangers to one another, against a veteran army.” Pompey wrote at the same time the following letter to the Consuls:

Ad An.
viii. 13.

CN. MAGNUS, Proconsul, to C. MARCELLUS and L. LENTULUS, Consuls.

“BEING persuaded, that, while we remained scattered, we could neither serve the Republic, nor defend ourselves, I wrote to L. Domitius, that he should make all haste to join me with his whole force; and, if he had any apprehensions with regard to himself, that he should send me the nineteen cohorts which were upon their march to join me from Picenum. It happened, as I dreaded, that Domitius was surrounded, without having with him forces sufficient for a regular incampment; my nineteen cohorts and his twelve being quartered in three different towns: (for he had stationed some of them at Alba, and some at Sulmo;) nor, indeed, could he escape should he attempt it. Now, you must know, that this accident gives me the greatest disquiet imaginable. At the same time that I earnestly desire to de-

Ibid.

Y. R. 704. 48. 403. Coal. " I live so many illustrious Romans from the danger of being besieged, it Bef. Chr. " is impossible for me to relieve them; because I judge it unsafe to " march the two legions I command here into those quarters; and of " those two legions I can bring together no more than fourteen cohorts;
 " having thrown a garrison into Brundisium, and taken care of Canu-
 " sium, which I did not think proper to leave without a sufficient force " to defend it.

" As I was in hopes that our army would grow stronger, I charged
 " Lælius with a request, if you thought proper, that one of you should " repair to me, and that the other should go to Sicily with the troops
 " you have raised at Capua or in its neighbourhood, and with the levies
 " of Faustus; that Domitius should join them with his twelve cohorts;
 " and that the rest of the troops should assemble at Brundisium, and be " shipped over from thence to Dyrrachium. Now, as things are circum-
 " stanced, it is as much out of my power, as out of yours, to relieve Do-
 " mitius, who cannot get off by the mountains: And we are to take " care that the enemy shall neither come up with those fourteen waver-
 " ing cohorts, nor overtake me in my march. I therefore think proper,
 " and I am joined in sentiments by Marcellus, and the other Senators
 " in this place, to march the troops I have with me here to Brundisium.
 " I therefore request you to make all possible dispatch to join me there,
 " with as many troops as you can get together. My opinion is, that " you give to the troops, you have with you, the arms you proposed to " send to me; and, if you have more than are requisite for that purpose,
 " it will be of great service, if they can be conveyed in waggons to " Brundisium. I beg that you will give our friends advice concerning " that matter. I have sent to require the Prætors, P. Eupus and
 " C. Coponius, to join me, and to resign to you the command of their " forces."

Domi-

" In a letter from Cicero to Atticus, there is a short letter from Pompey to the Consuls on this occasion, which was written before that which we have now transcribed: It runs thus: " I received a letter from L. Domi-
 " tius on the 17th of February, of which I " inclose you a copy. Now, though I had " not written to you, I know you are sensi" ble how important it is for the Common" wealth, that, as soon as possible, there " should be a general muster at one place of " all our forces. Therefore, if you please,
 " you will make all possible dispatch to join
 " me; and leave at Capua such a garrison
 " as you shall judge sufficient." Ad Att.
 viii. 6. Here Pompey conceals his answer to Domitius, and his resolution of leaving Italy.
Cicero, who did not doubt but the rendezvous was in order to march forwards, is in great terror for the event on the meeting of the two armies. In the next letter he seems to have penetrated into Pompey's design; and, in the eighth, he reflects thus on Pompey's conduct: " Disgraceful and therefore " miserable measure! for such are my senti" ments, that what is disgraceful is the last,

 " may the only character of misery. He " had fostered up Cæsar's power; of a " sudden he begins to fear him, he discour-
 " ages all advances to an accommodation,
 " he neglects all preparation for war, he a" bandons the city, his misconduct loses Pi-
 " cenum, he pins himself up in Apulia, he " prepares to go to Greece, he forsakes us
 " without bidding us adieu, and utter stran" gers to those mighty, those monstrous re-solu-

Domitius thought proper to dissemble the contents of the letter he had received from Pompey, and declared in Council, that this General of the Republic would speedily come to their assistance: And he exhorted his troops to behave with courage, and to obey those orders which were necessary for providing every thing for a vigorous defence. But as his looks and speech were found to disagree, and as he behaved not with his usual composure and firmness, and was observed, contrary to his custom, to be much in conference with his friends, it was not possible to conceal the truth. In the evening of the same day, the soldiers discovered that they were not to receive any succour, and that their Commander was meditating his escape: And they began to mutiny, and by means of their Under-officers to make known their thoughts to one another. “They were besieged (they said) by Cæsar, who had already in a manner completed his works; and their General Domitius, in whose promises of assistance they had placed their chief hope, abandoning all concern for their safety, was contriving to escape privately by flight: Wherefore it was their business to look to their own preservation.” The Marssi, ignorant of the motive that prompted their companions to mutiny, at first opposed this resolution, and possessed themselves of the strongest part of the town; and the dispute grew so warm that it almost came to be decided by the sword. But, as soon as they understood that Domitius was preparing for a private escape, they dropped their opposition, and joined in the sedition. The person of Domitius was then secured, and Deputies were sent to Cæsar, to inform him, “that the town and the garrison were ready to receive his orders.”

Though Cæsar was fully sensible of what great importance it was to get possession of the town immediately, and join so numerous a garrison to his own army, lest by largesses, promises of speedy relief, or false reports, any change should be produced in the minds of the soldiers; yet fearing that, if he introduced his troops into it in the night, they would take that opportunity to plunder it, he sent back the Deputies with thanks for their proffer, and delayed the taking possession of it till the next day. But he caused the walls and the gates to be watched with the greatest care: He disposed his men along the works, not at certain distances, “solutions. Well, all at once a letter comes from Domitius to him, and another from him to the Consuls.—Pompey retires to Brundium.” [Cicero is often too severe upon his friend Pompey even in regard to his military capacity: The letters above do not shew him to have been at this time so bewildered and out of his senses, as Cicero represents him in several of his epistles, for no other reason, perhaps, than because he did not think proper to make this timorous and talkative orator privy to his motions.] “Where

“or when are we to emerge, headed as we are by a General who knows so little of his profession, that he was a stranger to the important situation of Picenum? His misconduct carries its condemnation upon its own face.—Even at this time I am ignorant of his designs, but am incessantly endeavouring to fish somewhat out of him by letters: Nothing can be more unmanly or unmeaning than the whole of his management.” Ad Att. vii. 13.

Y. R. 704. distances, as usual, but in one continued range, so as to touch each Eccl. Chr. other, and to form a circle ; and he ordered the military Tribunes and
 48. Officers of the cavalry to patrol about the works, and not only to be 423 Conf. upon their guard against sallies, but to take care to prevent the escape of any particular persons. Not a man in the camp closed his eyes that night : All were busy in executing the General's orders, and in conjecturing the fate of the Corfinians, of Domitius, Lentulus, and the other illustrious Romans confined in the town.

Three in the morning.

About the fourth watch of the night, Lentulus Spintber called from the wall to the guard, and desired to be conducted to Cæsar. His request being granted, he came out of the town, attended by some of Domitius's soldiers, who never left him till he was in Cæsar's presence :
 " He begged Cæsar to spare his life, and pardon the injuries he had done
 " him, in consideration of their former friendship. He owned the " many great favours he had formerly received from him ; that, by his " interest, he had been elected into the College of Priests, obtained the " government of Spain, after the expiration of his prætorship, and that he " had been assisted by him when he was candidate for the consulship."
 Here Cæsar, interrupting him, said, " that he was not come out of the " bounds of his province with an intent to injure any one : But to repel
 " the injuries done to him by his enemies ; to revenge the wrongs of " the Tribunes ; and to restore the Roman people, who were oppressed
 " by a small faction of the Nobles, to their liberty and privileges."
Lentulus, encouraged by this speech, asked leave to return into the town ; " where" he said, " the assurances he had obtained of his own " safety, would contribute not a little to the consolation of others, some " of whom were so terrified, that they were ready to take desperate
 " resolutions."

48437 l.
 Earl.

As soon as it was light, Cæsar ordered before him all the principal men. These were L. Domitius, P. Lentulus Spintber, L. Vibullius Rufus, Sextus Quinctilius Varus, Quæstor, and L. Rubrius ; who were of Sena-torian rank ; and Domitius's son, and several young men of quality, with some Roman Knights, and a few Decurions or Senators of the neighbouring municipal towns. When they appeared, he gave orders to secure them from the insults of the soldiery ; and, addressing them in a few words, he reproached them with their animosity to him, which he said he had not deserved, and then set them all at liberty. He likewise restored to Domitius six millions of sesterces, which that General had brought with him to Corfinium, and had deposited in the hands of the two Treasurers of the town. As this was public money assigned by Pompey for the payment of his forces, Cæsar might justly have seized it ;
 but, he says, he was willing to shew himself generous as well as merciful.
 He ordered Domitius's soldiers to take the usual oath to him, and set out immediately for Apulia, in pursuit of Pompey ; who, having now lost, by the rashness of Domitius, the half of his forces, and the only troops well-

well-affectioned to his cause, was under the necessity of retiring with all expedition, and of abandoning Italy to his rival. ^{Y. R. 704. Bef. Chr. 48.}

Mean-while, a notion universally prevailed among the Pompeians, ^{403 Conf. Middl. p. 79.} of Cæsar's cruel and revengeful temper, from which horrible effects were apprehended: Cicero himself was strongly possessed with it, as appears from many of his letters; where he seems to take it for granted, that he would be a second Phalaris, not a Pisistratus; a bloody, not a gentle tyrant. This he inferred from the violence of his past life; the nature of his present enterprise; and, above all, from the character of his friends and followers; who were, generally speaking, a needy, profligate, audacious crew; prepared for every thing that was desperate. It was affirmed likewise, with great confidence, he had openly declared, that he was now coming to revenge the deaths of Cn. Carbo, M. Brutus, and all the other Marian Chiefs, whom Pompey, when acting under Sylla, had cruelly put to death for their opposition to the Syllan cause. His generous and magnanimous behaviour to his most inveterate enemies, taken at Corfinium, allayed all these vain suspicions and fears, and confirmed what he had always given out, that he sought nothing by the war, but the security of his person and dignity. The following letter to Oppius and Balbus was published at that time, and expresses the motives of his conduct.

CÆSAR TO OPPIUS and BALBUS.

“ I AM extremely glad at your expressing, under your hands, your ^{Ad Att. ix.} great approbation of what has passed at Corfinium: I will follow your ^{7.} advice with the greater pleasure, than it was always my own disposition to act with the utmost lenity, and to court an accommodation with Pompey. Let us try whether it be possible, by this means, to regain the affections of mankind, and to make our successes durable; since others by cruelty fell into detestation: and none of them, excepting Sylla, whom I don't chuse to imitate, enjoyed his successes long: Let us shew the world a new method of conquering; and let clemency and munificence be my only guard. I have already formed some schemes; and many more may be formed, for effecting this. I desire you to turn your thoughts to the same subject.

“ I took

* Cæsar made himself master of Corfinium viii. kal. Mar. or the 22d of February of the Roman year: According to Usher, the 11th of the Julian December; but really on the 26th of January. Cælius, in a letter written to Cicero, while Cæsar was marching from Corfinium to Brundisium, says: “ Look upon Cæsar's troops, my friend, and tell me, whether one would not imagine, by the gaiety of their countenances, that, in“ stead of having fought their way through the roughest and coldest countries in the hardest winter, they had been regaling themselves in all the delicacies of ease and plenty?”—“ Nonne tibi nostri milites, qui durissimis et frigidissimis locis, teterrima hieme, bellum ambulando confecerunt, malis orbiculatis esse passi videntur?” Ep. Fam. viii. 15. Melm. vii. 7.

V. P. 24. "I took prisoner Cæ. Magius, one of Pompey's masters of the works ;
 B. 1. C. 12. "but, according to the plan I laid down, I instantly dismissed him.
 403. Conf. "He is the second master of the works who has fallen into my hands, ——— "and whom I have dismissed. If they want to shew their gratitude,
 "they will exhort Pompey to prefer my friendship to that of those men,
 "who have ever shewn themselves both his and my enemies ; and by
 "whose practices the public is reduced to its present state."

This conduct gave a considerable turn to his affairs ; while the behaviour of Pompey, on the other hand, appeared every day more and more despicable. He fled perpetually before an enemy whom his pride and perverseness were said to have driven to the necessity of taking arms ; and he was continually throwing out threats against those who did not follow him : Before he set out from Brundisium, he talked of nothing but proscriptions, and of acting in imitation of Sylla ; and his future conduct sufficiently answered these early professions.

Cæf. de
 Bell. Civ.
 Com. l. 1.

As soon as he got intelligence of the surrendry of Corfinium, he retreated from Luceria to Cannusium, and from thence to Brundisium.* Here he

Ad. Art. viii.
 13.

"Are you not sensible, says Cicero to Atticus, what a discerning, what a vigilant, what a resolute Commander the Commonwealth has to do with. By Heavens ! if he does not imbrue his hand in blood, or stretch it out in rapine, he will become the darling of those who dreaded him most. I have had a great deal of talk with our townsmen, and a great deal with our country gentlemen in these quarters : And, take my word for it, they have no concern but about their lands, their farms, and their money. You see what a pass things are come to. They fear the man they trusted ; they love the man they feared. It is with anguish that I recollect the miscarriages and misconduct that have brought us to this."

Middl. p.
 31.

From this first experiment of Cæsar's clemency, Cicero took occasion to send him a letter of compliment, and to thank him particularly for his generous treatment of Lentulus, who, when Consul, had been the chief author of his restoration ; to which Cæsar returned the following answer :

"You judge rightly of me, for I am thoroughly known to you, that nothing is

"farther removed from me than cruelty ;
 "and, as I have a great pleasure from the thing itself, so I rejoice and triumph to find my act approved by you : Nor does it at all move me, that those, who were dismissed by me, are said to be gone away to renew the war against me ; for I desire nothing more, than that I may always act like myself ; they like themselves." I wish that you would meet me at the city, that I may use your council and assistance as I have hitherto done in all things. Nothing, I assure you, is dearer to me than Dolabella ; I will owe this favour therefore to him : Nor is it possible for him indeed to behave otherwise, such is his humanity, his good sense, and his affection to me. Adieu !" Ad. Art. ix. 16.

* Pompey was now obliged to declare what he had never before owned, his design of quitting Italy, and carrying the war abroad ; he gave notice of it to Cicero, and wrote two letters to him at Formiæ, to press him to come away directly ; but Cicero, already much out of humour with him, was disgusted still the more by his short and negligent manner of writing, upon an occasion so

* Domitius retired to his country-house at Cosa, in Tuscany ; and, having manned some ships with his own servants, set sail for Marseilles ; which he held for Pompey, with consent of the inhabitants, and defended it, as we shall soon see, against Cæsar. Ad. Art. ix. 6. Cæsar de Bell. Civ. lib. ii. Lentulus went secretly to his house at Patrae ; and, after concealing himself for some time, he joined Pompey. Publius Rufus went also to Pompey, who sent him into Spain, charged with orders to his Lieutenants there : And Varus sailed for Africa.

he ordered all the new levies to join him ; and, arming three hundred slaves and shepherds, he furnished them with horses. The Prætor,
 Vol. IV. G L. Man- Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

so important : The second of Pompey's letters, with Cicero's answer, will explain the present state of their affairs, and Cicero's sentiments upon them.

CN. POMPEIUS MAGNUS, Proconsul, to M. CICERO, Emperor :

" IF you are in good health, I rejoice :
 " I read your letter with pleasure : For I " perceived in it your ancient virtue by " your concern for the common safety.
 " The Consuls are come to the army, which " I had in Apulia : I earnestly exhort you,
 " by your singular and perpetual affection
 " to the Republic, to come also to us ; that,
 " by our joint advice, we may give help
 " and relief to the afflicted State. I would " have you make the Appian way your
 " road, and come in all haste to Brundisium.
 " Take care of your health." Ad Att. viii.
 11.

M. CICERO, Emperor, to CN. MAGNUS,
 Proconsul.

" WHEN I sent that letter, which was " delivered to you at Canusium, I had no sus" picion of your crossing the sea for the ser" vice of the Republic, and was in great
 " hopes that we should be able either to " bring about an accommodation, which
 " to me seemed the most useful, or to de" fend the Republic with the greatest dig" nity in Italy. In the mean time, before " my letter reached you, being informed of " your resolution by the instructions which
 " you sent to the Consuls, I did not wait
 " till I could have a letter from you, but set " out immediately towards you, with my " brother, and our children, to Apulia.
 " When we were come to Trebanum, your " friend C. Messius, and many others, told " us, that Cæsar was in the road to Capua,
 " and would lodge that very night at Æser-
 " nia : I was much disturbed at it ; because,
 " if it was true, I not only took my journey
 " to be precluded, but myself also to be
 " certainly a prisoner. I went on, there" fore, to Cales, with intent to stay there,
 " till I could learn from Æsernia the cer" tainty of my intelligence : At Cales, there " was brought to me a copy of the letter

 " which you wrote to the Consul Lentulus,
 " with which you sent the copy also of one
 " that you had received from Domitius,
 " dated the 18th of February, and signified
 " that it was of great importance to the Re" public that all the troops should be drawn
 " together, as soon as possible, to one place ;
 " yet so as to leave a sufficient garrison in " Capua. Upon reading these letters, I " was of the same opinion with all the rest,
 " that you were resolved to march to Cor-
 " finium with all your forces ; whither, when
 " Cæsar lay before the town, I thought it " impossible for me to come. While this " affair was in the utmost expectation,
 " we were informed at one and the same
 " time both of what had happened at Cor-
 " finium, and that you were actually march" ing towards Brundisium : And, when I
 " and my brother resolved, without hesita" tion, to follow you thither, we were ad" vertised by many, who came from Sam-
 " nium and Apulia, to take care that we did " not fall into Cæsar's hands ; for that he " was upon his march to the same places
 " where our road lay, and would reach
 " them sooner than we could possibly do.
 " This being the case, it did not seem ad-" viseable to me, or my brother, or any of " our friends, to run the risk of hurting,
 " not only ourselves, but the Republic, by
 " our rashness : Especially when we could " not doubt, but that, if the journey had " been safe to us, we should not then be " able to overtake you. In the mean while
 " I received your letter dated from Canu-
 " sum, the 21st of February, in which you
 " exhort me to come in all haste to Brun-
 " dusium : But, as I did not receive it till
 " the 29th, I made no question but that " you were already arrived at Brundisium ;
 " and all that road seemed wholly shut up
 " to us, and we ourselves as surely inter" cepted as those who were taken at Cor-
 " finium : For we did not reckon them only " to be prisoners, who were actually fallen
 " into the enemy's hands, but those too
 " not less so, who happen to be inclosed
 " within the quarters and garrisons of their " adversaries. Since this is our case, I " heartily wish, in the first place, that I
 " had

Y. R. 704. L. Manlius, in his retreat from Alba, with six cohorts, and the Prætor
 Bef. Clk. Rutilius Lupus, from Terracina, with three, perceiving Cæsar's cavalry
 48. at a distance, commanded by Bivius Curius, were extremely dis-403 Conf. concerted; and, while they meditated what step to take, their soldiers deserted them, and joined the troops under the conduct of Curius. Several other parties, flying different ways, fell in, some with Cæsar's foot, others with his cavalry. Cn. Magius, of Cremona, Pompey's master of the works, or chief engineer, being taken in his way to Brundisium,

" had always been with you, as I then told
 " you, when I relinquished the command
 " of Capua, which I did not do for the sake
 " of avoiding trouble, but because I saw " that the town could not be held without " an army, and was unwilling that the same
 " accident should happen to me, which, to
 " my sorrow, has happened to some of our
 " bravest citizens at Corfinium: But, since it " has not been my lot to be with you, I wish
 " that I had been made privy to your coun" cils; for I could not possibly suspect, and
 " should sooner have believed any thing,
 " than that, for the good of the Republic,
 " under such a leader as you, we should not " be able to stand our ground in Italy:
 " Nor do I now blame your conduct, but " lament the fate of the Republic; and,
 " though I cannot comprehend what it is
 " which you have followed, yet I am not
 " the less persuaded that you have done no" thing but with the greatest reason. You
 " remember, I believe, that my opinion al" ways was, first, to preserve peace, even on
 " bad conditions; then about leaving the " city; for, as to Italy, you never intimated
 " a tittle to me about it; but I do not take
 " upon myself to think that my advice
 " ought to have been followed: I followed
 " yours; nor that for the sake of the Re" public, of which I despaired, and which " is now overturned, so as not to be raised
 " up again without a civil and most pern-
 " cious war. I fought you; desired to be " with you; nor will I omit the first oppor" tunity which offers of effecting it. I
 " easily perceived, through all this affair,
 " that I did not satisfy those who are fond
 " of fighting: For I made no scruple to " own, that I wished for nothing so much
 " as peace; not but that I had the same " apprehensions from it as they; but I " thought them more tolerable than a civil " war: Then, after the war was begun,
 " when I saw that conditions of peace were " offered to you, and a full and honourable

" answer given to them, I began to weigh
 " and deliberate well upon my own con" duct, which, considering your kindness
 " to me, I fancied that I should easily ex" plain to your satisfaction: I recollected
 " that I was the only man who, for the " greatest services to the public, had suffered a " most wretched and cruel punishment: That " I was the only one, who, if I offended him,
 " to whom, at the very time when we were
 " in arms against him, a second consulship and " most splendid triumph were offered, should be " involved again in all the same struggles; so " that my person seemed to stand always " exposed as a public mark to the insults of " profligate citizens: Nor did I suspect any " of these things till I was openly threatened " with them: Nor was I so much afraid of " them, if they were really to befall me, as " I judged it prudent to decline them, if " they could honestly be avoided. You " see, in short, the state of my conduct
 " while we had any hopes of peace; what " has since happened deprived me of all " power to do any thing: But to those " whom I do not please I can easily answer,
 " that I never was more a friend to C. Cæsar
 " than they, nor they ever better friends to
 " the Republic than myself: The only dif" ference between me and them is, that as " they are excellent citizens, and I not far " removed from that character, it was my " advice to proceed by way of treaty, which
 " I understood to be approved also by you;
 " theirs by way of arms; and, since this " method has prevailed, it shall be my care
 " to behave myself so, that the Republic
 " may not want in me the spirit of a true
 " citizen, nor you of a friend. Adieu."
Ad Att. viii. 11. The expostulations in the latter part of this letter were certainly useless, unfriendly, and ill-timed. His excuses in the first part were all false; for he owns to Atticus, that, in truth, he was willing to consider a little longer what was right and fit for him to do.—viii. 12.

was brought to Cæsar, who sent him back to Pompey with this message :
 “ That, as he had not yet obtained an interview, his design was to come
 “ to Brundisium, there to confer with him in relation to the common “ safety ; because they soon would be able to dispatch, in a personal “ treaty, what, if managed by the intervention of others, might run “ into a tedious negociation.” It appears, by a letter of Cæsar to Oppius, * that Pompey sent back Magius, as soon as Cæsar arrived before Brundisium, with some proposals which we know nothing of ; nor of those in return which were then made by Cæsar. Young Balbus was sent also after the Consul Lentulus, to endeavour to engage him to stay in Italy, and to return to the city, by the offer of every thing that could tempt him ; and Cicero seems to think that Lentulus might have complied with the invitation, if Balbus and he had met ; but the Consul had failed before Balbus could come up with him.

In fine, Cæsar was so bent upon an accommodation, that, seeing Magius † did not return to him, as he expected, he dispatched Caninius Rebilus, one of his Lieutenants, a relation and intimate friend of Scribo- nus Libo, to confer with him on the subject. His orders were to exhort Libo, in the most earnest manner, to procure an interview between him and Pompey : To represent to him that, by this means, peace might be concluded upon reasonable terms ; and that the honour of it would redound to him by whose mediation both parties should be prevailed with to lay down their arms. Libo, after conferring with Caninius, waited on Pompey, and returned with this answer : “ That the Consuls were ab“ sent, without whom Pompey had no power to treat of an accommo“ dation.” Pompey’s aversion to all negociations was known to his party ;

G 2

* “ On the 9th of March, I arrived at “ Brundisium, and have invested it. Pom- “ pey is within the place. He sent Magius
 “ to me, to treat of peace. I answered “ him as I thought proper. I was willing “ you should be instantly informed of this.
 “ When I shall have any prospect of an ac“ commodation, I will let you know with“ out loss of time.” Ad Att. ix. 13. “ I “ have no copy,” says Cicero, “ of the pro“ posals you ask for, sent by Cæsar to the “ Consuls and to Pompey : While I was upon
 “ the road, I sent you those brought by “ Ægypta ; by which, I suppose, you may “ gather the substance of the others.” Ad
Att. ix. 15.

† M. Crevier (Vol. XIII. p. 255.) taking it for granted that Cæsar means to say in this place that Magius was never sent to him by Pompey, makes a very severe and hasty reflexion upon his veracity. “ Cæsar” [to use the words of this historian] “ says, in his Commentaries,

“ that Magius brought him back no answer
 “ from Pompey ; but we have a letter from “ Cæsar to Oppius and Balbus, which proves
 “ the contrary. Pompey,” says he, “ has “ sent Magius to me, with overtures of peace,
 “ and I have answered him what I thought “ proper. It is difficult to reconcile these “ contradictions, but by supposing that “ Cæsar has not been scrupulously faithful
 “ as to facts in his Commentaries ; particu“ larly in what regards the civil war. Asi- “ nus Pollio, who accompanied him in seve“ ral expeditions, expressly accused him of “ it. So that this great man, this gene“ rous, elevated soul, disdained not to dis“ honour himself by falsehood, and to sup“ press the truth in a work destined for pos“ terity.” The letter cited by M. Crevier, and which is copied above, proves that Cæsar expected Magius again. His first message by him, when taken prisoner, was only in general terms, to demand an interview ;

Y. R. 704.
 Bell. Civ.
 48.
 403 Conf.

Cæf. de
 Bell. Civ.
 Com. l. i.

Y. R. 704. party;* and, lest the Consuls should engage in one against his will, he
 Bel. Chr. was all along very desirous of sending them out of Italy.

48. Cæsar sat down, on the ninth of March, before Brundisium with six 403 Cons. legions; three of which were composed of veteran soldiers, and the rest
 Cæf. de of new levies drawn together upon his march. He had sent Domitius's
 Bel. Civ. troops directly from Corfinium, towards Sicily, not caring to bring them
 Com. l. i. near Pompey's quarters. The Consuls had sailed on the 4th with thirty cohorts, and there were still twenty in the town with Pompey. Nor was it certainly known whether he continued there for want of shipping to transport his troops, or with the design to keep possession of Brundisium, that he might be master of the whole Adriatic sea, the farthest parts of Italy, and the country of Greece, in order to make war on both sides the Gulph. Cæsar, having lost all hopes of an accommodation, and fearing that it was his intention to keep footing in Italy, resolved to push the war with vigour, and to deprive him of the advantages he might reap from the port of Brundisium. The following works were contrived by him for this purpose. He carried on a mole on each side of the haven where the entrance was narrowest, and the water shallow. But as this undertaking could not be carried quite across the port, by reason of the great depth of the sea, he prepared double floats of timber, thirty feet square, which were each secured by four anchors, to enable them to resist the fury of the waves. These, which were to extend all the way between the two moles, were covered over with earth and fascines, that the soldiers might pass and repass with ease, and have firm footing to defend them. The front and sides were armed with a parapet of hurdles; and every fourth float had a tower of two stories, the better to keep the enemies ships at a distance, and to guard the work from fire and the shocks of vessels.

Against these preparations Pompey made use of several large ships, upon which he raised turrets three stories high; and, having filled them with engines and darts, he let them loose upon Cæsar's floats in order to break through the staccado, and interrupt the progress of the works.
 Thus daily skirmishes happened with darts, arrows, and slings, at a distance; and Cæsar had spent nine days in these works, and had half-finished the staccado, when the ships employed in the first embarkation were sent back by the Consuls. Pompey, either alarmed at Cæsar's works, or because from the first he had resolved to abandon Italy, immediately prepared to carry off the rest of his forces: And, the better to secure his retreat, and to hinder the enemy from breaking into the town

view; he made no proposals. Cæsar has neglected to mention Magius's first visit; or, perhaps, as in many other places of his Commentaries, there are some lines wanting.

* "Your last letter is dated the 1st of " March; and in it you wish for an inter-

" view, and do not despair of an accommo" dation between Cæsar and Pompey; but,
 " in my present way of thinking, I cannot " believe that there will be any interview;
 " or, if there is, that Pompey will agree
 " to any terms." Ad. Att. viii. 15.

town during the embarkation, he walled up the gates, barricaded the streets, or cut ditches across them, which he filled with pointed stakes, and covered with hurdles and earth. The two streets which led to the port, and which he left open for the passage of his men, were fortified with a double palisado of very strong well-sharpened stakes. After these precautions, he ordered the soldiers to embark in silence, having placed on the walls and towers some select archers and slingers, who were to wait till all the troops had got aboard; and were then, upon a signal given, to retire to some small ships that waited for them at a convenient distance.

The inhabitants of Brundisium, dissatisfied with Pompey's soldiers, and provoked by the damage done to their town by his works, found means to give notice to Cæsar of his departure, from the tops of their houses. He immediately upon this intelligence ordered scaling-ladders to be prepared, and the soldiers to repair to their arms, that he might not lose any opportunity of acting. Pompey weighed anchor a little before night, and gave the signal for recalling the soldiers that were upon the walls, who retired with all possible expedition to the ships prepared for them. At the same time the scaling-ladders were applied to the walls, and Cæsar's troops entered the town: But, being informed by the Brundisians of the snares and ditches provided for them by the enemy, they were obliged to take a circuit; which gave Pompey time enough to put to sea. Two transports only, impeded by Cæsar's mole, were taken with the troops on board.

Thus Pompey, on the 17th of March, abandoned all Italy to his rival. It is the opinion of many, that he saw from the beginning he should be reduced to this necessity; but had kept the secret to himself, and had humoured his party in the contrary notion, often talking big to keep up their spirits. In this view, after the desertion of Labiens, he wrote to Cicero, "that in a few days he would have a firm army, with which he would march against Cæsar into Picenum; so that the Senate might have an opportunity of returning to the city." Cicero may be quoted as of this opinion. In a letter to Atticus, he writes to the following purpose: "Pompey and Cæsar are rivals in power——"
 "Pompey did not abandon Rome because it was untenable, nor Italy because he was driven out of it; it had all along been his intention to move earth and sea, to rouse barbarous monarchs, to introduce the troops of barbarous nations into Italy, and to levy numerous armies. He has many to second him in what he has long thirsted for, a species of Sylla's tyranny." But Cicero writes not always to his friend his real sentiments; he says and unsays: He is now all love, and the moment after all indignation. He begins the tenth letter of the ninth book with these words: "I have nothing to write to you; because, since I answered yours, the day before yesterday, I have had no fresh intelligence. But as fretting not only keeps me from sleeping, but "gives

Y. R. 704.
 Bef. Chr.
 48.
 403 Conf.

Ad. Ant.
 viii. 11.

Y. R. 704. "gives me the greatest pain while I am awake; I set myself down to Bel. Chr. "scribble somewhat or other, in which I have no manner of meaning, but 48.
 493 Conf. "to converse as it were with you, who are my only comfort." And I do not perceive any thing in the history of the commencement of this war, but what convinces me that Pompey thought himself capable of defending Italy; in which opinion he was certainly confirmed by Labienus, who would never have quitted Cæsar, if he had thought otherwise. He gave the strongest assurances to his party before the rupture, that Cæsar would never dare to proceed in an hostile manner; and that, if he was mad enough to do so, he held him in the utmost contempt. He had provided himself with two legions of veteran troops, and ordered levies all over Italy sufficient to form eight other legions: And he sent his Officers with troops to stop Cæsar's progress. But he was greatly disappointed in every thing he relied upon, and his spirits were sunk by these disappointments. The sudden panic that seized the town on the first news of Cæsar's march, and made the two Consuls and all the Senators of Pompey's faction fly out of it, put a stop to all levies there. In the southern parts, on whose affection Pompey depended so much, the levies went on but slowly: The people shewed a great backwardness to enlist. The northern parts shewed themselves, contrary to his expectation, to be in Cæsar's interest, and surrendered to him upon the first summons: Even many towns declared for him before they were summoned. The Pompeian Commanders were deserted every-where by their troops, which inspired Pompey with a just diffidence of the two legions that had been taken from Cæsar; and which constituted, in reality, his chief strength. Lastly, Cæsar's astonishing celerity baffled all his attempts to preserve Italy: For, from his setting out at Ravenna with one legion, though he was forced to take in all the great towns on his road, and spent seven days before Corfinium, and nine before Brundisium; yet in two months he marched the whole length of Italy, entered Brundisium with six legions, and was master of four more at least in different parts of the country.

Ad. Ant. 11. 3.
 Midd. p. 73. A very ingenious and justly-admired writer, to whose performance we are much indebted, but to whose opinions we are not always disposed to subscribe, speaks in the following manner of Cæsar's enterprise: "If we consider the famous passage of the Rubicon, abstractedly from the event, it seems to have been so hazardous and desperate, that Pompey might reasonably condemn the thought of it, as of an attempt too rash for any prudent man to venture upon. If Cæsar's view indeed had been to possess himself only of Italy, there could have been no difficulty in it: His army was undoubtedly the best which was then in the world; flushed with victory, animated with zeal for the person of their General, and an overmatch for any which could be brought against it into the field: But this single army was all that he had to trust to; he had no resource: The loss of one battle
 " was

“ was certain ruin to him ; and yet he must necessarily run the risk of “ many before he could gain his end : For the whole Empire was armed Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
 “ against him ; every province offered a fresh enemy, and a fresh field 403 Conf.
 “ of action, where he was like to be exposed to the same danger as on “ the plains of Pharsalia. But, above all, his enemies were masters of “ the sea, so that he could not transport his forces abroad without the “ hazard of their being destroyed by a superior fleet, or of being “ starved at land by the difficulty of conveying supplies and provisions “ to them : Pompey relied chiefly on this single circumstance, and was “ persuaded that it must necessarily determine the war in his favour :
 “ So that it seems surprising how such a superiority of advantage, in the “ hands of so great a Commander, could possibly fail of success ; and “ we must admire rather the fortune, than the conduct of Cæsar, for car“ rying himself safe through all these difficulties to the possession of the “ Empire.”

But it must be remembered, on the other hand, that a certain destruction would have attended Cæsar, if he had submitted to the decree made against him by the Senate. He would thereby have been disarmed at once, and reduced to the condition of a private citizen : And Pom- phey, with all the power of the State in his hands, would easily have disappointed him of the consulship. He intended, it is certain, to do so, and even to bring him to trial, as Cato and others were continually threatening him : And, of this last circumstance, Cæsar, according to Suetonius, was really apprehensive. “ He engaged in the war,” says Suet. in Cæsar, 30.
 that historian, “ because he was afraid of being called to an account for “ what he had done in his first consulship, contrary to the religion, the “ laws, and the authority of the Tribunes : For Cato often declared, and “ with an oath too, that he would impeach him as soon as he disbanded “ his army : And it was commonly talked, that, if he returned a private “ person, he would, like Milo, be tried with a guard to attend the Court.
 “ This circumstance Afinius Pollio has confirmed, when he says that “ Cæsar, upon viewing his enemies slaughtered and put to flight upon “ the plains of Pharsalia, spoke these words : They would have it so : I “ Caius Cæsar, who have performed such great things, must have undergone
 “ a sentence of condemnation, had I not desired the assistance of my army.”

If it was so evident, [as Dr. Middleton will have it] that Pompey could not defend Italy, this threw at once an immense power into Cæsar's hands, and put him in possession of the fortunes of all his enemies :
 Which consideration he might think sufficient to induce them not to pursue their scheme of depriving him of his government ; and it certainly would have had this effect, if Pompey had not deceived the Senate by assuring them that he had an army sufficient to defend the city.
 This is very plain from the many reproaches which were thrown on Pompey, when things went contrary to the general expectation.

Y. R. 704. Cæsar, with an army of martial and experienced soldiers, and possessed Bef. Chr. 48. of Italy, Gaul, and the adjacent islands, was an overmatch for the rest of 403 Conf. the world. For what was the fighting world? Truly, six legions of veterans in Spain, and an army of new levies out of Italy and the oriental provinces, with two legions that had served under Cæsar, and three more dispersed in Asia. But Cæsar, it is said, must run the risk of many battles, all the empire was armed, and every province offered a fresh field of action: This, however, was not the case: It was, on the contrary, most evident from the beginning, that one general engagement would decide the fate of the two Chiefs; and, with regard to the provinces, it must be observed, that they were quite indifferent in the quarrel, and could not stop, if they intended it, the progress of the conqueror.

See Middl. In fine, Cicero does not always represent Cæsar's enterprise as a kind of
 P. 74. madness. Here is his account to his friend Atticus: "I perceive Cæsar
 Ad. Att. ix. 13. "to be very strong in infantry, in cavalry, in shipping, and in auxiliary
 "Gauls; whose numbers Matius, I believe, exaggerated, when he said "they had offered to maintain for him, at their own expence, ten thousand foot, and six thousand horse. But, supposing this to be a vaunt, yet it is certain that he is very strong; and he will not, like Pompey, be obliged to maintain his forces upon extraordinary imposts; for he will have the riches of all Rome at his command: And add to this Cæsar's enterprising spirit, and the weakness of our Patriots, who are grieved at war for no other reason, than because they have incurred Cæsar's resentment.—Cæsar, however, has been more moderate than he appeared to be at setting out, and the common people have lost the great affection they had for Pompey, and seem fond of him. The situation therefore of Cæsar is such, that, supposing he cannot conquer, yet I cannot see how he can be conquered.—I do not understand whom you call Patriots: I know of none: I mean I know of no order of men deserving that appellation: Take them man by man, they are very worthy gentlemen: But, in civil dissensions, we are to look for patriotism in the constituent members of the Body Politic. Do you look for it in the Senate? Let me ask you by whom were the provinces left without governors?—Do you look for patriotism among the farmers of the revenue? Alas! they never were steady, and now they are entirely devoted to Cæsar. Do you look for it in our trading, or in our landed interest? They are fondest of peace. Can you imagine that they have any terrible apprehensions of living under a monarchy; they, to whom all forms of government are indifferent, provided they enjoy their ease?—When his stream of power was weak, it might have been easily stopt. But now he is master of eleven legions [of veterans] and as much cavalry as he pleases to draw into the field. Think upon the towns beyond the Po, the mob of Rome, upon so great a majority of the Tribunes, upon a profligate rising generation,

Ad Att.
 vii. 7.

“ration, upon a General, with such sagacity to contrive, and such “boldness to execute.” Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.

“It was with reluctance I undertook that commission at Capua; 48.
403 Conf.
“not that I would have declined it, had we been acting upon any “concert: But I could see no declared, sincere concern for their country Ad Att.
viii. 3.
“in any of our public bodies; nor, in reality, among private persons. Our “Patriots were without spirit and activity, as usual, and as I had fore“seen; while the mob discovered a manifest bias to Cæsar; and most of “them were fond of a change.” These extracts from Cicero seem to contain a very natural and true description of the times; and this description leads us to consider the justice of Pompey’s or Cæsar’s cause.

The ingenious author above-cited has given his decision on this Middl. p.
67.
head, in the following passage from Cicero; which we must beg leave Ad Att.
vii. 9.
to accompany with our remarks. You have beld [Cicero had been speaking of Cæsar] your government ten years, not granted to you by the Senate, but extorted by violence and faction: [Was not this the case with every other grant at this time? Was the Gabinian, or the Manilian, or the Messian law, more legally preferred? The government of Gaul was given to Cæsar by a law of the people, which the Senate thought fit to confirm by a decree of their own] the full term is expired, not of the law, but of your licentious will: But allow it to be a law; [Cicero allowed it to have been such, and voted for it; and he himself engaged Cælius to propose, in favour of Cæsar, another bill to dispense with his presence in suing for the consulate during the continuance of the law in question] it is now decreed, that you must have a successor: [By whom? By the people? No: By a decree of the Senate? No: For the Tribunes interposed: By a vote of the Senate? Yes: But of the Senate awed illegally by the power of Pompey] you refuse; and say, Have some regard to me: Do you first shew your regard to us: Will you pretend to keep an army longer than the people ordered, and contrary to the will of the Senate?
To this passage from Cicero Dr. Middleton has added: “But Cæsar’s “strength lay not in the goodness of his cause, but of his troops:
“——The flight of the Tribunes gave him a plausible handle to be“gin, and seemed to sanctify his attempt; but his real motive, says “Plutarch [in Ant.] was the same that animated Cyrus and Alexander “before him to disturb the peace of mankind; the unquenchable thirst “of Empire, and the wild ambition of being the greatest man in the “world; which was not possible, till Pompey was first destroyed.”

In this state of the merit of Cæsar’s cause, we have two assertions which require a particular consideration. It is affirmed, that the full term appointed for Cæsar’s government of Gaul was expired; and that he continued to hold his province against law in defiance of the Senate and of the people of Rome: And Dr. Middleton has said, in another p. 45. place, that the 1st of March of the year 703 was the term prescribed to it by law. Secondly, Cæsar is condemned as guilty of an impudent

Y. R. 704. and treacherous behaviour in not obeying the orders of the Senate.
 E. C. C. 48.
 423 C. C. 1. 17.

Now, as to the first point, Dr. Middleton is certainly mistaken, and contradicts Cicero himself, when he supposes that Cæsar's government was to last but eight years, and ended on the 1st of March, 703. Dio Cassius indeed says, that Cæsar's government was only prolonged to him for three years; but he is in this contradicted by every other historian, and by indubitable facts. Cæsar, in his harangue to his soldiers at Ravenna, tells them, that they had served under him for nine years; and it appears by what he mentions soon afterwards, that, beyond the period fixed by the decree of the Senate for disbanding his forces, there wanted six months to complete the time allotted to him by law. The complaints of the Tribunes of the people against the Senate, for pretending to abrogate a law of the people, were evidently grounded upon this supposition. What could mean the privilege granted him in the year 701, when Pompey was sole Consul, of suing for the consulship in his absence, if his government was to expire before he could legally present himself as a candidate? And it would have expired, if it had not been decennial. In fine, Cicero owns, in other places, that Cæsar had law on his side: "Yet, such is the General we are either to encounter, or we are to gratify him in what he can already claim by law." And Monsieur l'Abbe Mongault has thus remarked on the passage of Cicero cited above: "Cicero writes here in the Pompeian style, or he means only that Cæsar's government would nearly expire about the time of the elections of the next Consuls; and that therefore he might well consent to leave it, in order to come and stand candidate in person, as was required of him: Or, perhaps, Pompey's faction began to reckon the years of Cæsar's government, from the very moment that the law was passed at Rome, allotting that province to him; but the general and legal method was to reckon from the day in which the Governor entered his province."

At Ant.
 C. C. 7.

As to the second point, I shall not interpose my judgment: The reader, who has had the whole evidence laid impartially before him, will, probably, have determined for himself. I shall, however, beg leave to insert a paragraph or two from the spirited performance of our late poet laureat.

The character and conduct of Cicero considered from the history of his life, by Dr. Middleton, p. 183.

"After several difficulties, doubts, debates, and political schemes, to make bad matters worse, at last the Senate, without any notice taken of the people's right to confirm or reject it, came to this bold resolution, that Cæsar should dismiss his army by a certain day, or be declared an enemy, &c. Does not the very menace in this vote imply a doubt or apprehension of its not being obeyed? And whence could that doubt come but from a consciousness of their severity in taking his command from Cæsar, before the time of its legal duration was expired? Was this a treatment that the high spirit of Cæsar could comply with, or quietly bear? Or, indeed, if he would have borne it, where,

at

“ at that time, was the policy of it ? What good was the Senate or the “ public to reap by it ? Would they have less reason to be afraid of “ Pompey's power, because Pompey then must have had less reason to “ be afraid of Cæsar ; while they were both rivals, they could be but “ candidates for empire ; but, when one of them was destroyed, the “ other of course became equal to their master duly elected. Could “ they then imagine that Cæsar, whose strength (says Dr. Middleton) “ lay not in the goodness of his cause, but of his troops, would chuse to “ come from the head of them merely to humble himself into a pri“ vate innocent man, and to depend upon the favour of Pompey for his “ future preferment ? Or, if this was really what their wisdom proposed “ by their sage and sober vote, why, at least, when they knew Cæsar “ was so formidable in the field, would they not previously choose to “ soften him into obedience by giving him a reasonable hope that “ some such great and gracious honour should be secured to him ? But, “ perhaps, the neglect of this civility might be owing to the sic volo of “ Pompey, whose disregard of Cæsar might not as yet have given them
 “ his orders to make him any such proposal ; his orders, I call them, “ because, whatever at this time was proposed in the Senate went but “ very slowly forward, that had not an eye to the interest or good-“ liking of Pompey. It would be therefore the greatest absurdity to “ suppose so rash and enterprising a vote could have come from them “ ex mero motu, as the free and voluntary act of their own pious care “ of the public. No, had that been their case, had they been their “ own masters, it can admit of no doubt but that Pompey, as well as “ Cæsar, would have had the same disbanding vote passed upon him “ too. But, Cæsar being then abroad and Pompey at home, they natu“ rally chose to be most afraid of the danger that was nearest to “ them.”

Cicero, we may remember, in the account he gives of his interview with Pompey, tells us, that, as to public affairs, Pompey talked in such a strain, as if a war was inevitable, without giving the least hopes of an accommodation.

“ While such [continues our Laureat] was the disposition of Pom- “ pey's mind, we can be no longer in doubt from whence came this “ peremptory vote upon Cæsar.

“ Thus the government de jure having utterly lost its power, the “ only debateable question now was, whether Pompey or Cæsar should “ be the sole governor de facto. A melancholy election for liberty !
 “ Nor had it a better appearance to Cicero, who tells us, that, which-“ side soever got the better, the war must necessarily end in tyranny ; the “ only difference was, that, if their enemies conquered, they should be pro“ scribed ; if their friends, be slaves.

“ This being the most equal light that the cause of Pompey or of “ Cæsar can stand in, we must either suppose, that, had Cæsar, in obe-Y. R. 704. " dience to the Senate, disbanded his army, the public liberty would Eccl. Chr. " have been of course restored ; or that, if it would not, (as there is

 48. " not the most distant pretence to say it would) it then must follow, that, 403 Conf. " whether Pompey or Cæsar had prevailed, it could have wrought no " different consequence to the Roman liberty ; the ruin of which, under
 " the sole dominion of either, must (as Cicero confesses) have been " equally inevitable : Let this be granted, and neither the virtue, nor
 " the critical learning of posterity, will ever think this cause a dispu-
 " table point, or give the least preference to the pretensions of either
 " of these celebrated competitors. 'Tis true, they may tell us, that " Pompey had the fairer appearance in the Senate's support. Yes, but in " nothing more than appearance ; not by their free and independent
 " choice, but by the palpable terror of his arms ; nor from their opinion
 " of his better intentions to the public, than they conceived of Cæsar's ;
 " but the plain truth is, that, in this situation, they rather chose to let " Pompey's orders seem to be their own, than that any thing should " appear to be transacted without their authority. If Cæsar then was " not so tame as the Senate in yielding up his liberty, or refused to " obey the mandate of an intimidated authority ; rather choosing, if " he could not live like a Roman, to die like Cæsar : Will this stand
 " in no excuse for him ? Or, will it be too partially favourable,
 " should we call his slighting such a Senate an almost laudable ambi" tion ? For never surely can it be urged that Cæsar's disobeying them
 " was a more criminal infringement of the public liberty than was Pompey's
 " keeping them in fear of him. And yet, again, if the presumption of " either their disobeying or commanding could be mitigated by appear" ances, Cæsar, by his offering to lay down his arms, provided Pompey might " be under the same obligation at the same time, made an advancement to
 " the Patriot, which POMPEY had not virtue enough to dissemble. And
 " though it may have been objected, that this compliance of Cæsar
 " was all but grimace, without the least intention of his making it
 " good ; yet, as this is but an imaginary charge, it ought at least to " have been brought to a proof before Cæsar could be justly con" demned upon it. But Pompey's absolutely, and, without hesitation, re" fusing the proposal, was an open declaration, that no peaceable terms should " prevail upon him to part with a grain of his power. While Pompey,
 " therefore, lies under this imputation, he stands in a less favourable
 " light, or was, rather, a more notorious offender than Cæsar."

C H A P. III.

Cæsar, after settling every thing in the South of Italy, and taking measures to secure Sicily and Sardinia, sets out for Rome. In his way, he has a conference with Cicero, who soon after retires to Pompey's camp. At Rome,

Rome, he seizes the public treasure; and, finding the Senate unwilling to act any part, he takes upon himself the public administration. After a stay of six or seven days, he sets out for Spain.

CÆSAR was very sensible, that, to put a speedy end to the war, Y. R. 704. Bef. Chr. 48. 403 Conf. the best plan he could follow was to pass the sea immediately, and endeavour to come up with Pompey and the Consuls in their present defenceless state, before they could draw the transmarine forces together. But the execution of this design was at present absolutely impracticable; for all the ships had been carried off the coast; and to gather others from Picenum, Sicily, and the coasts of Gaul, was a tedious business, and in the winter season subject to great uncertainty. Dreading therefore this delay and loss of time, he determined to go to Spain, whither also a very interesting consideration called him. It appeared of dangerous consequence to suffer a veteran army to strengthen themselves in his rival's interest by new levies of horse and foot, and to prepare a sure resource for their General, when driven out of Greece and Asia: And he could never have a more favourable opportunity of conquering Spain, and the legions there, than when Pompey was at such a distance from them, and unable to give them any assistance. He resolved therefore upon this expedition, saying, he would go first to find an army without a General, and then return to a General without an army. It is commonly supposed, that Pompey committed a capital error Middl. p. 118. in not going to Spain, and in neglecting to put himself at the head of the best troops he had, in a country devoted to his interest, and commodious for the operations of his naval force; and Cicero is cited, as being so much of this opinion, that, when he first heard of Pompey's resolution to go to Greece, he called it monstrous. But it is to be considered, that Pompey had at this time no fleet in readiness; and, if he had sailed for Spain directly, he would not have had influence enough in the East to have raised the fleets and armies, which, by his presence there, he was enabled to collect. Cæsar would have been before-hand with him; and, by transporting a few legions into Greece, would have awed all the States of the East, who were most of them very indifferent about this quarrel: And Pompey, in the mean time, would have been cooped up in Spain, and precluded from every province of the Empire besides Africa.

Cæsar, before he left Brundisium, sent orders to all the municipal Cæf. de Bell. Civ. Com. lib. 1 towns upon the several coasts to assemble all the vessels they could, and send them to that port: And, knowing of what importance it was to his credit, that Italy should be abundantly supplied with provisions, which Pompey was determined to cut off by every possible method,^a he

^a (Ad Att. ix. 9.) "I perceive a most destructive war ready to break out, which Pompey will begin by famishing Italy; And yet I mourn for not taking part in this

Y. R. 704. he immediately dispatched Valerius, one of his Lieutenants, into Sardinia, with one legion; and Curio into Sicily with three; commanding
 B. C. 48. him, as soon as he had mastered this island, to pass over into Africa.
 403 Conf. Then, having put his legions into winter-quarters in the towns along Ad An. the coast, at Brundisium, Tarentum, Sipontum, and other places, in such
 x. 15. a manner as to lock up all the passages by sea, and having ordered levies over the whole country, he set out for Rome.
 Ad An. In the midst of his military operations, he had neglected no means of
 x. 19. gaining over to his party all those who were not his avowed enemies.
 Ad An. As soon as he was informed that the Senators had left Rome, he wrote
 vii. 17. to many of them to return, and desired Trebatius to write to Cicero to beg of him not to absent himself from the city: And, after Cicero had left it, he employed all their common friends to use their endeavours to induce him to imitate the conduct of some other Consuls, who had determined to preserve a neutrality. Cicero, upon these applications, keeping at a distance from Pompey, Cæsar imagined they had made an impression upon him; and he began to attempt another point with him, viz. to persuade him to come back to Rome, and assist in the Councils of the Senate, which he designed to summon at his return from following Pompey. With this view, in the hurry of his march towards Brundisium, Cæsar sent him the following letter.

CÆSAR, Emperor, to CICERO, Emperor.

Ad An. "WHEN I had but just time to see our friend Furnius, nor
 ix. 6. "could conveniently speak with, or hear him, was in haste, and on
 "my march, having sent the legions before me; yet I could not pass
 "by without writing, and sending him to you with my thanks:
 "Though I have often paid this duty before, and seem likely to pay
 "it oftener, you deserve it so well of me. I desire of you, in a special manner, that, as I hope to be in the city shortly, I may see you there, and have the benefit of your advice, your interest, your authority, your assistance in all things. But to return to the point: You will pardon the haste and brevity of my letter, and learn the rest from Furnius." To this very polite letter Cicero made the following answer.

"this war; a war! so detestable, that, tho' "there is nothing more unnatural than not "to assist our parents, yet have the leaders "of it taken their measures for famishing "the most venerable, the most sacred of all "parents, I mean their country. My apprehensions are not founded upon conjecture, but upon what I have heard from "themselves. This fleet that is gathering "from Alexandria, Colchis, Tyre, Sidon, "Aradus, Cyprus, Pamphylia, Lycia, Rhodes, "Chios, Bizantium, Lesbos, Miletus, Smyrna, "and Coos, is designed to intercept the provisions of Italy, and to seize the coasts of the corn countries."

CICERO,

CICERO, Emperor, to CÆSAR, Emperor.

“ UPON reading your letter, delivered to me by Furnius, in which “ you pressed me to come to the city, I did not so much wonder at “ what you there intimated, of your desire to use my advice and autho- “ rity, but was at a loss to find out what you meant by my interest
 “ and assistance : Yet I flattered myself into a persuasion, that, out of “ your admirable and singular wisdom, you were desirous to enter into “ some measures for establishing the peace and concord of the city ;
 “ and in that case I looked upon my temper and character as fit e“ nough to be employed in such a deliberation. If the case be so, and “ you have any concern for the safety of our friend POMPEY, and of “ reconciling him to yourself, and to the Republic, you will certainly find “ no man more proper for such a work than I am, who, from the “ very first, have always been the adviser of peace both to him and “ the Senate ; and, since this recourse to arms, have not meddled with “ any part of the war, but thought you to be really injured by it, while “ your enemies and enviers were attempting to deprive you of those honours “ which the Roman people had granted you. But as at that time I was “ not only a favourer of your dignity, but an encourager also of others “ to assist you in it ; so now the dignity of Pompey greatly affects me :
 “ For many years ago I made choice of you two, with whom to cul“ tivate a particular friendship, and to be, as I now am, most strictly “ united. Wherefore I desire of you, or rather beg and implore with “ all my prayers, that in the hurry of your cares you would indulge a “ moment to this thought, how by your generosity I may be permitted “ to shew myself an honest, grateful, pious man, in remembering an “ act of the greatest kindness to me. If this related only to myself, I “ should hope still to obtain it from you : But it concerns, I think, “ both your honour and the Republic, that by your means I should “ be allowed to continue in a situation the best adapted to promote the “ peace of you two, as well as the general concord of all the citizens.
 “ After I had sent my thanks to you before on the account of Lentulus ;
 “ for giving safety to him who had given it to me ; yet, upon reading “ his letter, in which he expresses the most grateful sense of your libe“ rality, I took myself to have received the same grace from you, “ which he had done : Towards whom, if by this you perceive me to “ be grateful, let it be your care, I beseech you, that I may be so too “ towards Pompey.”

In

* (Middleton, p. 92.) Cicero was censured for some passages of this letter, which Cæsar took care to make public, viz. the compliment on Cæsar's admirable wisdom ;

and, above all, the acknowledgment of his being injured by his adversaries in the present war : In excuse of which he says : (Ad Att. viii. 9.) “ that he was not sorry for the pub-

Y. R. 704.
B.C. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

In his way to Rome, Cæsar had a conference with Cicero, at Formiæ, on the 29th of March; of which, the latter gives the following account

10

“lication of it, for he himself had given several copies of it; and, considering what had since happened, was pleased to have it known to the world how much he had always been inclined to peace; and, that in urging Cæsar to save his country, he thought it his business to use such expressions as were the most likely to gain authority with him, without fearing to be thought guilty of flattery, in urging him to an act for which he would gladly have thrown himself even at his feet.”

He received another letter on the same subject, and about the same time, written jointly by Balbus and Oppius, two of Cæsar’s chief confidants: “The advice, not only of little men, such as we are, but even of the greatest, is generally weighed, not by the intention of the giver, but the event; yet, relying on your humanity, we will give you what we take to be the best in the case about which you wrote to us; which, though it should not be found prudent, yet certainly flows from the utmost fidelity and affection to you. If we did not know from Cæsar himself, that, as soon as he comes to Rome, he will do what in our judgment we think he ought to do, treat about a reconciliation between him and Pompey, we should give over exhorting you to come and take a part in those deliberations; that, by your help, who have a strict friendship with them both, the whole affair may be settled with ease and dignity: Or, if, on the contrary, we believed that Cæsar would not do it, and knew that he was resolved upon a war with Pompey, we should never try to persuade you to take arms against a man to whom you have the greatest obligations, in the same manner as we have always intreated you, not to fight against Cæsar. But, since, at present, we can only guess, rather than know what Cæsar will do, we have nothing to offer but this, that it does not seem agreeable to your dignity, or your fidelity, so well known to all, when you are intimate with them both, to take arms against either; and this we do not doubt but Cæsar, according to his humanity, will highly approve: Yet, if you judge proper, we will

“write to him, to let us know what he will really do about it; and, if he returns us an answer, we will presently send you notice what we think of it, and give you our word, that we will advise only, what we take to be most suitable to your honour, not to Cæsar’s views; and are persuaded that Cæsar, out of his indulgence to his friends, will be pleased with it.” Ad Att. ix. 8. This joint letter was followed by a separate one from Balbus: “Immediately after I had sent the common letter from Oppius and myself, I received one from Cæsar, of which I have sent you a copy; whence you will perceive how desirous he is of peace, and to be reconciled with Pompey, and how far removed from all thoughts of cruelty. It gives me an extreme joy, as it certainly ought to do, to see him in these sentiments. As to yourself, your fidelity, and your piety, I am entirely of the same mind, my dear Cicero, with you, that you cannot, consistently with your character and duty, bear arms against a man, to whom you declare yourself so greatly obliged; that Cæsar will approve this resolution, I certainly know from his singular humanity; and that you will perfectly satisfy him, by taking no part in the war against him, nor joining yourself to his adversaries; This he will think sufficient, not only from you, a person of such dignity and splendor; but has allowed it even to me, not to be found in that camp, which is likely to be formed against Lentulus and Pompey, from whom I have received the greatest obligations: It was enough, he said, if I performed my part to him in the city and the gown, which I might perform also to them, if I thought fit; wherefore I now manage all Lentulus’s affairs at Rome, and discharge my duty, my fidelity, my piety to them both: Yet, in truth, I do not take the hopes of an accommodation, though now so low, to be quite desperate, since Cæsar is in that mind in which we ought to wish him: One thing would please me, if you thought it proper, that you would write to him, and desire a guard from him, as you did from Pompey, at the time of Mile’s trial, with my approval.”

to his friend Atticus. “My discourse with him, says he, was such as “would rather make him think well of me than thank me. I stood “firm in refusing to go to Rome; but was deceived in expecting to “find him easy; for I never saw any one less so: He was condemned,
 “he said, by my judgment; and, if I did not come, others would be
 “the more backward: I told him that their case was very different “from mine. After many things said on both sides, he bad me come,
 “however, and try to make peace: Shall I do it, says I, in my own “way? Do you imagine, replied he, that I will prescribe to you? I “will move the Senate then, says I, for a decree against your going to “Spain, or transporting your troops into Greece, and say a great deal be“sides in bewailing the case of Pompey: I will not allow, replied he,
 “such things to be said: So I thought, says I, and for that reason will “not come; because I must either say them, and many more, which I “cannot help saying, if I am there, or not come at all. The result “was, that, to shift off the discourse, he wished me to consider of it;
 “which I could not refuse to do, and so we parted. I am persuaded,
 “that he is not pleased with me; but I am pleased with myself; which “I have not been before of a long time. As for the rest; good Gods, “what a crew he has with him! What a hellish band, as you call “them! — What a deplorable affair! What desperate troops!
 “What a lamentable thing, to see Servius’s son, and Titinius’s, with “many more of their rank in that camp, which besieged Pompey! He “has six legions; wakes at all hours; fears nothing; I see no end of “this calamity. His declaration at the last, which I had almost forgot, “was odious; that, if he was not permitted to use my advice, he would “use such as he could get from others, and pursue all measures that “were for his service.”

Cicero fancied to himself, that Cæsar deemed his presence in the city as of the greatest importance to his cause, and meant to get a decision from him, that, in the absence of the Consuls, the Assembly for the elections

“probation: I will undertake for him, if “I rightly know Cæsar, that he will sooner “pay a regard to your dignity, than to his “own interest. How prudently I write “these things, I know not; but this I cer“tainly know, that, whatever I write, I “write out of a singular love and affection
 “to you; for, (let me die, so as Cæsar may “but live) if I have not so great an esteem
 “for you, that few are equally dear to me.
 “When you have taken any resolution in “this affair, I wish that you would let me “know it, for I am exceedingly solicitous “that you should discharge your duty to “them both, which in truth I am confident “you will discharge.” Dr. Middleton is of opinion, that the offer of a guard was insinuated to deprive him of the liberty of retiring: But, considering Cæsar’s most generous behaviour, even to his enemies, this suspicion seems to be intirely groundless.

VOL. IV

“There was a time [says Cibber, p.
 “192.] when these followers of Cæsar were “all heroes with Cicero, they being still the “same ragamuffins that had done glorious “business abroad for the Republic under the “same command of Cæsar, and did as ef“fectually (valiant rascals as they were) as “if they had been all Saints or Patriots.”
 Has not the illustrious Consul, who saved
Rome, condescended to sing their exploits in Greek verse?

I

of

Y.R. 704.
 Ref. Chr.
 48.
 403 Conf.

Y. R. 704. of the new Magistrates might be held by a Prætor: But Cæsar, it is Euf. Chr. 48. probable, did not think his presence of so much use, and certainly never 403; Con. intended to force him into a compliance, but to win him by address, and the counsels of his friends.

Middl. p. 97. While Cæsar was on the road to Rome, young Quintus Cicero, the ne-Ad Ant. x. 4, 5, 7. phew, a fiery, giddy youth, privately wrote to him to offer his service, with a promise of some information concerning his uncle; upon which, being sent for, and admitted to an audience, he assured Cæsar, that his uncle was utterly disaffected to all his measures, and determined to leave Italy and go to POMPEY. The boy was tempted to this rashness by the hopes of a considerable present, and gave much uneasiness by it both to the father and the uncle, who had reason to fear some ill consequence from it:
 But Cæsar, desirous to divert Cicero from declaring against him, and to quiet the apprehensions which he might entertain for what was past, took occasion to signify to him, in a kind letter from Rome, that he retained no resentment of his refusal to come to the city, though Volcatius Tullus and Servius Sulpicius [two Consular Senators] had complained that he had not shewn the same indulgence to them. And Curio told him a few days after, that, when Delabella was earnestly solicitous that he should come to Rome, Cæsar, in an answer, returned him many thanks, and told him, that he was not only satisfied, but pleased at his not coming. He assured him also that Cæsar would have made no difficulty in granting him the favour he had granted to Philippus, that of remaining neuter:
 That he might act as if the thing was agreed on with Cæsar himself;
 and that he would write to him, that matters were so settled between them: He added, that, if he pleased, he might leave Italy, and pass through Sicily to go into Greece. Yet Cicero's behaviour and residence in those villa's of his, which were nearest to the sea, gave rise to a general report, that he was waiting only for a wind to carry him over to Pompey; upon which, Cæsar sent him another pressing letter to try, if possible, to dissuade him from that step.

CÆSAR, Emperor, to CICERO, Emperor.

Ad Ant. x. 8. “ THOUGH I never imagined that you would do any thing rashly “ or imprudently; yet, moved by common report, I thought proper to “ write to you, and beg of you, by our mutual affection, that you would “ not run to a declining cause, whither you did not think fit to go while “ it stood firm. For you will do the greatest injury to our friendship, and “ consult but ill for yourself, if you do not follow where fortune calls:
 “ For all things seem to have succeeded most prosperously for us, most “ unfortunately for them: Nor will you be thought to have followed “ the cause (since that was the same, when you chose to withdraw your“ self from their Councils) but to have condemned some act of mine;
 “ than which you could do nothing that could affect me more sensibly,
 “ and

“ and what I beg, by the rights of our friendship, that you would “ not do. Lastly, what is more agreeable to the character of an ho“ nest, quiet man, and good citizen, than to retire from civil broils?
 “ from which some, who would gladly have done it, have been de“ terred by an apprehension of danger: But you, after a full testi“ mony of my life, and trial of my friendship, will find nothing more “ safe or reputable, than to keep yourself clear from all this conten“ tion. The 16th of April, on the road.”

Y. R. 704.
 Bcf. Chr.
 48.
 403 Conf.

Antony, also, whom Cæsar left to guard Italy in his absence, wrote to him to the same purpose, and on the same day.

ANTONIUS, Tribune of the People and Proprætor, to CICERO, Emperor.

“ IF I had not a great esteem for you, and much greater indeed “ than you imagine, I should not be concerned at the report which is “ spread of you, especially when I take it to be false. But, out of “ the excess of my affection, I cannot dissemble, that even a report, “ though false, makes some impression on me. I cannot believe that “ you are preparing to cross the sea, when you have such a value for “ Dolabella, and your daughter Tullia, that excellent woman, and are “ so much valued by us all, to whom, in truth, your dignity and ho“ nour are almost dearer than to yourself: Yet I did not think it the “ part of a friend not to be moved by the discourse even of ill-design“ ing men, and wrote this with the greater inclination, as I take my “ part to be the more difficult on the account of our late coldness, oc-“ sioned rather by my jealousy than any injury from you. For I de“ sire you to assure yourself, that nobody is dearer to me than you, “ excepting my Cæsar, and that I know also that Cæsar reckons M. Ci- “ cero in the first class of his friends. Wherefore, I beg of you, “ my Cicero, that you will keep yourself free and undetermined, and “ despise the fidelity of that man who first did you an injury, that he “ might afterwards do you a kindness; nor fly from him, who,
 “ though he should not love you, which is impossible, yet will al“ ways desire to see you in safety and splendor. I have sent Calpur- “ nus to you with this, the most intimate of my friends, that you “ might perceive the great concern which I have for your life and “ dignity.”

Ad Att. x.

Calpurnius also wrote to him on the same subject; but finding, by some hints in Cicero's answer, that he was actually preparing to run away to Pompey, he sent him a second letter, in a most pathetic, or, as Cicero Ad Att. calls it, lamentable strain, in hopes to work upon him by alarming all his fears.

x. 9.

COELIUS TO CICERO.

Y. R. 704. " BEING in a consternation at your letter, by which you shew Ref. Chr. " that you are meditating nothing but what is dismal, yet neither tell
 48. " me directly what it is, nor wholly hide it from me, I presently wrote 403 Conf. " this to you. By all your fortunes, Cicero, by your children, I beg Ep. Fam. " and beseech you not to take any step injurious to your safety : For I viii. 16. " call the gods and men and our friendship to witness, that what I " have told, and forewarned you of, was not any vain conceit of my " own, but after I had talked with Cæsar, and understood from him,
 " how he resolved to act after his victory, I informed you of what I " had learned. If you imagine that his conduct will be always the " same, in dismissing his enemies and offering conditions, you are mis" taken : He thinks and even talks of nothing but what is fierce and " severe*, and is gone away much out of humour with the Senate,
 " and thoroughly provoked with the opposition which he has met with,
 " nor will there be any room for mercy. Wherefore, if you yourself,
 " your only son, your house, your remaining hopes be dear to you ;
 " if I, if the worthy man your son-in-law, have any weight with you ;
 " you should not desire to overturn our fortunes, and force us to hate
 " or to relinquish that cause in which our safety consists, or to enter" tain an impious wish against yours. Lastly, reflect on this, that " you have already given all the offence which you can give by stay" ing so long behind ; and now to declare against a Conqueror, whom " you would not offend, while his cause was doubtful, and to fly after
 " those who run away, with whom you would not join while they " were in a condition to resist, is the utmost folly. Take care that,
 " while you are ashamed not to approve yourself one of the best citi" zens, you be not too hasty in determining what is the best. But, if " I cannot wholly prevail with you, yet wait at least till you know
 " how we succeed in Spain, which, I now tell you, will be ours as " soon as Cæsar comes thither. What hopes they may have when " Spain is lost, I know not ; and what your view can be in acceding " to a desperate cause, by my faith, I cannot find out. As to the " thing, which you discover to me by your silence about it, Cæsar has " been informed of it ; and, after the first salutation, told me pre" sently what he had heard of you : I denied that I knew any thing of " the matter, but begged of him to write to you in a manner the " most effectual to make you stay. He carries me with him into Spain ;

* It is evident that Coelius writes thus to frighten Cicero, whom he knew to be a coward. Caris told him also, in his way to Sicily, that Cæsar's clemency flowed not from his natural disposition, but because he thought it popular ; and that, if he once lost the affections of the people, he would be cruel. Ad Att. x. 4.

" if

“ if he did not, I would run away to you, wherever you are, before
 “ I came to Rome, to dispute this point with you in person, and hold “ you fast even by force. Consider, Cicero, again and again, that you “ do not utterly ruin both you and yours; that you do not knowingly
 “ and wilfully throw yourself into difficulties, whence you see no way “ to extricate yourself. But, if either the reproaches of the better sort “ touch you, or you cannot bear the insolence and haughtiness of a “ certain set of men, I would advise you to chuse some place remote “ from the war, till these contests be over, which will soon be decided:
 “ If you do this, I shall think that you have done wisely, and you “ will not offend Cæsar.”

The

* The conclusion, the partial conclusion of Dr. Middleton, p. 106, from these letters, is as follows: “ These letters give us the most sensible proof of the high esteem and credit in which Cicero flourished at this time in Rome: When in a contest for empire, which force alone was to decide, we see the Chiefs on both sides so solicitous to gain a man to their party, who had no peculiar skill in arms, or talents for war: But his name and authority was the acquisition which they sought; since, whatever was the fate of their arms, the world, they knew, would judge better of the cause which Cicero espoused. The same letters will confute, likewise, in a great measure, the common opinion of his want of resolution in all cases of difficulty, since no man could shew a greater than he did on the present occasion, when, against the importunities of his friends, and all the invitations of a successful power, he chose to follow the cause which he thought the best, though he knew it to be the weakest.”

The same elegant panegyrist of Cicero has laid open, in the following manner, the motives of his conduct at this time. P. 109, 110, 113. “ From the time of his leaving the city, together with Pompey and the Senate, there passed not a single day in which he did not write one or more letters to Atticus, the only friend whom he trusted with the secret of his thoughts. From these letters it appears, that the sum of Atticus’s advice to him agreed intirely with his own sentiments, that, if Pompey remained in Italy, he ought to join with him; if not, should stay behind, and expect what fresh accidents might produce. This was what Cicero had hitherto followed;

“ and as to his future conduct, though he seems sometimes to be a little wavering and irresolute, yet the result of his deliberations constantly turned in favour of Pompey. His personal affection for the man, preference of his cause, the reproaches of the better sort, who began to censure his tardiness, and, above all, his gratitude for favours received, which had ever the greatest weight with him, made him resolve at all adventures to run after him; and though he was displeased with his management of the war, and without any hopes of his success; though he knew him before to be no politician, and now perceived him, he says, to be no General; yet, with all his faults, he could not endure the thoughts of deserting him, nor hardly forgive himself for staying so long behind him.—What held him still a while longer was the tears of his family, and the remonstrances of his daughter Tullia, who intreated him to wait only the issue of the Spanish war, and urged it as the advice of Atticus.—Pursuing at last the result of all his deliberations, and preferring the consideration of duty to that of his safety, he embarked to follow Pompey on the eleventh of June.”

Mr. Melmoth has given a quite different, Cic. Lett. and, I think, a truer account of Cicero’s motives. He thinks that his conduct, during this important crisis, evidently shews the strength and measure of his patriotism: “ Upon the news that Cæsar was marching into Italy, Pompey was appointed General in chief of the republican forces: And the principal Magistrates, together with those who were invested with proconsular power, were distributed into different cantons in Italy, in order to raise troops for
 “ the

Y. R. 704.
 Bef. Chr.
 48.
 403 Conf.

V. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Cons.

The substance of his answers to these letters from Cæsar, Antony, and others, is contained in the following letter to Cælius, which is written with particular care.

CICERO

“ the defence of the common cause. Cicero had his particular district assigned him among the rest: But, instead of executing this important commission with spirit and vigour, he remained altogether inactive at his several villa’s in that part of Italy. And this he signified to Cæsar, by means of their common friend Trebatius; who had written to him in Cæsar’s name, in order to prevail with him to return to Rome: I answered Trebatius that what he required of me was impracticable at this juncture: But that I lived in my own farms, and did not concern myself in the new levies of troops, or any public business. Ad Att. vii. 37 Pompey, in the mean time [a month after] was pressing Cicero to join him: But he excused himself by representing, that, while he was actually on the road for that purpose, he was informed that he could not proceed without the danger of being intercepted by Cæsar’s troops. Epist. 2. Cic. ad Pomp. apud Epist. ad Att. viii. Cicero, however, is so ingenuous as to acknowledge in the same letter to Pompey, that, so long as there were hopes that the negotiations for a peace would be attended with success, he thought it a justifiable piece of prudence not to be too active in forwarding the preparations that were carrying on against Cæsar, remembering, he says, how much he had formerly suffered from the resentment of the latter in the affair of his exile. This was explaining at once the true principle of his whole conduct: And he avows it more expressly in a letter to Atticus: Then, say you, why did not you go beyond seas with Pompey? I tell you it was out of my power to do it: And I refer you to the days and dates of our letters. At the same time I will frankly confess what I might have easily conceived; I was, perhaps, in the wrong in laying too great a stress upon a certain circumstance, in which I was deceived. I have flattered myself with the hopes of an accommodation: Should that happen, I was unwilling to have Cæsar for my enemy, when he was reconciled with Pompey. I was sensible that they were still the same men: And it was this

“ that occasioned my indecision. Ad Att. x. 8. Pompey, however, had no sooner set sail for Greece, than Cicero was struck with the consciousness of his having acted an unworthy part: Hitherto I was vexed and uneasy, because unable to come to any resolution. But, now that POMPEY and the Consuls have left Italy, it is no longer vexation and grief, it is anguish and distraction.—I am not, believe me, in my senses, so overwhelmed am I with the infamy, I think, I have incurred. Ad Att. ix. 6. After several deliberations, therefore, he was determined, he tells Atticus, to follow Pompey, without waiting for the event of Cæsar’s arms in Spain. Ad Att. ix. 19. x. 8. This resolution, nevertheless, soon gave way to a second: For, having received some accounts which contradicted a former report that had been spread concerning the advantageous posture of Pompey’s affairs, Cicero renounced his intention of joining him, and now purposed to stand neuter. Ad Att. x. 9. But a new turn in favour of Pompey seems to have brought Cicero back to his former scheme. For, in a subsequent letter to Atticus, wherein he mentions some reasons to believe that Pompey’s affairs went well in Spain, and takes notice, likewise, of some disgust, which the populace expressed towards Cæsar in the theatre; we find him resuming his design of openly uniting with Pompey. And, accordingly, he resolved to join those who were maintaining Pompey’s cause in Sicily. Ad Att. x. 12. It does not appear, by any of his letters, upon what motive he afterwards exchanged his plan, for that of sailing directly to Pompey’s camp in Greece: Which, after various debates with himself, he, at length, executed. There is a passage, however, in Cæsar’s Commentaries, which perhaps will render it probable, that the news which, about this time, was confidently spread at Rome, that Cæsar’s army had been almost totally defeated in Spain, was the determining reason that sent Cicero to Pompey. The fact was, that Afranius and Petreibus had gained some advantages over Cæsar: But, as they magnified

“ them

CICERO TO MARCUS COELIUS.

“ I SHOULD have been extremely affected by your letter, if Y. R. 704. Bef. Chr. 48.
 “ reason had not banished from my heart all its disquietudes, and despair 403 Conf.
 “ of seeing better days had not long since hardened it against every new Ep. Fam. ii. 16.
 “ impression of grief; yet, strong as I must acknowledge my despon- Melm. vi. 11.
 “ dency to be, I am not sensible, however, that I said any thing in “ my last, which could justly raise the suspicion you have conceived.
 “ What more did my letter contain than general expressions of dissatis“ faction at the sad prospect of our affairs? A prospect, which cannot, “ surely, suggest to your own mind less gloomy apprehensions than it “ presents to mine. For I am too well persuaded of the force of your “ penetration to imagine that my judgment can discover consequences “ which lie concealed from yours. but I am surprised that you, who “ ought to know me perfectly well, should believe me capable of acting “ with so little policy as to abandon a rising fortune, for one in its de“ cline, at least, if not utterly fallen; or so variable, as not only to de“ stroy at once all the interest I have established with Cæsar, but to de“ viate even from myself, by engaging at last in a civil war, which it has “ hitherto been my determined maxim to avoid. Where then did you “ discover those unhappy resolutions you impute to me? Perhaps you “ collected them from what I said of secluding myself in some se“ questered solitude. And indeed you are sensible how ill I can submit,
 “ I do not say to endure, but even to be a witness of the insolencies of “ the successful party: A sentiment, my friend, which once, I am sure,
 “ was yours no less than mine. But in vain would I retire, whilst I pre“ serve the title with which I am at present distinguished, [of Impera- “ tor] and bear about this embarrassing parade of Lictors. Were I “ eased of this troublesome honour, there is no part of Italy so obscure,
 “ in which I should not be well contented to hide myself. Yet these,
 “ my laurels, unwelcome as they are to myself, are the object both of “ the envy and the raillery of my malevolent enemies. [†] Nevertheless, under

“ them in their letters to Rome, much be“ yond the truth; several persons of note, “ who had hitherto been fluctuating in “ their resolutions, thought it was high time “ to declare themselves, and went off im“ mediately to Pompey.” De Bell. Civ. i.
 55. Cicero very well knew from the beginning, which was the most honourable part for a man of his political principles to act under his connections with the Chiefs of the aristocracy, and his formal engagements to Pompey; but the prudential part was not so clear a point. He dreaded Cæsar’s resentment, but he was still more afraid of the resentment of Pompey: “ I find I am “ either way in danger; from the one party

 “ by not doing my duty, and from the other “ by doing it; and so distracted are public “ affairs, that I can steer no course but “ what is full of perils.”

[†] Cicero, undoubtedly, gave upon this occasion but too much colour to the censure of his enemies: For it could not but have a very strange appearance, that he should preserve the thoughts of a triumph, at a time when his country was bleeding with a civil war.

Y. R. 704. " under all these temptations of withdrawing from so disgusting a Bef. Chr. " scene, I never once entertained a thought of leaving Italy without the 48. " previous approbation of yourself and some others. But you know the 403. Conf. " situation of my several villa's : And as it is among these that I am " obliged to divide my time, that I may not incommode my friends ;
 " the preference I give to those which stand on the sea-coast has raised
 " a suspicion that I am meditating a flight into Greece. If peace, indeed,
 " were to be found in that country, I should not perhaps be unwilling
 " to undertake the voyage : But to enter upon it, in order to engage in " a war, would be altogether inconsistent, surely, with my principles " and character ; especially, as it would be taking up arms not only a" gainst a man who I hope is perfectly well satisfied with my conduct,
 " but in favour of one whom it is now impossible I should ever render
 " so. In a word, as I made no secret to you when you met me at " my Cuman villa, of the conversation which had passed between Am-
 " pius and myself, you could not be at a loss to guess my sentiments
 " upon this head : And indeed you plainly saw how utterly averse I was " to the scheme of Pompey's deserting Rome. Did I not then affirm, " that there was nothing I would not suffer, rather than be reduced to " follow the civil war beyond the limits of Italy ? And has any event
 " since happened, that could give me just reason of changing my senti" ments ? On the contrary, has not every circumstance concurred to " fix me in them. *

" Be assured, (and I am well persuaded 'tis what you already believe) " that the single aim of my actions, in these our public calamities, has " been to convince the world, that my great and earnest desire was to " preserve the peace of our country ; and, when this would no longer be " hoped, that there was nothing I wished more, than to avoid taking " any part in the civil war. And I shall never, I trust, have reason to " repent of firmly persevering in these sentiments. It was the frequent
 " boast, I remember, of my friend Hortensius, that he had never taken " up arms in any of our civil dissensions. But I may glory in the " same honest neutrality, with a much better grace : As that of Horten- sius

war. But, as he was extremely ambitious of this honour, he was greatly unwilling to renounce it ; still flattering himself, perhaps, that some accommodation between Cæsar and Pompey would afford him an opportunity of enjoying what he so strongly desired. Melmoth.

* Notwithstanding Cicero's strong assertions, that he had no thoughts of joining Pompey, he had actually determined to do so a few days before he received the preceding letter from Calpurnius ; as appears by an epistle to Atticus, wherein he expressly tells him, that he was only waiting for a fair wind. But, before he wrote the present letter, he had received some news not altogether favourable to Pompey's party : In consequence of which, he renounced his former design, and was now determined, (though he does not think proper to own it in this letter) to retire to Melia, as a neutral island. This resolution, however, he soon afterwards rejected, and resumed his first intentions of following Pompey into Greece. And this scheme he at length executed. Ad Att. x. 8, 9.

“ fius was suspected to have arisen from the timidity of his temper ; whereas “ mine, I think, cannot be imputed to any motive of that unworthy kind.
 [Cicero seems to have been sensible that Calius intended to frighten him into a neutrality] “ Nor am I in the least terrified by those considera“ tions, with which you so faithfully and affectionately endeavour to “ alarm my fears. The truth of it is, there is no calamity so severe,
 “ to which we are not all of us, it should seem, in this universal anarchy “ and confusion, equally and unavoidably exposed. But if I could have “ averted this dreadful storm from the Republic, at the expence of my “ own private and domestic enjoyments, even of those, my friend, “ which you so emphatically recommend to my care, I should most “ willingly have made the sacrifice. As to my son, (who I rejoice to “ find has a share in your concern) I shall leave him a sufficient patri-“ mony in that honour with which my name will be remembered, so “ long as the Republic shall subsist : And, if it be destroyed, I shall “ have the consolation at least to reflect, that he will suffer nothing more “ than must be the common lot of every Roman. With regard to that “ dear and excellent young man, my son-in-law, whose welfare you in-“ treat me to consider ; can you once doubt, knowing, as you perfectly “ do, the tenderness I bear, not only for him, but for Tullia, that I am “ infinitely anxious upon his account ? I am the more so indeed, as it “ was my single consolation amidst these general distractions, that they “ might possibly prove a means of protecting him from those inconve“ niences in which his too generous spirit had involved him. ^b How “ much he suffered from them during the time he continued in Rome, as “ well as how little that circumstance was to my credit, are points “ which I choose to leave to your own inquiry.

“ Affairs in Spain, I doubt not, will terminate in the manner you “ mention. But I neither wait the event of them in order to determine “ my conduct, ^c nor am I acting in any other respect with the least arti“ fice. If the Republic should be preserved, I shall certainly hold my “ rank in it : But, if it should be subverted, you yourself, I dare say, “ will join me in my intended solitude. But this latter supposition is,

K

“ per-

^b It should seem, by this passage, that Dolabella, who had contracted very considerable debts, was at this time under some difficulties from his creditors : From whom Cicero flattered himself that Cæsar’s power would have protected him. Some commentators, however, instead of liberalitate, adopted in this translation, read libertate : And suppose that Cicero alludes to the prosecution in which Dolabella had been engaged against Appius. But, whichever be the true word, the sentiment is observable. For, surely, it was utterly unworthy of Ci- cero to find the least consolation amidst the calamities of his country, in the hope that they might prove a screen to Dolabella, either from the justice of his creditors, or the malice of his enemies. Melmoth.

^c The contrary of this was the truth : For Cicero was at this time determined to wait the event of Cæsar’s expedition against the Lieutenants of Pompey in Spain. And for this purpose he had thoughts of retiring to Melia : Melitum, opinor, capeßam (says he to Atticus) dum quid in Hispania. Ad Att. x. 9. Melm.

Y. R. 704. " perhaps, the vain and groundless surmise of a disturbed imagina-
 Bef. Chr. " tion; and affairs, after all, may take a happier turn than I am apt 48. " to presage. I remember the despondency which prevailed in my 40; Conf. " earliest days amongst our patriots of more advanced years¹: Possibly " my present apprehensions may be of the same cast, and no other than " the effect of a common weakness incident to old age. Heaven
 " grant they may prove so! And yet you have heard, I suppose, that " a robe of magistracy is in the looms for Oppius; and that Curtius
 " has hopes of being invested with the double-dyed purple: But the " principal workman, it seems, somewhat delays him. I throw in " this little pleasantry, to let you see I can smile in the midst of my
 " indignation.

" Let me advise you to enter into the affair which I formerly men" tioned concerning Dolabella, with the same warmth as if it were your " own. I have only to add, that you may depend upon it I shall take " no hasty or inconsiderate measures. But, to whatever part of the " world I may direct my course, I intreat you to protect both me and
 " mine, agreeably to your honour and to our mutual friendship.
 " Farewell."

Cicero tarried about two months in Italy, after Cæsar's departure, under continual perplexities, whether to stay or to go; to wait the issue of the Spanish war, or to depart before it; whether to sail to Sicily first, or to Malta, or to Pompey's camp. He resolved, at last, to cross the sea to Pompey: yet, knowing all his motions to be narrowly watched, took pains to conceal his intention, especially from Antony, who resided at this time in his neighbourhood, and kept a strict eye upon him. He sent him word, therefore, by letter, that he had no design against Cæsar; that he remembered his friendship, and his son-in-law Dolabella; that, if he had other thoughts, he could easily have been with POMPEY; that his chief reason for retiring was to avoid the uneasiness of appearing in public with the formality of his liegors. But Antony (who saw through his finess) wrote him a surly answer; which Cicero calls a Laconic mandate, and sent a copy of it to Atticus, to let him see, he says, how tyrannically it was drawn.

———— " How sincere is your way of acting? for he, who has a " mind to stand neuter, stays at home; he, who goes abroad, seems " to pass a judgment on the one side or the other. But it does not " belong to me to determine, whether a man may go abroad or " not. Cæsar has imposed this task upon me, not to suffer any man
 " to go out of Italy. Wherefore it signifies nothing to me to approve

¹ This alludes to the contentions between Sylla and Marins: Which, notwithstanding the probability of their terminating in the total subversion of the Constitution, the Republic, however, survived. Melm.

“ your resolution, if I have no power to indulge you in it. I would “ have you write to Cæsar, and ask that favour of him : I do not “ doubt but you will obtain it, especially since you promise to retain “ a regard for our friendship.”

Y. R. 704.
 Bef. Chr.
 48.
 403 Conf.

Antony, after this letter, he tells us, never came to see him, but sent an excuse, that he was ashamed to do it, because he took him to be angry with him, giving him to understand, at the same time, by Trebatius, that he had special orders to observe his motions^k. In these circumstances, while he was preparing all things for his voyage, and waiting only for a fair wind, he removed from his Cuman to his Pompeian villa beyond Naples, which, not being so commodious for an embarkment, would help to lessen the suspicion of his intended flight^l. He at last stole away on the eleventh of June^m,

Ad Att. x.
 12. 15.

K 2

with

^k Cicero, in his letters to Atticus, vents his spleen against Antony : He thus describes his usual equipage in travelling about Italy : “ He carries with him in an open chaise the “ famed actress Cytheris ; his wife follows “ in a second, with seven other close litters “ full of his whores and boys. See by what “ base hands we fall ; and doubt, if you “ can, whether Cæsar, let him come van- “ quished or victorious, will not make cruel “ work among us at his return.” Among Antony’s other extravagances, he had the insolence to appear sometimes in public, with his mistress Cytheris, in a chariot drawn by lions. But Cicero tells his friend that, though the beasts were fierce, the Master himself was very tame. Pliny gravely reflects on this frolic, and speaks of it as a designed insult on the Roman people, as if, by the emblem of lions, Antony intended to give them to understand, that the fiercest spirits of them would be forced to submit to the yoke. Plutarch also mentions it, but both of them place it after the battle of Pharsalia, though it is evident, from Cicero’s letters, that it happened long before. Ad Att. x. 10. 13. Middl. p. 107.

^l Cicero, ad Att. x. 12, writes : “ I often “ propose to myself the example of Cælius “ Caldus,” [a consular man of the Marian faction, who raised troops for Marius, when at war with Sylla, and was killed in the attempt to support him] “ Could I find an “ occasion of imitating him, I would not let “ it slip.—I perceive the legions, which “ Cæsar raised in Italy, are very ill affect- “ ed to him : But he has not a greater foe “ than he is to himself. You rightly fear “ his abandoning himself to all excesses,

“ which he certainly will, if he grows “ desperate. This is the reason why I “ ought to attempt something in the spirit “ of a Cælius, but, I hope, with better suc- “ cess.” And, in Ep. 15, he says : “ The “ opportunity for executing my project of “ imitating Cælius ripens every day : If a “ standard was erected, numbers would flock “ to it.” Now, while he was at his Pompeian villa, his friend Ninnius brought him a message from the Officers of the three cohorts, which were in garrison at Pompeii, to beg leave to wait upon him the day following, in order to deliver their troops and the town into his hands ; but, instead of listening to the overture, he slipped away the next morning before day, to avoid seeing them. “ I reflected, says he, on the fate “ of Cælius.” Ep. 16. “ I do not blame, “ says Abbé Mongault, his circumspection ; “ but why does he boast so much of his “ prowess ?”

^m According to Usher’s computation on the first of April, or thereabout, of the Julian year. Now, if Cicero set out so early in the year, it is not possible that he should have heard any thing of the affairs of Spain, as he certainly did ; for it was about harvest-time, when Cæsar forced Pompey’s Lieutenants to capitulate ; and he reduced them to this extremity in forty days, so that he had scarce got into Spain by the month of April of the Julian year. According to our calculation, he sailed about the 15th of May. In a letter dated the 16th of May of the Roman style, ad Att. x. 17, he writes : Nunc quidem æquinoctium nos moratur, quod valde perturbatum erat. Abbé Mongault and Mir. Guthrie,

Y. R. 704. with his son, his brother, and nephew, and arrived safely at Dyrrachium.² Ecl. Chr.

^{48.}
403 Cenz. To make some amends for his past behaviour, and gain the greater authority with his party, he furnished Pompey, who was in great want of money, with a large sum out of his own stock, for the public service. But he met with nothing but disgust: He was reproached by some for coming so late; and Cato blamed him for coming to them at all, and deserting that neutral post, which might have given him the better opportunity of bringing about an accommodation. Pompey gave him no employment; and his counsels were slighted as timorous and cowardly; so that he soon repented of having embarked in the war, contrary to the advice of his best friends. In this disagreeable situation he resumed his usual way of raillery, and, what he could not dissuade by his authority, endeavoured to make ridiculous by his jests. By this conduct he is said to have provoked Pompey so far, that he told him, I wish you would go over to the other side, that you may begin to fear us: And it gave occasion afterwards to Antony, in a speech to the Senate, to censure the levity of his behaviour in the calamity of a civil war, and to reflect not only upon his fears, but the unseasonableness also of his jokes^o. Having paid this attention to the greatest civil character of his time, let us return to Caesar, whom we left in his progress to Rome.

Ad Ant. xi. 3, 13. Caesar, so vigorous in action, so temperate in victory, was now become the object of public admiration all over Italy. The municipal towns in the southern parts, who, the year before, had put up prayers for Pompey's recovery, were now as earnest to shew their zeal for his rival; and he every-where received congratulations on his success. The people flocked to Rome, not only those whom particular favours

Guthrie, deceived by our learned Primate, have translated these lines in this sense: I wait for the equinox, the season of which is now in great confusion. But it is plain that the equinox was passed; quod perturbatum erat: The equinox, which has been very tempestuous, stops me. In the next letter, dated the 19th of May, he says he is detained by the dead calms more than by the guards that watch him: Ne mirifice tranquillitates adhuc tenerent. This description of storms and subsequent calms agrees very well with the month of April, in which, according to our computation, these letters were written, one on the 22d, the other on the 25th.

Middl. p. 124. We have no account of the manner and circumstances of his voyage, or by what course he steered towards Dyrrachium: For, after his leaving Italy, all his correspondence with it was in a great measure cut off, so that, from June, in which he sailed, we find an intermission of about nine months in the series of his letters, and not more than four of them written to Atticus during the continuance of the war. Ad Att. xi. 1, 2, 3, 4.

^o Some of Cicero's sayings on this occasion are preserved by different writers. When Pompey put him in mind of his coming so late to them: How can I come late, said he, when I find nothing in readiness among you? And upon Pompey's asking him sarcastically, Where his son-in-law Dolabella was; He is with your father-in-law, replied he. To a person newly arrived from Italy, and informing them of a strong report at Rome, that Pompey was blocked up by Caesar; and you sailed thither therefore, said he, that you might see it with your own eyes. Vid. Macrobi. Sat. ii. 3. Plut. in Cic. Middl. p. 116.

had

had attached to his person, but those also, who, guided by their interest, thought, with Calpurnius, that in civil contentions, when it came to arms, the stronger side was the best, because the safest. Several also of the Nobles, of the honest, were more complaisant than Cicero; and did not think it advisable to disregard Cæsar's solicitations: Among these were Servius Sulpicius, Volcatius Tullus, and M. Lepidus. The city neither wanted a Senate, nor its Magistrates, except the Consuls: The Prætors administered justice as usual; and the Ediles were making preparations for the public games. M. Antony and Q. Cassius, two Tribunes of the people, the most zealous in Cæsar's interest, convoked, on his arrival, the Senate in the suburbs, that he might be present without the infringement of the laws.

In his harangue to the House, after complaining of the injuries of his enemies, he said, "that he had never affected extraordinary and " illegal honours", but waited patiently the time prescribed by the " laws to solicit for a second consulship. That the people, with the " concurrence of the whole college of Tribunes, had allowed him to " stand candidate, though absent, and that even in the consulship of " Pompey; who might have prevented the passing of the decree, if he " had disapproved of it; and who could now have no good reason to " oppose it. That he had given proof of his moderation, by having " voluntarily proposed, that both parties should lay down their arms; " a measure which would have divested him of his government and " command. That the malice of his enemies was such, that they " sought to impose terms upon him, to which they would not submit " themselves; chusing rather to involve the state in a civil war, than " to part with their armies and provinces. That he had been injured " by having two of his legions taken away from him, and that the " violation of the authority of the Tribunes was oppressive and inso- " lent. That he had frequently made offers of peace, and had often " desired an interview; and that all his efforts for an accommodation " and the public good had been ineffectual." Upon all these accounts, he requested and conjured the Senate to take the Republic under their protection, and to assist him to govern it: And, if they declined, he said, through fear, this important charge, he would take it wholly upon himself. He then proposed to send Deputies to Pompey to treat of an accommodation. " Nor was he moved, he told them, by a re- " flection which Pompey had made lately in the House, that to send

^p Pompey had been habituated to them from his youth, and made haughty and insolent by them: He would bear no equal, and Cæsar did not think himself obliged to acknowledge him for his superior:

Nec quumquam jam ferre potest Cæsarve priorem, Pompeiusve parem.— — Lucan.

" Sure then Cæsar comes nearer to the com-
" monwealth's-man than Pompey. Pompey's
" no equal has a visible tincture of offensive
" ambition; while Cæsar's no superior, at " most, aspires but to a share in command" ing." Cibber. p. 183.

" Deputies

Y. R. 704. "Deputies was to acknowledge the superiority of him to whom they were Bef. Chr. 48. "sent, and a mark of timidity in the sender. This, he said, was a low 423 Conf. "way of thinking; and, in the same manner as he had endeavoured at
 "a superiority in action, he would also strive at a superiority in justice
 "and equity." This proposal of a deputation was generally applauded; but no one was found who would undertake the office: And three days were spent in debates and excuses upon this point. For Pompey had declared, before his departure, *that he should look upon those who staid behind in Rome equally guilty with those who were in CÆSAR's camp*⁹.

L. xli. p. 150. Dio writes, that, having also assembled the people without the city, he harangued in the same strain, and promised to keep up plenty in Rome, by sending corn from Sicily and Sardinia, and to make a donative of three hundred sesterces to each of the poorer citizens; and that, in consequence of these pacific speeches, the Romans resumed the appearance of peace, which they had put off from the taking of Rimini; but were far from being easy. The great number of Cæsar's soldiers in the city; the little confidence to be put in a language which the circumstances of affairs might dictate; and the examples of Marius and Sylla, who had made as fair promises at first; all contributed to excite the anxiety and terror of the more deliberate and thoughtful.

About 21.
105.

Cæsar, finding that the Senate was backward to take any resolution, and that his enemies had engaged Metellus, one of the Tribunes, to oppose his designs, was not willing to waste his time to no purpose; and he resolved not to commit the same error his enemies had been guilty of, in leaving behind them the public money. He therefore ordered the Treasury to be broke open, and seized the money for his own use. Metellus had the boldness to attempt to obstruct him in this measure; and Cæsar is said to have treated him with unusual roughness; telling him that it was in vain to talk of laws in the midst of arms; and that he

Ad Att. ix. 7. Cicero himself was not very forward to undertake the task of peace-making; and others might very well be backward: He writes thus to Atticus: "But, if Cæsar does not leave me at liberty to stand neuter, you advise me to declare myself publicly a mediator for an accommodation. No danger shall deter me from that: For, surrounded as I am with dangers, act how I will, why not expose myself to that which will do me the most honour? But I am afraid lest this should gail Pompey, and engage him to give me a very bad reception. For our friend affects strangely the domination of Sylla. I know what I say, and he has never made less a secret of any thing in his life, than he does of this. If such, say you, are his dispositions, would you follow him? Believe me, my friend, I

"follow him for the kindnesses he has done me, not as he is the head of a party. I befriend him as I did Milo, as I did —, Then, say you, you disapprove of his cause. No, it is an excellent one: but, remember what I say; he and his party will act scandalously. They will endeavour to starve Rome and Italy; then plunder and burn their country, and seize the properties of monied men. — If Pompey prevails, we will not leave in Italy one stone upon another." And Ad Att. ix. 10. he says, "What threatenings against our free towns, against some of our patriots in particular, and against all those who staid behind! How frequent was that saying in Pompey's mouth, Could Sylla do such a thing, and cannot I do it!" was Master, not only of the money, but of the lives of all those whom he had conquered. The Tribune, not being intimidated by these terrible words, and persisting in his opposition with the applause of some that were present, Cæsar threatened to kill him, adding: Young man, consider it is harder for me to say it than to do it. Some people, says Plutarch, yet ventured to represent, that there was in the Treasury a sacred fund, not to be employed but under the terror of a Gallic invasion: I have entirely removed that scruple, replied Cæsar, by subduing the Gauls. He found there, according to Pliny's computation, twenty-five thousand bars of gold, thirty-five thousand of silver, and forty millions of sesterces¹.

was

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

About
322,9161.

Cæsar left the city immediately after this necessary but unpopular step, and, as Curio told Cicero, much disturbed to see the people disgusted with it. He had resolved to speak to them before he set out, but he durst not venture upon it for fear of some affront: And hurried away much discomposed, having made a stay of only six or seven days.

¹ Pliny has also related, l. xxxiii. 3, that Cæsar took out of the Treasury 1500 pounds of Lafer of Cyrene, a drug of great value among the ancients, and much esteemed by them, not only for medicinal use, but for sauce. This drug is, however, according to the opinion of an author much to be depended on in these matters, what we now call assa fetida, the taste and smell of which are scarce to be borne. The Orientals are to this day very fond of it. Crevier.

Geoffroi
Mat. Med.
t. ii. p. 606.

CHAP. IV.

The reduction of SARDINIA by VALERIUS, of SICILY by CURIO, and of SPAIN by CÆSAR.

CÆSAR, before he set out for Spain, committed the care of the city to the Prætor L. Æmilius Lepidus, who was afterwards Triumvir with Antony and Octavius: He appointed Antony to command the forces in Italy, named his brother C. Antonius to the government of Illyricum, and Licinius Crassus to that of Cisalpine Gaul. He also gave orders for the speedy fitting out of two fleets, the one to guard the coasts of the Adriatic, of which he made Dolabella Admiral; the other, under the direction of *Q. Hortensius*¹, the son of the famous Orator of that name,

¹ Young Hortensius had been disinherited by his father, who left his great wealth to his wife Marcia. This lady had been married before to Cato, by whom she had several children; and was actually with child when he consented to let his friend have her. When she was a rich widow, Cato took her back again: Which gave, says Plutarch, in Cat. an occasion to Cæsar to reproach him with covetousness and mercenary views. For, said he, if he wanted a wife, why did he part with her? And, if he did not, why did he take her again? Unless he gave her only as a bait to Hortensius; and lent her when she was young, to have her again when she was rich. This behaviour of Cato did not inspire the young man with any zeal for his and Pompey's cause; and, though the father was a pillar of the Aristocratical faction, it is no wonder to see the son employed on the popular side.

was

Y. B. 1224. was to protect those of the Tuian sea. He set at liberty, at the same Bell. Civ. time, the unfortunate Aristobulus, formerly King of the Jews, and sent 43 him to Judea, to raise commotions there, and give disturbance to Sci-
 423 C. 1. 1. pio, who was gone to his province of Syria, to gather forces and money for Pompey.

Valerius and Curio had been appointed at Brundisium to pass over into Sardinia and Sicily; and they now set out with Cæsar for the execution of his orders, in which they met with no opposition. The inhabitant of Callaris, now Cagliari, the principal town in Sardinia, no sooner heard of Valerius's commission, than they drove out Cotta; who commanded there for Pompey, and who, finding the whole island in Cæsar's interest, fled precipitately into Africa.

Cato had been sent into Sicily by Pompey some weeks before he left Italy. On his arrival there, he applied himself with great diligence to gather forces for both the sea and land service. He refitted old ships and caused new ones to be built, and he ordered the several states of the island to furnish him with levies of horse and foot. He also sent his Officers to raise troops in Lucania, and the country of the Brutii. But, perceiving that he was not to be supported by Pompey, and must trust entirely to his own strength, he did not think it expedient to defend his province: And, calling his officers together, he complained of Pompey, who, without any previous preparations, had involved the Commonwealth in an unnecessary war; and who, when questioned by himself and others, in the Senate, had assured them that he was in readiness to sustain it. Having declared, in this manner, his sentiments, he quitted the island on the approach of Curio. Cicero was much scandalised at this conduct, being persuaded that he might have held his possession without difficulty, and that all honest men would have flocked to him, especially when Pompey's fleet was so near to support him. I wish, says he, that Cotta may hold out Sardinia, as it is said he will; for, if so, how base will Cato's behaviour appear! And he cites Curio, as being of this opinion, who, he says, confessed, that, if Pompey's fleet had appeared upon the coast and begun to act, he would himself have run away the first.

Cæsar, on his arrival in Gaul, was informed that Pompey had sent Vibullius Rufus into Spain; who, not many days before, had been taken

* Plutarch in Cat. and Appian de Bell. Civ. l. ii. relate, that Asinius Pollio, having brought over some troops to Messana before Curio's arrival, Cato sent to him to inquire, by whose authority, whether of the Senate or the people, he had landed in his province: That Pollio answered, it was by the authority of him who was Master in Italy: That Cato, at the same time, being informed that Pompey had really failed for Dyr-

ebium, said he could easily drive Pollio out of Sicily; but, as greater forces were coming to join him, he would not engage the island in a war; and after complaining, not of Pompey, as Cæsar relates, but of the Gods, who gave Pompey success in every foolish and dishonest enterprise, and now abandoned him when he was defending his country, he advised the people of Syracuse to submit to Curio, and provide for their own safety.

prisoner

prisoner at Corfinium, and had been set at liberty; that L. Domitius,^{Y. R. 704. Buf. Cl. 48. 403 Cont.} named by the Senate to the government of Gaul, was expected at Marseilles; and that, to prepare the way for his reception, the Massilian Deputies in Rome, young men of the first quality, had been sent home by Pompey, before he left the city; and had been exhorted by him to remain in their ancient attachment and fidelity to the Senate, and not to suffer the memory of his past services to their country to be blotted out by those they had since received from Cæsar. The inhabitants of Marseilles, in consequence of these remonstrances, had determined to shut their gates against Cæsar, and called to their aid the Albici, a barbarous people who had long been under their protection, and inhabited the adjoining mountains. They laid in stores of provisions, set up workshops for the making of arms, refitted their navy, repaired their walls and gates, and neglected nothing to put their town in a state of defence.

The government of the city was aristocratical, the whole power^{Strab. l. 1. p. 179.} being in the hands of a Senate consisting of six hundred Nobles, who held their places for life: But out of this number there was formed a Council of fifteen for the execution of the laws and dispatch of business. Cæsar sent for these, and exhorted them to follow the example and authority of all Italy, which was now in his interest, rather than the will of one particular person and his adherents. The Counsellors, returning into the city, assembled the Senate on this important occasion, which sent back the following answer: "That they saw that the Romans were divided into two parties, and that it did not belong to them to decide the quarrel. That at the head of these parties were Pompey and Cæsar, both patrons of their city; the first having added to its dominion the country of the Volca-Arecomici and Helvii; the other that of the Salyæ: And that, as they were equally indebted to both, it did not become them to assist the one against the other; but to remain in a state of neutrality, and to grant to neither an admittance into their town or port.

This answer had just been given, when Domitius arrived at Marseilles, with a fleet of seven galleys, which he had manned with the slaves, freedmen, and peasants, who belonged to his lands in Tuscany. He was received, however, into the town, was appointed its Governor, and charged with the administration of the war; and by his order the Massilian fleet was sent out immediately to sail along the coasts, that it might seize and bring in all the merchant-vessels it could find, in order that they might be made fit for service, or taken to pieces to repair others. Cæsar was incensed at these proceedings, and, being sensible of the consequence of leaving behind him in the interest of his enemies a city which was the key of Gaul, he resolved to lay siege to it directly both by sea and land. He appointed three legions for this purpose, and, at the same time that he prepared towers and other works for the approaches by land, he had twelve galleys built at Arles; which, being

Y. R. 704. completed, and brought down the Rhone to Marseilles in thirty days, he Bel. Chr. gave the command of them to Decimus Brutus, and charged C. Trebo-
 48. nus with the conduct of the siege.
 403 Conl.

The employment Cæsar found so unexpectedly at Marseilles delayed not his Spanish expedition. While preparations were making for the siege, he sent C. Fabius with three legions that were quartered near Narbonne, to take possession of the passes of the Pyrenees, which were guarded by a party of Afranius's troops: And this Commander, having forced these, advanced by long marches towards the main army. Pompey had three Lieutenants in Spain, Afranius, Petreius, and Varro: The first of these was at the head of three legions in the nearer Spain: The other two, reckoning their new levies, had each two legions. Petreius commanded from the Castilian forest to the Anas: Varro from the Anas quite through Lusitania and the territories of the Vettones. These Lieutenants, upon the arrival of Vibullius Rufus, had consulted together, and agreed, that Petreius should join Afranius with his two legions, and that Varro should remain in further Spain and secure that province. They raised with all diligence eighty cohorts among the Spaniards, and five thousand horse; and determined to make Ilerda the seat of the war, on account of its convenient situation, upon a rising ground, twenty miles from the Iberus, between the rivers Sicoris and Cinga.

Lerida.

Segre.

Cæsar sent after Fabius what other legions he had in Gaul not employed at the siege of Marseilles; which could not be more than two, unless he brought from Italy the three with which he had made himself master of it. To these legions he added six thousand auxiliary foot, and three thousand horse, who had served under him in all his former wars; and he was now furnished with as many more. For, having heard that Pompey was coming with his whole force through Mauritania into *Spain, he sent circular letters to all the Gallie States, inviting by name those of the most known and approved valour, and, in particular, a select body of mountaineers from Aquitania, where it borders upon the Roman province. And, to assure himself the better of the fidelity of both officers and soldiers in his army, he borrowed sums of money of all his Tribunes and Centurions; which he distributed among the soldiers; by that means engaging his officers by their own interest, and the soldiers by his liberality. He soon followed himself, with nine hundred horse, which he had kept for a body-guard.

Fabius, before Cæsar's arrival, had left nothing unattempted for gaining the country round about to his party by his letters and ambassadors. He had already laid two bridges over the Sicoris, four miles distant from each other, for the convenience of foraging, having consumed all the pasture on his side of the river. Pompey's Generals did the same, and with the same view; which occasioned frequent skirmishes between the horse. It happened, one day, that two of Pompey's legions, going out to guard the foragers, according to custom, had passed the river, and, the carriages and cavalry endeavouring to follow after, the bridge broke down on a sudden, and prevented them from joining the foot. This Afranius and Petorius perceiving, by the hurdles and other materials that came swimming down with the stream, immediately detached four legions, with all their cavalry, to attack the two legions. L. Plancus, who commanded the foraging guard, seized a rising ground, and, forming his men in two divisions, posted them back to back, and so made a double front to prevent their being surrounded by the enemy's horse. By this disposition, though inferior in number, he was enabled to sustain the furious charge of the Pompeian legions and cavalry, till the colours of two legions, which Fabius sent over by the further bridge to the assistance of his party, were descried at a distance. Their approach put an end to the engagement, and both armies returned to their several camps.

* It was reported at this time in Italy, And this news, says Cicero, is grounded upon that Pompey, at the head of a great army, indisputable authority. Ad Att. x. 9. had passed through Illyria into Germany:

Two days after this engagement, Cæsar arrived in the camp*: And he ordered the bridge that had broke down to be instantly repaired. The next day he took a view of the country, and, leaving six cohorts to guard the bridge and the camp, he marched with the rest of his forces in three lines to Ilerda and stopped near Afranius's camp, where he remained under arms, and offered him battle on an even ground. Afranius drew out his troops and formed them half-way down the hill. Cæsar, finding that he declined an engagement upon equal terms, resolved to encamp within four hundred paces of the foot of the mountain; and, to hinder his troops from being alarmed or interrupted in their works by sudden incursions from the enemy, he ordered the soldiers of the third line, while those of the first and second continued in order of battle, to cut a ditch fifteen feet broad behind them, without throwing up a rampart, which would have been perceived by the enemy. Thus the front of his camp was secured by a ditch, before Afranius had the least suspicion of his design to encamp so near him. In the evening he made the legions file off by the two ends of the ditch, and brought them behind it, where he passed the whole night under arms. The day after, he carried his entrenchments quite round the camp: And, because materials for a rampart must have been fetched from a great distance, he contented himself for the present with a naked ditch; allotting a legion to each side of the camp, and keeping the rest of the troops under arms to cover those employed in the works. The Pompeian Generals came down with their troops as far as the bottom of the mountain, and threatened to give battle. But

* Cæsar arrived at Marseilles before the end of the month of April: (Ad Att. x. 10.) and he seems to have reached his army in Spain before the end of the month of May.

V. R. 724.
Bel. Cir.
45.
403. Com. Cæsar, trusting to the three legions under arms, and the defence of his ditch, did not call off his workmen; and Afranius, not venturing to come farther into the plain, after a short stay, wheeled off with his men. The third day Cæsar added a rampart to his fortifications, and sent orders to the cohorts he had left behind, to decamp, and come up to him.

Cæf. de
Bel. Civ.
Com. lib. i. Between the city of Ilerda and the hill, where Petreibus and Afranius were encamped, there was a plain of about three hundred paces; in the midst of which was a rising ground: And Cæsar perceived, that, by the means of this post, it would be easy for him to deprive the enemy of the conveniency of their bridge, and their communication with the city, from whence they furnished themselves with all their subsistence. In order to get possession of it, he drew out three legions, and, having formed them in order of battle, commanded the foremost of them to run before and gain the place. Afranius, seeing his design, dispatched, by a nearer way, the cohorts that were upon guard to the same eminence. The fight was sharply maintained on both sides: but Afranius's men, who first got possession, obliged those of Cæsar to give ground; and, being reinforced by fresh supplies, put them at last to the rout, and forced them to fly for shelter to the legions. Cæsar ascribes the advantage which Afranius's troops had over his on this occasion to their manner of fighting. It was their method to come forward briskly against an enemy, and boldly possess themselves of some post; neither taking care to preserve their ranks, nor holding it necessary to fight in a close compact body; and, if they found themselves hard pressed, they thought it no dishonour to retire. In these particulars they followed the example of the Lusitani and the other barbarous nations of Spain. This manner of fighting, as it was new and unexpected, disordered Cæsar's men, who, seeing the enemy come forward without regard to order, were apprehensive of being surrounded, while they were obliged to maintain their ranks, and not to abandon their ensigns.

Cæsar, contrary to his expectation, finding the consternation like to spread through the whole army, encouraged his men, and, leading on himself the ninth legion to the assistance of those that fled, he soon put a stop to the vigorous and insulting pursuit of the enemy, obliged them in their turn to give way, and pursued them to the very walls of Ilerda. But the soldiers, elated with success, and eager to repair the loss they had sustained, followed the runaways with so much impetuosity, that they were drawn into a disadvantageous place, and found themselves directly under the hill where the town stood; whence, when they endeavoured to retire, the enemy, facing about, charged them vigorously from the higher ground. The hill was rough and steep on each side, and the spot, where they stood, was so narrow, that only three cohorts could be drawn up in front, which could be neither reinforced in flank, nor protected by the cavalry. The enemy's forces increased every moment, fresh

fresh cohorts being sent from the camp through the town, to relieve those that were fatigued: And Cæsar was obliged to detach also small parties to maintain the battle, and bring off the wounded.

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

The fight had lasted five hours, without intermission, when Cæsar's men, pressed by the multitude of the enemy, and having spent their darts, attacked the cohorts on the hill sword in hand, and, bearing down a few, obliged the rest to betake themselves to flight. The pursuit was continued to the very walls of Ilerda, and, a part of the enemy taking shelter within the town, Cæsar's men had an opportunity of making good their retreat. At the same time the cavalry found means to gain the summit of the mountain, and, riding between both armies, hindered the enemy from harrassing the rear. Thus the engagement was attended with various turns of fortune; and both sides, of consequence, laid claim to the victory: Cæsar's soldiers, because they had bravely maintained themselves for five hours in a disadvantageous post, and had, at last, driven the enemy into the town; and Afranius's soldiers, because they had kept possession of the hill which had occasioned the battle. The loss on both sides was but inconsiderable for so long and so fierce a contention. Cæsar lost the first Centurion of the bastati of the fourteenth legion, with about seventy men: And above six hundred were wounded. On the other side were slain five Centurions and above two hundred soldiers. Afranius, made sensible of the great importance of the disputed post, caused the place to be fortified, and placed in it a strong garrison for its defence.

This engagement was followed, two days after, by an accident, which brought Cæsar's whole army into the greatest distress and danger. A violent storm of rain, and the melted snow from the mountains, made the Sicoris overflow its banks, and break down, in the same day, the two bridges which Fabius had erected over it. Thus Cæsar found himself shut up in a compass of thirty miles, between two rivers, neither of which was fordable. The States that had declared for him could supply him with no provisions: the troops sent beyond the river to forage could not return to the camp; and the convoys he expected from Gaul and Italy could not get to him. It was almost harvest-time, and for that reason corn was become very scarce, and the more so, as Afranius had carried great quantities of it into Ilerda, and the rest had been consumed by Cæsar's troops. The cattle, which were the next resource in the present want, had been removed to a distance by the neighbouring nations, upon the breaking out of the war. The parties, sent out to get provisions in the country that lay behind the camp, were perpetually harrassed by the Spanish infantry, who, being accustomed to pass the rivers on blown-up skins, pursued them every-where.

Cæsar endeavoured to repair his bridges, but to no purpose: The river was deep and rapid, and the enemy, stationed along the opposite bank, showered their darts upon the spot where the men attempted to work.

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Corf.

work. While things were in this posture, a large convoy from Gaul arrived on the other bank of the river, at some distance above Cæsar's camp. It consisted of archers from the Rutkeni, some Gallic horse, with many carts and much baggage, and about six thousand men of all sorts, with their domestics and slaves, who, being apprehensive of no danger, kept no order or discipline in their march. There were likewise along with it many young Noblemen, Senators sons, and Roman Knights, with the Deputies from the States of Gaul, and some of Cæsar's Lieutenants. Afranius, apprised of their arrival, set out in the night with three legions and all his cavalry; and, sending the horse before, attacked them, when they least expected it. The Gallic squadrons, forming themselves with great expedition, began the fight; and, though few in number, comparatively with the enemy, maintained their ground, and gave the rest of the convoy time to repair to the neighbouring mountains; whither they also retreated, as soon as they saw the legions advancing towards them. They lost only two hundred archers, a few troopers, and some servants and baggage.

About 1 l.
30 s.

This event served to enhance the price of provisions; a calamity inseparable from present scarcity, and the prospect of future want. Corn was sold at fifty denarii a bushel: The soldiers began to lose their strength, and, the evil increasing every moment, Cæsar dismissed all the useless mouths. Afranius, on the contrary, abounded in all things: He had large magazines of corn, was continually receiving fresh supplies, and had plenty of forage.

These circumstances were greatly exaggerated by Afranius and Petrius in their letters to Rome, where most people concluding, that the war was almost at an end, made public congratulations to the relations of the two Generals on their great success. Many also of the Nobility left Italy in order to join Pompey; some to carry the first accounts of this grateful news, others that they might not be so late as to subject themselves to the reproach of having waited for the event of things. Among the rest, Servius Sulpicius and C. Marcellus probably put to sea on this occasion, and, perhaps, Cicero himself; for intelligence of the battle of Ilerda, and of Cæsar's distress, might very well have reached him before the eleventh of June.

The joy of Pompey's party was but short. Cæsar, seeing no possibility of repairing the bridges, gave orders for the building some of that sort of vessels, the use whereof he had learned in his British expedition. The keel and ribs of these boats were of light wood, and the rest of osier covered over with leather. When he had got a sufficient number, he sent them by night in waggons to a place twenty-two miles distant from his camp. There having embarked a good number of his soldiers and carried them over the river, he took possession of a hill on the other side; threw up a fortification and posted a legion in it before the enemy thought of obstructing him: And here, in two days time, he laid a bridge bridge over the Sicoris, by which means he recovered his foragers, secured the convoy, and opened a passage for future supplies.

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.

The change of fortune was sudden and great. Cæsar being much superior in cavalry, the enemy was now reduced to confine their foraging within the neighbourhood of their camp; and to detach parties for that purpose in the night. Six considerable States also[†] declared themselves in his favour, and agreed to furnish him with provisions. A cohort composed from one of them, which served under Afranius, deserted to him upon hearing the resolution of their countrymen. The other provinces more distant, seeing the rumour industriously spread of Pompey's march through Mauritania quite extinguished, renounced also their engagements with Afranius, and besought Cæsar's friendship.

48.
403 Conf.

The bridge over the Sicoris was twenty-two miles from the camp, which obliged the cavalry to take this compass, when they went to forage: And Cæsar, to remedy this inconveniency, undertook to make the river fordable by turning its water into canals, thirty feet deep. When the work was almost completed, Petreius and Afranius, perceiving that they would be soon cut off from their provisions by a cavalry so superior to their own, took the resolution to carry the war into Celtiberia; a province where Pompey's fame was great, and where they expected to make new levies of horse and foot. They proposed by taking possession of some strong post to protract the war till winter. In order to execute this plan, they got together all the boats they could on the Iberus, and carried them to Ostogesa, a town upon that river, about twenty miles from their camp. There they cauled a bridge of boats to be made; and, having sent two legions over the Sicoris to fortify a camp with a rampart of twelve feet, they prepared to follow with the rest of their army.

Cæsar, informed of this motion by his scouts, laboured day and night at his drains, and lowered the water in the Sicoris to that degree that the cavalry could pass without difficulty; but it still took the infantry up to the shoulders, a depth which, joined to the rapidity of the stream, seemed to render it impassable to them. On the other side, Afranius, seeing Cæsar's works in such forwardness, and having notice that the bridge over the Iberus was perfected, lost no time, but, leaving two auxiliary cohorts in Ilerda, he crossed the Sicoris with all his forces, and joined the two legions he had sent before. Cæsar had no means of stopping their march, but by harassing them with his cavalry; for he could not send his foot soon enough over his bridge, the distance was so great.

He ordered therefore his horse to pass the river; and they soon came up with Afranius, who had decamped at midnight. At break of day their motions were easily descried from the hills near the camp. They pressed.

† The Oscenses, Calagurritani, Tarraconenses, Jacetani, Ausetani, and Illurgavonenses.

Y. R. 704. pressed extremely the enemy's rear, disordered their ranks, and obliged
 B. 7. Cl. them to halt: Then the cohorts facing about forced the cavalry to give
 48. ground; who, as soon as they began to march, renewed the attack.
 40; C. C.

At this sight the legionary soldiers, running up and down the camp, loudly complained, that the enemy would escape, and that the war would be unnecessarily protracted: And they desired their officers to assure Cæsar, that they feared neither danger nor fatigue, and were ready to pass the river as the horse had done. Cæsar, moved by their alacrity, though he saw some danger in exposing his army in a deep and rapid stream, yet resolved to make a trial of the passage. Having first drawn from every company such as were weak of body, he left them with one legion to guard the camp. Then disposing a double line of cavalry above and below the ford, he carried over all his soldiers without the loss of one man. Those, who were borne down by the violence of the current, were saved by the horse below them. Cæsar began the pursuit without delay, marching in three lines; and such was the ardour of the soldiers, that, though they were forced to go six miles about, and had lost a great deal of time in passing the river, they came up with the enemy at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Afranius and Petreius, intimidated by an approach so sudden and unexpected, halted on an eminence, and put their troops in order of battle. Cæsar kept his in the plain, being unwilling to hazard an action till his army had recovered their fatigue. But, the moment that the two Generals began again to move on, he followed; and thus forced them to encamp much sooner than they intended. They took up their quarters in a range of mountains to avoid the insults of the cavalry; and, having placed parties in all the passes to stop Cæsar's progress, hoped by this means to get off safe to the Iberus. This, says Cæsar, was their great object, and what, above all things, they should have endeavoured to effect: But, being fatigued by a long march, and their continual skirmishes with the horse, they imprudently deferred it till the next day. Cæsar likewise encamped on a hill not far from them.

About midnight, however, Cæsar's cavalry, having picked up some soldiers of the enemy, who had ventured too far from the camp in quest of water, were informed by them that Pompey's Lieutenants had altered their resolution, and were decamping in deep silence. Immediately he ordered the alarm to be sounded, and the signal given for marching: Which engaged the enemy to delay their retreat, as they would have had greatly the disadvantage in a nocturnal march, both on account of their heavy baggage, and the superiority of Cæsar's cavalry. Next day, Petreius went out with a party of horse to take a view of the country: And Decidius Saxa ² was detached by Cæsar with a squadron for the same pur-

² This Decidius Saxa was afterwards advanced by Cæsar to be Tribune of the people, at which Cicero was much scandalised. In his 13th Philippic he says, "How can I omit purpose. Both made the like report, in their several camps, that the country for five miles together was level and open, but after that rough and mountainous ; and that which ever army first got possession of the defiles might easily prevent the other from approaching.

Y. R. 724
Bef. C. h.
48.
403 Cont.

Afranius and Petreius called a Council of war to debate whether they should depart that night, or wait till the morning. The greater number were for setting out in the dark, in hopes of reaching the defiles before Cæsar could have notice of their departure. Others argued against the possibility of decamping privately. They mentioned “ the alarm given in Cæsar’s camp the night before ; and observed, that the enemy’s cavalry were continually patrolling in the night, and had beset all the ways and passes ; that a nocturnal engagement was to be avoided, because, in a civil war, the soldiers were more apt to listen to their fears, than to the obligations of the military oath ; that shame, and the presence of the Tribunes and Centurions, the great instruments of obedience and military duty, could have their proper effect only in the light ; and that therefore they should make their attempt by day ; in which case, if they received a disaster, or small loss, yet the bulk of the army would escape, and be able to possess themselves of the post in question.” These reasons prevailed, and it was resolved to set out the next morning by break of day.

But Cæsar got the start of them, and marched with his legions as soon as it was light, taking a considerable circuit, and following no particular route : For the direct way to the Iberus by Ostogesa lay through the enemy’s camp. He was obliged therefore to lead his men through deep valleys, and over steep rocks, which they could not climb, but by disencumbering themselves of their arms, and returning them afterwards to one another. The soldiers, however, in the hopes of putting speedily a period to their labours, went on joyfully. As in this march Cæsar’s army seemed to turn their backs, and pursued at first an opposite course, Afranius’s soldiers, elated with this appearance, came forth from their camp, and insulted them on their supposed flight, imagining that the want of provisions forced them to return to Ilerda. Their Generals applauded themselves upon the resolution they had taken of not decamping in the night ; and were confirmed in the notion of Cæsar’s retreat, when they saw that he had neither baggage nor carriages, which made them conclude that the scarcity must be exceeding great. But when they perceived his men soon after turn to the right, and that his advanced guard had already gained the ground beyond their camp, all immediately ran to arms, and, leaving a few cohorts to guard the baggage, they sallied out in a body, pursuing their way directly to the Iberus.

“ omit this Decidius Saxa, a man brought “ we see Tribune of the people, before we
“ from the farthest end of the world ; whom “ ever saw him a citizen.”

VOL. IV.

All

M

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Cens

All depended now upon dispatch. The difficulty of the ways was a great hindrance to Cæsar's troops; but his cavalry in return greatly incommoded the soldiers of Afranius; who, though he should succeed in getting first to the defiles, was yet certain of losing his baggage, and the cohorts which were left to guard it in the camp. But Cæsar outmarched him, such was the vigour and alacrity of his men; and, having got into the plain beyond the rocks, formed his legions in order of battle. The two Generals, perceiving the enemy's infantry in front, and being attacked by his cavalry in their rear, halted upon a rising ground, from whence they detached four Spanish cohorts to take possession of the highest mountain that appeared in sight; thinking to open to themselves a way over the hills to Obagesa. The Spaniards, wheeling obliquely to take possession of the place, were perceived by Cæsar's cavalry, who, charging them furiously, broke them at the first onset, and surrounded and cut them to pieces in the view of both armies.

Cæsar had now a most favourable opportunity of giving his enemy a total overthrow; and he was sensible they could make but a faint resistance under their present consternation, surrounded on all sides as they were by his cavalry, and obliged to fight on an open and even ground. His Officers, gathering round him, earnestly begged that he would not delay the engagement: They represented, "that the soldiers were eager for a battle, and that Afranius's army had given many marks of fear: For they had neither dared to support their own detachment, nor come down the hill: And that they had brought all their Ensigns into one place, where they crouded confusedly round them, without observing rank or order." They added, "that, if he thought the enemy too advantageously posted, he would soon have an opportunity of attacking them in another place more favourable, the want of water laying them under a necessity of changing their camp." But Cæsar, having cut them off from all provisions, was confident that he had it now in his power to reduce them without bloodshed: And he thought it better to gain the victory by his conduct, than by the force of arms. He therefore retired to a small distance, to give Afranius an opportunity to regain his camp: And then, placing troops in the mountains to guard all the passages to the Iberus, he lodged himself as near as he could to the enemy.

The next day, while Pompey's Lieutenants were in Council debating what measures they should follow, whether to return to Ilerda, or march to Tarraco, notice was given them, that Cæsar's cavalry had fallen upon the parties sent out in quest of water, and pressed them hard. Upon this intelligence, which called for all their attention, they immediately formed several corps of horse and foot intermixed with legionary cohorts, and began to throw up a rampart from the camp to the place where they watered. Afranius and Petreibus divided this work between them, and went in person to direct it.

In

In the mean time, the soldiers of the two armies had an opportunity of conferring together; and those who belonged to Afranius and Petreibius thanked Cæsar's troops for the generosity they had shewed in sparing them the day before, and testified their concern at being obliged to fight with their countrymen and relations. They then inquired, if they could trust to Cæsar's clemency, and even promised to join him, if the lives of Petreibius and Afranius were granted them: And they sent some of their principal Officers to treat with Cæsar. These preliminaries being settled, the soldiers of both armies went to one another's tents, and a great number of Centurions and military Tribunes came to pay their court to Cæsar, and to beg his protection. The Spanish Chiefs, who had been summoned to attend upon Afranius, and were detained in the camp as hostages, followed their example. Things were carried to such a length, that Afranius's son, a young man, treated with Cæsar, by the mediation of Sulpicius, for his own and his father's preservation. The joy was general; the Afranians thought themselves happy to have escaped such imminent danger; and the Cæsarians to have brought to a happy conclusion so important an enterprise without striking a blow. Cæsar, in the judgment of all, was upon the point of reaping the fruits of his clemency, and all unanimously applauded his late conduct.

Afranius, informed of what was transacting, quitted the work he was engaged in, and returned to the camp, not at all disturbed, and prepared for all events: But Petreibius discovered a very different spirit. He armed his slaves, and, joining to them a prætorian cohort and some Spanish cavalry, he flew to the rampart, and broke off the conferences of the soldiers, drove Cæsar's men out of the camp, and put all of them he could find to the sword. Those of them who had an opportunity to rally, wrapping their clokes round their left arms, drew their swords; and, trusting to the nearness of their camp, defended themselves till they gradually retreated to the advanced guard, who screened them from any further pursuit.

Then Petreibius went through the whole camp, begging the troops, with tears in his eyes, to have pity on him and on Pompey their General, and not to deliver them up to the cruel vengeance of their enemies. The soldiers followed him to the head-quarters; and there he proposed to them to bind themselves by a new oath, not to abandon their Commanders, nor to act separately, but with concert and unanimity for the public good. He himself took the oath first, then tendered it to Afranius, then to the military Tribunes and Centurions; and, lastly, to all the companies of the army. At the same time an order was issued, that all who had any of Cæsar's troops in their tents should produce them, in order that they might be put to death in the sight of the whole army. A few obeyed; but the greatest part, detesting this bloody decree, carefully concealed those who were under their protection, and procured them means to escape in the night. However, the terror im-

Y. R. 704
 Def. Ch.
 42.
 403 Cont.

pressed upon them by their Generals, the severity shewn in punishing, and the new oath they had been obliged to take, defeated, for the present, all hopes of a surrender, and reduced the war to its former state. Cæsar, on his side, ordered diligent search to be made after the Afranians who had remained in his camp, and carefully sent them back. Some Officers chose to stay with him; and these he afterwards treated with great distinction, promoting them to higher ranks, and honouring such of them as were Roman knights with the office of military Tribune.

The army of Afranius had now no forage, and could not water but with much difficulty. The legionary soldiers, who had been ordered to take with them two and twenty days provision, had some corn remaining: But the Spanish infantry and auxiliary troops had none; and, having no opportunity of supplying themselves, they deserted in great numbers to Cæsar. In this extremity, the expedient of returning to Ilerda appeared the safest, as they had still some provisions in that city; and there they proposed to consult concerning the future management of the war. Tarraco was at a greater distance, and they would of consequence be exposed to greater hazards in the way. This resolution being taken, they decamped; and Cæsar followed, sending his cavalry before, which perpetually harrassed the rear of the enemy. The manner of fighting was thus: Some light-armed cohorts formed the rear-guard of Afranius's army; and these, where the ground was even, halted from time to time, and made head against the cavalry. When they fell in with an eminence, the very nature of the ground furnished them with the means of defending themselves; because those who were foremost could protect those who followed. When they came, however, to a descent, the van could give no assistance to the rear, and the cavalry annoyed them with their darts. To avoid this inconveniency, the legions halted, and, driving back the cavalry a good way, ran down the hill precipitately, and traversed the valley until they came to the opposite eminence. Their cavalry, which should have been of great use in this retreat, and of which they had a considerable number, were so terrified by their ill success in former engagements, that they had been placed in the midst of the army, in order to be defended by the infantry; and, if any of them dared to straggle out of this situation, they were immediately taken by Cæsar's horse.

During these perpetual skirmishes, in which the Afranians were often obliged to stop to disengage the rear, their march could not but be very slow. After advancing four miles, finding themselves hard pressed by the cavalry, they halted on an eminence, and drew a line before them, as if they meant to encamp; but did not unload their baggage: And when they saw that Cæsar had marked out his camp, pitched his tents, and sent his cavalry to forage, they suddenly, towards noon, resumed their march, hoping to be rid of the cavalry for some time. Cæsar, leaving

leaving a few cohorts to guard his baggage, followed with his legions, and sent orders for his cavalry to return with all speed. The cavalry observed his orders, and, coming up with the enemy before the close of day, fell upon their rear with such impetuosity that it was almost put to the rout. A great number of soldiers, and some Centurions, lost their lives. At the same time Cæsar appearing with his whole army, the enemy were threatened with a total overthrow, as they could neither continue their march, nor look out for a proper place for a camp. They were forced to halt in a very disadvantageous ground, and at a distance from water. Cæsar, constant in his purpose, did not offer to attack them, but kept all his troops under arms to be in readiness to pursue, if they should attempt to escape either in the day or night. Pompey's Lieutenants, sensible of the disadvantage of their situation, employed the whole night in throwing up intrenchments, and in disposing their camp with an opposite front to Cæsar's army. The next day they continued at their works, and laboured from sun-rise to the evening. But the farther they extended their lines in order to better their position, the farther they removed from water: And thus, to avoid one inconveniency, they fell into a greater. Cæsar, who wanted to oblige them to capitulate, by reducing them to extreme necessity, drew lines round their camp; and by this method he offered an obstruction to any sallies or eruptions which they might make. The scarcity of forage, and the view of performing their march with the greater expedition, soon induced them to kill all the beasts of burden which they could not feed: And two days were wasted in forming and executing this resolution. But, on the third, Afranius and Petreibus, seeing Cæsar's works very much advanced, and being apprehensive of the consequences, drew all their forces out of the camp, and formed them in order of battle. Cæsar, aware of the hurt it might do his reputation, if, contrary to the inclination of his troops, and the general expectation, he still continued to decline an engagement, called in his workmen, assembled his cavalry, and put his army in a condition to receive them. He resolved, however, to remain upon the defensive; and the rather, because the distance between the two camps was so small, being only two thousand feet, that, should he put the enemy to the rout, he could not flatter himself with the hopes of a complete victory.

Afranius's troops were ranged in a double line, consisting of five legions: The Spanish cohorts, which used to be stationed in the wings, formed the body of reserve. Cæsar's legions were drawn up in three lines: The first consisted of twenty cohorts, four out of each of his legions; the second of fifteen cohorts, three out of each legion; and the third of the same number. The archers and slingers were disposed in the middle, and the cavalry in the two wings. The army being drawn up in this manner, each General kept firm to his resolution; Cæsar, not to engage unless forced to it; and Afranius to prevent the pro-

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Y. R. 707
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Cons. greſs of Cæſar's works. In this poſture they continued till ſun-ſet, when both armies returned to their ſeveral camps. The next day Cæſar propoſed to finiſh his lines ; and Pompey's Lieutenants endeavoured to find a fordable place in the Sicoris : But Cæſar had taken his meaſures againſt this attempt, and had ſent his light-armed Germans with part of his cavalry over the river, and poſted bodies of troops along the banks at a ſmall diſtance from one another.

The two Generals, having now no hope left, and being in want of wood, water, and corn, they demanded a parley, and begged that it might be in ſome place out of the ſight of the ſoldiers. Cæſar conſented to an interview, but the latter part of their requeſt was denied them : And Afranius, having firſt given his ſon for an hoſtage, met Cæſar in the preſence of both armies. He addreſſed him to this effect, with all poſſible marks of ſubmiſſion : “ that it was no juſt matter of blame, “ either in him or his ſoldiers, to have preſerved their fidelity to their “ General Pompey ; but that they had now ſufficiently acquitted them- “ ſelves of their duty, and ſuffered enough in his cauſe by the want of “ all kinds of neceſſaries : That, like wild beaſts caught in a toil, “ they were deprived of the moſt common enjoyments ; having their “ bodies oppreſſed with want, and their minds overwhelmed with ig- “ nominy ; and that therefore they acknowledged themſelves to be “ vanquiſhed, and beſought and conjured him not to make a rigorous “ uſe of his victory, but to ſpare the lives of his unhappy country- “ men.” Cæſar replied, “ that Afranius, of all men, had the leaſt rea- “ ſon to complain of his preſent unfortunate ſituation, and the leaſt “ pretenſions to any favour ; for that every one elſe had performed “ their duty : He himſelf, in declining to attack his army, though “ favoured by the advantages of time and place, in order that the way “ might be open to an accommodation : His army, in returning un- “ hurt the men that were in their power, after injuries received, and “ the maſſacre of their comrades : And even Afranius's own troops, in “ endeavouring to conclude a peace whereon the common ſafety de- “ pended. That thus, when all orders had ſhewn an inclination to “ treat, Afranius and Petreius alone had oppoſed the ſteps to an accom- “ modation ; refuſing an interview, and barbarouſly murdering thoſe “ whom the faith of a conference had inticed into their camp. That “ it had therefore happened to them, as it often happens to men of “ obſtinacy and arrogance ; and they were forced to have recourſe to “ prayers, and earneſtly to ſollicit the ſame terms which they had re- “ jected with ſcorn. That he would not, however, take advantage of “ their preſent ſubmiſſion, or the favourable circumſtances he was in, “ to inſiſt upon any thing tending to the increaſe of his power : And “ that he only requeſted they would diſband thoſe troops which “ had been ſo long kept on foot againſt him : For with what other “ view (he ſaid) had fix legions been ſent into Spain ; a ſeventh levied “ there ;

“there; so many powerful navies equipped; and so many able and “experienced Officers sent over? That such mighty preparations “could not be meant against Spain, or to supply the want of a pro“vince, which, having enjoyed a long peace, had no occasion for such “extraordinary forces: That their real end was his destruction; to “effect which, a new species of power had been introduced into the “Commonwealth; and that, on this account, the same man had been “appointed to command in Italy at the gates of Rome, and to hold for “so many years, though absent, the government of the two most po“tent provinces of the Republic. That, for this reason alone, the “Magistrates had been stripped of their prerogatives, the Consuls and “Prætors not being suffered, as had been always the custom, to take “the different provinces at the expiration of their offices; and particu“lar Governors were appointed by the choice and management of a “faction. That, for this reason alone, he had been denied that justice “which had never been refused to any General before him; and was “not allowed to disband his army, and to return home with honour;
 “or, at least, without ignominy, after having successfully served the “public. That all these injuries he had hitherto borne, and still re“solved to bear with patience; that it was not now his design to take “from Afranius his soldiers, and to enlist them in his own service, “which it would be easy for him to do; and that he only meant to “prevent their being employed against him. That, therefore, Afra- “nus must quit Spain, and disband his forces; that this was his de“termined resolution: And that these were the only terms of peace
 “he would grant.”

Y. R. 704.
 Bef. Chr.
 48.
 403 Conf.

These conditions were very agreeable to Afranius's soldiers; who, instead of being punished, as they feared, were, in some sort, rewarded by the discharge procured them. They plainly shewed their satisfaction: For, while the place and time of their dismissal were under debate between Cæsar and Afranius, they signified by their gestures and cries from the rampart, that they desired to be immediately disbanded.
 After some discussion, it was determined that those who had houses and possessions in Spain should be discharged upon the spot, and the rest, when they arrived at the Varus, a river between Gaul and Italy. And Cæsar declared, that no person should be injured or forced into his service: And that all those who had lost any thing during the war should be indemnified. He also engaged to furnish them with corn till they got to the Varus. By this generous behaviour, he acquired the confidence of Pompey's army to such a degree, that he became the arbiter of all their disputes, either among themselves, or with their Commanders: And when they were ready to mutiny about their pay, which Petorius and Afranius affirmed not to be yet due, the matter was referred to him, and he determined it to the equal satisfaction of both parties. One third of the army was disbanded during the two days they

The Var.

V. R. 724.
Bel. Chr.
48.
493 Conf. they continued in their camp : The rest set out for the Varus, two of Cæsar's legions marching before, and the others following after, and encamping near them. Q. Fufus Calenus, one of Cæsar's Lieutenants, presided over the march ; and, when he arrived at the Varus, disbanded them ; but the greatest part of them came over voluntarily to Cæsar : The two Generals went to find out Pompey.

Cæf. de
Bell. Civ.
Com. 1. 1. Thus did Cæsar, within forty days from his arrival in Spain, with five legions, and some auxiliary Gauls, reduce an army of five legions of veterans, eighty cohorts of Spaniards, and five thousand horse : And now many reasons called upon him to return into Italy ; but he did not think it adviseable to leave Spain, till he had subjected the whole country to his obedience. M. Varro commanded two legions in further Spain, to which he had added thirty auxiliary cohorts : And he had formed great magazines of corn, not only for his own use, but with a view also of supplying Marseilles, and the army under Afranius and Petreibus. The Gaditani had been ordered to furnish him with ten ships of war, and more had been built at Hispalis. He had put all his provisions into Gades, and had conveyed thither all the money and ornaments which he had found in the temple of Hercules : And, to guard this town, he gave it a garrison of six cohorts, under the command of C. Gallonius, a Roman Knight. This Commander had spoken upon every occasion with contempt of Cæsar's forces, and had frequently declared from his tribunal, that Cæsar had been worsted, and that his soldiers had gone over to Afranius. By these arts, he had struck such a terror into the Roman citizens who resided in his province, that he engaged them to promise him one hundred and ninety thousand sesterces, twenty thousand weight of silver, with one hundred and twenty thousand bushels of wheat. The States well affected to Cæsar he loaded with heavy impositions, and quartered soldiers upon them : He harassed private men whom he thought averse to his cause with arbitrary judgments : He confiscated the estates of many, whom he accused of having spoken against what he called the Commonwealth : And he obliged the whole province to take an oath of fidelity to himself and Pompey. Cæsar, who seems to give an account of this General's^{*} behaviour with a particular resentment, tells us, that in the beginning of the civil war, while his affairs went on successfully in Italy, Varro had affected to speak of him with great regard, and in a most friendly manner, saying, " that indeed he was under particular obligations to Pompey, who had made him his Lieutenant, but at the same time was " greatly indebted to Cæsar : That he was not ignorant of the duty of " an Officer employed by his General in an office of trust ; but that " he likewise knew his own weakness, and the attachment of the whole of Cadiz.

The people
Seville.
Cadiz.

^{*} He was probably the learned Varro, who had also served under Pompey in the war against the pirates.

“ province to Cæsar.” When he understood, however, that Cæsar was stopped by the siege of Marseilles; that Afranius and Petreibus had executed the junction of their troops, which they had considerably increased; and that all hither Spain had unanimously declared to support them; he changed his behaviour and speech. Varro, therefore, having committed to many acts of hostility, resolved to persist in his measures, and prepare for war: And, being sensible that the whole province was in Cæsar’s interest, he determined to shut himself up in Gades, where all his provisions and shipping lay; hoping, by the strength of the town, which is an island surrounded by the sea, and with the help of his fleet, to draw out the war into length.

Y. R. 704
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Cæsar sent against him Q. Cassius, Tribune of the people, with two legions; and he himself set out by great journeys at the head of six hundred horse, for Corduba, whither he summoned the Magistrates of the different States. All obeyed: Every city sent its Deputies, nor was there a Roman citizen of any note who did not repair to him. The Senate of Corduba shut their gates against Varro, stationed guards and centinels along the walls, and detained two cohorts, called Colonica, which were accidentally marching that way, that they might serve to protect the town. At the same time, the people of Carmona drove out of their city, which is the most considerable in the whole province, three cohorts which Varro had left there, and shut their gates against them.

Cordova.

The apparent affection of the province for Cæsar determined Varro to make all possible dispatch to reach Gades before his march could be intercepted. But he had advanced but a little way, when he received letters, informing him, “ That, as soon as Cæsar’s edict was known, “ the principal men of the town had conspired with the Tribunes of “ the garrison to drive out Gallonius, and deliver up the city and island “ to Cæsar; that, this agreement being made, they had warned Gallonius to retire of his own accord; threatening, if he refused to comply voluntarily, to force him to it: And that this Commander, terrified by so general a revolt, had thought proper to leave Gades.” Upon this intelligence, one of the legions, called Vernacula, took up their ensigns in Varro’s presence, quitted the camp, and marched directly to Hispalis, where they sat down in the market-place, without committing the least act of violence; a circumstance which so wrought upon the Roman citizens residing in the town, that every one was desirous of accommodating them in their houses. Varro, astonished and confounded at these proceedings, turned back with design to reach Italica, but was informed that its gates were shut. At last, finding himself surrounded on all sides, and the ways every-where beset, he wrote to Cæsar, that he was ready to resign the legion under his command to whomsoever he would appoint to receive it. Cæsar sent Sextus Cæsar to take the command; and Varro, having delivered up

Y. R. 701. the legion accordingly, came to him at Corduba: Where, after giving Bell. Civ. an account of the state of the province, he faithfully resigned all the
 48. public money he had in his hands, and informed him of the quantity of 403 Con. corn and shipping he had prepared.

Cæsar, in the Assembly of the States at Corduba, having returned thanks to all those who had declared in his favour, remitted the tribute imposed by Varro upon the Roman citizens; restored their estates to those who had been deprived of them for speaking freely their thoughts; distributed rewards to a great many in public and private; gave all hopes to receive the like favours hereafter; and, after a stay of two days, went to Gades; where he restored to the temple of Hercules all the treasures and ornaments it had been spoiled of, and soon after procured this city the freedom of Rome. And, having committed the government of the province to Q. Cassius, with the command of four legions, he embarked for Terraco on board the fleet which Varro had obliged the Gaditani to equip. There he found the Deputies of all netber Spain; and having, in like manner as at Corduba, thanked and rewarded them, both publicly and privately, he went by land to Narbonne, and so to the siege of Marseilles.

CHAP. V.

The siege of Marseilles. Caius Antonius and Dolabella, Cæsar's Lieutenants, in Illyricum, are defeated by M. Octavius and Scribonius Libo. Curio's unfortunate expedition into Africa.

Cæf. de
 Bell. Civ.
 Com. lib. i.

WHILE Cæsar was employed in reducing Spain, C. Trebonius and D. Brutus had carried on the siege of Marseilles with great vigour; and the inhabitants had bravely defended themselves. The town of Marseilles was formerly washed by the sea on three sides: It could be approached by land only on the fourth; and the citadel, being very strong by nature, because of a deep valley that ran before it, required a long and difficult siege.¹ It was of great importance to the besieged to command the sea: And, to beat off Brutus's fleet, they equipped seventeen gallies. To these they added a great number of smaller vessels, filled with archers and the mountaineers whom they had engaged in their service; and, on board of which, Domitius put also his own domestics whom he had brought with him from Italy. With this force they sailed out to give battle to Brutus, who lay at anchor at an island over-against the town. His fleet was much inferior to that of the Massilians in the number of ships; but Cæsar had manned it with his best soldiers, chosen out of all the legions, and headed by Centurions of distinguished bravery; and he had provided it with hooks and grappling irons, and offensive weapons of all sorts. Upon the first notice of the approach of the enemy, Brutus stood out to sea. The conflict was sharp and vigorous; for the mountaineers, a hardy race, habituated to arms, and trained up to war, yielded little in point of valour to the Romans. Domitius's vassals were animated with the hopes of liberty; and, fighting under the eye of their master, behaved gallantly. The townsfolk confided in the nimbleness of their ships and the skill of their pilots, and employed all their art to elude the shock of Brutus's vessels, and to baffle all their attempts. The enemy extended their line of battle in order to surround his fleet, or attack his ships singly with a number of theirs, or in running along side, to sweep away a range of oars. When they were compelled to come to a closer engagement, they relied wholly on the bravery of their mountaineers and the Italian peasants. Brutus's fleet was but indifferently provided with rowers and pilots, who had been hastily taken out of some merchant-ships, and knew not so much as the names of the tackle. They were incommoded too by the weight and lumpishness of their vessels, which, being built with too much expedition and of unseasoned timber, were not so ready at tacking about. When an opportunity however offered of coming to close fight, they would boldly get between two of the enemy's ships; and, grappling them with their hooks, charge them on each side, board them, and cut to pieces the mountaineers and peasants who defended them. In this manner, they sunk part of the Massilian vessels, took some, with all the men on board, and drove the rest into the haven.

¹ From this description it appears, says M. D'Arville, that the town did not then stand upon the same extent of ground as now: It only covered a triangle formed on one side by the port, and on the other by the coast of the great sea: Whereas now it is built round the port. Notice de l'Ancienne Gaul, p. 440.

This loss was repaired with all possible expedition. The Massilians drew out of their docks, and rigged as many old ships as they had lost; they also prepared a number of fishing barks, which they filled with archers and engines; and thus they were in readiness to sail upon the first occasion. Pempey, who was sensible of what importance it was to keep Cæsar employed in these parts, sent L. Nasidius to the succour of Marseilles, with a fleet of sixteen ships, some of which were very strong, and armed with beaks of brass. This fleet passed the streights of Sicily unknown to Curio, and, in their way, put in at Messana, where their unexpected arrival caused so great a terror, that the town was deserted by the Senate and the principal inhabitants: And Nasidius, entering the harbour without any opposition, drew out one of the galleys, which he joined to his fleet. The Massilians, informed of his arrival, sailed out a second time to try their fortune, and rendezvoused at Taurentum, a castle belonging to the town, where Nasidius lay with his whole squadron.

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Cæf. de
Bell. Civ.
Com. lib. ii.

Messina.

Taurenti,
on the right side of the bay of C. 10-

Brutus tal.

Y. R. 104. Brutus went to fight them with his fleet, which he had considerably
 En. Chr. 48. increased by six ships which he had taken in the late action. The bat-403 Conf. tle was maintained on both sides with determined courage. The Mas- silians had put on board their ships the choice of their youth, and the most considerable men of the city; who were all convinced, that on the issue of that day's engagement depended the safety and preservation of their country. But Nasidius was of no service to them: He left them during the engagement, and retired without hurt to the coast of Spain. Brutus obtained a second victory, having sunk five, and taken four of the enemy's ships.

These disasters at sea disheartened not the inhabitants of the town:
 They continued to defend themselves by land against Trebonius with great courage. This Commander had attacked them in two places; on the side of the port where the docks were; and on the side towards the sea, near the mouth of the Rhone: And, having been furnished from all parts of the province with a great number of workmen and carriages, and with wood and other materials, he had greatly advanced his works. But so well was the town stored with all engines necessary for its defence, that no mantelets of osier were sufficient to withstand their violence. Their Baliste shot wooden beams, twelve feet in length, and armed with iron, with such force, that, after they had pierced four rows of hurdles, they entered a considerable way into the earth. To resist the violence of these machines, the besiegers were obliged to roof their galleries with pieces of wood of a foot in thickness, strongly compacted together. Under this cover the materials necessary for raising the mount or terras, which was to be opposed to the town wall, were conveyed; and a tortoise, sixty feet long, composed of strong beams, and every thing necessary to defend it against fire and stones, was carried before to level the ground. But, in spite of all endeavours, and the greatness of the works employed against them, the height of their wall and towers, and the multitude of their machines, retarded the approaches of the besiegers. Besides, the mountaineers made frequent sallies, which greatly annoyed the workmen.

The Legionaries, who had the charge of the works on the right, perceived that a tower of brick, built at a little distance from the walls, would be of great service to shelter them from the frequent sallies of the enemy. At first they made it very low and small; and it served chiefly as a place of retreat, when they were repulsed. But they soon perceived that it would be of much more use if it were raised to a greater height. This they effected in the following manner: The tower was of a square form, thirty feet every way, allowing for the thickness of the walls, which was five feet. When it was raised to the height of one story, they laid a floor over it, the extremities of whose beams were concealed in the thickness of the wall, that they might not, by appearing on the outside, be liable to be set on fire. Then the wall was continued directly upwards as far as their mantelets would permit: And two beams were laid across each other, the ends of which almost reached the angles of the wall. These were for supporting the floor, which was to serve as a roof to the tower. Over these beams they placed the joists of the roof, and covered them with planks. These joists projected a little beyond the wall, in order to suspend from them what might be necessary to shelter the workmen. This floor they paved with tiles and mortar, to render it proof against fire; and it had besides a covering of mattresses to break the force of the darts and stones which might be thrown against it by the enemy. At the same time, they hung from the beams of this roof, that projected beyond the wall, curtains, made of strong cables, woven to the depth of four feet, and which went round the three sides of the tower which were exposed to the engines; having formerly experienced, that this kind of cover was impenetrable to any dart or engine whatever. When the roof with its curtains was thus prepared, they removed the mantelets, and elevated the roof from the first story as far as the curtains would permit. Then, secure from all insult, they laboured at the brick wall: And, when they had raised it to the height of a second story, they again screwed up the roof; and, under its defence, and of the curtains hanging from it, they continued the work, and laid the interjacent floors. In this manner they proceeded till they had completed six stories, leaving always holes in convenient places from which they could play their engines.

When, by means of this tower, they thought they had sufficiently provided for the security of the works around it, they undertook to build a moveable gallery, sixty feet long, of timber two feet in thickness, to extend from their brick tower to the walls of the town. The gallery they constructed in this manner: Two beams of equal length were first laid upon the ground at the distance of four feet from one another: And upon these were erected pillars, five feet high, joined at the top by pieces of wood designed to support the roof of the gallery. Over these were placed rafters two feet square, fastened strongly with nails and plates of iron. The upper part of the roof was composed of square laths, four inches thick, to bear the weight of the tiles that were to be laid upon them; and a covering of hides was thrown over it to hinder the cement from being washed away by spouts of water. Over all were laid strong mattresses to screen the hides from fire and stones. This work was finished close by the brick fortress, under cover of four mantelets, and immediately carried forward upon rollers, till it unexpectedly reached the very tower of the enemy.

The besieged, astonished at so threatening and unlooked for a machine, pushed forward with levers the largest stones they could find, and tumbled them upon it. But the strength of the wood resisted their weight

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Y. R. 704. weight and violence, so that they fell to the ground without doing any Bef. Chr. hurt. Observing this, they poured down barrels of burning pitch and
 48. other combustible matter. But these likewise rolled along the roof with-403 Conf. out damage, and, falling to the ground, were thrust away from the works with forks and long poles. Meanwhile the soldiers, under the protection of this gallery, were endeavouring to undermine the enemy's fortress; the gallery itself was defended by the brick tower, whence the engines played without intermission, insomuch that the enemy, driven from their battlements, were at last obliged to abandon their defence. By degrees the tower being undermined, part of it fell down, and the rest was so shaken that it could not stand long.

The Massilians dismayed, and dreading the plunder and devastation of their city, came out in the habit of supplicants, and besought the compassion of the army and Generals, earnestly requesting that all further operations should be suspended till Cæsar's arrival. They told them, "that, their tower being destroyed, they were sensible the city " could hold out no longer; and therefore meant not to defend it.
 " That, in the mean time, no prejudice could arise to the besiegers from " a short respite, because, if they refused to submit upon Cæsar's
 " coming, he would have it in his power to treat them as he pleased."
 They added, "that, if the whole tower should be broken down, it would " be impossible to hinder the soldiers from yielding to the desire of " plunder, by breaking into and pillaging the town." Cæsar had earnestly recommended to Trebonius, by letter, to prevent, if possible, the city's being taken by storm, lest the soldiers, irritated by its obstinate resistance, should put all the youth to the sword, which they threatened to do. The request of the Massilians was therefore complied with, though the soldiers murmured at the delay of a conquest which they looked upon as easy and certain.

But the Massilians were insincere, and aimed at nothing in all this, but to find a time and opportunity to deceive the Romans, and put in practice the perfidious design they had formed. For, after a few days, they suddenly sallied from the town, and, the wind being favourable, they set fire to the enemy's works. The flame, in a moment, spread itself on all sides, and the terrafs, the mantelets, the tortoise, and the tower, with its machines, were entirely consumed, before it was possible to discover whence the disaster arose. The Romans ran immediately to their arms, every one taking what came first to his hands;
 and flew from the camp to their works, where they attacked the enemy with great fierceness, but their ardour was checked by the arrows and darts poured in upon them from the town. The besieged, now secure under their walls, destroyed without difficulty the brick tower, and the gallery connected with it. Next day, being favoured by the same wind, they attacked, with still greater assurance, another tower and terrafs of the other attack. But Cæsar's Lieutenant, grown wise by his late late misfortune, had made all necessary preparations for their defence : So that the enemy, after losing many men, were obliged to retreat into the city without effecting their purpose.

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Trebonius immediately resolved to repair his loss, and he was warmly seconded by his soldiers, who were greatly provoked to see their credulity had been abused, and that they were the jest of a perfidious enemy. All the wood in the neighbourhood of Marseilles had been already cut down : They were therefore obliged to raise a terrace of a new kind, and such as history nowhere mentions before that time. They erected two walls of brick, each six feet thick, and of the same distance from each other with those of the former terrace. Over these they laid a covering which was supported by beams laid across : And, to make it firm, they placed pillars underneath between the walls. Hurdles, with brick and earth intermixed, served to make it proof against fire. The soldiers, thus sheltered over head, on the right and left by the walls, and before by mantelets, brought without danger the necessary materials for carrying on the works : And, by the eagerness with which they laboured, soon completed them ; leaving doors at convenient places, from which they might sally out upon occasion.

The townsmen seeing that the Romans had repaired in a few days what they imagined must have cost them the labour of many months ; that there was no hope left either of deceiving them, or sallying out upon them with success ; that all the approaches to the city by land might in like manner be shut up by a wall and towers, so as to render it impossible for them to appear upon their battlements ; that they could neither discharge their javelins to any effect, nor make use of their engines, in which their principal hope lay ; and that they were now reduced to the necessity of fighting upon equal terms ; they were forced to have recourse again to the same conditions of truce they had so ill deserved before ; and, on Cæsar's arrival, having no prospect of relief, they surrendered at discretion. Domitius, some days before, took the opportunity of a storm to sail out of the harbour with three vessels. They were chased by Brutus's ships, which kept constantly at anchor in the road, or before the port : And two of the three were obliged to return back, but that, which carried Domitius, made its escape. Cæsar spared the town, he says, more in regard to its antiquity and reputation, than to any real merit it could plead. He obliged the citizens, however, to deliver up their arms, machines, and ships of war, to surrender all the money in their treasury, and to receive a garrison of two legions. The rest of his army he sent into Italy, and he himself set out for Rome *.

Cæsar de
Bell. Civ.
Com. lib. ii.

* Pompey and the Senate in his camp, to reward, in some manner, the fidelity of the town of Marseilles, gave the rights and privileges of a free city to Phocæa in Ionian, which was the mother-town of Marseilles. Dio.

Y. R. 704.
 Ref. Chr.
 48.
 403 Cons.

Oderzo.

Cæsar's arms were not equally successful when conducted by his Lieutenants. Fortune, says Florus, ventured to do something in Illyricum and Africa against the absent General: But it was as if she meant, by some dark shades of adversity, to heighten the splendor of his own exploits. We have but few particulars of what passed in Illyricum, Cæsar's account being lost. We may gather from the historians, particularly Florus, that Dolabella and Antonius were suddenly surrounded by a superior number of men from Pompey's fleets, commanded by M. Octavius and Scribonius Libo: And that C. Antonius was obliged, for want of provisions, to surrender himself prisoner, with fifteen cohorts, in the island of Corgyra, off the coast of Dalmatia. An expression of Cæsar informs us, that the loss of the army was occasioned by the perfidy of Pulcio, one of his officers. Some of the troops attempted to escape in small flat-bottomed boats; but were stopped by a contrivance of the Cilician marines in Pompey's fleet. These had formed nets made of twisted ropes and chains, and extended them from rock to rock under water. However, of three boats, two got off by the working of the sea, but the third, filled with soldiers from a town beyond the Po called Opitergium, could not be disengaged. It was surrounded on all sides: And the soldiers, after having defended themselves for a whole day, chose, in the night, at the instigation of one of their officers, to turn their swords against one another, and mutually kill themselves to the last man, rather than surrender to the enemy.

The cause of Cæsar's loss in Africa was the rashness of Curio. This Commander, who had conceived the highest contempt for the troops headed by Publius Varus, sailed from Sicily into Africa, with only two of the four legions, which had been put under his command by Cæsar, and five hundred horse. Varus, after the loss of his cohorts at Auximum, had fled into Africa; which he had governed some years before, after the expiration of his prætorship. There, by his knowledge of the people and country, he levied two legions, and took the command of the province with the consent of the natives. Tubero, who had been named by the Pompeians to this command, arriving some time after with his fleet before Utica, was forbid the town and harbour: Nor could he even obtain leave for his son to land, who was sick on board his fleet: And he was obliged to weigh anchor and return to Pompey. Curio, after two days and three nights sailing, landed at a place called Aquilaria, twenty-two miles distant from Clupea; where L. Cæsar, the son, was waiting for him with ten gallies, which Varus had repaired at Utica and put under his command. But L. Cæsar, terrified at the number of ships Curio brought with him, stood in for the coast; where, running his galley on shore, he left her, and went by land to Adrumetum, a town possessed by C. Confidius Longus, with a garrison of one legion. To this place likewise the rest of his fleet repaired. M. Rufus, the Quæstor, who commanded for Curio twelve ships, towed the galley off the strand, and returned with the fleet to Curio.

Curio

Curio ordered him to sail directly for Utica; whither he followed with his land-army. After a march of two days, he arrived at the river Ba- gradas, where he left C. Caninius Rebilus with the legions, and advanced before with the cavalry to take a view of the spot called the Cornelian camp, because the first Scipio Africanus had encamped there. The situation was judged to be very advantageous. It was a high rock jutting out into the sea, steep and rough on both sides, but with an easy descent where it fronts Utica. It lay little more than a mile from that town, in a direct line: But as there was a fountain about half-way, which overflowed the plain and formed a morass, it was necessary to take a compass of six miles in marching to Utica. When he had taken a view of this post, he went and examined Varus's camp.

Y. R. 704.
 Bef. Chr.
 48.
 403 Conf.

It was covered by the town of Utica itself on one side, and on the other by a kind of theatre that stood without the walls: And, the works round this theatre taking up a great extent of ground, they rendered the approach to the camp extremely difficult. While he was taking his survey, he saw all the roads crowded with people, who were carrying their valuable effects into the city: And he detached his cavalry to plunder them. At the same time Varus ordered six hundred Numidian horse, with four hundred foot, to their assistance. The Numidians, unable to stand the first shock, retreated immediately to their camp with the loss of one hundred and twenty men. Mean while the port of Utica was deserted by all the merchant-ships that were there to the number of two hundred, in obedience to a proclamation Curio had published, in which he threatened to treat them as enemies, if they did not instantly repair to the Cornelian camp. By this means the army was at once plentifully supplied with every commodity: And Curio, upon his return to the camp at Ba gradas, was saluted Imperator by the joint acclamations of the soldiers.

Next day, he led his army towards Utica, and encamped not far from the town: But, before he had made his intrenchments, he was informed by some parties of horse stationed near the camp, that a powerful body of infantry and cavalry had been sent by Juba, King of Mauritania, to its succour, and were marching towards it. At the same time was seen a cloud of dust, and soon after the enemy's van was in view. This King inherited from his father an affection for Pompey, and he personally hated Curio, who, during his tribuneship, had proposed a law to deprive him of his kingdom. Curio immediately sent the cavalry to sustain their first charge and keep them in play: And he hastened to form the legions in order of battle. The horse engaged according to his orders, and with such success, that, before the legions could be drawn up, the whole body of the King's troops, which marched without order or apprehension of danger, falling into confusion, betook themselves to flight. The cavalry, wheeling nimbly along the shore,

Y. R. 704. found means to escape with little loss into the town: But great numbers of the infantry were cut to pieces.

48.
403 Conf The night following two Centurions of the nation of the Marfi, with twenty-two soldiers, deserted from Curio, and went over to Attius Varus. These men assured him, that the whole army was extremely averse to Curio, and would infallibly revolt, if he would but shew himself, and come to a conference with them. Varus accordingly drew out his legions the next day: Curio did the same: And both armies stood facing one another in order of battle, with a small valley between them. Sextus Quintilius Varus, who had been made prisoner at Corfinium, where he performed the office of Quæstor to Domitius, and had been dismissed by Cæsar, was now in Attius's camp: And Curio had brought over the very same legions which had revolted from him and his General. He took occasion, from this circumstance, to try to debauch Curio's army, “and began with putting the soldiers in mind of their former oath to Domitius and to himself: He exhorted them not to bear arms against the old companions of their fortune, who had shared with them all the hazards of the same siege; nor fight in defence of a party which could not call them but by the ignominious name of deserters.” To these considerations he added offers of a liberal recompence, if they would follow his fortune, and that of Attius. Curio's soldiers returned no answer, nor made any declaration of their sentiments: But an uncommon panic spread itself suddenly among them, and the reflections, which they communicated to one another, served only to increase it.

Curio summoned a Council of war to deliberate on the proper remedies for this evil. Some of the officers proposed to attack at all hazards Varus's camp, and deemed this the best expedient to free the soldiers of their alarms. “It was better, they said, to trust to valour, and try the fortune of a battle, than to see themselves abandoned by their men, and delivered up to the barbarity of the enemy.” Others were for retiring during the night to the Cornelian camp, where they might at leisure cure the minds of the soldiers: And whence, in case of a disaster, they could with more safety and ease retire into Sicily by the means and under the protection of their fleet. Curio was averse to both these measures: The one, he thought, argued cowardice; the other an unjustifiable temerity. “With what hope, said he, can we attack a camp fortified by nature and art, and what advantage can we draw from an attempt whence we shall be obliged to retire with loss? Does not success always secure to a General the affection of his troops, whereas ill fortune is always followed with contempt and hatred? To change our camp would have the appearance of an ignominious flight, and might alienate from us the minds of the army: The dutiful ought not to know that we distrust them; nor the disaffected that we fear them, because our apprehensions would only augment the presumption of the one, and abate the zeal of the other. But if what is “ reported

“ reported of the discontent of the army be true, which I am yet un“ willing to believe, we ought, for that reason, rather to hide and dis“ semble our fears, than, by an unseasonable discovery of them, to add “ strength to the evil, and give courage to the enemy. It is proposed “ to march away at midnight; this would only furnish a fairer occasion “ to the ill-affected to execute their purpose. For fear and shame are “ powerful restraints by day, but night entirely divests them of their “ force. In fine, I own, that I am not so daring as to attack a camp “ without hopes of success; nor so blinded by fear as to be at a loss “ what measures to pursue. It is my opinion that we ought to try every “ thing, rather than follow either of these schemes; and I doubt not “ but, by your counsel, to fall upon some safe and honourable expe“ dient, that will be attended with success.”

Then, assembling the soldiers, he reminded them of the great obligations Cæsar had to them: “ It was you that gave the example of “ submission at Corfinium, and all the municipal towns followed it; it “ was you that obliged Pompey to quit Italy, without being forced to it “ by the loss of a battle. Can you therefore make any doubt but that “ he hates you, or that Cæsar ranks you among his best friends; parti“ cularly, when you see he has committed my safety to your care, and “ entrusted you with the protection of Sicily and Africa, without which “ he cannot hold Italy. You are now in the presence of those who ex“ hort you to abandon us: And indeed what can be more desirable
 “ to them, than at the same time to circumvent us, and fix upon you
 “ the stain of an infamous crime? What worse opinion could an enraged “ enemy conceive of you, than to suppose you capable of betraying “ those who own themselves indebted to you for all their success; and “ of throwing yourselves into the power of a party, who consider you
 “ as the authors of all their misfortunes? Are you strangers to Cæsar’s “ exploits in Spain? He has defeated two armies, overcome two Gene“ rals, and brought two provinces under subjection: And all this with“ in forty days after he came in sight of the enemy. Is it likely that “ those, who with forces unbroken could not stand their ground, will “ be able to resist, now that they have received such considerable losses?
 “ And will you, who followed Cæsar before fortune declared in his fa“ vour, now return to the vanquished, and lose the reward of your ser“ vices? They charge you with having abandoned and betrayed them, “ contrary to the faith of oaths: But did you desert Domitius, or Domitius
 “ his soldiers? Were you not ready to have endured the last extre“ mities, whilst he privately endeavoured to escape? Were you not be“ trayed by him, and saved by Cæsar’s mercy? And how can the oath “ any longer oblige you, when he to whom you swore, laying down the “ ensigns of his office and authority, became a private person, and sur“ rendered himself a captive to another? But perhaps, though you ap“ prove of Cæsar’s cause, you dislike your General. I shall not insist on

Y. R. 704. " the obligations you have to me : They are much inferior to my own Bef. Chr. " desire and your deserts : But you are not ignorant that the rewards of
 48. " military service come not till after the conclusion of the war, and, I 403 Conf. " believe, you little doubt what will be the issue of the present one.
 " Yet why should I decline taking notice of the diligence I have used, the " progress I have already made, and the good fortune that has hitherto " attended me ? Have I not landed my army safe in Africa without the " loss of a single ship ; dispersed the enemy's fleet ; worsted their ca" valry ; forced two hundred of their merchant-ships to quit the port of " Utica and join me ; and reduced them to a situation where it is im" possible for them to receive any supplies either by land or sea ? Can " you think of deserting a cause headed by such leaders and attended
 " with such success, to return to those who ignominiously delivered up
 " Corfinium, fled from Italy, surrendered Spain,* and have already suf" fered such losses in this African war ? For my part, I desired no greater
 " name than Cæsar's soldier ; you have thought fit to give me that of " Imperator ; which I am ready this moment to resign, if you repent of " having done me that honour. Give me again my former name,
 " that it may not be said, that I was honoured, to be covered after" wards with greater ignominy."

This speech had its proper effect : The soldiers often interrupted him to express their grief at his suspecting their fidelity : And, when he retired, they all gathered round him, begging him to lead them to battle, and make a trial of their zeal and bravery. This behaviour of the troops entirely satisfied the officers, and, with the consent of them all, Curio determined to take the first occasion to engage the enemy. Accordingly, he drew out his men the next day, and Autius Varus did the same. The valley between the two armies, though not very large, was of difficult ascent : And each army waited till the other should venture to pass it, that they might engage with the greater advantage. At length all the cavalry of Varus's left wing, together with the light-armed foot, descended into it. Upon this, Curio immediately detached his horse with two cohorts, to engage them : And the enemy, unable to sustain the first onset, returned with full speed to their main body ; leaving the light-armed foot behind, who were surrounded and cut to pieces in sight of Varus's whole army. In that instant Canninius Rebilus, (one of Cæsar's Lieutenants, who had distinguished himself in the Gallie war, and whom Curio had chosen for his Counsellor on account of his military capacity) cried out to his General : " Why do you delay seizing the favourable " moment ? You see the enemy is struck with terror." Curio made no answer ; only he desired his soldiers to remember what they had promised the day before : And, advancing himself before the rest, commanded them to follow him. The ascent on the other side of the valley was so steep, that the foremost could not get up but with the assistance of those that came after. The enemy, however, were so frightened

ened with the rout and slaughter of their men, that they made no resistance: And, before a dart was thrown, the whole army turned their backs, and fled to their camp, imagining themselves already surrounded by the victorious cavalry. Of Varus's army, about six hundred were killed; and a thousand were wounded at the gates of the camp, where the throng was so great, that many were crushed to death. Curio lost but one man, by name Fabius Pelignus, a Centurion of the lowest rank in his army: As this man was pursuing the runaways, he called with a loud voice to Varus, who, hearing himself named several times, and taking him to be an officer of his own army, turned, and stood still, demanding who he was, and what he wanted. Fabius then aimed a blow at his shoulder, which was uncovered, and would have certainly killed him, if he had not been immediately surrounded and put to death.

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Varus, seeing his army under the greatest consternation, and that many of the men had deserted the camp to take refuge in the town, brought all the rest at midnight within the walls: And Curio the next day began a line of circumvallation, resolving to lay siege to the place. Utica was filled with a great number of inhabitants, whom a long peace had rendered quite unfit for war, and, having formerly received many favours from Cæsar, stood well-affected to his cause. The Magistrates were so terrified with the bad success they had met with, that they talked openly of surrendering; and begged of Varus not to ruin them with his obstinacy. But messengers from King Juba, who came while this affair was in agitation, made them alter their resolution. They brought the news that the King was himself coming to their assistance, at the head of a numerous army, and would soon appear. Curio received the same intelligence: But for some time, through too great a confidence in his good fortune, would give no credit to it. The news of Cæsar's success in Spain being now publicly known in Africa, he could not be persuaded that Juba would dare to attempt any thing against him. But, being at last convinced by repeated accounts, that the King with all his forces was already arrived within twenty-five miles of Utica, he quitted his works, and retired to the Cornelian camp. It was conveniently placed near the sea, was well fortified by art and nature, was plentifully stored with water and salt, and the country around was covered with trees, and abounded with corn: Here, therefore, he resolved to wait the arrival of the forces which he had left in Sicily.

Curio, however, did not long abide by this prudent resolution: Some deserters bringing him an account that Juba had been obliged to return home to defend the borders of his kingdom, and compose the broils among the Leptitani, and had only sent forward Sabura with a few troops; he too hastily gave credit to this report: And, hurried away by his natural impetuosity, determined to march towards the enemy.

Y. R. 724. enemy. He sent, in the beginning of the night, all his cavalry to-
 Bet. Chr. wards their camp, which was upon the river Bagradas: And he him-
 48. self marched with the rest of the forces about three in the morning, 423 Conl. leaving only five cohorts to guard his baggage. After a march of six miles he was met by his cavalry, who, having travelled all the night, had surprised Sabura's camp, killed a great number of his men, and made some prisoners. Curio asked these, who commanded at Bagra- das? They answered, Sabura. Upon this, without making any further enquiries, he turned to the soldiers next to him, and said: "Do
 " you not see that the report of the prisoners corresponds exactly with
 " the intelligence given by the deserters? Juba is not with the army.
 " It must consist but of a few troops, since they were not able to " withstand the charge of a small body of horse. Let us hasten then " to obtain victory, booty, and glory." The ardour of the army was equal to that of their General. On they marched precipitately, that they might come as soon as possible upon a frightened enemy. The horse were ordered to follow, but, fatigued with their late march, they halted, some in one place and some in another. Juba was only six miles behind Sabura, and, having notice of the last night's engagement, he detached to his assistance two thousand Spanish and Gallie horse, of his ordinary guard, with that part of the infantry on which he chiefly relied. He followed leisurely with the rest of the troops, and about forty elephants; suspecting that Curio had sent his cavalry before, and was not far off with his army. Sabura, having drawn up his horse and foot, ordered them to give ground upon the enemy's attack. Curio, deceived by this behaviour, and not doubting but the enemy were preparing to fly, drew his army down into the plain from the higher ground. At length, having advanced a considerable way, he halted to give his men breath, who had now marched upwards of sixteen miles. That moment Sabura sounded the charge, led on his men in order of battle, and went from rank to rank to animate them: But he suffered the cavalry only to come to blows, keeping the infantry at a small distance, but in good order. Curio was not wanting on his part; he exhorted his men to place all their hopes in their valour:
 Nor did the foot, though wearied with their march, or the cavalry, though few in number, and exhausted with the duty they had already done, betray any symptoms of fear. Of the latter there were only two hundred, the rest having halted by the way; yet, wherever they charged, they obliged the enemy to give ground: But their horses were so tired that they could not pursue them far. On the other side the Numidian cavalry began to surround the Roman army, and to gall them in the rear. Whenever the cohorts issued out to charge them, the Numidians, being fresh, avoided the attack by their nimbleness, and, immediately returning, got behind the Romans, and cut them off from the army.
 Thus it was equally dangerous for them to keep their ground, or to advance

advance to battle. Sabura's forces increased continually by the reinforcements sent by Juba: Curio's, disabled by fatigue, and surrounded on all sides, had no place of safety to which they could retire or carry their wounded. Sensible of their extreme distress, they began to give themselves up to despair. Curio, perceiving the soldiers were in so great a consternation, as neither to give ear to his commands nor entreaties, gave orders, as the last resource, that they should endeavour to gain the neighbouring hills: But these were already possessed by Sabura's cavalry. Some of the Romans, attempting to escape by flight, were killed by the enemy's horse: Others, seeing it useless to make any efforts to save their lives, threw themselves upon the ground. While affairs were in this desperate condition, Cn. Domitius, Commander of the cavalry, having only a few of his followers left, advised Curio to save himself by retreating to the camp, and promised not to forsake him. But Curio could not think of surviving the loss of his army; and continued fighting bravely till he was killed: A few of the cavalry escaped: And those of them who had staid behind to refresh themselves, perceiving at a distance the rout of the army, retired with precipitation to the camp. Every man of the infantry was cut to pieces.

When the total overthrow and destruction of the army was known in the camp, M. Rufus, the Quæstor, who commanded there, intreated his men not to lose their courage. They insisted, however, to be transported to Sicily: And he ordered the Masters of the ships to have them in readiness at night along the shore. But such was the general consternation, that some cried out that Juba was arrived with his troops: Others that Varus approached with his legions, the dust of whose march they pretended to discern: And many declared that the enemy's fleet would be upon them in an instant. Confounded by their fears, they consulted every man his own preservation. Those who had embarked hoisted sail immediately, and their flight drew the transports after them. A few only of the boats would obey Rufus's orders: But the strand was so crowded, and every one so eager to get on board before the rest, that some of these vessels were sunk, and others were afraid to come nearer the shore. It thus happened that a small number of soldiers only got safe to Sicily. Those who remained, having sent their Centurions that night as deputies to Varus, surrendered. These Juba claimed as his property the next day, commanded the greatest part to be put to the sword, and sent the rest into Numidia. In vain did Varus intercede for them, and complain of this breach of faith: He durst not make any resistance. The haughty King made his entrance into the city attended by a great number of Senators: And, after regulating every thing according to his pleasure, returned triumphant with all his forces into his own kingdom.

C H A P. VI.

Cæsar is created Dictator : He returns to Rome, where he holds the Assembly for the election of Magistrates, and settles the affairs of the city. He follows Pompey into Greece. The disturbances raised by Coelius and Milo are quieted. The famous campaign between Cæsar and Pompey before Dyrrachium and in Thessaly. The battle of Pharsalia. Pompey's flight and death. The dispersion of his followers.

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
493 Conf.

See. in Cæf.
Dio.

M. Æmilius Lepidus, to whose care, as Prætor, Cæsar had committed the government of the city in his absence, obtained, after the reduction of Pompey's army in Spain, an ordinance of the people for creating a Dictator; and, pursuant to it, he named Cæsar to that office¹. Cæsar received the news of his election on his arrival at Marseilles, but did not immediately set out for Rome. He spent the remainder of the year in Gaul and in the North of Italy, to strengthen his army, and give directions for the security of the provinces which he was about to leave. It was in this interval that the ninth legion mutinied at Placentia, and demanded its dismissal. This was the first event of the kind that had ever befallen him. They said that they were worn out by labour, and deserved to have at last some rest: But their discontent proceeded from Cæsar's conduct since the commencement of the civil war, and particularly at the siege of Marseilles, where, notwithstanding the perfidious behaviour of the inhabitants, and the many provocations they had given him, he would not suffer them to be plundered. He brought this legion back to its duty, not by any mean compliance, but by his authority and resolution. After reproaching them with their ingratitude and folly, he told them, “that he had no occasion for their service, and that he should never want soldiers to share his prosperity and triumphs: And that, before he disbanded them, he would punish their crime, and order them to be decimated.” These words broke the spirit of the mutineers: They threw themselves at his feet and begged for pardon: And all their officers interceded for them. Cæsar was for some time inexorable; but at last, abating of his severity, he ordered them to deliver up to him an hundred and twenty of the most guilty; of these twenty were appointed by lot for execution; and the officers managed it so that the lots fell on the most insolent. After this execution the soldiers were obliged to renew their intreaties for leave to continue in his service.

¹ Some nations, as the Syro-Macedonians, Cæsars, or Roman Emperors. See Usher's reckoned from this epocha the years of the Annals, ad an. 3956.

On his arrival at Rome, he held the Comitia for the election of Magistrates, and was himself appointed Consul with P. Servilius Isauricus.^{Y. R. 704. Bef. Chr. 48.} Of the Prætors, the most remarkable were C. Trebonius, whom Cæsar^{403 Conf.} appointed Prætor of the city, and M. Cælius, who had the department of foreign affairs. It was the universal belief, and the wish of many in Cæsar's party, that there would be a general abolition of all debts. In consequence of this, the public credit was at a stand over all Italy, every one refusing to pay what he owed. But Cæsar put an end to this uncertainty, by decreeing that arbiters should be appointed to make an estimate of the possessions of all debtors, and to convey them in payment to their creditors, at the price they bore before the war. Suetonius adds, that he allowed the debtors to deduct from the principal what they had paid for interest. Dio Cassius says, that the creditors lost by this regulation a fourth of their due: And that, as many were suspected of concealing great sums of money, an ordinance was published, forbidding any body to keep above sixty thousand sesterces.^{484 l.} This extraordinary ordinance has no other voucher besides Dio.

Many of those who had been tried and condemned for bribery, while Pompey kept his legions in the city, resorted to him in the beginning of the war; and, that he might not be charged with ingratitude towards these men, nor accused of invading the prerogatives of the people, he now caused them to be restored in a legal manner by a law propounded to the people by the Prætors and Tribunes. The pretext was, that they had been condemned at a time when Pompey had influenced the Judges. Milo, alone, seems to have been excepted from this general amnesty: He had made, perhaps, no advances to gain Cæsar's favour; who might have, besides, many other reasons to be dissatisfied with the enemy and murderer of his friend Clodius: He restored, at the same time, the sons of the proscribed to the rights of Roman citizens, from which they had been hitherto excluded by the cruelty of Sylla, and the injustice of the aristocratic faction. Having made these regulations, and celebrated the Latin festivals, he abdicated the Dictatorship, after holding it but eleven days, and immediately set out for Brundisium, where he arrived before the end of December: And, on the 1st of January,¹ he entered upon his office of Consul in that city.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR, II. }
P. SERVILIUS VATTIA ISAURICUS, } Consuls.

Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chr.
47.

Pompey, having had a whole year to make his preparations, undisturbed by wars, and free from the interruption of an enemy, had gathered a mighty fleet from Asia, the Cyclades, Corcyra, Athens, Pontus, Bitynia, Syria, Cilicia, Phœnicia, and Ægypt: To all which places he had sent orders for the building of ships upon the first breaking out

404 Conf.

¹ The 11th of October, according to Usher; but, really, the 25th of November.
VOL. IV. P of

Y. R. 905. of the civil war; being persuaded, that he who was master of the sea
 Bef. Chr. would certainly be superior also at land; * and he had exacted great
 47. sums of money from the people of Asia and Syria, from the Kings, 404 C. 02. Tetrarchs, Dynasties, and free States of Achaia, and from all the cor-(ref. e. porations of the provinces subject to his command. He had got to-
 1. 1. Com. gether nine legions of Roman citizens; five he had brought with him
 1. 1. 11. from Italy; one had been sent him from Sicily, consisting wholly of veterans, and called Gemella, because composed of two; another, partly from Crete, and partly from Macedonia, of veteran soldiers likewise; who, having been disbanded by former Generals, had settled in those parts; and two more from Asia, levied there by Lentulus. Besides all these, he had troops from Thessaly, Bactia, Achaia, and Epirus: Which, together with the soldiers of C. Antonius, who had been obliged to surrender in Illyricum, he distributed among the legions by way of recruits.
 He expected also two legions which Scipio commanded in Syria. He had three thousand archers from Crete, Lacedæmon, Pontus, and other provinces; six cohorts of slingers, and two of mercenaries. His cavalry amounted to seven thousand; six hundred of which came to him from Galatia, under Dejotarus; five hundred from Cappadocia, under Ariobarzanes; the like number from Thrace, sent by Cotus, under the command of his son Sadalis; two hundred from Macedonia, under Rascipolis, an Officer of distinction; five hundred from Alexandria, consisting of Gauls and Germans, left there by Gabinus to serve as a guard to King Ptolemy, and now brought over by young Pompey in his fleet, together with eight hundred of his own domestics: Castor and Donilaus furnished him with three hundred; the first of these came himself in person, the second sent his son; and two hundred, most of them archers, were sent by Antiochus Ccmagenus, who lay under the greatest obligations to Pompey. He had likewise a great number of Dardanians and Bessians, with others from Macedonia, Thessaly, and the adjoining States, who completed his cavalry, and were partly volunteers, and partly mercenaries. To subsist this mighty army, he had taken care to amass vast quantities of corn from Thessaly, Asia, Ægypt, Crete, Cyrene, and other countries; and he resolved to quarter his troops during the winter at Dyrrhæcium, Apollonia, and the other maritime towns, to prevent Cæsar's passing the sea; for which reason, he ordered also his fleet to cruise perpetually along the coasts. Young Pompey commanded the Egyptian Squadron; D. Lælius and C. Triarius, the Asiatic; C. Cossius, the Syrian; C. Marcellus and C. Caponius, the Rhodian; and Scribonius Libo and M. Octavius, the Liburnian and Achaian: But the chief authority was given to M. Bibulus, who was High-admiral.
 In Cæ. Plutarch tells us, that Pompey had at first destined Cato to this impor-

* Pompeii omne consilium Themistocleum est. Existimat enim, qui mare teneat, eum necesse rerum potiri. Ad Art. x. 8.

tant command, and had even made him a promise of it : But that he afterwards changed his mind, lest that rigid republican, vested with so much power, should become troublesome to him after the defeat of Cæsar, and compel him to disband his soldiers, in order to restore the liberty of the Commonwealth.

Before the end of the year, while Cæsar was holding the Assemblies of the people in Rome for the election of Magistrates, the Consuls assembled at Theffalonica all the Senators who had followed Pompey, to the number of two hundred. There, after consecrating a place with augural ceremonies, they declared themselves the true Roman Senate; and enacted, that all those who were then Consuls, Prætors, and Quæstors, should retain their authority, and continue in the exercise of their several offices, under the names of Proconsuls, Proprætors, and Proquæstors. Pompey they declared Generalissimo of the Republic: And honours and thanks were decreed to the Kings and nations who favoured their cause; and, in particular, young Ptolemy, King of Egypt, was confirmed in the possession of his crown, in exclusion of his sister, the famous Cleopatra, though she had an undoubted title by the will of Ptolemy Auletes, their common father, who had left the succession to his eldest son and eldest daughter jointly.

Cæsar found at Brundisium twelve legions, and all his cavalry: But his legions were far from being complete. They had been considerably weakened by the Gallic war, by their long march from Spain, and by a general sickness, which had lately prevailed among them, during the autumn in the unhealthy climate of Apulia. Yet, the want of ships alone hindered him, he says, from putting a speedy end to the war. For, notwithstanding his orders to build and assemble as many ships as possible, he had scarcely a sufficient number to embark twenty thousand men; who, in the present state of his army, formed seven legions and six hundred horse. On his arrival at Erundisium, he harangued his troops, and told them, “that, as they were now upon the point of seeing an end of all their toils and dangers, they should make no difficulty to leave their servants and baggage in Italy, in order that they might embark with less confusion, and in greater numbers; placing all their hopes in victory, and in the generosity of their General.” The whole army having loudly testified their assent, he embarked with seven legions on the 4th of January, and arrived the next day at the Cæraunian mountains, on the coast of Epirus; where, having found a tolerable harbour, he landed his troops at a place called Pharsalus. Lucretius Vespillo and Minutius Rufus were then at Oricum, with eighteen Asiatic ships; and Bibulus had one hundred and ten at Corcyra: But the first durst not hazard an engagement, though Cæsar had for his convoy no more than ten galleys, only four of which had decks; and Bibulus had not time to assemble his men and get his ships in order. For no account of Cæsar’s approach

*N. R. - 65.
Bel. Chu.
47.*

404 Cons.

*Plut. in Pomp.
Dio.
Lucan. l. v.*

*Cæf. de
Bell. Civ.
Com. lib.
iii.*

Y. R. 705.
 B. C. Chr.
 404 C. n.

proach had reached these parts, till his fleet was seen from the continent. Cæsar sent the fleet back the same night to Brundisium to bring over the rest of his forces. Fufius Calenus had the charge of this expedition, with orders to use the utmost dispatch; but, setting sail too late, he lost the benefit of the wind, and fell in with the enemy. For Bibulus, hearing at Corcyra of Cæsar's arrival, forthwith put to sea, in hopes of intercepting some of the transports: And, meeting the fleet as it returned empty, took about thirty ships, which he burnt, with all that were on board. He imagined, by this example, to deter the rest of the troops from attempting the passage. He then stationed his fleet along the coast from Salona to Oricum, and remained himself on board, notwithstanding the rigour of the season; declining no fatigue nor danger, so that he might intercept Cæsar's supplies.

Cæsar, following the plan he had at first adopted, sent Vibullius Rufus (the same he had made prisoner at Corfinium, and afterwards in Spain) to Pompey, to treat of peace. He thought this man the properest person he could employ, as he had been twice indebted to him for his life, and was also much esteemed by Pompey, whom he had served with great zeal and fidelity in the quality of chief engineer. He was commissioned to represent to Pompey, "that it was now time to put an "end to their quarrel, and not obstinately expose themselves any more
 "to the precarious events of fortune: That the losses they had already
 "sustained ought to fill them with just apprehensions of the future:
 "That Pompey had been forced to abandon Italy, had lost Sicily and "Sardinia, the two Spains, with about an hundred and thirty cohorts
 "of Roman citizens. That he himself had been a considerable sufferer
 "by the death of Curio, the destruction of the African army, and the "surrender of his forces under C. Antonius at Corcyra. That it was "therefore incumbent on them to shew some regard to the sinking
 "state of the Commonwealth, and that the present moment was the "most favourable; because, not having yet tried one another's
 "strength, and considering themselves as equals, there was the more
 "likelihood of their coming to an agreement, upon moderate terms:
 "Whereas, if one of them once got the least advantage, he would
 "exact every thing from the other, and give up nothing himself.
 "That, as hitherto, they had been unable to settle the conditions of "peace, they ought to refer them to the Senate and people of Rome;
 "and, in the mean time, both swear to disband their armies in three "days time. That a proposition of this nature should be equally

▪ Plutarch in Pomp. tells us, that in a Council of war, in which Caro presided, a decree was passed, that no Roman citizen should be put to death but in battle, and that they should not plunder any city which was subject to the Roman Empire: And that such moderation gained the affections of all people to Pompey's cause. Cæsar followed this rule, notwithstanding the greatest provocations: But, on Pompey's side, Caro's decree was very little regarded, and I doubt whether it was ever made.

"agree-

“agreeable to all ; since the two Commanders, divested of their “strength, would find themselves under a necessity of submitting to “the decree of the Senate and people. In fine, that to give Pom- “pey a proof of his readiness to perform these proposals, he would “give immediate orders for the discharge of all his forces, both in “garrison and in the field.” Vibullius, having received these instructions, hastened to Pompey’s camp with all diligence, frequently changing horses, and posting day and night ; but he was more sollicitous to give him early notice of Cæsar’s arrival, and the condition of his army, than to execute the commission he was charged with. Pompey was in Candavia, on his way through Macedonia, to his winter quarters at Apollonia and Dyrrhacchium : And, surprised and disturbed at news so unexpected, he hastened his march, that he might prevent the loss of the sea coasts.

Cæsar, the very day he landed, brought his troops before Oricum, where L. Torquatus attempted to defend himself with a garrison of Greeks, called Parthini : But they, refusing to fight against the Consul of Rome, and the inhabitants being entirely in the same sentiments, he surrendered. Thence Cæsar marched to Apollonia, whose citizens being also well affected towards him, L. Staberius, who commanded for Pompey, privately left the place : And the inhabitants sent their Deputies to him, and received him into the town. The Bulliden- ses, Amantiani, with the neighbouring nations, and all Epirus, followed their example, and sent ambassadors to Cæsar to receive his commands. This rapid progress made Pompey march day and night to reach Dyrrhacchium : And, when he drew near to that place, a false report, that Cæsar was not far off, threw the whole army into such consternation, that many abandoned their colours and arms, and the march in general was continued in so disorderly a manner, that it had all the appearance of a precipitate flight. They had not even recovered their consternation when they had reached Dyrrhacchium, and were about to intrench themselves under its walls : Which Labienus perceiving, he advanced, in the sight of all the soldiers, and solemnly swore never to abandon his General, but to share whatever fortune should befall him. All the other officers, and the whole army, took the same oath.
Cæsar, finding that he was prevented in his design upon Dyrrhacchium, pursued his march more leisurely, and encamped on the river Apsus, in the territory of the Apollonians, that he might be able to protect the possessions of a State, which had declared warmly in his favour.
 Here he resolved to wait the arrival of the rest of his troops. Pompey did the like ; and, having encamped on the other side of the same river, assembled there all his legions and auxiliaries.

Salona, a town in Dalmatia, where Spalatro now stands, sustained a memorable siege about this time against M. Octavius, Admiral of the Liburnian and Achaian fleets under Bibulus. It was built upon a hill,

Y. R. 705.
 Bef. Chr.
 47.
 404 Cons.

Cæf. de
 Bell. Civ.
 Com. l.
 iii.

Y. R. 100. hill, and advantageously situated for defence ; but, as the fortifications
B. 100. were very inconsiderable, the Roman citizens residing there immediately
A. 100. surrounded the place with wooden towers ; and, finding themselves too few to resist the attacks of the enemy, after many of them had been killed or disabled, they, in their last extremity, gave arms and liberty to their slaves, and the women gave their hair to make cords for the engines. Octavius, to conquer their obstinacy, blocked up the town on all sides with five different camps, resolving to harass them with continual attacks. The brave Salonians dreaded nothing but the want of corn ; and, on Cæsar's arrival on the coast of Epirus, they sent to him to beg a supply. The siege had continued for some time ; and, the be-siegiers not keeping a strict watch, they all sallied out at mid-day, leaving, for a shew, their wives and children on the walls, and attacked the nearest quarters of Octavius. Having forced these, they ran to the next, and so successively to all the five camps ; and, driving the enemy with great slaughter from every post, they compelled them to take refuge in their ships. Octavius, as winter approached, and his loss had been considerable, retired to Dyrrhacchium, and joined Pompey.

Cæsar de
Bell. Civ.
Can. lib.
iii.

Calenus was charged, as we have related above, to bring over to Brundisium the rest of the forces ; and, having embarked according to his instructions, he put to sea : But he had not sailed very far, when he met with an advice-boat from Cæsar, informing him, that every part of the coast was guarded, and he returned back into the harbour.
One ship, which was not under his command, continued its route, and fell in at Oricum with the fleet of Bibulus, who put all on board to death, not sparing even the freedmen, children, or slaves. The troops under Calenus, had it not been for Cæsar's dispatches, would have met with the same fate. If Bibulus thus deprived Cæsar of all supplies by sea, he was in like manner greatly incommoded by Cæsar at land :
Who, having disposed parties all along the coast, hindered him from getting either water or wood, or any thing else, except from the island of Cercyra ; and, by this means, he was sometimes reduced to great difficulties. Notwithstanding therefore his high spirit, he condescended to let Libo enter upon parley with two of Cæsar's Lieutenants,
M. Acilius and Statius Murcus, who guarded Oricum, and the sea coasts :
And these, believing the proposals made to them to be serious, did not scruple to grant a truce. Cæsar was then at Butbrotum, a town over against Cercyra, whither he had gone with one legion to reduce some of the more distant States, and to get a supply of corn. Upon the first information of this transaction, he hastened back to Oricum, and invited Libo and Bibulus to a conference. Libo appeared, and made the following apology and declaration on the part of Bibulus ; “ that, “ being naturally hasty, and bearing a personal grudge to Cæsar, con“ tracted during the time of his quæstorship and edileship, he had de“ clined the interview, lest his presence might be an obstacle to the suc-suc-

“ success of so desirable a design. That Pompey was, and ever had “ been inclined to lay down his arms, and terminate their differences
 “ by an accommodation ; but, as yet, had not sent him sufficient “ powers to treat ; which, however, he doubted not soon to receive, as
 “ the Council or Senate had intrusted him with the whole administra“ tion of the war. That if Cæsar, therefore, would make known his “ demands, they would be sent to Pompey, who would soon come to a “ resolution upon the matter : And, in the mean time, he desired that “ the truce might continue, and both parties abstain from acts of hos“ tility, till an answer could be obtained.” Cæsar, on his side, “ de“ manded leave to send Ambassadors to Pompey, and required that “ Libo and Bibulus would answer for their return, or undertake to con“ vey them in safety. With regard to the truce, he said, that such “ were the present circumstances of the war, that their fleet kept back “ his supplies and transports, and his forces deprived them of all ac“ cess to the shore and other conveniencies. That, if they expected “ any abatement on his part, they must likewise abate in their constant “ guard at sea along the coast ; and that, while they persisted in their “ vigilance, he would not remit his attention and watchfulness. He “ added, however, that, though they could not agree on this point, the “ treaty might still proceed.” Libo declined receiving Cæsar’s Ambassadors, or answering for their safe return, and chose to refer the whole matter to Pompey : Yet insisted on the truce, which Cæsar constantly rejected ; perceiving, that his only aim was to extricate the fleet from its present distress. Bibulus soon after died on ship-board : He had contracted a dangerous illness by cold and perpetual fatigue ; and, as he could not have proper assistance at sea, and would not be prevailed upon to quit his post, he sunk under the violence of his distemper. Nobody succeeded him as Admiral : Each squadron was governed independently of the rest by its particular Commander, under the general direction of Pompey.

Vibullius at last thought proper to deliver to Pompey, in the presence of Libo, L. Luccius, and Theophanes, his most intimate Counsellors, the commission he had from Cæsar. But scarce had he begun to speak, when Pompey interrupted him, and ordered him to proceed no farther :
What, said he, is my life and country to me, if I shall seem to be beholden for them to Cæsar ? And will it be believed that I am not indebted to him for them, if he by an accommodation restores me to Italy ? Cæsar affirms that this speech of Pompey was reported to him after the conclusion of the war by those that were present. He assures us also, that, notwithstanding Vibullius brought him no answer back to his message, and Libo refused to conduct his Ambassadors to Pompey, yet he tried every other method to obtain peace. As the two camps were separated only by the river Apfus, the soldiers had frequent discourse among themselves, and committed no acts of hostility on these occasions. Cæsar laid hold on this

Y. R. 705. this circumstance, and ordered Vatinius to address himself to the officers
 Bel. Chr. and soldiers, and demand publicly and frequently, in the most serious
 47. and earnest manner, "Whether it might not be permitted to citizens 404 Conf. "to send Deputies to their fellow-citizens to treat about peace: That "this was never denied even to fugitives and robbers, and ought much "less to be opposed, when the design was to prevent a civil war, and the "effusion of Roman blood." He was heard with great silence by both armies, and received this answer: "That Varro would next day appear
 "at an interview; whither Cæsar's Deputies might come in perfect se"curity, and make known their demands." The hour of meeting was likewise settled; and multitudes flocked to the place, elated with the highest expectations. Labiens, advancing from the croud, began in a low voice to confer with Vatinius, as if to adjust the articles of the treaty:
 But their discourse was soon interrupted by a flight of darts which came pouring in upon all sides. Vatinius escaped unhurt, by means of the soldiers, who ran to cover him with their shields: But Cornelius Bal- bus, M. Pbotius, L. Tiburtus, Centurions, and some private men, were wounded. The brutal Labiens, then raising his voice, cried out aloud:
Leave off prating any more of peace: For none you shall have, till you have brought us CÆSAR's head. This declaration, so extraordinary, is of a piece with the whole behaviour of that deserter, and corresponds also very well with the haughty and cruel conduct of the whole party.

Cæf. de
 Bel. Civ.
 Com. l. iii.

While the two rival Generals lay during the winter on each side of the river Apfius, great commotions were raised in Rome and in some parts of Italy by M. Cælius and the famous Melo. The first, who was Prætor at Rome for foreign affairs, having met with some disappointments; or dis-obliged because Cæsar had given the more important charge of the city to his colleague C. Trebonius; or not relishing the law Cæsar had made in regard to the debtors, which might not answer his views; he engaged in the most rash and unjustifiable attempts. He had the boldness to undertake the cause of the debtors, and, on his entrance into office, ordered his tribunal to be fixed near that of Trebonius, declaring that he would receive the complaints of such as should appeal to him, in regard to the estimation of estates, and payments made in consequence of Cæ- sar's late regulation. But the law itself was so just, and Trebonius's judgments so moderate, that no pretence of appeal could be found.
 This Magistrate admitted of every reasonable plea, taking into consideration the poverty of the debtors, their personal losses, the hardness of the times, and the difficulty of bringing their effects to sale: And no one was so divested of honesty and shame, as to own themselves in debt, and yet pretend to keep their estates entire. Thus this first attempt of Cælius proved unsuccessful. His whole severity, therefore, was pointed now against those to whom the inheritances of the debtors were adjudged: And, having once embarked in the affair, that he might not seem to have engaged himself to no purpose in an unjustifiable cause, he proposed a law by which he allowed the debtors six years for the discharge of their debts, which they were to clear at equal payments without interest*. But the Consul Servilius and the rest of the Magistrates unanimously opposed the project; nor was it received by the people with the favour he expected: And he dropped the affair. This disappointment only served to render him more furious; and now, determined to keep no measures, he proposed two other laws, which he foresaw would more effectually inflame the people; the one "to exempt all the tenants of Rome from paying rent;" the other, "for a general abolition of debts." These laws took with the multitude; and Calpurnius at their head attacked Trebonius in his tribunal, drove him thence, and wounded some persons about him. The Consul Servilius complained to the Senate of his riotous behaviour, and Calpurnius, by a decree of the house, was interdicted the functions of his charge. In virtue of this decree the bills of his laws were torn down, admittance was refused him into the Senate, his chair of office was broke, and he himself was driven from his tribunal, whence he was going to harangue the people. It was doubtless in these circumstances that he wrote the following letter to Cicero, which I insert, because it clearly indicates the character of the man.

Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

M. COELIUS TO CICERO.

"WAS it for this that I followed Cæsar into Spain? Why was I not rather at Formiæ, that I might have accompanied you to Pompey? But I was infatuated: And it was my aversion to Appianus, together with my friendship for Curio, that gradually drew me into this cursed cause. Nor were you entirely unaccessory to my error: For, when I called upon you that night I set out for Ariminum, why did you forget the friend, when you were gloriously acting the patriot; and not dissuade me from the purpose of my journey, at the same time that you commissioned me to urge Cæsar to pacific measures? Not that I have the least doubt of his success: But, believe me, perdition itself were preferable to being a witness of the insufferable behaviour of these his partisans. They have rendered themselves so generally odious, that we should long since have been driven out of Rome, were it not for the apprehension which people have conceived of the cruelty of your party. There is not at this juncture any order of citizens; or even a single man in Rome, except a few rascally usurers, who does not wish well to Pompey; and I have brought over to your cause, not only those among the plebeian families who were in

Ep. Fam.
viii. 17.
Melm. vii.
18.

* This place in Cæsar is corrupted, and the Commentators can make nothing of it. The sense above is according to Murætorius's interpretation. Others say that Calpurnius's law gave the debtors three years to acquit themselves, in six payments, one every six months: Others, that it allowed but eighteen months, or one year and six months.

Y. R. 705. " the interest of Cæſar, but the whole populace in general. But you Bef. Chr. " will ask, perhaps, what can this avail us now? Wait the event, my 47. " friend: I will render you victorious in ſpite of yourſelves.* For 404 Conf. " ſurely a profound lethargy has locked up all the ſenſes of your party:
 " as they do not yet ſeem ſenſible how open we lie to an attack, and
 " how little capable we are of making any conſiderable oppoſition. It " is by no means from an intereſted motive that I offer my aſſiſtance, but " merely in reſentment of the unworthy uſage I have received; and re-
 " ſentment is a paſſion which uſually carries me, you know, the greateſt
 " lengths:—But what are you doing on the other ſide the water?
 " Are you imprudently waiting to give the enemy battle? What Pom-
 " pey's forces may be, I know not: But Cæſar's, I am ſure, are accuſ-
 " tomed to action, and enured to all the hardships of the moſt ſevere
 " campaigns. Farewell."

Cæſ. de
Bel. Civ.
Com. lib.
iii.

Cælius had privately written to his old friend Milo, to engage him to come into Italy, and join him with the remains of the gladiators, which he had bought for his public ſhews, and to make war on his enemy Clodius. Milo, exaſperated by the treatment he had met with from Cæſar, who had not reſtored him with the other exiles, inſtantly obeyed the ſummons, and began to gather troops all over Italy. For that purpoſe he diſpatched letters to all the colonies and free towns, intimating, that what he did was in conſequence of Pompey's authority, who had ſent him his orders by Bibulus. He alſo endeavoured to draw to him the debtors, whoſe favour Cælius had gained by his project for a general abolition of debts. But he met with no ſucceſs, and all he could accompliſh was to ſet ſome ſlaves at liberty. With theſe, and his gladiators, he had the hardineſs to lay ſiege to Coſa,^{*} in the territory of Thurium; where Q. Pedius commanded with a gariſon of one legion; and there he was killed by a ſtone from a machine on the walls. Cælius, when he underſtood that Milo was in the country of Thurium, ſet out from Rome, under the pretence of carrying his complaints to Cæſar, but with a view of putting himſelf at the head of a number of partiſans he had in the ſouth of Italy. At Cafilinum, he heard that his enſigns and arms were ſeized at Capua; that his partiſans were diſcovered at Naples; and that he was looked upon as a public enemy. Finding, therefore, that his project was defeated, and apprehenſive of his ſafety, he gave out, on leaving Cafilinum, that he was gone to Cæſar; but, turning from the high road, he went privately acroſs the country to Thurium: where, notwithſtanding the unhappy end of Milo, he endeavoured to

* Iritavi in me Catonem.

^{*} Vellius Paterculus calls the place Compſa:—Compſam in Hirſiniis oppugnans, ic- quam armis petebat pœnas dedit; vir iniquus, ſque lapide, tum P. Clodius, tum paria, et ultra ſortem temerarius. Lib. ii. c. 68.

debauch

debauch the inhabitants, and corrupt, by promises of money, some Spanish and Gallie horse, who had been left to garrison the place. These were deaf to his solicitations, and slew him.¹ Thus, says Cæsar, these dangerous beginnings, which, by reason of the multiplicity of affairs wherewith the Magistrates were distracted, and the ticklish situation of the times, threatened great revolutions, and alarmed all Italy, were brought to a safe and speedy issue.

The armies of Pompey and Cæsar were still in the same situation. The great object of the two Generals was the army left at Brundisium: Which Cæsar now expected with great impatience; and whose passage Pompey was greatly interested to prevent. He ordered Libo, with the fleet under his command, consisting of fifty ships, to sail to Brundisium, and possess himself of an island that lay before the harbour, judging it of more importance to secure a post, by which the enemy's transports must necessarily pass, than to guard all the havens and ports on the other side. As his arrival was unexpected, he surprised and burnt some transports, and carried off a vessel laden with corn: And the consternation was so great upon the coast, that, having landed some foot, with a party of archers in the night, he drove before him the cavalry that were upon guard. Elated with this, he sent word to Pompey, that he might draw the rest of the navy on shore, and order them to be careened: For that he alone, with his squadron, would undertake to cut off Cæsar's supplies. But Antony, who commanded in Brundisium, soon found means to dislodge him. He ordered sixty boats belonging to the fleet to be covered with hurdles and galleries; and, having filled them with chosen soldiers, disposed them along the shore. To allure the enemy, he sent two three-benched galleys to the mouth of the harbour, as if with no other view than to exercise the rowers; and Libo, seeing them advance boldly, and hoping he might be able to intercept them, detached five four-banked galleys for that purpose. At their approach, Antony's galleys rowed back, and were inconsiderately pursued too far by the Pompeians: For now the boats, stationed along the coast, on a signal given, came pouring upon them from all parts; and, on the first charge, took one of the four-benched galleys, and forced the rest to save themselves by flight. Antony, also, by posting the cavalry all along the coast, effectually prevented the enemy from watering; and thus Libo was put to the shameful necessity of quitting the blockade.

¹ The reader is perfectly acquainted with the characters of these two men, from what has been related of their behaviour: We have in Seneca this anecdote concerning the temper of Cælius: Calium oratorem fuisse iracundissimum constat; cum quo, ut aiunt, cenabat in cubiculo lætæ patientiæ cliens: Sed difficile erat illi in copulam conjeclo, rixam

*ejus cum quo hærebat, effugere. Optimum judicavit quicquid dixisset signi, et secundas agere. Non tulit Cælius assensientem, sed exclamavit: Dic aliquid contra, ut duo simus. Vellius Paterculus, ii. 68, gives him the preference to Curio, both in eloquence and courage: M. Cælius vir eloquio animoque Curioni simillimus, sed in utroque perfectior—.*

Y. 2. 73. Several months had now past, and the winter was almost over; yet the passage of Cæsar's troops was not effected, and was every day more 47. hazardous. Pompey was continually reproaching his Admirals for their neglect in relation to Cæsar's first passage, and exhorting them to make amends for it, by preventing the supplies from coming over. His sea-officers exerted themselves therefore, and were ever on the watch.
Cæsar, on his side, could not but think that Antony and Calenus had lost some opportunities, the wind having stood often fair for them: And he sent them peremptory orders to sail with the first wind that offered for the coast of Apollonia; which, having few havens, was not so closely beset by the enemy.

All the historians, Suetonius, Plutarch, Appian, Florus, and Dio, tell us, that such was Cæsar's impatience at this time, that he resolved to go and fetch his troops himself; and, in the disguise of a slave, went on board a fisherman's bark at the mouth of the river Apfus, with a design to cross over to Brundisium. The master of the boat rowed off, it is said, with his men, but the wind rising made the water so very rough, that it seemed impossible to him to get out to sea, and he ordered his men to return back. Upon this, Cæsar discovered himself: Fear no- thing, said he, thou carriest Cæsar and his fortune. The mariners, encouraged and awed by his presence, made fresh endeavours, and got out to sea; but the waves ran so high, and the danger was so imminent, that he permitted them to return to land. Cæsar's soldiers, informed of what had past, ran to meet him in great multitudes, and told him, with much tenderness and affection, that he had greatly reflected upon their courage by going in quest of new forces, when they were sure to conquer alone, as long as they acted under his direction.

LUCAN. l.
v.

The pressing orders he had sent for his soldiers, who were sufficiently eager of themselves to cross the sea, determined Antony and Calenus to sail with a south wind, which was not the most favourable for their passage. They made for the coast of Apollonia, but were driven before Dyrrhacchium: Whence, being descried by Coponius, he chased them with sixteen Rhedian gallies, and, the wind abating, the fleet had almost fallen into his hands. A brisk gale, however, arising, they made their way, and put into the port of Nymphæum, about three miles beyond Lissus. There they would have been in the greatest danger from the south wind, which had continued two days without intermission; but they were scarcely entered the port, when the wind changed to southwest. To this favourable circumstance they owed their safety. The fleet of Coponius was driven by the violence of the storm against the shore, and dashed to pieces. The greatest part of the soldiers and mariners perished among the rocks; a few only were taken up by Antony's soldiers; and these were afterwards sent by Cæsar to their several homes. There were two, however, of the transports, which, unable to keep up with the rest, were overtaken by the night, and, not knowing where

where the fleet had put in, cast anchor over against Lissus. Otacilius Y. R. 705. B. C. 47. 404 Cons. Crassus, who commanded in that place, sent out some boats and small vessels to attack them, and to promise them quarter, if they submitted. One of these vessels carried two hundred and twenty new-raised soldiers; the other less than two hundred veterans: And, on this occasion, appeared, says Cæsar, what resource there is in valour, in the most imminent dangers. The new levies, frightened at the number of their enemies, and fatigued with sea-sickness, surrendered on promise of their lives; but were cruelly slain, as soon as they came before Otacilius. The veterans, on the contrary, though they had both the storm and a leaky vessel to struggle with, abated nothing of their wonted bravery; they spun out the time till night, under the pretence of treating, and then obliged their pilot to run the vessel on shore; where they found an advantageous post. At day-break, Otacilius sent against them about four hundred horse; but they defended themselves with great bravery; and, having slain some of the enemy, rejoined without loss the rest of the troops. The Roman citizens inhabiting Lissus, to whom Cæsar had formerly made a grant of the town, after having fortified it with great care, were entirely in their patron's interest; and Otacilius, who well knew it, and dreaded the consequences of a revolt, quitted the place at this time, and fled to Pompey. As soon as he was gone, the inhabitants opened their gates to Antony, and furnished him with every thing he stood in need of. Antony, after landing his troops, which consisted of three veteran legions, one new-raised, and eight hundred horse, sent the most of the transports back again to Brundisium, to bring over the rest of the foot and cavalry, and retained only a few of Gallic structure, that, if Pompey, imagining Italy to be destitute of troops, should attempt to return thither, as was commonly rumoured, Cæsar might be able, in some measure, to follow him.

On the first news of Antony's landing, which the two Generals received about the same time, they both set out from their camps on the Apfius; Cæsar to join him as soon as possible; Pompey to hinder the junction, and, if possible, to draw Antony into an ambuscade. Cæsar, who had the river to cross, was obliged to fetch a compass, that he might reach a ford. But Pompey, having nothing to obstruct his march, advanced by great journeys against Antony; and, understanding that he was not far off, he posted his troops on an advantageous ground, ordering them to keep within their camp, and light no fires, that his approach might not be perceived. Antony, however, was apprised of it by the people of the country, and kept close for one day within his intrenchments; the next he was joined by Cæsar; and then Pompey retired to Asparagium, a town belonging to the Dyrrhachians. Cæsar followed him, and, after a march of three days, during which he made himself master of the capital town of the Partbinians, he came in sight of the enemy's camp, and pitched his own at a small distance from it. The next day he drew out all his

Y. R. 705. forces and offered Pompey battle. But Pompey stirred not, and from
 E. C. Cir. that moment Cæsar perceived that he must take other measures.

47.
 404 Conf. The day after Cæsar set out for Dyrrhachium, taking a long circuit, and through narrow and difficult ways, hoping thereby either to oblige Pompey to follow him thither, or to cut off his communication with the town, where he had laid up his provisions and magazines of war. In this last design he succeeded. For Pompey, seeing him set out another way, imagined he had been obliged to remove for want of provisions, and did not raise his camp till the next day, when he was informed by his scouts whither Cæsar directed his course. He, however, hoped to reach Dyrrhachium before him, by taking a nearer way: And though Cæsar gave his soldiers but little rest, and made them march with the greatest celerity, yet, when he arrived in the morning at Dyrrhachium, Pompey's van began to appear at a distance. Cæsar intrenched himself without delay: And Pompey seized a hill called Petra, where there was a tolerable harbour, sheltered from some winds. Here he ordered a part of his fleet to attend him and provisions to be brought to him from Asia, and the other provinces subject to his command. And Cæsar, apprehending, on his side, that the war would run into length, sent his officers into Epirus and all the adjoining countries, where provisions could be picked up.

In this situation of the two armies, Cæsar formed a project, which the nature of the country suggested. All round Pompey's camp, at a small distance from each other, were high and steep hills. He took possession of these, and built forts upon them; resolving, as the nature of the ground would allow, to draw lines of communication from one fort to another, and thus inclose Pompey within a circumvallation. By this means Pompey's cavalry, which was very strong, would no longer be troublesome to his convoys; they themselves would be distressed for forage; and Pompey's reputation would greatly suffer, when it was reported every where, that he had suffered himself to be imprisoned by Cæsar's works, and durst not hazard a battle to set himself at liberty. Pompey, who was determin'd neither to quit Dyrrhachium and the sea, nor to give battle, contented himself with obstructing Cæsar's works, and giving his men as much trouble as he possibly could. For this end he extended his army, taking in a great many hills, and a large circuit of country. He raised twenty-four forts, and, in imitation of Cæsar, drew lines between them, which took in a circumference of fifteen miles, in which were arable and pasture lands to feed his horses and beasts of burden: And his works were perfected before Cæsar's, as he had more hands to employ, and a narrower circuit to inclose. When Cæsar endeavoured to gain any place near his works, he failed not to detach parties of archers and slingers, who galled his men in such a manner, that they were obliged to furnish themselves with tunics made of sackcloth or wool, or thick leather. Both parties disputed every post with the greatest obstinacy.

Cæsar's

Cæsar's purpose was to inclose Pompey in as narrow a compass as possible: And Pompey's business was to extend himself in order to weaken his enemy by dividing his forces. In one engagement Cæsar's ninth legion was in such imminent danger, that Pompey ventured to declare publicly, that he consented to be accounted no General, if Cæsar's men got off without considerable loss. This legion had taken possession of a hill, which they began to fortify: And Pompey seized on that which was opposite to it, and from thence sent his archers and slingers with a strong detachment of light-armed troops to attack them. He played, at the same time, his engines upon them. Cæsar soon perceived it to be impossible to make any fortification there, while he was so briskly attacked, and resolved to draw off the legion; but, as he was to make his retreat by the steep part of the hill, it proved a business very nice and dangerous. For the Pompeians, as soon as they observed Cæsar's men to retire, pressed on the more fiercely, not doubting but their retreat was the effect of the terror they had impressed upon them. Cæsar therefore ordered his men to stand their ground, and he formed a palisado with hurdles on the ridge of the hill, and dug a ditch behind it. Then he made the legionaries file off, while some light-armed troops, posted on their flanks, protected them, and repulsed the enemy, with flights of darts and stones. But they had no sooner got behind the ditch, than the Pompeians, coming up to the hurdles, threw them into the ditch in such heaps, at convenient distances, as to make to themselves so many bridges: And, with great outcries and fierce menaces, they went pouring down the hill upon their enemies. Cæsar, sensible both of the dangerous situation of his men, and of the dishonour attending a retreat, which had all the appearance of a flight, ordered Antony, who commanded that legion, to encourage his men, and bravely fall upon the pursuers: Which they did in such close order and so briskly, that, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the ground, they routed the Pompeians; who, while they endeavoured to escape, were not a little incommoded by the ditch and hurdles which had been designed to prevent their pursuit. Cæsar, seeing there was nothing now to fear from the enemy's return, having killed a great number of them, and lost only five of his own men, retired leisurely, and, after inclosing some other hills, completed his circumvallation. It was a very extraordinary attempt for a General with an inferior army, which wanted bread, and was obliged to make use of a root called chara, pounded and kneaded with milk, to undertake the surrounding of an army much superior in number, and which abounded in every kind of provision and ammunition. Nothing certainly could shew so much the superiority of both the General and the army, than that they could dare to form such a plan, and had the industry and courage to go through with it. Such indeed was the spirit of this army, that, when their enemies reproached them with the famine they endured, they answered their insults in no other manner than by throwing

Y. R. 705.
Esf. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

V. R. 775. throwing among them their black loaves; glorying in their want, and
 Bar. C. 12. declaring that they would eat the bark of trees sooner than suffer them
 47. to escape; a behaviour which struck Pompey with astonishment, and 424 Cor. 1. made him order the loaves of ckera to be carefully picked up, and con-
 1. 1. 1. 1. cealed as much as possible from his soldiery; saying, he never thought to have had to do with wild beasts.

This event had fully the effect which Cæsar had intended: It raised his credit all over the empire, and diminished that of his rival. Nobody doubted but that Pompey would draw off his troops into his ships, and remove the war to some distant place: And, upon this, Dolabella wrote the following letter to Cicero, who was in Pompey's camp.

DOLABELLA TO CICERO.

Fp. Fam. 1. 3. 21. 12. 19. " I SHALL rejoice to hear you are well; as I have the satisfac" tion to inform you, that both Tullia and myself are perfectly so. Te-
 " rentia, indeed, has been somewhat indisposed; but is now, I am as" sured, perfectly recovered. As to the rest of the family, they are all " of them in the state you wish.

" It would be doing me great injustice to suspect, that I have at any " time advised you to join with me in the cause of Cæsar, or at least to " stand neuter, more with a view to the advantage of my own party
 " than of your interest. But, now that fortune has declared on our " side, it is impossible I should be supposed to recommend this alterna" tive for any other reason, but because the duty I owe you will not " suffer me to be silent. Whether my advice, therefore, shall meet " with your approbation, or not, you will at least be so just as to be" lieve, that it proceeds, my dear Cicero, from an honest intention, and
 " from an heart most sincerely desirous of your welfare.

" You see that neither the name of Pompey the Great, nor the cre" dit of his former illustrious actions, nor the advantages he so frequent" ly boasted of having Kings and nations in the number of his clients,
 " have any thing availed him. On the contrary, he has suffered a dis" grace which never, perhaps, attended any other Roman General. For,
 " after having been driven out of Italy, and having lost both the Spains,
 " together with a veteran army, he is now invested on all sides in such a " manner, that he cannot execute what Generals of the lowest capacity
 " have often performed: He cannot even make an honourable retreat.
 " You will consider well, agreeably to your usual prudence, what hopes
 " can possibly remain either to him or to yourself: And the result will
 " evidently point out the measures which are the most expedient for you " to pursue. If Pompey extricates himself from this danger, in which " he is involved, and takes refuge in his fleet, I intreat you to consult " your own interest in preference to that of any other man. You have " fully satisfied your duty, your friendship, and your engagements to
 " that

“ that party, which you espoused in the republic. What then remains “ for us but to sit down quietly under the Republic as it now subsists, “ rather than, by vainly contending for the old constitution, to be abso“ lutely deprived of both? If Pompey, therefore, should be driven from “ his present post, and obliged to retreat still farther; I conjure you,
 “ my dear Cicero, to withdraw to Athens, or to any other city uncon“ cerned in the war. If you should comply with this advice, I beg you “ would give me notice, that I may fly to embrace you, if by any “ means it should be in my power. Such is our General’s natural gene“ rosity, that you will find it easy to obtain from him any honourable “ conditions you shall demand: And I am persuaded that my sollicita“ tions will have no inconsiderable weight for this purpose’.”

Y. R. 705.
 Bcf. Chr.
 47.
 404 Cons.

But the war soon after took a very different turn, and Pompey, instead of making his escape, forced Cæsar, by an unexpected defeat, to retire towards Macedonia. Pompey, inclosed as he was, began soon to suffer great inconveniencies from the want of water and forage. For Cæsar had not only turned the course of all the rivers and brooks which ran into the sea, but he had also taken the precaution to turn the current of the waters which, after a storm of rain, would fall from the mountains. This obliged the enemy to sink wells in the low and marshy grounds, which, lying at a considerable distance from some parts of the army, and being soon dried up by the heat, greatly increased the daily labour of the soldiers. As for forage, after consuming what was within the lines, they could have none but by sea, which not coming in sufficient quantities, the horses and cattle died in great numbers. It was therefore time for Pompey to make the most vigorous efforts to force Cæsar’s lines and set himself at liberty; and he made use of every stratagem to distress and fatigue his enemies. In the night he sent his archers wherever it appeared, by the fires, that their guards were, who, after pouring a flight of arrows upon them, retired instantly to their lines; so that Cæsar’s men were obliged to have fires in one place, and keep guard in another. After several particular assaults, the two armies were engaged in six different actions at once; in three near Dyrrhachium, and in three about the lines. We have lost the particulars of these several engagements, Cæsar’s commentaries being imperfect in this place. We gather from him, however, that the principal attack was at a fort garrisoned by a single cohort, commanded by the brave Scæva, who kept his ground for se-

Cæsar de
 Bell. Civ.
 Com.
 li.

* Velleius Paterculus informs us, that Cæsar still continued to solicit the Chiefs of Pompey’s party, and that Cornelius Balbus, at the peril of his life, entered privately Pompey’s camp, several times, to gain the late Consul Lentulus, his benefactor, who was wavering in his mind: Tum Balbus Cæ- nelius, excedente humanam fidem temeritate, ingressus castra hostium sapiusque cum Lentulo collocutus, consule dubitante quanti se venderet, illis incrementis fecit viam, quibus Hispanus in triumphum & pontificatum assurgeret, fieretque ex privato consularis. L. ii. c. 51.

Y. R. 705. veral hours against four legions, till P. Sylla brought to his assistance, Ref. Chr. by Cæsar's orders, two legions from the camp. The Pompeians were
 47. then repulsed; but they found it no easy matter to make good their re-404 Conf. treat. Having advanced to the summit of a hill, they had reason to fear Cæsar's men would charge them in their descent; and Pompey, to sustain them, immediately took possession of an eminence out of the reach of the engines of the fort, where he threw up an intrenchment and brought more forces. But Sylla, who was intrusted with the care of the camp, satisfied to have disengaged his own men, had no intention to hazard a general battle, which might have been attended with ill consequences, and would have looked like arrogating the part of a General; and, checking the ardour of his soldiers, he brought them off from the pursuit. It was, however, generally believed, that, if he had pursued the enemy briskly, that day might have put an end to the war. "But "his conduct, says Cæsar, cannot justly be censured: For there is a "wide difference between a Lieutenant and a General: The one is "bound to act according to instructions; the other, free from restraint,
 "is at liberty to lay hold of all advantages." In these six engagements Cæsar lost no more than twenty men, whereas Pompey had above two thousand of his legionaries killed, and several volunteers and Centurions. In the fort, however, not a soldier came off without a wound, and four Centurions lost their eyes. It appeared that thirty thousand arrows had been shot into it; and Scæva shewed two-and-thirty holes in his buckler. Cæsar, to reward such heroism, presented him with two hundred thousand asses, and advanced him from the eighth rank of Captains to the first. He also distributed military rewards to the officers and soldiers of the whole cohort, and assigned them, besides, double pay and a double allowance of corn. Pompey laboured all night at his fortifications, raised redoubts the following days, and, having carried his works fifteen feet high, covered all that part of his camp with man-telets. He staid there five days, and, taking advantage of a very dark night, he walled up the gates of this new camp, rendered all the avenues impracticable, and, drawing out all his troops in great silence, at midnight, returned to his former works.

About
645 L.

Cæf. de Cæsar, after this success, drew up his army every day to insult Pom-
 Bell. Civ. pey, offering him battle; and, to provoke him to accept it, he advanced Corn. i. iii. so near to his camp, that his van was within engine-shot of the ramparts.
Pompey also drew out his legions, but posted them in such a manner that his third line touched the rampart, and the whole army lay under cover of the weapons discharged from thence: And in this situation Cæsar did not think proper to attack him. Pompey, induced by the scarcity of forage, had sent his horse to Dyrrhachium; but there Cæsar soon laid them under the same constraint as in the camp: For, by drawing a line with forts round the town, he also effectually blocked it up. They therefore returned again by sea to the camp, where, having no forage

but

but what was imported from Corcyra and Acarmania, the horses were often fed with leaves of trees and the roots of green reeds bruised. At last, all expedients for their subsistence failing, Pompey resolved to set himself at liberty, if possible: And, in the execution of his design, he was greatly assisted by the counsels of two officers in Cæsar's cavalry, named Roscillus and Ægus, who, at this time, deserted to him. They were Allobrogians, the sons of Abducillus, who had long held the chief sway in his state, and, being men of singular bravery, who had done Cæsar eminent service in the wars of Gaul, he had greatly distinguished them, by raising them to the highest offices in their own country, and to a state of great wealth. These men, presuming on Cæsar's friendship, used their troopers ill, defrauded them of their pay, giving false musters, and secreted all the plunder for their own use; a behaviour which alienated from them not only the minds of the Gallie cavalry, but of the whole army, with whom they had been in high esteem: And a general complaint was made against them. Cæsar, not thinking it a proper time for animadversion, and regarding them greatly on account of their valour, declined all public notice of the affair, and only reprimanded them in private; admonishing them to expect every thing from his friendship, and to ground their future hopes on the experience of what he had already done for them. This rebuke, however, disgusted them greatly: And shame, a consciousness of guilt, and the fear, perhaps, of having entirely lost Cæsar's favour, made them resolve to try their fortune elsewhere, and to look out for new friendships. Having imparted their design to a few of their clients, whom they judged to be fit instruments for the execution of it, they first attempted to murder C. Volusenus, General of the cavalry, that, by so signal a piece of service, they might the more effectually recommend themselves to Pompey. But, finding that design attended with great hazard, and that no favourable opportunity offered for putting it in execution, they borrowed all the money they could, under pretence of reimbursing the troops and making restitution, and, having bought up a great number of horses, went over to Pompey, with those they had made privy to their counsels. As they were persons of noble birth, liberally educated, came with a great train of horses and servants, had been highly honoured by Cæsar, and were universally esteemed on account of their bravery, Pompey received them with great distinction, and ostentatiously carried them over all his camp, triumphing in this new and unexpected acquisition. For till then neither trooper nor foot-soldier had deserted to him, whereas scarce a day passed without some deserting from his army, especially among the levies in Epirus and Greece. The two brothers being well acquainted with the condition of Cæsar's camp and fortifications, where the defects of the lines lay, the particular times for every service, distances of places, strength and vigilance of the guards, with the temper

Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

Y. R. 705 and character of the officers who commanded in every post, made an
B. C. 42. exact report of all to Pompey.

404 Conf. Upon this intelligence, having already formed the design of forcing Cæsar's lines, he ordered the soldiers to make coverings of osier for their helmets, and provide themselves with fascines for filling up the trenches. This done, he embarked by night in boats a great number of light-armed troops and archers, with the fascines; and, having drawn together sixty cohorts from the greater camp and the forts, he led them towards that part of the enemy's line which lay nearest the sea, and was the farthest distant from their headquarters. The boats and all the galleys that lay at Dyrrhachium, filled with men and fascines, were ordered to the same spot. The place, which Pompey designed to attack, was commanded by Lentulus Marcellinus, Quæstor, whose health being infirm, Fulvius Posthumus was to assist him; and it was defended by a ditch fifteen feet broad, with a rampart towards Pompey's lines, ten feet high and of equal thickness. Behind this, at the distance of six hundred feet, was another rampart, somewhat lower than the former, and fronting the contrary way, designed as a defence against an attack from the sea. But the line that was to join the two ramparts, and run along the sea-shore, was not yet completed: And this, Pompey being informed of, it was of fatal consequence to Cæsar. Pompey's sixty cohorts approached at break of day towards Cæsar's line, and, by their sudden appearance, greatly surprised the cohort of the ninth legion upon guard. They planted their scaling-ladders against the inward rampart, and, plying those who defended it with darts and engines, spread a general terror over all that part of the works, which was still increased by the multitude of archers that poured flights of arrows on all sides. In this extremity, the only refuge of Cæsar's men was to ply the enemy with stones; but these were prevented from doing much execution by the osiers with which the Pompeians had bound their helmets. At the same time the troops that came by sea assailed the exterior rampart, and, soon discovering the defect in the lines, landed their men between the two ramparts, where the line of communication towards the sea remained unfinished; and thus, attacking in the rear the soldiers that defended them, they obliged them to withdraw from both.

Marcellinus, apprised of this disorder, detached some cohorts to sustain the flying troops: But, as the rout was become general, they could neither persuade them to rally, nor were able themselves to withstand the enemy's charge. The more supplies he sent, the greater confusion was created, and the means of escape became more difficult. In this action the Eagle-bearer of the ninth legion, finding himself dangerously wounded, and that his strength began to fail, called to some troopers who passed by, and said: I have carefully preserved, to the last moment of my life, this Eagle, with which I have been intrusted;
and,

and, now that I am dying, I return it to CÆSAR with the same fidelity: Carry it to him, I beseech you, nor suffer his arms to experience, in losing it, an ignominy with which they have been hitherto unacquainted. Thus the Eagle was preserved, but all the Centurions, except one, of the first cohort were killed. The Pompeians, now bearing down all before them, approached the quarters of Marcellinus, when M. Antony, who commanded in the nearest forts, was seen descending, with twelve cohorts, from the higher grounds. His arrival put a stop to the enemy's progress: And soon after Cæsar came up in person with more troops, being informed of the attack by the smoke of the forts, the usual signal on these occasions. He perceived that Pompey had forced the lines, and had lodged himself on a spot from whence he could freely forage, and which allowed him a communication with the sea, and, altering intirely the project he had formed of inclosing him, he encamped as near to him as he could.

An eagerness to repair this loss was like to be the cause of his total ruin. No sooner were the intrenchments of his new camp finished, than he was informed by his scouts, that a certain number of the enemy's cohorts, which appeared to them to be a complete legion, were retired behind a wood, and seemed to be on their march to an old camp, which had been successively occupied and abandoned by Cæsar and Pompey. This camp bordered upon a wood, and was about four hundred paces from the sea: It had been formed by Cæsar's ninth legion, when they were sent to oppose a body of Pompey's troops. Upon their removing to a greater distance, Pompey had taken possession of it, and, intending to lodge in it several legions, surrounded it with more extensive intrenchments, inclosing a small camp within one of a larger circumference. He likewise carried an intrenchment from the left angle of his camp to the river through the space of about four hundred spaces, which enabled him to water freely and without danger: But all these works he had thought proper to abandon. Hither the scouts reported they saw the standard of a legion carried, which was also confirmed by those who were stationed in the higher forts. The place was about five hundred paces from Pompey's new camp, and Cæsar hoped, that, if he could get to the old camp, unperceived by Pompey, he would be able to surprise the legion and cut it off. He set out therefore as privately as possible with thirty-three cohorts, in which number was the ninth legion, that had lately lost so many of its Centurions and soldiers: And, taking a circuit, arrived before Pompey had notice of his design. Though the intrenchments were strong, yet, charging the enemy briskly with his left wing, where he commanded in person, he quickly drove them from the rampart: But they continued some time to defend the gates, which were secured by a barricade; and here T. Pulcio, formerly an officer in Cæsar's army, and who had betrayed C. Antonius, gave signal proofs of his valour. At length Cæsar's men prevailed, cut down
the

Y. R. 705
Bef. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

Cæsar de
Bell. Civ.
Co. n. l. m.

Y. R. 705. the-barricade, broke into the greater camp, and pursued the legion in-
 Sed. Chr. to the inward and lesser one. But Fortune, says Cæsar, which often
 47. effects mighty changes from trifling causes, and whose influence is ne-404 Conf. ver greater than in war, shewed its power on this occasion. For the cohorts of Cæsar's right wing, unacquainted with the situation of the camp, and mistaking the rampart which led to the river for one of its sides, marched on that way in quest of a gate; but, perceiving their error, they got over the rampart and were followed by all the cavalry.
 This delay saved the enemy: For Pompey, having notice of what passed, brought up a legion and a large body of horse to sustain his party; which, being seen advancing by both sides, quickly changed the face of affairs. Pompey's legion, encouraged by this succour, bravely defended themselves, and stood their ground: On the other hand Cæsar's cavalry, who had entered by a narrow breach in the rampart, foreseeing that a retreat would be extremely difficult, made off immediately.
 The right wing which had no communication with the left, observing the consternation of the cavalry, and fearing they should be overpowered within the camp, retired the same way they had entered; and many, to avoid being engaged in the narrow passes, threw themselves into the ditch; where, the first ranks being trodden to death, their bodies afforded an easy passage for those that followed. The left wing, who, from the rampart whence they had driven the enemy, saw Pompey advancing against them, and their own men flying, fearing to be entangled in the defiles, as they had the enemy upon them both within and without the camp, began also to retreat. Nothing was to be seen but consternation and disorder; and all Cæsar's efforts to rally his men were fruitless. If he seized any of them, they struggled till they got away:
 If he laid hold of their colours, they left them in his hands: Not a man could be prevailed upon to face about. In this calamity, what saved the army, says Cæsar, from entire destruction was, that Pompey, apprehending an ambuscade (probably because the success was beyond his hopes, as a little before he had seen his men worsted and put to flight) durst not for some time approach the intrenchments, and that his cavalry were retarded in the pursuit by the narrowness of the ways and the difficulty of passing the forts which Cæsar's soldiers were masters of. In these two actions Cæsar lost nine hundred and sixty soldiers, thirty officers, and several Knights of note: Most of whom died without wounds, being trodden to death in the ditch, or on the banks of the river. He lost also thirty-three colours. The prisoners were delivered up to Labiænas, at his request; and this deserter, brutal and cruel as usual, diverted himself with insulting them in their calamity; and, after asking them sarcastically, whether it was common for prisoners to run away, he caused them all to be put to death.

Pompey was saluted Imperator upon this occasion; a title which he bore ever after: But, neither in his letters nor his consular ensigns, did
 he

he think proper to assume the laurel. His party was so elated with this success, that they thought the war at an end, and proclaimed every-where their victory with great exaggerations*. Cæsar, seeing all his projects disconcerted, called his troops from the several forts into his camp, where, having assembled them, he said, “that they ought not to be anywise discouraged at what had happened, but should put, in the balance with their present loss, their many successful engagements; and should consider how Fortune had hitherto befriended them in the reduction of Italy, which they had effected without bloodshed; in the conquest of the two Spains, though defended by warlike troops under the conduct of skilful and experienced Leaders; in the subjection of Epirus and the neighbouring provinces, whence they had been supplied with provisions; and in their passing safe over the sea when the enemy covered it with their fleets, and were possessors of all the havens and coasts. If they were not successful in every thing, they must endeavour, he said, by prudence, to overcome the disappointments of Fortune; and attribute their late disaster to the caprice of that goddess, rather than to any fault on their side: For that he had led them on successfully, and had forced the enemy’s camp; and, if some sudden consternation, the mistaking their way, or any other mishap, had snatched a certain victory out of their hands, they ought to exert their utmost endeavours to repair the disgrace: Which would turn their misfortunes to a benefit, as it had happened at Gergovia, where those, who had been seized with a dread of the enemy, soon after earnestly urged him to lead them to battle.” This artful speech was followed by the disgrace of some Standard-bearers, who were reduced to the rank of private soldiers: But there was little occasion for severity; for the whole army was so grieved at their loss, and so desirous of expunging the stain their glory had received, that it was scarcely requisite for the officers to remind them of their duty. They begged with one voice to be led to the enemy, and some of the more considerable Commanders entreated Cæsar to venture

Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chr.
47-
404 Conf.

* Cicero does not appear to have been in the same humour. We have a letter from him to Atticus, written at this time from Dyrrhachium, which is as follows: “You complain of not hearing from me, but I have nothing to send you that is worth your notice: For I absolutely disapprove of every thing that is done, and every thing that happens here. I wish I had rather conferred with you, at a certain time, than corresponded by letters. I defend you here with our party as well as I am able, and so does Cicero. I have hitherto declined all employment, and the rather, because I saw none in which I could act consistently with my character and situation.

“You ask me what news: You may know from Isidorus what has lately happened: What remains to be done doth not seem more difficult.—My anxieties prey upon me so much, that I am reduced to a very low state of health: When I am somewhat recovered, I shall join our General, who is now very sanguine in his hopes. Our friend Brutus acts in this cause with great spirit. This is all I can say to you consistently with prudence. Adieu.” Ad Att. xi. 4.

a battle;

Y. R. 705-
B.C. Chr.
47-
404 Cons.
 a battle; but he did not think it prudent to expose in the field, against an enemy elated with success, troops that had been just worsted, and in whom deep impressions might remain of their late fright. He therefore resolved to change his camp, and the whole plan of the war, and to give them time to recover themselves. As soon as night approached, he sent all the sick and wounded, with the baggage to Apolonia, under the guard of one legion, ordering them not to stop till they had reached the place: And at three in the morning he made all his forces, except two legions, file out of the several gates of the camp, and follow the same route that the baggage had taken. Soon after, that his march might not have the appearance of a flight, and be known to the enemy as late as possible, he ordered the usual signal of decamping to be given, and, setting out with the rest of the troops, lost sight of the camp in a moment. Pompey, informed of his retreat, prepared to follow him without delay, and sent his cavalry to harass and retard his rear-guard: But Cæsar, having no baggage, marched with such expedition, that they did not come up with him till he had reached the river Genusus. He sent his horse with some light-armed troops against them, who charged with such vigour, that they turned their backs and returned to Pompey, leaving a considerable number of their men dead upon the field. Cæsar, having crossed the Genusus and made a day's march, took up his quarters in his old camp at Asparagium; where he gave strict orders to the soldiers not to stroll without the rampart, and charged the cavalry, which he sent out, as it were to forage, to return without delay by the Decuman gate, which was the most remote from the enemy. Pompey also took up his quarters in the camp he had formerly made, where the works being entire, and the soldiers having nothing to do, some made long excursions in quest of wood and forage, and others, who had come almost without any baggage, having set out on a sudden, enticed by the nearness of their former camp, laid down their arms in their tents, and went to fetch what they had left behind. This dispersion rendered them unable to continue the pursuit, as Cæsar had foreseen; and about noon he gave the signal for decamping, and, by doubling that day's march, gained eight miles upon Pompey. The following days he set out at three every morning, and Pompey, after attempting for three days to overtake him, gave over the pursuit on the fourth, and began to think of other measures.

Both Generals had at this time armies in Macedonia. Cæsar, when he was joined by M. Antony with the troops from Italy, received a deputation from Thessaly and Ætolia, with assurances of submission from all the States in those parts, on condition that he would send troops to defend them. He had accordingly dispatched L. Cassius Longinus into Thessaly with a legion of new levies and two hundred horse; and C. Calpurnius Sabinus into Ætolia with five cohorts: Desiring them, as these provinces lay nearest his camp, to provide him with corn. The latter was well received by the Ætolians, and, having driven out the enemy's garrison from Calydon and Neupattum, possessed himself of the whole country. In Thessaly, there were two factions: Egerejetus, a man of years and of established credit, favoured Pompey: Patreius, a young Nobleman, exerted his whole influence in behalf of Cæsar. About the same time, Cn. Domitius Calvinus was ordered into Macedonia, with the eleventh and twelfth legions and five hundred horse: Whither he had been also invited by Menedemus, a principal man of the country, who assured him of the general affection of the inhabitants. Pompey, on his side, sent messengers to Scipio in Syria, to hasten his march, and come and join him with the legions under his command. Cæsar gives us a strange account of this Proconsul's behaviour in his province, which corresponds, however, very well with the rest of his life. He tells us, that, after receiving some affronts and checks from the barbarous people of mount Amanus, he assumed the title of Imperator; that he exacted great sums of money from the neighbouring States and Princes; obliged the Farmers of the revenue to pay the two years taxes which lay in their hands, and advance a third by way of loan; and sent orders to the whole province for levying cavalry. In his progress through Asia Minor, he found the natives in the greatest terror on account of the Parthians; and his soldiers declared, that, though they were ready to serve against a public enemy, they were not disposed to act against the Consul and their fellow-citizens. But, to stifle their discontents, he not only made them considerable presents, but quartered them in Pergamus, and other rich towns, and gave up the whole country to their discretion. Heavy exactions, nevertheless, were made upon the province, and various new pretences devised to serve as a ground for them. Freedmen and slaves were subjected to a capitation tax: Imposts were laid on pillars and doors of houses: Corn, soldiers, mariners, arms, engines, carriages, in a word, every thing that had a name, furnished a sufficient handle for extorting money: Governors were appointed not only over towns, but over villages and castles; and he that acted with the greatest rigour and cruelty was accounted the worthiest man, and the best citizen. The province swarmed with Lictors, Overseers, and Collectors, who, besides the sums imposed by public authority, exacted money likewise on their own account; colouring their iniquitous demands with a pretence that they had been expelled their country and native homes, and were in want of every thing. Add to all these calamities immoderate usury, an evil inseparable from such exorbitant exactions; for, when sums are called for beyond what a country is able to furnish, they are obliged to apply for a delay, which, at any interest, is still accounted a favour. Thus the debts of the province increased immensely these two years. Scipio had given orders to seize all the treasure of the temple of Diana at Ephesus, with all the statues of

Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

Y. R. 705. that goddess, when he received letters from Pompey, to lay aside all Bef. Chr. other concerns, and advance to him. Josephus relates, that, while he
 47. was in Syria, he beheaded Alexander, Prince of the Jews, under the 404 Conf. frivolous pretext of his having formerly occasioned some disturbances in Judea: but in truth, because he favoured Cæsar's cause, like his Jof. Ant. unfortunate father, Aristobulus, who had been poisoned a little before xiv. 13 & by Pompey's partisans, for the same reason.
 25.

On Scipio's arrival in Macedonia, he found there Domitius, and advanced towards him by great marches; but, being come within twenty miles of him, he suddenly changed his route, and, leaving M. Favonius at the river Haliacmon, which separates Macedonia from Thessaly, with eight cohorts, to guard the baggage, and there to raise a fort, he turned off in quest of Cassius Longinus, and marched so expeditiously that he was actually arrived before Cassius had notice of his approach. At the same time King Celus's cavalry came pouring upon Cassius's camp, who, knowing that Scipio was not far distant, believed the cavalry to be his, and retired, in a fright, to the mountains that begirt Thessaly, and thence directed his course towards Ambracia. Scipio, when he was preparing to follow him, was called back by Favonius, who informed him that Domitius was marching towards him, and that it would be impossible for him to defend his post. Marching, therefore, day and night without intermission, he arrived so opportunely, that his advanced guards and the dust of Domitius's army were descried at the same time. Thus Domitius's care preserved Cassius, and Scipio's diligence Favonius. These two Generals kept one another in play, during the blockade of Dyrrhachium, without coming to any decisive engagement. During which time, also, Calenus, taking the command of Cassius's and Calpurnius's troops, penetrated into Acbaia, where Delfos, Thebes, and Orcbomenus submitted to him: But he was stopped in his conquest by a Lieutenant of Pompey, Rutilius Lupus, who kept him out of the Peloponnesus.

Cæsar, from Apollonia, where he staid but to provide for his wounded, pay his army, and garrison the towns in his interest, set out to join Domitius Calvinus. He perceived, that, if Pompey followed him, he must leave the sea and the ammunition and provision he had treasured up at Dyrrhachium, and be reduced to engage him on equal terms; and, if Pompey passed into Italy, he purposed to join Domitius and march to its defence, by the coast of Illyricum: In fine, if Pompey should fall upon Apollonia and Oricum, and endeavour to exclude him from the sea-coast, he intended to attack Scipio and thereby force Pompey to come to his assistance. Cæsar, therefore, had dispatched couriers to Calvinus to acquaint him with his designs, and with orders how to act; and, having left four cohorts at Apollonia, one at Lissus, and three at Oricum, marched through Epirus and Acarnania. Pompey, on his side, penetrating into Cæsar's views, made what haste he could to join Scipio, that, if Cæsar should march that way, he might prevent his being overpowered: But should he still keep near the sea, because of the legions and cavalry he expected from Italy, in that event he purposed to fall upon Calvinus with all his forces. Both Generals, therefore, marched with the greatest expedition, as well to afford timely relief to their friends, as not to miss the opportunity of distressing their enemies. Cæsar, however, had been forced to turn off to Apollonia, and Pompey, taking the direct way through Candavia, arrived first in Macedonia: And Fortune had almost thrown Domitius into his hands. For Cæsar's late defeat, which the Pompeians greatly exaggerated in their letters, having induced several States to throw off their allegiance, his couriers to Domitius were intercepted; and this General, having consumed all the provisions near his camp, had quitted it at this time, and was upon his march to Heraclea Senticæ, a town of the Candavians. What saved him was, that his scouts met accidentally with some *Allobrogi*ans, servants of Ægus and Roscillus, who, either from ancient familiarity or from a motive of vain-glory, informed them of all that had passed, and of Pompey's approach: Which news being immediately carried to Calvinus, who was not above four hours march from the enemy, he instantly turned off, and joined Cæsar at Æginium, a town on the borders of Thessaly.
 that,

From Æginium Cæsar marched with all his forces to Gomphi, the first town of Thessaly on the side of Epirus. A few months before, the inhabitants of their own accord had sent him a deputation, to petition for a garrison, and make him an offer of what their country produced: But now Androsthenes, Prætor of Thessaly, chusing rather to be the companion of Pompey's good fortune than a partner with Cæsar in his adversity, ordered all the people, whether free or slaves, to assemble in the town, and, having shut the gates against Cæsar, sent letters to Scipio and Pompey to come to his assistance, intimating, that the town was strong enough to hold out if they used dispatch, but was by no means in a condition to sustain a long siege. Scipio was then at Larissa, and Pompey had not yet entered Thessaly. Cæsar, after fortifying his camp and preparing every thing for a sudden attack, called his soldiers together, and represented to them, “ of what consequence “ it was to make themselves masters of an opulent city, abounding in “ all sorts of commodities, and, by the terror of whose punishment,
“ other States would be awed into submission: And this must be done “ before any succours could arrive.” His soldiers having shewed an uncommon ardour, he led them on to the assault at three in the afternoon, and was master of it before sun-set. After giving it up to be plundered by his soldiers, he marched on to Metropolis, where he arrived before the inhabitants were apprised of the disaster of their neighbours. The Metropolitans proposed at first to stand upon their defence, but, being made acquainted with the fate of Gomphi, they

Y. R. 705. opened their gates, and Cæsar suffered no harm to be done them. The Bcf. Chr. other States of Thessaly, observing the different fates of these two ci-47- ties, readily submitted; except Larissa, which was awed by Scipio's le-454 Conf. gions. Cæsar now resolved to encamp, and wait for Pompey. For this purpose he pitched upon a convenient spot near a town called Pharsalus: And the adjacent country being good, and covered with corn, which was now almost ripe^{*}, he thought it a proper situation for the theatre of war, and for determining his quarrel with his rival.

Pompey came soon into Thessaly, and, joining Scipio's legions with his own in one camp, he first thanked his own men for their late important services, and then exhorted Scipio's troops to claim their share of the booty to which his late victory had intitled them. He divided all the honours of command with Scipio, ordering a prætorian tent to be prepared for him, and the trumpets to attend him. This increase of strength, by the union of two powerful armies, raised to such a height the presumption of his followers, and their assurance of victory, that now all delays were considered in no other light, than as an odious hindrance of their return into Italy: Insomuch that, if Pompey on any occasion acted with slowness and circumspection, they complained, “that he industriously protracted the war, which could easily be brought to a conclusion in one day, in the view of gratifying his ambition for command, and keeping in his dependence such a number of consular and prætorian Senators.” They began to contend with one another about the dignities and priesthoods of the State, and disposed of the consulship for several years. They even sued for the houses and estates of those who followed Cæsar's party: And a warm debate arose in Council, whether L. Hirrus, whom Pompey had sent Ambassador to the Parthians, should be allowed, in the next election for Prætors, to stand a candidate for that office in his absence. His friends implored Pompey to make good the promise he had made him at his departure, and not suffer him to be deceived by depending on his honour; while such as aspired to this office complained publicly that a promise should be made to any one candidate, when all were embarked in the same cause, and shared the like dangers. Great was the competition,

* This circumstance determines nearly the time of the Julian year when Cæsar sat down in Thessaly, and that of the battle of Pharsalia, which was about a month after: And, as we know the day of the Roman year when this said battle was fought, it serves to determine the relation of the Roman with the Julian year. In a discourse of M. de la Nauze, printed in the 26th vol. of the Mémoires de Littérature, of the Royal Academy of Paris, we find the following note: “M. l'Abbe Belley a depuis communiqué, à “l'auteur de ce mémoire, l'extrait suivant “d'une lettre écrite à M. Pellerin par M.

 “de Clairambault, Consul de France à Sa-“lonique, en date du 4 Janvier, 1755: Sui-“vant les informations que j'ai demandées en “THESSALIE, & suivant ce que m'en on “rapporté ici les gens de ce pays-là, la moisson “s'y fait dans le mois de Juin; & du côté de “LARISSA & de Tricala, c'est dès les pri“miers jours de Juin; & du côté de Jannina “& des environs, ce n'est que du 15 au 20 “du même mois.”

and not without personal abuse between Lentulus Spintber, L. Domitius, Y. R. 705. Bef. Chr. 47. 404 Conf. and Scipio, about the High-priesthood, with which Cæsar was invested; the first pleading his age, the second his dignity, and interest in the city, the third his alliance with Pompey. Attius Rufus impeached Afranius before his General, charging him with being the cause of the loss of the army in Spain. L. Domitius moved in Council, that, after Cæsar's destruction, a commission of the Senators in Pompey's camp should be empowered to pronounce judgment upon those who had either staid in Italy, or, after removing to countries under Pompey's command, had taken no share in the war; and that three billets should be given to these judges, one for acquittal, one for condemnation, and a third for a pecuniary fine. Thus every one's thoughts were employed on the honours and profit he was to share, or the vengeance he hoped to inflict upon his enemies: But no one considered by what methods the victory was to be obtained, looking now upon Cæsar as a certain and easy conquest. This account of the behaviour of the Pompeian Chiefs is not only given by Cæsar, but by all the other historians; and well might Cicero conceive the greatest disgust for the company he was engaged with. There is one circumstance suggested to us by Cicero

" We have Cicero's account of things in a letter to M. Marius, written in the year 707: " I resolved to sacrifice all considerations of personal safety to the dictates of my honour: And accordingly I joined Pompey in Greece. But I no sooner arrived in his army, than I had occasion to repent of my resolution; not so much from the danger to which I was myself exposed, as from the many capital faults I discovered among them: In the first place, Pompey's forces were neither very considerable in point of numbers," [at the battle of Pharsalia, they were more than double of those of Cæsar] " nor by any means composed of warlike troops; and, in the next place, excepting Pompey himself, and a few others of the principal Leaders, they carried on the war with such a spirit of rapaciousness, and breathed such principles of cruelty in their conversation, that I could not think even upon our success without horror. To this I must add, that some of our most dignified men were deeply involved in debt; and, in short, there was nothing good among them but their cause. Thus, despairing of success, I advised (what indeed I had always recommended) that proposals of accommodation should be offered to Cæsar; and, when I found Pompey utterly averse to all

" measures of that kind, I endeavoured to persuade him at least to avoid a general battle. This last advice he seemed sometimes inclined to follow; and, probably, would have followed, if a certain engagement, in which his troops behaved bravely, and he gained the victory, had not given him too great a confidence in them. From that moment, all the skill and conduct of this great man seem to have forsaken him: And he acted so little like a General, that, with a raw and unexperienced army," [he had at Pharsalia 11 legions of Roman citizens, of which 8 were made up of veterans] " he imprudently gave battle to the most brave and martial legions. The consequence was, that he suffered a most shameful defeat; and, abandoning his camp to Cæsar, he was obliged to run away unaccompanied even with a single attendant." Id. Fam. vii. 3. Milm. viii. 1. It is certain, therefore, that Pompey was not driven, as Dr. Middleton puts it, by a sense of shame, and against his judgment, to the experiment of a decisive action: Pompeius, longe a iuxta aliis suadentibus (quorum plerique hortabantur, ut in Italiam transmitteret: Alii, ut bellum traheret, quod dignatione partium in dies ipsis magis prosperum fieret) usus impetu suo hostem secutus est. Vell. Pat. l. ii. c. 52.

which

Y. B. 705. which had the greatest influence in determining Pompey's conduct at this time, his superstitious regard to omens, and the admonitions of diviners; to which his nature was strongly addicted. The Haruspices were all on his side, and flattered him with every thing that was prosperous; and, besides those in his own camp, the whole fraternity of them at Rome were sending him perpetual accounts of the fortunate and auspicious significations which they had observed in the entrails of their victims.*

Cæf. de
Bell. Civ.
Lib. iii.

The two armies were now in sight of each other; and Cæsar, having provided for the subsistence of his troops, and given them some days rest, thought it time to make a trial how Pompey stood affected to a general engagement. Accordingly, he drew out all his forces in order of battle, but first near his camp, and at a good distance from Pompey's; and each day he drew nearer and nearer to him; inspiring his men by this conduct with fresh courage, and a contempt of an army that dared not to leave the heights where they were incamped. His cavalry being much inferior in number to those of the enemy, he followed a method he had formerly put in practice with success to strengthen them. He singled out the stoutest and nimblest of his foot soldiers, and accustomed them to fight within the ranks of the horse; who were thereby so much emboldened, that, though but a thousand in number, they would upon occasion sustain the charge of Pompey's seven thousand; and in one skirmish they had actually the advantage, and killed Ægus, one of the Allobrogian brothers.

Pompey, who was come to Pharsalia with a firm resolution to give battle, drew up his army at the foot of the mountain, upon which his camp stood; presuming, that such was Cæsar's eagerness and temerity, that he would venture to fight him in that disadvantageous situation. This Cæsar would in no manner consent to; and, despairing to draw his adversary to battle on equal terms, he determined to move his camp, and to be always upon the march; in hopes, that, by frequently shifting his ground, he might the better be supplied with provisions, harraiss his enemy less used to fatigue, and find an opportunity of forcing them to a general action. But, just as the order for marching was given, Cæsar perceived that Pompey had quitted his intrenchments, and advanced farther than usual with his army in array, on a spot where he could engage them without disadvantage: And, turning to his soldiers, "let us no longer, said he, think of marching; now is the time for fighting, so long wished for; let us, therefore, arm ourselves with courage, and not miss so favourable an opportunity." Upon this, he immediately drew out his forces. Pompey's real design was to draw on a bat-

* Hoc civili bello, Dii immortales!—quæ nobis in Græciam Româ responsa Haruspicum missa sunt? quæ dicta Pompeio?—etenim ille admodum extis et ostentis movebatur. De Div. ii. 24.

a battle : He had taken his resolution, and, in a Council of war held two days before, he had declared, “ that Cæsar’s army would be defeated before the infantry came to engage.” And when some expressed their surprise at this speech : “ I know, said he, that what I promise appears almost incredible ; but hear the reasons on which I ground my confidence, that you may advance to battle with the greater assurance. I have engaged the cavalry to promise, that, as soon as the armies draw near, they shall fall upon Cæsar’s right wing ; and, taking it in flank and rear, force it to recoil in confusion upon the main body, and thus throw the whole army into disorder before we have launched a dart. In this manner we shall obtain a complete victory without exposing the legions to any peril ; nor can there be any difficulty in the design, since we are so much superior to them in cavalry.” He warned them at the same time “ to be in readiness for battle ; and that, since permission to fight the enemy, which they had so often demanded, was now granted them, to answer by their valour the expectation every one had conceived of them.” Labienus highly applauded this scheme ; and, expressing the greatest contempt for Cæsar’s army, which he assured them was almost intirely made up of new levies, raised in Cisalpine Gaul, and especially in the colonies beyond the Po, he took an oath, which he proffered to all those that were present, never to return again to their camp, unless victorious. After these solemn engagements, they separated, full of joy and expectation, assuring themselves of victory ; and relying intirely on the ability of their General, who, in an affair of that importance, would promise nothing, they were confident, without a certainty of success.

The two armies were drawn up in the following manner : Pompey, placed in his left wing, where he designed to command in person, the two legions taken from Cæsar in the beginning of the quarrel by a decree of the Senate. Scipio was in the center, with the legions he had brought out of Syria ; and the Cilician legion, joined to the Spanish cohorts brought over by Afranius, formed the right wing. These Pompey esteemed his best troops. The rest of his forces he distributed between the wings and the main body. He had in all forty-five thousand men, besides two cohorts of volunteers, who had served under him in his former wars ; and who, out of affection to their old General, though their legal time was expired, flocked to his standard on this occasion, and were dispersed by him in different quarters of his army. His other seven cohorts were left to guard the camp and the adjoining forts. The Enipeus covered his right wing ; and, on that account, he placed all the horse with the archers and slingers in the left. Cæsar, observing his ancient custom, placed the tenth legion in the right, and the ninth in the left wing ; and, as this last was considerably weakened by the several actions at Dyrhachium, he joined the eighth to it in such a manner, that they formed as it were but one legion, and had orders mutually

Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

Y.R. ally to succour each other. His whole army amounted to fourscore cohorts, making in all twenty-two thousand men; besides two cohorts left to guard the camp. Demitius Calvinus was in the center, M. An- tory in the left wing, and P. Sylla in the right. Cæsar himself took his post opposite to Pompey, at the head of the tenth legion; and, as he had observed that the disposition of the enemy was contrived to out-flank his right wing, to obviate that inconveniency, he made a draught of six cohorts from his rear line, formed them into a separate body, and opposed them to Pompey's horse, instructing them in the part they were to act, and admonishing them, that the success of that day would depend chiefly on their courage. At the same time he charged the whole army, and particularly the third line, not to advance to battle without orders; which, when he saw it proper, he would give by making the usual signal. In his harangue to them before the battle, after reminding them of the many favours received at his hands, he chiefly insisted
 "on the injustice and obstinacy of his enemies, who had forced him to "enter upon this war, and to prosecute it against his will. They "themselves, he told them, had been witnesses of his earnest endea"vours after peace, and that he had left nothing unattempted to avoid "wasting the blood of his soldiers, and to spare the Commonwealth the "loss of her armies." After his speech, observing the ardour of his soldiers for the fight, he ordered the trumpets to sound the charge. Among the soldiers in Cæsar's army was one Cressinus, a man of distinguished courage, who, the year before, had been first Centurion of the tenth legion. This brave officer, as soon as the signal was given, called out to those next him, "Follow me, you that were formerly under my com"mand, and acquit yourselves of the duty you owe to your General.
 "This one battle will restore him to his proper dignity, and us to the "enjoyment of our freedom." At the same, turning to Cæsar, "Ge"neral, says he, this day you shall be satisfied with my behaviour; and,
 "whether I live or die, I will deserve your commendations." So saying, he marched up to the enemy, and began the attack with an hundred and twenty select men, who followed him.

Between the two armies there was space enough for them to move forwards upon one another, and form a shock, as is usual: But Pompey had given his troops orders to keep their ground, that Cæsar's troops might have all the way to make. In this, he is said to have been directed by the advice of Triarius, that the enemy's ranks might be dis-ordered, and the soldiers put out of breath, by having so far to run.
 It was also thought, that the enemy's javelins would have less effect upon his troops at rest, than if they sprung forward to meet them.
 "But herein, says Cæsar, he seems to have acted contrary to reason; be"cause there is a certain alacrity and ardour of mind naturally planted
 "in every man, which is inflamed by the desire of fighting, and which "an able General, far from repressing, will, by all the methods he can devise,

A. Pompey's Camp. B. Pompey's Army. C. Pompey's Horse in disorder. D. Caesar's Army. E. Caesar's Camp.

“vise, foment and cherish: Nor was it a vain institution of our ancestors, that the trumpets should sound on every side; and that the whole army should raise a shout, in order to animate the courage of their own men, and strike a terror into the enemy.” However, Cæsar’s soldiers entirely defeated Pompey’s hopes by their good discipline and experience: For, perceiving the enemy did not stir, they halted of their own accord, in the midst of their career; and, having taken a moment’s breath, put themselves a second time in motion, marched up in good order, flung their javelins, and then, as Cæsar had ordered, betook themselves to their swords. Nor did Pompey’s men act with less presence of mind; for they bravely sustained their attack; and, having launched their javelins, immediately had also recourse to their swords. At this instant, Pompey’s horse, supported by the archers and slingers, attacked Cæsar’s; and, having compelled them to give ground, began to extend themselves in order to flank the infantry. Whereupon Cæsar gave the signal to the six cohorts, who fell on Pompey’s cavalry with such fury, that they not only drove them from the field of battle, but even forced them to take refuge in the mountains. It is reported by some historians, that Cæsar ordered his soldiers to aim at the faces of the enemy; and that this contrivance served much to disorder the nice and effeminate Knights, who could not bear the thoughts of being disfigured. He himself, however, has not mentioned this stratagem. The archers and slingers, deprived of the protection of the horse, were soon cut to pieces. The same cohorts, having thus driven the cavalry entirely out of the field, turned upon the enemy’s left wing, and began to charge it in the rear. Cæsar at the same time brought up his third line, which had not been engaged. The left wing of the enemy, thus attacked in front by fresh troops, and in the rear by the victorious cohorts, made but a faint resistance, and fled to their camp. Pompey, upon seeing that part of his army, on which he chiefly depended, put into disorder, despaired of being able to restore the battle, had retired from the field to wait the event in his tent. Cæsar, tho’ the battle lasted till noon, and the weather was excessively hot, yet, encouraging his soldiers, led them on, notwithstanding their fatigue, to attack the intrenchments of the vanquished. The camp was bravely defended by the cohorts left for its guard, and particularly by a body of Thracians and other barbarians. The soldiers who had fled from the battle were in too great a consternation to think of any thing but of making their escape. These fresh troops were overpowered however, driven from the rampart, and forced to fly to the neighbouring mountains.

Pompey, perceiving that all was lost, and that his intrenchments were forced, quitting his military dress for a habit more suitable to his ill fortune, mounted his horse, and, withdrawing by the Decuman gate, rode full speed to Larissa. He would not enter the town, Dio.

Y. R. 705. though invited by the citizens, that he might not expose them to the re-
 Bef. Chr. sentment of Cæsar : But, having called for what he wanted, he advised
 47. them to submit to the conqueror. Thence, continuing his flight day
 404. Cæsar. and night, without intermission, he arrived on the sea-side with thirty horse, and went on board a ship of burden ; often complaining “ that “ he had been so far deceived in his opinion of his followers, as to see “ those very men, from whom he expected victory, the first to fly, and “ betray him to his enemies.” His camp shewed how little he and his followers dreamed of the issue of that day. The tents of the Grandees were adorned with branches of myrtle, and shaded with ivy ; the tables were found covered, the side-boards loaded with plate ; and, in a word, every thing gave proofs of the highest luxury, and the greatest assurance of victory.

Cæsar, not thinking his victory yet complete, earnestly intreated his soldiers to form a line of circumvallation round the mountain, whither a part of the conquered army had retired. But the Pompeians quickly abandoned a post which for want of water was not tenable, and endeavoured to reach the city of Larissa : Whereupon Cæsar, dividing his army, left one part to guard Pompey's camp, sent back another to his own, and, with four legions, taking a nearer road than that by which the enemy passed, he found means to intercept them, and after six miles march drew up in order of battle. However, the vanquished troops once more found protection from a mountain, at the foot of which ran a rivulet. Though Cæsar's men were greatly fatigued by fighting the whole day, yet before night they flung up some works which were sufficient to prevent the enemy from having any communication with the rivulet : Who, by this step, being cut off from all hopes of relief, or of making good their retreat, sent Deputies to treat of a surrendry. Affairs continued in this situation all that night, and some Senators took the occasion to make their escape. At break of day they came down into the plain, and delivered up their arms ; humbly imploring Cæsar's goodness, and suing for mercy.
 He not only granted them readily their lives, but spoke to them with the greatest humanity, and gave strict orders that nothing should be taken from them. He then sent for the legions that had passed the night in the camp, to relieve those he had employed in the pursuit :
 And, being determined to follow Pompey, he began his march, and arrived the same day at Larissa. Thus Cæsar, by his admirable skill, and the indefatigable industry of his soldiers, obtained the most complete and important victory. According to his own account, he lost but two hundred men, ¹ with thirty Centurions. To the body of Crassinus, who had been killed in the beginning of the engagement, he ordered particular honours to be paid. On Pompey's side there fell

¹ Plutarch and Appian say twelve hundred.

fifteen thousand; of whom the greatest number were servants, and ^{V.R. 705.} those who guarded the tents; only six thousand soldiers were killed, ^{Bef. Chr. 47.} ten Senators and forty Knights. Upwards of twenty-four thousand ^{404 Conf.} were made prisoners; for the cohorts that garrisoned the forts surrendered to Sylla. One hundred and eighty colours and nine eagles were ^{Plut. in Pomp.} taken. L. Domitius Abenobarbus, that mortal enemy to Cæsar, was overtaken in his flight, and put to death.² Dio relates, that Cæsar caused all those to be slain, who, having been once pardoned, had a second time carried arms against him. But this circumstance may well be doubted, since all the historians are unanimous in extolling his clemency both in the battle, and after it.³ As soon as he saw his enemies defeated, he cried to his soldiers to spare the blood of their fellow-citizens. Upon viewing the field of battle, he said with a sigh: They have forced me to this sad necessity. Cæsar must have sought the assistance of his soldiers, or must have perished. He generously pardoned all those he had made prisoners: And Pliny and Seneca have observed that, having found in ^{Suet. in Cæsar.} Pompey's tent a great many letters from several great men, in which, ^{Pliny, l. vii. c. 25.} undoubtedly, they had expressed in the warmest manner their zeal for ^{Sen. de Ira, ii. 23.} his party, he instantly gave orders to burn them. “Although,” says the last of these writers, “he was perfectly moderate in his anger, yet he rather chose to put it out of his power to resent such injuries, and thought that the most obliging manner of pardoning was to be ignorant of the nature of the offence.” Dio himself tells us, that he pardoned all the Kings and States who had assisted Pompey, and demanded nothing more of them than a sum of money; and, considering, adds the historian, that he himself was little known to them, and that they were under many and great obligations to Pompey, he had more regard for those who had appeared in arms, than for the others who had deserted their benefactor. To the Athenians, who sent Deputies to him to solicit their pardon, he granted it, with this reproach: “How long, having merited death by your degeneracy, will you owe your safety to the glory of your ancestors?”

This famous battle was fought on the 9th of August,⁴ as appears by

T 2

an

² Cicero, Philipp. ii. c. 29, accuses Antony of having killed Domitius, and some others whom Cæsar probably would have spared: Fueras in acie Pharsalica anseignatus: L. Domitium, nobilissimum et clarissimum virum, occideras: Mulios, qui de prælio effugerant, quos Cæsar, ut nonnullos, fortasse servasset, crudelissime persecutus trucidaras. He commanded, probably, the forces sent after the runaways.

³ Illud notandum est: Ut primum C. Cæsar inclinatam vidit Pompeianorum aciem: Neque prius, neque antiquius quidquam habuit, quam quinque partes (militari et verbo et consuetudine utar) dimitteret. Proh Dii immortales! quod hujus voluntatis erga Brutum suæ postea vir tam mitis pretium tulit! Nihil illa victoria mirabilius, magnificentius, clarius fuit; quando neminem, nisi acie consumptum, civem patria desideravit. Vell. Pat. l. ii. c. 82.

⁴ The 9th of August of the Roman year, according to Primate Usher, corresponded with the 6th of June of the Julian; but the bat-

X. R. 705.
Bef. Chr. an inscription produced by the learned Muratori; a circumstance unknown in Lucan's time.

47.
404. Conf. The news of Pompey's defeat was brought to Dyrrhachium by Labi- enus, who escaped thither with the Gallie and German horse. Cato had been left Governor of the town with fifteen cohorts, and with him were Cicero, the learned Varro, and some other Senators. They all, immediately, in the greatest consternation, got on board the ships in the port with their troops, and repaired to the island of Corcyra, which was the general rendezvous of Pompey's followers. D. Lelius brought there his fleet from before Brundisium, where he was attempting to block up the port: C. Cassius, who had just burned two of Cæsar's fleets, one of thirty-five sail at Messana, commanded by M. Pomponius, and another at Vibo, under the orders of P. Sulpitius, consisting of five gallies, arrived there with the Syrian, Phœnician, and Cilician squadrons from Sicily; and thither also Octavius brought the ships under his command. Young Pompey and Cornelius had been deserted by their forces, and arrived without them. Here a general Council was held, and we are told by Plutarch, that Cato offered the command of his cohorts to Cicero, as the superior in dignity; and that, upon his refusal and declaration, that he would join no longer in the war, young Pompey was so enraged, that he drew his sword, and would have killed him, if Cato had not interposed. There was no scheme agreed

Plut. in Cato. & Cic.

Cæsar de
Bell. Civ.
Comm. lib.
iii.

battle, I should think, was fought later in the year. Cæsar encamped in the plains of Pharsalia, when the corn was almost ripe, que prope jam matura erat: It was therefore in the end of May, or beginning of June, of the Julian year. Pompey followed him a few days after, paucis post diebus, but was in no haste to give him battle. Cæsar had time to exercise his troops, to teach his light-armed soldiers to fight among the cavalry, and to raise the spirit and courage of his men, by sending them daily to offer battle to the enemy, continentibus diebus. There were several skirmishes between parties detached from the two armies. Appian and Lucan both tell us, that, before the battle, Cæsar's troops had been sent out to gather corn: And, in fire, Cæsar despairing to draw Pompey to an engagement, was preparing to march to another place; and one of his reasons was, the better to supply his army with provisions. So that we cannot allow less than a month between Cæsar's arrival in Thessaly and the battle. Now, the harvest in that country, as has been remarked above, does not come on before the beginning of June at Larissa, and the 15th or 20th at Jannina. The 9th of August, of the Roman year, must, therefore, have corresponded with the end, or 29th of June of the Julian year: And thus the battle was given a few days after the harvest; which agrees with Plutarch, who tells us, that it was fought in the greatest heat of summer; and with Suetonius, who says, that Cæsar besieged Pompey four months at Dyrrhachium, which he did not begin to do till the end of winter, when Antony brought him the remainder of his army.

It appears, that Cicero had at this time great reason to complain of his party. "I cannot" says he to Atticus, "without the deepest sorrow, inform you what bitter, what heavy, what extraordinary motives have forced me to yield rather to a sudden impulse of passion, than the counsel of my reason: These motives are such, that they have induced me to act as you see." Ad Att. x. 5. In a letter to Terentia, he makes the same complaint. Ep. Fam. xiv. 12. Milt. vii. 23. "May the joy you express at my safe arrival in Italy be never interrupted! but my mind was so much discomposed by those atrocious injuries I had agreed upon, and all dispersed themselves severally, as their hopes and inclinations led them. Cicero went straight to Brundisium, committing himself to the mercy of the conqueror. Many retired into Acbaia, to wait there the farther issue of things, and take such methods as fortune offered. M. Marcellus went to Mytilene: Cacilius Bassus, a Roman Knight, who acted a considerable part after Cæsar's death, and Libo, hid themselves in Tyre. Scipio, Labienus, and many others, who had acted more violently against Cæsar, resolved at all events to renew the war, and sailed for Africa, to join Varus and King Juba. Octavius sailed with the Liburnian fleet to Illyricum, where he made war, as shall be related hereafter, with various fortune. Young Pompey and Cato followed the unfortunate General. C. Cassius sailed to Cilicia, where he waited Cæsar's arrival in a bay at the mouth of the river Cydus, and there delivered up his fleet. ^d Plutarch tells us, that M. Brutus, seeing

Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

Pom-

“ had received, that I have taken a step, I “ fear, which may be attended with great “ difficulties.”

^d Cicero, Philip. ii. 11, tells us, that he lay there in wait for Cæsar, with a resolution to destroy him; which he would have effected, if Cæsar had not landed on the opposite shore, where he was not expected, and had not determined to land. This, however, it is thought, is a weak apology for Cassius; and the real motives of his conduct at this time are explained to us in a letter of Cicero to him, written in the year 706. Ep. Fam. xv. 15. Melm. vii. 36. “ It was the hope, that peace would be restored to our country, and the abhorrence of spilling the blood of our fellow citizens, that equally induced both you and myself to decline an obstinate perseverance in the civil war. But, though these sentiments were common to us both, yet, as I am considered as having been the first to inspire you with them, it is more my part, perhaps, to render you satisfied with having adopted them, than it is yours to perform the same friendly office towards me. But, to say the truth, (and it is a circumstance upon which I frequently reflect) we mutually convinced each other, in the free conversations we held upon this subject, that a single battle, if it should not wholly determine our cause, ought to be the limits however of “ our particular opposition. And these sentiments have never seriously been condemned by any, but by those alone who think it more eligible that our constitution should be totally destroyed, than in any degree impaired. But my opinion was far otherwise: For I had no views to gratify by its extinction, and had much to hope from its remains. As to the consequences which have since ensued, they lay far beyond the reach of human discernment; and the wonder is, not so much how they escaped our penetration, as how it was possible they should have happened. I must confess, my own opinion always was, that the battle of Pharsalia would be decisive; and I imagined that the victors would act with a regard to the common preservation of all, and the vanquished to their own. But both the one and the other, I was well aware, depended on the expedition with which the conquerors would pursue their success. And, had they pursued immediately, those who have since carried the war into Africa, would have experienced (and experienced too, if I do not flatter myself, by my intercession *) the same clemency with which the rest of our party have been treated, who retired into Asia and Acbaia. But the critical opportunity (that season so important in all transactions, and especially in a civil war) was “ un-

* It appears, by this flow of spirits, that this letter was written after Cicero had been comforted by Cæsar, and his terrors dispelled by the assurance of his pardon, in the kindest terms: And what follows shews it to have been penned before Cæsar's return into Italy.

Y. R. 705. Pompey's camp forced, stole out of one of the gates, and hid himself in a
 Bef. Chr. morass covered with reeds; from whence, having got safe in the night
 47. to Larissa, he wrote immediately to Cæsar, who not only forgave him, 424 Conf. but treated him with the greatest affection. Even before the battle Cæsar had given particular orders, not to kill him on any account; and to make him prisoner, in case he was willing to surrender: but, if he refused, to let him go.

Cæsar de
Bell. Civ.
Com. lib.
 ii.

Pompey sailed first to Amphipolis, where he issued a proclamation, enjoining all the youth of the province, whether Greeks or Romans, to join him in arms: This he did, either with a design to keep footing in Macedonia, or to conceal his real intention of retreating much further.
 He lay one night at anchor, sending to his friends in the town, and raising all the money he possibly could: But, being informed of Cæsar's approach, he departed, and sailed for Mitylene, where he had left his wife Cornelia. Here he was detained two days by the badness of "unhappily lost: And, a whole year inter"vening, it raised the spirits of some of our "party to hope they might recover the vic"tory; and rendered others so desperate

 "as not to dread the reverse. Fortune,
 "however, must be answerable for the "whole train of evils which this delay has "produced. For who could have ima"gined, either that the Alexandrine war
 "could have been drawn out to so great a
 "length, or that the paltry Pharnaces
 "could have struck such a terror through"out Asia. But, though we both acted by
 "the same measures, our present situations,
 "however, are extremely different. The "scheme which you thought proper to execute
 "has given you admission into Cæsar's coun"cils, and opened a prospect to you of his "future purposes: [this scheme must be
 "the desertion of the Pompeian party, and the
 "surrendry of the fleet to Cæsar] "an advan"tage, most certainly, that must spare you
 "all the uneasiness which attends a state of "doubt and suspense. Whereas, for my"self, as I imagined that Cæsar would, im"mediately after the battle of Pharsalia,
 "have returned into Italy, I hastened thi"ther, in order to encourage and improve
 "that pacific disposition which he had dis"covered, by his generosity, to so many of "his illustrious enemies: By which means,
 "I have ever since been separated from "him by an immense distance. Here, in "truth, I sit, the sad witness of those com"plaints that are poured forth in Rome,
 "and throughout all Italy: Complaints

"which both you and I, according to our "respective powers, might contribute some"what to remove, if Cæsar were present to "support us. I intreat you, then, to com"municate to me, agreeably to your won-
 "ted friendship, all you observe and think
 "concerning the present state of affairs: In "a word, that you would inform me what "we are to expect, and how you would ad"vise me to act. Be assured I shall lay
 "great stress upon your sentiments: And,
 "had I wisely followed those you gave me,
 "in your first letter from Lutetia, I might,
 "without difficulty, have still preserved my
 "dignities."

"Plutarch in Pomp. is very diffuse in "describing this Lady's disappointment and "inexpressible grief: She bitterly complained
 "of her ill destiny, which allied her to Cæsar
 "for first, and afterwards to Pompey, only to "cause the ruin of two illustrious families.
 "The same writer tells us, that the Stoic phi"losopher Cratippus came to pay his compli"ments in Mitylene to Pompey, and that Pom-
 "pey could not refrain from complaining to "him of the dispensations of Providence.
 "The philosopher declined, through politeness
 "and humanity, to enter upon the subject:
 "But he might have answered, says Plutarch,
 "that the disturbed state of Rome
 "required now an absolute monarchy, as a "necessary remedy to the public disorders."
 "And he might have added, "By what proof
 "may we be induced to believe, that, if the "victory had been yours, you would have "made a better use of it than Cæsar?"

the

the weather, and, having increased his fleet with a few gallies, he sailed to *Cilicia*¹, and thence to Cyprus. In this island he had intelligence that the people of Antioch and the Roman citizens, who traded there, had, with joint consent, seized the cattle, and sent Deputies to such of his followers as had taken refuge in the neighbouring places, not to approach that town. L. Lentulus, the late Consul, P. Lentulus Spinther, and some of the other principal men of his party, had been refused admittance into the island of Rhodes, and had been ordered to withdraw immediately. These accounts made him lay aside his design of going into Syria; and the money in the public bank, and borrowing as much more as he could of his friends; providing great quantities of brass for military uses, and raising two thousand soldiers; he set sail for Pelusium, to implore the assistance of Ptolemy, King of Egypt. This Prince, yet in his minority, was there at the head of a considerable army, making war against his sister Cleopatra, whom he had expelled the throne, to which by her father's will she had an equal right with him. Pompey sent to demand his protection, and a safe retreat in Alexandria, in consideration of the friendship that had subsisted between him and his father. The messengers, after discharging their commission, began to converse freely with the King's troops, many of whom had served formerly under Pompey, and had been left in Egypt by Gabinus; and they exhorted them not to despise their old General in his adverse fortune. The King's Ministers, who, during his minority, had the administration in their hands, either out of fear, as they afterwards pretended, that Pompey should debauch the army, and thereby make himself master of Alexandria and all Egypt, or despising his low condition, gave a favourable reception to the Deputies in public, and invited Pompey to court: But dispatched, at the same time Acbillas, Captain of the King's guards, and Septimius, a military Tribune, with secret orders to murder him before he came into the King's presence². They put off from the shore in a small bark, with a few guards, and made towards Pompey's ship. When on board, they accosted him with an air of frankness, and invited him into the boat. Pompey, after taking leave of Cornelia, ordered two Centurions,

Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

Plut. in Pomp.
Appian.
Dio.

¹ Plutarch in Pomp. says, that it was deliberated among his followers, since no province of the empire could afford them protection, to what foreign power it was most expedient to repair: That Pompey was strongly inclined to take refuge in Parthia; that others advised him to put himself under the protection of Juba; but that Theopbanes determined him to go to Egypt. See Lucan, l. viii.

² Plutarch in Pomp. tells us, that one Theodotus, Preceptor to the King, seeing the Council divided in their opinions concerning the reception it was proper to give

Pompey, some advising to receive him with honour, others to order him away immediately, he maintained, "that both proposals were equally dangerous: That to admit Pompey was making him their master, and drawing upon themselves the resentment of Cæsar: And, by not receiving him, they offended the one without obliging the other. That therefore the only expedient left was to let him land, and then kill him, which would be doing Cæsar a good service, and ridding themselves of all apprehensions on Pompey's account; because, said he, dead dogs do not bite."

Y. R. 705. one of his freedmen named Philip, and a slave, to enter the boat with
 B. Chr. him; and, as Achilla gave him his hand to assist him in coming out of 47 the ship, he turned to his wife, and repeated two verses of Sophocles, 404 Cont. signifying, that whoever goes to the Court of a King becomes a slave from that moment. During the passage from the ship to land, nobody spoke to him a single word, or shewed the least mark of friendship or respect; Pompey broke the silence, and, looking Septimius in the face, "methinks," said he, I remember you to have formerly served under me." Septimius gave only a nod with his head, without uttering a word, or denoting the least civility. Whereupon Pompey took out a speech which he had prepared in Greek for the Egyptian King, and began to read it. In this manner they came near the land; and, when Pompey rose to go out, Septimius stabbed him in the back, and was immediately seconded by Achillas. Pompey, without making any resistance, or saying a word, covered his head with his robe, and resigned to fate. At this sad sight, Cornelia and her attendants weighed anchor and made off to sea. His murderers cut off his head, leaving the body on the shore. His freedman Philip stayed by it, and, while he was gathering up some pieces of a broken boat for a pile, he was thus accosted by an old soldier, who had served under Pompey: Who art thou, that art making these sad preparations for the funeral of Pompey the Great? Philip answered him, one of his freedmen. Thou shalt not, replied he, have all this honour to thyself: Let me partake in an action so just and sacred. It will please me, amidst the miseries of my exile, to have touched the body, and assisted at the funeral of the greatest and noblest soldier ROME ever produced. In this manner were the last rites performed to Pompey^b. His ashes, according to Plutarch, were carefully collected, and carried to Cornelia, who deposited them in a vault in his Alban villa^c. The Egyptians, however, afterwards raised a monu-

^b This is Plutarch's story; who does not tell us what became of the two Centurions and the slave Pompey took into the boat with him. Lucan relates that the body was flung over-board into the sea, and dragged out from thence in the night, and burnt by one Cerdas, who had been Pompey's Quæstor in Cyprus. Aurelius Victor de Vir Illust. calls him Servius Cerdas.

"New 'gan the glitt'ring stars to fade away,
 "Before the resy promise of the day,
 "When the pale youth th' unfinished rites
 "forsook,
 "And to the covert of his cave betook.
 "Ah! why thus rashly would thy fears dis-
 "claim
 "That only deed which must record thy
 "name." Lucan, b. viii. v. 1065.

Aurelius Victor and Lucan say, that upon his tomb was inscribed: Hic situs est Magnus Pompeius. And Appian has given us a Greek inscription to this purpose: How poor a tomb covers the man who had so many temples erected to his honour!

^c Every circumstance relating to the end of this great man is uncertain, except what we have in Cæsar's brief account. Lucan supposes that Pompey's ashes remained in Egypt:

"And thou, oh Rome! by whose forgetful
 "hand
 "Altars and temples rear'd to tyrants stand,
 "Canst thou neglect to call thy hero home,
 "And leave his ghost in banishment to roam?
 "What tho' the victor's frown, and thy base
 "fear
 "Bad thee, at first, the pious task forbear;
 "Yet

a monument to him on the place, and adorned it with figures of brass, which, having been defaced by time, and buried almost in sand and rubbish, was sought out and restored by the Emperor Adrian.
Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

Such was the end of Pompey the Great, on the 28th of April, in the 58th year of his age. It did not surprise Cicero, as we find by the short reflection that he makes upon it. “As to Pompey’s end, says he, I never had any doubt about it: For the lost and desperate state of his affairs had so possessed the minds of all the Kings and States abroad, that, whithersoever he went, I took it for granted that this would be his fate.” How happy had it been for him to have died in that sickness,

VOL. IV.

U

ness,

“Yet now, at least, oh! let him now re“turn,

“And rest with honour in a Roman urn.

“Nor let mistaken superstition dread,

“On such occasions, to disturb the dead:

“Oh! would commanding Rome my hand “employ,

“This impious task should be perform’d with “joy.

“How would I fly to tear him from that “tomb,

“And bear his ashes in my bosom home!”

B. viii. l. 114.

* Cicero adds: I cannot, however, help grieving at it; for I knew him to be an honest, grave, and worthy man: Hominem enim integrum, et castum, et gravem cognovi. “This, says Dr. Middleton, was the short and true character of the man from one who perfectly knew him; not heightened as we sometimes find it by the shining colours of his eloquence, nor depressed by the darker strokes of his resentment.” Yet the same ingenious writer has thought proper to draw more at large the character of a man who was Cicero’s God upon earth, and indeed the above short and true character is but a scanty panegyric for one in Pompey’s high station: And, as this history includes a sort of critical examination of the life of Cicero, we will not scruple to present the reader with it, together with some short observations:

“Pompey had early acquired the surname of Great, by that sort of merit, which, from the constitution of the Republic, necessarily made him great; a fame and success in war superior to what Rome had ever known in the most celebrated of her Generals.” [The surname of Great, according to Plutarch, was a compliment of Sylla, after the good services Pompey had done him in Italy, Sicily, and Africa. Tho’ young Pompey had been bred to war in the camp of his father, a man of great military capacity, and had shewn his talents in the support of Sylla’s party, he had not yet properly acquired or merited that surname by a success in war, superior to what Rome had ever known. Livy, or his abbreviator, says, that this surname was given him after his victories in Asia.] “He had triumphed at three several times over the three different parts of the known world, Europe, Asia, Africa; and, by his victories, had almost doubled the extent, as well as the revenues of the Roman dominion; for, as he declared to the people, on his return from the Mithridatic war, he had found the lesser Asia the boundary, but left it the middle of their empire.” [If Pompey made this declaration, he was guilty of an unpardonable gasconade, for he added to the Roman empire only Pontus, Bithynia, and Syria: But, if he did not double the revenues of the Commonwealth, he greatly multiplied his own; for he received every month from Antiochus, King of Cappadocia, alone, above 6393 l. which was almost all that poor King could raise. See Ad Att. vi. 1] “He was six years older than Cæsar; and, while Cæsar, immersed in pleasures, oppressed with debts, and suspected by all honest men, was hardly able to shew his head, Pompey was flourishing in the height of power and glory, and by the consent of all parties placed at the head of the Republic.” [This is not a fair representation of the fortunes of these two men: Pompey was raised to all his power and wealth against the will of the Senate; who was ever envious and jealous of him: And Cæsar not only dared to shew his head, but was ever so much the darling of the city, that 132.

Middl. p.

Ad Att.

xi. 6.

Y. R. 705. neis, when all Italy was putting up vows and prayers for his safety?
 Bel. Chit. Or, if he had fallen by the chance of war on the plains of Pharfalia, in 47. the
 404 Conf.

that he carried every thing he stood for, by almost the unanimous votes of the people, notwithstanding the opposition of the same Senate.] "This was the point that his ambition seemed to aim at, to be the first man in Rome; the Leader, not the tyrant of Rome." For he more than once had it in his power to have made himself the master of it without any risk, if his virtue, or his phlegm, at least, had not restrained him." [This is a groundless assertion. Pompey, after the Sertorian war, kept his army in Italy; and so did Crassus to check him; till they both disbanded their troops by agreement: Neither of them dared then to act the tyrant. After the Mithridatic war, the opposition Cæsar and Metellus, who openly courted Pompey, met with, plainly shewed how jealous the city was of Pompey's power: And that same jealousy prevailed after his arrival, notwithstanding all the favour and credit his victories had procured him. He could not depend upon his army in an enterprise against his country, when he had no motive of revenge to stimulate them with, nor indeed any other that he could avow with common decency. Cæsar and Crassus were willing to associate with him against the aristocracy, but not to become his servants.] "but he lived in a perpetual expectation of receiving, from the gift of the people, what he did not care to seize by force; and, by fomenting the disorders of the city, hoped to drive them to the necessity of creating him Dictator. It is an observation of all the historians, that, while Cæsar made no difference of power, whether it was conferred or usurped; whether over those who loved, or those who feared him; Pompey seemed to value none but what was offered; nor to have any desire to govern, but with the good-will of the governed." [Vellius, ii 29, says indeed of Pompey, Potentia quæ honoris causa ad eum deferretur, non ut ab eo occuparetur, cupidissimus: But I do not see any difference between Pompey and Cæsar in this respect. As long as power was offered to Pompey, he did not undertake to seize it by an armed force; neither did Cæsar; but no sooner did Pompey foresee that Cæsar would become his equal, than he armed, illegally, the whole empire, to preserve his own superior power: And this is allowed by the same historian: Civis in toga, nisi uti crederetur, ne quem haberet parum, modestissimus. A power, maintained all along by the most open and scandalous bribery, cannot be deemed a power offered by the good-will of the governed: And a man who employs such means, in defiance of the laws, cannot, with any propriety, be called a man of integrity, Virum integrum cognovi.] "What leisure he found from his wars he employed in the study of polite letters, and especially of eloquence, in which he would have acquired great fame, if his genius had not drawn him to the more dazzling glory of arms. Yet he pleaded several causes with applause, in the defence of his friends and clients; and some of them in conjunction with Cicero. His language was copious and elevated; his sentiments just; his voice sweet; his action noble and full of dignity. But his talents were better formed for arms than the gown; for though in both he observed the same discipline; a perpetual modesty, temperance, and gravity of outward behaviour; yet, in the licence of camps, the example was more rare and striking. His person was extremely graceful, and inspiring respect; yet with an air of reserve and haughtiness, which became the General better than the citizen. His parts were plausible rather than great; specious rather than penetrating; and his views of politics but narrow; for his chief instrument of governing was dissimulation; yet he had not always the art to conceal his real sentiments. As he was a better soldier than a statesman, so what he gained in the camp he usually lost in the city; and, though adored when abroad, was often affronted and mortified at home; till the imprudent opposition of the Senate drove him to that alliance with Crassus and Cæsar, which proved fatal both to himself and to the Republic. He took in these two not as the partners, but the ministers rather of his power;" [They had more interest in the city than he, and he could not compass his ends without their assistance: They were therefore necessary allies, the defence of his country's liberty, he had died still glorious, though unfortunate; but, as if he had been reserved for an example of the instability of human greatness. he, who a few days before commanded Kings and Consuls, and all the noblest of Rome, was sentenced to die by a Council of slaves; murdered by a base deserter; cast out naked and headless on the Egyptian strand; and, when the whole earth, as Velleius says, *had scarce been sufficient for his victories, could not find a spot upon it for a grave*¹.

Y. R. 705.
Bet. Chr.
47.
404 Conf.

U 2

Lentulus,

allies, not ministers of his power.] "That, by giving them some share with him, he might make his own authority uncontrollable: He had no reason to apprehend that they could ever prove his rivals; since neither of them had any credit or character of that kind, which alone could raise them above the laws; a superior fame and experience in war, with the militia of the empire at their devotion: All this was purely his own; till, by cherishing Cæsar, and throwing into his hands the only things which he wanted, arms and military command, he made him at last too strong for himself, and never began to fear him till it was too late." [That Pompey helped Cæsar, during the triumvirate, will be easily granted, but that he owed all to Pompey is not true: And Pompey was at least as much indebted to Cæsar, as Cæsar to him. Would Pompey have condescended to marry the daughter of the man whom he suspected to have debauched his wife Mucia, the mother of Cnæus and Sextus Pompey, and whom for this reason, during the civil war, he used to call Ægisthus, if his alliance had not been deemed absolutely necessary to support his credit: And indeed he could never have supported himself in that long reign of his during the Gallic war without Cæsar's interest. This is evident from the whole history of the times.] "Cicero warmly dissuaded both his union and his breach with Cæsar; [So Cicero says in his second Philippic; but his letters shew that he greatly approved of the breach between Cæsar and Pompey, till the prospect was darkened, and the civil war was ready to break out with great advantage on Cæsar's side. If Cicero did not approve of their union at first, he cemented it afterwards, and was very subservient to the confederate Chiefs. See his apologetic letter, cited Vol. iii. p. 509.] "And, after the rupture, as warmly still, the thought of giving him battle: If any of these counsels had been followed, Pompey had preserved his life and honour, and the Republic its liberty." [Pace opus est: Ex victoria cum multa malis, tum certe tyrannus exisset. Ad Att. vii. 5. Lepugna, inquis, potius, quam servias: Ut quid? Si victus eris, proscribere? Si viciss, tamen servias? Ad Att. vii. 7. Hoc Cnæus noster cum antea nunquam, tum in hac causa minime cogitavit; beata et honesta civitas ut esset. Dominatio quaesita ab utroque est.—Genus illud Sullani regni jampridem appetitur, [a Pompeio] multis, qui una sunt, cupientibus. Ad Att. viii. 11. It appears then that Cicero was not of Dr. Middleton's opinion. He thought also that Pompey's victory would have been a very cruel one: Tanta erat in illis crudelitas, ut non nominatim, sed generatim proscriptio esset informata; ut jam omnium iudicio constitutum esset, omnium vestrum bona prædam esse illius victoriae; vestrum planè dico: Nunquam enim de te ipso, nisi crudelissimè, cogitatum est. Ad Att. xi. 6.] "But he was urged to his fate by a natural superstition, and attention to those vain auguries with which he was flattered by all the Haruspices: He had seen the same temper in Marius and Sylla, and observed the happy effects of it: But they assumed it only out of policy, he out of principle. They used to animate their soldiers, when they had found a probable opportunity of fighting; but he, against all prudence and probability, was encouraged by it to fight to his own ruin." [I should think that Pompey was not altogether so credulous as Dr. Middleton makes him. Cicero, in his Letters, and Cæsar, in his Commentaries, assign other reasons for Pompey's confidence, as we have seen above: And these reasons influenced not only Pompey, but Labiens and all the Generals in his army, whom we cannot suppose to have been all addicted, in a great degree, to superstition.

¹ Qui si ante biennium quam ad armatum est, perfectis muneribus theatri et aliorum operum quæ ei circumdedit gravissima tentatus

Y. R. 705.
Ber. Chr.
47
404 Cons. Lentulus, the late Consul, landed in Egypt a few days after his General, and was immediately seized and put to death. Plutarch, or the author whom he copied, to make his story more interesting, supposes that Lentulus landed just upon the spot where the body of Pompey had been burned the day before; and, seeing a little pile which yet smoked, broke out into these words, "Who is the wretch to whom are paid these last offices? Perhaps, alas! it is you, great Pompey!" Lentulus Spinther is said to have found in Egypt the same fate.

Cato, conjecturing that Pompey had retired to Egypt or Lybia, took that way. He first sailed from Corcyra to Patrae, where he picked up Faustus Sylla, Petreius, and some other fugitives. Then, doubling the cape of Malta, and coasting the isle of Crete, he came to Palinurus, a promontory of the Cyrenaica: Whence he marched to Cyrene, which opened its gates to him. Here he was met by Cornelia and Sextus Pompeius, Pompey's youngest son: Who had first fled to Cyprus, but, finding themselves too near Egypt, and fearing lest they should meet with Cæsar, steered towards the West, and put in at the same place to which Cato had brought the fleet. The news of Pompey's death occasioned a fresh division among his fugitive friends: Many who were attached personally to him, and had held out in hopes of seeing him again at their head, determined to have recourse to the Conqueror's clemency. Cornelia returned to Italy, well knowing that she had nothing to apprehend from Cæsar. Cato, with Pompey's two sons, remained in Africa and marched by land to join Varus and Juba: And we shall see immediately how they renewed the war, and exposed the Conqueror to new per tiques and dangers.

tentatus valetudine decessisset in Campania (quo quidem tempore universa Italia vota pro salute ejus, primo omnium civium suscepit) defuisset fortunæ destruendi ejus locus; et quam apud superos habuerat magnitudinem, illibatam detulisset ad inferos. Vell. Pat. ii. 48. Princeps Romani nominis, imperio arbitrioque Ægyptii mancipii, jugulatus est. Hic post tres consulatus et totidem triumphos, domitumque terrarum orbem, sanctissimi ac præstantissimi viri, in id evecti super quod adscendi non potest, duodesexagesimum annum agentis, pridie natalem ipsius, vitæ fuit exitus: In tantum in illo viro à se discordante fortuna, ut cui modo ad victoriam terra defuerat, deesset ad sepulturam. Id. ii. 53.

ÆGYPTVS ANTIQA.

LIBYA

C H A P. VII.

Cæsar follows Pompey into Egypt. The Alexandrian war. The war against Pharnaces. Illyricum saved by Vatinius. Cæsar returns to Italy. Cicero's disquietudes at Brundisium during Cæsar's absence. Cæsar puts an end to the disturbances raised by Dolabella in the city: He quells a mutiny in his army, and sets out for Africa.

CÆSAR, sensible that all the hopes of the vanquished party were lodged in the person of Pompey, pursued him with the utmost diligence at the head of his cavalry, having first given orders to one of his legions to follow. He heard at Amphipolis, that Pompey had left Greece: But, having no ships, he was under the necessity of marching by land to the streights of the Hellepont, that he might only have that short passage by sea into Asia. Here, while he was crossing in a small vessel after his troops, he fell in with a squadron of the Pompeian fleet, commanded by Cassius, consisting, according to Suetonius, of ten ships of war^m, and which was sailing to the Bosphorus. Cæsar, making up to him, ordered him to surrender; he obeyed; and, coming on board the little boat, threw himself at Cæsar's feet. Cæsar, with these ships, and those he found on the coast of Asia, continued his route by sea. At Ephesus, he saved a second time the treasure of Diana's temple, which J. Ampius was going to plunder for Pompey. After a short stay in Asia, hearing that Pompey had been at Cyprus, and thence conjecturing that he had gone for Egypt, on account of the interest he had in that kingdom, and the advantage it could afford him; he sailed first to Rhodes, where having joined to his fleet the Rhodian gallies, he set out for Egypt with two legions, one of which he had ordered to follow him from Thessaly; the other he had detached from Fufius Calenus in Achaia. These two legions did not make up above three thousand two hundred foot, and eight hundred horse: But Cæsar depended on the reputation of his exploits, and the terror of his name.

Cæsar, on his arrival at Alexandria, was informed of Pompey's death: And, according to some authors was presented by the King's order with the head and ring of his rivalⁿ. These sad remains of so great a

Y. R. 705.
Bef. Chu.

47.
104 Conf.

Suet. in
Cæf. 63.
Dio, l. xlii.
App. 482.

^m Appian says 70. It may be observed, that authors have distinguished this Cassius from the Cassius who was one of the conspirators against Cæsar.

ⁿ Plutarch in Pomp. tells us, that Theodotus, a Greek rhetorician, one of the King's Counsellors, who had determined the Council to kill Pompey, was charged to carry Cæsar this present, and to compliment him on the success of his arms; and that Brutus, after Cæsar's death, caused him to be executed for it with the most cruel torments. Aurelius Victor, de Vir Illustr. c. 77, says it was presented by Achillas. Lucan says,

Dira fatelles

Colla gerit Magni, Phario velamine testa.

l. ix.

man,

Y. R. 704.
Bef. Chr.
48.
403 Conf.

Appian,
448.

Cæf. de
Bell. Civ.
Com. l.
iii.

man, with whom he had lived so long in the strictest friendship, as the husband of his beloved Julia, and his partner in power, very naturally drew tears from him*. He caused the head to be burned with the most costly perfumes, and placed the ashes in a small temple, which he dedicated to Nemesis, the avenging power of cruel and inhuman deeds. He took up his quarters in the royal palace, where he kept a strict guard: For upon his landing he had been received in a clamorous manner by the garrison, and he observed that the mob appeared dissatisfied to see the fasces carried before him, which they interpreted as a degradation of the royal authority. During several days disturbances and tumults happened, and many Roman soldiers were murdered in different parts of the city. The Etesian winds, which blew at that time, were contrary to any passage by sea from Alexandria^p: And Cæsar thinking it belonged to him, as chief of the Roman Empire, to take cognisance of the quarrel between Ptolemy and his sister Cleopatra, which had broken out into an open war; he began to interfere in this dispute, not foreseeing the many difficulties and hazards in which this conduct was to involve him.

Plut. in Ant.

Ptolemy Auletes, who died in the year 702, left four children: Two sons, who were both called Ptolemy; and two daughters, the famous Cleopatra and Arsinoë. According to the established custom in the Ptolemean family, he had ordered that his eldest son should marry his eldest daughter, and reign with her. For the more certain execution of this his will, he implored the protection of the Roman people; and sent a copy of it by ambassadors to Rome to be deposited in the public treasury; which, however, in the confusion of the times, had been left with Pompey. The original was kept at Alexandria. The brother and sister did not live long in harmony: Cleopatra was seventeen years old, and her brother only thirteen; and she claimed a right to govern her young consort. On the other hand, the guardians of the young Prince, the chief of whom was the eunuch Pothinus, were ambitious to govern under his name and authority. This division had not yet produced an open rupture, when Pompey's eldest son came to Alexandria to demand succours for his father. Cleopatra even then is said to have prostituted her person to this young Roman to gain Pompey's interest: But Pothinus succeeded better, and obtained at the Senate held at Thessalonica a determination in favour of Ptolemy. Cleopatra was banished Egypt, and forced to retire with her sister Arsinoë into Syria, where she assembled an army, and advanced as far as Pelusium. Ptolemy marched with his troops to oppose her, and the two armies were in sight of each other near mount Casius, on the borders of Egypt, when Pompey came there to meet his unhappy fate. Things remained in the same situation till Cæsar's arrival; and he admonished the contending parties, that it was their duty to remit their respective pretensions to his determination. They both immediately repaired to him; and Cleopatra Y. R. 705. Def Chr. seems to have dismissed her army, for we hear no more mention made of it. We are told by some historians, that, in order to get into Alexandria, which was in the possession of her enemies, she went on board a small vessel, and, landing in the evening near the palace, was wrapped up in a bundle of cloaths, and thus carried by one of her attendants into Cæsar's bed-chamber. The day after, Cæsar sent for the King, who, being strangely surprised to see his sister with the Consul of Rome, fled from the palace to the market-place, crying out that he was betrayed; and, in the excess of his grief and passion, tore the diadem from his head. He was seized by the Roman soldiers, and brought back; but this occasioned a great alarm in the city, and, the people having assembled tumultuously about the palace, Cæsar signified to them that his intention was no other than to execute the late King's will, and to declare the brother and sister King and Queen of Egypt. Dio adds, that he promised also to give the isle of Cyprus, an ancient appendage of the kingdom of Egypt, to the younger Ptolemy and Arfinoë, his sister: But this circumstance is very improbable: And the authority of this historian is not much to be depended on, when unsupported by other testimonies. 40. Conf. Plot. in Cæs. Flor. l. iv. c. 2. Luc. n. b. x. Dio l. xlii.

* It is positive, that these tears were counterfeit; and Strabo takes occasion from them to rail bitterly at Cæsar. See the end of the ninth book.

^p The Etesian winds are northerly winds, which begin to blow about the summer solstice, and do not cease till about the end of August.

Pothinus, Governor and chief Minister to the King, Cleopatra's declared enemy, complained bitterly to his friends, that the King should be treated in this manner; and, finding them disposed to support him, he privately sent for the army at Pelusium, and gave the command of it to Achillas, the same who murdered Pompey, and was then Captain of the King's guards. This army was numerous and formidable, and Cæsar's forces were insufficient to keep the field against it. The only course therefore left for him was to secure the most convenient ports of the town, till he was informed of the designs of the Egyptian General. He admonished the King to send some persons of weight to forbid his approach. Dioscorides and Serapion, accordingly, who had both been ambassadors at Rome, and in great credit with Ptolemy the father, were deputed to him: But no sooner did they come into his presence, than, without giving them a hearing, or inquiring after their message, he ordered them to be seized and put to death. One was killed upon the spot, and the other, having received a dangerous wound, was carried off for dead by his attendants. Such an enormous behaviour was a warning to Cæsar. He took care to secure the King's person, whose name would authorise his proceedings, and make Achillas and his associates pass among the people for rebels to their Prince. Cæs. de Bell. Civ. Com. lib. iii.

Achillas's army consisted of eighteen thousand foot and two thousand horse, all brave and experienced soldiers. Many of them were Romans, who had been brought into the country by Gabinus, when he came to settle Auletes on the throne; and who, having married and settled: Cæs. de Bell. Civ. Com. l. iii.

Y. R. 705. settled at Alexandria, were devoted to the Ptolemean interest: The
 Bel. Chr. others were mercenary troops from Syria and Cilicia, and fugitive slaves, 47. who found protection in Egypt by entering into the service. These 404 Conf. troops were accustomed to give the law to their Sovereign: Cæsar tells us, that they had often taken upon them to put to death the King's Ministers, plunder the rich, invest the royal palace, banish some and send for others home, with other liberties of the like nature. This description of the Alexandrian militia accounts for the continual changes remarkable in the government of that city. Such will always be the fate of Princes, who chuse to rely upon a mercenary soldiery rather than the affections of their subjects. Achillas, trusting to the valour of this army, and despising the handful of men Cæsar had brought with him, quickly made himself master of Alexandria, the palace only excepted, where Cæsar had fortified himself, and which the Egyptian General attacked briskly, though without success. The greatest efforts were made on the side of the harbour: Had Achillas got possession of it and the shipping, he might have cut Cæsar off from all communication with the sea, and consequently from all hopes of receiving supplies either of victuals or forces. This made both the Egyptians and the Romans exert themselves with incredible vigour. At length Cæ- sar carried his point, and not only burnt all the vessels in the harbour, which amounted to fifty-five galleys, with twenty-two guard-ships, but also those that were in the arsenals: In all one hundred and ten. The flames unfortunately extended themselves to the Alexandrian library:
 And that valuable monument of the magnificence of the Ptolemy's, and of their taste for learning, was almost wholly consumed⁹.

Cæf. de
 Bell. Civ.
 Com. lib.
 iii.

Cæsar, during the action, transported a body of troops into the isle of Pbaros, so called from a tower of prodigious height and wonderful workmanship, built by Ptolemy Philadelphus. This island lay over-against Alexandria, and both formed and commanded the port, the entrance on each side of it being very narrow. A mole or causey, nine hundred paces long, ran through the middle of the port: At the two ends of this mole were two bridges, through the arches of which vessels could pass from one side of the port to the other. Many Egyp- tian sea-faring men had built houses in the Pbaros, and lived chiefly by pillaging the ships that were thrown in upon their coast. By getting possession of this place, Cæsar secured the reception of the supplies he had sent for from all sides. In other quarters of the town the fight was maintained till night with equal advantage, and little loss, neither party losing ground. Cæsar's next care was to make fortifications round the King's palace and the theatre adjoining to it, of which he made a kind of citadel: And he thus put it out of the power of the ⁹ According to Livy, cited by Seneca de tranquill. anim. c. 9. there were in this library four hundred thousand volumes. According to Aulus Gellius, vi. 17, and Ammianus Marcellinus, xxiv. 17, seven hundred thousand.

Alexandrians to force him to a battle against his will. He then employed himself in inclosing the narrowest part of the town, which lay between the port and a lake towards the South : By which means he could have provision of water and forage. On the other side the Alexandrians were extremely active and industrious in making all sorts of preparations proper for their own defence, and for forcing Cæsar's quarters.

Y. R. 705.
Bel. Chr.
47.
405 Conf.

While these works were carrying on, Cæsar ordered Potbinus to be put to death, having discovered a secret correspondence between him and Achillas, whom he encouraged to a vigorous prosecution of his enterprise. According to Plutarch, he had formed a design of killing Cæsar at table ; and the conspiracy was discovered by a slave, whose exceeding timidity prompting him to be continually upon the watch, and to listen at every door, he had overheard Potbinus and his associates. About the same time Arfinoë, the youngest sister, found means to escape from the palace to Achillas's camp, under the conduct of Ganymed, her Governor ; hoping, in such confusion, to get into the throne herself, in the place of Cleopatra. But she soon disagreed with Achillas, and they endeavoured to supplant one another, and to gain, by bribes and promises, the affection of the mercenary soldiers. At length Arfinoë prevailed, and caused Achillas to be slain : And Ganymed, under the name and authority of Arfinoë, was vested with the supreme power, and proved not less bold and enterprising than his predecessor.

Cæf. de
Bel. Civ.
Com. l. iii.

Alexandria was supplied with water from the Nile : But, this water being generally muddy and unwholesome, every house was provided with a cistern, where it remained till it became fit to be drunk. Ganymed, being master of that part of the town where the river lay, and consequently of all the conduits, he undertook to taint all the cisterns in Cæsar's quarter, by pouring into the aqueducts a great quantity of sea-water, raised by the help of machines : And, at the same time, to preserve his own untainted, the aqueducts on his side were stopped up. The cisterns in the nearest houses soon began to taste saltier than usual, while no change could be observed in those that were more remote. However, the saltness soon became general, and the water was everywhere unfit for use. The Roman army, greatly discouraged at this unexpected event, began to complain against Cæsar for not abandoning the place ; but he soon found means to remove the inconveniency that so much alarmed them, by sinking a great number of wells ; and, with little difficulty, obstructed the laborious attempts of the Alexandrians.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR, Dictator II.
M. ANTONIUS, Mag. Eq.

Y. R. 706.
Bel. Chr.
46.
405 Conf.

During these transactions the thirty-seventh legion, composed of Pompey's veterans, who had surrendered to Cæsar after the battle of Pharfalia,
VOL. IV. X

Hirtius de
Bell. Alex.

Y. R. 706. Pharfalia, were driven upon the coast of Africa, a little above Alexan- Bef. Chr. dria: where, being detained for several days by an easterly wind, and
 46. being pressed for want of water, they sent to inform him of their ar-40; Conf. rival and situation. Cæsar, upon this intelligence, immediately went on board one of the ships in the harbour, and ordered the whole fleet to follow, leaving the land-forces to defend the works. Being arrived at a port of the coast called Cherfenesus, he sent some mariners on shore to fetch water. These venturing too far into the country, for the sake of plunder, were intercepted by the enemy's horse, and from them the Egyptians heard that Cæsar himself was on board without any soldiers.
 Upon this information, they thought that Fortune had thrown a fair opportunity in their way of attempting something with success. They got together all the ships that were in a condition to sail, and met Cæ- jar on his return, at four in the afternoon. The Roman General was very desirous to avoid an engagement so late in the day, which probably would be continued in the dark, when the Alexandrians would have the advantage by the knowledge they had of the coast; and he would not be able to encourage his men, and be witness of their behaviour, a circumstance upon which he always greatly relied. He therefore drew all his ships as near the shore as possible, where he imagined the enemy would not venture to follow him. But, contrary to his inclination, he was engaged to fight by the temerity of a Rhodian galley of the right wing, which stood out at a considerable distance from the rest, and was immediately attacked by four gallies and several open barks. Cæsar, not to suffer the disgrace of seeing her sunk before his eyes, was obliged to advance to her relief. The Rhodians, distinguished at all times by their valour and experience in naval engagements, exerted themselves on this occasion to the utmost, and gained a complete victory. One four-benched galley was taken, another was sunk, a third was disabled, and the whole fleet would have been destroyed, if night had not put a stop to the chase. Cæsar, after giving this defeat to the enemy, took his transports in tow, and returned to Alexandria.

Hirt. de bell. Alex. The Alexandrians were much disheartened at this bad success, and at finding themselves so much outdone by the Rhodian mariners. But Ga- nymed raised their dejected spirits by the strongest assurances of his being able to fit out, in a very short time, a fleet much superior to that which had been lately defeated. Having gathered all the ships stationed at the mouth of the Nile, for receiving the customs, he opposed again to the Romans twenty-two four-benched gallies and five quinqueremes, with a great number of open barks. Cæsar's fleet consisted in all of nine Rhodian gallies, (for, of the ten he had brought with him, one had been shipwrecked on the coast of Egypt) eight from Pontus, five from Lycia, and twelve from Asia. Of these, however, only ten were quadriremes, and five quinqueremes: The rest were of an inferior bulk, and for the most part without decks. Cæsar, notwithstanding this inferiority of his

his fleet in number and strength, resolved to give the enemy battle; and, sailing round the Pbaros into that part of the port which the Alexandrians were masters of, he drew up his ships in the following order. His nine Rhodian gallies he placed in his right wing: The eight of Pontus in the left; leaving between them a space of four hundred paces to serve for the extending and working the vessels: And the rest of the fleet he destined as a reserve, and disposed them behind the two wings in such a manner that every ship followed that to which she was appointed to give succour. The Alexandrians, who came forth with great confidence, had placed their twenty-two quadrirèmes in front: Their other ships were arranged behind in a second line: And they had a number of smaller vessels which carried fire and burning weapons, by which they meant to strike a terror into the Romans. This regular disposition did not hold long. Between the two fleets, there were certain flats; and each side hesitated which should first pass them: Because, in case of any misfortune, they would be a great obstruction to a retreat; and it was difficult to draw up in order of battle beyond them in the presence of an enemy. Euphranor, the Rhodian Admiral, a man of distinguished courage and experience, perceiving Cæsar's perplexity, addressed him to this effect: "Great General! it appears you are apprehensive lest by passing these shallows first, you should be forced to engage, before your whole fleet is drawn up: We beg of you to put your confidence in us, and we promise to maintain the fight till the whole fleet gets clear of the shallows. It is greatly dishonourable and afflicting, that the enemy should so long continue in our fight with that air of triumph." Cæsar, encouraging him in his design, gave the signal of battle: And four Rhodian ships, having passed the flats, were immediately assailed on all sides by the Alexandrians; but the Rhodians worked their vessels with so much skill, and disengaged themselves with so much address, that they never suffered any of the enemy's ships either to strike their flanks with their beaks, or to run along-side of them in order to sweep away or break their oars: They always found means to oppose beak to beak. Thus they maintained the fight till the rest of the fleet came up: And, art now becoming useless, the whole success depended upon valour. Both sides fought in sight of their friends at land; who, laying aside their work, and all thoughts of attack or defence, gave their whole attention to what was going forward at sea. The Romans risked more than the Alexandrians by this battle: A defeat would have deprived them of all resource either by sea or land, and victory would not

¹ This brave Admiral was soon after sent out to cruise off Canopus; an expedition in which he perished. He had begun an engagement with some Alexandrian ships, and had sunk the first he attacked; but, pursuing another too far, and, not being sustained by the rest of the fleet, his galley was surrounded and shattered to pieces. Hirt., de Bell. Alex.

Y. R. 706
Def. Cle.
46.
405 Cons.

much better their condition : The Alexandrians, on the contrary, if success attended them, gained every thing, and though defeated, could still maintain the war. On the side of the Romans, every thing depended on the bravery of a few : This Cæsar had often before the battle represented to his officers and soldiers, and they now repeated it to one another. They were animated by the difficulty and importance of their situation, and fought with such determined resolution, that neither the art nor efforts of the Alexandrians, nor the multitude of their ships and boats, could any ways avail them. In this action the Romans sustained not the loss of one vessel : But two Alexandrian gallies, one of five benches of oars, and another of two, with all the soldiers and mariners on board, were taken, and three others were sunk. The rest fled towards the town, and took shelter under the mole and forts, whither the Romans could not pursue them.

Hist. de
Bell. Alex.

Cæsar, to deprive the enemy of this resource, resolved to make himself master once more of the mole and the island, which had been retaken by the Egyptians, while he was employed in the more necessary works within the town. For the execution of this design, he put into boats and small vessels ten cohorts, a select body of light-armed infantry, and such of the Gallie cavalry as he thought most proper for his purpose, and sent them against the island. He himself, at the same time, to cause a diversion, attacked it on the other side with his fleet. The attack was brisk, and the Pharians defended themselves at first with vigour. They annoyed the Romans from the tops of their houses, and gallantly maintained their ground along the shore ; which was in most parts steep and craggy, and which, in the places of easier access, was skilfully defended by small boats properly stationed for the purpose. But when, after examining the approaches and shallows, a few of the Romans had found means to land, they were followed with so much expedition by others, that the Pharians, abandoning their ships and coast, fled into the town. There they might easily have defended themselves ; for the buildings were very high, and joined together so as to form a strong wall, and the Romans had neither ladders, nor any other instruments for assault : But such was their consternation, that they dared not to engage from a height of thirty feet ; and, throwing themselves from the mole into the sea, they endeavoured to gain Alexandria, though above eight hundred paces distant. Many were slain, and six hundred were made prisoners in this fight. Cæsar gave the plunder of the place to the soldiers, and demolished all the houses. The castle, however, at the end of the bridge next the island, he fortified and placed a garrison in it. The other castle, which was next the town, was much the strongest, and was still held by the Alexandrians. This he attacked the next day ; because, by getting possession of both forts, he would be entirely master of the port, and would be able to prevent any sudden incursions. By means of the arrows and darts launched from his engines, he quickly forced the the garrison to abandon the place and retire into the town; and, having landed upon the mole three cohorts, which was all that the spot could well contain, he disposed the rest of his troops in his ships to sustain them. Things being in this forwardness, he ordered the arch of the bridge that joined the mole to the town, and through which the Alexandrians used to send their fire-boats against his vessels, to be entirely stopped up; and, at the same time, he began to raise a fortification upon the bridge. The Alexandrians, however, brought all the troops they could out of the town before this fortification could be finished, and posted them in an open area before it; and, having placed also a number of transports all along the mole, they began to attack the Romans by launching their javelins. While Cæsar, attentive to what passed, was exhorting and directing his troops, a number of rowers and mariners of his fleet, quitting their ships, threw themselves upon the mole, partly out of curiosity, and partly to have some share in the action. At first, with their slings, they forced the enemy's ships from the mole, and seemed to do great service; but, soon after, when a few of the Alexandrians, having ventured out upon the mole, attacked them in flank, they fled with precipitation. The Alexandrians, encouraged by this success, landed in greater numbers, and vigorously pushed the Romans, who were now in great confusion. Those that were in the galleys, perceiving this, removed the ladders, and put off from the mole to prevent the enemy's boarding them. The three cohorts, who were fortifying and defending the bridge at the head of the mole, where they had much business upon their hands, hearing a clamour behind them, and seeing the general rout of their friends, immediately interrupted their work; and, fearing to be surrounded, and precluded from a retreat, ran with all speed towards the galleys. Some, getting on board the nearest vessels, overloaded and sunk them; others, making head against the enemy, and, uncertain what course to take, were cut to pieces: A few, throwing their bucklers over their shoulders, swam to the ships which were at the smallest distance from them. Cæsar endeavoured to stop his men, and bring them back to the defence of the works; but, finding them giving ground universally, he retreated to his own galley; whither such a multitude followed and crowded after him, that it was impossible to work her. Foreseeing, therefore, what must happen, he flung himself into the sea, and swam to a ship that lay at some distance. Hence, dispatching boats to succour his men, he

P. R. 706.
Bef. Ch. 46.
405 Conf.

*Some ancient writers have finely embellished this story, and M. Crevier has extracted from them what is most curious in their several tales: "It is remarkable, that, having stripped off his coat of mail, (his General's cloak) which would have "been an incumbrance to him in swimming, "he drew it after him with his teeth, to prevent its falling into the enemy's hands; "and, as he had some papers in his left hand, "he constantly held it above water, at the same time swimming with the right, by which

Y. R. 706. he preserved a few. His own galley perished, with all that was on Bef. Chr. board; and he lost in this action four hundred legionary soldiers, and
 46. somewhat above that number of rowers and sailors. The Alexandrians
 425 Conf. secured the fort by strong works, and a great number of engines; and, having cleared away the stones with which Cæsar had filled up the arch of the bridge, they had, thereby, a free passage into that part of the port where Cæsar's fleet lay.

This misfortune, far from discouraging the Romans, served only the more to exasperate them; and they made their enemies sensible of the spirit and fury that transported them, by pushing on their attacks with greater vigour; insomuch that their General was more employed in restraining their ardour, than in inciting them to action.

The Alexandrians who now began to think it would be of great service to them to have their King at their head, sent Deputies to Cæsar, beseeching him to restore him to them, and representing it as the only means to bring about an accommodation. Cæsar, perfectly well acquainted with the false and perfidious character of the Alexandrians, was not to be imposed upon by this plausible pretext. He determined, however, to comply with their demands, being sensible that the whole hazard was to them and their King; for, as to what concerned himself, if, at first, he thought it might be of service to him to detain the young Prince, in order to prevent a rebellion; now that it was not only broken out, but had been obstinately maintained for several months, such a prisoner created him more trouble than real advantage; and he perceived, that it would be more for his honour to make war with the King himself, than with Arsinoë, and her eunuch Ganymed. He therefore, having exhorted Ptolemy to put an end to the misfortunes of his country, and to save from total ruin its metropolis, took him by the hand to conduct him out of the palace. The young Prince, who was already an adept in the art of dissimulation, entreated Cæsar with tears not to send him back; for that he took more pleasure in his company than in the possession of his Crown. Cæsar told him, that, if such were his real sentiments, they should quickly see one another again. Ptolemy took his leave, and had no sooner regained his liberty, than he carried on the war with so much fierceness, that the tears he shed at parting appeared to be tears of joy. Cæsar's officers and soldiers were highly diverted with the

“ which means the papers were not wetted.

“ However, his coat of armour got from “ him, which proved of service to him:

“ For, being purple, and distinguishable by

“ the brightness of its colour, it sustained

“ all the fury of the enemy's shot, at the “ same time that Cæsar saved himself with-

“ out being observed or known. The Alex-

“ andrians took it, and made it the princi“ pal ornament in the trophy they erected “ on the place of the engagement.” The authorities for these particulars are Suetonius, Florus, Plutarch, Appian, and Dio. But no authorities can make one believe, that Cæsar carried his papers upon the mole of Alexan- drina, or in plunging into the sea did not wet them. The other circumstances are equally absurd.

the event; imagining, that, through his easiness of temper, he had let himself be duped by a boy.

Cæsar, in the beginning of this Alexandrian war, had sent Mitbridates of Pergamus^{*}, to raise troops in Syria and Cilicia. This General, having acquitted himself of the commission with great fidelity and expedition, was now upon the borders of Egypt with a numerous army; in which were three thousand Jews, commanded by Antipater, father of Herod, and Minister of Hircan, King of Judea. Mitbridates took Pelusium by storm the day he arrived before it, notwithstanding Achillas had placed a strong garrison in it, as it was the key of Egypt on the Syrian side. The shortest way from Pelusium to Alexandria was to keep a parallel line with the sea; but all the country is so traversed by the Nile and its canals, that Mitbridates found the march equally fatiguing and hazardous. This obliged him to march up the river as far as the head or point of the Delta, a province of Egypt, so called from its similitude to the Greek letter of that name. There the Nile divides itself into two great branches. The young King, understanding that Mitbridates approached this place, and knowing he must pass the river, sent a considerable body of troops against him to crush him, if possible, before his junction with Cæsar, at least to oppose his march. Part of this detachment, which formed the van, made what haste they could to engage him, that they alone might have all the honour of the victory: But Mitbridates had intrenched himself with great care; and, after keeping some time upon the defensive, he sallied out upon them from all parts, put a great number of them to the sword, and dispersed the rest. Cæsar and the King of Egypt had both information of this event, and set out at the same time to the assistance of their friends: The King, having a shorter cut, and the advantage of the river, got there first, but was not able to attempt any thing before Cæsar's arrival, who found no difficulty in joining Mitbridates. The Roman General, seeing himself now at the head of a powerful army, resolved to put an end to the war by an assault upon the enemy's camp.

The King had intrenched himself in a place well fortified by nature: It was a rising ground, surrounded by a plain; and three of its sides were secured by different fences; one adjoined to the Nile, the other was steep, and of very difficult access, and the third was defended by a morass. About seven miles from it ran a narrow river, but with very high banks, which discharged itself into the Nile: And, as it lay between the two armies, Ptolemy sent all his cavalry and a select body of light-armed troops to prevent Cæsar from passing it. The legionary troops, however, found means to get over by throwing across from bank

* This Mitbridates was probably the son of Mitbridates, King of Pontus. His mother, though married, was one of the mistresses of that Monarch. The King of Pontus shewed a singular affection for him, gave him a royal education, and for many years kept him at his Court, and in his army.

Y. R. 706.
Bef. Chr.
46.
405 Conf.
Hist. de
Bell. Alex.

bank to bank a number of large trees, and some German cavalry ventured to pass it by swimming where the banks were lowest. These attacked the detachment from Ptolemy's camp, and with such fury, that very few escaped to the King with the news of his enemy's approach. Cæsar, willing to strike a terror into the Alexandrins, encamped as near to them as possible; and the next day he attacked a fort which lay at a small distance, and which Ptolemy had joined to his camp by a line of communication. He employed his whole army in this attack, with a design of falling immediately upon the camp itself, during the consternation and disorder which the loss of the fort would occasion. The Romans accordingly pursued the garrison of the fort to the works of the camp; and these they attempted to force by the two only approaches by which it seemed possible to attack them; the one by the plain, the other by a narrow pass between the camp and the Nile: But the former was bravely defended by a numerous body of their best troops; and the latter was not only protected from the rampart, but from the river, where a great number of archers and slingers made a continual discharge from the ships stationed there. Cæsar, observing that, though his troops fought with the greatest ardour, yet they made no progress, he ordered a few cohorts, under the command of Carfulenus, a brave officer, to wheel round the camp, and to climb up the steepest side of it, which he perceived to be unguarded; the whole army having crowded to the attacks, or giving their whole attention to them. Carfulenus, having executed his General's orders, soon put an end to the fight, by falling down upon the rear of the enemy. The Alexandrins fled on all sides in the greatest consternation, and, endeavouring to escape to the ships on the Nile, threw themselves over the rampart on that side. The King, during the confusion, got on shipboard, but the vessel was overloaded and sunk by the multitudes which followed him. Such was the end of this perfidious Prince. His body was afterwards found, covered with mud, and known by the golden cuirass, which it was customary for the Ptolemy's to wear in battle.

Cæsar marched immediately to Alexandria, at the head of his cavalry, by the shortest way, confident that the inhabitants and troops, left in the town, would not dare to make any resistance. On his approach the whole city came out to meet him in the habit of suppliants, preceded by all their Priests with the sacred symbols of their religion. The victorious General received their submission with his wonted humanity, and rode triumphant through the enemy's works into his own quarters*. Thus Cæsar, in a few months, extricated himself from a war, in which all manner of difficulties seem to have been combined to put his prudence, courage, vigilance and activity to the test. In the midst of winter, and absolutely unprepared and in want of every thing, he maintained himself at land and sea, within the very walls and port of an artful enemy, supplied with every commodity, and who brought against him a disciplined and warlike army, four times as numerous as that with which he had been forced to begin the war.

* It appears by an old marble calendar, cited by Grægorius, Inscript. t. i. p. 133, that Cæsar entered Alexandria, vi cal. Ap. or 27th of March; which, according to Usher, was the 14th of January of the Julian year; but rather about the middle of February; Suetonius in Cæsar. 35. says the war was carried on in winter, hyems anni.

Y. R. 706.
Bcf. Chr.
46.
405 Conf.

He now banished Arfinoë the kingdom, and settled the crown, in conformity to Auletes's will, upon the only surviving son and Cleopatra: And he left with them the greatest part of his troops, to support their authority over subjects, who, upon his account, were greatly disaffected to them. It seemed also for the honour and interest of the people of Rome, that the Roman forces should remain there to protect them, while they continued faithful; and to check them, if they should fall off from their allegiance. Suetonius tells us, that what deterred Cæsar from reducing Egypt, at this time, into a province of the empire, was, that he was apprehensive, lest an ambitious Governor, master of a country so opulent, and of such difficult access, should be tempted to revolt. Others ascribe it to his love for Cleopatra, who, not long after his departure, was delivered of a son to him, whom she named Cæsario, and whom Cæsar is said to have owned*. But, whatever passion he may be supposed to have had for Cleopatra, it certainly engaged him in no act of injustice, and never drew his attention from concerns of greater importance. As soon as affairs were settled in Egypt, and the season was open for military operations, he set out by land for Syria, with the sixth legion, in his way to Pontus, where Pharnaces, King of the Bosphorus, during the Alexandrian war, had made a great progress, and was likely to give him much uneasiness†.

This Prince, at the breaking out of the Civil War, thought he had a fair opportunity, while all was in such confusion, and the Romans employed in their mutual destruction, to reconquer the dominions of

Hist. de
Bell. Alex.

* So Antony gave out after Cæsar's death: though Oppian, it may be observed, thought it worth his while to write a book to confute his testimony, and to prove that Cæsario was not Cæsar's child.

† “Cleopatra's charms, says M. Crevier, “ must have been very bewitching, since “ they had the power to retard Cæsar's ac- “ tivity. After having confined himself nine “ months in Alexandria during which time “ the whole business of Rome and Italy was “ at a stand, and whereby the vanquished “ party found means to get strength, and “ become formidable in Africa, Cæsar, in- “ stead of quitting Egypt, with all expedi- “ tion, to go where honour and the affairs

“ of state required his presence, abandoned “ himself to pleasure, and passed whole “ nights in feasts and other debaucheries “ with Cleopatra: And at last set out with “ her to make a tour round the country. “ They went on board a ship richly orna- “ mented, and took their course up the Nile, “ attended by four hundred vessels. Cæsar's “ design was to have gone to Ethiopia, but “ he was prevented by his army, who be- “ gan to dislike his proceedings.” Suetonius, Appian, and Dio are cited to confirm these particulars; but one has occasion for a very small share of penetration to perceive their improbability.

Y.R. 706. his ancestors. He began by taking Phanegoria, which Pompey had Bef. Chr. 46. declared free: He next subdued Colchis; then, entering Pontus, he 405 Conf. made himself master of Sinope, the ancient residence of its Kings. E——— lated by this success, he had seized upon the lesser Armenia, which belonged to Dejotarus, and carried his arms into Cappadocia, the kingdom of Ariobarzanes. Dejotarus found affairs in this situation, on his return from Pharsalia; and had recourse to Domitius Calvinus, whom Cæsar had appointed Commander in those parts. Domitius was very sensible that the Republic was not less interested in this war than Dejo- tarus and Ariobarzanes, and that it was dishonourable to the Roman people, to Cæsar, and to himself, to suffer the dominions of their friends and allies to be invaded by a foreign Prince: He therefore sent ambassadors to Pharnaces, and required of him, “to withdraw im“mediately out of Armenia and Cappadocia, and no longer to insult the “majesty of the Roman Republic.” At the same time, to give more weight to his embassy, he assembled what troops he could, and ordered them to rendezvous at Comana. Of the three legions which Cæsar had left with him, he had sent two to Egypt, one by sea, the other with Mithridates: The thirty-sixth alone remained with him. He received, however, two legions from Dejotarus, and one had been lately raised in Pontus. These four legions, with some Cilician recruits, and two hundred horse, made up his whole army. Pharnaces made answer, “that he had quitted Cappadocia, and that the lesser Armenia was “his own by the right of inheritance; but that he would submit to the “decision of Cæsar.” Domitius, who understood that he had left Cappa- docia for no other reason than because, Armenia lying contiguous to his kingdom, he could more easily defend it, sent him word, that he had no better right to Armenia than to Cappadocia, and that he must renounce acquisitions to which his sword alone had intitled him. Pharnaces endeavoured in vain to amuse him with a negociation, and by sending Deputies after Deputies with presents. The Roman General advanced to Nicopolis, and a battle ensued. In this battle Dejotarus’s two legions gave ground on the first onset, the legion raised in Pontus was cut to pieces, and the legion alone of Pompey’s veterans, after sustaining the whole shock of the action, retreated in good order with the loss of only two hundred and fifty men. Domitius, assembling his scattered soldiers as well as he could, retired as far as Asia; while the King entered Pon- tus as Conqueror, and committed all kinds of enormities. Affairs were in this situation, when Cæsar left Egypt.

Hist de Bell. Alex. On his arrival in Syria, he received advice from all hands, that every thing was in confusion at Rome; that the contests of the Tribunes produced daily seditions; that the officers kept up no discipline among the soldiers; and that his presence was necessary to give the laws their proper authority. However, he thought it necessary first to regulate the affairs of the Eastern provinces, and take vengeance on Pharnaces.

The

The Kings and petty Princes in and about Syria came from every side to wait on him, and were graciously received. He confirmed Hircan in the high-priesthood of the Jews, notwithstanding the solicitations of Antigonus, son to Aristobulus; and gave him leave to build the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had ordered to be pulled down: He likewise supported Antipater in the command he had for a long time exercised in Judea, under Hircan's name; which greatly strengthened the authority of that Prince. From Syria where he left the command in the hands of Sextus Cæsar, a young relation, he sailed for Cilicia: And, having convened the States of that province in Tarsus, and settled its affairs, he set out with the greatest expedition towards Pontus. At Comana he conferred the priesthood of Bellona on Lycomedes of Bitbynia, who claimed it in right of his ancestors, and, according to Appian, dispossessed Archelaus, the son of him whom Pompey had invested with that dignity. On his approaching the frontiers of Gallœgræcia, he was met by Dejotarus, who had not only divested himself of all marks of royalty, but had taken that of a suppliant “to beg forgiveness for having assisted Pompey, at a time when Cæsar could give him no protection: Urging that it was his business to obey the Governors who were present, without pretending to judge of the disputes of the Roman people.” Cæsar, who was well acquainted with what zeal and spirit he had served against him, after some reproaches, and refuting his excuses, restored him his royal habit, and commanded him to join him with all his cavalry and troops.

Pharnaces observed the same conduct with Cæsar as with Domitius: He pretended to sue for peace, but was fully resolved to push the war. Cæsar saw through his design: And, though his army was very considerable, both as to the number and the quality of his troops, consisting only of the sixth legion (now reduced to one thousand men) and the remains of Domitius's army, he resolved to give battle. He advanced therefore within five miles of the enemy. The country where the King was encamped was filled with hills, separated from each other by deep vallies: And, opposite to that eminence where Pharnaces had intrenched himself, was another at the distance only of one mile, and there Cæsar intended to pitch his camp. With this design, having ordered his men to prepare every thing necessary for throwing up a rampart, he set out in the night to take possession of it. Pharnaces was greatly surprised to see him there, at sun-rising, employed in making his fortifications, and immediately took the resolution to attack him. The approach was so very difficult and dangerous, that Cæsar concluded the King's intention was no other than to retard his works by keeping a great number of his men under arms: And, shewing therefore his first line in order of battle, he commanded the rest of the army to go on with the works. But the King, encouraged by favourable omens, and by reflecting that in this very place Triarius had been overcome by his father Mitbridates,

Y. R. 46. and having conceived an utter contempt for so small an army, made
 Bet. Cæsar. up, for the most part, of troops he had already defeated in the field,
 46. had determined upon a battle, and to that end began to cross the valley.

— Cæsar laughed at his foolish attempt in crowding his army into so narrow a place, where no General in his right senses would have entered; and did not think of calling his soldiers from their work. But, seeing him push on and ascend the hill, he found himself obliged, to his great astonishment, to post his army in order to receive him. An attack so sudden and unexpected caused some disorder at first, which was increased by the chariots armed with scythes, which, sent before the enemy's first line, fell in with Cæsar's ranks before they were quite formed: But the multitude of darts, which were launched against them, soon put a stop to their career. The army, which followed them close, began the battle by a shout; and the engagement was sharp and long. At last the Romans, by the advantage of their situation, repulsed the assailants: The victory began in the right wing, where the veterans of the sixth legion were posted; and, the troops in the center and in the left wing gaining soon a like superiority, the whole army of Pharnaces was driven precipitately down the hill. In the flight great numbers were slain and crushed by their own troops, and those who escaped were obliged to throw away their arms, so that, having crossed the valley and got to the opposite ascent, they could not face about, nor derive any benefit from the advantage of the ground. The Romans pursued them, and, without allowing them to rally, attacked and took their camp. It was during this attack that Pharnaces made his escape. Almost his whole army was destroyed or made prisoners. It is reported by Appian, that Cæsar, astonished at the ease with which he gained this victory, cried out: Happy Pompey! such then are the enemies by whose defeat you acquired the surname of Great: And in a letter to one of his friends at Rome, giving an account of this action, he described the rapidity of his conquest in these three words, Veni, vidi, vici; I came, I saw, I conquered *. And, when he triumphed afterwards on this occasion, he caused a tablet to be carried in the procession, with these very words inscribed in capitals. Hirtius tells us, that no victory ever gave him more joy, as he, at one blow, in so critical a conjuncture, put an end to a dangerous war, which he was afraid would detain him a long time from Rome, where his presence was necessary. Pharnaces, having retired to Sinope, was pursued thi-

* Rex Pharnaces magis discordiæ nostræ fiducia, quam virtutis suæ, infesto in Cappadociam agmine ruebat: Sed hunc Cæsar aggressus, uno, et, ut sic dixerim, non toto prælio, obtinuit; more salmisis, quod uno eademque momento venit, percussit, abscessit. Nec vana de se prædicatio est Cæsaris, ante victum hostem esse, quam visum. Flor. l. iv. c. 2.

ther by Domitius, who forced him to leave the country. In the Bos- Y. R. 706.
Bel. Chr.
46.
405 Corf.
phcrus, Asander, whom he had left Regent of his kingdom, had revolted and set up for himself, during the expedition into Pontus; so that, when the fugitive King returned home, he found a Rebel in a condition to dispute with him the possession. A battle ensued, in which I'pharnaces lost his life. Such was the end of this parricide son of the great Mithridates.

During the war in Egypt and in Pontus, Greece and Illyricum had Hirt. de Bell. Alex.
been pacified by Calenus and Vatinius. The first made himself master of all Peloponnesus without much difficulty. In Illyricum the struggle was greater. Cæsar, upon his expedition against Pompey, had left Q.
Cornificius to command in that province with two legions, and this Lieutenant had kept the Barbarians in subjection. After the battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar, being informed that many of the vanquished party had fled that way, and that Octavius had brought the fleet which he commanded upon the coast, he sent orders to Gabinus, who was then in Italy, to march with the new-raised legions to the succour of Cor- nificius. Gabinus, imagining that the province was better stocked with provisions than it really was, and depending on the terror impressed upon the inhabitants by Cæsar's late victory, marched into Illyricum in the middle of winter, and, not finding sufficient subsistence in a province already exhausted, and partly ill-affected, he was obliged to make war upon the inhabitants for provisions, and to besiege them in their strong-holds; and, receiving, on these occasions, many checks, he was brought into such contempt, that the people of the country ventured to attack him upon his march to Salona, and killed two thousand of his soldiers, thirty-eight Centurions, and four Tribunes. He escaped with the remainder to Salona, and died there of a disorder, which the toil of a winter campaign and grief had occasioned. Oc- tavius entered immediately into an alliance with the Barbarians, and would soon have reduced the whole country, if Vatinius had not flown to its assistance with the same spirit he had fought Cæsar's battles in Rome at the head of the mob. Neither the sickness he then laboured under, nor the hardships of the season, stopped him. He sent to Ca- lenus for a squadron of gallies, but, these not coming with that dispatch the affairs of Illyricum required, he fastened beaks to all the vessels he found in the port of Brundisium, and, putting on board the veterans whom Cæsar had left sick in those parts, and who had since recovered, he sailed with this stout fleet in quest of Octavius. He found him before Epidaurus, which he was besieging both by sea and land. Octavius immediately raised the siege and retired to Tauris, whither Vatinius, having joined to his army the garrison of the place, followed him.
The Pompeian Admiral, informed of the condition of the enemy's fleet, resolved to give battle, and, upon their approach, sailed out of the harbour. Vatinius, though part of his ships had been dispersed by a tempest,

Y. R. 706. a tempest, and the enemy was superior both in number and strength of
 B. f. C. r. vessels, gave the signal for battle, and began it himself by driving his
 45. quinquere me upon Octavius's four-benched galley, which it shocked 405 Conf. with such violence, that it lost its beak. The battle raged with great fury among the rest of the ships, but chiefly round the two Admirals.
 As the ships on each side advanced to sustain those that had engaged, a close conflict ensued in a very narrow sea. Nothing could have happened more favourably for Vatinius; for his veterans leaped into the enemy's vessels, and, forcing them to an equal combat, soon mastered them by their superior valour. Octavius's galley was sunk; and many others had the same fate, or were taken. Octavius himself got into a boat, which sinking under the multitude that crouded after him, he swam to a neighbouring ship; where, being taken up, and night coming on, he spread all his sails and fled towards Greece. He thence continued his route for Africa, followed by a few that escaped out of the battle. Vatinius entered the town, whence Octavius had sailed to fight him, without the loss of one vessel, and, having refitted both his own ships and those taken from the enemy, he sailed to the island of Issa; whither, he was informed, Octavius had retired. Here he was certified of Octavius's motions, and thus, having restored peace to Il- lyricum, he returned triumphant with his army and fleet to Brundisium.

Hir. de Cæsar, after his victory over Pharnaces, was at liberty to return to Bell. Alex. Rome: And, the day after he had obtained it, he set out with a guard of light horse, having sent home Deiotarus's troops, and ordered the sixth legion to follow him into Italy, there to receive the recompence due to their services. He took his way through Gallo-græcia and Bitbynia into Asia, giving judgments, as he passed, in all controversies of moment, and settling the limits and jurisdictions of the several Kings, Tetrarchs, and States. Mitridates of Pergamus was appointed to succeed Pharnaces in the kingdom of the Bosphorus, and the tetrarchate of Gallo-græcia was added to it, claimed now by Mitridates, in right of inheritance, though it had been possessed for some years by Deiotarus.
Cicero tells us, that Cæsar had a particular hatred to this Prince, that he also exacted large sums of money from him, and deprived him of Armenia, bestowing it on Aricbarzanes. Nor is it difficult to account for his severity to Deiotarus. This Prince had been remarkable for his zeal for Pompey, and by this means had obtained several unjust grants from the Senate. Cæsar staid no where longer than the necessity of his affairs required, and, making the greatest dispatch, arrived in Italy in the month of September, much sooner than was expected.

Cicero, who had been, in a manner, a prisoner at Brundisium, ever since the battle of Pharsalia, and lived there in perpetual uneasiness^a, upon

Middl. p. 127. ^a " Cicero no sooner returned to Italy, " too hasty in coming home before the war
 " than he began to reflect, that he had been " was determined, and without any invita" tion

upon the first notice of his landing at Tarentum, set out on foot to meet him. Cæsar no sooner saw him, than he alighted, ran to embrace him, and

Y. R. 706.

Bef. Chr.

46.

405 Conf.

“tion from the conqueror; and, in a time
“of that general license, had reason to apprehend some insult from the soldiers, if “he ventured to appear in public with his “sasces and laurel; and yet to drop them
“would be a diminution of that honour “which he had received from the Roman
“people, and the acknowledgment of a “power superior to the laws: He condemned “himself, therefore, for not continuing abroad, “in some convenient place of retirement, till he “had been sent for, or things were better “settled. (Ad Att. xi. 6. and 9.) What gave “him the greater reason to repent of this “step, was a message that he received from “Antony, who governed all in Cæsar’s absence, and with the same churlish spirit, “with which he would have held him before
“in Italy against his will, seemed now disposed to drive him out of it; for he sent “him the copy of a letter from Cæsar, in “which Cæsar signified, that he had heard “that Cato and Metellus were at Rome, and “appeared openly there, which might occasion
“some disturbance; wherefore he strictly enjoined, that none should be suffered to come to “Italy without a special license from himself.
“Antony, therefore, desired Cicero to excuse “him, since he could not help obeying “Cæsar’s commands: But Cicero sent L. Læmia to assure him, that Cæsar had ordered “Dolabella to write to him to come to Italy
“as soon as he pleased; and that he came “upon the authority of Dolabella’s letter.
“So that Antony, in the edict which he “published to exclude the Pompeians from “Italy, excepted Cicero by name: Which “added still to his mortification; since all “his desire was to be connived at only,
“or tacitly permitted, without being personally distinguished from the rest of his “party.” (Ad Att. xi. 7.)

“He had several other grievances of a “domestic kind, which concurred also to “make him unhappy: His brother Quintus, “with his son, after their escape from “Pharjalia, followed Cæsar into Asia, to “obtain their pardon from him in person:
“And Quintus, in order to make his own “peace the more easily, resolved to throw “all the blame upon his brother; and, for “that purpose, made it the subject of all “his letters and speeches to Cæsar’s friends,

“to rail at him in a manner the most inhuman. Cicero was informed of this from “all quarters, and that young Quintus, who “was sent before towards Cæsar, had read “an oration to his friends, which he had “prepared to speak to him against his uncle.” (Ad Att. xi. 8, 9, 10.) Middl. p.
128.

“But what gave him the greatest uneasiness was to be held still in suspense, in “what touched him the most nearly, the “case of his own safety, and of Cæsar’s disposition towards him; for, though all “Cæsar’s friends assured him, not only of “pardon, but of all kind of favour; yet he “had received no intimation of kindness
“from Cæsar himself. To ease his mind “in this respect, some of his friends at “Rome contrived to send him a letter in “Cæsar’s name, dated the 9th of February,
“from Alexandria, encouraging him to lay “aside all gloomy apprehensions, and expect “every thing that was kind and friendly
“from him: But it gave him little satisfaction, as he suspected what he afterwards “found to be true, that it was forged by “Balbus and Oppius, on purpose to raise his “spirits, and administer some little comfort
“to him. All his accounts, however, confirmed to him the report of Cæsar’s clemency and moderation, and his granting “pardon without exception to all who asked
“it; and, with regard to himself, Cæsar
“sent Quintus’s virulent letters to Balbus, “with orders to shew them to him, as a proof
“of his kindness and dislike of Quintus’s perfidy. But Cicero’s present despondency, “which interpreted every thing by his fears,
“made him suspect Cæsar the more, for refusing grace to none; as if such a clemency “must needs be attended, and his revenge deferred only to a season more convenient; and,
“as to his brother’s letters, he fancied that “Cæsar did not send them to Italy, because “he condemned them, but to make his present misery and abject condition the more “notorious and despicable to every body.”
(Ad Att. xi. 16, 17, 20, 22.)

“He had fears also from another quarter: Middl. p.
“ter: 140.

Y. R. 706. and walked with him alone, conversing very familiarly for several Bel. Chr. furlongs.

46.
 403 Conf. On his arrival at Rome, he found the city in the greatest ferment.
 I. i. c. xii. He had been created Dictator, after the battle of Pharsalia, for the following year; and Antony, as his Master of Horse, had governed in his absence. Dolabella had got into the tribunate, which he was no sooner invested with, than he revived the laws proposed the year before by Calpurnius, for an abolition of debts, and to exempt tenants from paying, in the present confusion, any rent to their landlords. We are told, that at first he was favoured by Antony, who found this project very suitable to his own circumstances; but, having discovered an intrigue between his wife Antonia and the young Tribune, he put her away, and from that moment sided with the Senate and two of the Tribunes in opposing Dolabella. The multitude favoured the scheme; the Tribune was obstinate in the pursuit of it; and, in the absence of Antony, who was obliged to make a tour to appease the mutiny of the veteran legions, the disorder became extreme. The creditors on one side, and the debtors on the other, formed two camps in the city, and alternately attacked each other with fire and sword. We are told that the Vestals, not thinking themselves safe in their temple, removed from thence with the sacred relics. Antony upon his return was charged by the Senate to take care the Republic received no detriment. Dolabella grew desperate; and, having fixed a day for the passing of his laws, he barricaded the avenues to the Forum, erected wooden turrets to prevent the approach of any person against his will, and made such dispositions as are usual, where a siege is to be maintained. Antony, on his side, brought a number of troops to the Capitol, forced the barriers, broke to pieces the tables on which the laws were inscribed, and, having taken some of the ringleaders of this sedition, he threw them down the Tarpeian rock.

“ter: Cæsar’s enemies had greatly strengthened themselves in Africa, and it was reported, that they would bring into Italy a powerful army before Cæsar could return from Alexandria. Cicero, in this case, was sure to be treated as a deserter; for while Cæsar looked upon all men as friends, who did not act against him, and pardoned even enemies, who submitted to his power; it was a declared law, on the other side, to consider all as enemies who were not actually in their camp: So that Cicero had nothing now to wish, either for himself, or the Republic, but, in the first place, a peace, of which he had still some hopes; or else that Cæsar might conquer; whose victory was like to prove the more temperate of the two.” Ad Att. xi. 6. 12. 19.)

“After a long series of perpetual mortifications, he was refreshed at last by a very obliging letter from Cæsar, who confirmed to him the full enjoyment of his state and dignity, and bad him resume his fasces and style of Emperor as before. Cæsar’s mind, adds Dr. Middleton, was too great to listen to the tales of the brother and nephew,” [which, however, contained a great deal of truth] “and, instead of approving their treachery, seems to have granted them their pardon on Cicero’s account, rather than their own: So that Quintus, upon the trial of Cæsar’s inclination, began presently to change his note, and to congratulate with his brother on Cæsar’s affection and esteem for him.” (Ep. Fam. xiv. 23. Pro Lig. iii. Ad Att. xi. 23.) Middl. p. 142.

Notwithstanding this exertion of Dictatorial and despotic power, the troubles continued till Cæsar's arrival. He did not think fit to take notice of any thing done in his absence by his friends; but, being desirous to gain the affection of the several parties, regulated affairs as much as possible to every one's satisfaction. He refused to listen to the clamours of the people, who demanded the abolition proposed by their Tribune, telling them, that he was as much incumbered with debts as any one, yet had no design of defrauding his creditors. However, besides the mitigation already granted by him, he farther indulged the debtors by a discharge of all arrears since the commencement of the civil war: And, with regard to the tenants, he eased the poor citizens by an order, importing, that all, not renting above two thousand sesterces annually in Rome, should be exempted from payment of a year's rent, and of a quarter's only in the other parts of Italy.

Q. FUFIVS CALENVS, } Consuls for the three last
P. VATINIUS, } Months of the Year.

Y. R. 706.
Bef. Clu.
46.
405 Conf.

Having thus settled the affairs of the city, and made Vatinius and Fufius Calenus Consuls for the remaining months of the year, he caused himself to be created Consul, and continued in the Dictatorship for the year following; taking, for his colleague in the Consulship, and his Master of the Horse, M. Lepidus; and he applied himself to raise the money necessary for the expedition to Africa, where the progress of the Pompeians called for his presence. Dio tells us, that, as it had been customary to present crowns of gold and erect statues to victorious Generals, Cæsar received under this pretence great sums from the corporations in Italy, and at the same time borrowed of them still greater. But the sale of the estates of the contrary faction was probably his chief resource. Pompey's estate, houses and goods, were sold at this time, and purchased by Antony: And it was undoubtedly one way of recompensing a great number of his followers to make over to them the effects of the vanquished at an under rate. P. Sylla, as well as Antony, was one of the most forward and eager purchasers.

l. xii.

When every thing for his expedition to Africa was ready, a violent sedition broke out among his old legions. They had been very mutinous ever since their return to Italy, being disappointed in not receiving immediately the rewards that had been promised them, and which they had so highly merited; and, when they perceived that Cæsar meant to employ them again in a dangerous war, they grew furious. Before Cæsar's return, the twelfth legion had treated their officers with contempt, and pelted with stones such of them as had dared to remind them of their duty: And now the tenth, so favoured by their General, and so much attached hitherto to his person, gave the signal of revolt, and was followed by the others in Campania. Cæsar sent to them Sallust, whom he had lately appointed Prætor, and to whom he destined the government of Africa, with instructions to let them know, that, as soon as he had put an end to the African war, besides the distributions of

Suet. in
Cæf.
Appian.
Dio, l. xlii.

land and money already due to them, he would add a thousand denarii to each man as a recompense for this last campaign. These offers, so wide of the soldiers expectations, greatly exasperated them. Sallust was obliged to save himself by flight; and, in the extremity of their resentment, they marched to Rome, plundering all in their way, and killed several people of distinction. Cæsar, under apprehensions for the city, ordered the gates to be shut, and sent to its defence what troops he had about him: But when he heard of their arrival, and that they had sat down in the Campus Martius, the entreaties of his friends, concerned for his safety, could not prevail with him to defer a moment going in person to speak with them. He boldly mounted his tribunal, and, with a menacing tone of voice, asked the soldiers, What had brought them thither, and what they wanted? This intrepid and imperious behaviour began to disconcert them: They were ashamed to reproach him with having delayed their promised rewards, but represented that, being worn out by fatigue, and weakened by the wounds they had received in his service, they were in hopes that he would have given them their discharge. I give it you, replied Cæsar; and, after a short silence, added, and, when I shall have triumphed with other troops, I nevertheless will fulfil my engagements with you. They were thunderstruck with these words; and the Dictator was about to retire, when he was stopped by the officers attending him; who conjured him to treat the companions of his victories with less coldness and severity. He consented to speak to them once more, and began by addressing them with the word Quirites, citizens. This expression instead of that of Commilitones, or Comrades, which he commonly used, quite overcame them, and brought them back effectually to their duty. They interrupted him, and insisted that they were still his soldiers, and begged he would consider them as such, offering to follow him into Africa, and every-where else*. He pardoned them, but soon after took the first occasion to punish the licentious behaviour and the rapines of some of the officers. C. Aquilius, a military Tribune of the tenth legion, when he set out from Sicily, having filled a ship entirely with his own equipage and servants, Cæsar summoned all the military Tribunes and Centurions to appear before his tribunal the next day, and addressed them in these words: "I could have wished that those, whose insolence and licentious carriage have given me cause of complaint, had been capable of amendment, and of making king

* This event has been embellished with many circumstances which cannot be true. We are told, that the soldiers desired to be decimated, and that Cæsar refused them that honour, telling them, that he would treat them according to their deserts, and break them: That he continued inflexible towards the tenth legion; who, not being able to obtain their pardon, followed him of their own accord and without orders into Africa;

where Cæsar made indeed use of them, but employed them always in hazardous enterprises in order to get rid of them: And that after the war, when returned to Italy, he deprived the few that remained of one third of their reward in punishment of their mutiny. Dio, l. xlii. But we see that in the battle of Thapsus, and afterwards at Munda, they had the place of honour as usual, in the first line of the right wing. Suet. in Cæs. 70.

“ king a good use of my clemency. But, since they know not how to “ keep within bounds, I shall make an example of them according to “ the law of arms, that others may be taught a better conduct. You, ^{Y. R. 706.}
 “ C. Avienus, when you was in Italy, instigated the Roman soldiers to ^{Bef. Ciu.}
 “ mutiny against the Republic; you have been guilty of rapine in the ^{46.}
 “ municipal towns; and you have never been of any real service, either ^{405 Conf.}
 “ to the Commonwealth, or to your General: Lastly, in place of sol“ diers, you have crouded the transports with your slaves and baggage:
 “ So that, through your fault, the Republic fails in troops, which at “ this time are not only useful, but necessary. For all these reasons I “ break you with ignominy, and order you to leave Africa this very “ day. In like manner, I break you, A. Fonteius, because you have be“ haved yourself as a seditious officer, and as a bad citizen. You, “ T. Salienus, M. Tiro, C. Clusinas, have attained the rank of Centurions, “ through my indulgence, and not through your own merit; and, since “ you have been raised to that rank, have neither shewn bravery in “ war, nor good conduct in peace. Instead of behaving according to “ the rules of modesty, your whole study has been to stir up the soldiers “ against your General. I therefore think you unworthy of continuing “ Centurions in my army: I break you, and order you to quit Africa as “ soon as possible.” Having concluded this speech, he delivered them over to some Centurions, with orders to confine them separately on board a ship, allowing each of them but one single slave: And this seems to have been the only punishment he inflicted on those seditious troops.

C H A P. VIII.

The War of Cæsar in Africa against Scipio, Cato, and Juba.

CÆSAR set out from Rome towards the beginning of December; and, passing the streights at Rbegium, arrived on the 17th at Lily- bæum, the farthest point of Sicily. It was his design to embark immediately, though he had but one legion of new levies, and not quite six hundred horse; and he ordered his tent to be pitched so near the sea-side, that the waves flowed quite up to it. This he did to take away all hopes of delay, and keep his men in readiness at an hour's warning: And, the wind proving contrary, he nevertheless suffered none of the soldiers or mariners to come on shore, that he might lose no opportunity of sailing. His view was to land and intrench himself on the coast of Africa before his enemies were apprised of his approach, or could assemble their army^b: And he meant also to shew an utter

^b We are told, that this reason prevailed with him more than the will of the Gods, declared by the Auspices: Cum immolanti ausugisset hostia, profectiorem adversus Scipionem et Jubam non distulit. Suet. in Cæs. c. 59. Quid? Ipse Cæsar cum a summo haruspice moneretur, ne in Africam ante Brumam transmitteret, nonne transmisit? Quod ni fecisset, uno in loco omnes adversariorum copiae convenissent. Cic. de Divinat. l. ii. c. 24.

Y. R. 706
Bef. Chr.
405 Cont. contempt of their forces, which were greatly exaggerated both in Italy and Sicily. While the wind remained contrary, his gallies and transports increased daily; and, before the 25th, he had got together six legions, and two thousand horse, with the greatest part of which he set sail, giving strict orders to Allienus the Prætor, whom he left to command in Sicily, to embark with the utmost expedition the remainder of his troops. The wind being favourable, he himself, with a few gallies, arrived the fourth day within sight of Africa: But most of his transports had not kept up with him, nor had he appointed them any place of rendezvous, knowing of no part that was clear of the enemy's forces, and resolving to land where occasion offered. He coasted some time along the shore, running southward, and leaving Chyrea and Neapolis behind him; and when he came before Adrumetum, where the enemy had a garrison commanded by C. Censidius, Cn. Piso appeared upon the shore with the cavalry and about two thousand Moors. Here, notwithstanding this shew of opposition, he landed the troops he had with him, which did not exceed three thousand foot and a hundred and fifty horse, and encamped before the town, keeping his soldiers within their intrenchments, and not suffering them to commit any hostilities. L. Plancus, one of his Lieutenants, dispatched a messenger into the town with a letter, exhorting Censidius to surrender: But Censidius ordered him to be slain in his presence, and sent the letter unopened to Scipio, saying, he knew no other General of the Romans. Cæsar, finding himself unable to storm the town, after staying before it one night and a day, broke up his camp. As he was drawing off his troops, the garrison which consisted of two legions made a sally, and, a body of Juba's horse, whom he had sent to receive their pay, happening just then to come up, they jointly took possession of the abandoned camp, and began to harass his rear. The legionaries immediately halted, and the cavalry, though few in number, boldly charged the great multitude of the enemy: Thirty Gallie horse are said on this occasion to have repulsed two thousand Moors, and driven them quite within the town. Cæsar reached Ruspina the same day, which was the 1st of January^c.

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR, Dictator III.

M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS, Mag. Eq.

405⁴⁵ Cont.

From Ruspina, Cæsar marched towards Leptis, a free town, and governed by its own laws. The inhabitants of this place had formerly assisted his enemies, but now they thought proper to send Deputies to him, to make offer of their submission and services; and, having placed a guard at its gates, to prevent the soldiers from entering it and committing disorders; he encamped with his army at a small distance. Here he was joined by a part of his fleet, by whom he was informed that the rest, uncertain what course to take, had steered towards Utica. Cæsar instantly dispatched ten gallies after them, and the next day, having left six cohorts at Leptis, he returned with the rest of his army to Ruspina; where he went on board with some of his best troops in the evening to the great astonishment and dismay of his army. They saw themselves but few in number, mostly new levies, exposed upon a foreign coast to the mighty forces of a crafty nation, which had an innumerable cavalry; nor had they the least expectation of safety from their own conduct, but derived all their hopes from the alacrity and cheerfulness which appeared in the countenance of their General: For, at no time, had he shewed a greater confidence. They soon, however, understood with what view he intended to put to sea, when, the next day, they saw him return with the rest of the troops, which his fleet had luckily brought him before he set sail. He was greatly apprehensive lest they should fall in with the enemy's fleet, and had resolved to go out to assist and direct them.

^c According to Usher, the 13th of October; but, more probably, the 5th of November of the Julian year.

This junction of his forces was very necessary; for Labienus was in full march towards him with a considerable army of horse and foot. Cæsar, after forming his camp, having advanced only three miles into the country with thirty cohorts to forage, was informed by his scouts, and some advanced parties of horse, that the enemy was in view. Upon this intelligence, he ordered his horse, and a small number of archers which attended them, to advance, and his cohorts to follow and prepare for battle. Labienus drew up with a very extended front, consisting mostly of horse, with whom he intermixed light-armed Numidians and archers, and formed them in such close order, that Cæsar's army at a distance mistook them all for infantry; his right and left were strengthened with a numerous cavalry. Cæsar was forced to draw up his army also in one line, on account of the smallness of its number; ranging his bowmen in front, and his cavalry in the wings; and he gave them particular instructions not to suffer themselves to be surrounded. Both armies stood some time expecting the signal: At length, the enemy began to extend themselves, and to spread out upon the hills with a view to surround Cæsar's cavalry. The main bodies advancing then to engage, the enemy's horse, intermixed with the light-armed Numidians, suddenly sprung forward from among the legionaries, and threw their darts. Upon this, they retreated with all speed, leaving the legionaries to sustain the attack of Cæsar's troops, and soon after returned to the charge with fresh vigour. Cæsar, perceiving that his ranks were in danger of being broken by this new way of fighting, which enticed his men to pursue the horse, gave express orders that no soldier should advance above four feet beyond the ensigns. But he soon found himself surrounded on all sides, his cavalry being altogether unable to resist those of the enemy; and, in this perplexity, he formed his whole army into an orb. Labienus, to encourage his men, advanced on horseback to the front of the battle, and, addressing Cæsar's legions, upbraided them with their inexperience in war, and their infatuation in following him to their cer-

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
45.
466 Conf.

Hist. de Bell. Afr.

Y. R. 707. certain destruction. One of the soldiers answered, that he was no new
 Bcf. Chr. soldier, but a veteran of the tenth legion. Where then is your standard?

⁴⁵
 406 Cont. said Labienus. You shall know me presently, answered the soldier: Then, — pulling off his helmet to discover himself, he launched his dart with all his strength against Labienus. The dart wounded his horse in the breast, and the veteran called out, Learn, Labienus, to respect a warrior of the tenth legion. However, the whole army, particularly the new levies, began to be terrified; and, casting their eyes on Cæsar, expected their deliverance from his experience. Cæsar, to disengage himself, directed the cohorts of the right and left wings to extend themselves as much as possible, and push forward alternately; by which means he broke the enemy's circle at both his wings; and, attacking one part of it now separated from the other, with almost all his forces, easily put it to flight; and, with the same success, having repulsed the other part, he immediately gave orders for the retreat. But M. Petreius and Cn Piso, brought up in this moment eleven hundred select Numidian horse, and a considerable body of foot; and, this succour recovering the enemy from their terror, they fell again on the rear of the legions. Cæsar was forced to order his men to wheel about, and renew the battle; but, perceiving that the enemy still pursued their former plan, and avoided a close engagement, and, considering that his horses, fatigued with their late voyage at sea and the business of the day, were unfit for a vigorous and long pursuit, which the approach of night rendered also impossible, he ordered both horse and foot to fall at once briskly upon the enemy, and follow them beyond the next hill, and not to stop till they had taken possession of it. This scheme was immediately executed; and Cæsar, having kept that post for some time, retired slowly in order of battle to his camp. The enemy thought proper to do the same, having been rudely handled in this last attack, in which Petreius was also dangerously wounded, and obliged to quit the field. The battle lasted from eleven till sun-set. Cæsar made a great many prisoners, and many deserters flocked to him after the action, by whom he was informed that Labienus brought against him sixteen hundred Gallie and German horse, who had served under Pompey, with eleven hundred Numidian troopers commanded by Petreius, eight thousand Numidian foot, and four times that number of light-armed soldiers, with a multitude of archers and slingers; and that he had designed to have astonished Cæsar's raw levies, and few legionaries, with the new and uncommon manner of fighting of his troops; and, after surrounding them with his cavalry, to have cut them to pieces, as Saburra did Curio's army. He had said in Council, that he would lead such a numerous body of men against Cæsar's legions, as should fatigue them with the very slaughter, and defeat them even in the very bosom of victory. This is Hirtius's account. The Greek historians tell us, that Cæsar had the worst of it in this day's battle; and it appears from a passage in Valerius Maximus, that Labienus and Scipio rewarded their soldiers for

Pt. App.
 Dio.

Val. Max.
 v. l. 14.

for their bravery ; and they also probably gave out, that the victory was on their side, since Cæsar retreated to his camp^d.

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.

Cæsar was also informed, that within three days Scipio was expected with his forces, which consisted of eight legions and three thousand horse. He therefore fortified his camp and the forts about it with the greatest care, and threw up two intrenchments ; one from Ruspina quite to the sea, and the other from his camp to the sea likewise, in order to secure the communication, and receive his supplies without danger. He took out of his fleet a great number of the mariners, Gauls, Rhodians, and others, of whom he formed companies of light-armed troops to fight, after the example of the enemy, among the cavalry. Having thus strengthened his army, he stationed his fleet along the coasts and islands for the security of his convoys, wrote to Sicily and Sardinia to press for supplies of all kinds, and sent Sallust to seize Cercinna, an island upon the coast, where Scipio had a magazine of provisions. But, notwithstanding what was brought from thence, he found himself soon in very great scarcity, and particularly of forage. He was not master of six miles in Africa, and was obliged to keep within his intrenchments : It was the winter season, and navigation was very dangerous ; and his ships of burden were often taken by the enemy's fleets : The veteran soldiers, however, and cavalry, who had been accustomed to hardships of every kind, were nowise dismayed ; and with sea-weed, washed in fresh water, they subsisted the horses and cattle of the army.

45.
406 Conf.

Cn. Pompey set out about this time upon a particular expedition. Cato, who commanded in Utica, never ceased exhorting and urging the youth in words to this effect : “ Your father, when he was arrived at your “ age, and saw the Commonwealth oppressed by wicked and daring “ men ; and the honest party either slain, or driven by banishment “ from their country and relations ; instigated by magnanimity and “ the love of glory, though then only a private man, had yet the cou“ rage to rally the remains of his father's army, and to deliver Italy and “ Rome from the yoke of slavery and tyranny under which they groaned.
“ He recovered, with amazing dispatch, Sicily, Africa, Numidia, Mauri- “ tania, and by that means gained an illustrious and extensive reputation “ among all nations, and triumphed at three-and-twenty, while but a “ Roman Knight. Nor did he enter into the world with those advan“ tages which you enjoy ; the exploits and dignity of his father reflected

^d Appian's account is as follows : Cæsar, upon his landing in Africa, being informed that Scipio was gone to meet King Juba, took the opportunity of his absence, and drew up his army before the enemy's camp. Labienus, and Petreibus, Scipio's Lieutenants, accepted his defiance, and vigorously beat back Cæsar's men, driving them before them with contempt, till, Labienus's horse, wounded in the belly, having thrown him, he was obliged to quit the fight. Petreibus, who took the command, contenting himself with having tried the courage of his soldiers, caused the retreat to be sounded, saying to those about him, We must not deprive Scipio, our General, of the honour of beating Cæsar.

V. R. 27. "on him no considerable lustre. Do you, dignified by your descent, B. C. 45. "bestir yourself and call together your friends, and vindicate your 45. C. 45. "own liberty, that of the Commonwealth, and of every good and
 "honest man." Roused by the remonstrances of a man of such gravity, young Pompey collected about thirty sail of ships, of which a few were galleys, and, sailing from Utica to Mauritania, invaded the kingdom of Bogud, who was in alliance with Cæsar; but he had little success in this attempt. With an army of two thousand men, composed of freedmen and slaves, of whom some were armed and some not, he approached the city of Ascurum, in which the King had a garrison. The inhabitants suffered him to advance to the very walls and gates, and then, sallying out of a sudden, they drove him quite back to his ships. This defeat determined him to leave that coast, and he steered directly to the Balearian islands, and Spain, whither he was invited by a party which had declared for him; and there he raised a force sufficient to appear against Cæsar the following year, and to dispute with him the Roman empire.

Scipio, having left a strong garrison in Utica, under the command of Cato, had marched to Adrumetum, and, a few days after, joined Petrius and Labiens, whose camp was but three miles distant from Cæsar's. Juba also was advancing at the head of a great body of horse and foot, when news was brought him that *P. Silius and King Bogud had united their forces, entered Numidia, and taken Cirta, the most opulent city of the country, by storm, with two other towns of the Getulians, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. He therefore marched immediately back to hinder the further devastation of his territories, leaving only thirty elephants behind him; but, as soon as he had put his kingdom in a better posture of defence, ordering Sabura to make head against Silius, he returned again to Scipio with three legions, eight hundred horse, a body of Numidian cavalry, thirty elephants more, and a great number of light-armed infantry. Both armies for four months were continually observing each other's motions; during which time there happened frequent engagements between detachments from the two camps, in which Cæsar had commonly the advantage. Scipio, on his arrival, had appeared very desirous of coming to a general battle, and brought out his troops every day; but Cæsar had not collected all his forces, and he was sensible from the last encounter, in which he had so much difficulty to bring off

* P. Silius was a Roman Knight, who, having made himself obnoxious to the laws, had been obliged to leave Italy, and retired into Africa. There he got about him a great number of Italians and Spaniards, of whom he formed a small army, and, in the wars between the petty Princes in Africa, he let himself out to the best bidder: And, it being remarked, that the side he espoused always came off victorious, he gained great reputation, and was much courted. He was in alliance with Bogud, who favoured Cæsar.

his men, that, having to do with an army so superior in number, and commanded by experienced officers, it was necessary to use the greatest caution. He therefore kept within his intrenchments, and applied himself to gain over to his interest the people of the country, and to encourage desertion in the enemy's camp. He succeeded in his intentions; and the Africans, in particular, came to him in crowds when they understood that he was related to C. Marius, for whose name they had the greatest respect. The Pompeians, at the same time, were diligent in disciplining their elephants; and Cato was daily inlisting freedmen, Africans, slaves, and all that were of age to bear arms, and sending them to Scipio's camp.

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
45.
406 Conf.

When Cæsar, however, saw all his forces drawn together, and had taught them how to fight with elephants, and with troops who never stood their ground, but, after a fierce attack, retreated to return again, he was as desirous to give battle, as he had been formerly averse to it. But Scipio, in his turn, had changed his scheme, and resolved very prudently to protract the war. On the fourteenth of April, Cæsar, to force him to an engagement, decamping at midnight, marched to Tbapsus, a sea-port town of the utmost importance to the enemy, and where Vergilius commanded with a strong garrison. The very first day after his arrival he began the circumvallation, and soon raised all the forts necessary both for his own security, and to prevent any succours from entering the town. Scipio and Juba, to avoid the disgrace of abandoning Vergilius and the Tbapsitani, who had all along remained firm to their party, followed Cæsar without delay, and posted themselves in two camps eight miles from Tbapsus. They attempted first to throw troops into the place, but, finding that to be impossible, they resolved to give battle[†]. For this purpose Scipio approached with his army, and began to intrench himself about fifteen hundred paces from the sea. Cæsar immediately, leaving two legions to guard his camp, marched all the rest of his forces with the utmost expedition to the place where the enemy was posted. At the same time, he ordered part of his fleet to make as near the shore as possible towards the enemy's rear, and observe the signal he should give them; upon which they were to raise a sudden shout, that the enemy, alarmed and [†] Plutarch in Cat. tells us, that Cato opposed this resolution with the greatest earnestness, and insisted upon protracting the war. But that Scipio rejected his advice with disdain; and, in a letter he sent him, taxed him with cowardice, and told him that he ought to be satisfied with being safe in a good city, behind strong walls; and that it was taking too much upon him to dissuade others from following the dictates of their courage. Cato, nettled at the reproach, replied, that, if he would give him back the troops he had brought, he was ready to march at the head of them into Italy, and that it was more for their interest so to do, than to risk all in Africa. Plutarch adds, that he then sorely repented the having given up the command to a man who was incapable of a prudent conduct in the war, or of any moderation in victory: And indeed Hirtius has given us several instances of his cruel disposition.

Y. R. 227. disturbed by the noise behind them, might be forced to face about.
 B. f. Cnr. He found Scipio's army in order of battle before the intrenchments, 45. 406 Conf. which were not yet perfected, and the elephants were ranged in the two wings. Upon this he drew up his army in three lines: He placed the second and tenth legions in the right wing, the eighth and ninth in the left, and five legions in the center: He covered his flanks with five cohorts posted opposite to the elephants, and disposed the archers and slingers in the two wings, and the light-armed troops, which he intermingled with his cavalry. He himself, on foot, went from rank to rank to rouse the courage of the veterans, putting them in mind of their great reputation for bravery; and to exhort the new levies to emulate the valour of the veterans, and attain the same degree of glory.
 As he spoke to his soldiers, he observed the enemy to be very uneasy, hurrying from place to place; one while retiring behind the rampart, then coming out again in great tumult and confusion; and his officers, making the same observation, begged that he would give the signal for battle. While he hesitated whether he should restrain the eagerness of his troops, a trumpeter in the right wing sounded, of a sudden, the charge, and all the cohorts rushed forwards. The Centurions strove in vain to keep them back, and Cæsar, perceiving that their ardour could not be checked, spurred on his horse and charged the enemy in the center. On the right wing the archers and slingers poured such a volley of arrows and stones upon the elephants, that these animals, which were not perfectly disciplined, turning upon their own men, trod them down, and rushed into the camp through the gates, which were but half finished. The Mauritanian horse followed them; upon which the legions pushed on to the intrenchments which they soon carried;
 and the greatest part of the troops that defended them fled to the camp, which they had quitted the preceding day. Thither they were followed, and, finding neither General to command them, nor any security, they made towards Juba's quarters. This being likewise forced by the victorious troops, they retired to a hill; where, seeing their case desperate, they endeavoured to soften their enemies, saluting them with the name of brethren: But the veterans, transported with rage, were not only deaf to their cries, but even killed and wounded some persons of distinction of their own army, whom they suspected to wish well to the contrary party. Ten thousand of the enemy were slain upon the spot: The rest were dispersed, and their three camps carried sword in hand with the loss of only fifty men killed, and a few wounded.

The garrison of Thapsus, during the battle, had sallied out of the town with a view either to assist Scipio, or to make their escape; but had been beat back by the servants and followers of the camp. Cæsar, in his return from the battle, stopped before the town, and ranged the sixty elephants he had taken, with their trappings and castles, in full view of the place. He was in hopes, by this evidence of his success, to induce Vergilius to a surrendry; and he farther invited him to it by reminding him of his experienced clemency. No answer, however, being given, he retired from before the town; but, next day, after returning thanks to the Gods, he assembled his army before it, and, in the sight of the inhabitants, praised his soldiers from his tribunal, and rewarded them according to their deserts. Then leaving C. Rebellius, one of his Lieutenants, with three legions, to continue the siege, he sent Cn. Domitius, with two, to invest Tisdra, where Confidius now commanded, and marched himself towards Utica.

Scipio's cavalry had taken the same road in their flight, and, arriving at Parada, were refused admittance, the inhabitants being already apprised of Cæsar's victory. They thereupon forced the gates, and, lighting a great fire in the market-place, threw all the inhabitants they could seize into it, without distinction of age or sex, with all their effects: And thence they marched directly to Utica. Cato, who commanded there, knowing the common people to be well affected towards Cæsar, who had formerly procured them great privileges, had turned them out of the town, and obliged them to encamp without the walls under the protection of a slight intrenchment, round which he had placed guards. The cavalry attacked first this camp, but the people, animated with the news of Cæsar's victory, and enraged at the ill usage they had met with, repulsed them, though they had no other arms than clubs. Disappointed in this attempt, they entered the town, and began to sack it. Cato, unable to prevail with them to abstain from rapine and undertake the defence of the place, gave each of them an hundred sesterces, and Faustus Sylla gave them as many more, to retire in peace: And he marched them into the territories of Juba. Many of the other fugitives had by this time arrived at Utica, and Cato, having assembled them with the three hundred Roman merchants settled in the town, and of whom he had formed a council, he exhorted them to set their slaves free, and join with him in the necessary measures for defence; but, finding them averse to this resolution, he furnished them with ships to make their escape. He himself, having settled all his affairs with the utmost care, and recommended his children to L. Cæsar, his Quæstor, without the least indication, which might give cause of suspicion, or any change in his countenance and behaviour, privately carried a sword into his chamber, when he went to sleep, and stabbed himself with it. The wound, however, not proving mortal, and the noise of his fall creating a suspicion, a physician, with some of his friends, broke into his chamber, and endeavoured to bind it up; which he no sooner was sensible of, than, tearing it open again with his own hands, he expired with undaunted resolution and presence of mind. The Uticans, though they hated his party, yet, in consideration of his singular integrity, his behaviour, so different from that of the other Chiefs, and the wonderful fortifica-

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
45.
406 Cons.

Y. R. 707- tions he had erected to defend their town, interred him honourably.
 Ed. Cl. This is the account we find of Cato's conduct and death in the Memoirs
 45- concerning the African war, and it contains the substance of Plutarch's 406 C. n. longer narrative. As the Greek historian's circumstantial relation, however, has passed hitherto for authentic, and is the ground-work of all the panegyric which has been written upon Cato, it might look like partiality, if we should omit it. It is as follows:

Plut. in The news of the battle of Thapsus, and the utter ruin of Scipio's and
 C. Juba's armies, caused the greatest consternation in Utica. Cato applied himself first to quiet the minds of the people, by representing to them, that the reports were greatly exaggerated; and, as he went from street to street, his presence appeased for a time their apprehensions. His next care was to assemble the three hundred Roman merchants or bankers, with whom he used to consult, and who had been very serviceable to his cause: And, after bestowing due praises upon their past fidelity and services, he exhorted them above all to a strict union, as the only means by which they could support themselves, or make themselves considered by the Conqueror. He then told them to consult together what was proper to be done, and that, if they thought fit to submit to fortune, he would ascribe their resolution to necessity; but that, if they resolved to persist in the defence of their liberty, he would be their Leader in such a glorious cause. " Rome, he said, had " often emerged out of greater difficulties: The Conqueror was per" plexed in many difficult affairs: Spain had revolted to Pompey's sons:
 " And the Romans would unanimously throw off a yoke which they " wore with indignation." His speech had the desired effect: All appeared zealous for the prosecution of the war, and promised to arm themselves: But a little reflection soon cooled their ardour. " Who " are we? said they, and to whom do we refuse submission? Is not " Cesar vested with the whole authority of the Roman empire? Does
 " he not command its forces? Shall we dispute the possession of Utica
 " with him to whom Pompey and all his adherents were forced to aban" don Italy? And, when the whole earth submits to his yoke, shall " we undertake the defence of the Roman liberty?" They made a declaration of these sentiments to Cato, and many of them even formed a design of seizing the Roman Senators, and delivering them up to Cesar, the better to ingratiate themselves with him. Cato, sensible that it was impossible to keep Utica, gave notice of it to Scipio and Juba; the first had escaped to his fleet at sea, and then lay concealed behind a promontory not far from the city; and the other was hid in the neighbouring woods, and had sent messengers to him. The arrival of Scipio's cavalry gave Cato fresh hopes, and he went out to meet them, attended by all the Roman Senators except M. Rubrius, whom he left to watch the motions of the three hundred during his absence. He addressed the Commanders of this body of cavalry, and entreated

entreated them not to give themselves up to a foreign Prince, but to prefer Cato to Juba, representing to them the dishonour of such a conduct, and that, by affording a protection to him and the Senators with him, they would provide for their own safety in a town so well furnished with provisions and every thing necessary to hold out a siege. The officers replied, they would consult their troopers, and Cato sat down on an eminence waiting their answer. Here Rubrius came to him, complaining of the audaciousness of the three hundred, who had revolted, and raised a commotion in the city. Cato sent him back to beseech them to wait his return. The answer of the cavalry added to his perplexity. They sent him word “that they had no inclination to serve under Juba; nor any apprehensions of Cæsar when under Cato’s command: But that they would not put their trust in the inhabitants of Utica, whom, therefore, he must consent to murder, or expel the city, if he would make use of their assistance².” Cato’s answer was, “that he would consult with the three hundred.” Upon his return into the town, he found that these men were come to a resolution of having recourse to Cæsar’s mercy, and explained themselves pretty clearly on their design of delivering up the Senators; and, at the same time, notice was given him that the cavalry were making off. Cato, fearing lest the three hundred should immediately execute their threats, when they saw themselves delivered from the cavalry, called for a horse and rode after them, and by his entreaties, which he accompanied with tears, he with much difficulty prevailed upon them to halt one day; and, having brought them back, posted them at the gates of the city, and put them in possession of the citadel. The three hundred, alarmed at this proceeding, assembled, and invited Cato to their meeting. The Senators were very earnest to dissuade him from putting himself into their hands, but he knew that he had nothing to fear from them. They began by making their acknowledgments for the confidence he reposed in them, and gave him the strongest assurances of their respect and of their attachment to his person; but told him, that they were not Cato’s, and could not attain to his exalted sentiments. They added that they had come to a resolution to send Deputies to Cæsar to implore his clemency; but that the first and principal object of their solicitation should be Cato’s safety, which if they could not obtain, they would fight in his defence to the last moment of their lives. Cato thanked them for their good-will towards him, approved of their design of submitting to Cæsar, and advised them to lose no time, but desired them to make no solicitation in his favour. “It is proper, said he, for the vanquished to have recourse to prayers, and for those who have com-

² We are told by Plutarch, that Juba had proposed, in the beginning of the war, to destroy the city and exterminate the inhabitants, and that Scipio had consented to this massacre; but that Cato opposed it with so much vehemence and indignation, that the barbarous project was not carried into execution.

Y. R. 757. "mitted faults to sue for pardon. As for me, I have been invincible Ref. Chr. "during the whole course of my life, and even now I am victorious, 456 Conf. "and triumph over Cæsar by the superiority of justice and equity. It ——— "is he that is conquered: This day is he attainted and convicted by "undeniable evidence, notwithstanding what he has said to the con"trary, of plotting against his country." Cato, as he came out from this conference, was informed, that Cæsar was on his march with the greatest part of his forces to besiege Utica. Alas! says he, he pays us a compliment we do not deserve: He takes us for men. Another message was brought him presently after from M. Octavius, who sent to let him know that he was near Utica with two legions, and was ready to join him, but it was necessary first to settle who should have the command in chief. Cato returned no answer to the message, but, addressing himself to his friends, "Well, says he, ought we to be "surprised that our affairs have not succeeded, since, when upon the "brink of ruin, we are contending for the the vain honour of com"mand." His only care now was to hasten the departure of the Ro- man Senators before the cavalry retired; and, having ordered all the gates of the town to be shut, except that which led to the port, he appointed ships and furnished every thing requisite to those who were to sail. The cavalry, now looking upon Utica as a town of their enemies, had begun to plunder it; but Cato, interposing, wrested, out of the hands of those he met first, the spoils they were carrying off, and the rest threw away of their own accord what they had seized, and departed in silence, ashamed of what they done. He then called together the citizens of Utica, and recommended it to them to act in concert with the three hundred, and seek their common safety together with them. Having done this, he went to the port and took leave of the Senators who were about to embark. His son, however, remained with him, and Statilius, a young man remarkable for his hatred to Cæsar. He did not insist upon his son's departing, but endeavoured to persuade the other to go with the rest:
 And, upon his refusing to do it, he turned to Apollonides and Deme- trius, two philosophers who constantly attended him; "it is your bu"siness, said he, to bend that stubborn spirit, and give it a more use"ful turn." Cato then returned to his affairs, and dispatched business all that night and the greatest part of the following day. L. Cæ- sar, being appointed Deputy for the three hundred, begged of Cato that he would assist him in drawing up the speech for the occasion; and declared, at the same time, that he would be also mediator for him, and would throw himself at the Dictator's feet, and embrace his knees to obtain his pardon. "By no means, replied Cato; were I
 "disposed to owe my life to Cæsar, I should myself go to him, but I "will not be beholden to the tyrant for any act of his injustice: For "it is unjust in him to pretend as a master to pardon those over whom
 " he

“ he has no lawful power. But, if you please, let us consider what “ it is proper to say in behalf of the three hundred.” They then conferred together on this subject, and Cato at parting recommended to him his son and the rest of his friends. These being assembled at his house, among other discourse, he forbid his son to take any share in the administration of public affairs; “ for to act as became him was “ now impossible, and to do otherwise was dishonourable.” Towards evening he went into the bath, and, there calling to mind Statilius, he inquired of Apollonides whether he had succeeded with him; “ and is “ he gone, said he, without taking leave of us? “ No, replied the “ philosopher; I have discoursed much with him, but to no purpose:
 “ He is resolute, and declares that he will stay and follow your ex“ ample.” Cato smiled, and answered, “ of that we shall soon judge.”
 After bathing he supped with his friends and the magistrates of the city. They sat late at table, and the conversation was lively: The discourse falling upon this maxim of the Stoics, that the wise man alone is free, and that the vicious are slaves, which Demetrius, who was a Pe- ripatetic, undertook to confute from the principles of his school, Cato, in answer, treated the matter very amply, and with so much earnestness and vehemence of voice, that he betrayed himself, and confirmed the suspicions which his friends had already conceived of his design to kill himself. When he had done speaking, a melancholy silence ensued; and Cato, perceiving it, turned the discourse to the present situation of affairs, expressing his concern for those who had been obliged to put to sea, as well as for those who, having determined to make their escape by land, had a dry and sandy desert to pass. After supper, the company being dismissed, he walked for some time with a few friends, and gave his orders to the officers of the guard; and, going into his chamber, he embraced his son and his friends with more than usual tenderness, which farther confirmed the suspicions of the resolution he had taken. Then, laying himself down on his bed, he took up Plato's Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul. Having read for some time, he looked up, and, missing his sword, which his son had removed while he was at supper, he called a slave and asked who had taken it away; and, receiving no pertinent answer, he resumed his reading. Some time after he asked again for his sword, and, without shewing any impatience, ordered it to be brought to him: But, having read out the book, and finding nobody had brought him his sword, he called for all his servants, fell into a rage, and struck one of them with so much violence on the mouth, that he very much hurt his own hand, crying out in a passionate manner, What?
do my own son and family conspire to betray me, and deliver me up naked and unarmed to the enemy? Immediately his son and friends rushed into the room, and began to lament, and to beseech him to change his resolution. Cato, raising himself, and looking fiercely at them, How long

Y. R. 707.
 Bef. Chr.
 45.
 406 Conf.

Y. R. 707. long is it, said he, since I have lost my senses, and since my son has become
 Ref. Cl. my keeper? Brave and generous son, why do you not bind your father's 455 Cont. hands, that, when CÆSAR comes, he may find me unable to defend myself? Do you imagine, that without a sword I cannot end my life? Cannot I destroy myself by holding my breath for some moments, or by striking my head against the wall? His son answered with his tears, and retired. Apelionides and Demetrius remained with him, and to them he addressed himself in the following words: Is it to watch over me that you sit silent here? Do you pretend to force a man of my years to live? Or can you bring any reason to prove, that it is not base and unworthy of Cato to beg his safety of an enemy? Or why do you not persuade me to unlearn what I have been taught, that, rejecting all the opinions I have hitherto defended, I may now by CÆSAR's means grow wiser, and be yet more obliged to him than for life alone? Not that I have determined any thing concerning myself, but I would have it in my power to perform what I shall think fit to resolve upon: And I shall not fail to ask your counsel, when I shall have occasion to act up to the principles which your philosophy teaches. Go, tell my son that he should not compel his father to what he cannot persuade him. They withdrew, and the sword was brought by a young slave: Cato drew it, and, finding the point to be sharp, Now, said he, I am my own master: And, laying it down, he took up his book again, which, it is reported, he read twice over. After this he slept so soundly, that he was heard to snore by those who were near him^b. About midnight he called two of his freedmen, Cleantes, his physician, and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in the management of his affairs. The last he sent to the port, to see whether all the Romans were gone: To the physician he gave his hand to be dressed, which was swelled by the blow he had given his slave. This, being an intimation that he intended to live, gave great joy to his family. Butas soon returned and brought word, that they were all gone except Crassus, who had staid upon some business, but was just ready to depart. He added, that the wind was high and the sea rough. These words drew a sigh from Cato. He sent Butas again to the port to know, whether there might not be some one, who, in the hurry of the embarkation, had forgot some necessary provisions, and had been obliged to put back to Utica. It was no: break of day, and Cato slept yet a little more, till Butas returned to tell him, that all was perfectly quiet. He then ordered him to shut his door, and he flung himself upon his bed, as if

^b There are doubtless several circumstances in this story which have the appearance of a forgery. It is not probable that a man in such a heat of passion, and taken up with the thoughts of putting an end to his life, would sleep so soundly. And it is still more strange, that he should read twice over Plato's Phædo, to confirm himself in his desperate resolution: For there is not a passage in it to encourage self-murder, and many against it: Indeed the whole is so, and no one, who admires the death of Socrates, can ever die like Cato.

he meant to finish his night's rest. But, immediately, he took his sword, and stabbed himself a little below his chest; yet, not being able to use his hand so well by reason of the swelling, the blow did not kill him. It threw him into a convulsion, in which he fell from his bed, and overturned a table near it. The noise gave the alarm, and his son, and the rest of the family, entered the room, where they found him weltering in his blood, and his bowels half out of his body. The surgeon upon examination found that his intestines were not cut, and was preparing to replace them and bind up the wound, when Cato, recovering his senses, thrust the surgeon from him, and, tearing out his bowels, immediately expired.

Thus died, according to his admirers, the famous Cato, in the forty eighth year of his age. "If we consider his character without prejudice," dice, says a celebrated writer, he was certainly a great and worthy man; a friend to truth, virtue, liberty: Yet, fallaciously measuring all duty by the absurd rigour of the Stoical rule, he was generally disappointed of the end which he sought by it, the happiness both of his public and private life¹. In his private conduct, he was severe, morose, inexorable; banishing all the softer affections, as natural enemies to justice, and as suggesting false motives of acting, from favour, clemency, and compassion: In public affairs he was the same²; had

¹ What this Stoical rule was, we are told in another place, p. 564. "The Stoics were the bigots or enthusiasts in philosophy; who held none to be truly wise and good but themselves; placed perfect happiness in virtue, though stripped of every other good; affirmed all sins to be equal; all deviations from right equally wicked; to kill a dunghill-cock, without reason, the same crime as to kill a parent; that a wise man could never forgive; never be moved by anger, favour, or pity; never be deceived; never repent; never change his mind. With these principles, Cato entered into public life." These, certainly, were never the practical principles of any man; and, if to live a wise man, or to be a true Stoic, is to live up to them, Cato had no pretensions to that character. He was often deceived; sometimes he changed his mind, was very subject to envy and anger, and sometimes was moved by favour. There are many examples of his frailties in the foregoing pages. The account of this pretended rule, by which Cato measured all duty, is taken from the oration of Cicero pro Murena; in which the orator ridicules the Stoics, and banters Cato, who was the accuser. Cato was so far from acknowledging the rule to be his, that he cried out, What a merry Consul we have got? Cicero was Consul when he spoke this oration.

² This made him obstinate, rather than constant, morose instead of being grave, and sour, when he would be most sincere. His humour was not only always overcast, but sometimes broke out upon his best friends in indecent passions: His temper was rather stiff than steady; for he was as inflexibly in the wrong as in the right; he withstood compassion as resolutely as bribery, and avoided common decency as much as flattery: He would come into the Forum with nothing but his under garment on, and that loose; his bosom and feet bare; and in this condition sit upon the bench when he was Prætor, and pass sentence upon those of the first quality. Ptolemy, King of Egypt, being at Rome, and desiring to speak with him, he sent word, as he was upon the close-stool, that he might come to him, if he had any thing to say to him. See his behaviour on his return from the Cyrian expedition, and after his losing the consulate. This gives a suspicion of his setting too great a value upon his actions, and being liable to something of vain-glory. Adams.

Y. R. 707. " but one rule of policy, to adhere to what was right, without regard Bef. Chr. " to times and circumstances, or even to a force that *could controul him*¹ :
 406 Conf. " For, instead of managing the power of the Great, so as to mitigate " the ill, or extract any good from it, he was urging it always to acts of " violence by a perpetual defiance ; so that, with the best intentions in " the world, he often did great harm to the Republic. This was his ge" neral behaviour ; yet, from some particular facts, it appears that his " strength of mind was not always impregnable, but had its weak pla" ces of pride, ambition, and party-zeal ; which, when managed and
 " flattered to a certain point, would betray him sometimes into mea" sures contrary to his ordinary rule of right and truth. The last act of " his life was agreeable to his nature and philosophy : When he could
 " no longer be what he had been ; or when the ills of life overbalanced
 " the good ; which, by the principles of his sect, was a just cause for " dying ; he put an end to his life with a spirit and resolution which " would make one imagine that he was glad to have found an occasion " of dying in his proper character. On the whole, his life was rather " admirable than amiable ; fit to be praised rather than imitated."

L. Cæsar,

¹ Nothing is right that is not so, taking in the consideration of all circumstances of time, place, and persons. But, besides, did Cato make right the rule of his conduct, when he opposed salutary laws, because proposed by Cæsar ; when, in punishing Cataline's accomplices, he extended, against the fundamental laws of the state, the prerogative of the Senate ; and when he refused to allow Cæsar what had been granted him by a law of the people, and a decree of the Senate. Have we not seen him a riotous Magistrate, violating the privilege of the tribuneship in the person of one of his colleagues, and, from personal hatred to Cæsar, approving of bribery and corruption at the elections for magistracy ? See Vol. III. p. 383, 399.

" It is said, in another place, p. 564, that " after a perpetual course of disappoint-
 " ments and repulses, finding himself unable " to pursue his old way any farther ; instead " of taking a new one, he was driven by his " philosophy to put an end to his life." We have seen above, a King of Cyprus, a friend and ally of the Roman people, accused of no practices, nor suspected of any designs against the Republic, yet deprived of his kingdom and estate by an iniquitous law preferred by P. Clodius ; and that our Stoic philosopher Cato took upon him to execute this unparalleled act of injustice, and valued himself upon this his Cyprian expedition. Ptolemy, unable to resist the Roman power, and too proud to take up with a private station after he had reigned so long, was driven by his royal philosophy to put an end to his life by poison. In what is the Stoic philosophy of Cato preferable to the royal philosophy of the Cyprian Monarch ? What can be alledged to excuse the one, which does not equally excuse the other ? Ptolemy, I should imagine, was driven to that extremity by injuries much more evidently unjust and more affecting than were those which Cato complained of. But we are told by Cicero, that it was becoming and proper in Cato to die in this way ; and that otherwise he would not have kept up the decorum of life, which consists in maintaining a certain likeness in all our actions, a certain equality of behaviour : And this, he adds, is grounded upon universal and particular nature. " The difference of particular nature, says he, which forms the several " characters of men, is of that force, that

 " one sometimes ought to kill himself,
 " and yet another in the same circumstances
 " ought not ; for was not Cato's case the " very same with that of those who surren" dered themselves to Cæsar in Africa ?
 " And yet, perhaps, it would have been
 " blameable in them to have killed them" selves, because their manners were gent-
 " ler

L. Cæsar, to procure some advantages by Cato's death, assembled the people, and in an harangue exhorted them to throw themselves upon Cæsar's clemency, from which they had the greatest reason to hope the best.

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
45.
466 Conf.

Cæsar from Thapsus had marched to Usceta, where Scipio had laid up a great store of corn and ammunition, and which immediately surrendered: He entered also Adrumetum without opposition, where he found Q. Ligarius and C. Convidius, the son, whom he pardoned. In his way to Utica, he was met by L. Cæsar, who threw himself at his feet, and begged for nothing more than that he would grant him his life. He obtained this favour, and it was extended likewise to Cætina, C. Alcius, P. Atrius, L. Cella, father and son; M. Eppius, M. Aquinius, to Cato's son, and the children of Damasippus. Being informed of Cato's death, Cæsar is reported to have broke out into this exclamation: O Cato! I envy thee the glory of thy death, since thou hast envied me that of saving thy life. On his entering the town, he summoned an assembly of the people, and thanked them for the affection they had shewn to his cause. At the same time he censured severely and enlarged upon the crime of the three hundred merchants, who had furnished Scipio and Varus with money; but concluded with telling them, that they might shew themselves without fear, as he was determined to grant them their lives, and content himself with exposing their effects to sale; and that he would give them notice when their goods were to be sold, and allow them the liberty of redeeming them upon payment of a certain fine. The three hundred who had served his enemies with zeal, and dreaded Cæsar's resentment, were very well pleased with these conditions, and begged that he would impose a certain sum in gross upon them all: And he accordingly

Hist de
Ecl. Afric.

Plut. in Cat.

B b 2

ingly

“ler and easier: But, as nature had given “Cato an incredible bravery, and he had “confirmed this by a perpetual constancy, “and had always remained immoveable in “what he had once resolved and undertaken, it became him rather to die than see “the face of the tyrant.” But is not this a justification of the same desperate behaviour in every wrong-headed, obstinate, and perverse man?

The public good, in his own sense of it, required of Cato, I should think, to remain in life, and pursue the ruin of the tyrant. In his speech to the three hundred, after the battle of Thapsus, did he not tell them, “that, if they continued firm against Cæsar, “they would thereby avoid his contempt; “and that Rome had fallen lower, and “merged from yet greater dangers.” This was as true in regard to him as to them; and, though they had not spirit enough to follow his counsel, he should, however, have done himself what he exhorted others to do. He might certainly have done good service to his party in Spain: And, after Cæsar's death, a great field of action would have opened to him.

Some authors have imputed Cato's death to his hatred to Cæsar: And indeed no persons in the world were more contrary in their humours and manners. The opposition of temper between two persons engaged in the same place, about the same affairs, very naturally gives rise to enmity; and this, in the present case, was increased by family injuries. Cæsar's intimacy with Servilia, Cato's sister, was once the talk of all Rome. Cato accordingly seems to have opposed Cæsar furiously in every thing, right or wrong: And there is no absurdity in

Y. R. 707.
Ber. Chr.

456 Conf.

1614583 l.
Hist de
Bell. Afric.

ingly amerced them in two hundred millions of sesterces^a, to be paid to the Republic at six different payments within the space of three years. Juba had fled with Petreius towards Zama, his place of residence, which he had strongly fortified in the beginning of the war; but the inhabitants, who were dissaffected towards him^a, could not be prevailed upon, either by threats or intreaties, to open their gates, or even to deliver to him his wives and children. They sent ambassadors to Cæsar, to signify to him this their intention, and to desire that he would prevent by a speedy succour any attempt the King might make upon their town. At the same time Tisdra was abandoned by Considius, and Vergilius surrendered Thapsus; and the same of his clemency brought over to Cæsar, on his march, all the Numidian officers that remained. Juba, seeing himself deserted on all sides, and that there was no longer any hope of safety, proposed to Petreius an engagement in which they should mutually kill each other. Petreius fell first, and the King immediately endeavoured to dispatch himself, but was obliged to have recourse to one of his slaves, on whom he prevailed to perform that last office. P. Silius, in the mean time, having defeated the army of Saburra, and slain the General, was marching through Mauritania to join Cæsar, and chanced to fall in with Faustus and Afranius, who had put themselves at the head of the party that had plundered Utica, and were making their way to Spain. This Commander, having notice of their approach, placed himself during the night in an ambuscade, and, attacking them upon their march by break of day, he either killed or made them all prisoners, except a few that escaped from the van. Afranius and Faustus were among the prisoners, with their wives and children: And our author says, that they were slain a few days after, together with L. Cæsar, in a mutiny of the soldiers. Dio and Florus report, that they were killed by Cæsar's order, or at his instigation; and Suetonius has observed, that this was the general belief. And perhaps they had no pretensions to his mercy. L. Cæsar had shewn himself his implacable enemy on all occasions, had treated several of his domestics with more than ordinary cruelty, and had ordered the beasts to be killed which the Conqueror had destined for his games in Rome: And Afranius and Faustus were taken in their flight to his enemies in Spain. But since Cæsar had laid it down to himself as a general law, not to put any citizen to death in cold blood, in supposing that the last act of his life was directed by that principle, which so powerfully influenced him in other parts of his conduct. I do not say but that Cato died in character, but I think that his death is far from reflecting any lustre on his life.

^a Appian writes, that Cæsar put to death all he could find of the three hundred who had formed Cato's Senate. This author must have invented a number of facts and circumstances of facts, which, certainly, no memoirs, how partial soever, could have transmitted to him.

* And they had very good reason, if, as Hirtius tells us, before he set out against Cæsar, he had raised a mighty pile of wood in the market-place, and declared a resolution, in case he did not conquer, to massacre all the citizens, and destroy their bodies and effects in one general conflagration.

it

it is not probable that he made an exception to this rule in the case of these two and his relation L. Caesar. Cicero bestows this encomium on his clemency, “that the citizens which the Republic lost were carried off by the common chance of war, and not through any resentment of the conqueror”. To Pompeia, the wife of Faustus, and her children, he not only granted a pardon, but permitted them the free enjoyment of all their effects. Nor had Scipio better success in his flight: He had got together twelve galleys, with a design to make for the coast of Spain, but was obliged by stress of weather to put in at Hippo, where Sitius’s fleet chanced to be at that time. Scipio’s vessels were most of them sunk; and, when he saw that there was no hopes of escaping, he stabbed himself, and in his last moments behaved with magnanimity; for when one of Sitius’s soldiers, who had boarded his ship, enquired what was become of the General? He answered himself, the General is safe.

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
45.
406 C. inf.

Florus, iv.
2.

From Utica Caesar marched to Zama, where he exposed to sale the goods of King Juba, confiscated the estates of the Roman citizens settled there, who had joined in the war against him, and converted the kingdom into a Roman province. Sitius, who had done him such signal service, was put in possession of Cirta, formerly the royal city of Masiniſſa and of Syphax; and which, from the name of its new inhabitants, was afterwards called the colony of the Sitians. When he returned to Utica, he, in the like manner, confiscated and sold the effects of all who had the rank of Centurions under Petreius and Juba; and he fined the several towns that had served his enemies in proportion to their revenue, but suffered none to be plundered by his soldiers. The only distinction he made between the Romans who readily submitted after the battle of Pharsalia, and those whose obstinacy forced him to conquer them a second time in Africa, was, that the first were immediately restored to all their former privileges, and the last remained in exile till after the Spanish war, when he granted a general pardon. Dio tells us, that he gave the same instance of his moderation after the battle of Thapsus, which had done him so much honour after that of Pharsalia, in burning all the papers of Scipio without reading them. Salust, the historian, was left to govern the new Roman province of Numidia, where he amassed great wealth, which enabled him, on his return to Rome, to purchase the famous Sallustian gardens in the city, with several villa’s in the country, in which he spent the remainder of his life, in a learned and splendid retreat from all public business¹.

CHAP.

¹ Quos amissimus cives, eos martis vis perculit, non ira victoria. Cicero pro Marcello.

² As this is the last time we shall have occasion to mention Salust, it may not be improper to subjoin a few particulars concerning him. It appears by all his writings, as well as by the favour shewn him by Caesar, that he was of the popular party. In his early youth, as he tells us himself, he was Bell. Cat.

C H A P. IX.

Cæsar returns to Rome ; the honours decreed him : His four triumphs ; his civil administration and clemency.

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
455 Conf.
Hist. de
Bell. Afric.

CÆSAR left Utica on the 13th of June, having put an end to a war of great importance, and attended with extreme difficulty, in little more than five months. He took his way by Sardinia, from whence he sent part of his fleet and legions into Spain, under the command of C. Didius, his Admiral, and his Lieutenants Q. Fabius, and Q. Pedius, with orders to observe the motions of the sons of Pompey. After a short stay in that island, he put to sea on the 29th; but, meeting with foul weather in his passage, he did not get to Rome before the end of July.

Dis, l. xliii. The uncertain event of the African war had kept the Senate under some reserve ; but they now began to push their flattery beyond all bounds of decency, and decreed more extravagant honours to Cæsar than were ever given before to any mortal. It was decreed, that there should be feasts and rejoicings for forty days, to celebrate his late victory ;

Afon. in Cic. Mil.

was carried away by ambition, and sought preferment. At what time he was made Quæstor is uncertain ; but he was Tribune of the people in 701, when Pompey was sole Consul ; and at first acted vigorously against Mila, though he afterwards became more tractable. In 703, he was turned out of the Senate by the Aristocratic Censor Appian, for his immoral life, and notorious debauchery ; and, if we believe the anonymous author of an invective against him, he left Rome to join Cæsar. As soon as the civil war broke out, he wrote an epistle to Cæsar, upon the regulation of the Commonwealth ; where he vents his spleen against Pompey and the faction of the Nobles, and was, in the year 704, named Quæstor a second time, and thus recovered his seat in the Senate. He seems to have written his second epistle to Cæsar in the year 706, while the Dictator was yet in Asia, who caused him to be named Prætor for the following year. Cæsar then employed him in the African war, and recompensed his services with the grant of the government of the province. In this government he is accused by Dio of having exercised the most flagrant oppressions ; and Cæsar, it is said by this author, gave him express orders to plunder the people, rather than to protect them. This testimony of Dio is supported by the authority of an old grammarian, and of the author of the abovementioned invective, who tell us, that, on his return to Rome, he divided his spoils with Cæsar, who screened him from all prosecution. The riches he had acquired enabled him to pass the remainder of his days in a learned retreat ; and it was then that he wrote the history of the conspiracy of Cataline, of the war against Jugurtha, of the attempts of Lepidus, and the war against Sertorius in Spain ; which last history he carried backwards twelve years to the commencement of the Social or Marsic war. In regard to the private life and character of this historian, it must be remarked, that, as he had reviled the vices of the Nobility with great vehemence, and had thereby created to himself many enemies, injurious aspersions would be thrown out against him. We are informed by Suetonius, that Lenæus, a freedman of Pompey, wrote a violent invective against him, because, in speaking of his patron Pompey, he had said, that, with a modest exterior, he had a shameless soul : Oris probi, animo inverecondo fuisse. Eusebius in Chron. says, he died in the year 718, four years before the rupture between Antony and Octavius.

Dio, l. xlii.

that,

that, when he triumphed, his chariot should be drawn by four white horses, as those of Jupiter and of the Sun; and that, besides the ordinary number of Lictors belonging to his offices, he should be preceded by all those of his former dictatorships. He was created Dictator for ten years, and Inspector of Morals for three; his statue was placed in the Capitol opposite to that of Jupiter, with the globe of the earth under his feet, and with this inscription, To Caesar the Demi-god.

Ever since the commencement of the civil war, he had found no leisure for celebrating the triumphs, which he had so justly deserved. He thought therefore the present time the most convenient for this purpose; and, in one month, he enjoyed four triumphs, which were conducted with a magnificence answerable to the wealth of the empire he was master of. His first triumph was over the Gauls; the next over Ptolemy and Egypt; the third over Pharnaces and Pontus; and the fourth over King Juba. We are told that the apparatus of each of these triumphs (by which is meant probably the pedestals and frames for the statues, pictures, and other representations) was different; that citron-wood was made use of in the first, tortoise-shell in the second, acanthus in the third, and ivory in the fourth. In that over the Gauls, which was the most splendid of the four, were carried the Rhine and the Rhone, and the captive ocean represented in gold. Dio adds a most improbable circumstance, that a multitude of prisoners preceded his chariot, among whom was distinguished Vercingetorix, the unfortunate Chief of confederate Gaul, who had been reserved upwards of six years, to grace his Conqueror's march to the Capitol, and was afterwards thrown into a dungeon, and put to death with other captives. But Caesar never acted with this barbarity against his enemies, when in the actual pursuit of conquest; and much less would he now be guilty of it towards a nation from which he had lately received so many signal proofs of their attachment to his cause and person. The axle-tree of the triumphal chariot broke in the way, and he did not arrive at the Capitol till night, which he ascended by the light of lustres and flambeaux, carried by forty elephants ranged on the right and left: And the Greek historian, just now mentioned, tells us, that, notwithstanding the divine honours decreed him, he, in a very humble and supplicating posture, and upon his knees, climbed up the steps of the Capitol. In the triumph over Egypt was represented the river Nile, and the Pharos on fire; and the death of Achillas and Potbinus in two different pictures. Dio says that Arsinoë, Cleopatra's sister, appeared there as a captive, and was afterwards set at liberty. This circumstance, however, is to be found in no other author, and Hirtius has informed us, that Caesar banished her the kingdom of Egypt before he left Alexandria. The triumph over Pharnaces had nothing more remarkable than the inscription, Veni, vidi, vici, engraved in capitals on a tablet. In the fourth marched Juba's son, a child; who afterwards gained great reputation

Y. R. 707- by his learning, and was restored to the kingdom of Mauritania. Appian says, that the money carried in these processions as the fruits of his victories, amounted to sixty-five thousand talents, besides two thousand eight hundred and twenty-two crowns of gold, weighing together twenty thousand four hundred and fourteen Roman pounds.

These triumphs were followed by rewards to his soldiers, and largesses to the citizens: To the first, besides land and settlements according to their services, he gave each veteran twenty thousand sesterces, double of that sum to every Centurion, and four times as much to the Tribunes. One hundred and fifty thousand citizens received from his bounty each ten bushels of corn, ten pounds of oil, and four hundred sesterces in money; and, at the same time, the whole body of the people was treated with the greatest profusion at twenty-two thousand tables placed in the streets. To these expences Cæsar further added public spectacles of all sorts. For the Circensian games, the Circus was enlarged on each side, and a canal sunk round it: And several young men of the greatest families ran the races in chariots drawn, some by four, some by two horses, and some on a single horse. The Trojan game was acted by two companies of lesser and larger boys, children of the nobility. The hunting of wild beasts was represented for five days together; and at last a battle was fought by five hundred foot, twenty elephants, and thirty horse on each side; to make room for which the goals were taken away, and in their room two camps pitched opposite to one another. Wrestlers too performed for three days together in a stadium provided for the purpose in the field of Mars. A lake was sunk in the lesser Clodius, in which the people were entertained with the representation of Egyptian and Tyrian galleys of two, three, and four benches of oars, and a sea-fight. He also dedicated this year his temple to Venus Geni-

Appian relates, that in these triumphs were to be seen representations of all the memorable events of the Civil War; and portraits of all the Romans of distinction, who had lost their lives in it, Pompey only excepted; of Metellus Scipio, for example, falling on his own sword, and of Cato tearing out his bowels. But it is certain, that Cæsar imitated Sylla upon this occasion, and gave no offence by shewing the wounds of his country, and insulting over the misfortunes of his fellow-citizens: For Cicero, who in his eighth Philippic mentions the spectators concern when they saw the city of Marsilia carried in triumph, would not have omitted those other affecting circumstances. The soldiers, on festivals of this kind, were allowed the liberty, during the procession, of singing verses, which sometimes contained the victor's praises, but were much oftener satyrs on him. Suetonius tells us, that they now reproached their General with his debauchery, and revived the suspicion which he had formerly lain under during his stay at the Court of Nicomedes, King of Bithynia; a suspicion which gave him great offence, but which he could never get clear of, notwithstanding his oath to the contrary. Suet. in Cæs. xlix. 57. Pliny says that, dissatisfied with the rewards bestowed on them, they reproached him with the bad food they had lived upon at Dyrrhacium. Plin. xix. 8. And Dio writes that they all told him with one voice, If you act the honest part (by resigning your usurped power) you will be punished; but, if you continue to be unjust, you may continue to reign over us. Dio l. xliii.

trix;

trix; opened his new Forum; and celebrated the funeral obsequies of his daughter Julia, Pompey's wife. Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.

Many Roman Knights, to make their court to the Dictator, and please the populace, debased themselves so far as to enter the lists of gladiators. Furius Leptimus, a man of a prætorian family, and Q. Calpurnius, who had been a Senator, fought a prize in the Forum. Decimus Laberius, a Roman Knight, acted a mimic piece of his own composition, in compliance with Cæsar's will; and, being immediately presented with five hundred thousand sesterces and a gold ring, he went from the stage, through the orchestra, into the seats assigned for the equestrian order*. 406 Conf.
Suet. in
Cæf. 39.
40361.

When these festivals and rejoicings were over, Cæsar turned his attention towards matters of state and the administration of justice. He filled up the vacancies in the Senate, advanced several Commoners to the dignity of Patricians, and enlarged the number of Prætors, Ædiles, Quæstors, and inferior magistrates, restoring such as had been disgraced by the Censors, or condemned for bribery in elections. He admitted to the offices of the Republic the sons of those who had been proscribed by Sylla. He introduced Gauls and other foreigners, who had enriched themselves in his service, into the Senate; and, on this account, he has been greatly censured*. Dio and Macrobius tell us, that he increased the number of Senators to nine hundred, whereas the House formerly did not consist of above six hundred: And such an augmentation, we may observe, is greatly recommended in a letter to Cæsar, attributed to Sallust, the historian, concerning the regulation of the State. But we have no mention of this matter in any of Cicero's letters, or in any authentic writing; nor of the augmentation of magistrates mentioned by Suetonius: Though the increase of the Senate, if true, implied that of the magistrates, that there might be Quæstors enough to fill up the

* Laberius, to get to his place, was obliged to pass over the benches of the Senators; and Cicero, as he came by him, said to him, I would make room for you on our benches, if we were not already too much crowded: meaning to ridicule Laberius, and at the same time to reflect on the number of new Senators. The Poet made him this smart answer: You surprise me; for you were wont to sit on two stools at once; a proverbial expression to signify a trimmer. It appears that the Knights were greatly disgusted to see one of their body upon the stage, and that Laberius had consented to appear there against his will. We are told, that, to make some amends, and to shew a spirit more suitable to his rank, he inserted some lines, which gave offence to Cæsar, and engaged him to award the prize to Publius Syrus, La- berius's competitor: Romans, we are losing our liberty. He, who is feared by many, has many to fear. Necessesse est multos timet, quem multi timeant. Macrobius Sat. xi. 3.

* Suetonius c. lxxx. says that, on this occasion, the following advertisement was stuck up in different parts of the city: Bonum factum. Ne quis Senatori novo curiam monstrare velit: "This is to give notice, that persons are desired not to shew any of the new Senators the way to the Senate-house." And, according to Macrobius, the great increase of Senators occasioned a joke of Cicero; who, being applied to by one of his friends for his interest to get his son-in-law made a Senator in one of the municipal towns: "At Rome, said he, the thing is easy: At Pompeii it is more difficult."

Y. R. 707. annual vacancies of the Senate without any particular creation of Sena-Bef. Chr. tors. We are told, that from this time there were 14 Prætors, and 40 45. Conf. Quæstors.

Suet. in
 Cæ. 41. The choice of the magistrates he so divided with the people, that, excepting only the competitors for the consulship, they chose one half of them, and he the other half: And his way was to recommend such as he had pitched upon, by billets dispersed through the several tribes to this effect: Cæsar, the Dictator, to such a tribe: I recommend to you such and such persons, that, by the favour of your votes, they may attain to the respective honours they sue for. We do not, however, find any division of magistracies between Cæsar and the people in Cicero's letters: It appears; on the contrary, that the Consuls, Prætors, Ædiles, Tribunes and Quæstors were all elected according to the usual forms.

Dio l. 43. He restrained the trial of causes to two ranks of Judges, those of the
 Suet. in
 Cæ. 41. Equestrian and Senatorian orders, laying aside the Commissioners of the Treasury, who had before made a third class.

Id. In the quality of Master of Manners, he surveyed the people, but not in the usual method or place. He made the census in the several streets by those called Domini insularum; and he reduced the number of those who received corn from the public, from three hundred and twenty thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand. And, to prevent all riots for the future upon account of the survey, he ordered, that, every year, a choice should be made by lot, by the Prætor, in the room of such as died, out of those who had not been enrolled for the receipt of corn. He reduced the number of the poor citizens, by sending fourscore thousand into colonies beyond seas. He enacted, that no freeman of the city above twenty, and under forty, should be allowed to absent himself three years together from Italy; that no Senator's son should go into foreign parts, unless in the retinue of some Governor; and that those who had pasture ground should have no less than a third part of their shepherds free-born. He made all such as practised physic in Rome, and all masters of liberal arts, free of the city, in order to fix them in it, and invite others to the place. To many, who had shewed themselves zealous in his cause, he communicated the like favour: And we have a proof from one of Cicero's letters, that, in bestowing this privilege, he acted with discretion. For, having found that some of his friends had abused his confidence by exposing this privilege to sale, he made a general revocation of such grants, and examined anew the grounds upon which they had been given. He encouraged marriages at the same time, and decreed rewards to those who had a numerous offspring.

Suet. in
 Cæ. 41. He disappointed the expectation of many in his regulation concerning debts. Several of his followers were in hopes that these would be wholly cancelled; a thing, as we have seen, that was frequently moved for; but he ordered that the debtors should satisfy their creditors, deducting only only what interest had been paid since the commencement of the civil war, by virtue of which order, Suetonius says, a fourth part of the debt was lost.

V. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
45.
406 Conf.

He abolished all companies of artificers but such as were of ancient establishment: For the corporations of later institution had been chiefly erected by turbulent magistrates, such as Clodius, with a view to have in the city so many companies to vote, or regiments to fight, for them.

Suet. in
Cæs. 42.

Luxury being carried to great excess in dress, furniture, building, eating, and sepulchral monuments, he revived the sumptuary laws, and was very desirous to carry them into execution. He laid duties on the importation of foreign commodities; and the use of coaches, jewels, and scarlet cloth was allowed only to certain persons. We are told that he appointed Commissioners to inspect the markets, and seize upon all the victuals which were exposed to sale contrary to law; and that he sent officers into private houses, to take off the tables the prohibited rarities, when he heard of any prevarications in this particular. All this care, however, was to no purpose: Luxury still continued to prevail.

Ad Att.
xiii. 7.

He was indefatigable and very strict in the administration of justice*. He enforced the laws against crimes by more severe punishments: And, because the rich were easily induced to transgress, by reason of their being only punished with banishment, he stripped parricides or murderers of their whole estates, and other offenders of one half. He turned such as were convicted of bribery out of the Senate; and he dissolved the marriage of a Senator of prætorian rank, who had married a woman two days after her divorce from a former husband, though there was no suspicion of any former unlawful commerce betwixt them.

Suet. in
Cæs. 43.

One of the most considerable as well as most useful of his laws was, that no Prætor should hold any province more than one year, or a Consul more than two. This was a regulation that had been often wished for, as Cicero says, in the best times; and what one of the ablest Dictators of the old Republic had declared to be its chief security, not to suffer great and arbitrary commands to be of long duration; but to limit them at least in time, if it was not convenient to limit them in power†. Cæsar knew by experience that the prolongation of these extraordinary commands, and the habit of ruling kingdoms, was the readiest way not only to inspire contempt of the laws, but to give a man the power to subvert them. He secured by this law his own possession and power from the attempts of all future invaders; and, after him, it was the

Dio 43.
Phil. i. 8.

* Jus laboriosissimè ac severissimè dixit. Suet. 43.

† Mamercus Æmilius.—Maximam autem, ait, ejus custodiam esse, si magna imperia diuturna non essent; et temporis modus imponeretur, quibus juris imponi non posset. Liv. iv. 24.

Y. R. 707. most proper to secure the liberties of the State, by preventing any
 Def. Cnr. other man from doing what Pompey and he himself had done.

⁴⁶
 406 Cons. It was at this time also, that he set himself to reform the calendar; a work of general benefit to mankind. The Roman year, from the old institution of Numa, was lunar; borrowed from the Greeks; among whom it consisted of three hundred and fifty-four days. Numa added one more to them, to make the whole number odd, which was thought the most fortunate; and, to fill up the deficiency of his year to the measure of the solar course, inserted likewise, or intercalated, after the manner of the Greeks, an extraordinary month of twenty-two days, every second year, and twenty-three every fourth, between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth day of February. If Numa had stuck to the lunar year of 354 days, by this intercalation his year would have been as regular as that of Cæsar, but, by adding his odd day, each year deviated from the solar one whole day too much: Which irregularity he might easily have corrected by striking out of the intercalary month eight days every eighth year. This, however, was not done, and there appears to have been a progression of all the months in the year, relatively to the seasons: And we find, that the Consuls, and other magistrates entered upon their offices in different ages of the Republic, in January, in December, in October, in July, and in March; though the commencement of their magistracies must have been always in the winter-season. Numa committed the care of these intercalations to the College of Priests; who, it is commonly asserted, partly by a negligent, partly by a superstitious, but chiefly by an arbitrary abuse of their power, used either to drop or to insert them, as it was found most convenient to themselves or their friends to make the current year longer or shorter. But, when the last intercalation was made in the year 701, Pompey being sole Consul, the first of January of the following year was very near the winter solstice, and therefore in its right place; and the great confusion, in the year 707, proceeded from the omission of the intercalary months during six successive years. Cæsar resolved to put an end to this disorder for the future, as well as for the present, by abolishing the source of it, the use of intercalations; and, instead of the lunar, to establish the solar year, adjusted to the exact measure of the sun's revolution in the zodiac, or to that period of time in which it returns to the point from which it set out: And as this, according to the astronomers of that age, was supposed to be three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours, so he divided the days into twelve artificial months, and to supply the deficiency of six hours, by which they fell short of the sun's complete course, he ordered a day to be intercalated every fourth year between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of *February*⁷. But, to make this year begin and end regularly, he was forced to insert into the current year two extraordinary months between November and De- cember; the one of thirty-three, the other of thirty-four days; besides (add Suetonius and Censorinus) the ordinary intercalary month of twenty-three days, which fell into it of course. But Dio is positive, that he added no more than sixty-seven days: And, though his authority is not decisive, yet as he seems to have examined this point, and there is no probability of there having been any intercalation since the beginning of the civil war, sixty-seven days were sufficient to replace the months in their proper seasons; which sixty-seven days were lost, since 701, by the omission of three intercalations. All this was effected by the care and skill of Sofigenes, a celebrated astronomer of Alexandria, whom Cæsar had brought to Rome for that purpose: And a new calendar was formed upon it by Flavius, a Scribe, digested according to the order of the Roman festivals, and the old manner of computing their days by calends, ides, and nones; which was published and authorised by the Dictator's edict not long after his return from Africa. This year therefore was the longest that Rome had ever known, consisting of four- teen months, or four hundred and twenty-two days; and is called the last of the confusion, because it introduced the Julian or Solar year, with the commencement of the ensuing January; which continues in use to this day in all Christian countries; without any other variation than that of the old and new style.*

⁷ This day was called Bissexus from its being a repetition or duplicate of the sixth of the calends of March, which fell always on the twenty-fourth; and hence our intercalary, or Leap-year, is still called Bissextile. See Middl. p. 170.

All the regulations mentioned above were not enacted merely by Cæ- sar's dictatorial authority: They were confirmed either by decrees of the Senate, or orders of the People, according to their nature. Indeed grants to foreign Princes were often made in the name of the Senate, though the affair had not been referred to the House; but this had been practised before Cæsar's reign, and these jobs had been esteemed the perquisites of the Consuls*.

The

* This difference of the old and new style was occasioned by a regulation made by Pope Gregory, A. D. 1582; for it having been observed, that the computation of the vernal equinox was fallen back 10 days from the time of the Council of Nice, when it was found to be on the 21st of March; according to which all the festivals of the Church were then solemnly settled; Pope Gregory, by the advice of astronomers, caused ten days to be entirely sunk and thrown out of the current year, between the 4th and 15th of October.

* Ep. Fam ix. 15. Middl. p. 152. "While I am still at Rome, and attend the Forum, says Cicero, in a letter to Papirius Pætus, the Senate's decrees are all drawn at our "friend's house; and, whenever it comes into his head, my name is set down as if present at drawing them; so that I hear from Armenia and Syria of decrees said to be made at my motion, of which I had never heard a syllable at home. Do not take me to be in jest, for I assure you, that I have received letters from Kings from the remotest parts of the earth, to thank me for giving them the title of King; when, so far from knowing that any such title had been decreed to them, I knew not even that there were any such men in being. What is then to be done? Why, as long as our Master of Manners continues here, I will follow your advice; but, as soon

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
45.
406 Conf.

Pliny, Hist.
Nat. xviii.
25.

Macroh.
Sat. i. 3.
Dio, 227.

Y. R. 707. The Dictator distinguished himself also, during his stay at Rome, by the greatest acts of clemency and generosity to his most avowed enemies. M. Marcellus, who, when Consul, began the attack upon Cæsar, and prosecuted it for three years by his relations, whom he got successively into the first dignity of the State, retired, after the battle of Pharsalia, to Mitylene, where he lived in ease without making any advances to Cæsar, and it was with difficulty he consented that his friends should sue for his pardon. In an assembly of the Senate, Piso, Cæsar's father-in-law, undertook to broach the affair, and immediately C. Marcellus, brother to Marcus, threw himself at Cæsar's feet; upon which the whole Senate, rising from their seats, seconded the request. Cæsar complained of the moroseness of Marcellus, and made a parallel of his behaviour with that of others towards him, and particularly with that of S. Sulpicius, his colleague in the consulate; but presently declared, contrary to all their expectations, that, whatever offence he had received from the man, he could refuse nothing to the intercession of the Senate, though he knew that he had many enemies who had designs upon his life^b. And it was upon this occasion that Cicero delivered that ingenious and eloquent panegyric on Cæsar, in which he justifies the Dictator's conduct in the civil war, and professes a personal affection for him, and zeal for the preservation of his life, insomuch that he declares himself ready to put himself between a pointed dagger and his body^c. Marcellus, however, did not live to enjoy the

"soon as he is gone, will run away to join you over a plate of mushrooms." Was it not a great grievance that Cæsar should grant favours, without the privacy of the Senate, to men so insignificant that Cicero had never heard of them?

^b The whole history of this transaction is related by Cicero, in a letter to Sulpicius, Ep. Fam. iv. 4. Mem. ix. 17.

Guthrie, Vol. i. p. 167—171. Mikil. p. 167. "Now proceed I to your heavy charge and gloomy suspicions (says Cicero to Cæsar, in his speech for Marcellus) all which ought to be guarded against not more by you than by every Roman, especially by us whom you have preferred: And, though I hope they are groundless, yet never shall I endeavour, by my expressions, to extenuate them; for your circumspection is our safety; and, were I to err on any extreme, it should be that of too much caution, rather than too little prudence. But who can be such a madman? Is he of your friends? Who can be more so than they whom, contrary to their own expectations, you brought from ruin! Is he of those who followed you to the field? Where is the wretch so frantic, as not to prefer, even to his own life, the life of the man, under whose command he has risen to all that ambition could wish! But, if your friends enter in to no conspiracy, may not your foes? Where are these to be found! For all, who formerly were so, either owed their death to their own stubbornness, or their life to your mercy. Thus no man who ever was your foe is now alive, or, if alive, he is now your determined friend.

"Yet, as the mind of man is so dark and so impenetrable, we ought to increase your distrust, and, at the same time, your circumspection. For, shew me the man so new to the affairs of life, such a novice in this State, so unheeding either his own or the common safety, as not to be sensible, that in your preservation his own is included, and upon your life depends the life of every Roman? For my part, when I meditate night and day on the accidents of life, the uncertain enjoyment the benefit of his pardon. He had left Mitylene in the beginning of the following year, and was come as far as Piræus on his way towards Rome ;

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
45.
406 Conf.

“ment of health, and the frailty to which “nature is subjected ; I tremble, I grieve,
“that this State, which ought to be eter“nal, should exist in the breath of one mor“tal. But if, with human accidents and “doubtful events depending on the natural “constitution, treason and villainy shall co“operate, to me it appears, that a God,
“were he willing, must be unable to save
“this country.

“By you, alone, O Cæsar ! every thing,
“which you see overthrown and overturned “by the unavoidable calamities of war, is “to be replaced : Public justice must be “restored, public credit must be retrieved ;
“the lusts of mankind suppressed, the race
“of mankind propagated, and every droop“ing branch of the constitution, that now “hangs its head, is to be reared and sup“ported by the wholesome severity of laws.
“There is no denying that, in so fierce a “civil war, amidst such a combustion of “arms and opinions, in every event the “State must receive a shock, by the beat“ing down some of her most graceful orna“ments and primest bulwarks. For the “head of each party, in the storm of war, “was forced on many measures which he “would have disapproved of in the calm of “peace. You alone are the physician to bind “up these bleeding wounds of your country, and “every application from any other hand must “prove ineffectual.

“With reluctance, therefore, did I hear “from your mouth that saying, which dis“covers at once the hero and the philoso“pher : *That you had lived long enough either
“for nature or for glory.* Enough, if you “will, for nature ; nay, I will add for glory “too : But surely not for the chief purpose
“of life, your country ! Give over, there“fore, I conjure you, that philosophical “contempt of death. Do not be a sage at “the expence of your country : For it has “often reached my ears, that it is com“monly in your mouth, that you have lived “long enough for yourself. True ! if I could “suppose that you lived for yourself, and “was born for yourself alone. But now “that your courage and conduct are connected “with the safety of ROMANS, and the con“stitution of ROME ; so far are you from “having completed, that you have not yet “laid the foundations of those great designs

“you meditate. Thus you limit your life, “not by the good of your country, but the “intentions of your equity : Yet even that “is not enough for the purposes of glory ;
“which, wise as you are, you must own to “be the ruling passion of your soul.

“*Shall I then, say you, leave behind me
“but a scanty portion of glory ?* Yes : to “others it would be sufficient : But to Cæ“sar it is but scanty. For what, considered “by itself is great, may prove but little “when compared with the degrees to which “it may be extended. If this was to be the “end of your immortal acts, that, after “conquering all your enemies, you should “leave the Republic in the condition in “which it is now ; consider, I beseech you, “whether your divine virtue would not ex“cite an admiration of you rather than any “real glory : For glory is the illustrious “fame of many and great services either to “our friends, our country, or to the whole “race of mankind.

“This part, therefore, still remains ; there “is one act more to be performed by you ;
“to establish the Republic again, that you “may reap the benefit of it yourself in “peace and prosperity. When you have “paid this debt to your country, and ful“filled the ends of your nature by a satiety
“of living, you may then tell us, if you “please, that you have lived long enough :
“Yet what is it, after all, that we can really “call long, of which there is an end ? For,
“when that end is once come, all past plea“sure is to be reckoned as nothing, since
“no more of it is to be expected. Though “your mind, I know, was never content “with these narrow bounds of life which “nature has assigned to us, but inflamed “always with an ardent love of immor“tality.

“Nor indeed is this to be considered as “your life, which is comprised in this bo“dy and breath ; but that, that, I say is “your life, which is to flourish in the me“mory of all ages : Which posterity will “cherish, and eternity itself propagate. It “is to this that you must attend ; to this “that you must form yourself : Which has “many

Y. R. 707. Rome; where he was killed by P. Magius Cilo, his friend and companion; who, though he had been Quæstor, and was of a family which had borne some of the public offices, had attached himself to the fortunes of Marcellus, and followed him through the wars, and in his exile. After having given him two wounds, the one in his stomach, the other in his head near the ear, he stabbed himself with the same poniard. As soon as the news reached Rome, it raised a general consternation: And, from the suspicious nature of the times, all people's thoughts were presently turned upon Cæsar, as if he were privately the contriver of it; and, from the wretched fate of so illustrious a citizen, every man began to think himself in danger. Cicero was greatly shocked at it, and seemed to consider it as the prelude of some greater evil to

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.

45.
4-6 Conf.

Middl. p.
134.

Il. p. 198.

" many things already to admire, yet wants
" something still, that it may praise in you.
" Posterity will be amazed to hear and read
" of your commands, provinces; the Rhine,
" the Ocean, the Nile; your innumerable " battles, incredible victories, infinite mo" numents, splendid triumphs: But, un" less this city be established again by your " wisdom and counsels, your name indeed
" will wander far and wide, yet will have " no certain seat or place at last, where to " fix itself. There will be also, among those " who are yet unborn, the same controver" sy that has been among us; when some
" will extol your actions to the skies; others
" perhaps will find something defective in " them; and that one thing above all, if " you should not extinguish this flame of ci" vil war, by restoring liberty to your coun" try: For the one may be looked upon as
" the effect of fate, but the other is the cer" tain act of wisdom.

" Pay a reverence, therefore, to those " Judges who will pass judgment upon you in " ages to come; and with less partiality per" haps than we, since they will neither be bi" ased by affection or party, nor prejudiced
" by hatred or envy to you; and though this,
" as some falsely imagine, should then have
" no relation to you, yet it concerns you
" certainly, at the present, to act in such a " manner, that no oblivion may ever ob" scure the lustre of your praises.

" Various were the inclinations of the " citizens, and their opinions wholly di" vided: Nor did we differ only in senti" ments and wishes, but in arms also and " camps: The merits of the cause were " dubious, and the contention between two " celebrated Leaders: Many doubted what " was the best; many what was convenient;

" many what was decent; some also what " was lawful: The Commonwealth, at " length, got over this ruinous, this destruc" tive war: Victory favoured the man whose
" resentment was not inflamed by conquest,
" but softened by clemency; the man who " did not condemn to exile, or death, the " enemy against whom he was exasperated.
" Some quitted their arms; they were forced " from others. That citizen is unjust and " odious, who, when hostilities are laid
" aside in the field, retains them in his " bosom; much more justifiable is he who
" lays down his life in the field of battle,
" and seals with his blood the cause he has
" embraced.

" But since all civil discord is now sub-
" dued by the arms, or extinguished by the " clemency of the victor, let us all think
" and act with unanimity. It is, O Cæsar,
" only by your remaining safe and fixed in
" the same principles which you have here" tofore, but more particularly this day ex" pressed, that we can be preserved. There" fore all of us who wish the prosperity of our " country, beg and intreat, that you would " provide for your life and safety; and all of " us, (I speak for others what I myself feel)
" as you suspect some reason to be cautious,
" promise not only to guard you by day, and
" watch you by night, but to form, with our " own bodies and our own breasts, the wall of
" your defence."

Though all this was mere compliment in Cicero, it might have been spoken with great truth and sincerity; for certain it is, that at this time, no power less than that of a Dictator, as Cæsar was, could remedy the disorders of the State.

ensue,

ensue; and Atticus, signifying his concern upon it, advises him to take a more particular care of himself, as being the only consular Senator left, who stood exposed to any envy. But Cæsar's friends soon cleared him of all suspicion; as indeed the fact itself did, when the circumstances came to be known, and fixed the whole guilt of it on the fury of Magius. It was Cicero's conjecture that Magius, oppressed with debts, and apprehending some trouble on that score, at his return to Rome, had been urging Marcellus, who was his sponsor for some part of them, to furnish him with money to pay the whole; and, by receiving a denial, was provoked to the madness of killing his Patron. Others assign a different reason, as the rage of jealousy, and the impatience of seeing others more favoured by Marcellus than himself^a.

Soon after the affair of Marcellus, Cicero had another occasion of trying both his eloquence and interest with Cæsar in the cause of Ligarius; who was now in exile, on account of having been in arms against Cæsar in the African war, in which he had borne a considerable command. His two brothers, however, had been on Cæsar's side; and, being recommended by Pansa, and warmly supported by Cicero, had almost prevailed for his pardon; when Q. Tubero, who had an old quarrel with him, being desirous to obstruct it, and knowing Cæsar to be particularly exasperated against all those, who, through an obstinate aversion to him, had renewed the war in Africa, accused him, in the usual forms, of an uncommon zeal and violence in prosecuting that war. Cæsar is said to have privately encouraged the prosecution, and ordered the cause to be tried in the Forum, where he sat upon it in person, strongly prepossessed against the criminal, and determined to lay hold of any plausible pretence of condemning him: But the force of Cicero's eloquence, exerted with all his skill in a cause which he had much at heart, got the better of all his prejudices, and extorted a pardon from him against his will^b. This Ligarius, after his return, lived

VOL. IV.

D. d.

in.

^a S. Sulpicius, who, in a letter to Cicero, gives the account above, tells him, that the Athenians refused to grant a place of burial for him within the city, saying, that it was forbidden by their religion, and had never been indulged to any man. He was therefore buried without the city in the Academy. Middl. p. 172. Ep. Fam. iv. 12.

^b The merit of this speech, says Dr. Middleton, is too well known to want to be enlarged upon: Those who read it will find no reason to charge Cicero with flattery: But the free spirit, which it breathes, in the face of that power to which it was suing for mercy, must give a great idea of the art of the Speaker, who could deliver such bold truths without offence; as well as of the generosity of the Judge who heard them not only with patience, but approbation. Middl. p. 173—175.

“Observe, Cæsar, says he, with what fidelity I plead Ligarius's cause, when I betray even my own by it. O that admirable clemency, worthy to be celebrated by every kind of praise, letters, monuments! M. Cicero defends a criminal before you, by proving him not to have been in those sentiments in which he owns himself to have been: Nor does he yet fear your secret thoughts, or, while he is pleading for another, what may occur to you about himself. See, I say, how little he is afraid of you. See with what a courage and gaiety of speaking your generosity

Y. R. 707.
Ref. Cl. r.
45.
406 Conf.

Ad. A. 1.
Lib. 10.

Val. Max.
ix. 11.

Ep. Fam.
vi. 14.

Plut. in
Cic.

Y. R. 707. in great confidence with Brutus, who found him a fit person to bear a Ref. Chr. part in the conspiracy against Cæsar; but, happening to be taken ill
 46. near the time of its execution, when Brutus in a visit to him began to la-406 Coml. ment, that he was fallen sick in a very unlucky hour; he, presently raising himself upon his elbow, and, taking Brutus by the hand, replied: Yet still, Brutus, if you mean to do any thing worthy of yourself, I am well.
 Nor did he disappoint Brutus's opinion of him, for we find him afterwards in the list of the conspirators.

Cicero composed, at this time, his panegyric upon *Cato*¹, which is lost: But, from the accounts given of the work by antiquity, it appears,
 that

“and wisdom inspire me. I will raise my “voice to such a pitch that the whole Ro“man people may hear me. After the war “was not only begun, Cæsar, but, in a “great measure, finished, when I was driven “by no necessity, I went, by choice and “judgment, to join myself with those who “had taken arms against you. Before “whom do I say this? Why before him “who, though he knew it to be true, yet “restored me to the Republic, before he “had even seen me; who wrote to me from “Egypt, that I should be the same man that “I had always been; and, when he was the “only Emperor within the dominion of “Rome, suffered me to be the other; and “to hold my laurelled fasces, as long as I “thought them worth holding.—Do you “then, Tabern, call Ligarius's conduct wic“ked? For what reason, since that cause “has never yet been called by that name?
 “Some indeed call it mistake, others fear;
 “those, who speak more severely, hope, am“bition, hatred, obstinacy, or, at the worst, “rashness; but no man besides you has ever “called it wickedness. For my part, were I to “invent a proper and genuine name for our “calamity, I should take it for a kind of fa“tality, that had possessed the unwary minds
 “of men; so that none can think it strange “that all human counsels were over-ruled “by a divine necessity. Call us then, if “you please, unhappy, though we can ne“ver be so under this Conqueror; but I “speak not of us who survive, but of those “who fell: Let them be ambitious; let “them be angry; let them be obstinate;
 “but let not the guilt of crime, of fury, of “parricide, ever be charged on Cn. Pompey
 “and on many of those who died with him.
 “When did we ever hear any such thing
 “from you, Cæsar? Or what other view

“had you in the war but to defend yourself from “injury?—You considered it, from the first,
 “not as a war, but a secession; not an hos“tile, but a civil dissension: Where both “sides wished well to the Republic; yet,
 “through a difference, partly of counsels, “partly of inclinations, deviated from the “common good: The dignity of the Lead“ers was almost equal; though not, per“haps, of those who followed them; the “cause was then dubious, since there was “something which one might approve on “either side; but now that must needs be “thought the best, which the Gods have “favoured; and, after the experience of “your clemency, who can be displeased
 “with that victory, in which no man fell
 “who was not actually in arms.”

It would have been difficult for Cæsar to have been angry with these bold truths.

¹ Dr. Middleton (p. 160) and Abbé Mon-gault imagine, that Cicero had been left a guardian to Cato's son, as he was also to young Lucullus, Cato's nephew. “This tes“timony of Cato's friendship and judgment
 “of him, says the former of these writers, “might induce him the more readily to pay
 “this honour to his memory. It was a mat“ter, however, of no small deliberation, in “what manner he ought to treat the subject:
 “His friends advised him not to be too ex“plicit and particular in the detail of Cato's “praises, but to content himself with a ge“neral encomium, for fear of irritating Cæ“sar, by pushing the argument too far. In “a letter to Atticus, (xii. 4.) he calls this “an Archimedean problem; but I cannot but “upon any thing, says he, that those friends “of yours will read with pleasure, or even “with patience: Besides, if I should drop “the account of CATO's votes and speeches in “the Senate, and of his political conduct in that he spared no pains to adorn it. Brutus, also, composed and published a piece on the same subject. Cæsar, far from expressing any resentment, affected to be pleased with them; yet declared that he would answer Cicero's; and Hirtius, in the mean while, drew up a little piece, in the form of a letter to Cicero, filled with objections to Cato's character, but with high compliments to Cicero himself; which Cicero took care to make public, and called it a specimen of what Cæsar's work was like to be. Cæsar's answer was not published till the next year, upon his return from Spain, after the defeat of Pompey's sons. It was a laboured invective; answering Cicero's book paragraph by paragraph, and accusing Cato with all the art and force of his rhetoric, as if in a public trial before Judges; yet with expressions of great respect towards Cicero; whom, for his virtues and abilities, he compared to Pericles and Themistocles of Athens: And in a letter upon it to Balbus, which was shewn by his order to Cicero, he said, that, by the frequent reading of CICERO's Cato, he was grown more copious; but, after he had read BRUTUS's, thought himself more eloquent.
 “the

Y. R. 707.
Bef. Chr.
45.
405 Conf.

Tac. An.
iv. 34.
Quint. iii.
7.
Plut. in Cic.

Ad Att.
xiii. 46.

Brutus, about this time, took a resolution of putting away his wife Claudia, to marry Porcia, Bibulus's widow, and his uncle Cato's daughter; a step for which he was much censured; since Claudia had no stain upon her character; was nobly born; the sister of Appius Claudius; and nearly allied to Pompey; so that his mother Servilia, though Cato's sister, seems to have been averse to the divorce, and strongly in the interest of Claudia against her niece. Cicero's advice upon it was, that, if Brutus was resolved upon the thing, he should do it out of hand, as the best way to put an end to people's talking; by shewing that it was not done out of levity or complaisance to the times, but to take the daughter of Cato, whose name was now highly popular: Which Brutus soon after complied with, and made Porcia his wife. And Cicero, when he separated from Terentia, in the beginning of this year, had thoughts of marrying the daughter of Pompey. Nothing shews better how much they presumed on Cæsar's mildness. He married, however, Publia, a young woman with a great fortune, to whom he was Guardian, to satisfy, says Plutarch, his creditors with her money. This drew upon him a great deal of censure; and was certainly an act of the greatest injustice to Terentia, who had lived with him upwards of thirty years, and had made him the father of two children extremely dear to him.

Middl. p.
193.

D d 2

C H A P.

"the State, and give a slight commendation
"only of his constancy and gravity, even this "will be more than they care to hear: But
"the man cannot be praised as he deserves,
"unless it be particularly explained, how he
"foretold all that has happened to us; how
"he took arms to prevent its happening; and
"parted with life rather than see it happen."

"These were the topics, which he resolved to display with all his force." And the Doctor thinks, that this work was a remarkable proof of his being no temporiser at this time. But, since Cæsar and his friends were so much pleased with the work, it is very evident that they did not find their condemnation in it. His orations for Marcellus, las,

Y. R. 707
B.C. 67
45.
406 Cons. is, for Ligarius, and afterwards for Dei- mus, may be called, with as good reason, remarkable proofs of his courage and veracity, whereas they are extraordinary examples of falsehoods and servile adulation. If we examine his private correspondence at this period, we shall find, that he acted a double part; making his court, on the one hand, to Cæsar, and passing his whole time with Cæsar's friends, of whom he was continually asking favours; while, on the other hand, he was perpetually complaining of the state of affairs, in the bitterest and most unreasonabie terms, to Republican, and to Scipio then in exile.——The following letters accordingly will give the reader a most satisfactory account of his sentiments and way of life during Cæsar's administration: And we shall accompany them with some remarks.

CICERO TO PAPIRIUS PRÆTUS.

Ep. Fam.
1. 16.
Mich. vii.
20.
 “YOUR letter afforded me a very agreeable instance of your friendship, in the “concern it expressed lest I should be uneasy at the report which had been brought me “hither by messengers.” [This man had brought an account from the army in Africa, that “some wicked crimes of Cicero had been reported to Cæsar, which had given him offence] “I “was indeed too sore perfectly sensible how much you was disturbed at this circumstance,
 “by your care in sending me duplicates of a former letter upon the same subject: And I “then returned such an answer as I thought would be sufficient to abate, at least, if “not entirely remove this your generous solicitude. But since I perceive, by your last “letter, how much this affair still dwells upon your mind; let me assure you, my dear “Prætus, that I have employed every artifice (for we must now, my friend, be armed with “cunning, as well as prudence) to procure the good graces of the persons you mention: And,
 “if I mistake not, my endeavours have not proved ineffectual. I receive indeed so many “marks of respect and esteem from those who are most in Cæsar's favour, that I cannot “but flatter myself they have a true regard for me. It must be confessed, at the same “time, that a pretended affection is not easily discernible from a real one, unless in sea“sons of distress. For adversity is to friendship what fire is to gold; the only infal“lible test to discover the genuine from the counterfeit: as, in all other circumstances, “they both bear the same common signatures. I have one strong reason, however, to “persuade me of their sincerity: as neither their situation, nor mine, can by any means “tempt them to dissemble with me. As to that person [Cæsar] in whom all power is “now centered, I am not sensible that I have any thing to fear: or nothing more,
 “at least, than what arises from that general precarious state in which all things must “stand where the fence of laws is broken down; and that it is impossible to pronounce “with assurance of any event, which depends wholly upon the will, not to say the ca“price, of another. But this I can with confidence affirm, that I have not, in any single “instance, given him any just occasion to take offence: and, in the article you point out,
 “I have been particularly cautious. There was a time, it is true, when I thought it well “became me, by whom Rome itself was free, to speak my sentiments with freedom: But,
 “now that our liberties are no more, I deem it equally agreeable to my present situation “not to say any thing that may disgust either Cæsar or his favourites. But, were I to “suppress every rising railery, that might pique those at whom it is directed, I must re“nounce, you know, all my reputation as a wit: And, in good earnest, it is a character “upon which I do not set so high a value as to be unwilling to resign, if it were in my “power. However, I am in no danger of suffering in Cæsar's opinion, by being repre“sented as the author of any sarcasms to which I have no claim: As his judgment is “much too penetrating ever to be deceived by any imposition of this nature. I remem“ber your brother Servius, whom I look upon to be one of the most learned Critics that “this age has produced, was so conversant in the writings of our Poets, and had ac“quired such an excellent and judicious ear, that he could immediately distinguish the “numbers of Plautus from those of any other author. Thus Cæsar, I am told, when “he made his large collection of apothegms, constantly rejected any piece of wit that “was brought to him as mine, if it happened to be spurious: A distinction he is much “more able to make at present, as his particular friends pass almost every day of their “lives in my company. As our conversation generally turns upon a variety of subjects, I “frequently

“ frequently strike out thoughts which they look upon as not altogether void, perhaps, Y. R. 707.
 “ of spirit and ingenuity. Now these little sallies of pleasantry, together with the gene- Bef. Chr.
 “ ral occurrences of Rome, are commonly transmitted to Cæsar, in pursuance of his own 45.
 “ express directions: So that, if any thing of this kind is mentioned by others as coming 406 Conf.
 “ from me, he always disregards it. You see then, that the lines you quote, with so much “ propriety, from the tragedy of Oenomaus, contain a caution altogether unnecessary.
 “ For tell me, my friend, what jealousies can I possibly create? Or who will look with envy “ upon a man in my humble situation? But, granting I were in ever so enviable a state, “ yet, let me observe, that it is the opinion of those philosophers who alone seem to have “ understood the true nature of virtue, that a good man is answerable for nothing farther “ than his own innocence. Now, in this respect, I think myself doubly irreproachable:
 “ In the first place, as having recommended such public measures as were for the interest “ of the Commonwealth; and, in the next, when I found I was not sufficiently supported “ to render my counsels effectual, that I did not deem it advisable to contend farther by “ arms against a superior strength. Most certainly, therefore, I cannot justly be accused of “ having failed in the duty of a good citizen. The only part, therefore, that now re“ mains for me, is to be cautious not to expose myself, by any indiscreet word or action,
 “ to the resentment of those in power: A part which I hold likewise to be agreeable to “ the character of true wisdom. . . . But to turn from the serious to the jocular part “ of your letter.—The strain of pleasantry you break into, immediately after having quoted
 “ the tragedy of Oenomaus, puts me in mind of the modern method of introducing, at “ the end of those graver dramatic pieces, the buffoon humour of our low mimes, instead “ of the more delicate burlesque of the old Atellan farces. Why else do you talk of your “ paltry polypusses, and your mouldy cheese? In pure good-nature, it is true, I for“ merly submitted to sit down with you to such homely fare: but more refined company “ has improved me into a better taste: For Hirtius and Dolabella, let me tell you, are “ my Preceptors in the science of the table: As, in return, they are my disciples in that “ of the bar. But I suppose you have already heard, that they frequently declaim at my “ house, and I sup at theirs.”

To the same.

“ YOUR very agreeable letter found me wholly disengaged at my Tusculan villa. I Ep: Fam.
 “ retired hither during the absence of my pupils [Hirtius and Dolabella] whom I have ix. 18.
 “ sent to meet their victorious friend, in order to conciliate his good graces in my favour. Melm. viii.
 “ As Dionysius, the tyrant, after he had been expelled from Syracuse, opened a school, it 22.
 “ is said, at Corinth; in the same manner, being driven from my dominions in the Fo“ rum, I have erected a sort of academy in my own house; and I perceive, by your let“ ter, that you approve the scheme. I have many reasons for approving it too: And, “ principally, as it affords me, what is highly expedient in the present conjuncture, a “ means of establishing an interest with those in whose friendship I may find a protection.
 “ How far my intentions in this respect may be answered, I know not: I can only say, “ that I have hitherto had no reason to prefer the different measures which others of the “ same party with myself have pursued; unless, perhaps, it would have been more “ eligible not to have survived the ruin of our cause. It would so, I confess, had I “ died either in the camp, or in the field: But the former did not happen to be my “ fate; and, as to the latter, I was never engaged in any action. But, the inglo“ rious manner in which Pompey, together with Scipio, Afranius, and your friend Len- “ tulus, severally lost their lives, will scarcely, I suppose, be thought a more desirable “ lot. As to Cato's death; it must be acknowledged to have been truly noble: And I “ can still follow his example, whenever I shall be so disposed: Let me only endea“ vour, as in truth I do, not to be compelled to it by the same necessity: And this, indeed, “ is my first reason for engaging in my present scheme. My next is, that I find it an advan“ tage not only to my health, which began to be impaired by the intermission of exercises
 “ of this kind, but also to my oratorical talents, if any I ever possessed; which would have “ totally lost their vigour, if I had not had recourse to this method of keeping them in “ play. The last benefit I shall mention (and the principal one, I dare say, in your esti“ mation),

Y. R. 797. "mation" is, that it has introduced me to the demolishing a greater number of more delicious
 Ref. Chr. "peacocks, than you have had the devouring of paltry pigeons in all your life. The truth
 45. "of it is, whilst you are humbly sipping the meagre broths of the sneaking Aterius, I am 406 Conf. "luxuriously regaling myself with the savoury soups of the magnificent Hirtius. If you have "any spirit then, fly hither, and learn, from our elegant bills of fare, how to refine "your own. . . . To encourage you to do so, you shall be honoured with a chair and
 "cushion next to mine, and sit the second great pedagogue in my celebrated school."

The following letter to his friend NIGIDIUS FIGULUS, who was then in exile, is in a more melancholy strain :

Ep. Fam. "THOUGH I have been long looking out for an occasion of writing to you, yet
 iv. 13. "I have not only been unable to meet with any particular subject for that purpose, but Melm. ix. "find myself utterly at a loss even to furnish out a common letter. The calamities of
 3. "our country have spoiled me for those jocular epistles, with which, in happier days, I "used to entertain my friends : As fortune has rendered me incapable of writing, or in "truth of thinking upon any subject of a cheerful nature. There remains another species "of letters of a grave and serious cast, peculiarly adapted to these miserable times. But "as a letter of this kind ought to contain either some promise of assisting you to surmount
 "your misfortunes, or some arguments to support you under them ; from these too I am
 "likewise excluded. Sunk, indeed, as I am into the same abject fortune as yourself ;
 "what assistance can I possibly offer you ? The truth is, I am obliged to have recourse
 "myself to the aid of others : And I have much more reason to lament that I live upon these
 "disgraceful terms, than to rejoice that I am still in being. I say not this from any extraor"dinary injuries which I have suffered in my own person : As indeed there is nothing
 "which, in the present conjuncture, I could wish for myself, that Cæsar has not volun"tarily offered me. Nevertheless the sorrows that oppress my heart are of so severe a nature,
 "that I think myself guilty of a crime in still continuing to live. For I live deprived of ma"ny of my most intimate friends, whom death, or those public calamities which have "driven them from their country, have separated from me : As I have likewise lost, by "the same means, all those whose good-will I formerly conciliated, when, by your assist"ance, I successfully stood forth in defence of the Republic. I have the unhappiness,
 "at the same time, to be placed in the midst of the general wreck and plunder of their "fortunes : And not only have the pain to hear, (but, what is far more affecting) am a "spectator of the dissipation of the estates which belonged to those illustrious associates,
 "who assisted me in extinguishing the flames of that dangerous conspiracy. In a word, I "have the mortification to find myself utterly divested of all credit, authority, and ho"nours in that Republic, where I once flourished in the full possession of these glorious "distinctions. Cæsar, it is true, acts towards me with the utmost generosity : But his "generosity cannot restore what I have lost by the general violence and confusion of the "times. Thus, bereaved of those advantages to which I was habituated by genius, by "inclination, and by custom, I imagine the world is no less dissatisfied with me than I "am with myself. Formed indeed as I was by nature to be perpetually engaged in the "noblest and most important occupations, I am now deprived of every means, not only
 "of acting, but thinking to any public purpose. There was a time when my assistance
 "could have raised the obscure, and protected even the guilty : But now I cannot so "much as send a favourable promise to Nigidius ; to the virtuous and learned Nigidius ;
 "to the man who once flourished in the highest credit, and who was always my warmest "friend ! Thus you see that I am totally disqualified from writing letters to you of this "kind.

"The only subject, that remains to me then, is to endeavour to draw off your mind
 "from its inquietudes, by laying before you such arguments as may afford you a well-
 "grounded consolation. But, if ever any man was peculiarly qualified to employ the "strongest reasonings of this nature, either for his own use, or for that of others, most "undoubtedly it is yourself. Such, therefore, as may be drawn from the refined sources
 "of philosophy, I will not pretend to touch ; but shall leave them entirely to your own "suggestions. Whatever is worthy of a man of true wisdom and fortitude ; whatever is "agreeable

“agreeable to that character you have sustained in the world, and to those studies in Y. R. 707.
 “which you so early excelled; whatever, in short, is expected from a great and exalted Baf. Chr.
 “mind in the circumstances wherein you are placed, your own reflections will best supply. 45.
 “I will only take upon myself therefore to inform you of what I have been able to dis- 406 Conf.
 “cover from my being situated in Rome, and giving a particular attention to every occur“rence that passes. I will venture then with confidence to assure you, that your present “troubles (perhaps too I might add, that those of the Republic itself) will not be of long “continuance. For, in the first place, Cæsar seems well-inclined to recall you from “exile: And, trust me, I speak this from no hasty conjecture. On the contrary, I ex“amine his sentiments and disposition so much the more strictly, as I am less biassed in “his favour by any particular connexions. I am persuaded then that the single reason “for his delaying to restore you is, that he may, with a better grace, refuse the same fa“vour to others, against whom he is more warmly incensed. I am sure, at least, that all “his most intimate friends and favourites both think and speak of you highly to your “advantage. In the next place, the populace, or rather, I should say, the whole com“munity in general, are strongly in your interest. And, let me add, that the Republic “herself, whose power at present, it is true, is certainly inconsiderable, but who must ne“cessarily, however, recover some degree of credit; the Republic herself, believe me, will “soon obtain your restoration from those who at this time hold her in subjection. In this “respect therefore I may venture even to promise you some assistance. With this view,
 “I shall closely attach myself to Cæsar’s favourites; who are all of them indeed extreme“ly fond of me, and spend much of their time in my company: As I shall insinuate my“self into an intimacy with Cæsar; to which my own modesty has hitherto proved the sin“gle obstruction. In short, I shall pursue every probable means of this kind (and some-“too that I dare not commit to paper) in order to obtain your return. As to other ar“ticles of assistance, I am sensible there are many who are perfectly well inclined to offer “you their services; but you may depend upon me as the first and forwardest in that “number.”

TO CURIUS.

“THERE was a time when I thought you made a very injudicious choice, by pre- Ep. Fam; “ferring a foreign country to your own. I imagined that Rome (while yet alas! it was vii. 28.
 “Rome) must be far more suitable, I will not only say than Patrae, but even than the no- Melmu in “blest city in the Peloponnesus, to a man of your amiable and elegant turn of mind. But 25.
 “now, on the contrary, I look upon your having retired into Greece, when our affairs “were well nigh desperate, as a strong proof of your great penetration: And I consider “your absence not only as a very judicious, but a very happy resolution. Yet, why do
 “I call it happy, when it is impossible that happiness should be the portion of any man “in these wretched times, who possesses the least degree of sensibility? However, that “desirable privilege, which you, who were at liberty to leave Italy, enjoy by travelling,
 “I have procured by another method: And I can, in some sort say, no less than your“self, that I live

*Where nor the name, nor deeds accus’d, I bear,
 Of Pelops’ impious race—*

“For, as soon as my levee is over, (which is somewhat more frequented than formerly;
 “a Patriot being now looked upon as a sight of all others the most uncommon *) I shut “myself up in my library. And it is there, my friend, that I am employed in compo“sitions which you will find, perhaps, to be animated with all that spirit, which you “once said so ill agreed with my dejection and despair; when you reproached me at your “house, for not acting up to the fortitude that appeared in my writings. I must confess, I

*. A true Patriot was a sight in all ages too uncommon, it must be owned, not to have been worth remarking: But whether those who visited Cicero, in order to view so singular a curiosity, were disappointed or not, is a question, which does not require great sagacity to determine.

“could.

Y. R. 707. "could not at that time forbear lamenting the wretched fate of the Republic: To which
 Bef. Chr. "I was the more tenderly attached, as I had not only been distinguished with its honours,
 45. "but had greatly assisted it by my services. And even now that time (which wears out 406 Conf. "the sorrows of the weakest minds) together with reason which ought to have the strongest
 "influence for that purpose have jointly contributed to compose my breath; yet I still la-
 "ment to see the Commonwealth thus fallen, without a hope of ever rising more! There "is nothing, however, that can at present be justly imputed to him, in whom all power is now
 "reposed: unless, perhaps, it be that he has more than he ought. And, as to what is past,
 "our fate and our follies have had so large a share in all that has happened, that we cannot
 "complain with a good grace. As little reason is there to hope that affairs will mend. I "cannot, therefore, but conclude my letter as I began it, with admiring your judgment,
 "if it were choice, or your fortune, if it were chance, which led you from this unpleasing
 "scene."

The ingenious author of the life of Cicero, after having presented to his reader a few extracts from the foregoing letters, has made the following observations: "It is certain "that there was not a man in the Republic, so particularly engaged, both by principle
 "and interest, to wish well to its liberty, or who had so much to lose by the subversion of "it, as he: For, as long as it was governed by civil methods, and stood upon the foun"dation of its laws, he was undoubtedly the first citizen in it; had the chief influence in "the Senate; the chief authority with the People: And, as all his hopes and fortunes were
 "grounded on the peace of his country, so all his labours and studies were perpetually
 "applied to the promotion of it. It is no wonder, therefore, in the present situation "of the city, oppressed by arms and a tyrannical power, to find him so particularly im"patient under the common misery, and expressing so keen a sense of the diminution of his
 "dignity, and the disgrace of serving where he had been used to govern. CÆSAR, on the "other hand, though he knew his temper and principles to be irreconcilable to his
 "usurped dominion, yet out of friendship to the man, and a reverence for his character,
 "was determined to treat him with the greatest humanity; and, by all the marks of per"sonal favour, to make his life not only tolerable, but easy to him: Yet all that he could
 "do had no other effect on Cicero, than to make him think and speak sometimes favou"rably of the natural clemency of their master; and to entertain some hopes from it,
 "that he would be one day persuaded to restore the public liberty: But, exclusive of that
 "hope, he never mentions his government, but as a real tyranny, or his person in any "other style, than as the oppressor of his country."

Is it not amazing to hear Dr. Mann talk in this strain? Had Cicero been used to govern Rome? Cicero ever a slave to the Great, the perpetual panegyrist of the Triumvirs, and their tool to all the purposes of their ambition; who was no sooner abandoned by them, than he fell a sacrifice to the resentment of a young rake whom he had offended.
 "It is not wonderful that he should express so keen a sense of the diminution of his dignity,"
 Was there then more arrogance in his behaviour before the triumvirate, when, contrary to the views of the aristocracy, to ingratiate himself with Pompey, he defended the Gabinian and Manilian laws? After the triumvirate was formed, who was the promoter of Cæsar's power, but he? Of Crassus, that man whom he abhorred, but he? Who was the advocate of all the miscreants of the State, but he? Cicero all his life talked of his dignity, and could give a just definition of true dignity, when he pleased; but in his actions certainly he never shewed any, if dignity consists in an upright, open, generous behaviour, and not in prating to a Senate or a mob, right or wrong. — "He was impatient under the com"mon misery." But was really the State miserable under Cæsar's administration? Did he not restore order and peace in a distracted government? Did he not immediately set about making the most salutary laws? Was he not so intent upon their execution, as to be inclined to delay his expedition into Parthia, to give them, by his presence in the city, a greater force? Did not the people, under his short dominion, taste all the sweets of liberty but the name? And did not that empty name, under their own government, tolerate all the outrageous barbarity and injustice of the most absolute tyranny? Were order and justice no public blessings, because they were the gift of Cæsar? Did not Cicero himself enjoy the greater ease and liberty, and more power, by his interest with Cæsar, than
 he

he ever had in the Republic? And, when we view him in this tranquillity, opposed to Y. R. 707. the late tempestuous times he had been tossed in, was it gratitude in Cicero that he still talked of Cæsar as the oppressor of his country? Or, were the recovered sweets of life, which Cicero was now tasting, all imbibed, because the generosity of Cæsar, had no title to make them secure to him? If such indulgence were the effect of tyranny, what name should Cicero have given to that upright Republic that banished him? Bef. Chr. 45. 406 Conf.

But was not Cæsar the immediate destroyer of the Roman liberty? Certainly he was not: "Had Rome at the time of the civil war, been mistress of herself, both Pompey and Cæsar must have equally obeyed her. Though her government was not legally changed, it was so visibly altered by time and accidents, that it had then as much the appearance of an elective monarchy as of a Republic, its ancient liberty having scarce any one privilege left, but that of voting by the sword, what should be the name of the man that was to destroy it.—Had not the Republic almost consumed itself for want of an uncontrollable Magistrate? And was it better that the whole had perished, than that an uncommissioned power should have presumed to save the remains of it? Was so unasked a favour an injury, when public violence was grown too strong for the old laws; had not necessity, when she had no laws, a right to form new ones for her own use? And what possible power, but that of Cæsar, could have assisted that necessity to make them? Though form and order be indispensable in the quiet execution of laws, yet there may be critical seasons or times of danger, when the breaking through them may be equally necessary, and which the Roman Republic, under their happiest settlement, thought it sometimes advisable to comply with; and in such cases made a temporary Dictator, to take care the Commonwealth came to no harm. Thus, by parity of reason, when Pompey had, by his intimidating army, made himself little less than such a Dictator, had not Cæsar just as good a right to displace him? So that, whatever title was wanting to Cæsar's office, his office at least became necessary.—Admitting then that, out of the ruins of this self-subverted Republic, Cæsar had for some time designed to erect a monarchy, what more salutary expedient could, in their present distractions, be hoped for? Wherein was his usurpation a more public grievance, than in throwing water upon a house in flames? Would Pompey have held the imperial hand over them with more gentleness than Cæsar? This is the only material consideration, since without a Master Rome could not live. Now it is agreed on all sides, that Pompey's victory would have been a cruel one; and so intent were his followers upon destruction and proscriptions, that Cæsar's clemency struck them with amazement, and they could not believe their senses."

But should not Cæsar have restored the Commonwealth, as Sylla did? Sylla's settlement was no restoration of the public liberty, or of the true democratic government; he changed the constitution of the State and made it aristocratic; which, we are told by politicians is the worst of governments. This aristocracy subsisted but a few years; Pompey by his conquests acquired so much wealth, glory, and power, that he became of course the Master of the Republic; till Cæsar, by his conquests, glory, and power, became his competitor: Part of the State chose to adhere to Pompey, another part sided with Cæsar. Cæsar had success, and shewed he deserved it by his moderation and clemency. To have relinquished the sovereign authority would have been to have acted as an enemy to his country, since, having it in his power to do universal good, he would have chosen to have thrown the State into the same confusions and convulsions out of which it had so luckily and so gently emerged. "And why should we suppose a soul so elevated as Cæsar's could be ignorant of advantages to be derived from his greatness, or could think that the power of doing universal good could have a joy or glory superior to it?" Did not Cicero himself encourage him to keep his authority, and lay before him the strongest motives for this purpose, in his speech for Marcellus? And, if Cæsar had taken Cicero into his council, and flattered his vanity by giving him the appearance of a share in the administration, who can doubt but he would have had, in our Orator, a zealous panegyrist of all his actions, who, at the time that he made the complaints which have occasioned these reflections, writes thus to his friend Anulus Cæcilius, Fam. vi. 6. Mdm. ix. 34. "I shall now, indeed, be enabled to employ my zeal more effectually than heretofore, as I make great and daily advances in CÆSAR's friendship; not to mention my interest also with his favourites, who distinguish me with the first rank in their affection." In the same letter

Y.R. 707. he raises the hopes of his friend, then in exile, by the consideration of Cæsar's magnanimous conduct: "I cannot but observe to you, that I have often occasion to admire the justice and judgment of Cæsar; who never speaks of Pompey, but in terms of the highest honour. Should it be said, that, whatever regard he may shew to his memory, he treated his person upon many occasions with great asperity: Let it be remembered, that these instances cannot reasonably be imputed to Cæsar, but were the natural consequences of war. But how favourably has he received many of us, and myself in particular, who were engaged in the same party? Has he not appointed Cassius to be his Lieutenant? Has he not given the government of Gaul to Brutus? and that of Greece to Sulpicius? In a word, highly incensed as he was against Marcellus, has he not in the most honourable manner restored him to his friends and to his country?" Cicero succeeded so well in his application to Cæsar's favour, that, the following year, when he had any thing to ask, he wrote directly to himself: And his letters do but ill support what Dr. Middleton says of his speech during Cæsar's administration.

C H A P. X.

Cæsar's war in Spain against Pompey's sons. The honours decreed him by the senate. His triumph, and those of his two Lieutenants Q. Fabius and Q. Pedius. Cicero's grief for the death of his daughter Tullia. His writings during his retreat at this time.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR, Dictator III. Consul IV. sine Collega.
M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS, Mag. Equit.

Y.R. 708. IN the end of the year Cæsar was called away in great haste into Spain to oppose the attempts of Pompey's sons. The city was left without Consuls or Prætors, under the government of Lepidus, General of the Horse, and six Prefects to administer justice. The Tribunes and the Ediles were the only Magistrates elected in the ordinary form.

After the defeat of Afranius, Cæsar appointed to the government of Spain Q. Cassius Longinus, who was Tribune with Antony when the civil war broke out, and fled with him to Ravenna. He had been Quæstor there under Pompey, and was well acquainted with the country: But his violence and avarice, during his quæstorship, had rendered him the object of the public hatred; and he had been wounded in an attempt made upon his life. Invested by Cæsar with sovereign authority, he applied himself wholly to gain the hearts of his soldiers by largesses and a relaxation of military discipline, hoping to find in his army a bulwark against the resentment of the people: And, at the same time, to satisfy the demands of his avarice, he committed all kinds of acts, both of injustice and cruelty. This behaviour brought him into contempt even with the ministers of his violence, and produced a second conspiracy, which broke out, when, pursuant to Cæsar's orders, he was setting out for Mauritania, in order to give King Juba employment at home, and hinder him from sending succours to Pompey, as he had already done.

The conspirators, who were all of Italica, a city founded by the elder Scipio in Bætica, set upon him in open day, and gave him several wounds;

wounds; but, none of them proving mortal, he had the satisfaction to revenge himself on them by tortures and death. The act of the conspirators was approved by a great part of the army, as well as of the people. Two of the legions, who had formerly served under Varro, Pompey's Lieutenant, soon shewed their disaffection by an open mutiny; and, their hatred to Cassius reviving their affection for Pompey, they declared for him, and engraved his name on their bucklers. Three legions continued faithful to Longinus, not through any regard for him, but purely on account of their attachment to Cæsar. The city of Corduba, where a great many Romans were settled, detested also Longinus, but were unwilling to abandon Cæsar's interest. This commotion might have proved fatal to Cæsar, had not the Quæstor Marcellus Eserinus united all Longinus's enemies under Cæsar's name and authority: Which was effected with more ease, as accounts came about this time of the victory at Pharsalia. Longinus on his side had called to his assistance Bogud, King of Mauritania, who was in Cæsar's alliance, and their two combined armies waged war for some time against Marcellus, till Lepidus, Proconsul in nether Spain, coming soon after into Batica, with a considerable force, Marcellus readily consented to his arbitration. Longinus was forced to do the same; and, a short time after being informed that Trebonius, his successor, was arrived in the province, he put immediately to sea with all his treasure, and was lost in a storm in the mouth of the Iberus. But, as popular fury does not easily subside, this calm was of but short duration. Many, conscious of their offence, were afraid of Cæsar's resentment, and were well pleased to hear that Metellus Scipio had assembled a powerful army in Africa. They sent Deputies to him to offer their service and demand his protection; and Cn. Pompey was sent on this occasion, as has been related above, after he had made a fruitless attempt upon the kingdom of Bogud. The disaffected legions did not stay for his arrival, but, hearing that he was landed in the Balearian islands, and was there detained by sickness, they openly declared against Trebonius, and put themselves under the conduct of T. Scapula, and Q. Aponius, two Roman Knights. As soon as young Pompey recovered his health, he joined his friends; and in a short time got together eleven legions, and drove Trebonius out of Batica. His brother Sextus, in conjunction with Labienus and Varus, brought him the remainder of Scipio's fleet, and his land army was greatly strengthened by the fugitives from Africa; so that he was able to act powerfully both by sea and land. Cæsar, immediately after the defeat of Scipio and Juba, had sent Q. Fabius and Q. Pedius with part of his African army, and Didius with his fleet, to act against the sons of Pompey. This Admiral had engaged with success the Pompeian fleet commanded by Varus, and forced it to take refuge in a port called by Dio Crantia, which is probably that of Carteia: But the Lieutenants could not make head

Y. R. 708.
 Def. Chr.
 44.
 407 Conf.

Dio, l. xliii.

Y. R. 708. against the enemy in the field; and Cæsar's presence was necessary to Bel. Chr. prevent the entire reduction of the province.

44-
 407 Conf.

Hirt. de
 Bell. Hsp.
 Dio, l. xlii.

Cæsar therefore, called upon by the inhabitants that remained faithful to him, and by his own Lieutenants, set out before the end of November, arrived at Obulco, near Corduba, in twenty-seven days, and surprised both his friends and enemies by his sudden appearance among them. Cæ. Pompey was at this time actually besieging Ullæ, the only town of Bætica, which held out against him. Cæsar found means to throw some succour into it, and marched himself to Corduba, where Sextus Pompey had locked himself up. Sextus called away his brother from Ullæ to his assistance; but Cæsar, by that motion, had only in view to bring about a general and decisive action. Finding, however, that the two Pompey's had taken a fixed resolution to keep upon the defensive, he turned off to Ategua, the strongest fortress possessed by his enemies: And, in the depth of winter, and in the neighbourhood of a powerful army, carried it the 19th of February, when it surrendered at discretion. The garrison had offered to capitulate sooner, and surrender upon terms; but Cæsar answered, haughtily, "that he was used to prescribe conditions, not to receive them:" And he treated them, it is probable, with severity; for they had been guilty of great cruelty in cutting the throats of a great number of the inhabitants, who were thought to be in his interest, and whose bodies were thrown over the walls during the siege. Cæ. Pompey, upon the news of the taking of Ategua, treated in the same manner, and for the same crime, seventy-four citizens of a neighbouring town. Acts of the greatest oppression and inhumanity were committed on both sides. The two armies, shifting continually their ground, in order to find opportunities to harass each other, advanced at length into the plains of Munda. There, on the 27th of March, as Cæsar was preparing to move his camp, he was informed, that the enemy had been drawn up in order of battle ever since midnight. Pompey, dreading the contempt and desertion of his followers, who were all eager for a battle, had resolved to fight; and had chosen for that purpose an advantageous post on an eminence, defended on one side by a morass, and near the city of Munda; which, in case of bad success, would secure his retreat. Cæsar drew out his troops in the plain, between the two camps, placing his tenth legion as usual in the right, and the third and fifth in the left, with the auxiliary troops and cavalry. There he waited a little, to draw the enemy down; but, seeing that they had no design to quit their post, he marched up to them, giving the word Venus. The word on Pompey's side was Pietas, in allusion to his intention of avenging that day his father's death. When Cæsar's troops came to the extremity of the plain, they halted a while, and Cæsar marked out to them how far they might advance with safety. This halt raised the spirit of the Pompeians, and encouraged them to advance a little way. At last the battle began, with a shout on both sides, sides, and was obstinate. Pompey had not only the advantage of the ground, but the superiority in numbers; and his men were so circum-^{Y. R. 703.} stanced, as to be in a manner under a necessity of fighting desperately; ^{Bef. Chr.} being either soldiers, who had before served under Afranius and Varro, ^{44.} and had paid no regard to the pardon Cæsar had granted them, having ^{407 Conf.} rebelled against Cassius; or slaves set at liberty, who, if taken prisoners, had nothing to expect but an ignominious punishment. At first, victory seemed to declare against Cæsar: Not only his new-raised troops, but his veterans began to give ground; and, if we believe Suetonius and Florus, the day was so near being lost, that Cæsar was in suspense whether he should not kill himself. By all accounts, he gave himself incredible pains: Quitting his horse, he took up a buckler, and advanced before the first ranks, and within ten feet of the enemy^{*}, declaring, that he would not move from the spot. His example, and the imminent danger he was in roused the courage of his soldiers, who were ashamed to abandon such a General; and the tenth legion, that invincible troop, particularly distinguished itself. But what determined the victory on Cæsar's side was the following circumstance: Bogud, King of Mauritania, who served in Cæsar's army, undertook, during the action, to attack Pompey's camp: And Labienus, perceiving his motion, detached five cohorts to intercept the Moors, and protect it. Cæsar immediately cried out aloud; that the enemy was making off: And this false opinion, spreading itself instantly among the two armies, increased the courage of the one, and terrified the other. Cæsar's troops, especially the tenth legion, took this opportunity to press the enemy, whose ranks began to be in some confusion; and, after a vigorous contest, entirely broke and discomfited them. Thirty thousand were killed on Pompey's side, among whom were Labienus and Varus, and three thousand Roman Knights. All the legionary eagles and most of the colours were taken, with the fasces carried before the General; and seventeen principal Officers were made prisoners. The conqueror lost a thousand of his bravest soldiers, and had five hundred wounded. This bloody battle, which was the last in the civil war, was fought the same day on which Pompey the Great had set out from Brundisium to go into Greece. Cæsar is reported to have said, "that, in his other battles, he fought ^{Plut. Ap-} "for victory, in this for his life." The Romans of the vanquished party ^{pian.} fled, some to the camp, some to the city of Munda, some to Corduba,

* Nullum unquam atrocius periculosiusque a Cæsare initum prœlium, adeo ut plus-quam dubio Marte. descend: ret equo, con-sistensque ante recedentem suorum aciem, increpita prius fortuna, quod se in eum servasset exitum, denunciaret militibus, vesti-gio se non recessurum; proinde viderent quem et quo loco imperatorem deserturi so-rent. Verecundia magis quam virtute acies restitutz sunt, a duce quam a milite fortius.

Vel. Patt. ii. 55. Itaque ablegato equo, similis farenti, primam in aciem Cæsar procurrit. Ibi prensare fugientes, confirmare, per totum denique agmen oculis, manibus, clamore, volitare. Dicitur in illa perturbatione, et de extremis agitate secum, et ita manifesto vultu fuisse, quasi occupare manu mortem vellet. Flor. l. iv. c. 2.

and

Y. R. 683
B. C. 49
497 C. C. 49
Hist. de
Rom. Hist.
Lib. 1. 10.
 and others still farther. The camp was soon forced, but the city was in a condition to maintain a siege. Cæsar that very day invested it; and we are told that the soldiers heaped together the dead bodies of the enemy to serve them instead of a rampart, planting in them their javelins and darts by way of palisades, with the bucklers hanging upon them; and that, to strike the greater terror into the besieged, they fixed all around the heads of the deceased. Cæsar left Fabius to command the blockade, and marched immediately to Corintha, to invest Sextus Pompey, who was governor of the place. But Sextus, upon the first intelligence of the entire ruin of his party, after having distributed what money he had among his troops, left the town about nine at night, under a pretence of going to find out Cæsar to treat of an accommodation. Scapula, who had been the chief occasion of the revolt of the province, had escaped thither out of the battle, and took upon himself the command of the place. When he found, however, that he was besieged, he assembled all his followers; and, ordering a funeral pile to be raised, and a magnificent supper served up, he put on his richest dress, and distributed his plate and ready money among his domestics; and, having supped cheerfully, and anointed himself, he commanded one of his freedmen to dispatch him, and another to set fire to the pile. After his death, a division arose among the inhabitants, between those who favoured Cæsar, and those in the interest of Pompey, with such a clamour that it was heard in Cæsar's camp. During the contests, some companies, composed partly of fugitives, partly of slaves, made free by Pompey, surrendered themselves to Cæsar: But the thirteenth legion prepared to defend the place, and with that view possessed themselves of the walls and the towers in spite of all opposition. Upon this, the faction for Cæsar sent deputies to him for aid: And the thirteenth legion, irritated by this proceeding, and chusing rather to perish, than to fall into the hands of the conqueror, set fire to the city. At this instant Cæsar's troops making their way into the town, a battle ensued, in which the greatest part of the legionaries perished, and twelve thousand of the inhabitants. Cæsar now marched towards Hispania; but was met on the road by Deputies from the inhabitants, who sued for their pardon, which he immediately granted. At the same time he was assured that the citizens were able to defend the town with their own forces, and to preserve it in his interest; but he thought proper to send thither his Lieutenant Caminius, with some troops: And he himself encamped at a small distance. There was in the town a strong party of Pompeians, who, being displeased to see Cæsar's troops received within the walls, deputed secretly one Philo, a zealous partisan of Pompey, and well known in Lusitania, to beg assistance of Cecilius Niger, surnamed the Barbarous, who lay encamped not far off with a strong army of Lusitanians: And Philo, returning with a body of these towards night, got over the walls, surprised the centinels and garrison, shut

shut the gates, and undertook to defend the place. Cæsar did not think proper to press the siege, lest despair should prompt the Lusitanians to set fire to the town: On the contrary, he placed his guards in such a manner as to give them the hopes of making their escape, by sal-lying out in the night. They took the opportunity, as was foreseen, and in the sally set fire to the ships on the river Bætis (Guadalquivir;) and, while Cæsar's men were employed in extinguishing the flame, endeavoured to get off; but, being overtaken by the cavalry, the greatest part of them were cut to pieces. From Hispalis, Cæsar marched to Astá, which submitted, and thence went to Gades.

Y. R. 708.
 B. Chr.
 44.
 407 Conf.

During the siege of Hispalis, Deputies arrived from Carteia^b, with accounts of their having secured Cn. Pompey; the inhabitants hoping by this service to atone for their former offence, in shutting their gates against Cæsar. Pompey, after the battle of Munda, attended by a few horse and foot, had fled to that place, where his fleet lay, and which was about a hundred and seventy miles distant from Corduba. He was at first privately attended upon by those of his party, whom he secretly made acquainted with his arrival; but, seeing that great crouds assembled round him, and shewed some zeal for his service, he began to act more openly. But the faction which declared for him was inferior in point of strength and numbers to that which was in Cæsar's interest; and which, thinking to provide for their own safety and that of the place, had sent to him the above-mentioned Deputies. Animosit-ties within the city were carried to the greatest extremities; and Pompey himself, in a tumultuary action which happened, having received several wounds, did not think proper to stay in Carteia, but put to sea with thirty gallies. Didius, then at Gades, with Cæsar's fleet, hearing of what had passed, immediately sailed in pursuit of them; stationing at the same time some cavalry and infantry along the coast to prevent Pompey's retreat by land. Pompey had departed with so much precipitation, that he had not taken in a sufficient provision of water. This obliging him to stop in his way, Didius came up with him after four days sailing, and while the greatest part of the soldiers and mariners were employed ashore, he took some of his ships, and burnt the rest. The unfortunate and wounded General, attended by a few followers, fled, in this extremity, with what expedition he could, to a place of strength, which happened to be at no great distance, and where he hoped to conceal himself. Being discovered, however, by a Lusitanian, he was soon surrounded by the troops sent after him by Didius: And, unable to defend himself in this post, he fled to another which was more tenable, the approach to it being extremely difficult. Didius's troops, pursued him also to this retreat, and, after several fruitless at-

^b A sea-port town, in Hispania Bætica, which some geographers have placed at the mouth of the Bætis, but is commonly supposed to have been situated in the straits of Gibraltar.

Y. R. 703.
Bef. Chr.
44-
407 Conf.

tempts to storm it, determined to lay siege to it in form, and began to draw their lines, and to form a terrafs. Pompey, seeing that he would soon be blocked up, betook himself again to flight; and, in this escape, having been forsaken by his few attendants, he hid himself in a cave, where he was discovered, and put to death. His head was brought to Cæsar, on the 12th of April, as he was setting out from Gades to return to Hispania. This was the end of the elder Pompey; who, though he had shewed great abilities for command, was yet unregretted by many of his party, on account of his violent and cruel dispositions¹.

Didius, who had rendered Cæsar this service, did not live to receive his recompense. Proud of his success, and confident that all hostilities were over, he hauled some of his ships ashore to be refitted, and retired himself to a neighbouring fort; where he soon found himself invested by a strong body of Lusitanians, formed of several parties which had fled that way from Munda. He made daily sallies upon them to check their insolence; and this gave them an opportunity of projecting an ambuscade, in which they succeeded so well as to destroy him, with almost all his followers; a few only having escaped by swimming to the galleys at sea.

Munda was at last taken, after a siege of three weeks, and all Bætica submitted to the conqueror. The force of the Pompeians was now entirely broken. Even Sextus Pompey, the only remaining hope of his family and party, was reduced to the necessity of concealing himself in the mountains of *Celtiberia*². The success of Cæsar was complete; and, while

¹ " Sextus Pompey, says Cicero to Atticus,
" has withdrawn himself from Carduba
" into hispania : Cæsar is also fled,
" but I do not know whither, nor in truth
" do I care." In a letter to Tarquatus, a
" Pompeian in exile, he says, " the world is
" every day more and more persuaded, that,
" although there may be some little differ" ence in the cause of the contending par" ties, there will be scarce any in the con" sequence of their success. As to one of " them indeed, we have already in some " sort experienced his disposition; and, as " to the other, we are all of us sufficiently " sensible how much is to be dreaded from " an incensed conqueror." Ep. Fam. vi. 4.
Melm. x. 16. " May I perish, says Cassius
" to Cicero, if I be not solicitous about the " event of things in Spain; as I would " much rather keep our old and cle" ment master, than try a new and cruel
" one. You know what a fool Cæsar is,
" and how he takes cruelty for a virtue : And
" yet he is sensible how much he has been

" the object of our ridicule. I fear there" fore he would be apt to treat us some" what roughly, and return our jokes with
" the point of his sword." He adds : " If " you have any value for me then, you will " not fail to let me know whatever will hap" pen. Ab! my friend, how do I wish I
" were apprised, whether you read this with
" an easy or an anxious mind. For, by that
" single circumstance, I should be determined
" what measures are proper for me to pursue ;
" quam velim scire, utrum istâ sollicito
" animo, an soluto legas ! sciam enim eo-
" dem tempore, quid me facere oporteat." Ep. Fam. xv. 19. Melm. x. 22. These words seem to prove that he was then agitating in his mind what he executed the following year.

² Cæsar paid Cicero the compliment of sending him an account of his success with his own hand. At the same time young Quintus Cicero, who made the campaign along with Cæsar, thinking to please his company, and to make his fortunes the better

while he continued in Spain during the summer, he not only employed himself in providing for the future peace and settlement of the province¹, but found leisure to draw up his answer to Cicero's Cato.

During his absence there appeared a bold impostor, who began to make a great noise and figure in Italy, by assuming the name, and pretending to be the grandson of Caius Marius; and several of the colonies and municipal towns, particularly those where the veteran soldiers were settled, acknowledged him for their patron. He wrote a pathetic letter to Cicero, to justify his claim and descent, and to implore his protection against the enemies of his family; "conjuring him by their relation; by the poem which he had formerly written in praise of Marius; by the eloquence of L. Crassus, his mother's father, whom he had likewise celebrated, that he would undertake the defence of his cause." Cicero (who, if he had really been the son of C. Marius, would have been his distant relation, his grandfather having married Marius's aunt) answered him very gravely, "That he could not want a patron, when his kinsman Cæsar, so excellent and generous a man, was now master of all; yet, that he also should be ready to favour him." But Cæsar, at his return, knowing him to be a cheat, banished him out of Italy; since, instead of being what he pretended to be, he was found to be only a farrier, whose true name was Herophilus.

While Cæsar remained in Spain, Antony set forward from Italy, to pay his compliments to him there, or to meet him at least on the road in his return towards Rome; but, when he had made about half the journey, he met with some dispatches, which obliged him to return back in all haste to Rome. This raised a new alarm in the city; and especially among the Pompeians, who were afraid that Cæsar, having now subdued all opposition, was resolved, after the example of former conquerors, to take his revenge in cool blood on all his adversaries; and had sent Antony back as the properest instrument to execute some orders of that sort. Cicero himself had the same suspicion, and was much surprised at Antony's sudden return, till Balbus and Oppius eased him of his apprehensions, by sending him an account of the true reason of it: Which, ter among them, began to play over his old game, and to abuse his uncle again in all places. Cicero, in his account of it to Atticus, says, "there is nothing new, but Hirtius has been quarrelling, in my defence, with our nephew Quintus, who takes all occasions of saying every thing bad of me, and especially at public feasts; and, when he has done with me, falls next upon his father: He is thought to say nothing so credible, as that we are both irreconcilable to Cæsar; that Cæsar should trust neither of us; and even beware of me. This would be terrible, did I not see that

Vol. IV.

"our King is persuaded that I have no spirit left. Ad Att. xiii. 37.

¹ Dio tells us, that he committed great extortions, plundered the very temples, and particularly that of Hercules, at Gades, whose treasures he applied to his own use. But it is not probable that the needy Pompeians left much to plunder, or that Cæsar would seize, when he did not want it, a treasure which his enemy had spared in his utmost distress. The same author relates, that the States, who had remained faithful to him, yet paid for the freedom of the city, and the privileges which he granted them.

F f

con-

Y. R. 708.
Bef. Chr.
44.
407 Cont.

Mid. l. p.
198.

Ad Att.
xii. 49.

Val. Max.
ix. 15.

Mid. l. p.
211.

Y. R. 709
B. C. 41
107 C. J. S. contrary to expectation, gave no uneasiness to any body, but Antony himself. Antony had bought Pompey's houses in Rome, and the neighbourhood, with all their rich furniture, at Cæsar's auction, soon after his return from Egypt; but, trusting to his interest with Cæsar, never dreamt of being obliged to pay for them. Cæsar, however, had sent peremptory orders to L. Plautius, the Prætor, to require immediate payment of Antony, or to levy the money upon his sureties, according to the tenor of their bond. This was the cause of his quick return, to prevent that disgrace, and to find some means of complying with Cæsar's commands. Cicero tells us, in his invective against Antony, that it provoked him to such a degree, that, in the height of his resentment, he is said to have entered into a design of taking away Cæsar's life; of which Cæsar himself complained openly in the Senate.

Cæsar returned to Rome before the end of August, and seems to have passed the greatest part of the month of September at Lavicanum, his country-seat; where he made his will on the 13th, which he committed to the care of the eldest of the Vestals. During his residence in this place, every thing was prepared for a most splendid triumph for his victory over Pompey's sons, as over a foreign enemy; and it was celebrated on the 1st of October^a. It was followed by two public dinners with plenty of the most esteemed and costly wines of Cibios and Falerium. He now proclaimed a general amnesty, and it was probably on this occasion that a temple was built to Clemency, where his statue was placed near to that of the goddess, joining hands with her. He also divested himself of the consulship and conferred it upon Q. Fabius Maximus and C. Trebonius for the remaining months of the year. The Consul Fabius and Q. Pedius, who, in quality of Cæsar's Lieutenants, had reduced some parts of Spain, were allowed also the honour of a triumph, though there had been no example of inferior officers partaking of the honours of the General under whose auspices they had served. The triumph of Fabius was celebrated on the 13th of October, and that of Pedius on 107 C. J. S. We are told that the people, instead of admiring and applauding this triumph, as he expected, were sullen and silent; considering it, as it really was, a triumph over themselves; purchased by the loss of their liberty and the destruction of the best and noblest families of the Republic: And that they had before given the same proof of their discontent at the Circensian games; where Cæsar's statue, by a decree of the Senate, was carried in procession along with those of the gods; for they gave none of their usual acclamations to their favourite deities as they passed, lest they should be thought to give them to Cæsar. Atticus sent an account of this triumph to Cicero, who says in answer to him, "Your letter" "was agreeable, though the shew was so" "sad:—The people, however, behaved" "bravely, who would not clap even the god-" "dess Victory, for the sake of so bad a" "neighbour" But, if Cæsar committed any irregularity in this triumph over Pompey's sons and the Spaniards, he was engaged to it by the Senate, who voted, for the victory a supplication of fifty days, though the Conqueror had writ no public letter to Rome on his success: The triumph was the necessary consequence of the supplication.

the

the 12th of December. But the magnificence of Cæsar's made these appear contemptible; for their models of the conquered towns, which were always a part of the shew, being made only of wood, whereas Cæsar's were of silver or ivory, Chrysippus merrily called them the cases only of Cæsar's towns.

The Senate now accumulated upon Cæsar all the titles that flattery could invent. He was declared Imperator or Emperor in a sense that conferred upon him the command of all the forces of the Republic; perpetual and sole Master of Manners, and with this office the management of all the revenues: He was styled the Father and Deliverer of his country, and a temple was raised to Liberty, because he had procured it to the Roman people. His person was declared sacred, like those of the Tribunes; and the month Quintilis was called Julius, because he was born in it. He was allowed the privilege of wearing constantly a crown of laurel, and on festival days the triumphal robe; of having a distinct seat in all public shews; a golden chair in the Senate-house and in the Forum; a statue in all the towns, and in all the temples of the city; two in the Rostra, one of which had a civic crown, because he was the Saviour of the people; and the other had an obfidional crown, because he was the Saviour of his country; one in the temple of Quirinus with this inscription, To the invincible god; and one in the Capitol with those of the ancient Kings. He was allowed to hang up the opima spolia in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, that no feature of Romulus should be wanting in him: And, in the Circensian games, his image in ivory was ordered to be carried in a chariot in the same manner as those of the gods. This was not all; he had a pulvinar, or bed of state in the temples, on which his image was laid; temples were erected to him; he was called Jupiter Latialis; and a new fraternity of Luperci was instituted to his honour, and called by his name; of which Antony was the head, and Q. Cicero, the son, one of the membersⁿ; an honour which none of the immortal gods enjoyed, besides Mars and his son Quirinus, the founders of the State. Many, however, of these pretended honours we only hear of in Appian and Dio; and I cannot but think that these Greek Historians, who were grown accustomed to the extravagant appellations given to the subsequent Emperors, imagined that they had also been bestowed on the first of them. The last of these writers has likewise informed us, that some of the Senators voted, that this god, this Jupiter Latialis, should take to himself as many wives as he pleased, and whom he pleased; and that the Tribune Helvius Cinna had actually prepared a law to this ⁿ There had been hitherto but two fraternities of Luperci, called Fabiani and Quintiliani. The Luperci Julii were instituted the year before, after the African war. Vide Ad d.t. xii. 5. Cicero very much disapproved of his nephew's conduct, but the father was pleased with it: Quintus pater quortum vel potius millesimum nihil sapit, qui letetur Luperci filio et Statio, ut cernat duplici dedecore cumulatam doctum.

V. R. 706.
B. C. 45.
473 Cons.

effect. From this circumstance, so false and ridiculous, it may be gathered what degree of credit should be given to this historian. In the profusion of honours conferred on Cæsar, both his friends, it is said, and enemies eagerly concurred; the first out of zeal for his glory, and a spirit of adulation; the latter to load him with public envy, and bring him into contempt: And, indeed it appears, from a letter of Antony to Octavius, that Cicero used to boast, “that they had imposed upon Cæsar, and ruined him by this shew of respect for his person.”

On the last day of December, Fabius having died suddenly in the morning, C. Cæminius Rebilus was named by Cæsar to the vacancy at one in the afternoon; whose office was to continue only through the remaining part of that day*. Cæsar had had so many creatures and dependents who expected the honour of the consulship from him, as the reward of their services, that it was impossible to oblige them all in a regular way, so that he was forced to contrive the expedient of splitting it, as it were, into parcels; and conferring it for a few months, or weeks, or even days, as it happened to suit his convenience: And, as the thing itself was now but a name, without any real power, it was of little moment for what term it was granted; since the shortest gave the same privilege Metell.

219.

* This wanton profanation of the sovereign dignity of the empire raised a general indignation in the city; and a consulate so ridiculous gave birth to much raillery and many jokes, which are transmitted to us by the ancients (Macrob. Sat. ii. 3. Dio, p. 235.); of which Cicero, who was the chief author of them, gives us the following specimen, in his account of the fact: “I no longer, says he in a letter to Curius, either advise or desire you to come home to us, but want to fly somewhere myself, where I may hear neither the name, nor the acts of these sons of Pelops. It is incredible how meanly I think of myself for being present at these transactions. You had surely an early foresight of what was coming on, when you ran away from this place; for, though it be vexatious to hear such things, yet that is more tolerable than to see them. It is well that you were not in the field, when, at seven in the morning, as they were proceeding to an election of Quæstors, the chair of Q. Maximus, whom they called Consul, was set in its place; but, his death being immediately proclaimed, it was removed; and Cæsar, though he had taken the auspices for an assembly of the tribes, changed it into an assembly of the centuriæ;

Ep. Fam.
vol. 30.

“tribes; and, at one in the afternoon, declared a new Consul, who was to govern till one the next morning. I would have you to know, therefore, that, quibuscumque Cæminius was Consul, nobody dined; and that there was no crime committed in his consulship, for he was so wonderfully vigilant that, through his whole administration, he never so much as slept. These things seem ridiculous to you, who are absent; but, were you to see them, you would hardly refrain from tears. What, if I should tell you the rest? for there are numberless facts of the same kind; which I could never have borne, if I had not taken refuge in the port of philosophy with our friend Atticus, the companion and partner of my studies.” Suetonius in Cæs. p. 80. tells us, that the people themselves would not acknowledge a three months Consul: For, when, upon Fabius’s entrance into the theatre, his officers, according to custom, proclaimed his presence, and ordered the people to make way for the Consul, the whole assembly cried out, he is no Consul. I cannot see what injury Cæsar either did the State, or particular persons, by making over to others an office, or the title of an office, which the Senate had named him to for his life.

with

with the longest, and a man, once declared Consul, ever after enjoyed the rank and character of a consular Senator. Y. R. 708.
Bef. Chr.

He now granted a general pardon to all those who had borne arms against him; replaced the statues of Sylla and Pompey, which had been thrown down, and, disbanding his Spanish guard, threw himself intirely upon the affections of his citizens. And it was probably on this occasion that a temple to New Concord, mentioned by Dio, was built, in imitation of that of Camillus; and a festival for the restoration of peace and harmony in the Republic ordered to be celebrated every year. 44.
407 Conf.
Dio, l. 44.

Cicero's daughter, Tullia, died in the beginning of this year, in child-bed, to the inexpressible grief of her father. She was about two and thirty years old at the time of her death; and, by the few hints which are left of her character, appears to have been an excellent and admirable woman. She was most affectionately and piously observant of her father; and, to the usual graces of her sex, having added the more solid accomplishments of knowledge and polite letters, was qualified to be the companion, as well as the delight, of his old age; and was justly esteemed not only as one of the best, but the most learned, of the Roman Ladies. It is not strange, therefore, that the loss of such a daughter, in the prime of her life, and in the most comfortless season of his own, should affect him with all that grief, which the greatest calamity could imprint on a temper naturally timid and desponding. His friends were very officious in making their compliments of condolence, and in administering arguments of comfort to him. Among the rest, Cæsar himself, in the hurry of his affairs in Spain, wrote him a letter on this occasion, dated from Hispalis, the last of April. Their remonstrances, however, had Middl. p.
180.

¶ The following letter of S. Sulpicius is thought to be a masterpiece of the consolatory kind; for which reason, and because Sulpicius has acted a considerable part in this history, we shall insert it here, to bring the reader more acquainted with the talents of this consular Senator, whom Cicero in his letters often treats with much contempt:

“ I was exceedingly concerned, as, indeed, I ought to be, to hear of the death of your daughter Tullia; which I looked upon as an affliction common to us both. If I had been with you, I would have made it my business to convince you, what a real share I take in your grief; though that kind of consolation is but wretched and lamentable, as it is to be performed by friends and relations, who are overwhelmed with grief, and cannot enter upon their task without tears, and seem to “ want comfort rather themselves, than to be in a condition to administer it to others. I resolved, therefore, to write to you, in short, what occurred upon it to my own mind; not that I imagined, that the same things would not occur also to you, but that the force of your grief might possibly hinder your attention to them. What reason is there then to disturb yourself so immoderately on this melancholy occasion? Consider how fortune has already treated us; how it has deprived us of what ought to be as dear to us as our children; our country, credit, dignity, honours. After so miserable a loss as this, what addition can it possibly make to our grief, to suffer one misfortune more? Or how can a mind, after being exercised in such trials, not grow callous, and think every thing else of inferior value? “ lue?

Y. R. 43. had but little effect upon him; all the relief that he found was from
 E. C. 1. reading and writing; and he drew up at this time a treatise of consolation
 43. C. 1.

“lue? But is it for your daughter’s sake, “that you grieve? Yet, how often must “you necessarily reflect, as I myself fre“quently do, that those cannot be said to be “hardly dealt with, whose lot it has been,
 “in these times, without suffering any af“fliction, to exchange life for death. For “what is there in our present circumstances “that could give her any great invitation
 “to live? What business? What hopes?
 “What prospect of comfort before her?
 “Was it to pass her days in the married “state, with some young man of the first “quality? (for you, I know, on the ac“count of your dignity, might have chosen “what son-in-law you pleased out of all our “youth, to whose fidelity you might safely
 “have trusted her) Was it then for the sake “of bearing children, whom she might “have had the pleasure to see flourishing “afterwards, in the enjoyment of their pa“ternal fortunes, and rising, gradually, to “all the honours of the state, and using the “liberty to which they were born, in the “protection of their friends and clients?
 “But what is there of all this, which was “not taken away, before it was even given “to her? But it is an evil, you’ll say, to “lose our children.—It is so; yet, it is much “greater to suffer what we now endure. I “cannot help mentioning one thing, which “has given me no small comfort, and may “help also perhaps to mitigate your grief.
 “On my return from Asia, as I was sailing “from Egina towards Megara, I began to “contemplate the prospect of the countries “around me: Egina was behind, Megara
 “before me; Prætor on the right; Cer“rius on the left; all which towns, once “famous and flourishing, now lie over“turned, and buried in their ruins: Upon
 “this sight, I could not but think presently “within myself, alas! how do we poor “mortals fret and vex ourselves, if any of “our friends happen to die, or to be killed, “whose life is yet so short, when the car“casses of so many noble cities lie here ex“posed to me in one view? Why wilt thou “not then command thyself, Servius, and “remember, that thou art born a man?
 “Believe me, I was not a little confirmed “by this contemplation: Try the force of

“it, therefore, if you please, upon yourself;
 “and imagine the same prospect before “your own eyes. But to come nearer “home; when you consider how many of “our greatest men have perished lately at “once; what destruction has been made in “the empire; what havock in all the pro“vinces; how can you be so much shocked “to be deprived of the fleeting breath of “one little woman? Who, if she had not “died at this time, must necessarily have “died a few years after, since that was the “condition of her being born. But recall “your mind from reflections of this kind “to the consideration of yourself, and think “rather on what becomes your character
 “and dignity: That your daughter lived “as long as life was worth enjoying, as “long as the Republic stood; had seen her “father Prætor, Consul, Augur; been “married to the noblest of our youth; had “tasted every good in life; and, when the “Republic fell, then quitted it: What “ground is there then, either for you, or “her, to complain of fortune on this ac“count? In short, do not forget that you “are Cicero; one, who has been always “used to give advice and prescribe to o“thers; nor imitate those poultry phy“sicians, who pretend to cure other peo“ple’s diseases, yet are not able to cure
 “their own; but suggest rather to yourself
 “the same lesson, which you would give in “the same case. There is no grief so great,
 “which length of time will not alleviate:
 “But it would be shameful in you to wait “for that time, and not to prevent it by your “wisdom; besides, if there be any sense in “the dead, such was her love and piety to “you, that she must be concerned to see “how much you afflict yourself. Give this “therefore to the deceased; give it to your “friends; give it to your country; that it “may have the benefit of your assistance and “advice, whenever there shall be occasion:
 “Lastly, since fortune has now made it ne“cessary to us to accommodate ourselves to “our present situation, do not give any “one a handle to think, that you are not “so much bewailing your daughter, as the “state of the times, and the victory of cer“tain persons. I am ashamed to write any “more,

tion for himself, from which he professes to have received his greatest comfort. The design of it was not only to relieve his own mind, but to consecrate the virtues and memory of Tullia to all posterity: Nor did his fondness for her stop here, but suggested the project of a more effectual consecration, by building a temple to her, and erecting her into a sort of a deity. In his letters to Atticus, we find the strongest expressions of his resolution and impatience to see this design executed. Yet, after all his zeal, or pretended eagerness and sollicitude about this temple, it was never actually built by him¹.

¹ In the leisure of the retired life which he led, after the death of Tullia, Cicero composed several works; his Hortensius; a treatise in the way of

Y. R. 708.
Bef. Chr.
44.
407 Cont.

“more, lest I should seem to distrust your “prudence, and will add therefore but one “thing farther, and conclude: We have “sometimes seen you bear prosperity nobly,
“with great honour and applause to your“self; let us now see that you can bear ad“versity with the same moderation, and “without thinking it a greater burthen than “you ought to do; lest, in the number of “all your other virtues, this one, at last, be “thought to be wanting. As to myself, “when I understand that your mind is “grown more calm and composed, I will “send you word how all things go on here,
“and what is the state of the province.
“Adieu.” Ep. Fam. iv. 5. Middleton, 183.

² Abbe Morgault, ad Att. xii. 1. and Dr. Middleton, p. 190, remark, that this fact seems to confirm what the author of the book of Wisdom observes on the origin of idolatry; that it was owing to the fond affection of parents, seeking to do honour to their deceased children. The father, says he, oppressed with unexpected grief for the sudden death of his child, after making an image of him, began to worship him as a god, though he was but a dead man; and enjoined certain rites and mysteries to his servants and dependants. (Wisd. xiv. 15.) But it was not Cicero's real thought, after all, to exalt his daughter into a deity; he knew it to be absurd, as he often declares, to pay divine honours to dead mortals; and tells us how their very publicans had decided that question in Bæotia: For, when the lands of the immortal gods were excepted out of their lease, by the law of the Censors, they denied that any one could be deemed an immortal god, who had been once a man; and so made the lands of Amphiaraus and Trophonius pay the same taxes with the rest: (De Nat. Deor. iii. 19.) Yet, in a political view, he sometimes recommends the worship of those sons of men, whom their eminent services to mankind had advanced to the rank of inferior gods, as it inculcated, in a manner the most sensible, the doctrine of the soul's immortality: (De leg. ii. 11.) And, since a temple was the most ancient way of doing honour to the dead who deserved it, (Plin. Hist. 27.) he considered it as the most effectual method of perpetuating the memory and praise of Tullia; and was willing to take the benefit of the popular superstition, and follow the example of those ancients, who had polished and civilised human life by consecrating such patterns of virtue to the veneration of their fellow-citizens.

³ His extraordinary affliction, it may be here remarked, gave occasion to suspicions very dishonourable, which are thought to be hinted at in the 38th letter of the xiiith book to Atticus: “You say, that it is time “to shew a little more strength of mind,
“and you tell me, that certain persons talk “concerning me in more severe terms than ei“ther you or Brutus have informed me by “your letters. If some people look upon “my spirit to be broken, and my faculties “impaired, let them know in what com“pany I employ my time, and they will be “sensible that I cannot be blameable, since “I have already so much recovered, as to “bring my mind to such a composed state
“as to be able to write on difficult subjects:
“And that, if I have chosen them as an “amusement to my grief, I am praise“worthy to have taken up with one so be“coming a man of letters.” The author of an invective against him, under the name of Sallust, openly accuses him of an ince-

tuons

Y. R. 708. of dialogue, in which he undertakes the defence of philosophy against Ed J. C. Hortensius, to whom he assigned the part of arraigning it: His Acade- 44- mics, in four books, containing a particular account and defence of the 45- philosophy of the Academy, which he addressed to Varro: His excellent treatise de finibus, or of the chief good and ill of man, in five books, which he addressed to Brutus, in return for a present of the same kind, which Brutus had sent him a little before, viz. a treatise upon virtue;
 and his Tusculan disputations, in five books also, upon as many different questions in philosophy, the most important and useful to the happiness of human life. The first teaches how to contemn the terrors of death, and to look upon it as a blessing rather than an evil; the second, to support pain and affliction with a manly fortitude; the third, to appease all our complaints and uneasinesses under the accidents of life; the fourth, to mode- rate all our passions; the fifth, to evince the sufficiency of virtue to make men happy.

MIL. p.
 215.

After Cæsar's arrival, Cicero was persuaded by his friends to leave solitude and the country, and to come to Rome; where he soon found an opportunity of employing his interest and eloquence in the service of King Deiotarus. This Prince had already been deprived by Cæsar of part of his dominions, for his adherence to Pompey; and was now in danger of losing the rest, from an accusation preferred against him by his grandson, of a design pretended to have been formed by him against Cæsar's life, when Cæsar was entertained in his house, four years before, on his return from Egypt. The charge was groundless and ridiculous;
 but, under his present disgrace, any charge was sufficient to ruin him;

troas commerce with this beloved daughter. And Servius tells us, that Virgil was thought to have glanced at him in this verse:

Hic ibalamus invasi nocte veniosque Hy-menæos.

Dis, who betrays every-where the greatest rancour against our orator, has inserted the same charge against him, in a speech he has made for Cicero, in answer to his second Philippic: But there is nothing in all Ci- cero's letters, or in his behaviour in any part of his life, that gives the least credit to so malicious an aspersion.

* Cicero wrote also at this time a little piece, in the way of a funeral encomium, in praise of Porcia, the sister of Cato, and wife of Domitius Ahenobarbus, Cæsar's mortal enemy. Varro and Lollius attempted the same subject; and Cicero desires Atticus to send him their compositions: But all the three are now lost: Though Cicero took the pains to revive and correct his, and sent copies of it afterwards to Domitius, the son, and Brutus, the nephew of that Porcia.

'It appears, likewise, that he was pressed at this period by Atticus, and his other friends, and even by Brutus himself, to draw up something to be addressed to Cæ- sar; and it was certainly an undertaking suitable to his dignity and character. He drew up a letter accordingly, which was communicated to Hirtius and Balbus, for their judgment upon it, whether it was proper to be sent to Cæsar: But these, not thinking it advisable to send it, unless some passages were softened, Cicero was so much disgusted, that he dropped entirely the design.

"As for the letter to Cæsar, says he to Atti- cus, I was always very willing that Hir- tius and Balbus should first read it; for,
 "otherwise, I had both been wanting in ci"vility to them, and, if I had happened
 "to give offence, exposed myself also to "danger. They have dealt ingenuously
 "and kindly with me, in not concealing
 "what they thought; but what pleases
 "me the most is, that by requiring so many "alterations, they give me an excuse for
 "not writing at all." Ad Att. xii. 51.

and

and Cæsar's countenancing it so far as to receive and hear it shewed a strong prejudice against the King; and that he wanted only a pretence for stripping him of all that remained to him. Brutus also interested himself very warmly in the same cause; and, when he went to meet Cæsar, on his road from Spain, made an oration to him at Nicaa, in favour of Dejotarus; which startled Cæsar, and gave him occasion to reflect on what he had never perceived before, the invincible fierceness and vehemence of Brutus's temper. The present trial was held in Cæsar's house; where Cicero so manifestly exposed the malice of the accuser and the innocence of the accused, that Cæsar, being determined not to acquit, yet ashamed to condemn him, chose the expedient of reserving his sentence to farther deliberation till he should go in person into the East, and inform himself of the whole affair upon the spot. Cicero says, "that Dejotarus, neither present nor absent, could ever obtain any favour or equity from Cæsar: And that, as often as he pleaded for him, which he was always ready to do, he could never persuade Cæsar to think any thing reasonable that he asked for him." He sent a copy of his oration to the King; and, at Dolabella's request, gave another likewise to him: Excusing it, as a trifling performance, and hardly worth transcribing; but I had a mind, says he, to make a slight present to my old host and friend, of coarse stuff, indeed, yet such as his presents usually are to me.

Some little time after this trial, Cæsar, to shew his confidence in Cicero, invited himself to spend a day with him at his house in the country, and chose the third day of the Saturnalia for his visit; a season always dedicated to mirth and feasting amongst friends and relations¹. Cicero gives Atticus the following account of the entertainment, and how the day passed between them. "O this guest, says he, whom I so much dreaded! Yet I had no reason to repent of him, for he was pleased with his reception. When he came the evening before, on the 18th, to my neighbour Philippus, the house was so crowded with soldiers, that there was scarce a room left empty for Cæsar to sup in: But Barba Cassius relieved me; for he assigned me a guard, and made the rest encamp in the field; so that my house was clear. On the 19th, he stayed at Philippus's till one in the afternoon; but saw nobody; was settling accounts, I guess, with Balbus; then took a walk on the shore; bathed after two; heard the verses on *Mamurra*², at which he

VOL. IV.

G g

" never

¹ This festival, after Cæsar's reformation of the calendar, began on the 17th of December, and lasted three days. Macrobi. Saturn. i. 10.

² Mamurra was a Roman Knight, and General of the Artillery to Cæsar in Gaul; where he raised an immense fortune, and is said to have been the first man in Rome who incrustad his house with marble, and made all his pillars of solid marble. (Plin. Hist. xxxvi. 6.) He was severely lashed, says Dr. Middleton, together with Cæsar himself, for his excessive luxury, and more infamous vices, by Catullus, whose verses are still extant, and

V. R. 708.
Bef. Chr.
44.
407 Conf.

Ad Att.
xiv. 1.

Ep. Fam.
ix. 12.

Mi. Ill. p.
217.

Ad Att.
xiii. 52.

Y. R. 708. " never changed countenance ; was rubbed, anointed, sat down to table.
 Bef. Chr. " Having taken a vomit just before ⁴⁴, he eat and drank freely, and was 457 Conf. " very chearful. The supper was good and well-served :

" But our discourse at table, as we eat,
 " For taste and seasoning still excell'd our meat.

" Besides Cæsar's table, his friends were plentifully provided for in three " other rooms ; nor was there any thing wanting to his freedmen of " lower rank and his slaves ; but the better sort were elegantly treated :
 " In a word, I acquitted myself like a man : Yet he is not a guest, to " whom one would say, at parting, Pray call upon me again as you " return : Once is enough. We had not a word on business, but many
 " on points of literature : In short, he was delighted with his entertain-and the same, it has been thought, that Cicero refers to, as being first read to Cæsar at his house. Middl. p. 217. The verses of Catullus are as follow :

*Quis hoc potest videre, quis potest pati,
 Nisi impudicus, et vorax, Es bello ?
 Mamurram habere quod comata Gallia
 Habebant unctum et ultima Britannia :
 Cinæde Romule, hæc videbis et fratres,
 Es impudicus, et vorax, et alio.* Ep. 30.

Palebræ convenit improbis Cinædis, Mamurra Patibique Cæsarique. Ep. 58.

Suetonius, speaking of these verses, says, Valerius Catullum, a quo sibi versiculis de Mamurra perpetua stigmata impressa non dissimulaverat, satisfaciendum, eadem die adhibuit cæna : Hospitiæque patris ejus, sicut consueverat, uti perseveravit. In Cæs. 73. Now Bayle, art. Catulle, remarks very justly, that, if what Suetonius asserts be true, viz. that, if Cæsar continued to lodge at the house of Catullus's father, after his reconciliation with the son, these cannot be the verses read at Cicero's house : Because Cæsar, after this supper, never saw Verona, where Catullus's father lived : And we must conclude, that the offence given by Catullus, and his reconciliation, were before Cæsar's last journey to Gaul ; and the verses now read to him were by another hand.

The reader, perhaps, will not readily understand the time and manner of Cæsar's passing from Philip's house to Cicero's in this short account of it : But it must be remembered, that their villa's were adjoining to each other on the Formian coast near Cajeta ; so that, when Cæsar came out of Philip's at one, he took a walk upon the shore for about an hour, and then entered into Cicero's ; where the bath was prepared for him, and, in bathing, he heard the verses on Mamurra ; not produced by Cicero, for that would not have been agreeable to good manners, but by some of his own friends, who attended him, and who knew his desire to see every thing that was published against him, as well as his easiness in slighting or forgiving it.

² The custom of taking a vomit both immediately before and after meals, which Cicero mentions Cæsar to have done on different occasions, (Pro Dejot. 7.) was very common with the Romans, and used by them as an instrument both of their luxury and of their health : They vomit, says Seneca, that they may eat ; and eat, that they may vomit. (Conf. ad Helv. 9.) By this evacuation before eating, they were prepared to eat more plentifully ; and, by emptying themselves presently after it, prevented any hurt from repletion. Thus Vitellius, who was a famous glutton, is said to have preserved his life by constant vomits, while he destroyed all his companions, who did not use the same caution : (Sueton. 12. Dio, lxx. 734.) and the practice was thought so effectual for strengthening the constitution, that it was the constant regimen of all the Athletæ, or professed wrestlers, trained for the public shews, in order to make them more robust. So that Cæsar's vomiting before dinner was a sort of compliment to Cicero, as it intimated a resolution to pass the day chearfully, and to eat and drink freely with him. Middl. p. 217.

" ment,

" ment, and passed the day agreeably. He talked of spending one " day at Puteoli, another at Baiæ. Thus you see the manner of my re" ceiving him; somewhat troublesome, indeed, but not uneasy to me.
 " I shall stay here a little longer, and then to Tusculum. As he passed " by Dolabella's villa, his troops marched close by his horse's side, on the " right and left; which was done nowhere else. This I had from Nicias."

Y. R. 708
 Bef. Chr.
 44.
 407 Cont.

G g 2

C H A P.

" It is certainly to be regretted that Cicero suppressed the letter which, as we just now observed, he had prepared to address to Cæsar on the state and regulation of public affairs. There remain, however, two epistles, which were written to Cæsar on the same subject, and which have been generally, and with good reason, ascribed to Sallust. These, as they contain many important truths, and throw a considerable light on the times of which we write; and as they discover to us the regulations which an eminent genius and historian thought necessary to remove the disorders into which the Roman State had fallen, and are generally but little attended to; we shall beg leave to offer to the reader. That epistle, which is called the second, was certainly the first; and was written before the battle of Pharsalia: The other, called the first, was written after Cæsar had obtained that battle. It is for this reason that we have altered the order in which these pieces appear in the different editions of the Roman historian.

The first Epistle of SALLUST to C. JULIUS CÆSAR, concerning the Regulation of the Commonwealth.

" I AM not insensible how difficult and nice a task he undertakes, who ventures to offer advice to Princes and Governors; or to any one invested with high authority. The number of Counsellors with whom such persons are surrounded, and the great uncertainty of future contingencies, which the most cautious and penetrating politician cannot sufficiently guard against, are very discouraging considerations: And, what makes the office still more ungrateful, the worst-laid schemes will frequently have a more prosperous event than the most rational and prudent counsels. So capricious is the sway of fortune in the disposal of almost all human affairs!

" But, notwithstanding these discouragements, since my early inclinations led me to the study of state affairs, and as I have, with the utmost application, pursued that knowledge, not so much with a view to obtain employments, which I have often seen procured by means the most base and unworthy; but rather that I might thoroughly inform myself of the nature of our constitution civil and military; what is the true state of her strength with regard to her men, her arms, and her revenue: Therefore, though I may, perhaps, suffer in my reputation, and be thought too forward in the attempt, yet my regard to your dignity and fame has, after mature deliberation, prevailed with me above such apprehensions; and I am determined to run any hazard, where I have the least prospect of an accession to your glory. And be assured it was not without previous consideration, nor so much with a view to the circumstances of your fortune, that I took up this resolution, as because, among your other distinguished qualities, I have ever experienced in you this most admirable one, that the greatness of your soul is more conspicuous in adversity than prosperity.—But the same of your illustrious qualities is a subject I need not expatiate on: It is already so great, that sooner were men wearied in admiring and celebrating, than you in performing glorious actions. Nor was it out of any fond conceit of my own abilities, that I have presumed to lay before you my sentiments concerning the Commonwealth; but, as your thoughts have been hitherto taken up with another scene of business, with the toils of a camp, with battles, with triumphs, and military commands, I thought it not unreasonable to awake your attention to the regulation of civil affairs: For, if your only aim and intention be to repel the furious attack of your enemies upon your dignity, and defend the rights of the people against the Consul who " opposes

“ opposes them, these are views below the virtue of Cæsar. But, if you are still animated by “ the same spirit with which, from your first entrance into public life, you successfully opposed
 “ and overset the faction of the Nobility, and rescued the Roman people from the yoke of slavery;
 “ and with which you baffled, in your prætorship, though unarmed, all the attempts of your “ armed adversaries, and have since performed such great and glorious exploits, that even your “ enemies have nothing to object against you but your superior greatness: If the same virtuous “ spirit still possesses you, give your attention to the plan I shall propose for the regulation “ and government of the Commonwealth; which plan I am persuaded you will find to “ be proper and advisable, or, at least, to require but little alteration.

“ Now, since Pompey, either from a kind of infatuation, or blindly bent upon oppo“ sing you, has been so rash and imprudent as to throw the whole power of the State into “ the hands of its enemies [the aristocracy] and has thus put all into confusion, it is in“ cumbent upon you to restore the Commonwealth, and replace it upon its proper founda“ tion. [by asserting the sovereignty of the people] The first step he took was that of con- “ stituting in a few Senators an absolute authority in the direction of the revenue, the sumptuary “ laws, and judicial proceedings; whilst the people, in whom the sovereign power had before “ been lodged, were left in a state of subjection and slavery. The judicial authority is, indeed, “ as formerly, nominally vested in the three orders of the Republic; but the real power is “ in the hands of the faction, who, with unbridled dominion, controul all things; who “ give to one man and take from another; dispose of every thing, as they please; who “ insinuate the virtuous and innocent, and raise none but their own creatures to posts of ho“ nour: How notorious soever their crimes be, how flagitious soever their lives, and infa“ mous soever their reputation, this scandalous insufficiency excludes them not from the “ magistracy; and, thus exalted, they seize, they plunder whatever they have an in“ clination to: In short, their whole conduct is like that of a victorious army ravaging “ an enemy’s city: Lust and passion animate them; licentiousness is their only law. But, “ under these afflicting circumstances, it would, I own, be some alleviation to our mis“ fortunes to see men of abilities in possession of arbitrary dominion acquired by bra“ very; but, instead of that, we see a despicable faction of base, cowardly wretches, whose “ only strength and courage lie in the feeble efforts of words, masters of sovereign power, “ which fell into their hands by accident, and has been yielded to them by a base, perfidi“ ous man [Pompey] and exercising that power with extreme arrogance and cruelty. For,
 “ in any of our former contests and civil wars, were ever so many and such illustrious fami“ lies extirpated? Did ever any before pursue their conquests with such impetuous fury, such “ exorbitant unbridled licentiousness? Even Sylla, who thought the laws of war gave an “ unlimited license to the Conqueror, though he conceived that the terror of punishment “ added strength to his cause, yet was satisfied with a few instances of severity to his ene“ mies, and chose to win others to his party by lenity and benevolence, rather than the “ dread of revenge. But such moderate resentment suits not the sanguinary temper “ of Cato, Domitius, and the rest of that faction. No less than forty Senators, together “ with numbers of young men of promising abilities, have, by their orders, been but“ chered, like so many victims destined to slaughter; nor could the blood of all these mi“ serable citizens glut the thirst of those most implacable tyrants. The doleful cries of “ helpless orphans, the weakness of aged parents, the groans of men and the lamentations
 “ of women, made not the least impression on their unrelenting hearts: So far from it,
 “ that they grew every day more and more inflamed, both in their words and actions;
 “ and, by injurious practices, degraded many from their employments, drove many into “ exile.” [Pompey was guilty of great partiality in his third consulship, and probably of “ cruelty, since Tacitus, speaking of his conduct at this time, says, that, being chosen to “ correct the public enormities, his remedies proved more grievous to the State than its disorders.
 “ Appian, in his censorship, acted in the same partial manner, and his authority was subservient “ to the views of the aristocracy. Among others of the contrary faction he degraded our “ author and turned him out of the Senate. Hence this description of the injustice and cru“ elty of his enemies is, perhaps, full of resentment, and may be exaggerated] “ And there “ is no occasion to shew how they stand affected towards you. Base cowards as they are,
 “ they would yet gladly sacrifice their lives to procure your disgrace and ruin. Yes,—far “ less is the pleasure they taste in that sovereignty, which is unexpectedly fallen into their “ hands,

“ hands, than the anxiety they feel, when they view your exalted glory : for, to accom“ plish your destruction, they chuse rather to run the hazard of slavery, and esteem it a “ more eligible situation, than to see you the happy instrument of raising the empire of “ Rome, great as it is, to the highest pitch of glory and dominion.

“ These considerations will convince you, how absolutely necessary it is to use the ut“ most care and circumspection in forming your schemes for the establishment and secu“ rity of the Commonwealth. What occurs to me I shall freely offer without any reserve :
 “ But, how far the methods I shall propose are just and practicable, I leave to the determi“ nation of your own judgment.

“ By the primitive constitution of the Republic, as our histories inform us, the people “ were divided into two orders, Patricians and Plebeians : Originally the exercise of the “ supreme jurisdiction was lodged in the former ; but, as the latter was the stronger body, “ this superior force often excited them to withdraw to Mount Aventine, in defence of “ their liberties : The constant effect of which secession was, that the power of the Patri- “ cians was diminished, and the rights and privileges of the people augmented. But what “ contributed most to the security of their liberty was this, the laws had their due force, “ and the power of the magistrate was subservient to them. Nor was it then [during the “ perfect democracy settled by the Licinian laws] “ affluence of fortune, or an arrogant pas“ sion for precedence, but the character of a regular life and gallant exploits, that distin“ guished the nobility from the commonalty : Even men in the lowest station, whether oc“ cupied in their farms at home, or serving in the wars, just provided with the neces“ sary and decent supports of life, were amply satisfied themselves, and gave ample sa“ tisfaction to the State. But when, being thrust out of possession of their lands by a gra“ dual usurpation, they through indigence and idleness (having nothing to do) could no “ longer have any fixed abodes, then they began to covet the wealth of other men, and “ to put their own liberty and the Commonwealth to sale. Thus fell, by degrees, the an“ cient power of the Roman people, who had before been Lords of the world, and given “ laws to all nations ; and they, who jointly exercised sovereign authority, have, each in“ dividual separately, sold themselves to slavery and bondage.

“ Now a multitude, thus disposed, not only corrupt and degenerate in their manners, “ but also, by their different courses and pursuits, so alienated from each other, as to be “ incapable of any coalition and unanimity, are, I apprehend, very ill qualified to assume
 “ the government of the Commonwealth. But, if the number of citizens be augmented, “ such a regulation would rouse up a general ardour in support of the common liberty ;
 “ for then one part of the people will be animated to preserve the liberty they are admitted
 “ to ; and the other to shake off the yoke of slavery, which has hitherto disgraced them.
 “ These new enfranchised citizens, joined to some of the old ones, should, I think, be “ settled in our colonies ; by which means we shall not only be furnished with greater “ supplies for recruiting our armies, but the people, being then employed in useful oc“ cupations, will no longer disturb and embroil the State.” [We have seen above, that “ this was one of the measures taken by Cæsar for the better settlement of the State.] “ I am “ not insensible, that, when you attempt the execution of this scheme, you will expose “ yourself to the fury and severe resentments of the nobility ; who will immediately take “ fire, grow angry, and exclaim, that the very foundation of the constitution is under“ mined, that the ancient citizens are robbed of their privileges, and reduced to a state “ of slavery, and this free Republic converted into a regal government, when any single “ person assumes an arbitrary power of augmenting the number of citizens. I confess, In“ deed, it is my settled opinion, that whoever attempts to render himself popular, at “ the expence of the Commonwealth, is guilty of a crime, the grievous effects of which “ will fall on his own head : yet, at the same time, I will venture to say, He who has not “ resolution enough to undertake such designs, as are at once beneficial to the public, as well as his “ own private interests, is justly chargeable with the imputation of indolence and pusillanimity.
 “ When M. Livius Drusus was Tribune of the people, it was his fixed purpose and reso“ lution to exert his utmost endeavours in favour of the nobility ; nor did he, at first, ever “ enter upon any measures without their consent and authority. And yet those sons
 “ of faction, ever influenced by the maxims of treachery and falsehood, rather than fidelity “ and honour, no sooner considered what a number of men, should Drusus succeed, would “ owe the mighty obligation to one single person ; and, as it is reasonable to imagine,

“ when each reflected on his own base and perfidious heart, conceived, that Drusus would “ act in the same manner they were conscious they themselves should act in the same situ“ ation; apprehending therefore, that his professions of such singular regard for their “ interest was only an artifice to raise himself to sovereignty, they opposed him with the “ utmost rigour, and frustrated all his designs in their favour. These observations will en“ gage you to fortify yourself with the greatest attention and circumspection with all the “ support you can possibly procure.

“ To subdue a fair and open enemy is, to the brave and gallant man, no mighty difficul“ ty: But, in contriving or in avoiding secret stratagems and latent perils, generous and “ noble souls are by no means adroit and expert. For your better security therefore, when “ you have augmented the number of citizens, as the power of the people will be restored, “ it is your principal concern to cultivate good manners, and, by a firm coalition, unite the “ old and new citizens. But the greatest service you can possibly do to your country, to “ your fellow-citizens, to yourself, and your posterity, is to extinguish that extravagant “ passion for riches, which is so prevalent amongst us; or, at least, give such a check to it “ as the circumstances of the times will permit. And, unless this be done, neither in the “ city nor in the camp, neither in the administration of public or private affairs, can any “ due order, any regular oeconomy, be expected. For, where the love of money once pre“ vails, it proves always too powerful for discipline, and suppresses all good dispositions; “ nor is the firmest mind able to resist its efforts; but, sooner or later, falls a victim to “ this passion. Numerous are the instances that occur in history, what Princes, what States “ and Nations, have intirely owed, to the oppressive weight of their opulence, the loss of “ those mighty empires, which have been the glorious acquisitions of virtuous poverty.
 “ Nor is it at all surprising: For when an upright man beholds one of less merit more “ caressed and esteemed, upon no other recommendation but a superior fortune; at first,
 “ it has no other effect than to raise his indignation, and stagger him with perplexities:
 “ But, when he has still every day fresh experience that pomp and splendor triumph over “ genuine glory and honour; wealth and opulence over worth and merit; his mind is at “ last alienated; he deserts the cause of virtue, and flies to the tents of voluptuousness. It “ is doubtless the love of glory that stimulates and supports industry: Stripped of that at“ tracting charm, virtue in herself appears to men with a very forbidding aspect, and under “ a very unamiable form. In short, wherever riches are in high esteem, there all worthy ac“ complishments, there honour and probity, modesty and chastity, must lose all their regard, “ become neglected and despised. For, in the pursuit of virtue, men are confined to one “ road only; a road too surrounded with perils and difficulties: But, in quest of riches, “ great is the latitude they take, and every one pushes forward what way he pleases; and
 “ by any means, honourable or dishonourable, strives to obtain his end. Above all things, “ therefore, you must determine to crush this prevailing power of gold. And I am per“ suaded, that no one hereafter will judge a man more or less qualified for judicial offices, “ or the administration of the Commonwealth, if you put the election of Consuls and “ Prætors upon such a footing, that real worth and merit, and not wealth and riches, must “ of necessity prevail in the choice.” [We have seen also that Cæsar had nothing so much at heart as the execution of his sumptuary laws.]

“ As to the appointment of magistrates, it will be the safest and most convenient method
 “ to invest that power in the people. If you confine it to a few, you approach too near a “ regal government: If you suffer the elections to be carried by bribery, that were base
 “ and dishonourable. It is my opinion, therefore, that all of the first class of the people “ should be intitled to the privilege of standing candidates for judicial offices; but I think it ad“ visable that their number should be augmented. It is well known that neither the “ people of Rhodes, nor any other free State, were ever dissatisfied with the judgments of “ their courts: where rich or poor, just as it fell out, were promiscuously joined together “ in all consultations, even of the greatest, as well as the smallest importance. But, as to “ the election of magistrates, the law enacted by C. Gracchus, when Tribune of the people, “ is by no means to be despised: That, out of the five classes, promiscuously, those centuries
 “ were to give their suffrages should be chosen by lot. When the people are thus re“ duced to an equality, and superiority of fortune no longer gives superior claim to dig“ nity and honour, the only contention, that can then remain, will be, who shall surpass
 “ each

“ each other in virtue and merit. These remedies, which I have prescribed, will, I apprehend, prove a very easy and effectual cure for the evils attending riches. For our admiration, or desire of any objects, arises from the use and advantage we propose from them; it is from the hopes of gain that men are prompted to iniquitous courses: Take away that incitement, and you will find no man alive will be any longer a villain, when a villain can be no longer a gainer. But, whilst the temptation to riches remains, avarice, like a savage beast of the desert, is unsufferably outrageous and cruel: Which way soever she flies, she lays waste whole towns and countries; confounds all things, human and divine, without distinction: Nor walls nor armies are able to obstruct her imperious violence; she falls upon all in her way, robs all she meets, robs them of their reputation, their chastity, their children, parents, and country: All become the prey of this universal plunderer. And yet there is a remedy for this mighty evil: Take away all esteem and honour from riches, and virtue will instantly recover her vigour, and be able to triumph over the rage of this devouring pestilence.

“ But, though all men, whether friends or enemies, allow this to be true, yet, such is the factious spirit of the nobility, that you must expect violent opposition from that quarter. This is the grand obstruction you will meet with; if you can remove that, by guarding yourself against their dark deceit and base stratagems, all the rest of your way will be smooth and easy. Base stratagems I may justly call them, for, were they influenced by any virtuous principle, it would prompt them rather to emulate than envy the worthy. But as sloth and indolence, and dulness and invincible stupidity, press heavy upon them, the only efforts they can make are clamorous complaints and invidious reproaches against that high renown, which they look upon as a tacit reflection on their own infamous reputations. But what necessity is there to say any more about them? You want not to be informed of their characters. You are no stranger to M. Bibulus, the man who, by irresistible courage and great abilities, forced his way to the consular dignity! Yes—You must doubtless be sensible of this, because you know him to be a creature scarce endowed with the faculty of speech; who has, indeed, a heart disposed to any villainy, but not a head to contrive and execute it! What is there to be apprehended from such a man as this, a man to whom the very consulship, the highest office in the State, was the highest disgrace. And, as to L. Domitius, what magnanimity can there be in him, when every part of his body is defiled with some foul vice, some detestable crime or other; his tongue with falsehood and lyes, his hands with blood, his feet with ignominious flight; and his pollutions, in other respects, are so abominably shameful, that even the bare mention of them would be an unpardonable indecency? Cato is the only man amongst them who has any sort of merit: The dexterity of his parts, his eloquence, his artifice and penetration, are no contemptible qualifications: But they are no other than what may be acquired by Grecian discipline. The nobler qualifications, fortitude, vigilance, and unwearied industry, are not to be learned from the Greeks. For can a people, who had neither vigour nor spirit to defend the liberty of their own country, be qualified to instruct others in those arts and accomplishments, that are necessary for the support of empire? As to the rest of the faction, they are a set of noblemen so utterly insignificant, so excessively dull and senseless, that, like stupid statues, their names and titles are their only ornaments.—As for L. Posthumus and Favonius, they appear to me not unlike the additional lading, which is taken into a large ship, above the ordinary burden: If she arrives safe at her port, it may be of use; but had the mariners met with tempestuous weather, those goods would have been first thrown over-board, as they were of the least value.” [What Sallust says here of the nobles agrees very well with the character Cicero gives, in his letters to Atticus, of the Honest or the Fishpondmen; but the picture he draws of Cato is very unlike that which he has given us of the same man in his history of Cataline's conspiracy. There Cato is put upon an equality with CÆSAR in noble birth, eloquence, greatness of spirit and glory: And simplicity of life, regular conduct, and invincible strictness, are mentioned as his acknowledged virtues. He contended not, it is said, in wealth with the wealthy, nor with the factious in practices of faction; but in bravery he yielded not to the most courageous; nor in temperance to the most reserved; nor in purity of morals to the most innocent: He aimed not so much to appear, as to be a virtuous man; and, the less he courted renown, the more it followed him. Sallust, when he wrote

wrote the conspiracy of Cataline, had not, probably, been exasperated by persecutions, or had retired from all public business, and was perfectly at his ease: Whereas, in this epistle, his language is that of a lately provoked enemy. Cicero ad Att. vii. 15. speaks of Favonius and Posthumus, as vain weak men, of importance only in their own conceit: Uni Favonio leges ab illis nobis imponi non placebat; sed is haud auditus in concilio.—Posthumus autem, de quo nominatim Senatus decrevit, ut statim in Siciliam iret, Fuffanoque succederet, negat se sine Catone iterum: Et suam in Senatu operam auctoritatemque magni aestimat. This Posthumus is probably the same man whom Cicero mentions, in another letter to Atticus, ix. 2. as having joined Cæsar before Pompey left Italy: And this circumstance seems to prove that this epistle of Sallust was written upon the rupture between Cæsar and Pompey, and before the former was master of Brundisium.]

“ Having thus given you my judgment concerning the restitution of the plebeian power, and the reformation of their manners; I will now point out to you the steps which it will be adviseable to take, with regard to the Senate.

“ No sooner was my age and reason ripe for application, but I turned my thoughts to literature, rather than the exercise of arms and riding: And, as nature had given me greater strength of mind than body, I chose to inure the most able and vigorous part to labour and fatigue; and, in the pursuit of this course, the observations I have made, in my constant application to study, and the informations of men, as well as books, have thoroughly convinced me that all empires and states in the world have prospered and flourished, as long as they pursued wise and wholesome counsels: But, when partiality, fear, and voluptuousness corrupted those counsels, their strength soon began to decline: Then they lost their dominion, and, at last, their liberty.

“ I confess it is my settled opinion, that whoever is placed in an eminent station, and has a greater share of property in any State, is ever found to be most concerned for its security and preservation. As to others, they have but one motive to engage their attention, their liberty. But the man who, by virtue and bravery, has acquired riches, fame, and dignity, has those additional incitements. And therefore, whenever he sees any dangers threatening the State, the apprehension alarms his mind, rouses all his thoughts and cares, and excites his utmost pains and labour; his liberty, his glory, his property are at stake, and he will defend them. His vigilance is seen in all places, his activity in every quarter: For, the more flourishing his circumstances are, when the constitution is secure, the more anxious, the more resolute and vigorous, will be his endeavours, when he apprehends it to be in danger. These considerations convince me, that, in a constitution, where the people are to put in execution the determinations of the Senate, as the body does the dictates of the mind, prudence and policy are indispensable qualifications in the Fathers; sagacity and penetration talents unnecessary in the People.—Our ancestors, though oppressed with grievous wars, held out with unwearied industry, after infinite losses, and when their money was exhausted. Such was their magnanimity, that neither the formidable strength of their enemies, nor the emptiness of their treasury, nor any unprosperous events could subdue their invincible spirit. The acquisitions they made by virtue they did not part with but with life: And they owed their success, not so much to their courage in the field, as to the wisdom, the boldness, and the constancy of their counsels. For, in those happy days, all the members of the Commonwealth, firmly cemented together, acted as one man; had no other views but her welfare; entered into no cabals but against the public enemy; and every individual exerted his abilities both of mind and body, not to aggrandise himself, but his country. Far different are the practices which prevail in this age; for now a set of noblemen, enervated with indolence and sloth, who never faced an enemy in battle; unexperienced in war, unacquainted with military toils and hardships, trained up to faction only within the walls of the city; arrogantly usurp sovereign authority over all the nations upon earth: Whilst the Fathers, whose salutary counsels have hitherto preserved the State in all her difficulties, are driven, like the waves of the sea, this way or that, by arbitrary impulse; one day enact laws, the next repeal them, just as it suits the caprice, the resentments, and arrogance of these lordly oppressors; for that alone is allowed to be the rule to estimate public good or evil.

But

“ But if now, in your regulations, you restore to the Senators their common privileges and equal liberty, or contrive for them some secret method of giving their suffrages, then would the exorbitant power some of the nobility possess soon be diminished, and the Commonwealth would rise again and prosper. But, though an attempt to bring the interest and influence of the whole body upon a level may be thought impracticable, since some of them made their entrance into the world upon the bottom of anticipated honours and dignity, and a numerous train of clients; whereas the generality of others, Senators, not by descent but creation, cannot have, in all respects, equal influence and advantages: Yet they should, at least, be freed from any restraint of awe or terror in giving their suffrages. When every one can thus act, as it were, in obscurity, then the dread of any man's arrogant power will no longer force him to comply with measures prejudicial to his own interest and liberty. Liberty is a jewel of high estimation; the worthy and the unworthy, the coward and the brave, equally love and admire it. But, admired as it is, we often see men, alarmed by the dread of superior strength, tamely give up that inestimable treasure to the demands of a public robber. Weak and infatuated man! Liberty or bondage is the subject of contention; and, whilst the victory is yet uncertain, they receive the ignominious yoke; the worst lot that could have befallen them, had their resistance been unsuccessful.

“ Two expedients, therefore, I would propose to confirm the senatorial power; first to augment their number; and then to make it a rule, that each shall give his suffrage by tablets. By the one, every man, being screened under the protection of a veil, will not be intimidated from acting according to the dictates of his own mind. By the other, the additional numbers will be an additional service and security to the State. For such is our present situation, that our public deliberations are very ill attended: Some few are engaged in judicial offices; some are taken up with domestic concerns or the service of their friends; but the more general cause of their absence is, not so much any other avocation, as the intolerable arrogance of those lofty oppressors, who have usurped such exorbitant power, for now some of the ancient nobility, with a few of the new-created Senators, whom they have taken in as a farther support to the faction, censure, approve, and decree, by their own absolute authority; and act, in every instance, just as their own arbitrary will inclines them. But, if you augment the number of Senators, and oblige them to give their suffrages by tablets, then would those haughty rulers soon abate their arrogance, when they found they must submit to the determination of those very men, over whom they have exercised such rigorous, such despotic sway.

“ When you have examined these expedients, you may, perhaps, ask me, what number it is advisable to add to the senatorial order; and in what manner, and for what purposes, I would advise the distribution of them into their several parts and distinct offices: And, as I have proposed the committing the judicial proceedings to the first class of the people, in what form they should be distributed, and what shall be the number of each different division? It would not be difficult to draw up a particular plan; but I thought it advisable, first, to propose a general scheme, and to have your approbation of that, before I proceeded farther. If you think my expedients just and true in general, you will find the rest very easy and obvious. I will not deny, that I have a strong ambition to see the justness and propriety of these regulations confirmed by their happy consequences: For, from your success and prosperity, I shall expect to derive some share of glory and reputation to myself. But yet far greater is my desire, much more ardent my passion, to see the Commonwealth restored, whatever expedients are used; with as much expedition as it can possibly be effected. Liberty is a happiness I prefer infinitely above the highest acquisitions of fame and glory: And let me intreat, let me beseech and exhort you, now that you have raised yourself to the highest military renown, and gloriously triumphed over the warlike nation of the Gauls, not to suffer the mighty Roman empire, hitherto invincible, to perish and decay, or be dissolved by civil wars or inveterate discord. Should such a calamity happen through your fault, be assured, Cæsar, that, neither day nor night, will you be free from pungent remorse; the sense of such a corroding guilt will ever disturb your rest, and your afflicted mind will be incessantly racked with madness and despair. For I look upon it as an uncontrollable truth, that the Deity constantly inspects the actions of all the human race;

“ nor will the virtues or vices of any one pass unregarded ; but, agreeably to the different nature of them, they will be followed by a different retribution. These may not, indeed, be the immediate effects, but they are the constant expectation of every man, arising from the consciousness of his actions.

“ Imagine now that the Geniuses of Rome, attended by your ancestors, were to accost you at this important crisis : You would hear them delivering their sentiments in the following strain : Remember, CÆSAR, that it is from us you derive your descent, from a race of virtuous and valiant heroes. We gave thee existence in this flourishing city, to be the support of our dignity, a strength to our establishment, and a terror to our adversaries. And, when from us you received your life, you received, with it, all the acquisitions, which were the fruits of our infinite toils and perils, a country the most powerful and extensive, a place and family the most illustrious in that country ; in all which, we took care to add many excellent accomplishments, joined to an affluent fortune, acquired with honour ; in short, all the felicities that adorn a settled peace, all the rewards that crown a successful war. Think not that, in return for these extensive obligations, we require from thee any undertaking inconsistent with virtue and probity. No—what we expect at thy hands is THE RESTORATION OF FAL-LING LIBERTY. Accomplish THIS, and every corner of the universe will instantly be filled with the applause of such a virtuous achievement. What ! though you have already given many illustrious proofs of great abilities, both in your civil and military capacity, yet in this, CÆSAR, thou art not singular ; there are many brave, magnanimous spirits, who have arrived to the same degree of glory. But, if you would surpass all others, arise now and rescue, from the brink of ruin, this most renowned, this mighty Empire. Then, indeed, wilt thou rise to matchless greatness, and shine in unrivalled lustre ! But should a different fate attend this State, should it perish through the malignity of the distemper that afflicts it ; who sees not that universal wars, desolation, and slaughter will attend her fall ? But if you feel a generous ardour to do the most acceptable service to us and to your country, assert the liberty of the Commonwealth, and save the sinking State : Then will succeeding ages view thee exalted above all the human race, and, even after death, with singular felicity, gathering fresh laurels of praise. For it sometimes happens that the clouds of adverse fortune cast a shade on living grandeur, and oftentimes the blasts of envy check its growth. But, when the hero yields to fate, malice and detraction expiring with him, his merit becomes more and more conspicuous, and daily rises to higher degrees of fame and glory.

“ Thus, Cæsar, I have presented you with a brief plan of such regulations as, I apprehend, will contribute most to the public good, and your own interest. But, whatever scheme you think proper to pursue, I beseech the immortal gods that it may have a prosperous event, and that both you and your country may reap the fruits of your successful endeavours.”

The second Epistle of SALLUST to C. JULIUS CÆSAR, concerning the Regulation of the Commonwealth.

“ I T heretofore prevailed, as an established truth, that kingdoms and empires, and whatever other objects men eagerly pursue, were only the gifts of fortune ; since they were often capriciously bestowed upon the undeserving, and never enjoyed by any, without a sensible diminution and decay. But experience has convinced us that Appian the poet was not mistaken when he said, that every man is the architect of his own fortune. In you, especially, Cæsar, is this maxim verified ; in you, who have so far surpassed all others, that sooner were men wretched in celebrating your glorious actions, than you in performing them. But still, as in the finished works of architecture, so in the acquisitions of heroic virtue, the utmost attention is required ; if they are neglected, their beauty will soon be impaired ; or, for want of care to support them, the noblest structures may fall to ruin. For it is not without reluctance that any man submits to the sovereign authority of another ; and, however just and mild he may be in the exercise of such power, still we are apt to be under apprehensions of oppression from him whose situation enables him to oppress when he pleases. Nor are such apprehensions without foundation ; for those who get the reins of government into their hands are, in “ their conduct, generally influenced by an absurd maxim, that, the more base and degenerate the people are, the more secure is the power of the Sovereign. But far different ought to be your measures, Cæsar; and, as you yourself are virtuous and brave, who are to give laws, it is highly expedient to make the people so, who are to receive them. For the worst of men are always found most impatient under the restraints of government.

“ Indeed, when I consider, that the exercise of your power, in the course of the war, has been more gentle than that of others in the times of peace; when I see your victorious troops demanding the gratification of plundering the conquered; and when I consider, that the conquered are your fellow-citizens; I must confess that these difficulties, which you have to encounter in settling your conquests are greater than any, before you, have met with. But out of these difficulties you must resolve to extricate yourself, and settle the Commonwealth upon a firm establishment for the future; an undertaking to be effected, not so much by the force of arms, or by triumphs over enemies, as by a method much more noble as well as difficult; by the wholesome institutions of laws, and the sanctions of discipline and peace. An affair, therefore, of such high importance, calls upon all, not only those of eminent abilities, but also those who are less distinguished, to communicate their sentiments, and offer the best advice in their power: For it is my opinion, that the future happiness or misery of Rome entirely depends upon the methods you take in settling your victories.

“ That this great end may be more easily and effectually accomplished, I beg your attention to a few things, which occur to my thoughts upon this occasion.

“ You have been engaged, illustrious General, in a war against an eminent adversary, a man of immense wealth and boundless ambition; but more distinguished by his fortune than any prudence and sagacity in his conduct. Amongst his adherents, some few followed his arms, whose enmity to you had no other foundation, than the injustice they had done you: Others were drawn to his party by the tie of affinity, or some personal obligation. Not one of them had any share in his power; for, could he have submitted to a participation of dominion, the whole world would not have felt the shock of a devouring war. The rest of his party, the vast multitudes of the common people, that were in his camp, were drawn thither, not so much by their own judgment, as by the prevailing example of others, whom they looked upon as more discerning than themselves.” [The evidence of these truths we have already seen in the course of this history.] “ In this juncture, a set of wretches, whose infamous luxury had left nothing unpolluted, encouraged by malicious reports, with the hopes of seizing the Commonwealth, came over to your camp; and there, without any reserve, threatened death and rapine, and all the miseries of unrestrained licentiousness, to those who engaged in neither party. But many of them, when they found you would neither cancel their debts, nor suffer your fellow-citizens to be treated as public enemies, withdrew from your camp. Some few of them, indeed, still remained, imagining they should enjoy greater ease and security there, than they could in the city: So terrible an apprehension had they of the power and rage of creditors. It is almost incredible what numbers, and what men of high rank and distinction went over to Pompey also upon the very same motives; and, during the whole course of the war, adhered to him, as a sacred and inviolable sanctuary to people under such difficulties and distresses.

“ Now, as the success of your arms has made you the arbitrator of war and peace; that you may put such an end to the one, as may be a demonstration of your regard to your fellow-citizens, and make the other as honourable and lasting as possible; consider well what are the most advisable steps for the regulation of your own conduct; since it is on you only that this affair intirely depends. It is my opinion, that the rigid exercise of power tends rather to render it vexatious and uneasy, than firm and lasting; nor is it possible for any man to make himself an object of dread to the many, but, at the same time, a reciprocal dread of the many must recoil upon himself. And to be in such a situation is to be eternally involved in a state of warfare on all sides perilous: For, to whatever quarter you betake yourself, no security is to be found, surrounded as you are with continual dangers, and alarmed with terrible apprehensions. Very different is the situation of those, whose power is tempered with mildness, and moderated by humanity and benevolence! Every thing around them appears fair, flourishing, and happy; and the very enemies of the nation shew them more favour and esteem than “ those of a contrary character meet with from their own citizens. And can any one say, “ that I am prompted to give this advice by a partial regard to the conquered party, or “ a sinister view to detract from the glory of your triumphs? No doubt I deserve this “ censure, for declaring that such treatment as foreign nations, nations naturally our foes,

 “ have met with from us, and our ancestors, ought not to be denied to our fellow-citizens,
 “ and that we Romans should not, like savage barbarians, insist upon the retaliation of blood “ and slaughter.

“ Have they then forgot the reproaches they lately cast upon Pompey, and upon Sylla's “ cruel use of victory? How Domitius, Carbo, and Brutus, with several others, were “ slain; that they fell not, when under arms in the field; not in the heat of battle, by “ the common calamity of war; but, after that was over, even when they were suppli“ cating mercy, they were most inhumanly murdered by Pompey. Have they forgot how “ the people of Rome were, like so many cattle, butchered in the field of Mars? Bloody “ and inhuman has been the use other conquerors, before you, have made of their vic“ tories! Dreadful were the scenes of private slaughters, unexpected massacres, women “ flying into the bosoms of their children, and children into the bosoms of their parents, “ and, in all quarters, our habitations plundered and demolished! The very men who “ acted this bloody part would now persuade you to pursue the same measures: As if the “ only motive of the war had been, whether you or Pompey should have an arbitrary power
 “ of oppressing mankind; as if you had not restored the Commonwealth, but seized it “ as a prey of your successful arms; and as if the flower of our army, and the choicest “ of our veteran troops, took up arms against brethren and parents, and some even against “ their own offspring, from this motive only, that the most abandoned of men might,
 “ from the calamities of others, procure means to indulge their insatiable appetites, or “ that their enormous lives might reflect dishonour on the worthy men engaged in the “ same cause, and so stain the glory of their conquests. I venture to speak thus, because “ I am persuaded you are no stranger to the conduct of every individual amongst them, and “ how far they observed the rules of moderation, even when the event of the war was un“ certain; and how some of them gave such a loose to debauchery and licentious festivity, “ in the very field of battle, as men of their years could not have indulged themselves in,
 “ without a blemish to their reputation, even in time of peace and tranquillity.

“ I see no occasion to say any more of the disposition of military affairs.

“ As to the establishing of peace, since that is the great point you and your friends
 “ have in view; consider, in the first place, I beseech you, the nature of the affair now “ under deliberation: For thus, by distinctly separating the arguments on both sides, you “ will, of course, open a way to right measures. I own, when I reflect with myself, “ that whatever had a beginning has naturally a determined period, I am persuaded, that, “ whenever the fatal destruction of Rome's empire approaches, it can only happen when “ her citizens are harassed with intestine wars: In that critical juncture, when their “ strength is worn out and their spirits exhausted, they will fall a prey to some foreign “ Prince or State. But, were it possible to preserve harmony amongst ourselves, the whole “ world, all the nations of the earth in confederacy, would not be able to diminish or “ shake this mighty empire. Therefore, to secure all the advantages of unanimity, and to “ remove and prevent all the mischiefs of dissensions and divisions, is the great point “ that requires your perpetual attention. The best way to effect this is to give a check “ to the fashionable vices of licentious profuseness and rapine; not by reinforcing those “ obsolete laws, which the depravity of the times has rendered contemptible; but by ob“ liging every man to live within the bounds of his fortune. For now a prevailing custom “ has taught the Roman youth to look upon it as a laudable and gallant behaviour to “ squander away, not only their own, but other mens fortunes; and to deny themselves, “ or their dependents, no sort of gratification whatsoever. This they call manly conduct, “ this, true greatness of soul; whilst modesty passes for stupidity; and moderation, as the “ quality of an abject, inactive spirit. Possessed with such notions, when once engaged “ in a profligate course, they run on with unbridled fury; and no sooner do their old sup“ plies fail them, but they fall with impetuous violence upon our allies, sometimes upon “ our fellow-citizens, disturb the order and tranquillity of government, and, by any means “ whatsoever, would raise a new fortune to repair the ruins of the old one.

“ Since,

“ Since, therefore, this is the present situation of our affairs, it seems to me absolutely “ necessary to crush the power of the usurers, that every man may take upon him the ma“ nagement of his own affairs. To effect this, the only true and natural method would “ be to oblige the magistrates, in their judicial proceedings, to promote rather the inte“ rest of the people in general, than to favour the narrow interest of the creditors, and “ to establish their glory and reputation upon their endeavours to add strength to the Com“ monwealth, and not on such measures as tend to diminish it.

“ I am very sensible what disgust the first advances in this reformation will give, to “ those especially, who, after victory, expected rather greater latitude to their licentious “ inclinations, than any stricter discipline and restraints. But, if you regard more the “ true interest of the Commonwealth, than the loose desires of these men, you will pre“ vent their outrageous intentions, and settle both them and us, and all our allies, in a “ firm state of peace and tranquillity. But, if the youth are permitted to go on in their “ present pursuits, then will Cæsar’s exalted glory soon fall to the ground; and Rome it“ self will fall with Cæsar. Give me leave to add, that, it is, with a view of procuring “ peace, that men of sense and understanding enter into war; and, under all the toils “ and hardships attending it, they are supported by the prospect of future tranquillity. If “ this great end be not effectually accomplished, what does it avail, whether you con“ quer, or are conquered?

“ Wherefore, in the name of the immortal gods, take upon you the care and protection “ of the Commonwealth, and bravely push through all difficulties, with your wonted vi“ gour and resolution. For either you, Cæsar, can heal the wounded State, or it will “ be in vain for any other to attempt the cure. And what is that we now require at your “ hands? You are not called to bloody executions, to cruel and rigorous proceedings; “ methods which would sooner depopulate the State, than correct its manners; but only
 “ to give a check to the base practices and licentious debauchery of the Roman youth.
 “ This, this only, is the true notion of clemency; to prevent such vices as deserve the “ punishment of expulsion; to put a stop to extravagant follies, and the pursuits of false “ pleasures; and to establish union and harmony in the State.

“ I must confess here, I am sensible, that the greatness of this important undertaking “ raises doubts and fears in other men; but to me it gives the strongest assurances of suc“ cess: For matters of small moment are below the notice of so exalted a genius. Great “ indeed is the task, and great will be the reward, if you accomplish it!

“ Now one grand point, which demands your attention, is, that the People, whose “ minds are at present corrupted with gifts of corn, and other public largesses, apply “ themselves to their respective occupations. Such an application would divert their “ thoughts from giving any disturbance to the government: The youth also should be “ taught to turn their pursuits from riotous expence, and the thirst of riches, to a course “ of industry and the study of virtue. And this great end you will accomplish, by put“ ting an effectual stop to the use which men now make of money; and stripping that fruit“ ful source of evils of the esteem it has gained in the world. For, whenever I have ex“ amined by what steps illustrious heroes rose to the height of renown; by what means any “ people enlarged their conquests, and to what causes the ruin of mighty Kingdoms and “ States was to be ascribed; in either case I always discovered the same good or evil cause, “ constantly producing the same good or evil effects: And that the successful were always “ such as held riches in contempt; the unsuccessful such as coveted and admired them.
 “ Nor, indeed, is there any possible method to rise to glory and immortal fame, but by sub“ duing the thirst of riches and sensual pleasures, and giving a free scope to the exercise of “ the mind; not fondly soothing and gratifying the demands of unreasonable and corrupt “ inclinations; but by inuring it to labour and patience, to wholesome discipline and vi“ liant exploits. A man may raise a pompous palace in the town, or villa in the country;
 “ he may furnish them with magnificent hangings and statues, with other expensive orna“ ments, and thus make every thing in them conspicuous, but himself; yes, from the “ richness of such decorations, he is so far from deriving any honour or glory, that he “ himself casts a blemish upon their lustre. And, as for such as are so abandoned, that they “ pass not a day without twice overcharging their stomachs, not a night without disho“ nouring their bed with polluted embraces; when once the mind, designed by nature to “ govern

“ govern and controul, is thus become a slave to degenerate passions, in vain will they at“ tempt to rouse her up to exercise, when her vigour is decayed, and her faculties im“ paired. Men of this character, having neither spirit nor abilities, must unavoidably “ confound and destroy themselves and every scheme they engage in. Now these and all “ other evils which afflict the State, together with the high value and esteem that is set up-
 “ on riches, would be effectually cured, if neither the offices of magistracy, nor any other “ things, which are the objects of mens eager-pursuits, can hereafter be obtained by the “ influence of money. Proper care should, at the same time, be taken, that Italy and the “ provinces be put in a more secure situation; an affair which requires no great penetration
 “ to accomplish. The same remedy will answer, where the evil is the same; for there too, “ as well as in the city, the public ravagers have plundered and seized every thing they “ met with, forsaking their own habitations, and, in violation of all justice and equity, “ possessing those of other people. It is no less necessary to put a stop to that unjustifiable “ partiality, which has hitherto prevailed in our army, where some of the people have been “ forced to bear the fatigue of war for thirty years, whilst others have been entirely excused
 “ from the service. It is likewise my opinion, that the corn, which has hitherto been us- “ ing the reward of the warlike and inactive, should be sent to our municipal towns and co- “ lonies, and there distributed to the soldiers, when they return home after their discharge from “ service.

“ I have now, as briefly as the case would admit, laid before you such regulations as “ appear to me most conducive to the good of the Commonwealth, as well as your own “ reputation and glory: And, I apprehend, it will not be improper for me to add a word “ or two in relation to this my undertaking. There is scarce any man who does not be“ lieve himself furnished with all the faculties that make up a true and distinguishing judg“ ment; or, at least, endeavours to make the world believe so: but, certainly, all men “ in general have so violent a propensity to blast and condemn the performances of others,
 “ that the faculties of speech are too slow, to utter the quick suggestions of their hearts,
 “ That I have laid myself open to such men is a consideration, that does not, in the least, “ afflict me. Had I been silent on such an occasion, I should have been less able to have “ borne the reflection. For, whether you pursue the methods I have pointed out, or “ others occur, which may be thought more advisable, still I have given the best advice
 “ I was capable of, and contributed my utmost assistance towards the regulation of the “ Commonwealth.

I have nothing more to do, but to follow you with my earnest wishes, that whatever “ measures you pursue may be attended with approbation, and crowned with success by “ the immortal gods.”

C H A P. XI.

CÆSAR'S grand designs for the good of the Roman Empire. His death and character.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR, Dictator II.

Consul V. with

M. ANTONIUS.

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.

+3.
408 Cons.

Midd. p.
211.

ON the opening of the new year, Cæsar entered into his fifth consulship, in partnership with M. Antony: He had promised it all along to Dolabella, but, contrary to expectation, took it at last to himself.
 This

* There were sixteen Prætors this year, Lucius and Cassius, and six Ediles. Besides the the most distinguished of whom were Brutus two curule and the two plebeian Ediles,
Cæsar

This was contrived by Antony, who, jealous of Dolabella, as a rival in Cæ-^{Y. R. 709.}
far's favour, had been suggesting somewhat to his disadvantage, and ^{Bef. Chi.} labouring to create a diffidence of him in Cæsar; which seems to have ^{43.}
been the ground of what is mentioned above, Cæsar's guarding himself ^{408 Conf.}
so particularly, when he passed by his villa. Dolabella was sensibly touched with this affront, and came full of indignation to the Senate, where, not daring to vent his spleen on Cæsar, he entertained the as-^{Philip. ii.}
sembly with a severe speech against Antony: Which drew on many warm ^{32.} and angry words between them; till Cæsar, to end the dispute, promised to resign the consulship to Dolabella, before he went to the Par- thian war. But Antony protested, that, by his authority as Augur, he would disturb that election, whenever it should be attempted^a; and declared, without any scruple, that the ground of his quarrel with Do- labella was, for having caught him in an attempt to debauch his wife Antonia, the daughter of his uncle^b; though that was thought to be a calumny, contrived to colour his divorce with her, and his late marriage with Fulvia the widow of P. Clodius.

Cæsar, says Plutarch, being born for great achievements, and pas-^{Plut. in} sionately fond of glory, his continual success was no inducement to him ^{Cæs.} to enjoy the fruits of his labours, but became a spur to animate him to greater enterprises. He grew insensible to present glory, that he might seek fresh honour; and, becoming, in a manner, his own rival, he was ambitious by new enterprises and exploits to efface the splendor of his former ones. He had always entertained the thoughts of avenging the death of Crassus, his friend and partner in power; and no sooner had he put an end to the African war, than he openly declared his intention

Cæsar had instituted two more, called Cere- cales, who were to have the inspection of corn and all kinds of grain for the provision of the city.

^a This proves, by the way, that Cæsar kept up the usual forms in the election of magistrates.

^b Cicero relates, as an aggravating circumstance, that Antony made this dishonourable declaration in the presence of his uncle and father-in-law Antonius: Omni- bus eum [C. Antonium patrem Antoniae uxoris tuæ] contumeliis onerasti, quem pa-tris loco, si ulla pietas in te esset, colere de-bebas; filiam ejus, uxorem tuam, ejecisti, alia conditione quasita et ante perspecta: [Cicero insinuates, that he was already in good terms with Fulvia, and had determined to marry her] Non est satis: Probri- infundasti pudicissimam fæminam: Quid est, quod addi possit? contentus eo non fuisti. Frequentissimo Senatu kalendis Jan. sedente Patruo,

hanc tibi esse cum Dolabella causam odii dicere
ausus es, quod ab eo foreris? Et uxori tuæ stu-prum oblatum esse comperisses. Quis interpre-tari potest, impudentiorne, qui in Senatu: an improbior, qui in Dolabellam: An impurior, qui Patruo audiente: An crudelior, qui in illam miseram, tam spurcè tam impiè dixeris?
Phil. ii. 38. Dio, in a speech, which he has composed for Cicero against Calenus, makes his orator reproach Antony with his unkind behaviour to C. Antonius, whom he neither recalled from banishment during Cæsar's administration, nor after his death.
Thus the genuine Cicero and the persona-ted Cicero contradict one another. Many observations of the same kind may be made, which evidently prove, that the long invectives which we find in the Greek historian are either the production of his own imagination, or copied from very inaccurate memoirs.

V. R. 729.
Bef. Chr.
43.
4c 5 Conf.
 to retrieve the honour of the Empire, and made preparations for this expedition, which the people greatly approved of. After his return from Spain, he sent his legions before him into Macedonia, intending, before he led them into the East, to chastise the Daci, who had made inroads upon the Roman territory; and, after he had vanquished the Parthians, he proposed to go by Hyrcania to the borders of the Caspian sea, to pass Mount Caucasus, and return, through Scythia, Germany, and Gaul, into Italy, extending and securing on all sides, in his progress, the frontiers of the Roman empire. As this expedition could not be executed in less than two or three years, he appointed Consuls and other magistrates for the two following, lest, in his absence, the elections for these offices might raise disturbances in the city. A. Hirtius and C. Vibius Pansa were elected Consuls for the next, and D. Brutus and Munacius Plancus for the following year.

The necessary preparations for so grand an enterprise did not divert his attention from the works of peace: Various designs, all uncommonly great, employed his thoughts. He laid the foundations of two magnificent edifices for the ornament of the city; a temple to Venus, which, for grandeur, would have exceeded every thing in the world of that kind; and a theatre of immense extent; both which were afterwards completed by Augustus. He undertook to rebuild and repair several towns in Italy, to drain the Pemphine marshes, which render, to this day, the air of that part of Italy very unwholesome; to discharge the lake Fucinus; to dig a new bed for the Tiber from Rome to the sea, in order to facilitate the navigation of that river; to form a port at Ostia, capable of receiving the first-rate ships; to make a causeway over the Appenine mountains from the Adriatic sea to Rome; to rebuild Corinth and Carthage, whither he had transported colonies of Roman citizens, a project also perfected by Augustus; to cut through the Isthmus of Corinth, to save the seamen the trouble and danger of navigating round the Peloponnesus; and to take an exact geographical map of the whole Roman empire, with all its roads, and the distances of the towns. He also employed the learned Varro to collect a library of all the Greek and Latin authors, which he intended for the use of the public, and which was placed by Augustus in the temple of Apollo on Mount Palatine. In fine, he formed the design of abridging the collection of Roman laws, and, out of that immense and extravagant bulk into which they had swelled, to draw together in a small compass the best and most necessary.

Thus was Cæsar continually looking round him from his dictatorial chair, how best to acquit himself of his duty, and to sustain the dignity of his office; filling up the greatest posts of trust and honour with men of eminence, courage, and capacity; relying entirely, without any guards, upon the affections of the people, when a dire conspiracy was formed against his life, which deprived mankind of the benefit of such universal benevolence, and was as fatal to those who engaged in it.

We are told by the ancient historians, Suetonius, Plutarch, and Dio, who have evidently taken their accounts from Pompeian memoirs, that Cæsar's usual prudence intirely failed him at once; and, as if the height to which he was mounted had turned his head and made him giddy, he ran mad after the appellation of King; and, when he was actually possessed, in quality of Dictator, Emperor, and Master of Manners, of all the power of the Empire, was not still content without a title, which could add nothing to him but envy and popular odium. The proofs of this heavy charge lie in the following facts: On the 26th of January, returning with the pomp of an ovation, decreed him by the Senate, from Mount Albanus, where he had celebrated the Ferie Latine, amidst the acclamations of the people, he was saluted King by some in the throng, and, at the same time, a royal diadem with a crown of laurel was fixed upon one of his statues. The multitude, says Plutarch, was silent, and seemed abashed, and Cæsar was forced to answer, My name is Cæsar, not King: And it was remarked that he passed on with an air of sullenness and dissatisfaction, as one disappointed of his expectations. Epidius Marullus and Cæsetius Flavus, two Tribunes of the People, ordered the diadem to be taken down, and committed to prison the man who had put it round the head of the statue, declaring that they would also punish those who had dared to style him King; for that Cæsar refused and abhorred that title. Cæsar, says Suetonius, was much concerned that the mention of his advancement to the royal dignity had been made with so little success, or, as he pretended, that he had been thus deprived by the Tribunes of the honour of refusing it: He accused them before the Senate of a design to raise a sedition against him, by persuading the city, that he really affected to be a King; but, when the Senate was going to pass the severest sentence against them, he was content with deposing them from their magistracy, and expelling them from the Senate. From that day, adds Suetonius, he was never able to wipe away the scandal of affecting the name of King.

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.
43.
408 Cons.

Dio, 44.

But the Dictator's intentions are supposed to have been clearly manifested by Antony's bold attempt a few days after, on the 15th of February, when the festival of the Lupercalia was celebrated. Cæsar, in his triumphal robe, being seated upon his golden chair in the Rostra, to see the diversion of the running, Antony, then Consul, in the midst of the sport, at the head of the Luperci, made him the offer of a royal diadem, and essayed several times to put it upon his head. Cæsar as often rejected it, and at last sent it away to the Capitol, proclaiming, that Jupiter was the only King of the Romans: And Antony had it entered into the public acts, "that, by the command of the People, as Consul,

Is not this a strange inference? Cæsar charges the two Tribunes with a design of making him odious, and raising a sedition, by persuading the city, that he really affected the royal title: The Senate condemns the Tribunes as guilty of this crime: Therefore Cæsar most certainly affected the royal title.

VOL. IV.

I i

he

Y. R. 709. " he had offered the name of King to Cæsar, perpetual Dictator, and Ref. Chr. " that Cæsar would not accept of it."

^{43.}
 408 Cœl. Notwithstanding so public and solemn a refusal of the royal diadem, ————— Cæsar is supposed to have still prosecuted the scheme of getting himself called King, and to have had recourse to the ministers of religion, in order to gain his end. A prophecy was found in the Sibylline books, warning the Romans, " that the Parthians could never be conquered but
 " by a King:" And it was whispered, that L. Cotta, one of the Guardians of these books, was appointed to lay the oracle before the Senate, and to propose that, since their most mortal enemies could not be vanquished but by a King, Cæsar should have that title conferred upon him. But this was no more than a rumour, according to Cicero, Suetonius, and Dio°. It is hard to believe that Cæsar either laid so much stress.

* Cæsar, it is said, was angry with the Tribunes Marullus and Flavius for depriving him of the honour of refusing the crown: If so, and if we must believe that the offering of the crown on the festival of the Lupercalia was not a mere frolic of Antony's, but a thing concerted between him and Cæsar;
 then I do not see what absurdity there is in supposing, that Cæsar took this means to retrieve his honour, and make a public and solemn declaration, that he did not affect the kingly title, in contradiction to the in-vidious rumours spread by his enemies.

Middl. p.
 225.

* Dr. Middleton gives us this rumour for certain fact, and tells us, that Cæsar's impatience to be a King accelerated his fate, and pushed on the nobles, who had conspired against his life, to the immediate execution of their plot; that they might save themselves the shame of being forced to concur in an act which they heartily detested: And the two Bruni's, in particular, the honour of whose house was founded in the extirpation of kingly government, could not but consider it as a personal infamy, and a disgrace to their very name to suffer the restoration of it.—Now, to my apprehension, there is in these facts and rumours no proof of Cæsar's having affected the royal title. It is quite improbable in itself, and it is not to be admitted, but upon the strongest evidence, that so great a man as Cæsar should lay so much stress upon a title; which, so far,
 it is owned, from being an honour to him,
 seemed rather a diminution of his dignity:
 And I cannot but approve of our late Poet
 Laureat's reasoning on this accusation: " It " has never been proved, that the offering
 " the crown to CÆSAR was a previously con"certed expedient between him and Antony to "feel the pulse of the People: To shorten the "question then, let us suppose all this to "be fact, and see what will come out of it;

 "not more than this, sure, that Cæsar had
 "a mind to be King, provided it could be
 "with the consent of the People; but, when he "found it was disagreeable to them, he troubled "himself no farther about it. And why ought
 "we not, with equal reason, to believe,
 "that, in Cæsar's refusing the crown, he "was as much governed by his affection to "the People, as by his fear of them? If "we allow then that Cæsar would not have "been displeased, had the People called "upon him to be King, it is as much as "we can, in conscience, charge him with.
 "But, if it is insisted, that he had set his "heart upon the title, it will be taking too
 "much from the intrepidity of CÆSAR to sup"pose he would not, at any hazard, have gra"tified his ambition. When he had once "made himself master of the Roman world,
 "could there be any great difficulty in his
 "giving what name he pleased to his office?
 "It is not easy, therefore, to conceive, that
 "the solid sense of Cæsar could be very "anxious about a title, which neither the "want, nor the acquisition of, could lessen
 "the glory, or add to the honour of his "station. The power of it he was secure
 "of, and no title could enlarge it. But take "the power from the regal title, and it will "signify no more than the word King in a "dictionary. And, tho' a great deal of stress
 "has been laid upon this point, as the most
 "unpardonable mark of Cæsar's ambition,
 "I cannot see why his desire, or his indiffe"rence to be a King, gives him a jot more
 "or

Cibber, p.
 215.

stress upon an empty, odious title, or that Brutus, Cassius, and their associates were excited by these facts to conspire against his life. Other motives will account more naturally for the conspiracy: Those of the Pompeian faction, who engaged in this conspiracy, were under the influence of an animosity which Caesar's clemency could not disarm; those of his own party who entered into it were guided by an insatiable avarice, which no rewards could satisfy; the hopes of plunder, by throwing the State again into confusion, had weight with many; and, in relation in particular to Cassius and Brutus, the loss of liberty was less afflicting to them, than that they must depend upon a Superior for preferment; a grievance which Caesar could not soften by laying them under the greatest obligations. Cassius, it is thought, was the first contriver of the design¹, and imparted his thoughts to some of his friends before he communicated them to Brutus; but, upon their telling him that it was of the greatest importance to have a man of Brutus's reputation and credit² at the head of the enterprise, and that they would

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.

43.
408 Conf.

Sen. de Ira,
iii. 30.

I i 2

not

“or less to answer for: For, if his bringing order into so distracted a State will not excuse his making himself perpetual Dictator, his being made a King could not have been at all a better or worse reason for destroying him.”

¹ C. Cassius was descended from one of the most ancient and honourable families of the Republic. He is said to have shewn a remarkable instance, when a boy, of his high spirit and love of liberty; for he gave Sylla's son Faustus a box on the ear for bragging, among his school-fellows, of his father's greatness and absolute power; and when Pompey called the boys before him, to give an account of their quarrel, he declared, in his presence, that, if Faustus should dare to repeat the words, he would repeat the blow. In his later years he was converted from Stoicism to be a follower of Epicurus; maintaining, that the pleasure, which his master recommended, was to be found only in the habitual practice of justice and virtue. While he professed himself, therefore, an Epicurean, he lived like a Stoic; was moderate in pleasures, temperate in diet, and a water-drinker through life. He married Tertia, the sister of Brutus, with whom he was strictly united in friendship and politics. We have seen his gallant behaviour against the Parthians after Craesus's death, and his conduct in the civil war. The ancient historians give him the character of a brave, witty, and learned man; but passionate, fierce, and cruel: And they have assigned very frivolous reasons of disgust, as the motives of his killing Caesar: that Caesar took a number of lions from him, which he had provided for a public show; that he would not give him the consulship; that he gave Brutus the more honourable praetorship in preference to him. Middl. p. 229.

² M. Junius Brutus pretended to derive his name and descent in a direct line from that first Consul L. Brutus, who expelled Tarquin, and gave freedom to the Roman people; and Atticus paid him the compliment to draw up his genealogy. But Dionysius of Helicarnassus, and other writers, do not allow him this illustrious original; because, for upwards of two hundred years, the Roman history mentions none but a Plebeian of that name, who was one of the first Tribunes of the people; and, when afterwards the Brutus's were raised to the first dignities of the State, they were looked upon as a new race of people. However, at the time we are speaking of, as this family had enjoyed, for two centuries, the first honours and posts of the State, it is no wonder that the opinion favourable to the pretension of Brutus prevailed. He was now one-and-forty years old, being born in the consulship of L. Cornelius Cinna III. and Cn. Papirius Carbo, A. U. 668; Which fully confutes, as Dr. Middleton observes, the vulgar story of his being commonly believed to be Caesar's son: Since he was but fifteen years

Y. R. 709. not otherwise engage in it, he immediately made him privy to it. Brutus entered into it readily; and we are told, that he was spurred on by several billets and inscriptions, reproaching him with his inaction. In one left upon his prætorian tribunal, was written, You are asleep, Brutus, you are no true Brutus. Upon the pedestal of the statue of the elder Brutus were found the following words: Would thou couldst come to life again! and under the statue of Cæsar: *Brutus, for having expelled the Kings, was made the first Consul; and this man, for having expelled the Consuls, is now become our King.*⁴³ Cassius and Brutus admitted to the number of sixty accomplices; the chief of whom were Trebonius, Decimus Brutus, Q. Ligarius, Servius Galba, C. and P. Servilius Casca, Tillius Cimber, and Mimucius Basilus. Plutarch, among many other improbable circumstances, relates, that the conspirators had thoughts of letting Antony into the secret, who was upon very good terms with several of them; but that Trebonius opposed it, telling them that he had sounded Antony at Narbonne, when Cæsar was on his return from the Spanish war, and that he very well understood his meaning, but did not seem inclined to engage with him; though he was sure he had inviolably kept his secret^b. The same author adds, that though Brutus did not think it safe to trust Cicero with the design of the conspiracy, on account of his want of resolution, he yet mentioned it to his wife *Porcia*ⁱ.

Suet. in
Cæsar

The

years younger than Cæsar himself: whose familiarity with his mother Servilia cannot be supposed to have commenced till many years after Brutus was born; or not till Cæsar had lost his first wife Cornelia, whom he married when he was very young, and always tenderly loved; and whose funeral oration he made when he was Quæstor, and consequently thirty years old. Brutus, having lost his father when very young, was trained, with great care, by his uncle Cato, in all the studies of polite letters, especially of eloquence and philosophy. He had excellent parts and equal industry, and acquired an early fame at the bar, where he pleaded several causes of great importance, and was esteemed the most eloquent and learned of all the young nobles. His manner of speaking was correct, elegant, and judicious, yet wanting that force and copiousness which are required in a consummate orator. But philosophy was his favourite study; in which, though he professed himself of the more moderate sect of the old Academy, yet, from a certain pride and gravity of temper, he affected the severity of the Stoic. Whether he was a man of so much mildness, such strict probity, and consummate virtue, as Plutarch pretends, his actions must evince. His credit, at this time, was due to his birth, his alliances, his talents, perhaps too his riches, which he increased with great application and industry. See Vol. III. n. 568.

^b Cicero, Phil. ii. 14, affirms, that Antony assented to Trebonius's proposal.—Si interfici Cæsarem voluisse crimen est, vide, quæso, Antoni, quid tibi futurum sit, quem et Narbone hoc consilium cum C. Trebonio cepisse notissimum est, et ob ejus consilii societatem cum interficeretur Cæsar tum se à Trebonio vidimus servocari. Ego autem (vide quam tecum agam non inimicè) quod bene cogitasti aliquando, laudo: Quod non indicasti, gratias ago: Quod non fecisti, ignosco.

ⁱ Plutarch tells a very pretty tale upon this occasion, and we find it also in Dio. Brutus, having undertaken the management of so hazardous an enterprise, on which depended the liberty of Rome, and the fortunes of many virtuous and noble families, was so far master of himself as to preserve an air of serenity during the day and in public; but, when he retired to his family, and during the night, he could not maintain the same shew of inward peace and tran-

The Conspirators had debated whether they should kill him in the Campus Martius, in the eyes of all the people, while he was taking their votes, at the election of the magistrates; or in the Via Sacra, or at the entrance of the Theatre, or in the Senate-house; and at length they determined on the last place, as the most proper, and fixed on the ides of March as the time when they would execute their design. They did not doubt but that the Senate would applaud the act when done, and even assist, if there was occasion, in doing it^k; and there was a circumstance which particularly encouraged them, that it happened to be Pompey's Senate-house, in which their attempt was to be made; and where Cæsar would consequently fall at the feet of Pompey's statue, as a sacrifice to the manes of that Aristocratic Chief. They took it also for granted that the People would be generally on their side; yet, for their greater security, D. Brutus gave orders to arm his gladiators that morning, as if for some public shew; that they might be ready, on the first notice, to secure the avenues of the Senate, and defend them from any sudden violence; and Pompey's theatre, which adjoined to the Senate-house, being the properest place for the exercise of the gladiators, would cover all suspicion that might arise from them. The only deliberation that perplexed them, and on which they were much divided, was, whether they should not kill Antony also and Lepidus, together with Cæsar; especially Antony, who was Consul, and the more likely to create fresh

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.
43.
408 Conf.

tranquillity; and Portia (his new wife, who had robbed Claudia of his heart) could easily perceive, that his breast laboured with some great design, some agonising care, which he endeavoured to conceal. As she loved him tenderly, she was desirous to share with him his care and trouble; but, before she ventured to put any question to him, she resolved to make a very extraordinary trial of her own constancy. She took a small knife, and, having sent her women out of the room, thrust it into her thigh. The wound bled copiously, and the violent pain was quickly succeeded by a fever. Brutus was in the utmost consternation, and knew not what to think. Then Portia, in the extremity of her sufferings, thus addressed him: "Brutus, I am Cato's daughter, and was given you not merely to share your bed and table as a mistress, but to partake of your good or ill fortune. Your behaviour to me hitherto has been irreproachable. But how can I serve you, or in what manner can I prove my sense of your goodness, unless in assisting you to support a latent uneasiness, which disturbs your rest? Why then am I denied your " confidence? Women, indeed, have no

" great reputation for secrecy: But a good " education and suitable company have " great influence on the dispositions and
" tempers, even of women: And who has " a better right to make a merit of these " advantages, than Cato's daughter and " Brutus's wife? However, I rely not on " any pre-conceived opinion of my resolution, but have, by experiment, convinced " myself that pain cannot subdue my courage."
She then pointed to the wound she had given herself, and declared, that she had no other motive for putting herself to that torture, than to make a trial of her constancy. Brutus, transported with admiration, lifted his hands to heaven, and implored the immortal gods to crown his enterprise with success, that he might live to be a husband worthy of such a wife: And immediately let her into the whole secret of the conspiracy.

* If the conspirators thought so, then Cæsar had not filled up the Senate with a very great number of Gauls and other Barbarians.

danger

Plut. in
Cæf.
App. ii.
499. 502.
Dio, 247.
248.

Y. R. 709 danger to the Commonwealth. Cassius, with a majority of the compa-
 B. C. 43 ny, was warmly for killing them; but the two Brutus's as warmly op-433 C. C. posed and finally over-ruled it: They alledged, that to shed more blood than was necessary would disgrace their cause, and draw upon them an imputation of cruelty¹; and of acting, not as patriots, but as partisans of Pompey; not so much to free the city, as to revenge themselves upon their enemies, and get the dominion of it into their own hands. But what weighed with them most was a vain persuasion that Antony would be tractable, and easily reconciled, as soon as the deed was over.

As these intrigues could not be conducted so secretly as not to give some cause of suspicion, Cæsar, if we believe Plutarch, received information of the nightly meetings of the Conspirators; and one day, when he was cautioned to be upon his guard against Antony and Dolabella, he answered, It is not those plump, jelly, curled fellows that I am afraid of; it is of the pale, meagre ones: Under which description he glanced at Cassius and Brutus. Brutus, in particular, adds the same historian, appeared formidable to him, on account of his courage, severity, and natural impetuosity: But, when he reflected on his probity and honour, his apprehensions disappeared; and, when he was advised not to trust him too far, What, said he, clapping his hand to his breast, do you think that Brutus will not stay till this debilitated carcase has finished its career! Cæ- sar had resolved to trust to fortune, and was often heard to say that he had rather die once by treachery, than live always in fear of it; that he had lived long enough, and that, by his death, the Empire would be a greater loser than himself. The very night before his assassination, being at supper in Lepidus's house, he maintained, that the most eligible death was that which was least expected.

Suet. 81.
 Plut. in
 Cæf.

In the morning of the fatal day, we are told, that Cæsar, finding himself indisposed, was inclined to put off the assembly; to which he is said by Sue- tonius and Plutarch to have been likewise moved by many prodigies that had lately happened, and a dream that his wife Calpurnia had that very night, in which she saw him stabbed in her bosom²: but D. Brutus, by rallying

¹ Cicero often laments, in his letters, this fatal mistake, Ep. Fam. x. 28. Melm. xiii.
 7. "Would to heaven you had invited me
 "to that noble feast, which you made on
 "the ides of Mar. b: No remnants, most
 "affordedly, should have been left behind.
 "Whereas the part you unluckily spared
 "gives us so much perplexity, that we find "something to regret even in the godlike
 "service which you and your illustrious asso"ciates have lately rendered to the Repub"lic To say the truth, when I reflect that "it is owing to the favour of so worthy a man as yourself, that Antony now lives to "be our general bane; I am sometimes in"clined to be a little angry with you for "taking him aside, when Cæsar fell."

² Suetonius's account of the prodigies is as follows, c. 81. "Cæsar had warning
 "given him of his approaching fate by se"veral plain prodigies. A few months be"fore, when some of the colony which he "had seated at Capua were pulling down
 "some old sepulchres, and were the busier
 "in that work, because they found some "vessels of antique workmanship, a table
 "of

rallying those fears as unmanly and unworthy of him, and alledging that his absence would be interpreted as an affront to the assembly, drew him out against his will to meet his destined fate.

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.
43.
408 Cons.

M. Brutus and Cassius appeared according to custom in the Forum, sitting in their prætorian tribunals to hear and determine causes; where, though they had daggers under their gowns, they sat with the same calmness, as if they had nothing upon their minds; till the news of Cæsar's coming out to the Senate called them away to the performance of their part in the tragical act. Plutarch, who never fails to give us every circumstance, that can make his relation more interesting, whether it be founded on good authority or not, tells us, that, when Cæsar came out of his house, a slave endeavoured to get near and speak to him; but, not having been able to pierce the crowd that attended him, he went into the house and desired Calpurnia to secure him till Cæsar's return, because he had something to communicate to him of the greatest importance. In the way to the Senate-house, Artemidorus, a Greek phi-

Plut. iii.
C. 1.

“ of brass was discovered in a monument “ wherein Capys, the founder of Capua, was “ said to be buried, with an inscription in “ Greek words and letters, to this effect:
“ That, whenever the bones of Capys came to “ be uncovered, a descendant from Iulus would “ be slain by the hands of his relations, and his “ death revenged by dreadful devastations
“ throughout all Italy. And this account, “ lest any one should think it an idle story, “ comes from Cornelius Balbus, an intimate “ friend of CÆSAR.” [An excellent reason why it should not be a forgery to raise the spirits of the veterans, and justify, in the eyes of the lower sort, the vengeance of Cæsar's death.] “ A few days before his death “ some horses, which, upon his passing the “ Rubicon, he had consecrated and turned “ loose to graze without any keeper, would “ take no food, and wept plentifully.—The “ Soothsayer Spurinna warned him, as he “ was sacrificing, to look to himself, other“ wise some mischief would befall him be“ fore the ides of March were over.—The “ day before the said ides, birds of several “ kinds, from a neighbouring grove, pur“ suing a wren, that flew into Lompey's Se“ nate-house, with a sprig of laurel in his “ bill, tore it there to pieces.—The night “ before the day of his being slain, he “ dreamed that he was got above the clouds
“ and shaking hands with Jupiter: And his “ wife Calpurnia fancied in her sleep that
“ the top of the house was coming down,
“ and her husband stabbed in her bosom;

“ and immediately the chamber-doors flew “ open.”

Cicero, de Div. l. i. § 2. l. ii. 16, relates one of the most remarkable prodigies said to have happened at this time: “ that, as “ Cæsar was sacrificing, a little before his “ death, with great pomp and splendor, in “ his triumphal robes and golden chair, the “ victim, which was a fat ox, was found to “ be without a heart: And, when Cæsar “ seemed to be shocked at it, Spurinna, the “ Haruspex, admonished him to beware;
“ lest, through a failure of counsel, his life “ should be cut off, since the heart was the “ seat and source of them both. The next “ day he sacrificed again, in hopes to find “ the entrails more propitious: But the liver
“ of the bullock appeared to want its head,
“ which was reckoned also among the dire“ ful omens.” These facts, which are ri-dicated by Cicero, were probably invented after Cæsar's death. If they really happened, they were contrived by Cæsar's friends, and the heart and head of the liver conveyed away by some artifice, to give them a better pretence of enforcing their admonitions, and putting Cæsar upon his guard against dangers which they really apprehended, from quite different reasons than the pretended denunciations of the gods.
Suetonius writes, that on this, or a like occasion, Cæsar's answer was, that the entrails should be more favourable when he pleased, and that it ought not to be looked upon as an illomen, if a beast wanted a heart.

osopher;

Y. R. 705
Bef. Chr.
453
Cass. 453

Philosopher, put into his hands a paper containing a circumstantial account of the whole plot, and said to him : Read this, and lose no time, for it concerns you much. This man, who assisted several of Brutus's friends in the prosecution of their studies, had made several discoveries ; but Cæsar, surrounded as he was by soldiers could not read the contents, and entered the Senate house with the paper in his hand. Many circumstances gave the Conspirators great alarms, and put their fortitude to the test. An acquaintance of Cassia came up to him and said, You thought to be very secret, but Brutus has acquainted me of the whole affair. Just as Cassia was going to make a reply which would have discovered all, the other added : What then, my Friend, are you of a sudden grown rich enough to stand for the Edileship ! Cassia shuddered at the danger he had escaped. M. Brutus himself had a most violent shock : Word was brought him that his dearly beloved Porcia was at the point of death : For, as the moment of her husband's hazardous enterprise drew near, she was seized with a deadly panic. Brutus, however, shewed himself a true descendant of that hero who sacrificed his own children to the liberty of his country, and the same spirit over-ruled now in him every other affection. In fine, Cæsar arrives ; and, as he came out of his litter, Popilius Lenas, a Senator, made up to him and talked with him with much earnestness, and the Dictator seemed to give much attention to what he delivered. This Popilius, a little time before, had been with Brutus and Cassius, and said to them, I wish your design may succeed, and I advise you not to defer it ; for there are several private accounts of it. The Conspirators did not doubt, therefore, but that they were discovered and betrayed. An universal consternation reigned among our intrepid assassins ; they looked at each other, and agreed by signs not to wait till they were seized, but to stab themselves in order to avoid the ignominy of a public execution ; and already Cassius and some others had laid their hands to their poniards ; when Brutus, observing that the gesture and attitude of Popilius was rather that of a suppliant than an accuser, perceived his error, and, by the serenity of his countenance, made the others understand that they had nothing to fear. At length Popilius kissed the Dictator's hand and withdrew.

Plot, in
Cæsar

Cæsar went forward, and a number of the Conspirators surrounded and conducted him to the Curule chair: Whilst two of them, Decimus and Trebonius, stopped Antony at the door of the Senate-house. As soon as he had taken his place, Tillius Cimber, who was to begin the attack upon his person, advanced nearer than the rest, as if he had some favour to request of him ; and, laying hold of his gown, drew it over his shoulders, which was the sign agreed upon. This, said Cæsar, is plain violence : And he had scarcely pronounced these words, when he was wounded a little below the throat by one of the Cassia's. He seized the assassin's arm and ran it through with his style for writing ; and, endeavouring to rush forward, was stopped by another wound, which was afterwards afterwards judged to be the only mortal one he received. Finding himself surrounded on all sides with drawn daggers at him, he wrapped up his head in his toga, and spread it also before over his legs, that he might fall the more decently; and so received three and twenty wounds, fetching a groan only on receiving the first, without uttering so much as one word ^a.

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.
43.
408 Conf.

Thus fell Cæsar, in the 56th year of his age: A man, who, considered as a Statesman and a Captain, may justly challenge the first place in the registers of mankind. He was formed to excel in peace as well as in war; was provident in council, fearless in action, and executed what he had once resolved on with an amazing celerity. With the greatest nobleness of birth, of person, and of countenance^o, he joined every great quality that can exalt human nature, and give a man the ascendant in society. He was open, sincere, great and magnanimous in all his behaviour; faithful to his friends, and zealous to promote their interests^p; generous and liberal even to profusion to his dependents; and was distinguished for the most singular humanity and clemency in the midst of the greatest provocations and examples of cruelty and revenge^q. He was magnificent, polite, and, in respect of ^a Plutarch says, that upon receiving the first wound, he turned upon Casca in a fury, saying, Wretch, what are your designs? And that, notwithstanding his loss of blood, and the many daggers pointed at him, he raged amongst them like a lion: But, when M. Brutus came upon him, he said in Greek: What, art thou one of them too, thou, my son BRUTUS.

^o He is said to have been tall, of a fair complexion, round-limbed, pretty full-faced, with eyes black and lively; and very healthful, except, that, towards the end of his life, he was subject to sudden swoonings, and to be frightened in his sleep. He was also surprised twice with the falling sickness in the midst of business: In the care of his person, he was so very nice, that he had not only the hair of his head cut, but likewise had the hair in the other parts of his body taken up by the roots; and he is also said to have been very particular in his dress; for he used the latus clavus with fringes about his hands, and loosely girded about him with an effeminate air. Suet. 45. See also Vol. III. p. 301.

^p Suetonius, 71, 72, gives us the following instances of his attachment and zeal for his friends and clients.—When he was but a young man, he defended the cause of Ma-

sutha, a noble youth, against King Hiempsal, with so much keenness, that in the course of the pleading he seized Juba, the King's son, by the beard; and, upon his client's being declared tributary to Hiempsal, he immediately took him by force from those who were leading him away, and kept him concealed in his house for a long time; and, when he went, at the expiration of his prætorship, for Spain, he carried him off with him in his litter, amidst the confusion produced by those who were taking leave of him. When he came to have the whole power of the Commonwealth in his hands, he advanced some of his friends, though of very mean extraction, to the highest posts in the government; and, when he was reflected upon for it, openly declared, that, had he been assisted by robbers and cut-throats, in the defence of his honour, he would have made them the same requital.

^q He could not find it in his heart to do any harm to Cornelius Phagita, who had trepanned him in the night, with a design to carry him to Sylla; and out of whose hands he did not escape, without much difficulty, and a great bribe. Philemon, his Secretary, who had promised his enemies to poison him, he caused to be put to death, but without torture. Suet. 74.

Y. R. 709 natural endowments, learning, and eloquence, scarce inferior to Bel Chr. any man^r. He was a most munificent patron of wit and learn-
 43. ing, wheresoever he found them; and, from his love for those ta-
 4-8 Conf. lents, would easily pardon such as had employed them against him^r.

In.

* His orations were admired for two qualities, which are seldom found together, strength and elegance. Cicero ranks him among the greatest orators that Rome ever bred; and Quintilian, X. 1, says, that he spoke with the same force with which he fought; and, if he had devoted himself to the law, would have been the only man capable of rivaling Cicero.—His Commentaries, in Cicero's judgment, are plain, neat, and beautiful; and he adds, in thus preparing his materials for such as should write his history, he may perhaps have encouraged some inferior genius to undertake it, who might think to ornament it more; but has discouraged all men of sense from meddling with it. Nor was he master only of the politer arts, but conversant also with the most abstruse and critical parts of learning; and, among other books which he published, he addressed two books to Cicero, On the analogy of language, or the art of speaking and writing correctly. Pliny also, and Juvy sometimes employed his leisure; and Suetonius mentions a poem of his, called Iter, or, the Journey, which he wrote on his way to the Spanish war.

* Though C. Memmius had published some very abusive speeches against him, and he had answered them with equal sharpness, yet he afterwards assisted him with his vote and interest, when he stood for the consulship. When C. Calvus, who had written some scandalous epigrams upon him, endeavoured to bring about a reconciliation by the intercession of friends, he wrote the first letter; and when Carullus, for a like offence, came to beg his pardon, he invited him to supper. He also bore, with great moderation, a libel of Asius Cavinus against him. This man, whose genius and eloquence are much extolled, was still in exile in the year 707; and, to make amends for the invective he published against Cæsar, he employed himself in drawing up a work in which he mentioned him with honour; and, while his friends were earnestly soliciting his pardon, he sent to Cicero his performance, begging him to interest himself particularly in his cause. (Ad Fam. vi. 7. Melm. ix. 30.) “Your judicious observation, says he, has enabled you to penetrate into the recesses of Cæsar's heart; and you are acquainted with all the most probable methods of prevailing with him: So that each successful step that shall be made in this affair, from its commencement to its conclusion, must proceed altogether from you. I am sensible likewise that you have great interest with Cæsar, and still greater with all his favourites. I doubt not then of your effecting my restoration, if you will exert yourself for that purpose.—With regard to the book my son will deliver to you, I intreat you either not to suffer it to be published, or to correct it in such a manner, that it may not appear to my disadvantage.” Cicero's answer is much to Cæsar's honour: (Ad Fam. vi. 5. Melm. ix. 32.) — “I have read your performance, and still continue to read it, with much attention; as I shall preserve it with the greatest fidelity. Your affairs, indeed, of every kind, are my principal concern; and I have the pleasure to see them every day appear with a more and more favourable aspect. You have many friends, who contribute their good offices for this purpose; of whose zeal your son, I am persuaded, has already acquainted you, as well as of his own hopes, that their endeavours will prove effectual. In regard to what may be collected from appearances, I do not pretend to discern more than, I am persuaded, you see yourself: But, as you may reflect upon them, perhaps, with greater discomposure of mind, I think it proper to give you my sentiments concerning them. Believe me then, it is impossible, from the nature and circumstances of public affairs, that either you, or your companions in adversity, should long remain under your present misfortunes: Yes, my friend, it is impossible that so severe an injury should continue to oppress the honest advocates of so good a cause. But my hopes are particularly strong with respect to yourself: Not merely in consideration of your rank and virtues, (for these you possess in common with many others) but particularly from your singular learning and genius. The “max,

In all the military qualifications he had no superior; and no General ever acquired to such a degree the esteem and affection of his soldiers. In riding, in throwing the javelin, and in every exercise, he possessed a singular dexterity; and he was able to endure fatigue beyond all credibility. He used to march commonly at the head of his troops, bare-headed, both in foul and fair weather; and to swim over the rivers which obstructed his way. In his expeditions he was daring, but cautious; and never marched an army without using every possible precautions against surprises. He was never discouraged from any enterprise, nor retarded in the prosecution of it, by ill omens: He engaged in battle, not only after previous deliberation, but often on a sudden, when opportunities offered, after a march, or in stormy weather, when nobody could imagine he would move: And on all occasions he behaved with the greatest intrepidity and resolution; insomuch, that the serenity of his countenance was, often, in the most imminent dangers, the chief support of the courage of his troops. Just and impartial to his officers and soldiers, he treated them with an equal severity and indulgence; when the enemy was near, exacting the strictest discipline; but, on other occasions, excusing them from all duty, and leaving them to revel at pleasure. His soldiers, he used to boast, did not fight the worse for being perfumed. In his speeches to them, he called them always Comrades; and he ornamented their arms with gold and silver, that they might make the finer appearance, and be the more tenacious of them in battle. He loved them to that degree, that, when he heard of the disaster of his troops under Titurius Sabinus, he neither cut his hair nor shaved his beard, till he had revenged it upon the enemy; by which means he inspired them with a mutual affection for his person, and an invincible bravery. They never mutinied during the whole course of the Gallic war; and, when they were guilty of it during the civil war, we have seen how quickly he brought them back to their duty, by his authority. In his civil capacity he was directed by great and extensive views: The acts of his consulship, which the Aristocracy so vigorously opposed, were all wise and tending to the public good: And, when he was master of the Empire in quality of Perpetual Dictator, he discovered in all his undertakings the most general benevolence.

When we contemplate the virtues of this great man, and think of the great designs he had formed, it is impossible not to regret his death; and when we call to mind, that, of those who were the leaders in the conspiracy against him, some had been indebted to him for their lives,

“man, in whose power we all of us are,
“holds these shining qualities in much esteem:
“And, I am well assured, you would not have “remained even a single moment in your present “situation, if he had not imagined him“self wounded by those talents he admires.

“His resentment, however, seems daily “cooling; and it has been intimated to “me, by some of his most particular friends, “that you will undoubtedly find advantage “in the high opinion he has conceived of “your abilities.”

K k 2

and

Y. R. 7:9. and others had been loaded by him with honours; we cannot but Eccl. Chr. charge them with the basest ingratitude for having killed their be-
 43. nefactor. But Cicero was of a different opinion: He said, "That the 403 Cor. "public was the more indebted to them on these accounts; and that, as to the
 Mod. 2. "kindness of giving them their lives, it was the kindness only of a robber,
 272. "who had first done them the greater wrong: That, if there had been any
 "stain of ingratitude in the act, they could never have acquired so much
 "glory by it; and though he wondered indeed at some of them for doing it,
 "rather than ever imagined, that they would have done it; yet he admired
 "them so much the more, for being regardless of favours, that they might
 Ad Ant. "show their regard to their country." And he tells his friend Atticus, 14. "that he was present at the death of Caesar in the Senate; where he had
 "the pleasure to see the tyrant perish as he deserved."

These sentiments have been well combated by a judicious author; and I cannot do better than transcribe what he has said upon the occasion:

Chibet, p. "Who can see Caesar fall with this Ciceronian stain upon him? Had 219. "this expression come from the mouth of a malignant Cassius, little had
 "it surprised us; but from the mild morality of a Cicero, that Cicero
 "too, who, when under his protection, had looked on him in so differ"ent a view; when, not only his eloquence, but his excellent poetry
 "had been inspired with the praises of this very tyrant whom now he
 "vilifies and depreciates. In this light, I say, it calls for farther expof-
 "tulation. Whence then these jarring sentiments? Was Cicero or
 "Caesar altered, that the one could give, or the other merit, such diffe"rent terms of praise or censure? Could that Caesar deserve to perish as a "tyrant, whom Cicero had allowed to have taken up arms with no other
 "view than to defend himself from injuries? or could such an insult from "Cicero be due to the ashes of a man, whose clemency he had so lately
 "tasted, and so gratefully had celebrated? If Cicero then was a flatterer
 "when he offered these praises to Caesar, why are we not equally to dis-
 "believe him, when he blackens or loads him with invectives? Caesar,
 "with all his imputed tyranny, is, in every part but power, so unlike
 "the hideous wretch we call a tyrant, that the name finds no reception
 "among the visible virtues it here injuriously breaks in upon. Every "act and motion of him so rejects the infamy, that he seems a Genius
 "rather formed to lead a ruined people into happiness, than to drive them "into slavery.

"Were we to look upon Caesar as a fierce usurper, who, with an un-
 "warrantable violence, had seized upon the public liberty, and had torn
 "to pieces the happiness and quiet of a well-settled government, then,
 "indeed, might the pleasure Cicero conceived in seeing him perish be "allowed to flow from the laudable passion of a Patriot. But, as history "has not set Caesar in quite so detestable a light, nor yet the injured
 "liberty

“ liberty of Rome in so clear a one, why may we not look with a com“ plaining eye upon this Patriot pleasure of Cicero?—

Y. R. 709.
 Buf. Chr.

“ Was Cæsar an enemy to his country, because he was Dictator;
 “ and, upon the ground of his ambition, shall we justify the Conspira“ tors, and pronounce that he deserved the fate which befel him? His 43.

 408 Conf.
 Cibber, p.
 222.

“ ambition might have gone beyond the ambition of others, who “ were visible candidates for the tyranny complained of; yet the public, “ at least, were, or might have been, gainers in their preference of so “ meritorious a master, who, though his will gave laws to the Roman “ world, yet his laws were no reproach to his will. Nor could even the “ Conspirators say they would have governed better than Cæsar did, when,
 “ out of themselves, he had chosen the principal magistrates. What “ then did Cæsar take from them that was so dear to them, unless it “ were the liberty of so frequently breaking those wholesome laws which their “ wiser ancestors had made for their security? All the real hardships they “ suffered from him was the loss of that little care they took to see them “ obeyed; and could the redress of this grievance be a new grievance?
 “ When particular men grew too big for the old laws, was it not rather “ a remedy than a disease, that Cæsar, by giving new laws, grew too “ strong for the stoutest of these Republican tyrants? If their own ad“ ministration could have kept them within bounds, they had not “ wanted a Cæsar to repair the fences they had broke through: In this “ then Cæsar less deserved to be called the wolf than the shepherd.

“ The crime complained of in Cæsar is not of the same kind of treason as “ that of a subject, who seizes on the throne of his lawful Prince, and then “ steps into it himself. No, Cæsar” [supposing him an usurper for hav“ ing accepted, from the Senate and people, of the dictatorship] “ usurped “ only upon usurpers, upon a corrupted government, under which the Roman “ liberty had long groaned, even before the Triumvirate had insulted it; for,
 “ in the diffused tyranny of many, Cæsar, at worst, made but one in “ scarce less than a hundred; and, when those licentious rulers were re“ duced to three, (of which it is true Cæsar, in his own defence, “ still thought fit to make one, and found at last he had no other way “ to be intirely safe, than by being the only one) he had just as good a “ right to take the reins of government from the other two, as the united “ three had to take them from hundreds.—

Id. p. 244.

“ But, alas! to the lawless and the tumultuous, so dear had been the “ headstrong liberty of confounding, so sweet were the acquisitions of “ party violence and prevalent corruption, that the dull dreaming peace “ and surfeiting plenty, which Cæsar had restored to them (because “ Cæsar, it seems, had no right to bestow them) were to pass rather for “ injuries than blessings, and equally deserving an exemplary revenge
 “ or punishment. Admitting now we were to receive all this as unde-“ niable reason, and that Cæsar, with all his benefits and great qualities, “ was still a grievance, because he was thought, or called so; yet, where “ still

Id. p. 223.

Y. R. 705. " shall we find those honest, injured Romans, who had this absolute and un-
 Bel. Cæ. " questionable right to complain that he had either offered violence to
 4. 8 Cens. " their virtue or their innocence? Was it the uncorrupted magistrates, the ——— " Senate, or the people, or the collective body of them all, that inspired these
 " Patriot conspirators to revenge the general injury? It could not, sure,
 " be the legal government; that had long, long before, been torn to pie- " ces by a succession of civil broils and factions, of which the usurpa-
 " tions of Marius, Sylla, Pompey, Crassus, and a train of such pious
 " menders of the state, had been too flagrant instances.—Had he in- " jured the people? Neither; he had asserted and recovered their " rights, and had charmed them with his magnanimity, for which they " loved, and therefore more willingly obeyed him.—But might not
 " these services be purely political? Were they not all outside; with " no other view in his heart, than first to make fools, and then slaves of " them? But why this insinuation? why this presumptuous imputation
 " upon a just action? or why so hard a restraint upon virtue, that she
 " is never to act when any incidental benefit to the agent, beyond the " merit of the deed, may be joined to it? Must the public too be
 " sufferers, because a private account may be found in relieving Cæsar, p. " them? This may be an argument with those who will suffer none
 224. " to do good to the public but themselves, and that in their own way
 " too. But the laws of virtue are more favourable; they tolerate all
 " actions of public spirit, nor suffer them to be discountenanced, though
 " sure that such an imputation were to lie upon the duty or the merit
 " of them. Hard were the fate of Cæsar, if suggestions might invalidate
 " his virtue! No, suggestions shall not so much as cast a shade over the Con- " spirators; their private passions, their blind revenge, their ingratitude
 " and their envy, need not the weak assistance of insinuated guilt to piece and
 " patch out a complaint against them. The case of Cæsar and of his as- " sassins can never be decided, if any evidence less than fact is admitted
 " on either side.—Let us hear, then, what the Senate has to complain of.
 " What, all silent! Has Cæsar made it up with them too? Is he to be " acquitted by a volenti non fit injuria? Have they with open eyes com-
 " pounded with his tyranny, and made the empire of the world his pur- " chase? This indeed were a most enormous corruption! Sure they " could not but impeach him for it! No, they rather chose to load him
 " with honours and unlimited power, found their liberties safer in his
 " lap than in their own unruly hands, styled him Imperator, with the " higher distinction of Father of his Country. Such was their resent- " ment, such their grievances, and such their remedy. Was then this " mighty work of their own hands, this monument of power, erected
 " only to testify and commemorate, or to redress and heal their calami-
 " ties? For healed they certainly were, till, from the fresh wounds of Cæsar,
 " broke forth a worse calamity, a fatal civil war, that never ended till Roman
 " Liberty was no more. Where then shall we find these yet undiscovered
 " suffer-

“ ferings from Cæsar, unless in the dark, vindictive bosoms of the Conspi- Y. R. 709.
 “ rators? There, indeed, we ought to suppose them more grievously ty- Bef. Chr.
 “ rannical, because so dreadful, so vaunted, a vengeance resented them. 43.
 “ And yet it has never been known, that their particular complaints were 408 Conf.
 “ distinguished by any greater hardship than what was offered in com“ mon to the rest of the quieted Roman people.

“ Were we to give up all that is asked of us, that Cæsar, to the eyes
 “ of Brutus and his associates, appeared a tyrant; even in that view
 “ can we justify the assassins? Have laws, either divine or human, or- Cæber, p.
 “ dained assassination to be the punishment of any crime whatsoever? 231.
 “ Were the Conspirators to be at once the judges and the executioners?
 “ Nor do we find that any public act had deputed them to be the public “ avengers: The greatest of them were but self-commissioned, and in that,
 “ at best, but a sort of secret usurpers of the public authority.

“ And yet so farther unfortunate is their cause, that of all people these Id p. 226.
 “ were less qualified for so high an office than (from the highest to the lowest)
 “ were the most offended Romans. For, though obligations and favours “ so lately accepted from him could not make them grateful, they might,
 “ at least, have made them merciful to Cæsar. But, alas! so it was;
 “ the provinces he had assigned to some, and the greatest posts of dig“ nity to others, had availed him nothing. The arrogant presumption of “ being generous, just, and gentle to his foes and fellow-citizens, was, to “ their jealous honour, such a stinging provocation, such a triumph of smiling “ pride and insolence, as could never be forgiven or got over, but by the de“ termined death of the distributor. What a Tyrant! What Patriots?
 “ Were not this enough to make our judgment sicken, when so bold, so weak;
 “ so wicked a cause is before us? But let us not too hastily give sentence.
 “ Perhaps, the warmer advocates for liberty, the Patriot abhorers of “ Cæsar, may think it a narrowness of mind in us to suppose his plau“ sible acts of benevolence and bounty ought to have excited a sense of “ gratitude in the uncorrupted spirit of a Roman; and that it is more a “ call for our admiration, than our reproach, that these valiant cham“ pions of the public rather chose to plunge their daggers in his heart;
 “ in scorn of his obligations, than to be meanly merciful at the price of “ their honour. And yet, methinks, the heroic spirit of these Patriots “ had not been less brave or noble, had it previously refused these bribes of “ Cæsar; the scorn should have preceded the acceptance, but the pride was “ debased that came after it. Then, too, with a better grace, they might “ have drawn their daggers, not upon their acknowledged benefactor;
 “ but their enemy avowed.

“ But however, though we cannot easily get over this weakness of Id. p. 227.
 “ thinking them ungrateful, yet if we are still so just as to allow this “ animated enterprise, or this glorious vengeance, (if we must call it so) “ the utmost merit it can lay claim to, if we consciously confess (for “ sure they can ask no more of us) that to sacrifice our private interests “ is.

Y. R. 109. " to the public good is the highest merit that human virtue can aspire to. Yet Brut. Clu. " let the public good the declared motive of the Conspirators) be at least 408 Clu. " as visible to us as the sacrificed interest; let us be sure we are within
 " sight of the one, and not blinded by the other: First, let us be mo-
 " rally convinced that the death of Cæsar could be the cure of all the pub- " lic complaints; that it was as infallible, as it was the only one to " which the redress of this injured liberty was limited: For, if the Re-
 " public was in no wise relieved by it, how unskilful or how inhuman
 " must have been the application of so violent a remedy? What then
 " shall we call it but a more desperate act of tyranny than ever Cæsar, in
 " all his course of ambition, committed?

Clu. 409. " If, indeed, BRUTUS could have eradicated or subdued the whole ROMAN
 " ambition, or have turned faction into virtue, then, perhaps, liberty might " have arose from this particular sacrifice; but, from so unprofitable an
 " expedient to expect the cure of a national contagion, by putting only one in- " ferred person to death; how wild! how vain! how invisible the hope!
 " And, though we ought not to judge of attempts by their success or " failure, yet, when the hope of success has so ill a foundation, what
 " but an imaginary castle could be built upon it? Nay, the very people,
 " whose cause these Conspirators pretended to assert, chose rather, by
 " their compassionate clamours for vengeance on the murderers of Cæ-
 " sar, to suspend their liberty, than to enjoy it by a base and cruel con-
 " nivance at their escape. Strong, very strong, must have been the Re- " publican grievances, when they rather chose to be settled slaves their " own way, than to feel, (as they had done) in so many violent magis- " trates, so many galling, griping, grinding masters. A provocation
 " which, in later governments, has shewn us, that revenge may be
 " sometimes sweeter than liberty.

" To proceed then, let it be clear to us that under the cause of Liberty
 " were concealed no private passions, no stimulating pride, no lurking envy,
 " that moulded this conspiracy to the dreadful form it came out in: For, as
 " history set a mark of more than suspicion on their principal, as Cassius
 " was more known to have hated the person than the tyranny of Cæ-
 " sar, it will add but very little to the honour of their cause to say his
 " accomplices were imposed upon, or that the artful management of this " turbulent spirit had made it a darling point of glory to break through " their bonds, both of private and of public gratitude, in clearing their " way to the heart of Cæsar. However pompous the pretence might " be, it will be hard to prove, that it had either conscience, honour,
 " or the most distant hope of honest, lusty Liberty to build upon.

Clu. p. 409. " But now we are to stand a stronger opposition; the honour and in- " tegrity of a Brutus now rises to disarm our mercy for Cæsar, and to " vindicate his death. If Brutus thought no ties, not even the love that
 " Cæsar bore him, were of equal value to the cause of Liberty; if Brutus
 " chose to make his friend and benefactor fall a victim to the public justice;
 " if

“if such a man of so immaculate a character was of this Patriot-party, Y.R. 709.
“shall not the sanction of so great a name hang immortal praises on their Bef. Chr.
“memory? 43.
408 Cons.

“Such, indeed, have been the encomiums which the learned have “sometimes heaped upon him, and which even the friends of Cæsar
“have not totally refused him.”—But, how far we are to be led by the authority of Brutus, how far he deserves these high encomiums, the following history will shew. Hitherto he has certainly made no figure as a man of honour and virtue.

C H A P. XII.

The general consternation of the Senate, Consul, and People, upon the death of Cæsar. The treaty between Antony and the Conspirators. Antony's artful management. The Conspirators are obliged to leave Rome. Antony gathers an army about him, and disposes of every thing according to his pleasure. Sextus Pompey makes his peace by the mediation of Lepidus, and is declared Admiral of the Republic. Octavius appears upon the stage, is thwarted by Antony in every thing, raises an army to make good his claim, courts the Senate and Antony's enemies, whom he protects. Antony sets out from Rome to take possession of Cisalpine Gaul, and besieges D. Brutus in Mutina. He is followed by young Octavius, who, at Cicero's motion, is authorised by the Senate to raise troops, and make war against Antony.

THE Conspirators had no sooner finished their work, than Brutus, Middl. p. lifting up his bloody dagger, congratulated the Senate, and Ci- 244.
cero in particular, on the recovery of their liberty, and essayed to
Vol. IV. L 1 make

* Middl. p. 244. “This gave Antony a “pretence to charge him afterwards in pub“lic with being privy to the conspiracy, and “the principal adviser of it: But it is cer“tain that he was not at all acquainted with “it: For, though he had the strictest friend“ship with the chief actors, and they the “greatest confidence in him, yet his age, “character, and dignity rendered him whol“ly unfit to bear a part in an attempt of “that nature; and to embark himself in “an affair so desperate, with a number of “men, who, excepting a few of their Lead“ers, were all either too young to be trusted,
“or too obscure even to be known by him.
“He could have been of little or no service “to them in the execution of the act, yet of “much greater in justifying it afterwards to

“the city, for having had no share in it, nor “any personal interest to make his authority “suspected. These were the true reasons, “without doubt, why Brutus and Cassius did “not impart the design to him. Had it been “from any other motive, as some writers “have suggested; or had it admitted any “interpretation injurious to his honour; he “must have been often reproached with it
“by Antony and his other adversaries of “those times, who were so studious to in“vent and propagate every calumny that “could depress his credit.” [Surely Cicero was known for a coward, and Plutarch is in the right to say this was a good reason not to make him privy to the design.] “I can“not, however, entirely acquit him of be“ing in some degree accessory to the death
of

Y.R. 709
Ref. Chr.
43-
Conf.
Phil. ii. 12.
Pitt. in
Cæf.
Apolon,
503.
Lio, p. 250.
Plut. in
Cæf. et
Brut.

make a speech to them upon the occasion; but the Senators, seized with astonishment at so daring an attempt, after they had been mute spectators of the deed, rushed out of the Senate-house, and Cicero with them; as if they were all afraid of the same fate. Antony, who had indeed some reason to be apprehensive, took refuge in a neighbouring house; and, throwing off all the marks of his consular dignity, stole away to his own, where he strongly barricaded himself. The Conspirators, disappointed by the timid behaviour of the Senators, addressed themselves to the People, and, marching out in a body, with a cap, the sign of liberty, carried before them on a spear, proceeded in a calm and orderly manner through the Forum, where, in the first heat of joy, several of the young nobility, who had borne no part in the conspiracy, joined themselves to the company with swords in their hands, out of an ambition to be thought partners in the act; but they afterwards paid dear for that vanity, and were involved in the ruin it drew upon all the rest. Brutus designed to have spoken to the people from the Rostra; but, perceiving them to be in too great an agitation to attend to speeches; being uncertain too what turn the popular humour might take, and knowing there were great numbers of Cæsar's old soldiers in the city, who had been summoned from all parts to attend him to the Partbian war; he thought proper, with his accomplices, to take refuge in the Capitol, which he seized on by the assistance of Decimus's gladiators, on pretence of returning thanks to Jupiter. The dead body of Cæsar was left in the Senate-house, where, after it had been viewed by those “ of Cæsar; for it is evident, from several “ of his letters, that he had an expecta“ tion of such an attempt, and from what “ quarter it would come; and not only ex“ pected, but wished it: He prophesied ve“ ry early, that Cæsar's reign could not last “ six months, but must necessarily fall, either “ by violence or of itself; and hoped to live to “ see it. Ad Att. x. 8. “ He knew the dis“ affection of the greatest and best of the ci“ ty: Which they expressed with great free“ dom in their letters, and with much more

“ we may imagine in their private conver“ sation: He knew the fierce and haughty “ spirit of Brutus and Cicero, and their im“ patience of a master; and cultivated a “ strict correspondence with them both at “ this time, as if for the opportunity of ex“ citing them to some act of vigour. On “ the news that Atticus sent him, of Cæ- “ sar's image being placed in the temple of “ Quirinus, adjoining to that of the goddess “ Salus, I had rather, says he, have him the “ comrade of Romulus, than of the goddess of “ Safety, ad Att. xii. 12. referring to Ro- “ mulus's fate of being killed by the Senators. In another letter (ad Att. xiii. 40.)

“ it seems to be intimated, that Atticus and “ he had been contriving, or talking at least “ together, how Brutus might be spirited “ up to some attempt of that kind, by set“ ting before him the fame and glory of his “ ancestors: Does Brutus then tell us, says
“ he, that Cæsar brings with him glad ti“ dings to brave men? Where will he find “ them, unless he hangs himself? But how se“ curely is he now intrenched on all sides?
“ What use then of your fine invention; the “ picture of old Brutus and Albala, with the “ verses under, which I saw in your gallery?
“ Yet what, after all, can be do? One can“ not help observing, likewise, in his pieces “ addressed about this time to Brutus, how “ artfully he falls into a lamentation of the “ times, and of the particular unhappiness “ of Brutus himself in being deprived by “ them of all the hopes and use of his great “ talents; putting him in mind at the same “ time of his double descent from ancestors “ who had acquired immortal glory by deli“ vering Rome from servitude.” See the conclusion of his treatise on famous Orators.

who

who had the curiosity and courage to venture in, it was put into a litter by three of his slaves, and carried to his house, one arm dangling out of the window. The Conspirators, being secure in the Capitol from any immediate violence, summoned the people thither in the afternoon; and Brutus, in a speech to them which he had before prepared, justified his conduct, explained the motives of it, and, in a pathetic manner, exhorted them to exert themselves in the defence of their country, and to maintain the liberty now offered to them against all the abettors of the late tyranny.

When the Senators saw that all was calm, several of them ventured up to the Capitol in the evening, and Cicero among the rest; who tells us that his advice was, "that Brutus and Cassius, as Prætors, should call the Senate into the Capitol, and proceed to some vigorous decrees for the security of the public tranquillity:" But Brutus and his accomplices were for proceeding calmly, and with all due respect to the authority of the Consul; and, having conceived hopes of Antony, proposed sending a deputation to him, to exhort him to measures of peace. Antony, who had no thoughts of peace, but whose business it was by dissimulation to gain time, professed a sincere inclination to it, and seemed to have no other desire than to see the Republic settled again on its old basis; and he pretended that he had brought Lepidus into the same measures. Lepidus was at this time in the suburbs of Rome at the head of a legion, ready to depart for the government of Spain, which together with a part of Gaul, had been assigned him by Cæsar. In the night, therefore, after Cæsar's death, he brought his troops into the field of Mars, and, sensible of his superiority, began to think of making

¹ This is looked upon as a false step, and Cicero, in his second Philippic, c. 35, and in his letters to Atticus, xiv. 10, says he remonstrated against it, nor could be prevailed with to bear a part in it: He says, he told them plainly, "that there could be no safe treaty with him; that, as long as he was afraid of them, he would promise every thing; but, when his fears were over, he would be like himself, and perform nothing: So that, while the other consular Senators were going backwards and forwards in this office of mediation, he stuck to his point, and staid with the rest in the Capitol, and did not see Antony for the two first days." But it must be considered, 1. That, were it possible to bring things about by peaceable measures, that way undoubtedly was the best. 2. That Antony and Lepidus had really more strength in their hands than the Senate, and, if provoked to exert it, might very easily destroy them all, or force them to fly out of the city.

3. That, among the other Senators, Dolabella, who claimed the consulship, went up also to the Capitol, and there appeared very zealous for a reconciliation. 4. It was not possible to foresee the events that followed, and Brutus and his friends had particular reasons to entertain a better opinion of Antony. Dr. Middleton tells us, p. 254. "Cæsar had used him roughly on several occasions, and they knew his resentment of it, and that he had been engaged by Trebonius, on Cæsar's last return from Spain, in a design against his life: And, though he did not perform that engagement, yet they thought it an obligation, as well as a proof of his continuing in the same mind that he had not discovered it: Which was the reason for their sparing him when Cæsar was killed, and of Trebonius's taking him aside, on pretence of business, lest his behaviour on that occasion might provoke them to kill him too."

L 1 2

him-

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.
43.
408 Cons.

Ad Am.
xiv. 10.

Y. R. 709- himself master of the city, and taking immediate revenge on the Con-
 B. f. C. h. spirators: And Dio says, that by break of day he harangued the people
 43. against them. What Lepidus proposed might easily have been put in 408 Conf. execution, but Antony diverted him from that design, and managed him agreeably to his own views. His authority and forces he made use of to harraß and terrify the opposite party till he had driven the Conspirators out of the city: And, when he had served his purposes with him at home, he contrived to send him to his government to keep the provinces and Commanders abroad in due subjection to them; and that, by being stationed with his army in Gaul, he might be ready for any event which should require his help in Italy. Antony, to render their union the firmer, and at the same time to humour his vanity, gave his daughter in marriage to Lepidus's son, and assisted him to seize the Higb-priest- hood, vacant by Cæsar's death, without regard to the ordinary forms of election.

N. idd. p. The next day passed in mutual assurances from both sides of their dis-
 255. position to concord and amity: And Plutarch says, that Brutus and Cas- fius ventured down into the Forum, and were heard with silence and respect from the Rostra: But that L. Cornelius Cinna, one of the Prætors, beginning to speak and accuse Cæsar, they broke out into such a sudden rage that the Conspirators thought fit to withdraw again into the Capitol: Where Brutus, expecting to be besieged, dismissed the most eminent of those who had followed him thither, not thinking it just that those, who were not partakers of the deed, should share in the danger.
 P. in Antony summoned the Senate on the third day to adjust the conditions
 B. in of the agreement with the Conspirators, and confirm them by some so-
 l. in act. Antony, Plancus, and Cicero are said to have made studied orations much to the satisfaction of the house. Cicero moved the assembly in the first place, after the example of Athens, to decree a general amnesty, or act of oblivion for all that was passed, to which they unanimously agreed. Antony seemed to be all goodness, talked of nothing but of healing measures; and, for a proof of his sincerity, moved,
 " that the Conspirators should be invited to take part in their delibera" tions, and sent his son as an hostage for their safety:" Upon which they all came down from the Capitol: And Brutus supped with Lepidus; Cassius with Antony.

There were several things however very artfully proposed and carried by Antony on pretence of public concord, of which he made afterwards a most pernicious use; particularly a decree for the confirmation of all Cæsar's acts; which proposition was supported by all those who either were actually in office, or were named to be magistrates of the following years. But this motion was suspected by many, who opposed it for
 P. in some time, calling upon Antony to explain it, and to specify how far it
 B. in was to extend: He assured them, that no other acts were meant than what were known to every body, and entered publicly on Cæsar's register:

ter : They asked, if any persons were to be restored from exile ? He said, only one, and no more ; Whether any immunities were granted to cities or countries ? He answered, none ; and consented that it should pass with a restriction, proposed by Servius Sulpicius, that no grant, which was to take place after the Ides of March, should be ratified. This was generally thought so reasonable, and Antony's seeming candour made such an impression, that those who saw the mischief of it durst not venture to oppose it : Especially, as there was a precedent for it in the case of Sylla ; and as it was supposed to relate chiefly to the veteran soldiers, whom it was not possible to oblige, or keep in good humour, without confirming the privileges and possessions which Cæsar had granted to them. In favour of the Conspirators, it was added, that this was enacted for the sake of the public tranquillity. In fine, it was resolved that Cæsar's funeral should be solemnized at the public expence. All this had been agreed to before by Brutus : Though Cassius had opposed the last article, and Atticus had warned his friends of the dangerous consequences of it, maintaining that all was lost, if the tyrant received those honours. Dolabella, whom Cæsar, upon his intended expedition to Parthia, had designed and nominated to the consulship, now seized the ensigns of that office ; and, though Antony had protested against that designation, and resolved to obstruct its effect, he now quietly received him, and acknowledged him as his colleague.

Y. R. - 69.
Ref. Chr.
41.
408 Conf.

Ad Att.
xiv. 10. &
xiv.

The day following Antony received the thanks of the Senate for his prudent and peaceable behaviour ; and some historians tell us, that the greatest provinces of the Empire were decreed to the Conspirators ; to Brutus, Macedonia ; to Cassius, Syria ; to Trebonius, Asia ; to Tullius Cimber, Bitynia ; and that D. Brutus was confirmed in the government of Cisalpine Gaul. This would have been putting into the hands of the Conspirators the chief forces of the Empire ; and, if so, it is hard to imagine that Antony had at this time any view of raising a civil war. But Syria and Macedonia were not decreed to Cassius and Brutus till Antony was declared a public enemy.

App. B.
Ch. l. iii.

This calm was but of short duration ; for, Cæsar's will being opened at the house of Antony, it was found that Cæsar made his sister's grand-children his heirs ; young Octavius for the three quarters of his estate, and Q. Pedius, with L. Pinarius, for the remaining quarter. In the conclusion he adopted Octavius. Several of the Conspirators were named tutors to his son, in case he had one ; and, in failure of his first heirs, D. Brutus was named to the succession of his estate. He bequeathed his gardens near the Tiber to the public, and three hundred sesterces to every Roman citizen ; which greatly contributed to awaken the people's affection towards him. They declared, that a man so generous, and who had given such proofs of his tenderness to his fellow-citizens, could not be a tyrant ; and the favourable sentiments they entertained of him manifested themselves soon after at his funeral.

A lit.

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.
408 Conf.

A little temple, all glittering with gold, was built in the form of that dedicated to Venus the Mother, before the Rostra; and in this temple his body was placed, on an ivory bed, covered with a gold and purple cloth. At his head rose a trophy, upon which hung the robe in which he was killed. At the same time, in the Campus Martius, near the sepulchre of Julia, was raised a pile for the burning of his body, whither all those who in great numbers had brought perfumes to burn with it were directed to carry them. When all was ready, Antony mounted the Rostra, and ordered a herald to read the several decrees of the Senate, which declared Cæsar's person sacred, and accumulated all human and divine honours upon him: He then commanded him to read the oath that all the Senators had taken, not only not to attempt any thing against his life, but to defend it at the expence of their own; and he added a few words suited to the occasion*. When he had done speaking, the body was carried down from the bed of state into the Forum by the magistrates, and those who had borne offices under the deceased. The people, moved at the sight of this melancholy spectacle, and inflamed by verses adapted to raise compassion, which were industriously spread among them, would not suffer the body to be carried further, or to the field of Mars; but would have it burnt, some in Pompey's Senate-house, where he had been killed; others in the temple of Jupiter. In this tumult, two armed men came up to the body, and set fire to what covered it. The mob upon this immediately pulled up the seats of the judges, the counters of the bankers and shopkeepers, and gathered all the wood they could lay their hands on. The musicians threw into the fire the cloaths they had prepared for the ceremony; the veteran soldiers their arms; the women their ornaments; and the flame became so violent, according to Appian, that the house of L. Bellicus was intirely consumed. From the funeral, the mob ran with firebrands to set fire to the houses of the Conspirators, who had great difficulty to prevent them, notwithstanding the preparations they had made against such an attack. Helvius Cinna, one of the Tribunes, and a particular friend to Cæsar, was torn in pieces by the rabble, being mistaken, unluckily, for the Prætor L. Cornelius Cinna, who had extolled the act of killing Cæsar, in a speech from the Rostra; and, fixing his head upon a pike, they carried it about the town. This so alarmed all those who had any similitude of name with any of the Conspirators,

Suet. in
Cæf. 84.
85.

Val. Max.
ix. 9.
Plut. Cæf.
et Brut.
Dio, p.
867.

* Dio has given us a long oration of his own composition, and Appian writes, that Antony not only unfolded before the people Cæsar's garment, pierced by the daggers of the Conspirators, and stained with his blood; but also shewed a waxen image, with all the wounds marked upon it, which, in order to excite compassion, and spirit them up to revenge, he twirled about before them in relating his hero's assassination. But, though it must be allowed that Antony did make a short funeral oration, yet it does not seem probable that he acted the part which Appian and Dio make him act. Suet. in Cæf. l. 44. Cicero, in a letter to Atticus, reflects upon him in no other respect, than for his calling Cæsar, clarissimum virum.

that that Caius Casca thought fit, by a public advertisement, to signify the distinction of his person and principles from Publius Casca, who gave the first blow to Cæsar ^{Y. R. 709.}.

Bef. Chr.

43.

408 Conf.

This

“ We are not to imagine, however, as “ it is commonly believed, that these vio“ lences were owing to the general indig“ nation of the citizens against the murder“ ers of Cæsar; excited either by the spec“ tacle of his body, or the eloquence of An“ ton, who made the funeral oration; for “ it is certain that Cæsar, through his whole “ reign, could never draw from the people
“ any public signification of their favour;
“ but, on the contrary, was constantly mor“ tified by the perpetual demonstrations of “ their hatred and disaffection to him. The “ case was the same after his death: The “ memory of his tyranny was odious,
“ and Brutus and Cassius the real favourites
“ of the city; as appeared on all occasions,
“ wherever their free and genuine sense “ could be declared, in the public shows and “ theatres; which Cicero frequently appeals
“ to as a proper encouragement to all ho“ nest men to act with spirit and vigour in “ the defence of their common liberty.
“ What happened therefore at the funeral “ was the effect of artifice and faction; the “ work of a mercenary rabble; the greatest “ part slaves and strangers, lured and pre“ pared for violence, against a party un“ armed, and pursuing pacific counsels, and “ placing all their trust and security in the “ justice of their cause. Cicero calls it a “ conspiracy of Cæsar's freedmen, who “ were the chief managers of the tumult;
“ in which the Jews seem to have borne a “ considerable part; who, out of hatred
“ to Pompey for his affront to their city “ and temple, were zealously attached to “ Cæsar; and, above all other foreigners in “ Rome, distinguished themselves by the ex“ pressions of their grief for his death; so “ as to spend whole nights at his monu“ ment.” Middl p. 256.

The whole subsequent history is a confutation of what is here asserted. Brutus and Cassius were the favourites of a part of the Nobility, but could have no admirers among the people; though indeed all considerate men were desirous of peace upon any terms. Appian, Bell. Civ. l. iii.
expressly contradicts what Cicero says of the popular favour shewn at Brutus's plays:
He relates, that, when some bribed to that pur*pose, cried out, that Brutus and Cassius should be recalled, there was such an uproar among the people, that the plays ceased till such time as those who demanded their return were silent.*

And indeed this was the proper occasion for the people to shew their favour; and, had they shewn it with any unanimity, Brutus's return would have been a consequence of it.
Cicero's account to Atticus of the Cæsarians is as follows: “ Hirtius warmly loves the “ man whom Brutus stabbed; he, and all “ the rest, are perpetually lamenting the “ miserable end of so great a man; and de“ claring that the Republic is ruined by it.
“ They say that all his acts will be made “ void, as soon as the people's fears are o“ ver; and that clemency was his ruin; “ since, if it had not been for that, he “ could not have perished in such a manner.”
Ad Att. xiv. 22. And this is a proper place to present the reader with an excellent letter of a very worthy man, of Maius to Cicero. Ep. Fam. xi. 28.

“ YOUR letter gave me great plea“ sure, by letting me see that you retain “ still that favourable opinion of me, which “ I had always hoped and wished; and,
“ though I had never indeed any doubt of “ it, yet, for the high value that I set upon
“ it, I was very solicitous that it should re“ main always inviolable. I was conscious “ to myself, that I had done nothing which “ could reasonably give offence to any ho“ nest man; and did not imagine therefore “ that a person of your great and excellent “ accomplishments could be induced to take “ any without reason, especially against one “ who had always professed, and still con“ tinued to profess, a sincere good-will to “ you. Since all this then stands just as I “ wish it, I will now give an answer to those “ accusations, from which you, agreeably to “ your character, out of your singular good“ nefs and friendship, have so often defen“ ded me. I am no stranger to what has “ been said of me by certain persons since “ Cæsar's death: They call it a crime in “ me, that I am concerned for the loss of “ an intimate friend, and sorry that the man “ whom I loved met with so unhappy a “ fate: They say, that our country ought “ to be preferred to any friendship, as if “ they

Y. R. 709.
 Ber. Chr.
 43.
 408 Cons.

This was a clear warning to the Conspirators, how little reason they had to expect any safety in the city, without a guard for their defence.

M. Bru-

“ they had really made it evident, that his “ death was of service to the Republic;
 “ but I will not deal craftily: I own my“ self not to be arrived at that degree of “ wisdom; nor did I yet follow Cæsar in “ our late dissensions, but my friend;
 “ whom, though displeased with the thing,
 “ I could not desert; for I never approved “ the civil war, or the cause of it; but “ took all possible pains to stifle it in its “ birth. Upon the victory therefore of a “ familiar friend, I was not eager either to “ advance, or to enrich myself; an advan“ tage which others who had less interest
 “ with him than I abused to great excess.
 “ Nay, my circumstances were even hurt by “ Cæsar’s law, to whose kindness the greatest “ part of those who now rejoice at his “ death, owed their very continuance in the “ city. I solicited the pardon of the van“ quished with the same zeal as if it had “ been for myself. Is it possible therefore “ for me, who laboured to procure the “ safety of all, not to be concerned for the “ death of him, from whom I used to pro“ cure it? Especially when the very same “ men, who were the cause of making him “ odious, were the authors also of destroy“ ing him. But I shall have cause, they “ say, to repent, for daring to condemn
 “ their act. Unheard of insolence! that it “ should be allowed to some to glory in a “ wicked action, yet not to others, even to “ grieve at it without punishment. But “ this was always free, even to slaves, to “ fear, rejoice, and grieve by their own “ will, not that of another; which yet these “ men, who call themselves the authors of “ liberty, are endeavouring to extort from “ us by the force of terror. But they may “ spare their threats; for no danger shall “ terrify me from performing my duty and “ the offices of humanity; since it was al“ ways my opinion, that an honest death “ was never to be avoided, often even to be “ sought. But why are they angry with “ me, for wishing only that they may repent
 “ of their act? I wish that all the world “ may regret Cæsar’s death. But I ought,
 “ they say, as a member of civil society, to “ wish the good and safety of the Republic.
 “ If my past life and future hopes do not at-“ ready prove that I wish it, without my “ saying so, I will not pretend to evince it “ by argument. I beg of you therefore in “ the strongest terms to attend to facts rather “ than to words; and if you think it the most “ useful to one in my circumstances, that “ what is right should take place; never “ imagine that I can have any union or “ commerce with ill-designing men. I “ acted the same part in my youth, where

 “ to mistake would have been pardonable;
 “ shall I then undo it all again, and re“ nounce my principles in my declining “ age? No, it is my resolution to do no“ thing that can give any offence; except “ it be when I lament the cruel fate of a “ dear friend and illustrious man. If I “ were in different sentiments, I would “ never disown what I was doing; lest I “ should be thought not only wicked for “ pursuing what was wrong, but false and “ cowardly for dissembling it. But I un“ dertook the care of the shows, which “ young Cæsar exhibited for the victory of “ his uncle: This was an affair of private,
 “ not of public duty; it was what I ought “ to have performed to the memory and “ honour of my dead friend; and what I “ could not therefore deny to a youth of the “ greatest hopes, and so highly worthy of “ Cæsar. But I go often also to the Con“ sul Autury’s to pay my compliments; yet
 “ you will find those very men go oftener
 “ to ask and receive favours, who reflect “ upon me for it, as disaffected to my coun“ try. But, what arrogance is this? When “ Cæsar never hindered me from visiting “ whom I would; even those whom he did “ not care for; that they who have depri“ ved me of him should attempt by their ca“ vils to debar me from placing my esteem “ where I think proper. But I am not a“ fraid, that either the modesty of my life “ should not be sufficient to confute all false “ reports of me for the future, or that they,
 “ who do not love me for my constancy to “ Cæsar, would not chuse to have their “ friends resemble me, rather than them“ selves. For my own part, if I could have “ my wish, I would spend the remainder of “ my days in quiet at Rhodes; but, if any “ accident prevent me, will live in such a “ man-

M. Brutus and Cassius retired immediately to Lanuvium, fifteen miles from Rome: D. Brutus, Trebonius, and others, staid behind some time longer, and demanded a guard for themselves and their accomplices. But Antony inform'd them by Hirtius, that the soldiers and the populace were so enraged, that he did not think it possible for any of them to be safe. He also assured Hirtius that he could not consent to let Decimus take possession of the province to which he was nominated. Antony was sensible that, if the Conspirators had a firm footing in Italy, and gained any increase of power, it would be impossible for him and his party to maintain their ground against the nobles. His aim was therefore to amuse them, and neither suffer them to remain in the city, nor drive them to desperate measures, till he had collected a sufficient force to crush them. Decimus, in the desponding humour he was in, thought that under the present difficulties the most prudent step he could take for the common interest, was to request an honorary legation for each of the Conspirators, in order to give some decent colour to their leaving Rome. Hirtius accordingly promised to obtain this for them; but, in case he succeeded, it was thought, that it would not be long 'ere they should be declared public enemies, and sentenced to banishment. Decimus advised, therefore, his Confederates, as the most prudent step in the present conjuncture, to submit to fortune, and retire to Rhodes, or to some other secure part of the world, where they might adjust their measures to public circumstances, and wait at least to see how far the news of Cæsar's death would have influence to strengthen the several parties of Sextus Pompey, who was in arms in Spain; or of Cæcilius Bassus, who was raising commotions in Asia. He took courage, however, and went and put himself in possession of his province of Cisalpine Gaul without the leave of the Consul. Trebonius, in the mean time, stole away privately to Asia, and Tillius Cimber to Bitthynia; and, soon after this dispersion of some of the Chiefs of the conspiracy, Cicero with several other Senators retired from Rome.

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.

43.
408 Conf.

Cic. Fam.
xii. 5.

Melm. xii.

5.

Ibid.

VOL. IV.

M m

Antony,

"manner at Rome, as always to desire, that
"what is right may prevail. I am greatly "obliged to our friend Trebatius, for giving "me this assurance of your sincere and "friendly regard for me, and for making
"it my duty to respect and observe a man
"whom I had esteemed always before with "inclination. Take care of your health,
"and preserve me in your affection."

* Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, was in Rome when Cæsar was killed, and was lodged in his house: She had intended to accompany him into the East, in order to preserve her influence over him, which was very great. But, being terrified by the accident of his death, and the disorders which followed it, she presently left the city. However, before her departure, she laboured to get her son by Cæsar acknowledged as such at Rome, and declared the heir of her kingdom; as he was the year following by Antony and Octavius. She had a conference upon this subject with Cicero in Cæsar's gardens, where the haughtiness of her behaviour gave him no small offence. Knowing his taste and character, she made him the promise of some present very agreeable; and thus obliged him the more by not performing it: He does not tell us what it was; but, from the hints, which he drops, it seems to have been

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.

^{43.}
408 Conf.

Antony, as soon as the Conspirators were gone, resumed his mask, and, as if the late violences had been accidental only, and the sudden transport of a vile mob, professed the same moderation as before, and affected to speak with the greatest respect of Brutus and Cassius. He readily procured for them a decree to absolve them from the laws, which forbid the Prætors to be absent from the city above ten days: And, by several other seasonable acts, proposed by him to the Senate, appeared to have nothing so much at heart as the public concord. Among other decrees, he offered one, which was prepared and drawn up by himself, “to abolish for ever the name and office of a Dictator: This seemed to be a sure pledge of his good intentions, and gave an universal satisfaction to the Senate, who passed it, as it were, by acclamation, without even putting it to the vote; and decreed the thanks of the house for it to Antony.

About the same time the mob, headed by the impostor Marius (who was now returned to Rome) and the freedmen of Cæsar, had erected an altar in the Forum on the spot where his body was burnt; with a pillar of Namidian marble twenty feet high, inscribed, To the Father of his country.

been statues and curiosities from Egypt for the ornament of his library. When therefore she was obliged to apply to him by her ministers for his assistance in her affair, he refused to be concerned. “The flight of the Queen, says he, gives me no pain. . . . I should be glad to hear what further news there is of her, and her young Cæsar. . . . I hate the Queen: Her agent Armanius, the witness and sponsor of her promises to me, knows that I have reason: They were things only proper for a man of letters, and suitable to my character; so that I should not scruple to proclaim them from the Rostra. Her other agent Sara is not only a rascal, but has been rude to me. I never saw him at my house but once, and, when I asked him civilly, what commands he had for me, he said that he came to look for Atticus. As to the pride of the Queen, when I saw her in the gardens, I can never think of it without resentment: I will have nothing, therefore, to do with them: They take me to have neither spirit, nor even feeling left.” Ad Att. xiv. 8. 20. xv. 15. Mital. p. 262.

It was during his retirement at this time, that he composed his treatise, on the nature of the gods, addressed to Brutus; his discourse on divination, or the foreknowledge and prediction of future events; and the several ways by which it was supposed to be acquired or communicated to man; those on the advantages of old-age, on friendship, and on fate; and it was at this time, probably, that he finished his translation of Plato's famous dialogue, called Timæus, on the nature and origin of the universe. He was employing himself also upon a work of a different sort, which had been long upon his hands, a history of his own times, or rather of his own conduct: Full of free and severe reflections on those who had abused their power to the oppression of the Republic, especially Crassus and Cæsar. This he calls his anecdote; a work not to be published, but to be shewn only to a few friends, in the manner of Theopompus, an historian famed for his severe and invective style. Atticus was urging him to put the last hand to it, and continue it down through Cæsar's government: But he chose to reserve this last part for a distinct history, in which he designed to vindicate, at large, the justice of killing a tyrant. Dio says, that he delivered this book, sealed up, to his son, with strict orders not to read or publish it, till after his death: But, from this time, he never saw his son, and left the piece, probably unfinished; though some copies of it afterwards got abroad, from which his commentator Asconius has quoted several particulars. Middl. p. 291.

Here

Here they performed daily sacrifices, and the humour of worshipping at this new altar spread so fast among the meaner sort and the slaves, as to endanger the peace and safety of the city. But Antony had their Chief committed to prison, where he was strangled without any form of law: And his body in an ignominious manner was dragged through the streets. By this measure, Antony gained fresh credit with the Conspirators; insomuch that Brutus, together with Cassius and other friends, had a personal conference with him about this time, which passed to mutual satisfaction. By these arts he hoped to amuse the Conspirators, and induce them to lay aside all vigorous counsels; and thus prevent them from furnishing themselves with troops and money, which would put them in a condition to act offensively^a.

V. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.
43
408 Conf.
Philip. i. 2.

Antony, having thus put his affairs into the best train that he could, and appointed the 1st of June for a meeting of the Senate, in order to deliberate on the State of the Republic, took the opportunity of that interval to make a progress through Italy, for the sake of visiting the quarters of the veteran soldiers, and engaging them to his service by all sorts of bribes and promises. The government of the city, in his absence, devolved to Dolabella, whose conduct gave great satisfaction to the Senate. The death of Marius had not put a stop to the mode of sacrificing at Cæsar's column: The multitudes which continued to flock to the place, fired with a kind of enthusiastic rage, ran furious about the streets, committing all sorts of outrage and violence against the supposed friends of liberty. This was open rebellion, and called for a remedy; which Dolabella effectually applied by demolishing the pillar and altar, paving the area they stood upon, and seizing the authors of the disorders; whom he proceeded against with great severity, causing such of them as were free to be thrown down the Tarpeian rock, and the slaves to be crucified. This, we are told by Cicero, gave an universal joy to the city: The whole body of the people attended the Consul to his house; and in the theatres gave him the usual testimony of their thanks by the loudest acclamations^b.

M m 2

Antony,

^a Ad Att. xiv. 16. With the same view he wrote an artful letter to Cicero to desire his consent to the restoration of S. Clodius, the chief agent of P. Clodius, who had been several years in banishment for outrages committed in the city; chiefly against Cicero himself, on whose account he was condemned. Antony, by his marriage with Fulvia, the widow of P. Clodius, became the protector of all that family, and the tutor of young Publius, her son; which gave him a decent pretence of interesting himself in this affair. Middl. p. 260.

^b In a letter on this occasion to Atticus, Cicero says, "O my admirable Dolabella! "I now call him mine; for, believe me, I "had some doubt of him before. The fact "affords matter of great speculation: To "throw them down the rock; to crucify; de- "molish the pillar; pave the area; in short, "it is heroic. He has extinguished all ap- "pearance of that regret for Cæsar, which "was spreading every day so fast, that I "began to apprehend some danger to our "tyrant-killers: But I now agree with you "and conceive better hopes." Ad Att. xiv. 15.

Y. R. 709.
Ref. Chr.

43.
408 Conf.

Vell. Pat.
L. 62.
Ad. Att.
xiv. 10. et
xv. 1.

Antony, in his progress through Italy, having drawn great numbers of the veterans towards Rome to be ready for any purpose his affairs should require, found himself above controul, and began immediately to act with less reserve. Brutus and Cassius continued still near Lanuvium, being yet irresolute what measures they should take: They kept themselves quiet and retired, expecting what time and chance would offer, and waiting particularly to see what humour the Consuls would be in at the next meeting of the Senate, with regard to themselves and the Republic; and, since they were driven from the discharge of their Prætorship, they contrived to put the people in mind of them, from time to time, by their edicts, in which they made the strongest professions of their pacific disposition; declared that their conduct should give no handle for a civil war; and that they would submit to a perpetuation, if it would contribute in any manner to the public concord; being contented with the consciousness of their act, as the greatest honour which they could enjoy. Their present design was to come to Rome on the 1st of June, and to take their places in the Senate, if it should be thought advisable; or to present themselves at least in the Rostre and try the affections of the people, for whom Brutus was preparing a speech. But now the conduct of Antony began to open Brutus's eyes, and convince him of the mistake of his pacific measures; and he thought it time, therefore, in concert with Cassius, to require an explicit account of the Consul's intentions, and expostulate with him gently in the following letter:

BRUTUS and CASSIUS, Prætors, to M. ANTONIUS, Consul.

Ep. Fam.
ix. 2.
Midd. p.
288.

"IF we were not persuaded of your sincerity and good-will to us,
"we should not have written this to you; which, out of the kind dis"position that you bear to us, you will take without doubt in good part.
"We are informed that a great multitude of veteran soldiers is already
"come to Rome, and a much greater expected there on the 1st of June.
"If we could harbour any suspicion or fear of you, we should be un-
"like ourselves: Yet, surely, after we had put ourselves into your power
"and, by your advice, dismissed the friends, whom we had about us,
"from the great towns, and that not only by public edict, but by pri"vate letters, we deserve to be made acquainted with your designs;
"especially in an affair which relates to ourselves. We beg of you,
"therefore, to let us know what your intentions are with regard to us.
"Do you think we can be safe in such a crowd of veterans? who have

"O the brave act of Delabella! What a "prospect does it give us? I never cease
"praising and exhorting him—Our Brutus,
"I dare say, might now walk safely through
"the Forum, with a crown of gold upon "his head: For who dare molest him, when "the rack or the cross is to be their fate? And "when the very lowest of the people give "such proofs of their applause and appro"bation?" Ad Att. xiv. 16. See also his "letter to Delabella, Ep. Fam. ix. 14. which "is in the highest strain of compliment.

"thoughts,

“ thoughts, we hear, even of rebuilding the altar; which no man can “ desire or approve who wishes our safety and honour. That we had no “ other view from the first but peace, nor sought any thing else but the “ public liberty, the event shews. Nobody can deceive us but you,
 “ which is not certainly agreeable to your virtue and integrity: But no “ man else has it in his power to deceive us. We trusted and shall “ trust to you alone. Our friends are under the greatest apprehensions “ for us: For, though they are persuaded of your integrity, yet they “ reflect that a multitude of veterans may sooner be pushed to any vio“ lence by others, than restrained by you. We desire an explicit an“ swer to all particulars: For it is silly and trifling to tell us, that the “ veterans are called together, because you intend to move the Senate in “ their favour in June: For who do you think will hinder it, when it “ is certain that we shall not? Nobody ought to think us too fond of “ life: When nothing can happen to us, but with the ruin and confu“ sion of all things.”

The assembly on the 1st of June was composed intirely of those who were either devoted to Antony, or quite indifferent how affairs should turn. Hirtius and Pansa, the Consuls elect, did not appear, and Cicero also absented himself. He had moved towards Rome in the end of May; but, having received an account that the town was filled with veterans, who talked desperately against those who did not favour them; that Antony came thither, attended by a strong body of them; that all his views were bent on war, and that he designed to transfer the province of Gaul from Decimus Brutus to himself by a vote of the People; he determined not to venture to the Senate, but withdrew again from the city. The major part of the Senate followed his example, and fled out of the city for fear of some violence, leaving the Consuls, with a few of their creatures, to make what decrees they pleased. Antony represented, that his life was in danger on account of the several decrees he had passed and executed in favour of the Republic, and demanded a guard; which was no sooner granted him, than he enlisted the veterans he had brought to Rome, and, instead of a moderate guard, formed to himself a little army of six thousand old soldiers. The day following he obtained a decree which had been proposed before and deferred till the 1st of June, to give the cognisance and execution of the acts of Caesar to the Consuls. This decree put every thing into his hands; for, being master both of Caesar's papers, and of his Secretary Faberius, by whose hand they were written, he had an opportunity of forging and inserting, at pleasure, whatever he found of use to him; which he practised without any reserve or management, recalling from banishment the exiles, and selling publicly, for money, whatever immunities were desired by countries, cities, Princes, or private men, on pretence that they had been granted by Caesar, and entered into his books. The imposture was so gross in some instances, that he made Caesar mention things which had happened since

Y. R. 709. since his death. He granted the freedom of the city to all Sicily, pre-
 B. Chr. tending that Cæsar had published a law to this effect in an assembly of
 45. the people, though nobody had ever heard of it: He freed the rich 408 Conf. towns of the island of Crete, and enacted that, after Brutus's proconsul-ship, it should become a province: He restored to King Deiotarus all his dominions, though every body knew that Cæsar hated no man so much as Deiotarus; but the bargain was made in Fulvia's apartments 25, 725 L. for the sum of ten millions of sesterces by the King's agents at Rome.
Antony, immediately after Cæsar's death, by seizing upon the ready money he had left, and which Calpurnia delivered up to him, had presently amassed an infinite sum: For though, at the time of Cæsar's death, 32, 916 L. he owed, as Cicero told him, forty millions of sesterces^c; yet, within less than a fortnight after, he had paid the whole debt. But he soon made himself master of a much larger sum, by seizing on the public treasury, which Cæsar had deposited, for the occasions of the govern-5, 651, 037 L. ment, in the temple of Opis, amounting to seven hundred millions of ses-terces, or above five millions and an half of our money. The use he Arb. made of it was to purchase soldiers, and he was now in a condition to outbid any competitor: But the first purchase, which he made with it, was of his colleague Dolabella, who had been long oppressed with the load of his debts, and whom, by a part of this money, and the promise of a farther share in the plunder of the Empire, he drew intirely from Cicero and the party of the nobles into his own measures. This was an acquisition worth any price to him; the general inclination both of the city and country, we are told, being clearly against him. The town of Puteoli, one of the most considerable in Italy, had lately chosen the two Brutus's and Cassius for their patrons, and there wanted nothing but a Leader, it is said, to arm the whole Empire against him. Dolabella seemed to be that very person, till bribed, as Cicero says, by the force of money, he not only deserted, but overturned, the Republic.

On the 5th of June commissions were granted severally to Brutus and Middle. p. Cassius to buy up corn in Asia and Sicily. The situation of these Lead-295. ers of the Republican party, was, at this time, very disagreeable; they were stripped of the power of their offices, suffered a kind of exile, and even depended upon Antony for their safety. Their friends, therefore, at Rome had been soliciting the Senate for some extraordinary employment to be granted to them, to cover the appearance of a flight, and the disgrace of living in banishment, when invested with one of the first magistracies of the Republic. This was the ground of the commission just mentioned to buy corn; which seemed, however, to be below their character, and contrived as an affront to them by Antony, who affected still to speak of them always with respect. But their friends thought any thing better for them than to sit still in Italy; where their persons were exposed to danger from the veteran soldiers, who were all

^c Tu autem quadringentis HS. quod idibus Martiis debuisti, quonam moderante kalendas Aprilis debere defuisti. Phil. ii. 37.

now in motion : And that this employment would be a security to them for the present, and afford an opportunity of providing for their future safety, by enabling them to execute, what they were now meditating, a design of seizing some provinces abroad and arming themselves in defence of their party ; which was what their enemies were most afraid of, and charged them with publicly, in order to make them odious.

On the 26th of June, Brutus and Cassius held a select Council of their friends, at Antium, to which Cicero was particularly invited. There were present, among others, Favonius, Servilia, Porcia, Brutus's wife, and his sister Tertulla, the wife of Cassius. Cicero, being asked his opinion, advised, " that Brutus should go to Asia, and undertake the affair of the corn : That the only thing to be done at present was to provide for their safety : That their safety was a certain benefit to the Republic. . . . Here Cassius interrupted him, and, with great fierceness in his looks, protested that he would not go to Sicily, nor accept, as a favour, what was intended as an affront ; but would go to Achaia, — Brutus said, that he would go to Rome, if Cicero thought it proper for him—but Cicero declared it impossible for him to be safe there ;— but, supposing, says he, I could be safe : Why then, says Cicero, I should advise it by all means, as the best thing you could do, and better than any province.—After much discourse and complaining for the loss of opportunities, for which Cassius laid all the blame on D. Brutus, Cicero said, that, though that was true, it was in vain to talk of what was passed ; and, as the case then stood, he saw nothing left but to follow his advice,—to which, at last, they all seemed to agree, especially when Servilia^d undertook, by her mediation, to get the affair of the corn left out of their commission ; and Brutus consented that the plays and shews, with which he was to entertain the city shortly as Prætor, should be given by proxy in his absence." Cicero took his leave, pleased with nothing, he says, but the consciousness of having done his duty : For, as to the rest, he gave all for lost ; found the vessel not only broken, but shattered to pieces ; and neither prudence, reason, nor design in what they were doing : So that, if he had any doubt before, he had none now, but longed to get abroad as soon as possible.

There was now great expectation of the shews and plays which Brutus, as Prætor of the city, was going to exhibit, according to annual custom,

^d Servilia, though sister to Cato, had been one of Cæsar's mistresses : In the civil war he gave her several rich farms out of his Pompeian confiscations ; and, according to Suetonius in Cæs. c. 60, bought a single jewel for her at the price of about 50,000 l. She was a woman of spirit and intrigue, in great credit with the Cæsarean party, and at this very time possessed the estate and villa of Pontius Aquila, one of the Conspirators. Cicero reckons it among the solecisms of the time, that the mother of the tyrant-killer should hold the estate of one of her son's accomplices ; (ad Att. xiv. 21.) yet she had such a share in all the counsels of Brutus, that it made Cicero the less inclined to enter into them, or to be concerned with one whom he could not trust : When he is influenced so much, says he, by his mother's advice, or, at least, her intrigues, why should I interpose myself ? Ad Att. xv. 10. Middl. p. 297.

Y. R. 709 in honour of Apollo, on the 3d of July; and all people were attentive Bcf. Chr. and impatient to see in what manner they would be received. The 408 Conf⁴³ success of them answered all the hopes of Brutus and his friends; for they were received with great applause by all ranks, though Antony's brother-in-law Caius, as the next Prætor in office, presided at them.
 One of the plays was Tereus, a tragedy of Accius; which, having many strokes in it on the characters and acts of tyrants, was infinitely clapped by the people. This gave great pleasure to Brutus, who remained about a month longer in Italy, making preparations for his voyage.

Sextus Pompeius about this time made proposals towards an accommodation. After the battle of Munda, he had been obliged to fly from Corduba, and hide himself in the mountains of Celtiberia: Here he remained some time in disguise; but Cæsar had no sooner left Spain, than, gathering together a number of his scattered soldiers, he dared to appear again in arms, and made war successfully against two of Cæsar's Lieutenants, Carinas and Pollio. Upon the news of Cæsar's assassination, numbers flocked to him, and he saw himself again at the head of seven legions, with which he appeared in open campaign, and stormed some towns. The sum of his demands was, that all who had the command of armies should dismiss them. This proposal was contained in the letter which he addressed to the Consuls; but to Libo, his father-in-law, to whom he inclosed this public letter, he signified at the same time that, unless his father's estate and house at Rome were restored to him, he would agree to nothing. This overture from Pompey was procured chiefly by the management of Lepidus; who, having the province of Spain assigned to him, where Pompey was very strong, had no mind to be engaged in a war at such a distance from Rome, and drawn off from attending to the main point in view, the event of affairs in Italy: For which purpose, on pretence of the public quiet, he made the offer of a treaty and honourable terms to Pompey; and that, on condition of laying down his arms, and quitting the province, he should be restored to all his estates and honours, and have the command of the whole naval power of Rome, in the same manner as his father had it before him:
 All which was proposed and recommended to the Senate by Antony himself; where, to preserve a due respect to Cæsar's acts, by which Pom- pey's estates had been confiscated, it was decreed, "that the same sum,
 "for which they had been sold, should be given him by the public, to "enable him to purchase them again." This amounted to seven hundred millions of sesterces, above five millions and an half of our money, exclusive of his jewels, plate, and furniture; which, being wholly embezzled, he was content to lose. On these terms, ratified by the authority of the Senate, Pompey actually quitted Spain, and came to Marseilles; where, in his quality of Admiral, he made naval preparations, with which he soon after seized upon Sicily. The project was wisely conceited by Lepidus and Antony; for, while it carried a shew of moderation
 and

and disposition to peace, it disarmed a desperate enemy, who was in condition to give great obstruction to their designs, and diversion to their arms, at a time when the necessity of their interests required their presence and whole attention at home, to lay a firm foundation of their power in the heart and center of the Empire.

A little before this time, a new actor, the young Octavius, left by his uncle Cæsar, the heir of his name and estate, appeared upon the stage, who, though hitherto unnoticed, soon made a distinguished figure upon it, and became the object of general attention. He had attended Cæsar in the Spanish war; after which he was sent to Apollonia, a celebrated academy or school of learning in Macedonia, there to wait for him in his way to the Partbian war, in which he was to serve in quality of Master of the Horse. As soon as the news of his uncle's death was spread in those parts, all the officers of the troops quartered there made him a tender of their services. Agrippa and Salvidienus were of opinion that he would do right to accept of them; and, in all appearance, if he had followed their advice, all the veterans would have repaired to him, and, in the confused and unsettled state of things in Italy, he would easily have made himself master of Rome, and forced Antony to join him. But he thought this too rash an undertaking, before he had sounded the dispositions of the citizens and soldiers. The sole pretension, therefore, that he avowed at present, was to assert his right to the succession of his uncle's estate, and to claim the possession of it. This was thought an attempt by many too hardy and dangerous for a mere boy, not 19 years complete; for the aristocratical party had great reason to be jealous of him, lest, with the inheritance of the estate, he should grasp at the power of his uncle; and Antony still more, who had destined that succession to himself, and even seized the effects, lest, by the advantage of that wealth, Octavius might be in a condition to make head against him. His mother Atia, therefore, and her husband Philip, out of concern for his safety, pressed him, by letters, to suspend his claim for a while, and not assume an invidious name, before he could see what turn the public affairs would take. But, on the other side, there were many about him constantly pushing him on to throw himself upon the affections of the city and the army, before his enemies had made themselves too strong for him. The remonstrances of these last had weight with him; and, incited by his natural ambition, he resolved without delay to pass over into Italy. On his landing at Brundisium, he was received by the soldiers with great demonstrations of attachment to his cause; and the veterans settled in Italy came from all parts to meet him, complaining of Antony's indolence in revenging the death of his great friend and benefactor. He crossed the country to join his mother and father-in-law, who were at Cuma; where Cicero also was at this time, as well as Balbus, Hirtius, and Pansa. On the 18th of April, he arrived at Naples; whither Balbus went the next morning to

Y. R. 709. receive him, and returned the same day to Cicero, near Cuma, having Bef. Chr. conducted Octavius to the adjoining villa of his father-in-law Philip.
 45. Hirtius and Pansa presented him to Cicero, to whom he made the 468 Conf. strongest assurances, that he would be governed implicitly by his advice.
 His domestics gave him the name of Cæsar; for the young man was determined to risk all his hopes on the credit of this name; but Philip continued to call him Octavius, and so did Cicero: Who, speaking of him to Atticus, says, "Octavius is still with us, and treats me with the "greatest respect and friendship . . . it is not possible for him to make a "good citizen, there are so many about him who threaten the death of our "friends: they declare, that what they have done can never be forgiven."
 On his arrival near Rome, he was met by crowds of his father's and his own friends, and conducted by them in pomp into the city. Before he dismissed them, he desired that they would attend him the next morning into the Forum; and he then went to C. Antonius, who, in Brutus's absence, executed the functions of Prætor Urbanus, claimed in a legal manner his father's succession, and had his claim entered into the public register.
 Appian. From the Prætor's tribunal, he went to Pompey's gardens, where the Consul Antony resided. After the first compliments, Octavius having demanded of the Consul to be put in possession of the money and other effects Cæsar had left, in order to be able to discharge the legacies of the will:
Antony gave him but a very short audience, telling him, that he was young, and did not know what he was about; that the title he assumed of heir and executor to Cæsar's will was a burden too great for his shoulders. The Suet. Oct. Consul took likewise all possible means to prevent Octavius from getting 12. his adoption confirmed by the people in an assembly of the Curie, as the law required. He also opposed the young man in another scheme, that of getting into the tribuneship in the place of Helvius Cinna, killed by the mob at Cæsar's funeral.

Octavius, seeing that Antony openly declared against him, made his court to the people; and, being produced into the Rostra by one of the Tribunes, made a speech to them; which he seconded by what was like to please the inferior part of the city much better, a promise of not only paying them what Cæsar had bequeathed them by his will, but of adding to it, and treating them with public shews and plays in honour of Cæsar's victories. He courted also the Senate, who shewed him on their part the more regard in proportion as Antony became more and more formidable: "Octavius, says Cicero in a letter to Atticus, I perceive, has parts and spirit, and seems to be affected, as we could wish, towards our heroes; but how far we may trust his age, name, succession, education, is a matter of great deliberation. His father-in-law, who came to see me at Astura, thinks, not at all. He must be cherished, however, if but for nothing else, yet to keep him at a distance from Antony. Marcellus acts nobly, if he instils into him a good disposition towards our friends. He seemed to be much influenced

“ enced by him, but to have no confidence in Pansa and Hirtius : His Y. R. 709 “ natural disposition is good, if it does but hold.” Bef. Chi.

On the 20th of July, just after the shews given by Brutus, came on 43.
 those in honour of Venus Mater, and in memory of Cæsar’s victories ; 408 Conf.
 which Octavius undertook at his own expence, as those who had been charged with the management of them durst not venture to exhibit them after his death. In these shews Octavius brought out the Suet. Aug golden chair, which, among the other honours decreed to Cæsar when 10.
 living, was ordered to be placed in the theatres and Circus’s on all so- Dio, 44.
 lemn occasions ; but the Tribunes ordered the chair to be taken away *. 243.
 To answer the immense expence of these games, and others, in which he soon engaged, he was obliged to sell not only the succession of his father, but his own estate, and even that of his mother and Philip, his father-in-law, who, seeing now that his claim created to him no danger, entered earnestly into his views.

The turn affairs had taken made Cicero resolve to prosecute what he Midell. p.
 had long been projecting, his voyage into Greece, to spend a few months 294.
 with his son at Athens. He despaired of any good from the present Consuls, and intended to see Rome no more, till their successors entered into office ; in whose administration he began to place all his hopes. He wrote therefore to Dolabella to procure him the grant of an honorary lieutenantcy ; and, lest Antony, an angry man, as he calls him, Ad Att.
 should think himself slighted, he wrote to him too on the same subject. xv. 8. 11.
Dolabella immediately named him for one of his own Lieutenants, which answered his purpose still better ; for, without obliging him to any service, or limiting him to any time, it left him at full liberty to go where he pleased ; so that he readily accepted it, and prepared for his journey. He provided three little yachts or gallies to transport Midell. p.
 himself and his attendants ; but, as there was a report of legions arri- 309.
 ving daily from abroad, and of pirates also at sea, he thought it would Ad Att.
 be safer to sail in company with Brutus and Cassius, who had drawn xvi. 14.
 together a fleet of considerable force, which now lay upon the coast. He gave several hints of his design to Brutus, who received it more coldly than he expected ; and seemed uncertain and irresolute about the time of his going. He resolved therefore to embark without farther delay, though in some perplexity to the last, about the expediency of the voyage, and jealous of its being censured, as a desertion of his country ;
 but Atticus kept up his spirits, by assuring him constantly in his letters, Ad Att.

* There appeared, during these games, a comet near the great bear for seven days together. It rose about an hour before sunset, and was very bright. The people imagined that the appearance of this star was to inform us, that Cæsar’s soul was received into the number of the immortal Gods. For which reason, a star was placed over the head of the statue, which Octavius consecrated soon after in the Forum. The star became afterwards the distinguishing attribute of Cæsar in all the monuments erected to his honour, and we find it upon many of his medals.

Y. R. 709. that it was generally approved of at Rome, provided that he kept his word
 Ecl. Chr. of returning by the first of the new year. He sailed slowly from Pom- 43 Conf peii along the western coast of Italy towards Rhegium, going ashore every night to lodge with some friend or client. He was at Velia, on the coast of Lucania, on the 19th of *July*¹. From Rhegium, or rather Leu- copetra, a promontory near it, he passed over to Syracuse, on the 1st of August, and set sail the next morning towards Greece, but was driven back by contrary winds to Leucopetra; and, after a second attempt, with no better success, was forced to wait for the opportunity of a fair wind.
 Ad Att. Here the principal inhabitants of the country came to pay him their com-
 xvi. 7. pliments; some of them fresh from Rome, who brought the news of an Philip. 1. unexpected turn of affairs there towards a general pacification: "That " Antony seemed disposed to desist from his pretensions to Gaul, submit to " the authority of the Senate, and make up matters with Brutus and
 " Cassius, who had written circular letters to all the principal Senators,
 " to beg their attendance in the Senate on the 1st of September; and that
 " Cicero's absence was particularly regretted, and even blamed at such " a crisis." This agreeable account of things made him presently drop all thoughts of pursuing his voyage; in which he was confirmed likewise by letters from Atticus; who, contrary to his former advice, pressed him now, in strong and pathetic terms, to come back again to Rome.
 He returned therefore by the same course which he had before taken, and came back to Velia, on the 17th of August. Brutus lay within three miles of it with his fleet; and, hearing of his arrival, came immediately on foot to salute him: "He declared himself exceedingly pleased with
 " Cicero's return; owned that he had never approved, though he had " not dissuaded the voyage; thinking it indecent to give advice to a " man of his experience; but now told him plainly, that he had escaped
 " too great imputations on his character; the one, of too hasty a des" pair and desertion of the common cause; the other, of the vanity of " going to see the Olympic games. This last, as Cicero says, would have

¹ This was the native place of Trebatius; whence he wrote a kind letter to him, dated the 19th of July, advising him by no means to sell that family estate, as he then designed, situated so healthfully and agreeably, and affording a convenient retreat from the confusion of the times, among a people who intirely loved him. Ep. Fam. vii. 20. At this place he began his treatise of Topics, or the art of finding arguments on any question. It was an abstract of Aristotle's piece on the same subject; which Trebatius happening once to meet with in Cicero's Tusculan library, had begged of him to explain. He drew it up from his memory, and finished it as he sailed before he came to Rhegium, whence he sent it to Trebatius, with a letter, dated the 27th. In the same voyage, happening to be looking over his treatise on the Academic philosophy, he observed the preface of the third book to be the same that he had prefixed to his book on glory, which he had lately sent to Atticus. It was his custom, it seems, to prepare at leisure a number of different proems adapted to the general view of his studies, and ready to be applied to any of his works, which he should afterwards publish; so that by mistake he had used this preface twice; he composed therefore a new one on ship-board for the piece on glory. Ad Att. xvi. 6. Middl. p. 310.

" been

“ been shameful for him in any state of the Republic, but in the pre“ sent unpardonable; and professes himself therefore greatly obliged to “ the winds for preserving him from such an infamy, and, like good “ citizens, blowing him back to the service of his country.”

Y. R. 709.
 Bef. Chr.
 43.
 408 Conf.

Brutus informed him likewise of what had passed in the Senate on the 1st of August, and how Piso had signalized himself by a brave and honest speech, and some vigorous motions in favour of the public liberty, in which nobody had the courage to second him: He produced also Antony's edict, and their answer to it, which pleased Cicero exceedingly; but, on the whole, though he was still satisfied with his resolution of returning, yet he found no such reason for it as his first intelligence had suggested, nor any hopes of doing much service at Rome, where he arrived on the last of the month.

The Senate met the next morning, to which Cicero was particularly summoned by Antony, but excused himself by a civil message, as being too much indisposed by the fatigue of his journey. Antony took this as an affront, and, in a great rage, openly threatened in the Senate to order his house to be pulled down about his ears². The business of the day was to decree some new and extraordinary honours to the memory of Cæsar, with a religious supplication to him as to a divinity³. Cicero was determined not to concur in it, yet knew that an opposition would not only be fruitless, but dangerous; and for that reason staid away. Antony, on the other hand, was desirous to have him there, fancying that he

Middl. p.
 315.

² Plutarch in Cic. says, “ that Antony sent soldiers with orders either to bring him, or set his house on fire; but, being dissuaded from this violence by the interposition of the house, he was satisfied to make Cicero lose his pledge.” The Consuls had in former times obliged the Senators to lodge certain pledges in their hands, which they were to lose, if they refused obedience to their orders. But Cicero had given no pledge to Antony, nor was it now the custom; and, though in his first Philippic he exclaims against the injurious treatment he now met with from Antony, he must be considered as complaining only of a passionate threat.

³ Cicero, Phil. i. expresses himself in this manner on the subject of this religious supplication: “ Do you imagine, Conscrip-“ Fathers, though I had been forced to at“ tend the house, that I should have given “ my vote for decreeing that parental obse-“ quies should be mixed with public thank“ givings; that religious rites, inexpressible, “ should be introduced among us: That “ supplications should be ordered to the “ dead? I will not say to whom. Had he “ been a Lucius Brutus, who, with his own “ hand, freed his country from regal slav“ ery, and, through a succession of almost “ 500 years, transmitted a representative “ capable of being fired with the same noble “ sentiments, and performing a like glorious “ exploit; never should I have been brought “ to consent to the decree: Shall the dead

 “ be joined in the worship due to the im“ mortal Gods, and the man who no where “ has a monument of parental obsequies,
 “ be honoured with the rites of public sup“ plication! This opinion, Conscrip“ turs, I should have delivered, that I “ might have been able easily to vindicate “ myself to the Roman people, in case that “ any heavy blow had fallen upon them “ through war, through pestilence, or fa“ mine; part of these indeed we already “ feel, and more I am afraid now threaten “ us. But the immortal Gods, I hope,
 “ will pardon the people of Rome, who do “ not approve of this decree, and the Se“ nate, who were compelled to grant it.”

would

Y. R. 709. would either be frightened into a compliance, which would lessen him
 Bef. Cnr. with his own party ; or, by opposing what was intended, make himself
 43. odious to the soldiery. The decree passed without any contradiction.
 58 Conf.

The Senate met again the next day, when Antony thought fit to absent himself, and leave the stage clear to Cicero ; who accordingly appeared, and delivered the first of those speeches, which were afterwards called his Philippics. He opened it with a particular account of the motives of his late voyage and sudden return ; of his interview with Brutus, and his regret at leaving him. He then declared that “ he came “ to second Piso ; and, in case of any accidents, of which many seemed “ to surround him, to leave that day’s speech as a monument of his perpetual fidelity to his country.” After complaining of Antony’s injurious treatment of him the day before, and condemning the decree to which they were forced to give their consent, he returned thanks to Piso for what he had said in that place the month before ; wished that he had been present to second him ; and reproved the other Consuls for betraying their dignity by deserting him. As to public affairs, he dwelt much on Antony’s abuse of their decree to confirm Cæsar’s acts, and the plundering the temple of Opis of those sums, which might have been of great service to the State. He shewed also the unreasonableness of two laws, which Antony had proposed : The one to form a third order of Judges to consist of military men : And the other by which those convicted either of riotous or treasonable practices should be at liberty to appeal to the People. He then exhorted the two Consuls to follow the true path to glory, telling them, “ that to be dear to our citizens, to deserve well “ of our country, to be praised, respected, beloved, was truly glorious : “ To be feared and hated always invidious, detestable, weak, and tottering : That Cæsar’s fate was a warning to them how much better it “ was to be loved than to be feared : That no man could live happy who “ held life on such terms, that it might be taken from him not only with “ impunity, but with praise.”

Antony was greatly enraged at this speech, and summoned another meeting of the Senate, for the 19th, where he again required Cicero’s attendance ; but Cicero did not think proper to obey the summons. The Consul made a bitter invective against him, which he had been preparing ever since the last meeting, and in which he charged him with every thing his resentment could suggest : But chiefly insisted on his being not only privy to the murder of Cæsar, but the contriver of it, as well as the author of every step which the Conspirators had since taken. Cicero assures us, that his intention was to inflame the soldiers to some violence, whom he had placed for that purpose about the avenues of the temple of Concord, where the Senate met, and within hearing even of their debates. This determined him immediately to retire from Rome, and its neighbourhood, to his furthest villa’s near Naples, where he composed his second Philippic, by way of reply to Antony, not

not delivered in the Senate, as the tenor of it seems to imply, but ^{Y. R. 709.} finished in the country, nor intended to be published, till things were ^{Bef. Chr.} actually come to extremity. The oration is a most bitter invective on ^{43.} Antony's whole life, describing it as a perpetual scene of lewdness, faction, ⁴⁰⁸ violence, rapine, heightened with all the colours of wit and eloquence. ^{Conf.}

Brutus and Cassius, during these transactions, at last, clearly seeing ^{Middl. p.} that Antony meditated nothing but war, and that their affairs were grow- ^{321.} ing daily more and more desperate, left Italy: And they took occasion, a little before their departure, to write the following letter in common to Antony:

BRUTUS and CASSIUS, Prætors, to ANTONY, Consul.

“ IF you are in good health, it is a pleasure to us. We have read “ your letter, exactly of a piece with your edict, abusive, threatening, “ wholly unworthy to be sent from you to us. For our part, Antony, “ we have never done you any injury; nor imagined that you would “ think it strange that Prætors and men of our rank should require any “ thing, by edict, of a Consul. But, if you are angry that we have “ presumed to do it, give us leave to be concerned that you would not “ indulge that privilege at least to Brutus and Cassius: For, as to our “ raising troops, exacting contributions, soliciting armies, sending ex“ presses beyond sea; since you deny that you ever complained of “ it, we believe you; and take it as a proof of your good intention:
 “ We do not, indeed, own any such practices; yet think it strange,
 “ when you objected nothing of that kind, that you could not contain “ yourself from reproaching us with the death of Cæsar. Consider with “ yourself, whether it is to be endured, that, for the sake of the pub“ lic quiet and liberty, Prætors cannot depart from their rights by E“ dict, but the Consul must threaten them with arms. Do not think
 “ to frighten us with such threats: It is not agreeable to our character
 “ to be moved by any danger: Nor must Antony pretend to command “ those by whose means he now lives free. If there were other reasons “ to dispose us to raise a civil war, your letter would have no effect to “ hinder it: For threats can have no influence on those who are free.
 “ But you know very well that it is not possible for us to be driven to “ any thing against our will; and for that reason, perhaps, you threaten,
 “ that, whatever we do, it may seem to be the effect of fear. These “ then are our sentiments: We wish to see you live with honour and “ splendor in a free Republic; have no desire to quarrel with you;
 “ yet value our liberty more than your friendship. It is your business “ to consider again and again what you attempt, and what you can main“ tain; and to reflect, not how long Cæsar lived, but how short a time
 “ he reigned: We pray the Gods that your counsels may be salutary “ both to the Republic and to yourself; if not, wish, at least, that “ they

Y. R. 709. "they may hurt you as little as may consist with the safety and dignity
 Ref. Chr. "of the Republic. August the 4th."

43.
 408 Conf.

Middl. p.
 213

The two Prætors were to succeed of course to the government of some province at the expiration of their office. Cæsar had intended Macedonia for Brutus, and Syria for Cassius: But as these were two of the most important commands of the Empire, and would throw a great power into their hands, at a time when their enemies were taking measures to destroy them; so Antony contrived to get two other provinces of an inferior kind decreed to them, Crete to Brutus, and Cyrene to Cassius; and, by a law of the people, procured Macedonia and Syria to be conferred upon himself and his colleague Dolabella; in consequence of which, he sent his brother Caius in all haste, to possess himself of the first, and Dolabella to secure the second, before their rivals could be in a condition to seize them by force, of which they were greatly apprehensive; taking it for granted that this was the project which Brutus and Cassius were now meditating. Cassius had acquired a great reputation in the East by his conduct in the Parthian war, and Brutus was highly honoured in Greece for his reputation of virtue and love of philosophy: They resolved therefore to slight the petty provinces which were granted to them, and to try their fortunes in the more powerful ones that Cæsar had promised them: And with that view had provided the fleets above-mentioned, to transport themselves to those countries, which they had destined for the scene of action; Brutus to Macedonia, Cassius to Syria; where we shall soon have occasion to give a farther account of their success.

Fp. Fam.
 xii. 2.
 Melm. xii.
 24.

The desperate state of the party of the Conspirators, at this time, cannot be better represented than by giving the reader a letter of Cicero to Cassius: "It gives me great pleasure to find that my late speech [his first Philippic] "has received your approbation. If I could more frequently enforce the same sentiments, the liberties of the Republic "might easily be recovered. But that far more desperate and detestable scoundrel [Antony] than he at whose death you said, the worst of all villains is expired, is watching for a pretence to begin his murderous purposes: And his single view in charging me with having "advised the killing of Cæsar is merely to excite the veteran soldiers "against my life. But this is a danger which I am not afraid to hazard, "since he gives me a share with you in the honour of that glorious deed. Hence it is, however, that neither Piso, who first ventured to "inveigh against the measures of Antony; nor myself, who made a "speech afterwards to the same purpose, about a month afterwards; "nor P. Servilius, who followed my example, can any of us appear "with safety in the Senate. For this inhuman gladiator has evidently "a design upon our lives, and he hoped to have rendered me the first "victim of his cruel vengeance. With this sanguinary view he entered
 " the

“ the Senate on the 19th of September, having several days before re“ tired to the villa of Metellus, in order to prepare an inflammatory “ speech against me. But who shall reconcile the silent meditations of “ eloquence with the noisy revels of lewdness and debauchery? Ac“ cordingly, it was the opinion of all his audience, that he could not “ so properly be said to have delivered a speech, as to have discharged, “ with his usual indecency, the horrid fumes of his scandalous intem“ perance.

“ You are persuaded, you tell me, that my credit and eloquence will be “ able to produce some good effect. And some indeed it has produced, “ considering the sad situation of our affairs. It has rendered the people “ sensible that there are three persons of consular rank, who, because “ they are in the interest of the Republic, and have spoken their senti“ ments in the Senate with freedom, cannot attend that assembly with“ out the danger of being assassinated. And this is all the good you are “ to expect from my oratory. A certain relation of yours ^b is so capti“ vated with his new alliance, that he no longer concerns himself in the “ success of your games; but, on the contrary, is mortified at those “ peals of applause with which your brother ^c was distinguished. Ano“ ther of your family has been softened by some grants, which it is pre“ tended that Cæsar had designed to confer upon him. This, howe“ ver, might be borne with patience: But is it not utterly beyond all “ endurance, that there should be a man, who dares openly to avow that “ he supports the measures of that scoundrel Antony, with the hopes “ that his son will be chosen Consul, when you and Brutus are intitled to “ be Candidates for that office? As to our friend L. Cella, a fatal des“ pair (for so he terms it himself) has almost intirely driven him from “ the Senate. L. Cæsar, that firm and excellent patriot, is prevented “ from coming thither by his ill state of health: And S. Sulpicius, who “ is a true friend to the cause of liberty, and whose authority might be “ of infinite service in the present conjuncture, is unhappily absent from “ Rome. After having mentioned these, I must take the liberty to say, “ that I cannot add any others, excepting the Consuls elect, who may “ be justly deemed as well-wishers to the Republic. The truth is, these “ are the only persons upon whose advice and authority the Com“ monwealth can depend. And small, indeed, would their number “ be, even in the best of times: How unequal then must their strength “ be found, to combat against the worst? All our hopes, therefore, “ rest intirely upon you and Brutus; I mean, if you have not withdrawn “ from us with a view only to your own preservation: For, if that should “ be the case, we have nothing, alas! to hope neither from Brutus nor “ from you. But if, on the contrary, you are forming some glorious

^b Lepidus is supposed to be the person here meant. He was related to Cassius by his own marriage, and had lately married his son to Antony's daughter. Melm.

^c He conducted the games which Cassius gave as Prætor.

Y. R. 709. "enterprise, worthy of your exalted characters; I doubt not but the Ref. Chr. " Republic, by your assistance, will soon recover her liberties; and I 401 Conf. " have only to wish, that I may not be destroyed ere that happy day ——— " shall arrive. In the mean time, my best services neither are, nor shall " be wanting to your family: And, whether they should apply to me
 " for that purpose, or not, I shall never fail to give them proofs of my
 " friendship towards you. Farewell."

Antony kept no longer any measures with the Republican party: He declared himself more and more openly every day against the Conspirators, and, to ingratiate himself with the veteran soldiers, threatened them in his edicts, and discovered an intention to revenge the death of Cæsar. After the decree of a religious supplication to Cæsar, and parental obsequies above-mentioned, he erected a statue in the Rostra, and inscribed it, To the most worthy Parent of his country. These acts were so many public and solemn declarations, that the Conspirators were not only murderers, but parricides. All the hopes, therefore, of the Republicans were now grounded in the quarrel between Antony and Octavius. The latter, perceiving there was nothing to be done for him in the city against a Consul armed with supreme power both civil and military, formed a design against Antony's life, and actually provided certain slaves to assassinate him, who were discovered and seized with poniards in Antony's house, as they were watching an opportunity to execute their plot. The story was supposed by many to be forged by Antony, to justify his treatment of Octavius, and his depriving him of the estate of his uncle: But the greatest part of the old writers treat it as an undoubted fact, and Cicero says, that all men of sense both believed and applauded it. These two Chiefs of the Cæsareans now made open preparations for war. Antony left Rome in the beginning of October, in order to meet and engage in his service four legions from Macedonia, which had been sent thither by Cæsar on their way to Parthia, and were now, by his orders, returning to Italy. Octavius, on his side, sent also some of his adherents, with money, to engage them to prefer his service to Antony's, while he himself went into Campania, to solicit the veterans distributed in the colonies about Capua. Those of Calatia and Casilinum immediately joined him, to the number of 1000, to each of whom he distributed 500 denarii: These were afterwards called Evocati. Antony was not so well received at Brundisium, where he arrived the 8th of October: For the soldiers, discontented with his behaviour towards the Conspirators, received him without any signs of joy, and followed him in silence to his tribunal, to hear what he had to say for himself. He began by reproaching them with their ingratitude, in not being sensible of their obligations to him, who, instead of sending them upon an expedition to Parthia, brought them into Italy; but when he came to the point, and offered them only 100 denarii, whilst Octavius gave five times as much to those who followed him, they all left his tribunal. This affront put him him into such a rage, that, calling together the Centurions, whom he suspected to be the authors of their disaffection, he ordered them to be massacred in his own lodgings, while he and his wife Fulvia stood calmly looking on. Octavius's emissaries greatly profited by this mad behaviour, and spread among the soldiers billets in which they compared the usage they had met with from Cæsar, and what they might expect from his son and heir, with this treatment of Antony. All he could do by his promises and threats was to engage the legion of the *Alaudæ to follow him: The other three, without taking his money or giving him any mark of affection, took their route along the Adriatic coast, without declaring yet for any side.

Antony staid in those parts till the end of October. Octavius, on his side, was very active in soliciting the veterans in all the colonies, and was equally pressing to gain the Republicans over to his interest, and particularly Cicero, by whose influence he hoped to gain the others, offering to be their head against Antony. He wrote, therefore, letter after letter to *Cicero*¹ to assure him of his good dispositions, and to ask his advice,

O O 2

* This legion was raised by J. Cæsar and composed of the natives of Gaul armed and disciplined after the Roman manner, to which he gave the freedom of Rome. He called it by a Gallic name Alaudæ; which signifies a kind of lark or little bird with a tuft or crest rising upon its head: In imitation of which this legion wore a crest of feathers on the helmet; from which origin the word was adopted into the Latin tongue. Antony, out of compliment to these troops, and to assure himself of their fidelity, had lately made a judiciary law, by which he erected a third class of Judges, to be drawn from the officers of this legion, and added to the other two of Senators and Knights; for which Cicero often reproaches him as a most infamous prostitution of the dignity of the Republic. Philipp. i. 8. Middl. p. 325.

¹ "I had two letters the same day from Octavius; he presses me to come immediately to Rome; is resolved, he says, to do nothing without the Senate.—I tell him that there can be no Senate till the 1st of January, which I take to be true. He adds also: Nor without my advice. In a word, he urges: I hang back: I cannot trust his age; do not know his real intentions; will do nothing without Pansa; am afraid that Antony may prove too strong for him; and therefore unwilling to stir from the sea; yet would not have any thing vigorous done without me. Varro does not like the conduct of the boy, but I do. He has firm troops, and may join with D. Brutus: What he does he does openly; musters his troops at Capua; pays them; we shall have a war, I see, instantly." Ad Att. xvi. 9.

"I have letters every day from Octavius, to undertake his affairs; to come to him at Capua; to save the State a second time: He resolves to come directly to Rome.

"Urg'd to the fight, 'tis shameful to refuse, Whilst fear yet prompts the safer part to chuse." Hem. II. vii.

"He has hitherto acted, and acts still with vigour, and will come to Rome with a great force. Yet he is but a boy: He thinks the Senate may be called immediately: But who will come? or, if they do, who, in this uncertainty of affairs, will declare against Antony? He will be a good guard to us on the 1st of January; or it may come, perhaps, to blows before. The great towns favour the boy strangely—They flock to him from all parts, and exhort him to proceed: Could you ever have thought it?" Ibid. 11. They were not therefore so much in the interest of the Conspirators, as Cicero sometimes affirms.

In the hurry of all these politics, he was prosecuting his studies still with his usual application; and, besides the second Philippic already mentioned, now finished his book of Offices,

Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr.43.
408 Conf.Philipp. ii.
et v.

A. P. 7.

651.

Y. R. 723. advice, whether he should advance to Rome, before Antony's return, with
 B. C. 43. 3000 veterans, or keep the post of Cepus and oppose his progress there;
 408. Cons. or go to the Macedonian legions, who were marching along the Adri- ——— atic sea, and who, he hoped, were in his interest. Cicero advised him to march to Rome, where he was likely to have the lower people on his side. He did so, and, being produced in the Rejira by the Tribune Ca- natius, made a speech against Antony, declaring that he came to deliver the Republic from his oppression: He nevertheless let drop some expressions which greatly startled the Republicans: For, stretching out his hand to Cæsar's statue, he made use of this oath: So may I arrive at the honour of my father. He did not think proper to wait Antony's return, but left the city to join the rest of his soldiers.

Antony, in his way back to Rome, marched with colours displayed, and raised contributions in all the great towns: He entered the city at the head of his legion, and posted it about his own house, giving the word of command, and obliging them to do duty as in a camp. He published at the same time several fierce and threatening edicts, in which he gave Octavius the name of Spartacus; reproached him with the ignobleness of his birth; charged Cicero with being the author of all his councils; abused young Quintus as a perfidious wretch, who had offered to kill both his father and uncle; tormented three of the Tribunes, under pain of death, to appear in the Senate; Q. Cassius, the brother of the Conspirator, Carfulenus, and Caninius. In this humour he summoned the Senate on the 24th of November, with severe threats to those who should absent themselves; yet he himself neglected to come, and adjourned it by edict till the 28th. But, while all people were in expectation of some extraordinary decrees from him, and of one particularly, which he had prepared, to declare young Cæsar a public enemy; he happened to receive the news that two of the legions from Brundisium, the fourth, and that called the Martial, had actually declared for Octavius, and had posted themselves at Alba in the neighbourhood of Rome. This shocked him so much, that, instead of prosecuting what he had projected, he only huddled over what nobody opposed, the decree of a supplication to Lepidus; and the same evening, after he had distributed to his friends, by a pretended allotment, the several provinces of the Empire, which few or none of them durst accept from so precarious a title, he changed the habit of the Consul for that of a General, and left the city with precipitation, to put himself at the head of his army, and possess himself by force of Cisalpine Gaul, assigned to him by a pretended law of the People, against the will of the Senate.

On the news of his retreat, Cicero presently quitted his books and the country, and set out towards Rome. He seemed to be called by the Offices, or the Duties of man, for the use of his son. He now also drew up, as it is thought, his Stoical Paradoxes or an illustration of the peculiar doctrines of that sect, from the examples and characters of their own countrymen, which he addressed to Brutus. Middl. p. 327.

voice

voice of the Republic, to take the reins once more into his hands. The field was now open to him; there was not a Consul, and scarce a single Prætor in the city, nor any troops from which he could apprehend danger. He arrived on the 9th of December, and immediately conferred with Pansa (for Hirtius lay very ill) about the measures proper to be taken on their approaching entrance into the consulship. Before his leaving the country, Oppius had been with him to press him again to undertake the affairs of Octavius and the protection of his troops: But his answer was, "that he could not consent to it, unless he were first assured, that Octavius would not only be no enemy, but even a friend to Brutus; that he could be of no service to Octavius till the 1st of January, and there would be an opportunity before that time of trying Octavius's disposition in the case of Cæsa, who had been named by Cæsar to the tribunate, and was to enter upon it on the 10th of December: For, if Octavius did not oppose or disturb his admission, that would be a proof of his good intentions." Oppius undertook for all this on the part of Octavius, and Octavius himself confirmed it, and suffered Cæsa, who gave the first blow to Cæsar, to enter quietly into his office. The Tribunes, in the mean time, in the absence of the superior magistrates, called a meeting of the Senate on the 19th. Cicero had resolved not to appear there any more till he should be supported by the new Consuls; but happening to receive, the day before, the edict of D. Brutus, by which he prohibited Antony the entrance of his province, and declared that he would defend it against him by force, and preserve it in its duty to the Senate, he thought it necessary for the public service and the present encouragement of Brutus, to procure, as soon as possible, some public declaration in his favour: He went, therefore, to the Senate very early, which, being known to the other Senators, presently drew together a full house, in expectation of hearing his sentiments in so nice and critical a situation of the public affairs.

The Senate being assembled, the Tribunes acquainted them, that the business of that meeting was to provide a guard for the security of the new Consuls, and the protection of the Senate, in the freedom of their debates; but that they gave a liberty withal of taking the whole State of the Republic into consideration. Upon this Cicero opened the debate, and represented to them "the danger of their present condition, "and the necessity of speedy and resolute councils against an enemy, "who lost no time in attempting their ruin. That they had been ruined "indeed before, had it not been for the courage and virtue of young "Cæsar, who, contrary to all expectation, and without being even desired to do what no man thought possible for him to do, had, by "his private authority and expence, raised a strong army of veterans, "and baffled the designs of Antony: That if Antony had succeeded at "Brundisium, and prevailed with the legions to follow him, he would "have filled the city at his return with blood and slaughter: That it " was.

Y. R. 709.
Bel. Clu.
43.
408 Cor. f.

Ad Ant.
xvi. 15

Y. R. 709 " was their part to authorise and confirm what Cæsar had done, and to Ref. Chr. " impower him to do more, by employing his troops in the farther service
 43. " of the State; and to make a special provision also for the two legions 408 Conf. " which declared for him against Antony. As to D. Brutus, who had pro" mised by edict to preserve Gaul in the obedience of the Senate, that he " was a citizen born for the good of the Republic; the imitator of his " ancestors; nay, had even exceeded their merit: That it was necessary
 " therefore to confirm by public authority what Brutus had done by " private, in preserving the province of Gaul, the flower of Italy, and " the bulwark of the empire. Then, after largely inveighing against
 " Antony's character, and enumerating particularly all his cruelties and
 " violences, he exhorts them, in a pathetic manner, to act with cou" rage in the defence of the Republic, or die bravely in the attempt:
 " That now was the time either to recover their liberty, or to live for " ever slaves: That if the fatal day was come, and Rome was destined " to perish, it would be a shame for them, the Governors of the world,
 " not to fall with as much courage as gladiators were used to do, and
 " die with dignity rather than live with disgrace. He puts them in mind " of the many advantages which they had towards encouraging their " hopes and resolution: The body of the people alert and eager in the " cause; young Cæsar in the guard of the city; Brutus of Gaul; two " Consuls of the greatest prudence, virtue, concord between themselves;
 " who had been meditating nothing else, for many months past, but the " public tranquillity: To all which he promises his own attention and " vigilance both day and night for their safety. On the whole, there" fore, he gives his vote and opinion that the new Consuls C. Pansa and " A. Hirtius should take care that the Senate may meet with security on " the 1st of January: That D. Brutus, Emperor and Consul elect, had " merited greatly of the Republic, by defending the authority and the " liberty of the Senate and People of Rome: That his army, the towns
 " and colonies of his province, should be publicly thanked and praised " for their fidelity to him: That it should be decreed of the last conse" quence to the Republic, that D. Brutus and L. Plancus (who com" manded the farther Gaul) Emperor and Consul elect, as well as all
 " others, who had the command of provinces, should keep them in their " duty to the Senate, till successors were appointed by the Senate: And " since, by the pains, virtue, and conduct of young Cæsar, and the as" sistance of the veteran soldiers who followed him, the Republic had " been delivered, and was still defended from the greatest dangers; and " since the Martial and fourth legions, under that excellent citizen and " Quæstor Egnatuleius, had voluntarily declared for the authority of the " Senate, and the liberty of the people; that the Senate should take " special care that due honours and thanks be paid to them for their " eminent services: And that the new Consuls, on their entrance into " office, should make it their first business to see all this executed in " proper

“ proper form.” To all this the House unanimously agreed, and ordered Y. R. 709.
Bef. Chr. a decree to be drawn conformably to his opinion.

From the Senate he passed directly to the Forum, and, in a speech 43.
408 Conf. to the people, gave an account of what had passed. Those speeches, which stand the third and fourth in the order of his Philippics, were extremely well received by the Senate and People; speaking afterwards Philipp. vi. of the latter of them to the same People, he says: If that day had put an end to my life, I had reaped sufficient fruit from it, when you all, with one mind and voice, cried out, that I had twice saved the Republic. As he had now broken all measures with Antony, beyond the possibility of a reconciliation, so he published, probably, about this time, his second Philippic, which had hitherto been communicated only to a few friends.

The short remainder of this turbulent year was spent in preparing arms and troops for the guard of the new Consuls and the defence of the State: And the new levies were carried on with the greater diligence, from the certain accounts that were brought to Rome that Antony was actually besieging Mutina, into which Brutus, unable to oppose him in the field, had thrown himself with all his forces, as the strongest town of his province, and the best provided to sustain a siege. Young Cæsar, in the mean while, without expecting the orders of the Senate, but with the advice of Cicero, by which he pretended to govern himself in every step, marched out of Rome at the head of his troops, and followed Antony into the province; in order to observe his motions, and take all occasions of distressing him; as well as to encourage Brutus to defend himself with vigour till the Consuls could bring up the grand army, which they were preparing for his relief.

C H A P. XIII.

The Senate sends an embassy to Antony with peremptory orders to raise the siege of Mutina, and Hirtius marches at the head of an army to join Octavius. Antony refuses to comply with the orders of the Senate, and his proposals are reciprocally rejected: It is voted that there is a tumult: That Antony is an adversary, and that the town shall take the Sagum. M. Brutus's success in Macedonia. Trebonius surprised and killed by Dolabella in Asia, who is voted a public enemy by the Senate. Cassius makes himself master of Syria and all the forces in the East. Lepidus exhorts the Senate to pacific measures; and Antony endeavours to draw off the Consuls and Octavius from the interest of Cicero and his party without effect. Two successive battles in which Antony is defeated, and both Consuls lose their lives.

A. HIRTIUS,
C. VIBIUS PANSA, } Consuls.

THE

V. R. 12.
 125. 126.
 42.
 409. Cons.

THE two Consuls were no sooner inaugurated, than the Senate assembled to consider of the present state of the Republic, in order to perfect what had been resolved upon at their last meeting, and to contrive some farther means for the security of the public tranquillity. They both spoke with great spirit and firmness, offering themselves as leaders, in asserting the liberty of their country, and exhorting the assembly to courage and resolution in the defence of so good a cause², and, when they had done, they called upon Q. Lælius Calenus, to deliver his sentiments the first. He had been Consul four years before, and was father-in-law to Pansa, which, by custom, was a sufficient ground for paying him that compliment. Calenus's opinion was, that, before they proceeded to acts of hostility, they should send an embassy to Antony, to admonish him to desist from his attempt upon Gaul, and submit to the authority of the Senate. Piso and several others were of the same mind, alledging it to be unjust and cruel to condemn a man, till they had first heard what he had to say for himself.

Phil. v. 1, 2, 3.

But Cicero, in a speech which makes his fifth Philippic, opposed this motion with great warmth, “not only as vain and foolish, but dangerous and pernicious: He declared it dishonourable to treat with any one who was in arms against his country, until he laid them down, and sued for peace, in which case no man would be more moderate or equitable than himself: That they had in effect proclaimed him an enemy already, and had nothing left but to confirm it by decree. That, whatever was the purpose of their embassy or message, it would signify nothing; if, to beg him to be quiet, he would despise it; if, to command him, he would not obey it.—That, without any possible good, it would be a certain damage; would necessarily create delay, and obstruction to the operations of the war; check the zeal of the army, damp the spirits of the people, whom they now saw so brisk and eager in the cause. That his opinion therefore was to make no farther mention of an embassy, but to enter instantly into action; that there should be a cessation of all civil business; a public tumult proclaimed; the shops shut up; and that, instead of their usual gown, they should all put on the Sagum, or habit of war; and that levies of soldiers should be made in Rome, and through Italy, without any exception of privilege or dismissal from service.—That the very fame of this vigour would restrain the madness of Antony, and let the world see that the case was not, as he pretended, a struggle only of contending parties, but a real war against the Commonwealth.—That the whole Republic should be committed to the Consuls, to take care that it received no detriment; and that pardon should be offered to those of Antony's army, who should return to their duty

² Ut oratio consulum animum meum crexit, spemque attulit non modo salutis conferenda verum etiam dignitatis pristinae recuperandae. Phil. v. 1.

“ before

“before the 1st of February.”—The Consuls favoured the opinion of Cæ-lenus, but did not suffer the question to be put to the vote, seeing a clear majority on the side of Cicero *. The debate, being continued till night, was adjourned to the next morning, and kept up with the same warmth for three days successively. The firmness of Antony’s friends, and the reasonableness of the proposal, prevailed at last for an embassy;
and three Consular Senators were nominated to it, S. Sulpitius, L. Pijus, and L. Philippus. But their commission was strictly limited, and drawn up by Cicero himself; giving them no power to treat with Antony, but only to carry to him the peremptory commands of the Senate to quit the siege of Mutina, and to desist from all hostilities in Gaul. They had instructions likewise, after the delivery of their message, to speak with D. Brutus in Mutina, and signify to him and his army, that the Senate and people had a grateful sense of their services, which would one day be a great honour to them. The unusual length of these debates greatly raised the curiosity of the city, and drew the whole body of the people into the Forum, to expect the issue; where they called upon Cicero, with one voice, to come and give them an account of the deli-rations. He went therefore directly from the Senate into the Rostra, being produced by Aspuleius, the Tribune, and pronounced his sixth Philippic. His seventh he pronounced in the Senate, during the embassy, to lay open the intrigues of Calenus, who was endeavouring to obviate the offence which might be given by Antony’s refusal to comply with what was enjoined; contriving specious answers for him, and representing them as a reasonable ground of an accommodation, in hopes to cool the ardour of the city for the prosecution of the war. He kept a constant correspondence with Antony, and took care to publish such of his letters as were proper to depress the hopes and courage of his adversaries, and keep up the spirits of his friends.

The Consuls in the mean while were taking care that the expectation of the effect of the embassy should not supersede their preparations for war; and agreed between themselves, that one of them should march immediately to Gaul with the troops which were already provided, and the other stay behind to perfect the new levies, which were carried on with great success both in the city and the country: For Cicero tells us, that all the capital towns of Italy were vying with each other in voluntary contributions of money and soldiers; and in decrees of infamy and disgrace to those who refused to list themselves into the public service.
The first part fell by lot to Hirtius; who, though but lately recovered from a dangerous disorder, marched without loss of time at the head of a brave army; and particularly of the two legions, the Marjial and the fourth, which were esteemed the flower and strength of the whole, and now put themselves under the command and auspices of the Consul: And this seems to prove that there was a good understanding

* Aspin says, that Solvius, one of the Tribunes, interposed his negative.

Y. R. 710. between Hirtius and Octavius; and that the last could rely upon the
 B. C. Chr. Consul^a. With these, in conjunction with Octavius, he hoped to ob-
 42. 4-9 Conf. struct all the designs of Antony, and prevent his gaining any advantage — against Decimus, till Pansa could join them; which would make them superior in force, and enable them to give him battle, with good assurance of victory. He contented himself, in the mean while, with dis-possessing Antony of some of his posts, and distressing him, by straitening his quarters and opportunities of forage; in which he had some success, as he signified in a letter to his colleague Pansa, which was communicated to the Senate: “I have possessed myself, says he, of Claterna, and “driven out Antony’s garrison; his horse were routed in the action, and some of them slain.”

Phomp. m. 2. The ambassadors returned about the beginning of February, having 332. been retarded, somewhat longer than they intended, by the death of S. Sulpicius. They reported to the Senate, that Antony refused to perform any part of what was required, and would not suffer them to speak with Brutus, but continued to batter the town with great fury in their presence: And they laid before the assembly some conditions of his own, which, contrary to their instructions, they were weak enough to receive from him^b. The purport of them was, “that the Senate should as“sign lands and rewards to all his troops, and confirm all the other “grants which he and Dolabella had made in their consulship; that all “his decrees from Cæsar’s books and papers should stand firm; that “no account should be demanded of the money taken from the temple
 “of Opis; nor any inquiry made into the conduct of the seven Com“missioners created to divide the lands to the veteran soldiers; and that “his judiciary law should not be repealed: On these terms he offered “to give up Cisalpine Gaul, provided that he might have the greater “Gaul in exchange for five years, with an army of six legions, to be “completed out of the troops of D. Brutus.” This report contributed greatly towards bringing the house into Cicero’s sentiments;
 but, contrary to expectation, he found Calpurnius’s party still strong enough to give him much trouble, and even to carry some points against him,

^a Cicero, in one of his letters to Brutus, says that the conduct of Octavius was truer to the interest of the state than that of Hirtius’s; which only proves that Octavius was a better dissembler.

^b Appian tells us, that the Commissioners, ashamed to have brought Antony so insolent a command, delivered it into his hands without saying a word. That Antony at sight of it fell into a rage, and uttered many violent threats against the Senate, and Cicero in particular; telling the deputies that it amazed him that Cæsar, who had done such mighty services to the Roman Empire, should be esteemed a tyrant, and that men should not have the same opinion of Cicero, who, having been made a prisoner of war and pardoned, now sided with the murderers of his merciful conqueror; favouring Decimus, whom he a little before detested; and supporting in the government of Gaul the man named by the pretended tyrant against the Consul named by the people; that he had consented to the amnesty for the sake of two men, whom he respected; but that he would annul that indemnity, with which they were not content.

all tending to soften the rigour of his motions, and to give them a favourable turn towards Antony. He moved the Senate to decree that a war or rebellion was actually commenced; they carried it for a tumult: He urged them to declare Antony an enemy; they carried it for the softer term of an adversary: He proposed, that all persons should be prohibited from going to Antony; they excepted Varius Cotyla, one of his Lieutenants, who was then in the Senate, taking notes of every thing that passed. In these votes Paſſa himself and all the Consular Senators concurred; even L. Caesar, who, though a true friend to liberty, yet, being Antony's uncle, thought himself obliged by decency to vote on the milder side. But Cicero, in his turn, easily threw out, what was warmly pressed on the other side, the proposal of a second embassy; and carried likewise the main question, of requiring the citizens to change their ordinary gown for the sagum, or habit of war; by which they decreed the thing, while they rejected the name. Cicero, though all Consular Senators were excused on these occasions from changing their habit, put it on immediately. In a letter to Cassius, he gives the following short account of the state of things at this time. “We have excellent Consuls, but most shameful Consuls: A brave Senate, but the lower they are in dignity, the braver: Nothing firmer and better than the people, and all Italy universally: But nothing more detestable and infamous than our ambassadors Philip and Piso; who, when sent only to carry the orders of the Senate to Antony, none of which he would comply with, brought back of their own accord intolerable demands from him; wherefore all the world now flock about me, and I am grown popular in a salutary cause.” The Senate met again the next day to draw into form and perfect what had been resolved in the preceding debate, and Cicero took the occasion to expostulate with them for their lenity the day before, which is the subject of his 8th Philippic. The ninth was pronounced the day following, the Senate being assembled to deliberate on the proper honours to be decreed to the memory of Sulpicius, who died upon the embassy: Cicero, after speaking largely in his praise, advised to pay him all the honours which had ever been paid to any who had lost their lives in the service of their country; a public funeral, sepulchre, and statue. The statue was objected to by Servilius, but Cicero carried it; and we are told by a writer of the third century, that it remained to his time in the Rostra of Augustus ^P.

Y. R. 710.

Bel. Chr.

42.

409 Conf.

Phil. xii. 7.

Philip. viii.

1, 10.

Ep. Fam.

xii. 4.

Belin. xiii.

6.

Pomponius

de origine

juris.

The Senate had heard nothing of Brutus and Cassius from the time of their leaving Italy, till Brutus now sent public letters to the Consuls, giving a particular account of his success against Antony's brother Caius, in securing Macedonia, Illyricum, and Greece, with all the several armies in those countries, to the interests of the Republic. Brutus, when he left Italy, sailed directly for Athens; where he spent some time in concerting

^P He was esteemed the ablest lawyer in Rome, and left behind him near a hundred and eighty books on nice and difficult questions of the law. Digest. l. i. tit. 2. parag. 43.

V. R. 710. measures how to accomplish this design^a. Here he gathered about Def. Chr. him all the young Nobility and Gentry of Rome, who on account of
 422. their education had been sent to this celebrated school of learning; and
 405. Conf. among the rest M. Cicero, whom he made one of his Lieutenants, tho' he was but twenty years old, and of whom he gives in his public and private letters a very great character^b. Many of Pompey's soldiers, who had fought at Pharsalia, and were dispersed in the country, readily joined a General who defended the same cause. A legion commanded by L. Piso, one of C. Antony's Lieutenants, surrendered itself to young Cicero. Some stragglers of Delabella's army, and two separate bodies of his horse in their march through Thessaly and Macedonia, deserted their leaders, and came over to him; but what chiefly strengthened him was the accession of Q. Hortensius, the Proconsul of Macedonia; who, instead of keeping the province for Antony's brother, delivered it up to Brutus, together with the command of all the troops. These forces were soon considerably augmented by three legions, under the command of Vatinius, who had been sent by Cæsar into Illyricum to suppress some commotions there. But the people of the country, upon the news of Cæsar's death, attacked him, and forced him to retire to Dyrrhachium. During these transactions, C. Antonius arrived at Apollonia, with seven cohorts, and set out immediately to secure the troops under Vatinius, but Brutus got there before him; and Vatinius, knowing the troops to be well affected to his enemy, opened the gates, and delivered them up to him. Brutus's^c letters informed the Consuls of this success, and he promised soon to give a good account of Antony himself.

VL. ill. p. 164. Pansa no sooner received the letters, than he summoned the Senate to acquaint them with the contents. After they were read, the Consul

^a D. c. l. 47, tells us, that he and Cassius were received at Athens with all imaginable honours, and that the Athenians erected statues to them, which they placed near those of Harmodius and Aristogiton, who had formerly delivered their state from tyranny.

^b He took also into his service young Hirax, whose father, though no more than a freedman and a collector of taxes by profession, gave him an equal education with the Senators children: He served in the rank of military Tribune.

^c Brutus C. Antonio fratri M. Antonii in Macedonia, Vatinioque circa Dyrrhachium violentes legiones extorserat; sed Antonium bello laceraverat; Vatinium dignatione obruerat; cum & Brutus cui libet ducum præferendus videretur, et Vatinius nulli nomini non esset postferendus. Vel. Pat. ii. 69. This is the last time we hear any thing of Vatinius: He died probably soon after. The severe censure of Paterculus is grounded probably on the abuse contained in Cicero's invective against him, where he says, no one could look upon him without a sigh, or speak of him without execration; that he was the dread of his neighbours, the disgrace of his kindred, and the utter abhorrence of the public in general. At least his behaviour both in the city and the field shew him to have been a man of spirit and parts; and perhaps his moral character was not so bad as the orator has painted it: The same Cicero, in a letter to Vatinius, Fam. v. 11, writes in the following strain:

“I am by no means surprised to find “that you are sensible of my services; on “the contrary, I perfectly well know, and “you have upon all occasions declared, “that no man ever possessed a more grate“ful heart . . . and there is no employ“ment in which I can be engaged upon “your account, that I shall not think both “easy and honourable.”

spoke

spoke largely in the praises of Brutus; extolled his conduct and services; and moved that public honours and thanks should be decreed to him: And then, according to his custom, called upon his father-in-law Calpurnius to declare his sentiments the first, who, in a premeditated speech delivered from writing, acknowledged “Brutus’s letters to be well and properly drawn; but, since what he had done was done without any commission and public authority, that he should be required to deliver up his forces to the orders of the Senate, or the proper Governors of the provinces.” Cicero spoke next, and pronounced his tenth Philippic, which is an expostulation with Calpurnius, on account of his enmity to the Brutus’s, and a panegyric upon the whole conduct of M. Brutus, which he concluded by proposing the following decree: “Whereas, by the pains, counsel, industry, and virtue of Q. Cæpio Brutus, Proconsul, in the utmost distress of the Republic, the province of Macedonia, Illyricum, and Greece, with all their legions, armies, horse, are now in the power of the Consuls, Senate, and People of Rome; that Q. Cæpio Brutus, Proconsul, has acted therein well, and for the good of the Republic; agreeably to his character, the dignity of his ancestors, and to his usual manner of serving the Commonwealth; and that his conduct is, and ever will be, acceptable to the Senate and People of Rome. That Q. Cæpio Brutus, Proconsul, be ordered to protect, guard, and defend the province of Macedonia, Illyricum, and all Greece, and command that army which he himself has raised: That, whatever money he wants for military service, he may use and take it from any part of the public revenues where it can be best raised; or borrow it where he thinks proper; and impose contributions of grain and forage; and take care to draw all his troops as near Italy as possible. And whereas it appears, by the letter of Q. Cæpio Brutus, Proconsul, that the public service has been greatly advanced by the endeavours and virtue of Q. Hortensius, Proconsul; and that he concerted all his measures with Q. Cæpio Brutus, Proconsul, to the great benefit of the Commonwealth; that Q. Hortensius, Proconsul, has acted therein rightly, regularly, and for the public good: And it is the will of the Senate, that Q. Hortensius, Proconsul, with his Quæstors, Proquæstors, and Lieutenants, hold the province of Macedonia, till a successor be appointed by the Senate.”

It appears that M. Brutus had been lately adopted by his mother’s brother, Q. Servilius Cæpio, whose name, according to custom, he now assumed, with the possession of his uncle’s estate.

Cicero sent this speech to Brutus, with that also which he made on the 1st of January; of which Brutus says in answer to him, “I have read your two orations: You expect now, without doubt, that I should praise them: I am at a loss what to praise the most in them, your courage, or your abilities: I allow you now in earnest to call them Philippics, as you intimated jokingly in a former letter.” Thus the name of Philippics, which seems to have been thrown out at first in gaiety and jest only, being taken up and propagated by his friends, became at last the fixed and standing title of these orations; which yet, for several ages, were called indifferently either Philippics, or Antonians. Middl. p. 369.

Though

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Cl.
42.
409 Conf.

Y. R. 11. 1. 1. Though Brutus intimates nothing in his public letters but what was
 B. C. 43. prosperous and encouraging, yet, in his private accounts to Cicero, he
 4. 1. 1. signified a great want of money and recruits; and begged to be supplied — with both from Italy, especially with recruits; either by a vote of the Senate, or, if that could not be had, by some secret management, without the privity of Pansa; to which Cicero answered, “ You tell me that A. B. C. “ you want two necessary things, recruits and money: It is difficult to “ help you. I know no other way of raising money, which can be of use “ to you, but what the Senate has decreed of borrowing from the cities.
 “ As to recruits, I do not see what can be done: For Pansa is so far from “ granting any share of his army or recruits to you, that he is even uneasy
 “ to see so many volunteers going over to you: His reason, I take it, is, that “ he thinks no forces too great for the demands of our affairs in Italy:
 “ For, as to what many suspect that he has no mind to see you strong, I “ have no suspicion of it.”

1. 1. 1. p. But there came news of a different kind, about the same time, to
 1. 1. 1. Rome, of Dolabella's successful exploits in Asia. He left the city, as it is said above, before the expiration of his consulship, to possess himself of Syria, which had been allotted to him by Antony's management: And, taking his way through Greece and Macedonia, to gather what money and troops he could raise in those countries, he passed over into Asia, in hopes of inducing that province to abandon Trebonius and declare for him: Having sent his emissaries, therefore, before him to prepare for his reception, he arrived before Smyrna, where Trebonius resided, without any shew of hostility, or forces sufficient to give any great alarm, pretending to desire nothing more than a free passage through the country to his own province. Trebonius refused to admit him into the town;
 but consented to supply him with refreshments without the gates;
 where many civilities passed between them, with great professions on Dolabella's part of amity and friendship to Trebonius, who promised, in his turn, that, if Dolabella would depart quietly from Smyrna, he should be received into Ephesus, in order to pass forward towards Syria. To this Dolabella seemingly agreed; and, finding it impracticable to take Smyrna by open force, contrived to surprise it by stratagem: Embracing therefore Trebonius's offer, he set forward towards Ephesus; but, after he had marched several miles, and Trebonius's men, who were sent after to observe him, were retired; he turned back instantly in the night, and, arriving again at Smyrna before day, found it, as he expected, negligently guarded, and without any apprehension of an assault; so that his soldiers possessed themselves of it without opposition, and seized Trebonius himself in his bed before he knew any thing of his danger. Dolabella treated him with the utmost cruelty; kept him two days under torture, to extort a discovery of all the money in his custody; then ordered his head to be cut off, and carried about on a spear; and his body to be dragged about the streets and thrown into the sea. This was the first blood
 that

that was spilt on account of Cæsar's death; which was now revenged in kind upon one of the principal Conspirators, and the only one who was of consular rank. It had been projected, without doubt, in concert with Antony, to make the revenge of Cæsar's death the avowed cause of their arms, in order to draw the veterans to their side, or make them unwilling at least to act against them: And it gave a clear warning to Brutus and his associates, what they were to expect, if their enemies prevailed, as well as a sad presage, to all honest men, of the cruel effects and merciless fury of the impending war.

On the news of Trebonius's death, the Senate was summoned by the Consul, where Dolabella was unanimously declared a public enemy, and his estate confiscated. Calenus himself first proposed the vote, and said, that, if any thing more severe could be thought of, he would be for it. But he moved another question which greatly perplexed Cicero, about the choice of a General to manage the new war against Dolabella. Two opinions were proposed; the one that P. Servilius should be sent with an extraordinary commission; the other, that the two Consuls should jointly prosecute the war, with the provinces of Syria and Asia allotted to them. This was very agreeable to Pansa, and pushed therefore not only by his friends, but by all Antony's party, who fancied that it would take off the attention of the Consuls from the war of Italy; give Dolabella time to strengthen himself in Asia; raise a coldness between the Consuls and Cicero, if he ventured to oppose it; and, above all, put a public affront upon Cassius; who, by his presence in those parts, seemed to have the best pretension to that commission. The debate continued through the first day without coming to any issue; and was adjourned to the next. In the mean time Cassius's mother-in-law, Servilia, and other friends, were endeavouring to prevail with Cicero to drop the opposition, for fear of alienating Pansa, but in vain; for he resolved at all hazards to defend the honour of Cassius, and, when the debate was renewed the next morning, exerted all his interest and eloquence to procure a decree in his favour, which is the purport of the eleventh Philippic. From the Senate he went directly to the Forum, to give the people an account of the debate, and recommend to them the interests of Cassius: Hither Pansa followed him, and, to weaken the influence of his authority, declared to the citizens, that what Cicero contended for was against the will and advice of Cassius's nearest friends and relations: And in the end the Consul prevailed*. But Cassius was at that time master of Syria, and at the head

Y. R. 710.
B. C. 42.
409 Cons.

Middl p.
375.

Ep. Fam.
of xii. 7 & 14.

* The statue of Minerva, which Cicero, upon his going into exile, had dedicated in the Capitol, by the name of the Guardian of the city, was, about the end of the last year, thrown down and shattered to pieces by a tempest of thunder and lightning. This the later writers take notice of as ominous and portending the fall of Cicero himself: Though neither Cicero nor any of that time made any such reflection upon it. The Senate, however, out of respect to him, passed a decree in a full House, on the 18th of March, that the statue should be repaired and restored to its place. Ep. Fam. xii. 15. So that

Y. R. 713. of eight legions, with which he soon put an end to Dolabella's triumphs.
 Bel. Chr. 42.

439 Conf. Syria, after the Alexandrian war, had been left by Cæsar in the hands of Sextus Cæsar, a young man of his family, with one legion. The youth having lost the affection of his soldiers, who probably had served under Pompey, Cæcilius Bassus, a Roman Knight (who as we have before mentioned, hid himself at Tyre after the battle of Pharjalia) undertook to dispossess him of his government. Having gathered a small force in the place of his retirement, he openly attacked S. Cæsar, during the African war; and, meeting with a repulse, he had recourse to intrigues, in which he succeeded so well, that Sextus was murdered by his own men, who, at the same time, took Bassus for their Chief, and put him in possession of the province. Bassus applied himself immediately to fortify Apamea, a very strong city, and there formed his arsenal. Cæsar sent against him Antistius Vetus, who besieged him in his fortress, but was obliged by the Parthians to retire. Statius Murcus, who had the government of Syria after his prætorship, with three legions, did not find himself strong enough to reduce Bassus, and called to his assistance M. Marcius Crispus, Governor of Bithynia, with three more legions, who jointly laid siege to Apamea. Things were in this situation when Cassius landed in those parts. Lentulus Spintber, Quæstor to Trebonius, supplied him with some men and money: And the two Governors readily yielded to him the six legions under their command. Bassus was forced to follow their example, and open the gates of Apamea, his soldiers having sent a deputation to Cassius with a tender of their services. This success, so great and unexpected, was soon followed by another piece of good fortune. Dolabella had sent his Lieutenant, Aulus Allienus, into Egypt, to demand the assistance of Cleopatra, who then was sole Sovereign; having lately destroyed the last of the Ptolemys, her brother and husband, by poison. The Queen sent immediately a fleet to his assistance, and Allienus conducted by land four legions. Cassius, having notice of their march, went and met him in Judea, and obliged him to give up all his troops. Thus Cassius was master of a strong army, consisting of eleven legions, before the 7th of March, the date of a letter to Cicero, giving an account of this success.

Ep. Fam.
 xii. 11.

M. J. L. p.
 383.

D. Brutus was reduced by this time to such straits in Mutina, that his friends began to be greatly alarmed for him; taking it for granted, that, if he fell into Antony's hands, he would be treated no better than Trebonius. The mention, therefore, of a pacification being revived in the Senate, and recommended by Pansa himself, upon an intimation given by Antony's friends that he was now in a disposition to submit to reason, Cicero, out of a concern for Brutus's safety, consented to a decree for a second that it was now made, by public authority, safety of the Republic had been the constant what he himself had designed it to be, a object of his counsels. M. J. L. 383.

 standing monument to posterity, that the embassy,

embassy, to be executed by himself and Servilius, and three other consular Senators: But, finding upon recollection, that there appeared no symptoms of any change in Antony, and that his friends produced no proofs of it, nor any thing new in his conduct, he was convinced that he had made a false step, and that nothing more was intended than to gain time; which was of great use to Antony, as it would retard the attempts of relieving Mutina, and give an opportunity to Ventidius to join him, who was marching towards him at that time with three legions. At the next meeting of the Senate he retracted his opinion, and declared against the late decree, as dangerous and insidious; and in a warm and pathetic speech (which is his twelfth Philippic) pressed them so strongly to repeal it, that the thing was wholly dropped; and Pansa, about the end of the month, marched towards Gaul, at the head of his new-raised army, in order to join Hirtius and Octavius, and, without farther delay, to attempt a decisive battle with Antony for the delivery of D. Brutus.

Antony, at the same time, while he was perplexing the counsels of the Senate by the intrigues of his friends, was endeavouring also by his letters to shake the resolution of Hirtius and Octavius, and draw them off from the cause, which they were now supporting; but their answers seem to have been short and firm; referring him constantly to the authority of the Senate: Yet, as things were now drawing towards a crisis, he made one effort more upon them; and, in the following expostulatory letter, reproached them, with great freedom, for deserting their true interest, and suffering themselves to be duped and persuaded by Cicero to revive the Pompeian cause, and establish a power, which, in the end, would destroy them.

ANTONIUS TO HIRTIUS and CÆSAR.

“UPON the news of Trebonius’s death, I was equally affected both with joy and with grief. It was matter of real joy to me to see a villain suffer the vengeance due to the ashes of the most illustrious of men; and that, within the circle of the current year, the divine providence has displayed itself, by the punishment of parricide, inflicted already on some, and ready to fall upon the rest. But, on the other hand, it is a subject of just grief to me, that Dolabella should be declared an enemy, because he has killed a murderer; and that the son of a buffoon should be dearer to the people of Rome, than Cæsar, the Father of his country: But the cruellest reflection of all is, that you, Hirtius, covered with Cæsar’s favours, and left by him in a condition which you yourself wonder at; and you too, young man, who owe every thing to his name, are doing all which is in your power, that Dolabella may be thought justly condemned; that this wretch be delivered from the siege, and Cassius and Brutus be invested with all

Y. R. 710. " power. You look upon the present state of things, as people did up-Bef. Chr. " on the past; call Pompey's camp the Senate; have made the vanquish-
 42. " ed Cicero your Captain; are strengthening Macedonia with armies; 409 Conf. " have given Africa to Varus, twice a prisoner; have sent Cassius into " Syria; suffered Casca to act as Tribune; suppressed the revenues of " the Julian Luperci; abolished the colonies of veterans, established by " law, and the decree of the Senate; promise to restore to the people
 " of Marseilles what was taken from them by right of war; forget that " a Pompeian was made incapable of any dignity by Hirtius's law; have " supplied Brutus with Apuleius's money; applauded the putting to " death Poetus and Menedemus, Cæsar's friends, whom he made free of " the city; took no notice of Treopompus, when, stripped and banished
 " by Trebonius, he fled to Alexandria: You see Ser. Galba in your camp,
 " armed with the same poniard with which he stabbed Cæsar; have in-" listed my soldiers and other veterans, on pretence of destroying those " who killed Cæsar, and then employ them, before they know what " they are doing, against their Quæstor, or their General, or their com" rades.—What have you not done, which Pompey himself, were he " alive, or his son, if he could, would not do? In short, you deny, that " any peace can be made, unless I set Brutus at liberty, or supply him
 " with provisions: Can this please those veterans who have not yet de" clared themselves? For, as to your part, you have sold yourselves to " the flatteries and poisoned honours of the Senate. But you come, you " say, to preserve the troops which are besieged. I am not against their " being saved, or going wherever you please, if they will but leave him
 " to perish, who has deserved it. You write me word that the men" tion of concord has been revived in the Senate, and five consular am" bassadors appointed: It is hard to believe that those who have driven
 " me to this extremity, when I offered the fairest conditions, and was " willing to remit some part of them, should do any thing with mode-
 " ration or humanity: Nor is it probable, that the same men, who voted
 " Dolabella an enemy for a most laudable act, can ever forgive me, who " am in the same sentiments with him. Wherefore it is your business to " reflect, which of the two is the more eligible, or more useful to our " common interest, to revenge the death of Trebonius, or of Cæsar: And " which the more equitable; for us to act against each other, that the " Pompeian cause, so often defeated, may recover itself; or to join our " forces, lest we become at last the sport of our enemies, who, which
 " of us soever may happen to fall, are sure to be the gainers. But " fortune has hitherto prevented that spectacle; unwilling to see two " armies, like members of the same body, fighting against each other;
 " and Cicero, all the while, like a Master of Gladiators, matching us
 " and ordering the combat: Who is so far happy as to have caught you " with the same bait with which he brags to have caught Cæsar. For " my part, I am resolved to suffer no affront either to myself or my " friends;

“ friends ; nor to desert the party which Pompey hated ; nor to see the “ veterans driven out of their possessions, and dragged one by one to “ the rack ; nor to break my word with Dolabella ; nor to violate my “ league with Lepidus, a most religious man : Nor to betray Plancus, “ the partner of all my counsels. If the immortal gods support me, as “ I hope they will, in the pursuit of so good a cause, I shall live with “ pleasure ; but, if any other fate expects me, I taste a joy, however, “ before-hand, in the sure foresight of your punishment : For, if the “ Pompeians are so insolent when conquered, how much more they will “ be so when Conquerors, it will be your lot to feel. In a word, this “ is the sum of my resolution : I can forgive the injuries of my friends, “ if they themselves are disposed either to forget them, or prepared,
 “ in conjunction with me, to revenge the death of Cæsar : I cannot be“ lieve that any ambassadors will come ; when they do, I shall know “ what they have to demand.” Hirtius and Cæsar, instead of answering this letter, sent it directly to Cicero at Rome, to make what use of it he thought fit with the Senate or the People.

In this interval Lepidus wrote a public letter to the Senate, to exhort them to pacific measures, and to save the effusion of civil blood, by contriving some way of reconciling Antony and his friends to the service of his country ; without giving the least intimation of his thanks for the public honours which they had lately decreed to him. This was not at all agreeable to the Senate, and confirmed their former jealousy of his disaffection to the Republic, and good understanding with Antony. They agreed, however, to a vote proposed by Servilius, “ that Lepidus should “ be thanked for his love of peace, and care of the citizens ; yet should “ be desired not to trouble himself any farther about it, but to leave “ that affair to them ; who thought that there could be no peace, unless “ Antony should lay down his arms and sue for it.” This letter gave Anto- ny’s friends a fresh handle to renew their instances for a treaty, for the sake of obliging Lepidus, who had it in his power, they said to force them to it. Cicero pronounced, on this occasion, his thirteenth Philippic, to confute their arguments ; and, in the course of it, read to the House Antony’s letter to Hirtius and Cæsar, paragraph by paragraph, making all along, with great wit and spirit, his own comment and remarks upon it.

C. Antony, whom we mentioned above to have retreated, with seven cohorts, to Apollonia, not daring to wait for Brutus’s arrival, who was now advancing towards him, marched out to Butbrotum to seek his fortune elsewhere, in quarters more secure and remote : But, being overtaken and attacked on his march by a part of Brutus’s army, he lost three of his cohorts in the action ; and, in a second engagement with another body of troops which young Cicero commanded, was entirely routed and taken prisoner ; which made Brutus absolute master of the country without opposition. He treated his prisoner with great lenity, and seemed much disposed to give him his liberty ; which he would have

Y. R. 710. done, if he had not met with the strongest opposition from Cicero and Bef. Cnr. the Senate¹.

⁴²
 409 Conf.

The siege of Mutina had lasted now four months; and it was invested so closely by Antony, and he had posted himself so advantageously, that no succours could be thrown into it. Brutus, though reduced to the utmost straits, defended it still with the greatest resolution². Upon the approach of Pansa's army, Antony privately drew out some of his best troops, with a design to surprise him on the road before their union, and to draw him, if possible, to an engagement against his will. We have a particular account of the action, in a letter to Cicero from

¹ He not only wrote to the Senate about it himself, but permitted Antony to write too, and with the style of Proconsul; which surprised and shocked all his friends at Rome; and especially Cicero, who expostulates with him for it in the following letter:

"ON the 13th of April, says he, your messenger Pilus brought us two letters, one in your name, the other in Antony's, and gave them to Servilius, the Tribune: He to Corneilius, the Praetor. They were read in the Senate. Antony Proconsul, raised as much wonder as if it had been Dolabella Emperor, from whom also there came an express; but nobody, like your Pilus, was so hardy to produce the letters, or deliver them to the magistrates. Your letter was read; short indeed, but extremely mild towards Antony: The Senate was amazed at it. For my part, I did not know how to act. Should I affirm it to be forged?—What if you should own it? Should I admit it to be genuine? That was not for your honour. I chose, therefore, to be silent that day. On the next, when the affair had made some noise, and Pilus's carriage had given offence, I began the debate, and said much of Proconsul Antony. Sextius performed his part, and observed to me afterwards in private, what danger his son and mine would be liable to, if they had really taken up arms against a Proconsul. You know the man; he did justice to the cause. Others also spoke; but our friend Laberius took notice that your seal was not put to the letter; nor any date added; nor had you written about it, as usual, to your friends; from which he maintained the letter to be forged; and, in short, convinced the House of it. It is now your part, Brutus, to consider the whole state and nature of the war: You are delighted; I perceive, with lenity; and think at the best way of proceeding: This, indeed, is generally right; but the proper place of clemency is in cases and seasons very different from the present: For what are we doing now, Brutus? We see a needy and desperate crew threatening the very temples of the gods; and that the war must necessarily decide, whether we are to live, or not. Who is it then whom we are sparing, or what is it that we mean? Are we consulting the safety of those who, if they get the better, are sure not to leave the least remains of us? For what difference is there between Dolabella and any one of the three Antony's? If we spare any of these, we have been too severe to Dolabella. It was owing chiefly to my advice and authority that the Senate and People are in this way of thinking, though the thing itself indeed also obliged them to it: If you do not approve this policy, I shall defend your opinion, but cannot depart from my own: The world expects from you nothing either remiss or cruel: It is easy to moderate the matter, by severity to the Leaders, generosity to the soldiers."

² The old writers have recorded some stratagems, which are said to have been put in practice on this occasion: "How Hirtius provided men skilled in diving, with letters written on lead, to pass into the town under the river which runs through it, till Antony obstructed that passage by nets and traps placed under water: Which gave occasion to another contrivance of sending their intelligence backwards and forwards by pigeons. Front. de Stratagem. l. iii. 13. Plin. Hist. Nat. l. x. 37. Dio, p. 323c."

See.

Ser. Galba ^a, one of the Conspirators against Cæsar, who bore a principal part and command in it. Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.

“ ON the 15th of April, the day on which Pansa was to arrive in 42.
409 Cons.
“ Hirtius’s camp, (in whose company I was, for I went an hundred “ miles to meet him and hasten his march) Antony drew out two of his Ep. Fam.
x. 30.
“ legions, the second and thirty-fifth; and two prætorian cohorts; the “ one his own, the other Silanus’s ^b, with part of the Evocati; and came “ forward towards us, imagining that we had nothing but four legions
“ of new levies. But, in the night, to secure our march to the camp, “ Hirtius had sent us the Martial legion, which I used to command,
“ and two prætorian cohorts. As soon as Antony’s horse appeared in “ fight, neither the Martial legion, nor the prætorian cohorts, could be “ restrained from attacking them; so that, when we could not hold “ them in, we were obliged to follow them against our wills. Antony “ kept his forces within Castel-franco; [Ad forum Gallorum, a small village on the Æmilian way between Modena and Bologna] “ and, being unwilling to have it known, that he had his legions with him, shewed only his horse and light-armed foot. When Pansa saw the Martial legion running forward against his orders, he commanded two of the new-raised legions to follow him. As soon as we got through the straits of the morass and the woods, we drew up the twelve cohorts [the ten of the Martial legion, and the two prætorian] “ in order of battle. The other two legions were not yet come up. Antony immediately brought all his troops out of the village, ranged likewise in order of battle, and without delay engaged us. At first they fought so briskly on both sides, that nothing could possibly be fiercer: Tho’ the right wing, in which I was, with eight cohorts of the Martial legion, put Antony’s thirty-fifth legion to flight, at the first onset, and pursued it above five hundred paces from the place where the action began: Wherefore, observing the enemy’s horse attempting to surround our wing, I began to retreat, and ordered the light-armed troops to make head against the Moorish horse, and prevent their coming upon us behind. In the mean while I perceived myself in the midst of Antony’s men, and Antony himself but a little way behind me. Upon which, with my shield thrown over my shoulder, I pushed on my horse with all speed towards the new legion that was coming towards us from the camp: And, whilst Antony’s men were pursuing me, and ours, by mistake, throwing javelins at me, I was preserved. I know not how, by being presently known to our soldiers. Cæsar’s

^a He had been one of Cæsar’s Lieutenants in Gaul; but, not being favoured by him in his pursuit of the consulship, he joined in the conspiracy with Brutus and Cassius. He was great grandfather to the Emperor Galba.

^b He was military Tribune in the army of Lepidus, and, by the connivance, if not by the express orders of that General, had conducted a body of troops to the assistance of Antony. . . . Dio, xvi. 336. . . .

“ prætorian

Y. R. 710. " prætorian cohort sustained the fight a long time on the Æmilian road :
 Bef. Chr. " But our left wing, which was the weaker, consisting of two cohorts
 42. " of the Martial legion, and the prætorian of Hirtius, began to give 409 Conf. " ground ; being surrounded by Antony's horse, in which he is very " strong. When all our ranks had made good their retreat, I retreated " myself the last, to our camp. Antony, as the Conqueror, fancied that " he could take it ; but, upon trial, lost many of his men in the at" tempt, without being able to do us any hurt. Hirtius, in the mean " time, hearing of the engagement, marched out with twenty veteran
 " cohorts, and, meeting Antony on his return, intirely routed and put to " flight his whole army, in the very same place where they had fought
 " before. About ten at night, Antony regained his camp at Mutina
 " with all his horse. Hirtius retired to that camp, which Pansa had " quitted in the morning, and where he left the two legions, which
 " Antony attacked : Thus Antony has lost the greater part of his veteran " troops, yet not without some loss of our prætorian cohorts and the " Martial legion : We took two of Antony's eagles, and sixty standards ;
 " and have gained a considerable advantage." Besides this letter from Galba, there came letters also severally from the two Consuls and Osta- rius ; confirming the other account with the addition of some farther Philipp. particulars : " That Pansa, fighting bravely at the head of his troops, xiv. 9, 10. " had received two dangerous wounds, and was carried off the field to
 " Bononia : That Hirtius had scarce lost a single man : And that, to ani-
 " mate the soldiers the better, he took up the eagle of the fourth legion,
 " and carried it forward himself : That Cæsar was left to the guard of " their camp ; where he was likewise attacked by another body of the " enemy, whom he repulsed with great loss." Antony reproached Osta-
 Suet. in rius afterwards with running away from this engagement in such a Aug. x. fright, that he did not appear again till two days after, and without his horse or General's habit : But the account just mentioned was given by Cicero, from letters, that were read to the Senate, in which Hirtius declared him to have acted with the greatest courage.

The news reached Rome on the 20th of April : The day following the Senate was summoned by Cornutus, the Prætor, to deliberate on the letters of the Consuls and Octavius. Servilius's opinion was, " that the city
 " should now quit the Sagum ; and that a public thanksgiving should be " decreed jointly to the honour of the Consuls and Octavius." Cicero declared strongly against quitting the Sagum, till D. Brutus was quite delivered from the siege : And, having shewed how well the three Generals deserved the title of Emperor, he decreed a thanksgiving of fifty days in the name of the three jointly. He then proposed that a monument should be raised to those who, in the defence of their country, had been killed in battle ; that the former assurances made to the legions of the full and punctual payment of all which had been promised to them, as soon as the war should be over, should be renewed ; and for those, in the mean time,

time, who had lost their lives for their country, that the same rewards which would have been given them, if they had lived, should be given immediately to their parents, children, wives, and brothers^c.

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.
42.
709 Conf.
Middl. P.
427.

Antony, being cruelly mortified by this defeat, kept himself close within his camp, and resolved to hazard nothing farther, but to act only on the defensive; except by harrassing the enemy with his horse, in which he was far superior. He still hoped to make himself master of Mutina, which was reduced to extremity; and, by the strength of his works, to prevent their throwing any relief into it. Hirtius and Octavius, on the other hand, elate with victory, were determined at all hazards to relieve it; and, after two or three days spent in finding the most likely place of breaking through the intrenchments, they made their attack with such vigour, that Antony, rather than suffer the town to be snatched

^c The greatest part of this fourteenth Philippic, and last oration of Cicero, is a panegyric upon himself: He tells us, that, when the news of Antony's defeat was known, the people of Rome carried him into the Capitol in a kind of triumph. "For that, after all," he says, is a just and real triumph, when, by the general voice of the city, a public testimony is given to those who have deserved well of the Commonwealth. For, if in the common joy of the whole city they congratulated me singly, it is a great declaration of their judgment; if they thanked me, still greater; if both, nothing can be imagined more glorious." He then observes, "that he was forced to say so much of himself against his will, by the strange envy and injuries which he had lately suffered;—that the insolence of the factions, as they all knew, had raised a report and suspicion upon him of his aiming at a tyranny; that he had formed a design to make himself master of the city, and declare himself Dictator, and would appear publicly with the fasces within a day or two: Though his whole life had been spent in defending the Republic from tyranny; as if he who had destroyed Cataline, for that very crime, was of a sudden become a Cataline himself. That, if the report had found credit in the city, their design was by a sudden assault upon his person, as upon a tyrant, to have taken away his life:—That the thing itself was manifest, and the whole affair should be laid open in proper time:—That he had said all this not to purge himself to them, to whom he should be sorry to want an apology, but to admonish certain persons of jejune and narrow minds to look upon the virtue of excellent citizens as the object of their imitation, not of their envy; since the Republic was a wide field, where the course of glory was open to many; that, if any man contested with him the first place in the government, he acted foolishly, if he meant to do it by opposing vice to virtue: That, as the race was gained by running the fastest, so virtue was only to be conquered by a superior virtue:—That they could never get the better of him by bad votes, by good ones perhaps they might; and he himself should be glad of it.—That the people of Rome were perpetually inquiring, how men of their rank voted and acted; and formed their judgment of them accordingly.—That they all remembered, how, in December last, he was the author of the first step towards recovering their liberty: How, from the 1st of January, he had been continually watching over the safety of the Commonwealth: How his house and his ears were open day and night to the advice and informations of all who came to him, &c." And, in a letter to Brutus, he says, "that he reaped on the day he was carried to the Capitol the full fruit of all his toils, if there be any fruit in true and solid glory." Could any body help laughing when they heard Cicero vindicate himself seriously from aiming at tyranny, and his friend Apuleius, the Tribune, make a speech to the people to confute this report? Was there a man in Rome who was not sensible that he had no strength of his own, but was a mere tool in the hands of another?

out

Y. R. 710. out of his hands, chose to draw out his legions, and come to a general
 Ref. Chr. battle. The fight was bloody and obstinate; and Antony's men, though
 42. obliged to give ground, bravely disputed every inch of it, till D. Brutus, 409 Conf. taking the opportunity, at the same time, to sally out of the town, at the head of his garrison, helped greatly to determine and complete the victory.
Hirtius pushed his advantage with great spirit, and forced his way into Antony's camp; but, when he had gained the middle of it, was unfortunately killed near the General's tent: Pontius Aquila, one of the Conspirators, was killed likewise in the same place: But Octavius, who followed to support them, made good their attempt, and kept possession of the camp, with the intire defeat and destruction of Antony's best troops; while Antony himself, with all his horse, fled with great precipitation towards the Alps. The Consul Pansa died the day following of his wounds at Bononia *.

C H A P.

* Dr. Middleton, p. 429, gives the following character of the two Consuls: Hirtius was a man of letters and politeness; intimately intrusted with Cæsar's counsels and employed to write his acts: But, as he was the proper creature of Cæsar, and strongly infected with party, so his views were all bent on supporting the power that had raised him, and serving his patron, not the public. In the beginning, therefore, of the civil war, when he was Tribune of the people, he published a law, to exclude all, who were in arms with Pompey, from any employment or office in the State: Which made him particularly obnoxious to the Pampeians, who considered him as their most inveterate enemy. Pansa, whose father had been proscribed by Sylla, was attached with equal zeal to Cæsar, as to the head and revivier of the Marian cause: and served him in all his wars with singular affection and fidelity. He was a grave, sincere, and worthy man; and, being naturally more moderate and benevolent than Hirtius, was touched with the ruin of his country, and the miseries of the oppressed Pampeians; many of whom he relieved by his humanity, and restored by his interest to the city and their estates. This made him very popular, and gained him the esteem of all the honest;
 so that Cæsar, in defending his Epicurians to Cicero, alledges Pansa, as an example of those genuine Epicureans, who placed their pleasure, or chief good, in virtuous acts.
 Before their entrance into the consulship, Q.
Cicero gave a most wretched account of them
 "both, as of a lewd, luxuriose pair; not

"fit to be trusted with the command of a
 "paltry town, much less of the empire;
 "and says, that, if they were not removed "from the helm, the Republic would cer"tainly be lost; since Antony would easily
 "draw them into a partnership of his crimes;
 "for, when he served with them in Gaul, he "had seen incredible instances of their ef-
 "feminacy and debauchery in the face even
 "of the enemy." But we must charge a great part of this character to the perversi-ness and envy of Quintus: For, whatever they had been before, they were certainly good Consuls; and out of their affection to Cicero, and regard to his authority, governed themselves generally, in all great affairs, by his maxims. They were persuaded that the design of revenging Cæsar's death would throw the Republic again into convulsions, and flowed from no other motive, than the ambition of possessing Cæsar's place; and resolved, therefore, to quell by open force, all attempts against the public peace. From their long adherence to Cæsar, they retained indeed some prejudices in favour of that party; and were loth to proceed to extremities till pacific measures were found ineffectual. This gave Cicero some reason to blame, but never to distrust them; to complain of their phlegm and want of vigour, as detrimental to the common cause; yet,
 while they were generally suspected by others, he always thought them sincere, tho' they did not, in all cases, act up to his wishes. The event confirmed his judgment of them: For they both not only exposed but lost their lives with the greatest courage in defence of the Republic; and showed themselves to be the very men which Cicero had constantly affirmed them to be; and, though he imputes some little blame to Hirtius, yet of Pansa he declares, that he wanted neither courage from the first, nor fidelity to the last.
 the

N. B. Several medals were struck by the Senate on the occasion of this victory; particularly one in honour of Pansa, exhibiting the head of the goddess of Liberty, crowned with laurel, and the inscription Libertatis; and, on the reverse, Rome sitting upon the spoils of enemies, holding a spear in her right hand, and a dagger in her left, with her foot upon the globe, and Victory flying towards her to crown her with laurel; and the inscription, C. PANSA C. F. C. N. See Morel. Fam. Rom.

C H A P. XIV.

The Senate decrees honours to the two deceased Consuls, and to D. BRUTUS and OCTAVIUS. ANTONY is not pursued; OCTAVIUS wanting the will, and D. BRUTUS the means of following him. He is received by LEPIDUS, who writes to the Senate to justify his behaviour: On the other side, D. BRUTUS joins PLANCUS, Governor of farther GAUL. LEPIDUS is declared, by the influence of Cicero, an enemy to the State. OCTAVIUS treats secretly with ANTONY and LEPIDUS, and demands the consulship by a deputation of his officers. CICERO appears no more upon the Stage of action: His correspondence with the several Generals abroad.

THE death of the two Consuls placed Octavius at once above controul, by leaving him the master of both their armies; especially of all the veterans; who were disaffected to D. Brutus; and it fell out so lucky and so apposite to all Octavius's views, as to give birth to a general persuasion that they had received foul play, and were both of them killed by his contrivance; For he was observed to be the first man who took up Hirtius's body in the camp; where some imagined him to have been killed by his own soldiers; and Pansa's physician, Glyco, was actually thrown into prison by Torquatus, Pansa's Quæstor, upon a suspicion of having poisoned his wounds. But the chief ground of that notion seems to have lain in the fortunate coincidence of the event with the interests of Octavius: For M. Brutus thought it incredible, and, in the most pressing manner, begged of Cicero to procure Glyco's enlargement, and protect him from any harm; as being a worthy, modest man, incapable of such a villainy, and who, of all others, suffered the greatest loss by Pansa's death.

At Rome, the general rejoicings stifled all present attention to the loss of their Consuls; and Antony's friends were so dejected for some time,

VOL. IV.

R r

that

* They were not regretted by Brutus's friends, who had all along entertained a very bad opinion of them; and Cicero himself, confident of the good dispositions of his pupil Octavius, was not much concerned at first for their loss: These things appear by the following letters:

CICERO

Y. R. 710. that they gave Cicero no more opposition in the Senate : Where he poured Ref. Chr. ed out all imaginable honours on the deceased Hirtius, Pansa, and 43. Aquila ;
 409 C. 26.

CICERO TO BRUTUS.

Ad Brut. " WHILE I was writing this, our affairs were supposed to be reduced to the last ex-
 Ep. viii. tremity : For all our letters and messages brought us sad accounts of our Brutus *.
 M. Ed. " They did not, however, very much disturb me. For I could not by any means distrust
 p. 51. " the armies and the Leaders, who are now acting for us : Nor was I of the same opinion
 " with the majority of our friends, for I did not condemn the fidelity of the Consuls, which was " vehemently suspected. I blamed their want of prudence and celerity in some cases, where,
 " if they had exerted themselves, we should long ago have recovered the Republic. For " you are not ignorant of what moment it is, in public affairs, to seize the proper times " of acting ; and what a difference it makes, whether the same thing be decreed, under" taken, or transacted, sooner or later. If all the vigorous decrees, that have been made
 " since the beginning of this disturbance, had either been carried into effect on the day
 " when I proposed them, and not been put off from day to day ; or if, from the time
 " when they began to be put in execution, they had not still been delayed and postponed,
 " we should have seen an end of the war before now. I have acquitted myself, Brutus,
 " to the Republic in all points, as that man ought to do, who, by the judgment of the " Senate and people, is placed in that rank of authority in which I now am ; and not " merely in those things, which alone are to be required from man ; fidelity, vigilance, and
 " love of my country ; for these are duties from which nobody ought to be excused ; but " I take it to be the part of him, who acts as one of the Leaders in state affairs, to insure
 " even the prudence of his measures to the Public : And, for my part, since I have assumed
 " so much to myself, as to take the steerage of the Republic into my hands, I should not " think myself less culpable if I should draw the Senate into any thing impetuously, than if I
 " had drawn them into it treacherously. I know that a punctual account is sent you of all " things that are done or going forward among us. But what I would have you informed
 " of particularly by me is this : That my mind is wholly intent on the war ; nor cares
 " to attend to any other object, unless when the immediate service of the city may have " called it by accident to something else. But the greatest part of my attention is fixed " upon you and Cassius. Wherefore prepare yourself, Brutus, in such a manner, as to " be persuaded, that, if at this very time our affairs be crowned with success, it is you
 " who must set the Republic right ; or, if any ill fortune has befallen us, it is you who must " recover it."

CICERO TO BRUTUS.

Ad Brut. " OUR affairs seemed to have taken a more favourable turn. An account, I know, Ep. ix. is sent you of all that has been done. The Consuls answered the character which I of-
 M. Ed. ten gave you of them in my letters. But young Cæsar has shown a wonderful disposition
 p. 54. to virtue. I wish that I may be able to bind and govern him still, in this height of honour
 " and favour, as easily as I have hitherto done. It is now, indeed, become more difficult ;
 " yet I do not despair of it. For the young man is persuaded, and chiefly by me, that we owe
 " our safety to his power : And, in truth, if he had not kept off Antony from the city, all
 " had been lost. Nay, within three or four days before this most happy event, the city,
 " struck with a kind of panic, was all running away at once, with their wives and chil" dren, to you ; till, being made easy again on the 20th of April, they began to wish, that " you would rather come hither to them, than they go to you. On which day I reaped
 " the full fruit of all my great pains and constant watchings, if there be any fruit at all
 " from true and solid glory. For the whole multitude, which our city contains, flocked on " that day to my house ; whence I was carried by them first to the Capitol ; then placed in the

* D. Brutus.

" Rostra,

Aquila; decreed an ovation to Cæsar^f; and added a number of days to their thanksgiving, in honour of D. Brutus; whose deliverance happening to fall upon his birth-day, he decreed likewise, that his name should be ascribed ever after to that day, in the Festi or public calendars, for a perpetual memorial of the victory. Antony's adherents were also declared enemies^g: In which number Servilius himself, Cicero's great antagonist, included Ventidius; and moved to give Cassius the command of the war against Dolabella; to whom Cicero joined Brutus, in case they should find it useful to the Republic.

The Commanders abroad, who had been all greatly courted by Cicero, and had returned him civil answers, were so struck with Antony's defeat, that they redoubled their assurances to him of their firmness and zeal for the common cause^h. But we shall soon see them all fall off, excepting Cornificius, and side with the rebel Antony.

R r 2

The

“Rostra, with the loudest acclamations and applause. There is nothing of vanity in me; nor indeed ought there to be: Yet the consent of all orders, their thanks and gratulations, really move me; since it is truly noble to become popular by the preservation of the people. But I would have you hear of these things rather from others. I desire you to send me a punctual account of all your affairs and designs; and to take care particularly, that your generosity may not seem to be carried to a degree of remissness. The Senate is of opinion, and the Roman People of the same, that no enemies were ever more worthy of the last punishment, than those citizens, who have taken up arms against their country in the present war: On whom, indeed, I am taking a proper revenge, and pursuing in all my votes, with the approbation of all honest men. It is your part to determine what you ought to judge of this affair. My opinion of it is, that the case of the three Antony's is one and the same. We have lost two Consuls; good ones, it is true; but barely good. Her-tius fell in the very midst of victory, after he had beaten the enemy, a few days before, in a great battle. For Pansa was forced to fly, being disabled by the wounds he had received. Brutus is now pursuing the remains of the enemy, and Cæsar also: But all are adjudged enemies, who have espoused the party of M. Antony. Most people, therefore, interpret that decree of the Senate to extend also to your prisoners; whether taken in flight, or by surrender. I moved, indeed, for nothing more severe, though I was speaking upon C. Antonius by name; because I had resolved with myself, that the Senate ought to take their information of the case from you. April 22d.”

It is hard to believe, that it was the pure love of his country, unmixed with the low passions of fear and hatred, which engaged Cicero, contrary to all prudence and humanity, as well as the judgment of Brutus, to grant no quarter to Antony's adherents, and transform a civil contest into an inexorable war.

^f The decree of an ovation to Octavius was blamed by Brutus and his friends; yet seems, says Dr. Middleton, p. 434, “to have been wisely and artfully designed: For, while it carried an appearance of honour, it would regularly have stripped him of his power, if he had made use of it; since his commission was to expire of course, and his army be dissolved, upon his first entrance into the city: But the confusion of the times made laws and customs of little effect with those who had the power to dispense with them.” If so, there was no wisdom or cunning in Cicero's contrivance: And, if Cicero did believe that Octavius would disband his veterans to enjoy the honour decreed him, he must have possessed no great share of penetration.

^g Atticus, at this time, when Antony was deserted by almost all his friends, as a man utterly ruined, had the generosity to perform the most friendly offices to Fulvia, Antony's wife, and her children: Which behaviour met with its due recompence soon after.

^h Lepidus, who had suffered Silanus, a military Tribune in his army, to carry succours to Antony at Mutina, and, after Antony's defeat, sent Culeo with a body of men, under the pre-

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Ch.
42.
407 Conf.

Y. R. 710. The Conquerors at Mutina were very much censured for giving Antony leisure to escape : But Octavius, from the beginning, had no thoughts of Def. Chr. 42.
 409 Conf.

pretence of guarding the passes of the Alps; but most probably with secret instructions to favour Antony's march over these mountains, since he did not obstruct it, but, on the contrary, joined Antony; wrote, nevertheless, the following letter to Cicero :

M. LEPIDUS to CICERO.

Ep. Fam. " HAVING received advice that Antony was advancing with his troops towards my
 x. 34. province, and had sent before him a detachment of his cavalry, under the command of Melm. xiv. his brother Lucius; I moved with my army from the confluence of the Rhone and the 29. " Arar," [the Saône, which falls into the Rhone at Lyons] " in order to oppose their pas" sage. I continued my march without halting, till I arrived at Forum Varenii : [Le Luc
 " in Provence] " and am now encamped somewhat beyond that town, on the river *Ar-
 " gentus*," [Argens] " opposite to Antony. Ventidius has joined him with his three le" gions, and has formed his camp a little above mine. Antony, before this conjunction,
 " had the second legion intire, together with a considerable number of men, though in" deed wholly unarmed, who escaped from the general slaughter of his other legions.
 " He is extremely strong in cavalry; for, as none of those troops suffered in the late action,
 " he has no less than . . . horse." [The number is omitted in all the ancient manu-
 " scripts.] " Great numbers of his soldiers, both horse and foot, are continually deserting
 " to my camp; so that his troops diminish every day. Both Silanus and Culeo have left " his army, and are returned to mine. But, notwithstanding I was greatly offended by their " going to Antony, contrary to my inclination; yet, in regard to the connexions that subsist be" tween us, and in compliance with my usual clemency, I have thought proper to pardon them.
 " However, I do not, upon any occasion, employ their services; nor, indeed, suffer
 " them to remain in the camp.

" As to what concerns my conduct in this war, you may depend upon it I shall not be " wanting in my duty either to the Senate or the Republic: And, whatever farther mea" sures I shall take to this end, I shall not fail to communicate them to you. The friend" ship that subsists between us has, upon all occasions, been inviolably preserved on both " sides; and we have mutually vied in our best good-offices to each other. But I doubt " not that, since this great and sudden commotion has been raised in the Commonwealth,
 " some false and injurious reports have been spread of me by my enemies, which, in the " zeal of your heart for the interest of the Republic, have given you much uneasiness.
 " I have the satisfaction, however, to be informed, by my agents at Rome, that you are
 " by no means disposed easily to credit these idle rumours: For which I think myself, as " I justly ought, extremely obliged to you. I am so, likewise, for the former instances " of your friendship, in promoting my public honours: The grateful remembrance of " which, be assured, is indelibly impressed upon my heart. Let me conjure you, my dear
 " Cicero, if you are sensible that my public conduct has, upon all occasions, been worthy " of the name I bear, to be persuaded that I shall continue to act with equal, or, if pos" sible, even with superior zeal. Let me hope too, that, the greater the favours are which " you have conferred upon me, the more you will think yourself engaged to support my " credit and character. Farewell. From my camp at Pons Argentarius, May 22d."

Correspon- Asinius Pollio, the Governor of sarther Spain, had strictly kept within the bounds of dence be- his province: Before the news of Antony's defeat, he had written the two following letters tween Pol- to Cicero:
 io and Cicero.

ASINIUS POLLIO to CICERO.

Ep. Fam. " YOU must not wonder that you have heard nothing from me in relation to public af-
 x. 31. fairs, since the breaking out of the war. Our couriers have always found it difficult to Melm. xiii. pass unmolested through the forest of Cajula," [a city anciently of great note; at pre-11. sent

of pursuing him: He had already gained what he aimed at; had re-duced Antony's power so low, and raised his own so high, as to be in a condition

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.
42.
409 Conf.

sent it is only a small village called Cazorla, in the province of New Castile:] "but it is now more than ever infested with robbers. These banditti, however, are by no means the principal obstruction to our intercourse with Rome: As the mails are perpetually searched and detained by the soldiers that are posted for that purpose, by both parties, in every quarter of the country. Accordingly, if I had not received letters by a ship which lately arrived in this river," [the Betis or Guadalquivir] "I should have been utterly ignorant of what has been lately transacted in your part of the world. But, now that a communication by sea is thus opened between us, I shall frequently, and with great pleasure, embrace the opportunity of corresponding with you.

"Believe me, there is no danger of my being influenced by the persuasions of the person you mention." [Antony, or perhaps Lepidus.] As much as the world abhors him, he is far from being detested to that degree which I know he deserves: And I have so strong an aversion to the man, that I would, upon no consideration, bear a part in any measures wherein he is concerned. Inclined both by my temper and my studies to be the friend of tranquillity and freedom, I frequently and bitterly lamented our late unhappy civil wars. But, as the formidable enemies which I had among both parties rendered it altogether unsafe for me to remain neuter, so I would not take up arms on that side where I knew I should be perpetually exposed to the insidious arts of my capital adversary." [Perhaps Cato; as Pelios had early distinguished himself by a public impeachment of that eminent man. See Dial. de Caus. corrupt. Eloquent. 34.] But, though my inclinations were not with the party I joined, my spirit, however, would not suffer me to stand undistinguished among them: In consequence of which I was forward to engage in all the dangers of the cause I espoused. With respect to Cæsar himself, I will confess that I loved him with the highest and most inviolable affection: As indeed I had reason. For, notwithstanding his acquaintance with me commenced so late as when he was in the height of his power, yet he admitted me into the same share of his friendship, as if I had been in the number of those with whom he had lived in the longest intimacy. Nevertheless, as often as I was at liberty to follow my own sentiments, I endeavoured that my conduct should be such as every honest man must approve: And, whenever I was obliged to execute the orders I received, it was in a manner that evidently discovered how much my actions were at variance with my heart. The unjust odium, however, that I incurred by these unavoidable compliances, might well teach me the true value of liberty, and how wretched a condition it is to live under the government of a despotic power. If any attempts, therefore, are carrying on to reduce us a second time under the dominion of a single person, whoever that single person may be, I declare myself his irreconcilable enemy. The truth is, there is no danger so great that I would not cheerfully hazard for the support of our common liberties. But the Consuls have not thought proper to signify to me either by any decree of the Senate, or by their private letters, in what manner I should act in the present conjuncture. I have received, indeed only one letter from Pansa since the ides of March, by which he advised me to allure the Senate, that I was ready to employ the forces under my command in any service they should require. But this would have been a very imprudent declaration, at a time when Lepidus had professed in his public speeches, as well as in the letters he wrote to all his friends, that he concurred in ANTONY's measures." [It does not appear that Lepidus was so explicit] "For could I possibly, without the consent of the former, find means to subvert my troops in their march through his provinces? But, granting that I could have surmounted this difficulty, I must have conquered another and a still greater; as nothing less than a pair of wings could have rendered it practicable for me to have crossed the Alps, whilst every pass was guarded by the troops of Lepidus. Add to this, that I could by no means convey my dispatches to Rome: As the couriers were not only exposed, in a thousand different places, to the danger of being plundered, but were detained likewise, by the express orders of Lepidus. It is well known,

"however,

V. R. 710. condition to make his own terms with him in the partition of the Em-Eccl. Chr. pire; of which he seems to have formed the plan from this moment.
 42. Whereas,
 acc. Cor. 2

"however, that I publicly declared at Corduba, that it was my resolution not to resign this "province into any other hands than these which the Senate should appoint: Not to mention how "frequently I withstood all the applications that were made me for parting with the thirtieth
 "legion." [Very singular proofs these of his zeal for what Cicero called the Republic.]
 "I could not, indeed, have given it up without depriving myself of a very considerable
 "strength for the defence of the Republic: As there are no troops in the whole world
 "that are animated with a braver or more martial spirit than those of which this legion is "composed. Upon the whole, I hope you will do me the justice to believe, in the first "place, that I am extremely desirous of preserving the public tranquillity; as there is no"thing I more sincerely wish than the safety of all my fellow-citizens: And in the second "place, that I am determined to vindicate my own and my country's cause.

"It gives me greater satisfaction than you can well imagine, that you admit my friend
 "into a share of your intimacy. Shall I own, nevertheless, that I cannot think of him "as the companion of your walks, and as bearing a part in the pleasantries of your con"versation, without feeling some emotions of envy? This is a privilege, believe me,
 "which I infinitely value: As you shall most assuredly experience by my devoting the "whole of my time to your company, if ever we should live to see peace restored to the "Republic.

"I am much surprised that you did not mention in your letter, whether it would be
 "most satisfactory to the Senate that I should remain in this province, or march into Ita- "ly. If I were to consider only my own ease and safety, I should certainly continue here:
 "but as, in the present conjuncture, the Republic has more occasion for legions than for "provinces, (especially as the loss of the latter may with great ease be recovered) I have "determined to move towards Italy with my troops. For the rest, I refer you to the let"ter I have written to Pansa: A copy of which I herewith transmit to you. Farewell." Corduba, March the 16th. There must be an error in this date; or in the body of the letter, where Pollio writes, that he had received but one letter from Pansa, since the 15th, or the ides of March: It was probably written about six weeks after, or in the end of May.

ASINIUS POLLIO TO CICERO.

Ep. Fam.

x. 31.

Meim. xv.

7.

"I should be "glad the Senate would determine in what manner they would have me act. I am at the "head of three brave legions, one of which Antony took great pains to draw over to his "interest, at the commencement of the war. For this purpose, he caused it to be signi-
 "fied to them, that, the very first day they should enter into his camp, every soldier should "receive five hundred denarii;" [about 16 l.] "besides which, he also assured them, that,
 "if he obtained the victory, they should receive an equal share of the spoils with his own
 "troops: A reward which all the world knows would have been without end or measure.
 "These promises made a deep impression upon them: And it was with great difficulty I "kept them from deserting. I should not, indeed, have been able to have effected this,
 "if I had not cantoned them in distant quarters: As some of the cohorts, notwithstand"ing they were thus separated, had the insolence to mutiny. Antony also endeavoured to "gain the rest of the legions by immense offers. Nor was Lepidus less importunate with "me to send him the thirtieth legion; which he solicited both by his own letters, and "by those which he caused Antony to write. The Senate will do me the justice therefore "to believe, as no advantages could tempt me to sell my troops, nor any dangers, which "I had reason to apprehend, if Antony and Lepidus should prove Conquerors, could pre"vail with me to diminish their number, that I was thus tenacious of my army for no "other purpose but to employ it in the service of the Republic. And let the readiness,
 "with which I have obeyed all the orders I received from the Senate, be a proof that I "would have complied in the same manner with every other they should have thought
 "proper

Whereas, if Antony had been wholly destroyed, together with the Consuls, the Republican party would have probably been too strong for him

Y. R. 710.

Bef. Chr.

42.

409 Conf.

“ proper to have sent me. I have preserved the tranquillity of this province; I have “ maintained my authority over the army; and have never once moved beyond the li“ mits of my own jurisdiction. I must add likewise, that I have never employed any sol“ dier, either of my own troops, or those of my auxiliaries, in carrying any dispatches “ whatsoever: And I have constantly punished such of my cavalry whom I have found at “ any time attempting to desert. I shall think these cares sufficiently rewarded, in seeing “ the peace and security of the public restored. But, if the majority of the Senate and “ the Commonwealth, indeed, in general, had known me for what I am, I should have “ been able to have rendered them much more important service.” Corduba, June the 8th.

The same Commander wrote the following letter, after receiving the news of Antony's defeat.

ASINIUS POLLIO TO CICERO.

“ IT is owing to Lepidus, who detained my couriers above a week, that I did not re“ ceive earlier advice of the several actions near Mutina: Though indeed I should be glad “ to have been the last that was informed of this unhappy news, if it were utterly out of “ my power to be of any assistance in redressing its consequences. I wish the Senate had “ ordered me into Italy, when they sent for Plancus and Lepidus: For, if I had been pre“ sent, the Republic would not have received this cruel wound. And though some, per“ haps, may rejoice in this event, from the great number of principal officers and vete“ ran soldiers of the Cæsarean party, who have perished; yet they will, undoubtedly, find “ reason to lament it, when they shall be sensible of the terrible desolation it has brought “ upon their country. For, if what is related concerning the number of the slain be in “ any degree true, the flower and strength of our armies is intirely cut off.

“ I was well aware of the great advantage it would have proved to the Republic, if I “ could have joined Lepidus: As I should have been able, and especially with the assist“ ance of Plancus, to have dissipated those doubts which occasioned his delay in declaring “ for the Senate. But the letters which I received from him being written (as you will “ perceive by the copies I herewith transmit) in the same spirit with those speeches, which “ it is said, he made to his army at Narbo; I found it necessary to act with some sort of “ artifice towards him, if I hoped to obtain leave to march my troops through his pro“ vince. I was apprehensive, likewise, if an engagement should happen before I could “ execute my designs, that the known friendship I had with Antony (though not superior, “ indeed, to that which Plancus entertained for him) would give my enemies an occasion of “ misrepresenting my intentions. For these reasons I dispatched two couriers from Gades in “ the month of April, by two different ships, with letters, not only to you and to Octa- “ avius, but to the Consuls also, requesting to be informed in what manner my services “ might most avail to the Republic. But, if I am right in my calculation, these ships did “ not fail till the very day on which the battle was fought between Pansa and Antony:
“ As that was the soonest, I think, since the winter, that these seas were navigable. To “ these reasons for not marching. I must add, that I had so little apprehension of this civil war,
“ that I settled the winter-quarters of my troops in the very remotest parts of Lusitania.
“ Both armies, it should seem, were as eager to come to an action, as if their greatest fears on “ each side were, lest some less destructive expedient might be found of composing our disturbances.”
[This is a severe censure of Cicero's management, and the style of the letter in general could not be agreeable to him.] “ However, if circumstances required so much precipita“ tion, I must do Hirtius the justice to acknowledge, that he conducted himself with all “ the skill and courage of a consummate General.

“ I am informed, by my letters from that part of Gaul which is under the command of “ Lepidus, that Pansa's whole army is cut to pieces, and that he himself is since dead of “ his wounds. They add, that the Martial legion is intirely destroyed, and that Lucius “ Fabatus, Caius Peducaeus, and Decimus Carjulenus are among the number of the slain.

“ My

Y. R. 712. him and Lepidus, who, though Master of a good army, was certainly
 Bef. Chr. a weak General: When he was pressed, therefore, to pursue Antony, 42. he 409 Conl.

" My intelligence farther assures me, that, in the subsequent attack by Hirtius, both he
 " and Antony lost all their legions: That the fourth legion, after having taken Antony's
 " camp, was engaged and defeated by the first, with terrible slaughter: That Hirtius, " together with Pontius Aquila, and, as it is reported, Octavius likewise, were killed in the " action. [This gives some colour to Antony's reproach, that Octavius fled from, and dis-
 " appeared for three days after the battle.] " If this should prove true, which the gods " forbid, I shall be very greatly concerned. My advices farther import, that Antony has,
 " with great disgrace, abandoned the siege of Mutina: However, that he has . . . com" plete regiments of horse still remaining, together with one which belongs to Pullius
 " Baginrus, as also a considerable number of disarmed soldiers. That Ventidius has joined " him with the seventh, the eighth, and the ninth legions; and that Antony is determined,
 " if there should be no hopes of gaining Lepidus, to have recourse to the last expedient, and " arm not only the Provincials, but even the slaves. In fine, that Lucius Antonius, after " having plundered the city of Parma, has posted himself upon the Alps. If these seve" ral particulars are true, there is no time to be lost. And every man who wishes that
 " the Republic, or even the name of the Roman people, may subsist, should immediately,
 " without waiting for the express orders of the Senate, contribute his utmost assistance to " extinguish these dreadful flames. I hear that D. Brutus is at the head of only seventeen " cohorts, together with two incomplete legions of new-raised troop, which had been " levied by Antony. I doubt not, however, that the remains of the forces commanded by
 " Hirtius will join him. I hope so, at least; as there is little, I think, to be expected " from any new recruits that may be raised; especially since nothing can be more dan" gerous than to give Antony time to recover strength.

" My next letters from Italy will determine the plan of my operations: And as the " corn is now cut down, and partly carried in, I shall be more at liberty to execute them " without obstruction from the season of the year. In the mean time, let me assure you, " that I will neither desert nor survive the Republic. It is a misfortune, however, that " my distance from the scene of action is so great, and the roads so infested, that it is " often six weeks, and sometimes more, ere I can be informed of any event that has hap" pened. Farewell."

This letter is without a date, but appears to have been written in the end of June, or the beginning of July.

Correspondence be- L. Munatius Plancus, who had been Prætor during the Spanish war, was now Governor tween Plancus and Cicer- of farther Gaul, and had the command of three legions: Upon the death of Cæsar, Cicer-onus. 5, 6, 7.) and Plancus, who was to succeed to the consulate the year following, together with D. Brutus, thought it for his interest to declare in favour of the public Council of the State, which he saw supported by his Colleague elect, by the two Consuls, and Octavius.
 He had hesitated long before he declared himself.

PLANCUS, Consul Elect, to the Consuls, the Prætors, the Tribunes, the Senate, and the Commons of Rome.

Ep. Fam. 2. 3. " BEFORE I make any professions with respect to my future conduct, I deem it ne-Alcim. xiii. cessary to justify myself to those who may think that I have held the Republic too long in 17. " suspense concerning my designs. For I would by no means have it imagined that I am
 " atoning for my past behaviour, when, in fact, I am only seizing the first favourable " opportunity of publicly declaring a resolution, which I have long formed. I was in no
 " sort ignorant, however, that, at a time of such general and alarming confusions, a less " deliberate discovery of my intentions would have proved most to my own private advan" tage: As I was sensible that several of my fellow-citizens had been distinguished with
 " great

he contrived still to delay it, till it was too late; thinking he was more usefully employed in securing to his interests the troops of the
 VOL. IV. S f Consuls, ^{Y. R. 710.} ^{Bef. Chr.} ^{42.} ^{409 Conf.}

“ great honours, by a more hasty explication of their purposes. But as fortune has “ placed me in such a situation that I could not be earlier in testifying mine, without pre“ judicing that cause, which I could better serve by concealing them; I was willing to “ suffer for a season in the good opinion of the world, as I preferred the interest of the “ Public to that of my own reputation. That this was the genuine motive of my pro“ ceedings can not reasonably, I trust, be questioned. For can it be supposed, that a “ man in my prosperous circumstances, and of my well-known course of life, whose utmost “ hopes too were upon the very point of being crowned, could be capable either of meanly “ submitting to the destructive ambition of another, or impiously cherishing any dan“ gerous schemes of his own? But it required some time, as well as much pains and ex“ pence, to render myself able to perform those assurances I purposed to give to the Re“ public, and to every friend of her cause; that I might not approach with mere empty “ professions to the assistance of my country, but with the power of performing an effec“ tual service. To this end, as the army under my command had been strongly and “ frequently solicited to revolt, it was necessary to persuade them, that a moderate re“ ward, conferred by the general voice of the Commonwealth, was far preferable to an “ infinitely greater, from any single hand. My next labour was to convince those many “ cities, which had been gained the last year by largesses and other donations, that these “ were obligations of no validity, and that they should endeavour to obtain the same be“ nefactions from a better and more honourable quarter. I had still the farther task, to “ prevail with those who commanded in the neighbouring provinces to join with the “ more numerous party, in a general association for the defence of our common liberties, “ rather than unite with the smaller number, in hopes of dividing the spoils of a victory,
 “ that must prove fatal to the whole world. Add to this, that I was obliged to augment “ my own troops and those of my auxiliaries; that I might have nothing to fear, when“ ever I should think proper, contrary to the inclination of some about me, openly to avow
 “ the cause it was my resolution to defend. Now I shall never be ashamed to acknow“ ledge, that, in order to bring these several schemes to bear, I submitted, tho’ very un“ willingly, indeed, to the mortification of dissembling the intentions I really had, and of “ counterfeiting those which I certainly had not: As the fate of my colleague [D. Brutus] had “ taught me how dangerous it is for a man, who means well to his country, to divulge his resolu- “ tions, ere he is sufficiently prepared to carry them into execution.” [To what particular circum“ stance of Decimus’s conduct Plancus alludes, history does not discover: Perhaps he indiscreet-“ ly threatened, in his consulate, to annul Antony’s acts, which imprudent declaration of his “ sentiments engaged Antony to dispossess him of the important province of Cisalpine Gaul.]
 “ For this reason it was that I directed my brave and worthy Lieutenant, C. Furnius, to “ represent to you, more fully than I thought prudent to explain in my dispatches, those “ measures which seemed necessary both for the preservation of this province, and of the “ Republic in general; as being the more concealed method of conveying my sentiments “ to you upon that subject, as well as the safer with respect to myself.

“ It appears then, that I have long been secretly attentive to the defence of the Com“ monwealth. But, now that, by the bounty of the gods, I am in every respect better “ prepared for that purpose, I desire to give the world not only reason to hope well of “ my intentions, but clear and undoubted proofs of their sincerity.

“ I have five legions in readiness to march; all of them zealously attached to the Re“ public, and disposed by my liberalities to pay an intire obedience to my orders. The “ same disposition appears in every city throughout this province: As they earnestly vie “ with each other in giving me the strongest marks of their duty. Accordingly they have “ furnished me with as considerable a body of auxiliary forces both horse and foot, as “ they could possibly have raised for the support of their own national liberties. As for “ myself, I am ready either to remain here, in order to protect this province, or to march “ wheresoever else the Republic shall demand my services. I will offer you another al“ ternative;

Y. R. 710
 Bef. Chr.
 43.
 459 Conf.

Consuls, and watching the motions of the Senate : And, besides, most of the officers and soldiers in his army were attached to Antony. D.
Brutus

"ternative; and either resign my troops and government into any hands that shall be appointed, or draw upon myself the whole weight of the war: If, by this means, I may be able to establish the tranquillity of my country, or even retard those calamities with which it is threatened.

"If, at the time I am making these declarations, our public disturbances should happily be composed, I shall rejoice in an event so advantageous to the Commonwealth, notwithstanding the honour I shall lose by being too late in the tender of my services."

[This passage sufficiently discovers, says M. Melmoth, the true motive of Plancus's present declarations: As they appear evidently to have flowed from some reason he had to believe, that the contest between Antony and the Senate was likely to be adjusted in an amicable manner.] "But, on the contrary, if I am early enough in my offers to bear a full part in all the dangers of the war, let me recommend it to every man of justice and candour to vindicate me against the malevolence of those, whom envy may prompt to asperse my character.

"In my own particular, I desire no greater reward for my services, than the satisfaction of having contributed to the security of the Republic. But I think myself bound to recommend those brave and worthy men to your especial favour, who, partly in compliance with my persuasions, but much more in confidence of your good faith, would not suffer themselves to be prevailed upon by all the applications that have been made, both to their hopes and their fears, to depart from their duty to the Commonwealth."

This letter, which bears no date, appears to have been written in the beginning of March: Cicero's answer to it, Ep. Fam. x. 10. Melmoth. xiii. 18, is dated March the 30th. In a subsequent letter, received at Rome the 7th of April, which is lost, he sent the Senate a more satisfactory account of his designs, and acquainted them that he had begun his march towards Italy, which afforded Cicero an occasion to move, that honours should be decreed him: The following very instructive letter is an account of the debates of the Senate on that occasion.

CICERO TO PLANCUS.

Ep. Fam.
 x. 12.
Melmoth xiii.

"IT is principally for the sake of my country, that I ought to rejoice in the very powerful succours with which you have strengthened the Republic, at a juncture when it is well-nigh reduced to the last extremity. I protest, however, by all my hopes of congratulating you on the victorious deliverance of the Commonwealth, that a considerable part of the joy which I feel, upon this occasion, arises from the share I take in your glory. Great, indeed, is the reputation you have already acquired; and great, I am persuaded, are the honours that will hereafter be paid to you: For, assure yourself, nothing could make a stronger impression upon the Senate than your late letter to that assembly. It did so, both with respect to those very important services, which it brought us an account you had performed, and with regard to that strength of sentiment and expression with which it was drawn up. It contained nothing, however, which was in the least unexpected to myself: As I was not only perfectly well acquainted with your heart, and had not forgotten the promises you had given me in your letters; but as I had received from Farnius a full information of all your designs. They appeared, however, to the Senate, much beyond what they had allowed themselves to hope: Not that they ever entertained the least doubt of your disposition, but because they were by no means sufficiently apprised either of what you were in a condition to effect, or whither you purposed to march. It was with infinite pleasure, therefore, that I read the letter, which M. Variscus delivered to me on your part. I received it, on the 7th of this month in the morning, amidst a large circle of very worthy citizens, who were attending in order to conduct me from my house: And I immediately gave them a share in my joy. Whilst we were mutually congratulating each other upon this happy occurrence, “rence, Munatius [Plancus's brother] came to pay me his usual morning-visit; to whom “I likewise communicated your letter. It was the first notice he had received of an ex“press being arrived from you: As Varisidius, in pursuance of your directions, did not “deliver any of his dispatches till he had first waited upon me. A short time, however, “after Munatius had left me, he returned, with your letter to himself, together also with “that which you wrote to the Senate. We thought proper to carry the latter immedi“ately to Cornutus, who, as Prætor of the city, supplies the office of the Consuls, in their “absence, agreeably, you know, to an ancient and established custom. The Senate was in“stantly summoned: And the expectation, that was raised by the general report of an ex“press being arrived from you, brought together a very full assembly. As soon as your “letter was read, it was objected that Cornutus had not taken the auspices in a proper “manner: And this scruple was confirmed by the general sentiment of our college [of Augurs.]

 “In consequence of this, the Senate was adjourned to the following day: When I had a warm “contest with Servilius, who strenuously opposed the passing of any decree to your ho“nour. For this purpose, he had the interest [with Cornutus] to procure his own motion “to be first proposed to the Senate: Which being rejected, however, by a great majo“rity, mine was next taken into consideration. But, when the Senate had unanimously “agreed to it, P. Titius [one of the Tribunes] at the instigation of Servilius, interposed “his negative. The farther deliberation, therefore, upon this affair was postponed to “the next day: When Servilius came, prepared to support an opposition, which in some “sort might be considered as injurious to the honour even of Jupiter himself, as it was “in the Capitol that the Senate, upon this occasion, was assembled. I leave it to your “other friends to inform you, in what manner I mortified Servilius, and with how much “warmth I exposed the contemptible interposition of Titius. But this I will myself as“sure you, that the Senate could not possibly act with greater dignity and spirit, or shew
 “a stronger disposition to advance your honours, than it discovered upon this occasion.
 “Nor are you less in favour with the whole city in general: As, indeed, all orders and “degrees of men amongst us remarkably concur in the same common zeal for the delive“rance of the Republic. Persevere then, my friend, in the glorious course upon which “you have entered: And let nothing less than immortal fame be the object of your well-“directed ambition. Despise the false splendor of all those empty honours that are “short, transitory, and perishable. True glory is founded upon virtue alone: Which is “never so illustriously distinguished, as when it displays itself by important services to “our country. You have at this time a most favourable opportunity for that purpose:
 “Which, as you have already embraced, let it not slip out of your hands till you shall “have employed it to full advantage; lest it be said, that you are more obliged to the “Republic than the Republic is obliged to you. As for my own part, you will always “find me ready to contribute to the advancement, as well as to the support of your digni-“ties: As, indeed, it is what I owe, not only to our friendship, but to the Common“wealth, which is far dearer to me than life itself. Farewell.” April the 11th.

PLANCUS TO CICERO.

“I passed the Rhone, Ep. Fam.
 “with my whole army, on the 27th of April: And immediately ordered a detachment of x. 9.
 “a thousand horse [or rather three thousand horse, as they are numbered in a subsequent Melm. xiv.
 “letter] “to advance before me from Vienna, by a shorter road, and by long marches. If “I meet with no obstructions on the part of Lepidus, the Republic will have reason to be “satisfied with my diligence and expedition: But, if he should attempt to intercept my “passage, I must take my measures as circumstances shall require. Of this, however, I “will now assure you, that the army I am conducting is highly respectable, whether “considered with regard to the nature, the number, or the fidelity of my troops. I will “only add, that I desire your friendship upon no other terms, than as you are sure I shall “always give you the warmest returns of mine.”

CICERO TO PLANCUS.

Ep. Fam. x. 14. "HOW pleasing was the letter I received from you two days before our victory at Melm. xiv. 4. "Mutina: Wherein you gave me an account of the state of your troops, of your zeal for
"the Republic, and of the expedition with which you were advancing to the relief of "Sextus. But, notwithstanding the enemy was defeated before you could join our ar"my, the hopes, nevertheless, of the Commonwealth are still fixed intirely upon you: As "the principal Leaders of these infamous Rebels have escaped, it is said, from the field of "battle. You will remember, therefore, that to exterminate the remains of this party will be "as great as less acceptable to the Senate, than if you had given them the first repulse.
"I am waiting, as well as many others, with great impatience, for the return of your
"couriers. I hope that our late success will now induce even Lepidus himself to act in con"cert with you for the defence of the common cause. I intreat you, my dear Plancus,
"to employ your utmost endeavours for this important purpose; that every spark of "this horrid war may be utterly and for ever extinguished. If you should be able to ef"fect this, you will render a most godlike service to your country, and, at the same time,
"procure immortal honour to yourself. Farewell." May the 5th.
Cicero, after Antony's defeat at Mutina, obtained of the Senate the honours in favour of Plancus, which Sextus and the Tribune Tullius had opposed before with success.

PLANCUS TO CICERO.

Ep. Fam. x. 11. "I GIVE you a thousand and a thousand thanks for your late favours, which, as Melm. xiv. 7. "long as I live, I shall always most gratefully acknowledge; more than this I dare not "venture to promise. For I fear it will never be in my power to acquit such uncommon "obligations: Unless you should think, (what your letter endeavours, indeed, with much "serious eloquence, to persuade me, that to remember them is to return them. You could "not have acted with a more affectionate zeal, if the dignities of your own son had been
"in question; and I am perfectly sensible of the high honours that were decreed to me
"in consequence of your first motion for that purpose. I am sensible too, that all your "subsequent votes, in my behalf, were intirely conformable to the circumstances of the "times, and the opinion of my friends; as I am informed, likewise, of the advantageous
"colours, in which you are perpetually representing me, as well as of the frequent con"tests you sustain with my injurious detractors. It is incumbent upon me, therefore, in "the first place, to endeavour to convince the Republic, that I am worthy of the praises
"you bestow upon me; and, in the next place, to render you sensible, that I gratefully
"bear your friendship in remembrance. I will only add, under this article, that I desire
"you to protect me in the honours I have thus procured by your influence: But I desire
"it no otherwise than as my actions shall prove that I am the man you wish to find me.
"As soon as I had passed the Rhene, I detached a body of three thousand horse, un"der the conduct of my brother, with orders to advance towards Mutina; to which "place I intended to follow them with the rest of my army. But, on my march thither,
"I received advice that an action had happened, and that the siege was raised. Antony,
"I find, has no other resource left, but to return into these parts, with the remains of "his broken forces. His only hopes, indeed, are, that he may be able either to gain
"Lepidus, or his army: In which there are some troops no less disaffected to the Republic,
"than those which served under Antony himself. I thought proper, therefore to recall my "cavalry, and to halt in the country of the Allobroges, that I might be ready to act as "circumstances shall require. If Antony should retire into this country, destitute of "men, I make no doubt, notwithstanding he should be received by the army of Lepi-
"das, to be able to give a good account of him with my present forces. Should he even "appear at the head of some troops, and should the tenth veteran legion revolt, which, to"gether with the rest, was, by my means, prevailed upon to engage in the service of the "Republic; yet I shall endeavour, by acting on the defensive, to prevent him from gain"ing any advantage over us: Which I hope to effect, till a reinforcement from Italy shall "enable me to exterminate this desperate crew. I will venture, at least, to assure you,
"my

Brutus was, from the first apprehensive of his change¹, and, why he himself was not able to pursue his enemy so soon as he wished, he gives the following reasons in a letter to Cicero.

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.
42.
409 C. nf.

D. BRUTUS

“ my dear Cicero, neither zeal nor vigilance shall be wanting on my part for that purpose.
“ It is my sincere wish, indeed, that the Senate may have no farther fears : But, if any “ should still remain, no man will enter into their cause with greater warmth and spirit, “ nor be willing to suffer more in the support of it, than myself.

“ I am endeavouring to engage Lepidus to join with me in the same views : And I have “ promised him, if he will act with a regard to the interest of the Republic, that I shall,
“ upon all occasions, yield him an entire deference. I have employed my brother, together “ with Furnus and Laelius, to negotiate this association between us, and no private “ injury done to myself shall ever prevent me from concurring with my greatest enemy, “ whenever it may be necessary for the defence of the Commonwealth. But, notwith“ standing these overtures should prove unsuccessful, I shall still persevere with the same “ zeal (and perhaps with more glory in my endeavours to give satisfaction to the Se“ nate.”

¹ D. BRUTUS TO CICERO.

“ YOU are sensible how great a loss the Republic has sustained, by the death of Pan- Correspondence be“ sa. It behoves you, therefore, to exert all your credit and address to prevent our ene- tween D.
“ mies from entertaining any reasonable hope of recovering their strength, now that we Brutus and “ have lost both our Consuls. I am preparing to pursue Antony immediately : And, I trust, Cicero.
“ shall be able to render it impossible either for Antony to continue in Italy, or for Venti- Ep. Fam.
“ dus to escape out of it — I make it my first and principal request, that you would xi. 9.
“ send to Lepidus, in order, if possible, to prevent that light and inconstant man from re- Mclm. xiv.
“ newing the war, by joining Antony; as to Pollio, I suppose you see very clearly the mea- 3.
“ sures he will pursue !” [that he will act in concert with Lepidus.] “ They are both at “ the head of very numerous and warlike legions. I do not mention this as imagining
“ you are not equally attentive to this important point; but from a firm persuasion that “ LEPIDUS, however dubious it may, perhaps, appear to the Senate, will never act of him“ self in the manner he ought. Let me intreat you, likewise, to confirm Plancus in his pre“ sent resolutions : Who, I should hope, when he sees Antony driven out of Italy, will not “ be wanting in his assistance to the Republic. If the latter should have crossed the Alps, “ I purpose to post a proper number of forces to guard the passes of those mountains :
“ And you may depend upon my giving you regular notice of all my motions.” From my camp at Regium [Reggio between Moldena and Parma] April the 29th.

D. BRUTUS TO CICERO.

“ I LOOK upon the obligations I have received from you, as nothing inferior even I am.
“ to those which I have conferred upon the Republic : But I am not capable, you are well xi. 10.
“ assured, of making you so ill a return as I have experienced from some of my un- Mclm. xiv.
“ grateful countrymen. It might, perhaps, in the present conjuncture, be thought to 6.
“ have somewhat of the air of flattery to say, that your single applause outweighs, in my “ esteem, their whole united approbation. It is certain, however, that you view my “ actions by the faithful light of dispassionate truth and reason : Whereas they, on the “ contrary, look upon them through the darkest clouds of envy and malevolence. But “ I am little concerned how much soever they may oppose my honours, provided they do “ not obstruct me in my services to the Republic : the very dangerous situation of which let “ me now point out to you, in as few words as possible.
“ In the first place, you are sensible, what great disturbances the death of the Consuls “ may create in Rome : As it may give occasion to all the dangerous practices that ambition will “ suggest to those who are desirous of succeeding to their office. This is all that prudence will “ advise.”

Y. R. 713.
Bel. Chr.

D. BRUTUS TO CICERO.

42.
409 Cons.

Ep. Fam.
II. 13.
Mém. xiv.
17.

" IF you will look back into my former letters, you cannot be at a loss to discover the reasons that prevented me from pursuing Antony, imme-

" allow me to say in a letter; and all, indeed, that is necessary to be said to a man of your penetration. [No, Cicero, the Prophet, had not this penetration, or wilfully shut his eyes.]—" As to Antony, notwithstanding he made his escape from the field of battle with but a very few troops, and those too entirely disarmed; yet, by setting open the prisons, and by pressing all sorts of men that fell in his way, he has collected no contemptible number of forces. These have, likewise been considerably augmented by the accession of the veteran and other troops of Ventidius: he, after a very difficult march, over the Apennine mountains, has found means to join Antony in the fens of Sabazia. [Between the Alps and the Apennines on the coast of Genoa] The only possible scheme which the latter can pursue is either to have recourse to Lepidus, if that General should be disposed to receive him; or to post him self on the Alps and Apennines, in order to make depredations with his cavalry (in which he is exceedingly strong) on the neighbouring country; or to march into Etruria. [Tuscany] " where we have no army to oppose him. Had CÆSAR, however, possessed the Apennine mountains, agreeably to my advice, I should have driven Antony into such difficulties, that, perhaps, without striking a single blow, I should have been able to have wasted his whole army by famine. But the misfortune is, that Cæsar will neither be governed by me, nor will his army be governed by him: Both which are very unhappy circumstances for our cause. His then being the sad state of public affairs, can I be solicitous, as I said above, what opposition I may meet with in respect to my own personal honours? The particulars I have here mentioned are of so very delicate a nature, that I know not how you will be able to touch upon them in the Senate: Or, if you should, I fear it will be to no purpose.—In the mean time, I am in no condition to subsist my troops any longer. When I first took up arms for the deliverance of the Commonwealth, I had above four hundred thousand sesteria, [about 322,000 l. sterl.] in ready money: But, at present, I have not only mortgaged every part of my estate, but have borrowed all I could possibly raise on the credit of my friends. I leave you to judge, therefore, with what difficulty I now maintain seven legions at my own expence. The truth is, I should not be equal to so great a charge, were I possessed of all Varro's immense treasures.—As soon as I shall receive any certain information of Antony's motions, I will give you notice." From my camp at Tortona [Tortona, about 30 miles from Genoa,] May the 5th.

D. BRUTUS TO CICERO.

Ep. Fam.
II. 11.
Mém. xiv.
8.

" " I gave you an account, in my last, of the posture of our affairs: Since which I have received intelligence, that Antony is on his march towards Lepidus. Among some papers of Antony, which are fallen into my hands, I found a list of the several persons, whom he intended to employ as mediators in his behalf with Pollio, Lepidus, and Plancus: So that he has not yet, it seems, given up all hopes of gaining the latter. Nevertheless, I did not hesitate to send an immediate express to Plancus, with advice of Antony's march. I expect within few days to receive ambassadors from the Allobroges, and all the other districts of this province; and I doubt not of dismissing them strongly confirmed in their allegiance to the Republic. You will be attentive, on your part, I dare say, to promote all such necessary measures at Rome as shall be agreeable to your sentiments, and to the interest of the Commonwealth. I am equally persuaded that you will prevent, if it be possible to prevent, the malevolent schemes of my enemies. But, if you should not succeed in these generous endeavours, you will, at least, have the satisfaction to find, that no indignities they can throw upon me are capable “ immediately after the battle of Mutina. The truth, my dear Cicero, “ is, that I was not only unprovided both with cavalry and baggage-“ horses, Y. R. 710.

Bef. Chr.
42.
409 Conf.

“ capable of deterring me from my purposes. From my camp on the frontiers of the “ Statiellenses,” [A territory in Liguria, the principal town of which was Aquæ Statiellorum, now called Aqui, in the district of Montferrat.] May the 5th.

CICERO to D. BRUTUS, Consul Elect.

“ THE message you commissioned Galba and Volumnius to deliver to the Senate suf“ ficiently intimates the nature of those fears and suspicions, which you imagine we have “ reason to entertain. But I must confess that the apprehensions you would thus infuse “ into us seem by no means worthy of that glorious victory you have obtained over the “ enemies of the Commonwealth. Believe me, my dear Brutus, both the Senate, and “ the Generals that support its cause, are animated with an undaunted resolution: We “ were sorry, therefore, that you, whom we esteem the bravest Captain that ever the Re“ public employed, should think us capable of any timidity. Is it possible, indeed, af“ ter having confidently reposed our hopes on your courage and conduct, when you were “ invested by Antony in all the fulness of his strength and power, that any of us should “ harbour the least fear, now that the siege is raised, and the enemy’s army entirely over“ thrown. Nor have we any thing, surely, to apprehend from Lepidus. For who can “ imagine him so utterly void of all rational conduct, as to have professed himself an ad“ vocate for peace, when we were engaged in a most necessary and important war; and “ yet to take up arms, the moment that peace is restored? You are far too sagacious, I “ doubt not, to entertain such a thought.” [For the honour of Cicero’s sagacity, we must “ suppose that he is not in earnest.] “ Nevertheless, the fears you have renewed amongst us,
 “ at a time, when every temple throughout Rome is resounding with our thanksgivings
 “ for your deliverance, has cast a very considerable damp upon our joy. May the fact “ prove then, what indeed I am inclined to believe, as well as hope, that Antony is com“ pletely vanquished. But, should he happen to recover some degree of strength, he “ will most assuredly find, that neither the Senate is destitute of wisdom, nor the People “ of courage: I will add too, nor the Republic of a General, so long as you shall be “ alive to lead forth her armies.” May the 19th. Ep. Fam.
xi. 18.
Melm. xiv.
11.

CICERO to D. BRUTUS, Consul Elect.

“ IT is with infinite satisfaction, my dear Brutus, that I find you approve my conduct in “ the Senate, with respect both to the Decemvirs,” [They were probably the ten per“ sons whom the Senate, in the first transports of joy for their supposed complete victory “ over Antony, had appointed to inquire into his conduct during his late consulship] “ and “ to the honours decreed to our young man. Yet, after all, what have my labours “ availed? Believe me, my friend, and you know I am not apt to boast, the Senate was
 “ the grand engine of my power: But all those springs, which I used so successfully to “ manage, have utterly lost their force, and I can no longer direct its motions. The truth “ of it is, the news of your glorious sally with the garrison of Mutina, of Antony’s flight, “ and of his army being intirely cut to pieces, had inspired such confident hopes of a “ complete victory, that the disappointment has cast a general damp upon the spirit I “ had raised against our enemies: And all my ardent invectives seem at last to have proved “ just as insignificant as if I had been combating with my own shadow. But to the “ purpose of your letter.—Those, who are acquainted with the dispositions of the fourth
 “ and Martial legions, assure me, they will never be prevailed on to serve under you.
 “ As to the supply of money, which you desire, some measures may, and most assuredly shall,
 “ be taken, in order to raise it.—I am wholly in your sentiments, with regard to the calling “ Brutus out of Greece, and retaining Cæsar here for the protection of Italy. I agree “ with you, likewise, my dear Brutus, that you have enemies: And, though I find it, “ indeed,

Y. R. 715. " horses, but, not having, at that time, had an interview with Cæsar, Bel. Chr. " I could not depend upon his assistance : And I was wholly ignorant 42.
 459 Conf. " likewise, that Hirtius was killed, This will account for my not ha————— " ving pursued Antony on the day of the engagement. The day fol" lowing I received an express from Pansa to attend him at Bononia :
 " But, in my way thither, being informed of his death, I immediately " returned

" indeed, no very difficult matter to sustain their attacks, yet still, however, they some" what embarrass my schemes in your favour.—The legions from Africa are daily ex" pected. In the mean time, the world is greatly astonished to find that the war is broke " out again in your province. Nothing, in truth, ever happened so unexpectedly : As " we had promised ourselves, from the account of the victory, which was brought to us
 " on your birth-day, that the peace of the Republic was established for many genera" tions. But, now, all our fears are revived, with as much strength as ever.—You men" tioned, in your letter, dated the 15th of May, [it is lost] " that you was just informed,
 " by an express from Plancus, that Lepidus had refused to receive Antony. Should this prove " to be fact, our business will be so much the easier ; if not, we shall have a very difficult
 " struggle to maintain ; and it depends upon you to ease me of my great apprehensions
 " for the event. As for my own part, I have exhausted all my powers, and am utterly " incapable of doing more than I have already performed. It is far otherwise, however,
 " with my friend : And I not only wish, but expect, to see you the greatest and most dis" tinguished of Romans. Farewell."

CICERO TO D. BRUTUS, Consul Elect.

Ep. Fam. " I AM indebted to you for your short letter by Flaccus Volumnius, as well as for two
 xi. 12. " others more full ; one of which was brought by the courier of T. Vibius, as the other Milm. xiv. " was forwarded to me by Lepus : And all of them came to my hands on the same day.
 16. " I find, by your own account, as well as by that which Gracius has given me, that the " war, so far from being extinguished, seems to be breaking out again with greater vio" lence. You are sensible, if Antony should gain any strength, that all your illustrious " services to the Republic will be utterly frustrated. The first accounts we received here, " and which, indeed, were universally credited, represented him as having run away in " great consternation ; attended only with a few frightened and disarmed soldiers. But if " the truth, after all, should be, what Gracius assures me, that ANTONY is in fact so strong,
 " as to render it unsafe to give him battle ; he does not seem so much to have fled from Mutina,
 " as to have changed the face of war. This unexpected news has given all Rome another " countenance. And a general air of disappointment appears in every face. There are even " some among us who complain of your not having immediately pursued ANTONY, as they " imagine, if not he had been hit, that he must inevitably have been destroyed. But it is " usual with the people in all governments, and especially in ours, to be particularly dis" posed to abuse their liberty, by licentious reflections on those to whom they are in" debted for the enjoyment of it. However, one should be careful not to give them any just " cause for their censures." [The letter copied above, in the body of the history, is the " answer to this unreasonable, unseasonable, and ungenerous reflection.]—" To say all in one
 " word, whoever destroys ANTONY will have the glory of terminating the war : A HINT
 " WHICH I HAD RATHER LEAVE TO YOUR OWN REFLECTIONS, THAN ENTER MY-" SELF INTO A MORE OPEN EXPLANATION. Farewell." [In a letter to Plancus, Ep.
 Fam. x. 13 Milm. xiv. 5. we find the same hint. " Let me only intreat you to finish the " work, which others have so happily begun ; remembering, that whoever shall destroy " Antony will have the whole honour of concluding this war. It is thus that Homer gives
 " the glory, not to Ajax or Achilles, but to Ulysses alone, of having exterminated Trojans."
 [His meaning could hardly be mistaken, that any stratagem would be fair and honourable, which should for ever remove ANTONY out of their way. See McKnight, Vol. III. p. 260.]

“ returned back to join my little corps. I may justly call them so, in“ deed, as my forces are greatly diminished, and in a very bad condi“ tion, from the great hardships they suffered during the siege. It was “ by these means that Antony got two days advance of me: And, as “ he marched in disorder, he could retire much faster than it was in my “ power to pursue. He increased his forces likewise, by pressing the “ inhabitants, and throwing open the prisons, in every town through “ which he passed: And in this manner he continued his march, till he “ arrived in the Fens of Sabata. This is a place with which I must “ bring you acquainted. It is situated between the Alps and the Apen- “ nines, and the roads that lie about it are scarce practicable. When I “ had reached within thirty miles of Antony, I was informed that he had “ been joined by Ventidius, and had made a speech at the head of their “ combined troops, to persuade them to follow him over the Alps; as“ suring them that LEPIDUS had agreed to support him. Nevertheless, “ not only his own soldiers, which, indeed, are a very inconsiderable “ number, but those likewise of Ventidius, wholly and unanimously “ declared, that they were determined either to conquer, or perish in “ Italy: And, at the same time, desired they might be conducted to “ *Pollentia*². Antony found it in vain to oppose them: However, he “ deferred his march till the ensuing day. As soon as I received this “ intelligence, I detached five cohorts to Pollentia: And am now fol“ lowing them with the remainder of my troops. This detachment “ threw themselves into that city an hour before Trebellius arrived with “ his cavalry: A circumstance which gives me great satisfaction, as it “ is a point, I think, upon which our whole success depends. When “ the enemy found their designs were thus frustrated, they conceived “ hopes of crossing the Alps into Gaul: As they supposed the four le“ gions commanded by Plancus would not be able to withstand their “ united forces; and that an army from Italy could not overtake them “ soon enough to prevent their passage. However, the Allobroges, to“ gether with my detachment, have hitherto been sufficient to prevent “ their design: Which, I trust, they will find still more difficult to ef“ fect, when I shall come up with the rest of my forces. But, should “ they happen, in the mean time, to pass the Isara [Isere], I shall exert
 “ my utmost endeavours that this circumstance may not be attended “ with any ill consequences to the Commonwealth.

“ Let it raise the spirits and hopes of the Senate, to observe, that “ Plancus and myself, together with our respective armies, act in per“ fect concert with each other, and are ready to hazard every danger in “ support of the common cause. However, whilst you thus confident“ ly rely on our zeal and diligence, you will remit nothing, I hope, of ² Some remains of this city still subsist, under the name of Polenzo. It is situated at the confluence of the Stura and the Tanaro, in Piedmont.

Y. R. 710. " your own ; but employ your utmost care to send us a reinforcement, Ref. Chr. " as well as every other necessary supply, that may render us in a con-
 42. dition to defend your liberties against those who have infamously 409 Conf. " conspired their ruin. One cannot, indeed, but look upon these our " enemies with so much the greater indignation, as they have acted
 " with the vilest hypocrisy ; and suddenly turned those troops against " their country, which they long pretended to have raised for its de" fence."

Middl. p. This authentic account from D. Brutus confutes two facts, which are
 439. delivered by Appian, and generally received by all the modern histo-
 L. iii. p. rians ; first, that Octavius, after the victory, refused to have any con-
 573. ference with D. Brutus ; and that Brutus, for that reason, forbade him to enter his province, or to pursue Antony : Secondly, that Pansa, in his last moments, sent for Octavius and advised him to an union with Antony against the Senate. Both the stories seem to have been forged afterwards to save Octavius's honour, and give a better colour to that sudden change of measures, which, from this hour, he was determined to pursue ^a.

D. Brutus complains, in all his letters, of his want of money and the sad condition of his army, which was not contemptible for the number, but for the kind of his troops ; being, for the most part, new-raised, bare, and needy of all things. He desired, therefore, a present supply of money, and some veteran legions, especially the fourth and Martial, which continued still with Octavius. This was readily decreed to him by the Senate, at the motion of Drusus and Paulus, Lepidus's brother ; but the legions refused to serve under him. He had also desired Cicero to write to Lepidus not to receive Antony, though he was sure, he says, that LEPIDUS would never do any thing that was right : And wishes, likewise, that Cicero would confirm Plancus ; since, by some of Antony's papers, which fell into his hands, he perceived that Antony had not lost all hopes of him ; and thought himself sure of Lepidus and Pollio. Of which he gave Plancus immediate notice, and signified, that he was coming forward with all expedition to join with him.

Plancus,

^a There is an original medal still remaining, that gives no small confirmation to this notion ; and was struck probably at Rome, either by Pansa himself, upon his marching out towards Arminia ; or by the Senate, soon after Pansa's death ; in testimony of the strict union that subsisted between him and D. Brutus Albinus. For, on the one side, there is the head of a Silenus, as it is called, or rather of Pan, which is frequent on Pansa's coins, with the inscription also of his name, C. PANSA : And, on the other, ALBINUS. BRUTI.
 F. with two right hands joined, holding a caduceus, as an emblem of the strictest amity and concord. See Fam. Vibia. in Vaisset. or Morel.

PLANCUS,

*Plancus*ⁱ, as may be seen in his correspondence with Cicero above, had begun a negociation with Lepidus, to unite their forces against Antony:

Y. R. 710.

Bef. Chr.

42.

T t 2

It 409 Conf.

PLANCUS TO CICERO.

Continuation of the correspondence between Plancus and Cicero.

"SOME occurrences have arisen since I closed my former letter, of which I think it may import the Republic that you should be apprised. As both the Commonwealth and myself, I hope, have reaped advantage from my assiduity in the affair I am going to mention. I solicited Lepidus, by repeated expresses, to lay aside all animosities between us, and amicably unite with me in concerting measures for the succour of the Republic; conjuring him to prefer the interest of his family and his country to that of a contemtable and desperate rebel; and assuring him, that, if he did so, he might entirely command me upon all occasions. Accordingly, by the intervention of LATERENSIS, I have succeeded in my negociation, and LEPIDUS has given me his honour, that, if he cannot prevent ANTONY from entering his province, he will most certainly lead his army against him. He requests, likewise, that I should join him with my forces; and the rather, as Antony is extremely strong in cavalry, whereas that of Lepidus is very considerable: And, out of these few, ten of his best men have lately deserted to my camp. As soon as I received this express, I lost no time to forward and assist the good intentions of Lepidus. I clearly saw, indeed, the advantage that would arise from my joining him: As my horse would be of service in pursuing and destroying Antony's cavalry, and as the presence of my troops in general would be a restraint upon the disaffected part of those under his command. To this end, having spent a day in throwing a bridge across the Isara [Isere], a very considerable river that bounds the territories of the Allobroges, I passed it, with my whole army, on the 12th of May. But, having received advice that L. Antonius [Antony's brother] "was advancing towards us with a body of horse and foot, and that he was actually arrived at Forum Julii [Frejus]; I ordered, on the 14th, a detachment of four thousand horse to meet him under the command of my brother: Whom I purpose to follow, by long marches, with four light-armed legions, and the remainder of my cavalry. And, should that fortune, which presides over the Republic, prove in any degree favourable to my arms, I shall soon put an end at once both to our own fears, and to the hopes of these insolent rebels. But if the infamous Antony, apprised of our approach, should retire towards Italy; it will be the business of Brutus to intercept his march: And Brutus, I am persuaded, will not be wanting either in courage and conduct for that purpose. Nevertheless, I shall, in that case, send my brother with a detachment of horse to harass Antony in his retreat, and to protect Italy from his depredations."

Ep. Fam.

x. 15.

Melm. xiv.

9.

PLANCUS TO CICERO.

"ANTONY arrived at Forum Julii [Frejus] with the van of his army on the 15th of May: And Ventidius is only two days march behind him. Lepidus writes me word, that he proposes to wait for me at Forum Voconis [Le Luc] where he is at present encamped; a place about four-and-twenty miles distant from Forum Julii: If he and fortune do not deceive my expectations, the Senate may depend upon my speedily terminating this business to their full satisfaction.—I mentioned to you, in a former letter, that the great fatigues which my brother had undergone by his continual marches had extremely impaired his constitution. However, as soon as he was sufficiently recovered to get abroad, he considered his health as an acquisition which he had gained as much for the service of the Republic, as for himself; and was the first, therefore, to engage in every hazardous expedition. But I have recommended it to him, and indeed insisted that he should return to Rome, as he would be much more likely to wear himself away by continuing in the camp, than be able to give me any assistance. Besides, I imagined, now that the Republic was most unhappily deprived of both the Consuls, that the presence of so worthy a magistrate would be absolutely necessary at Rome. But, if any

Ep. Fam.

x. 17.

Melm. xiv.

12.

of

Y. R. 710. It was managed on Plancus's side by Furnius; on Lepidus's by Laterensis, one of his Lieutenants, a true friend to the Senate and zealous to engage
 E. 5. 42. 407 C. J. f.

" of you should think otherwise, let me be censured for my imprudent advice, but let
 " not my brother be condemned as failing in his duty. — Lepidus, agreeably to my re" quest, has delivered Apella into my hands, as an hostage for the faithful execution of " his engagements to co-operate with me in the defence of the Commonwealth. L. Gel-
 " lius has given me proofs of his zeal: As he has acted also in the affair of the three bro" thers to the satisfaction of Sex. Gavianus. I have lately employed the latter in some " negotiations between Lepidus and myself: And I have found him firmly attached to " the interest of the Republic. It is with great pleasure I give this testimony in his fa" vour: A tribute which I shall always be ready to pay, wherever it is deserved. — Take " care of your health, and allow me the same share of your heart, which you most as" suredly possess of mine. I recommend my dignities likewise to your protection; and " hope, if I can plead any merit, you will continue your good offices to me with the " same singular affection you have hitherto discovered "

CICERO TO PLANCUS.

Ep. Fam. " NOTHING, my dear Plancus, could be more glorious to yourself, nor more ac-
 x. 16. ceptable to the Senate, than the letter you lately addressed to that assembly: I will add Melm. xiv. 15. too, nothing could be more opportune than the particular juncture in which it was delivered. Cornutus received it in the presence of a very full house, just as he had communicated to us a cold and irresolute letter from Lepidus. Yours was read immediately afterwards: And it was heard with the loudest acclamations of applause. It was highly pleasing, indeed, to the Senate, not only from the importance of its contents, and those zealous services to the Republic, of which it gave us an account, but from that strength and elegance of expression with which it was animated. The Senate was extremely urgent that it might be immediately taken into consideration: But Cornutus thought proper to decline their request. However, the whole assembly, expressing great indignation at his refusal, the question was put by five of the Tribunes of the people. When Servilius was called upon for his opinion, he moved that the debate might be adjourned.
 What my sentiments were (and I was supported in them by the unanimous concurrence of the whole house) you will see by the decree that passed upon this occasion." [Both Plancus's letter to the Senate, and the decree upon it, are lost.]

" I am sensible that your superior judgment is abundantly sufficient to direct you in all " emergencies; yet I cannot forbear advising you not to wait for the sanction of the Senate,
 " in so critical a conjuncture as the present, and which undoubtedly must often demand
 " immediate action. Be a Senate, my friend, to yourself; and, without any other authority,
 " scruple not to pursue such measures as the interest of the Republic shall require. In one word,
 " let your actions anticipate our expectations, and give us the pleasure of hearing that " you have executed some glorious exploit, ere we are so much as apprised that you even " had it in your intention. I will venture to assure you, that the Senate will most certain" ly approve both of your zeal and your judgment, in whatever you shall thus under" take." [It appears that Cicero, notwithstanding his great influence, could not procure any particular commission for Plancus.]

PLANCUS TO CICERO.

Ep. Fam. " YOU have been apprised, no doubt, by Levius and Nerva, as well as by the letter
 x. 18. they delivered to you on my part, of the design I was meditating when they left me:
 Mich. xiv. 10. As, indeed, they have constantly borne a share in all my councils and measures of every kind. It has happened, however, to me, what happens not unfrequently, I suppose, to every man who is tender of his reputation, and desirous of approving his conduct to the friends of his country: I have given up a safer scheme, as being liable, perhaps,

engage his General to its interests ; and Lepidus himself dissembled so well, as to persuade them of his sincerity ; so that Plancus was marching

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.
42.
409 Conf.

“ haps, to some ill-natured exceptions, in exchange for a more dangerous one that may “ better evince my zeal. I am to inform you then, that, after the departure of my “ Lieutenants, I received two letters from Lepidus, intreating me to join him. These “ were seconded by the much stronger sollicitations of Laerensis: Who earnestly repre“ sented to me (what, indeed, I am also apprehensive of myself) that there is great rea“ son to fear a mutiny among the disaffected troops under the conduct of Lepidus. I de“ termined immediately, therefore, to march to his assistance, and take an equal share in “ the dangers with which he was threatened. I was sensible, at the same time, that to “ wait on the banks of the Isara till Brutus should pass that river with his army, and to “ meet the enemy in conjunction with my colleague, whose forces, as well as their Gene“ ral, would act in perfect harmony with me and my troops, would be much the most “ cautious measure with respect to my own personal security. But I reflected, that, if “ any misfortune should attend Lepidus, it would be wholly imputed to me ; and I should “ be condemned, either as obstinately suffering my resentment to prevent me from giving “ succour to my enemy in the cause of the Republic ; or of timidly avoiding to take part in “ the danger of a most just and necessary war ; as my presence therefore might be a means “ of protecting Lepidus, and of bringing his army into a better disposition, I resolved to “ expose myself to all hazards, rather than appear to act with too much circumspection.
“ But never was any man more anxious in an affair for which he was in no sort answer“ able, than I am in the present: For, though I should have no manner of doubt if the “ army of Lepidus were not concerned, yet, under that circumstance, I am full of appre“ hensions for the event. Had it been my fortune to have met Antony before my junction “ with Lepidus, I am sure he would not have been able to have kept the field against me even “ a single hour. Such is the confidence I have in my own troops, and so heartily do I despise “ his broken forces, as well as those of that paultry muleteer, the contemptible Ventidius.
“ But, as the case is now circumstanced, I dread to think what might be the consequence, “ should any ill humours lie concealed in the army of Lepidus: As they may possibly “ break out in all their malignity, before they can be remedied, or even discovered. It “ is certain, however, that Lepidus, together with the well-affected part of his army, “ would be exposed to great danger, if we should not act in conjunction: Besides, that “ our infamous enemies would gain a very considerable advantage, should they draw off “ any of his forces. If my presence, therefore, should prove a means of preventing these “ evils, I shall think myself much indebted to my courage and good fortune, for engaging “ me to make the experiment. With this design I moved with my army from the banks of “ the Isara on the 21st of May ; having first erected a fort at each end of the bridge, “ which I had thrown over that river, and placed a strong party to defend it ; that, when “ Brutus shall arrive, he may have nothing to retard his passage. I have only to add, that “ I hope to join Lepidus within eight days from the date of this letter.”

PLANCUS TO CICERO.

“ I SHOULD be ashamed that this letter is so little consistent with my former, if Ep. Fam.
“ it arose from any instability of my own. But it is much otherwise, and I have steadily “ pursued every means in my power to engage Lepidus to act in concert with me for the “ defence of the Republic ; as imagining it would render you less apprehensive of my “ success against our wretched enemies. To this end, I not only complied with all the “ conditions he proposed, but even engaged for more than he demanded: And I had so “ much confidence in the sincerity of his intentions, that I ventured to assure you, no “ longer than two days ago, that he would zealously co-operate with me in carrying on “ the war upon one common plan. I depended indeed upon the promises he had given me “ under his own hand, together with the assurances I had likewise received from Laerensis, “ who was at that time in my camp, and who earnestly conjured me to forget all resent“ ments

Y. R. 710.
 B. Chr.
 42.
 459 Cons.

ing forward in great haste to join with him. But Lepidus was acting all the while a treacherous part, being determined to support Antony; and, though ments against Lepidus, and to rely upon his good faith. But Lepidus has now put it out of my power to entertain these favourable hopes of him any longer: However, I have taken, and shall continue to take, all necessary precautions that the Republic may not be prejudiced by my too easy credulity. I am to inform you then, that, after I had used the utmost expedition, agreeably to his own earnest request, to transport my army over the Isara, and, for that purpose had, in the space of a single day, thrown a bridge over that river; I received a counter-express from him, requiring me to advance no farther; as he should have no occasion, he said, for my assistance. Nevertheless, I will own to you, I was so imprudent as to proceed in my march; believing that the true reason of his thus changing his mind arose from an unwillingness to have a partner with him in his glory. I imagined that, without depriving him of any share of that honour, which he seemed so desirous to monopolise, I might post myself at some convenient distance, in order to be ready to support him with my troops, in case he should be pressed by the enemy: An event, which, in the simplicity of my heart, I thought not improbable. In the mean time, I received a letter from the excellent Latrensis, which was conceived in terms full of despair. He complained that he had been greatly deceived, and assured me that neither Lepidus, nor his army, were to be trusted. He expressly cautioned me, at the same time, to be upon my guard against their artifices; adding, that he had faithfully discharged the engagements he had entered into on his part, and hoped I would act with the same fidelity to the Republic on mine. I have sent a copy of this letter to Titus, and purpose to transmit the originals of all the rest, relating to this affair, by the hands of Lucius Cispinus, who was privy to the whole transaction. I shall insert in this packet the letters of Lepidus, to which I did not give any credit, as well as those to which I did.—I must not forget to add, that, when Lepidus bargained his soldiers, these mighty best fellows were exceedingly clamorous for peace. They protested, that, after the loss of both the Consuls; after the loss the Republic had suffered of so many brave men, and after so many more, all ANTONY's adherents, had been declared enemies of the Commonwealth, and their estates confiscated; they were determined not to draw their swords any more either on the one side or the other. They were prompted to behave thus mutinously, not only by the intolent suggestions of their own hearts, but by the encouragement also of their officers, particularly Canidius, Rufrenus, and others, whose names the Senate shall be acquainted with at a proper season. Lepidus was so far from punishing this sedition, that he did not take even a single step to restrain it. I thought, therefore, that it would be the highest temerity to expose my own faithful troops, together with my auxiliaries, which are commanded by some of the most considerable Chiefs of Gaul, and in effect too my whole province, to their combined armies. I considered, if I should thus lose my life, and involve the Republic in my own destruction, I should fail, not only without honour, but without pity. In consequence of these reflections, I have determined to march my forces back again, that our wretched enemies may not have so great an advantage as my advancing any farther might possibly give them. I shall endeavour to post my army so advantageously as to cover the province under my command from being insulted, even supposing the troops of Lepidus should actually revolt. In short, it shall be my care to preserve every thing in its present situation till the Senate shall send an army hither, and vindicate the liberties of the Republic with the same success in this part of the world, as attended their arms before the walls of Mutina. In the mean time, be assured, that no man will act with more fervent zeal than myself in all the various occurrences of the war: And I shall most readily either encounter the enemy in the field, or sustain the hardships of a siege, or even lay down my life itself, as any of these circumstances shall prove necessary for the service of the Senate. Let me exhort you then, my dear Cicero, to exert your utmost endeavours to send a speedy reinforcement to me, ere Antony shall have increased the number of his forces, or our own shall be intirely dispirited. For, if dispatch be given to this

2 “ affair,

though he kept him at a distance for some time, and seemed to be constrained at last, by his own soldiers, to receive him, yet that was only

Y. R. 710.

Bef. Chr.

42.

TO 409 Conf.

“ affair, these infamous banditti will undoubtedly be extirpated, and the Republic remain in full possession of her late victory. Take care of your health, and continue your friendship to me.

“ P. S. I know not whether it may be necessary to make any excuse for the absence of my brother, who was prevented from attending me in this expedition by a slow fever, occasioned by the great fatigues he has lately undergone; as no man has shewn more zeal or courage in the cause of the Republic, he will undoubtedly return to the duties of his post, the very first moment his health shall permit.—I recommend my honours to your protection: Though I must confess, at the same time, that all my desires ought to be satisfied, since I enjoy the privilege of your friendship, and the satisfaction of seeing you invested with the high credit and authority I have ever wished you. I will leave it therefore entirely to yourself both when and in what manner I shall experience the effect of your good offices: And will only request you to suffer me to succeed Hirtius in your affection, as I certainly do in the respect and esteem he bore you.”

PLANCUS TO CICERO.

“ I SHALL never regret to undergo the greatest dangers in the cause of my country, Ep. Fam. provided, my dear Cicero, that whatever happens to myself, I may not justly be accused x. 23. of temerity. But I should not scruple to confess, that I had been guilty of an imprudence, Melm. xv. if I had ever acted in reliance upon the sincerity of LEPIDUS. Too easy a disposition to give credit to fair pretences cannot so properly be called a fault as an error: But an error into which the noblest minds are generally the most liable to fall. It was not, however, from a mistake of this nature that I had well nigh been deceived; for the character of LEPIDUS I perfectly well knew. [He here contradicts all he says in the beginning of the foregoing letter.] “ It was entirely owing to a certain sensibility of what my detractors might say: a quality, I will freely acknowledge, particularly prejudicial in the affair of war. I was apprehensive, if I remained in my camp, that those, who are inclined to misconstrue my actions, might represent me as the occasion of the war being protracted, by obstinately indulging my resentment against Lepidus: And, therefore, I advanced almost within sight of him and Antony. I encamped, indeed, at no greater distance from them than forty miles, that I might be able, as circumstances should require, either speedily to join the army of Lepidus, or safely to retreat with my own. In marking out my camp, I chose a spot of ground that gave me the advantage of having a large river in my front, which would take up some time in passing, and that lay contiguous likewise to the country of the Vocantii: Who, I was sure, would favour my retreat. When Lepidus found himself disappointed of what he so much wished, and that there was no hopes of my approaching nearer;” [Had not Lepidus sent him word not to come forward, and was it not against advice that Plancus advanced so near?] “ he immediately threw off the mask, and, on the 29th of May, joined Antony. The combined armies moved the same day, in order to invest my camp: And they had actually advanced within twenty miles before I received advice of their junction. However, I struck my tents with so much expedition, that, by the favour of the gods, I had the happiness to escape them. My retreat was conducted with so much good order, that no part of my baggage, nor even a single man, was either left behind or intercepted by these incensed villains. On the 4th of this month I repassed the Isara, with my whole army: After which I broke down the bridge I had thrown across that river. I took this precaution, that my troops might have time to refresh themselves, as well as to give my colleague [D. Brutus] an opportunity of coming up to me: Which I imagine he will be able to effect in three days from the date of this letter.

“ I must always acknowledge the zeal and fidelity Laterensis has shewn to the Republic, in his negotiations between Lepidus and myself: But, it is certain, that his great partiality “ towards

Y. R. 710. to save appearances, till he could do it with advantage and security to
 B. f. Chr. them both: His view in treating with Plancus was probably to amuse
 42. and
 409 Conf.

“ towards Lepidus prevented him from discerning the dangers into which I have been led.
 “ However, as soon as he discovered how grossly he had been imposed upon, he attempted “ to turn that sword against his own breast, which, with much more justice, had been “ plunged in the heart of Lepidus. But he was prevented from completing his purpose:
 “ And it is said, (tho’ I by no means mention it as a certainty) that the wound he has given “ himself is not mortal.—My escape from these traitors has proved an extreme mortification
 “ to them: As they marched to attack me with the same unrelenting fury, which infli-“ gates them against their country. Some late circumstances particularly contributed to “ inflame their resentment. I had frequently and warmly urged LEPIDUS to extinguish this “ civil war: I had disapproved of the conferences that were held with the enemy: I had re“ fused to see the Legates whom ANTONY deputed to me under the passports of LEPIDUS:
 “ And had intercepted CATIUS VESTINUS, whom the former had sent express to the latter.
 “ But it is with pleasure I reflect, that, the more earnestly they wished to get me into their “ hands, the more they suffer in the disappointment.

“ Continue, my dear Cicero, to employ the same vigorous efforts you have hitherto ex“ erted, that we, who are in arms for the defence of the Republic, may have suitable ho“ nours paid to our services. In the mean time, I wish that CÆSAR would join us with “ those brave troops he commands; or, if his affairs will not permit him; that, at least,
 “ they might be sent under the conduct of some other General: For most certainly his “ own personal interest is at stake. The whole force of the disaffected party is united “ against our country: And shall we not put forth our utmost strength in its defence? As “ for what concerns myself, I will venture to assure you, that, if you at Rome are not want“ ing on your parts, I will abundantly perform every thing that can be expected on “ mine.—The obligations I am continually receiving from your hands, endear you to “ me every day more and more; at the same time that they animate me to act in such a “ manner as not to forfeit, in any degree, your esteem and affection.—I will only add “ my wishes, that I were able in person to give you such proofs of my gratitude as might “ afford you greater reason to rejoice in the good offices you have conferred upon me.
 “ Calais, [Gravelle] on the frontiers of the Allobroges, June the 6th.” [There is in the col“ lection of Cicero’s letters but one more from Plancus, dated the 28th of July, which shall be laid before the reader in its proper place.]

Continuation of the correspondence between D.
Brutus and Cicero.

Ep. Fam.
 xi. 19.
 Melm. xiv.
 18.

D. BRUTUS to CICERO.

“ I WISH you would peruse the letter I have addressed to the Senate, and make “ what alterations you shall judge proper. You will find by it, that I am under an ab“ solute necessity of thus applying to them. Whilst I imagined I should be joined by the “ fourth and Martial legions, agreeably to the decree of the Senate, which passed for that “ purpose, on the motion of PAULUS,” [LEPIDUS’s brother] and DRUSUS, [very probably Cicero’s complaisance for Octavius did not permit him to move the house on so delicate a point] “ I was less solicitous about the rest: But now that I have only some new-raised “ legions, and those too extremely ill accounted, I cannot but be apprehensive, upon your “ accounts as well as upon my own.” Vercellæ [Verelli] in the duchy of Milan, May the 21st.

D. BRUTUS to CICERO.

Ep. Fam.
 xi. 20.
 Melm. xiv.
 23.
 “ FRIENDSHIP and gratitude make me feel, upon your account, what I never “ felt upon my own; and I will confess, that I am not without fear in regard to a story, “ which has been propagated concerning you. I thought it by no means a matter to be “ despised, when I had only heard of it, as I frequently did, from common report: But it “ has been lately mentioned to me by Segulius. This man tells me, (though what he says “ indeed is generally of a piece with the rest of his character) that, paying a visit at “ CÆSAR’s, and draw him so near to them, that, when he and Antony were actually joined, they might force him into the same measures, without his being

VOL. IV.

U u able

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chi.
41.
407 Conf

“CÆSAR’s, where you were much the subject of the conversation, CÆSAR complained, (and it was the only charge, it seems, he brought against you) of an ambiguous expression which you made use of concerning him.” [laudandum adolescentem, ornandum, tollendum: That the young man should be praised, ornamented, and advanced to the dignities of the state, or taken off.] “I suspect the whole to be a mere fiction of Segulius; or, at least, that it was he himself who reported these words to Cæsar. Segulius endeavoured, at the same time, to persuade me, that you are in great danger of falling a victim to the resentment of the veteran soldiers, who speak of you, he pretends, with much indignation. The principal cause, it seems, of their displeasure, is, that both CÆSAR and myself are left out of the commission for dividing the lands among the soldiers, and that every thing is disposed of just as you and your friends at ROME think proper.

“Notwithstanding I was on my march, when I received this account, yet I thought it would not be advisable to pass the Alps till I had informed you how affairs stand. I am well persuaded, nevertheless, that, with respect to yourself, these reports and menaces of the veterans aim at nothing farther, than, by alarming your fears, and incensing young Cæsar against you, to obtain for themselves a more considerable proportion of the rewards decreed by the Senate. But I do not intend, by saying this, to dissuade you from standing upon your guard: As nothing, be assured, is more valuable to me than your life. Let me only caution you, not to suffer your fears to run you into greater dangers than those you would avoid. However, I would advise you to obviate the clamours of these veterans as far as you reasonably may; and to comply with their desires both in regard to the Decemvirs, and to the distribution of their rewards. As to those forfeited estates which belonged to the veterans who served under Antony, I should be glad, if you think proper, that Cæsar and myself be nominated to assign them to the troops. But, in reference to the pecuniary donative, which they have been also promised, it will be proper to act with more deliberation, and as the state of the public finances shall require: To which end it may be signified to them, that the Senate will take these their claims into consideration. As to those other four legions, to whom the Senate has also decreed an allotment of lands, I imagine that the estates in Campania, together with those which were formerly seized by Sylla, will be sufficient for the purpose. I should think too that the best method of division would be, either to parcel out those lands, in equal shares, to the several legions, or to determine their respective proportions by lot. But, when I thus give you my opinion, it is by no means as pretending to superior judgment, but merely from the affection of my heart towards you, and from my sincere desire that the public tranquillity may be preserved: Which, I am very sensible, if any accident should happen to you, cannot possibly be maintained.

“I do not purpose to march out of Italy, unless I should find it greatly expedient. Meanwhile, I am employed in disciplining my troops, and furnishing them with arms: And I hope to appear with no contemptible body of forces, upon any emergency that shall again call me into the field. But Cæsar has not, however, sent back the legion to me which served in Pansa’s army.

“I request your immediate answer to this letter: And, if you should have any thing of importance to communicate to me, which requires particular secrecy, I desire you would convey it by one of your own domestics.” Eporodia, [Interu], May the 24th.

D. BRUTUS to CICERO.

“ALL things here go on well,” [He had probably received some favourable intelligence concerning Lepidus’s behaviour] “and it shall be my endeavour to render them still better. Lepidus seems to be favourably disposed towards me: And, indeed, we have reason to divest ourselves of all our fears, and to act with undaunted freedom in defence of the Commonwealth. But, had our affairs a far less promising aspect, yet it might justly animate and augment that courage, which I know always resides in your breast, was within forty miles of him, to stay where he was, till he should come up to him : But Plancus, suspecting nothing, thought it better still to march

“10

Y. R. 710.
B.C. Chr.
42.
409 Conf.

“ salute ; especially as the world is no less sensible than I am of the singular share I enjoy
“ of your affection.—I agree entirely with your opinion concerning the four legions ; as also “ that both you and Cæsar should have the distribution of these estates you mention. This is an “ office on which some of my colleagues had cast a very wishful eye ; however, I have dis“ appointed their longing, by referring it wholly for you and Cæsar. In the mean time, if “ any occurrence should arise that requires particular secrecy, I shall observe your direc“ tions, and communicate it to you by one of my own domestics.” June the 4th.

CICERO to D. BRUTUS.

“ TO tell you the truth, I was once inclined to be somewhat angry at the shortness of Ep. Fam.
“ your letters : but I am now so well reconciled to your concise manner, that I condemn xi. 24.
“ my own as downright loquacity, and shall make your epistles the models of mine. Melm. xv.
“ How short, yet how expressive are you when you tell me, that all things go well with 6.
“ you, and that you shall endeavour to render them still better ; that Lepidus seems favourably “ disposed ; and that we have every thing to expect from our three armies. Were I ever so “ full of fears, these significant sentences would banish them all.” [Indeed these general expressions were very unsatisfactory, and this polite letter is full of reproach] “ But I “ exert the spirit you recommend ; and indeed, if at the time when you were closely “ blocked up in Blutina, my hopes nevertheless were fixed entirely upon you ; how much “ higher think you must they be raised now ?—I should be glad, my dear Brutus, to “ resign to you my post of observation, if I might do so without incurring the censure of “ deserting it. As to what you mentioned of continuing in Italy till you should hear “ from me, I do not disapprove of it, if the motions of the enemy should not call you “ elsewhere ; as there are many points upon the carpet at Rome, which may render it prudent for “ you not to remove to a farther distance. But, at all events, if your presence here may “ prove a means of terminating the war, it is undoubtedly the first and principal scheme
“ you should have in view.—The Senate has decreed the first money that could be raised “ for the payment of your troops. . . . Servius is extremely your friend ; and you may “ always depend upon me.” June the 8th.

CICERO to D. BRUTUS.

“ THOUGH I always receive your letters with the highest satisfaction, yet I am Ep. Fam.
“ much better pleased that you employed your colleague Plancus to make an excuse to xi. 13.
“ me, than if you had interrupted your very important occupation by writing yourself. Melm. xv.
“ He has executed your commission very fully ; and nothing can render your character 10.
“ more truly amiable to me, than the account he gives of your zeal and diligence.—
“ The junction of your forces with these of Plancus, and the harmony with which you act to“ gether, as appears by your common letter to the Senate, was agreeable both to that assembly and “ to the people in general. What remains then, my dear Brutus, but to conjure you to perse“ vere in the same unanimity, and to endeavour, I will not say to excel others, but what “ is far worthier of your ambition) to rise above yourself. I need add no more ; espe“ cially as I am writing to one, whose epistolary conciseness I purpose to imitate.—I wait
“ with impatience for your next dispatches, as I imagine they will bring us such ac“ counts as are agreeable to our wishes.”

This letter is without a date, but appears to have been written about the beginning of June.

CICERO to D. BRUTUS.

“ I WAS expecting every day to hear from you, when our friend Lupus gave me no- Ep. Fam.
“ tice that he was just setting out to you, if I had any thing to write. But though I xi. 25.
“ have nothing worth communicating, more than what you are furnished with by the Melm. xv.
“ public journals ; and that you are no friend, I am told, to letters of mere empty form ; 15.
“ yet I cannot forbear following your example, and sending you two or three short

V. R. 110. march on; till Laterensis, perceiving how matters were going, wrote
 R. 4. 1. 1. him word, in all haste, that neither Lepidus, nor his army, were to be
 42. trusted; and that he himself was deserted; exhorting Planius to look to 429. Conf. himself, lest he should be drawn into a snare; and to perform his duty to the Republic; for that he had discharged his faith, by giving him
 D. 2. p. this warning. Laterensis, after sending this intelligence, laid violent
 314. hands upon himself, and, though he was interrupted in the act, yet died soon after of his wounds.

Lepidus and Antony joined camps on the 29th of May, and the same day marched forwards towards Planius, who was come within twenty miles of Lepidus's camp; but, upon the first information from Laterensis of what was transacting, he retreated in all haste, repassed the Isara, and broke down his bridge upon it, that he might have leisure to draw all his forces together, and join them with those of his colleague, D. Brutus, whom he expected in three days. Lepidus, the day after his union with Antony, wrote the following letter to the Senate:

LEPIDUS, Emperor and High-Priest, to the SENATE and PEOPLE of ROME.

Pr. 1. 2. 1. "HEAVEN and Earth will bear me witness, Conscrip Fathers,
 2. 35. "that there is nothing I have at all times more sincerely desired, than
 P. 1. 1. 1. "the preservation of our common liberties: And I should soon have
 21. "convinced you of this truth, if fortune had not forced me to renounce
 "those measures I purposed to pursue. My whole army, indeed, ex"pressed their usual tenderness towards their fellow-countrymen, by a "mutinous opposition to my designs: And, to own the truth, they ab"solutely compelled me not to refuse my protection to such a multi"tude of Roman citizens. I conjure you then, Conscrip Fathers, to judge "of this affair, not by the suggestions of private resentment, but by the in"terest of the Commonwealth: Nor let it be imputed as a crime to me and "words. Be assured then, that all our hopes rest upon you and your colleague. As to
 "M. Brutus, I am not able to give you any certain account of him: I can only say, "that, in pursuance of your advice, I endeavour to persuade him, in all my letters, to come over "into Italy, and to take a part in this general war. I much wish he were now here: As "his presence would render me less apprehensive of the consequences of these intestine commotions,
 "which prevail in Rome; and which are by no means, indeed, inconsiderable." [The disturbances here alluded to were not only those occasioned by Antony and Lepidus's numerous friends, but also those occasioned by Octavius's measures to obtain the consulate.]
 "But I forget that I promised to imitate your Laconic brevity, and am running into a se"cond page. Farewell then, and may success attend your arms." June the 18th. [This letter closes the correspondence between D. Brutus and Cicero. After the month of June, the communication between Cicero and the Commanders in Gaul was very difficult, and Cicero became more cautious, after Octavius had manifested his ambitious views.

We have, in the Collection of Cicero's Familiar Letters, several, which passed between him and Corellianus, Governor of Africa; but as they contain little more than recommendations of particular persons, and are not very instructive in the history of the times, we shall only refer to them for the few facts they contain, as occasion offers.

“ my army, that, amidst our civil dissensions, we yielded to the dictates Y. R. 710.
 “ of compassion and humanity. Be assured, that, by acting with an Bef. Chr.
 “ equal regard to the safety and honour of all parties, you will best con- 47.
 “ sult both your own and your country’s advantage. From my camp at 409 Cor. 6.
 “ Pons Argenteus [upon the Argents,] May the 30th.”

D. Brutus, on the other hand, joined his army with Plancus, who acted with him, for some time, with great concord, and the affection of the whole province on their side; which being signified in their common letters to Rome, the Senate so far depended upon their fidelity, that, after several debates, they took the desperate resolution of voting Lepidus an enemy, on the 30th of June, and demolished the gilt statue, which they had lately erected to him, reserving still a liberty, to him and his adherents, of returning to their duty by the 1st of September. Cicero was the great promoter of this impolitic and cruel decree. He was not, however, easy in his mind; and his anxiety is very apparent in the following letter to C. Cassius written just after the decree, and which is the last of their correspondence. “ Your relation and my friend, the worthy “ LEPIDUS, together with all his adherents, were, by an unanimous decree Ep. Fam.
 “ of the Senate, which passed on the 30th of June, declared public ene- 21. 10.
 “ mies to their country: But at the same time a full pardon was offered Me'm. xv.
 “ to such as shall return to their allegiance before the 1st of September. 16.
 “ The Senate acts with great spirit:” [He might have said fury:] But “ it is the expectation of being supported by your army, that chiefly “ animates them in their vigorous measures. I fear, indeed, we shall “ have occasion for all your assistance, as the war is now become extremely for- “ midable by the villainy of Lepidus.

“ The accounts that daily arrive, concerning Dolabella, are altogether “ agreeable to our wishes: But, at present, they are nothing more than “ mere rumours. However, your letter addressed to the Senate, dated from “ the camp on the 9th of May, has raised a general persuasion in Rome, “ that he is actually defeated. Accordingly, it is imagined, that you “ are now upon your march into Italy, with a view, on the one hand,
 “ of succouring us with your troops, if any of those accidents, so com“ mon in war, should have rendered our arms unsuccessful; or, on the “ other hand, of assisting us with your counsels and authority, in case
 “ we should have proved victorious. You may be assured, in the mean “ while, that no endeavours of mine shall be wanting to procure the “ forces under your command all possible honours. However, I must “ wait a proper season for this purpose, when it shall be known how “ far they have availed, or are likely to avail, the Republic. At pre“ sent we have only heard of their endeavours in the cause of liberty:
 “ And glorious, it must be acknowledged, their endeavours have been.
 “ But still some positive services are expected: And these expectations, “ I dare be confident, either already are, or soon will be, perfectly an“ swered.

T. R. 10. "swered. No man, indeed, possesses a more patriot or heroic spirit
 Bel. Car. "than yourself; and it is for this reason that we wish to see you in Italy, 409 Conf. "as soon as possible. The truth is, if you and Brutus were here, we "should look upon the Republic as restored.

"If Lepidus had not received Antony, weak and defenceless as he "was, when he fled after the battle of Mutina, we should have obtained
 "a complete victory. This infamous step, therefore, has rendered him "far more odious in Rome, than even Antony himself ever was. For "Antony raised a war at a time when the Republic was in the utmost
 "ferment: Whereas Lepidus has kindled the flames in the midst of "peace and victory. We have the Consuls elect to lead our armies
 "against him: But, though we greatly depend upon their courage and "conduct, still, however, the uncertain event of war leaves us much
 "to fear. Be assured, therefore, that our principal reliance is upon you "and Brutus, whom we hope soon to see in Italy; and Brutus, indeed,
 "we expect every day. Should we have defeated our enemies, as I hope
 "we shall, before your arrival, the authority, nevertheless, of two such "illustrious citizens, will be of infinite service in raising up the Repub"lic, and fixing it upon some tolerable basis. All our business, in"deed, will by no means be over, notwithstanding we should be deli"vered from the infamous designs of our enemies: As there are many "other disorders of a different kind, which it will be still necessary to redress."
 [He glances at the enormous pretensions of Octavius and his veterans.]

Midd. p.
 452.

Lepidus's wife was M. Brutus's sister, by whom he had sons, whose fortunes were necessarily ruined by the decree, which confiscated the father's estate: For which reason, Servilia, their grandmother, and Cas- sius's wife, their aunt, solicited Cicero very earnestly, either that the decree itself might not pass, or that the children should be excepted out of it:
 But Cicero did not think he could consent to oblige them: For, since the first was thought necessary, the second followed of course; and he gave Brutus a particular account of the case in the following letter:

Ep. ad
 Br. 1.
 M. All. Ed.
 xv. i. p. 116.

"Though I was just going to write to you by Messala Corvinus, yet I "would not let our friend Vetus come without a letter. The Republic,
 "Brutus, is now in the utmost danger, and, after we had conquered,
 "we are forced again to fight, by the perfidy and madness of M. Lepi-
 "dus, on which occasion, when, for the care, with which I have charged
 "myself, of the Republic, I had many things to make me uneasy, yet
 "nothing vexed me more, than that I could not yield to the prayers of your "mother and sister; for I imagined that I should easily satisfy you, on "which I lay the greatest stress. For Lepidus's case could not, by any "means, be distinguished from Antony's; nay, in all people's judg"ment, was even worse; since, after he had received the highest ho"nours from the Senate, and, but a few days before, had sent an ex"cellent letter to them; on a sudden, he not only received the broken
 "remains of our enemies, but now wages a most cruel war against us

“ by land and sea; the event of which is wholly uncertain. When we “ are desired, therefore, to extend mercy to his children, not a word is “ said, why, if their father should conquer, (which the gods forbid) Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.
42.
409 Conf.
 “ we are not to expect the last punishment from him. I am not igno“ rant how hard it is that children should suffer for the crimes of their “ parents: But it was wisely contrived by the laws, that the love of “ their children should make parents more affectionate to their coun“ try. Wherefore, it is Lepidus who is cruel to his children, not he “ who adjudges Lepidus an enemy: For if, laying down his arms, he “ were to be condemned only of violence, in which no defence could be “ made for him, his children would suffer the same calamity by the “ confiscation of his estate. Yet what your mother and sister are now “ solliciting against, in favour of the children, the very same and much “ worse Lepidus, Antony, and our other enemies, are at this very mo“ ment threatening to us all. Wherefore our greatest hope is in you “ and your army: It is of the utmost consequence both to the Re“ public in general, and to your honour and glory in particular, that,
 “ as I wrote to you before, you come as soon as possible into Italy: For “ the Republic is in great want, not only of your forces, but of your “ counsels. I served Vetus with pleasure, as you desired me, for his “ singular benevolence and duty to you: I found him extremely zealous
 “ and affectionate both to you and the Republic: I shall see my son, I “ hope, very soon; for I depend on his coming with you quickly into “ Italy.”

Brutus, who, in general, disapproved of Cicero’s violent and merciless proceedings, was particularly shocked at the projected decree against Lepidus, and, being informed by his mother and sister of Cicero’s fierce-ness, he sent him the following letter, which is worded with great energy, to make an impression upon him: “ Other people’s fears oblige “ me to entertain some apprehensions, myself, on Lepidus’s account: Ep. ad Brut. xiii.
M d l. l. d.
xviii. p.
122.
 “ If he should withdraw himself from us (which will prove, I hope, a “ rash and injurious suspicion of him) I beg and beseech you, Cicero, “ conjuring you by our friendship and your affection to me, to forget “ that my sister’s children are Lepidus’s sons, and to consider me in the “ place of their father. If I obtain this of you, you will not scruple, “ I am sure, to do whatever you can for them. Other people live dif“ ferently with their relations: But I can never do enough for my sis“ ter’s children to satisfy either my inclination or my duty. But what “ is there in which honest men can oblige me (if in reality I have de“ served to be obliged in any thing) or in which I can be of service to “ my mother, sister, and the boys; if their uncle Brutus has not as “ much weight with you, and the Senate, to protect, as their father “ Lepidus, to hurt them? I feel so much uneasiness and indignation, that I “ neither can nor ought to write more fully to you: For, if, in a case so im- “ portant and so necessary, there could be any occasion for words to excite and “ confirm

M. R. 10. "confuse you, there is no hope that you will do what I wish, and what is proper. Do not expect therefore any long prayers from me: Consider only what I am; and that I ought to obtain it; either from Cicero, a man the most intimately united with me; or, without regard to our private friendship, from a consular Senator of such eminence:
 Pray send me word, as soon as you can, what you resolve to do.
 "July the 1st." Cicero, perceiving from this letter, what he had no reason of before, how great a friend Brutus laid on procuring this favour for his nephews, prevailed with the Senate to suspend the execution of their act, as far as it related to them, till the times were more settled^k.

Lepidas and Antony were no longer joined, than a correspondence was set on foot between them and Octavius; who, from the death of the Consuls, shewed but little regard to the authority of Cicero, or the Senate; and wanted only an occasion of breaking with them. He saw that he had no share in their affection; that it was all engrossed by Brutus and Cassius and their adherents: That these Commanders had raised formidable forces, and were masters of all the eastern provinces, which they now held legally in virtue of a decree of the Senate: That Sextus Pom- pey was the authorised Admiral of the Republic; that the Senate meant nothing more by the decrees in his favour, than to make use of him as a tool to destroy Antony, and that they would readily concur after that in his own destruction: They had been so impolitic as to slight him, by leaving him out of the number of Commissioners named for the distribution of rewards to the soldiers; and even to put some public affronts upon him, pretending to dispose of his soldiers without his consent, and to treat with them without his privacy: His good friend Cicero, in the gaiety of his heart, after the defeat of Antony, and in answer to Brutus's friends, who reproached him with accumulating extraordinary honours upon Octavius, had spoken of the young man in ambiguous terms, which carried a double meaning, either of advancing or taking him off; this at least was reported of him, and the report was credited. Octavius however waited a while to see what became of Antony; till, finding him received and supported by Lepidas, he began to think ^k "The great solicitude, says Dr. Middleton, p. 124, in a note upon this letter, which Brutus peevishly expresses on the account of his nephews, and his demand to have the laws suspended in their favour, at a time of such confusion, when the liberty of Rome was at stake, seems to be much out of character; for, if Lepidas had returned to his duty, of which Brutus professes some hopes, the case of the children would be set right of course; or, upon the conclusion of the war, which side soever got the better, their fortunes would necessarily have been repaired, either by their father or their uncle." But where was the propriety of making the law in the present conjuncture, to declare enemies of the state such powerful men, and half the forces of the Republic, who were suing for peace;

 to plunge the Commonwealth into a most dangerous and inexpiable war, in which all their present dependence was upon the son of the tyrant, and veteran troops, who had already shewn their unfavourable inclinations; and who, according to Dr. Middleton, were actually treating with Lepidas and Antony?

it his best scheme to enter into the league with them ; and to concur, V. R. 710. Bcf. Chr. 48. in what seemed to be more peculiarly his own part, the design of revenging the death of his uncle. Instead, therefore, of prosecuting the 409 Conf. war any farther, he was persuaded by his friends to make a demand of the consulship, though he was not above twenty years old. Most of the Plut. in Cic. ancient writers say that Cicero was duped upon this occasion, and drawn in by Octavius to favour his pretensions to the consulship, by the hopes of being made his colleague, and governing him in this office. But whether Cicero encouraged and favoured Octavius underhand, or no ; it appears that neither he nor any other magistrate would undertake to propose him. The demand of it, therefore, was made by a deputation Suet. in Oct. 26. App. l. iii. p. 585. Dio, l. xlv. p. 319. of his officers ; and, when the Senate received it more coldly than they expected, Cornelius, a Centurion, throwing back his robe, and shewing them his sword, boldly declared, that, if they would not make him Consul, that should. But Octavius himself soon put an end to their scruples by marching with his legions in a hostile manner to the city. The Prætors placed a guard in different parts of it, and seized upon the Janiculum App. ibid. Dio, ibid. 310. with the rest of the troops and two legions, which were lately come by the Senate's order from Africa. But Octavius met with no opposition, and the legions on the Janiculum went over to him.

The reader who is desirous to form a true notion of the characters of Brutus and Cicero, and of their politics, cannot but be pleased to find here the following interesting letters :

M. BRUTUS TO CICERO.

“ HOW great a joy it gave me to hear of the success of our Brutus, Ad Brut. Ep. iv. Nid. Fdlin. Ep. xi. p. 71. [Decimus] and the Consuls,” [he does not condescend to name Octavius] “ it is easier for you to imagine than me to express. I am “ pleased, and rejoice on several accounts, but particularly on this ;
 “ that Brutus's sally was not only salutary to himself, but of the greatest “ service towards completing the victory.” [He expresses no concern for the death of the Consuls, whose intentions he had always suspected] “ As to what you write, that the case of the three Antonys is one and the “ same, and that it is my part to determine what I ought to judge of it : I “ lay down no other rule to myself, but this ; that it is the right of the “ Senate, and people of Rome, to pass judgment on those citizens “ who have been taken fighting against us. But I am to blame, you “ will say, for giving the title of citizens to those who bear an hostile “ disposition to the Republic. Yes, I do it with the greatest justice :
 “ For where the Senate has not yet decreed, nor the Roman people “ commanded any thing, there I neither arrogantly take upon myself to “ prejudge, nor to impose my will as a law. Nor have I changed my “ mind with regard to that person ; from whom, when I was under no “ necessity of killing him, I neither took away any thing cruelly, nor re-V. R. 115. "mitted any thing idly, but kept him in my power as long as the war

 b. f. Car. "continued¹. I take it to be much the more decent part, and what the 409 Cens. "Republic would more easily allow to us, not to persecute the fortunes of the " miserable, than to heap infinite honours on the powerful, which tend to in-
 " flame their ambition and arrogance. In respect to which, Cicero, thou
 " best and bravest of men, and of all most justly dear to me, both upon
 " my own and the public account you seem to trust too much to your " hopes; and, as soon as any one happens to have done what is right,
 " immediately to grant and give up every thing to him. As if a mind,
 " corrupted by extravagant concessions, could not be drawn to abuse
 " them to ill purposes. Such is your humanity, you will not take it ill
 " to be admonished; especially where the public safety is at stake.
 " You will go on however to act, as you shall judge for the best; and so " too will I, whenever you will instruct me. Now is the time, Cicero;
 " now the time for us to act so, that we may not rejoice in vain for An-
 " tony's ruin; nor, by our method of extirpating the first evil, give occa" sion to another still worse to sprout up. Nothing bad can now hap" pen to us, either through our inadvertency or permission, without
 " some fault in us all; but especially in you; whose authority the Se" nate and people of Rome not only suffer, but desire to see as great as " can possibly be allowed to any single man in a free State: Which it " is your business to maintain, by recommending not only honest, but " prudent measures. Nor is any other prudence required from you for " the time to come, but a moderation in conferring honours. All other " virtues are so eminent in you, that you may be compared with any of " the ancients. This one part, which flows from a grateful and gene" rous mind, requires a more cautious and temperate generosity. For " the Senate ought to grant nothing to any man, that may either be an " example, or a support to the disaffected. I am in pain therefore about
 " the consulship: Lest this Cæsar of yours should think himself raised higher
 " already by your decrees, than it would be, from his present height, to be " advanced still to a Consul." [This was penned on the 15th of May, after the first account of Antony's defeat.] "For if Antony took the en-
 " signs of royalty, left to him by another, for an occasion of making
 " himself our King; in what disposition, think you, will he be, who by " the authority, not of the tyrant, whom we have killed, but of the Se" nate itself, imagines himself encouraged to pretend to what power so-
 " ever he pleases? Wherefore I shall then at last applaud your felicity
 " and prudent foresight, when I begin to know for certain, that Cæsar
 " will be content with the extraordinary honours which he has hitherto
 " received. Will you make me answerable then, you will say, for another

¹ By Antony's defeat and flight out of Italy, Brutus seems to have thought the war at an end, and was meditating therefore either to dismiss his prisoner Antonius, or to send him to Rome, that his case might be determined by the Senate. Mid.! p. 78.

“man’s fault? Yes, surely, as far as it might have been foreseen and pre“vented. I wish that you could look into the fears which I conceive
“in my breast about him.—After I had written this letter, we heard “that you were made Consul. If ever I see that day, I shall then “begin to form to myself the true figure of a Republic, subsisting again “upon its own strength: Your son is in good health, and is sent before “me into Macedonia, with the horse. May the 15th. From my camp.”

Y. R. 715.
Bet. Chr.
42.
409 Conf.

Cicero appears no more upon the stage. He retired probably to one of his country-houses, where he had time to reflect and meditate upon his unsuccessful management of the public affairs. It had from the beginning been such as did not please Brutus: Who thought that he might have proceeded with less violence against Antony, who was not of a cruel nature; and he disapproved of the fierce decree against Lepidus. These measures threw him entirely upon Octavius, whom he servilely courted and raised to that power, which now effectually put an end to the hopes of restoring any form of a Commonwealth. In many instances Brutus freely intimated to Cicero his disapprobation of his conduct; but, when things were carried beyond redress, he was very reserved upon that head, and studiously avoided to take any notice of his acts; which clearly implied, that there was something in them that displeased him. Atticus therefore, as a common friend, was employed to sound him, and to learn the cause of his secret disgust, which produced this answer from Brutus, one of the most precious pieces which antiquity has transmitted to us:

BRUTUS TO ATTICUS.

“YOU write me word, that Cicero wonders why I never take any “notice of his acts. Since you require it then, and extort it from me, “I will tell you what I think of them. That Cicero has done every “thing with the best intention, I certainly know; for what can I pos“sibly be more assured of, than of his disposition towards the Repub“lic? Yet some things he seems to have done; what shall I say? im“prudently? Of a man of all others the most prudent! or ambitiously?
“Of one, who, FOR THE SAKE OF THE REPUBLIC, has not scrupled to “make the powerful Antony his enemy! I am at a loss what to write, ex“cept this one thing; that the ambition and licentiousness of the boy have “been encouraged, rather than repressed by Cicero; and that he carries his “indulgence of him so far, as not to abstain even from opprobrious language,
“and such as reflects doubly upon himself: Since he has taken away the life “of more than one,” [Lentulus, Cetbegus, Statilius, Gabinus, Ceparius, Ca- tiline’s accomplices, were put to death in an illegal manner] “and must “first confess himself to be an assassin, before he can reproach Casca with X x 2 “ what

Ad Brut.
Ep. 17.
Middl. Ep.
15, p. 95.

Y. R. 710. " what he objects to him ; and treat Casca, as Bestia once treated him ".
 Bef. Conf. " Or because we are not boasting every moment of the ides of March, 42. " as he is of his nones of December, what better pretext can he have for 409 Conf. " censuring our most laudable act, than Bestia and Clodius had for in" veighing against his consulship ? Our Cicero brags that he in his gown " has sustained the war against Antony. But of what service is that to " me, if the succession to Antony's place be claimed as the reward of op-
 " pressing Antony ? And if the avenger of that evil has been the au" thor of another, which is likely to be more firmly grounded, and to " take a deeper root, if we suffer it ? As if all that he is doing came " from one, not afraid of a master ; no, but of having Antony for that
 " master. But, for my part, I cannot think myself obliged to a man, " who, as long as he does not serve an angry lord, has no quarrel with " servitude itself ; nay, decrees triumphs, and pay, and every kind of " honour to him. It is a shame for any one to desire such a condition " of life as he has now taken upon himself. Is this the part of a Con" sular ? This, of Cicero ? Since you would not suffer me to be silent,
 " you will read what must necessarily make you uneasy : For I feel " within myself what an uneasiness it gives me to write it. Nor am I " ignorant what your sentiments are with regard to the Republic ;
 " which, though desperate, you think possible still to be retrieved.
 " Nor, in truth, Atticus, do I blame you. For your years, your princi" ples, your children, make you averse to action : Which I perceived " also from the account of our friend Flavius ". But to return to Ci- cero.

" Manatius professes himself unable to " conceive how Cicero should ever call Casca
 " a murderer ; yet cannot collect any thing
 " left from Brutus's words. But the thing " is impossible, and inconsistent with every " word that Cicero had been saying, and " every act that he had been doing from the " time of Cæsar's death : And, in relation " particularly to Casca, he had refused to " enter into any measures with Octavius,
 " but upon the express condition of his suf" fering Casca to take quiet possession of the " suburbs : It is certain therefore that
 " Brutus had either been misinformed, or was
 " charging Cicero with the consequential
 " reasoning of me saying which was never in" tended by him ; in advising Casca, per" haps, to manage Octavius, in the height
 " of his power, with more temper and " moderation, lest he should otherwise be
 " provoked to consider him as an assassin,
 " and treat him as such : For an intimation
 " of that kind would have been sufficient to " the fierce spirit of Brutus, for taking it as " a direct condemnation of Casca's act of " stabbing Cæsar, to which Cicero had al" ways given the highest applause." Middl.

Life of Cicero, Vol. II. p. 488. Unluckily, there are too many instances of these inconsistencies both in Cicero's words and deeds.
Octavius's circumstances were changed ; he was no longer in the dependence of Cicero and his Senate, and began to declare himself openly against his father's murderers :
 This was sufficient to engage Cicero to change his stile, at least in the presence of Octavius and his adherents.

" This is explained by a story related by Cornelius Nepos, that a scheme having been projected for raising a fund of money for the support of Brutus, and his forces, by a voluntary contribution of the Roman Knights, Flavius proposed the affair to Atticus, as Brutus's particular friend, and one of the richest of that order, desiring that he would undertake the management, and put himself at the head of it. But Atticus answered, that Brutus was welcome to make what use he pleased

cero. What difference is there between him and Salvidienus? [one of Y.R. 710.
Octavius's most zealous followers] "or what more would Salvidienus Bef. Chr.
"himself decree to Octavius?" He is afraid still, you will say, of the re- ^{42.}
"mains of the civil war. But can any one be so afraid of a routed 409 Conf.
"enemy, as to think neither the power of one, who is at the head of a "conquering army, nor the rashness of a boy, at all to be feared? Or "does he do all this, because he thinks that every thing ought freely to "be given up to him, on the account of his great power? Oh the "strange folly of fear! to be so cautious of shunning what we are afraid "of, that, instead of avoiding it, as we might perhaps have done, we for- "wardly invite and draw it upon ourselves. We have too great a dread "of death, and of exile, and of poverty. These Cicero looks upon as "the chief ills of life; and as long as he can find people who will "grant him what he desires; who will respect and applaud him; he "has no objection to slavery, provided it be an honourable one; if any "thing can be honourable, in a state of the most wretched and abject
"contumely. Let Octavius then call him father; refer all things to "him, praise, thank him: Yet it will be seen at last, that his words are "contrary to his acts. For what is so opposite to the common sense of "mankind, as to hold any one in the place of a father, who cannot be "ranked in the number even of freemen? And yet all that this excel"lent man is aiming at, all that he is doing, tends only to this, that
"Octavius may be kind to him. I can no longer set any value on those "arts, of which I know Cicero to be so great a master: For of what use
"to him are all the fine things that he has written with such eloquence,
"for the liberty of his country, or on dignity, death, exile, poverty?
"How much better does Philippus seem to understand these subjects,
"who was more reserved in his concessions to a son-in-law, than Cicero
"to a stranger? Let him forbear then in his boastings to insult even "our miseries. For what is it to us, that Antony is vanquished, if his "fall has made room only for another to possess his place? Though "your letters even still speak dubiously of him. Let Cicero then live
"on, since he can submit to it, suppliant and obnoxious; if he has no "regard, either to his years, or his honours, or the acts of his past life.
"As for me, I will wage war with the thing itself: That is, with ty-pleased of his fortunes, as far as they would go; but that, for his part, he would not have any conference or meeting with any person whatsoever, on any such occasion. Middleton's note on this letter, p. 106.

• When Octavius marched with his army against Antony, Cicero, as we have seen above, moved the Senate to decree him the legal command of that army, as Proprætor; and that he should carry on the war in conjunction with the two Consuls; and should have a seat in the Senate, with the rank of a Prætor. After the first batt'e of Mutina, they decreed to him likewise, at Cicero's motion, a thanksgiving of fifty days, with the title of Imperator, in common with the Consuls; and, after the second battle and the death of the Consuls, they decreed to him the less triumph, or an ovation: Indeed, it was not possible to do more for him: A triumph over the late Consul and the Roman legions! after it had been deemed a crime in Cæsar to have triumphed over the revolted Spaniards headed by the sons of Pompey!

RAN.Y.

Y. R. 719
 Bet. Cic.
 42
 Conf

“ranny, with extraordinary commands, with dominion, and every power
 “that seeks to advance itself above the laws : Nor shall any condition “of servitude, how advantageous soever, divert me from it ; though “Antony, as you write, be an honest man, which was never my opinion “of him. But, as to a Master, our ancestors would never endure one, “though it were even a parent. If I did not love you as much as Ci- “cero persuades himself, that he is beloved by Octavius, I would not have “written this to you. It grieves me to reflect, how much you are now “disgusted ; you who love all your friends so warmly, and, above all, “Cicero. But, assure yourself, that I have abated nothing of my par“ticular affection, though a great deal of my judgment of him. For “it cannot possibly be otherwise, but that every man’s opinion of “things must be agreeable to the light in which they appear to him.”

There is no probability that Atticus shewed the foregoing letter to Cicero ; but as Brutus, in his letters to Cicero himself, frequently intimated his dissatisfaction and dislike of Cicero’s management, Cicero took occasion, in the following letter, to lay open the whole progress of it, from the time of Cæsar’s death, in order to shew the reasonableness and necessity of each step : And the ingenious author of Cicero’s life thinks that it is a complete apology, and shews that Cicero’s conduct was in all respects uniform, great, and glorious ; never deviating from the grand point which he had in view, the liberty of his country : Whatever BRUTUS, or any one else, may have said.

CICERO TO BRUTUS.

Ad Brut.
 xv.
 MICH. Ed.
 xxi p. 145.

“YOU have Messala with you. How is it possible therefore for me “to explain, by letter, though ever so accurately drawn, the present state “of our public transactions, more precisely than he ; who both knows “them all more perfectly, and can describe and relate them to you “more elegantly than any man ? For do not imagine, Brutus, (though “there is no occasion for me to write what you know already your“self, but that I cannot pass over in silence such an excellence of all “good qualities) do not imagine, I say, that, for probity, constancy, “care, and zeal for the Republic, there is any one equal to him ; so “that eloquence, in which he wonderfully excels, scarce finds a place “amongst his other praises : Since, even in that, his wisdom shines the “most eminent, by his having formed himself, with so much judgment “and art, to the truest manner of speaking. Yet his industry all the “while is so remarkable ; and he spends so much of his time in study, “that he seems to owe but little to his parts, which are still the great“est. But I am carried too far by my love for him : For it is not the “purpose of this epistle to praise Messala ; especially to Brutus, to whom “his virtue is not less known than to myself ; and these very studies, “which

“ which I am praising, still more known : Whom, when I could not “ take leave of without regret, I comforted myself with reflecting, that,
 “ by going away to you, as it were to my second self, he both discharged “ his duty, and pursued the surest path to glory. But so much for that.

Y. R. 710.
 Bcf. Chr.
 42.
 409 Conf.

“ I come now, after a long interval, to consider a certain letter of yours^p, “ wherein, while you allow me to have done well in many things, you “ find fault with me for one; that, in conferring honours, I have been too
 “ free and even prodigal. You charge me with this : Other people, pro“ bably, with being too severe in punishing; or you yourself, perhaps, with “ both. If so, I desire that my judgment on each may be fully known to “ you. Not that I mean to justify myself only by Selen’s maxim, the wisest
 “ of the seven, and the only Legislator of them all; who used to say, “ that the public weal was comprised in two things; rewards and punish- “ ments; in which, however, as in every thing else, there is a certain “ medium and temperament to be observed. But it is not my design, “ at this time, to discuss so great a subject; yet I think it not impro“ per to lay open the motives of my opinions and votes in the Senate, from “ the beginning of this war.

“ After the death of Cæsar, and those your memorable ides of March,
 “ you cannot forget, Brutus, what I declared to have been omitted
 “ by you^q; and what a tempest I foresaw hanging over the Republic.
 “ You had freed us from a great plague; wiped off a great stain from
 “ the Roman people; acquired to yourselves divine glory : Yet all the “ equipage of kingly power was left still to Lepidus and Antony : The one “ inconstant, the other vicious; both of them afraid of peace, and ene“ mies to the public quiet. While these were wishing to raise fresh dis“ turbances in the State, we had no troops about us, which we could op“ pose to them : For the whole city was eager and unanimous in asserting “ its liberty. I was then thought too violent; whilst you, perhaps more “ wisely, withdrew yourselves from that city, which you had delivered;
 “ and refused the help of all Italy, that offered to arm itself in your “ cause^r. Wherefore, when I saw the city in the hands of Rebels; and “ oppressed by the arms of Antony; and that neither you nor Cassius “ could be safe in it; I thought it time for me to quit it too. For a “ city overpowered by Traitors, without the means of relieving itself,

^p The letter, here referred to, seems to be the 11th, and is cited above in the text: It is dated May the 15th, whereas this was written about the end of July, after an interval of above two months.

^q The omission here signified, and frequently complained of by Cicero, in his letters to Brutus and the other Conspirators, was that of not killing Antony. The mild Cicero would have been glad to have seen Le- pidus killed also, and the whole crew of the wicked Cæsareans.

^r If the city had been so eager and unanimous in asserting its liberty, and all Italy was ready to arm itself: It is indeed quite inconceivable how the Conspirators should have been so weak as to fly first to the Capitol, then out of Rome, and lastly out of Italy.

Y. R. 10. " is a wretched spectacle *. Yet my mind, always the same, and ever Br. 1. 12. " fixed on the love of my country, could not bear the thought of leaving
 42. " it in its distress. In the midst, therefore, of my voyage to Greece, 43 Conf. " and in the very season of the Etesian winds, when an uncommon
 " South wind, as if displeased with my resolution, had driven me back " to Italy, I found you at Velia, and was greatly concerned at it. For " you were retreating, Brutus; were retreating, I say; since your Stoics
 " will not allow their wise man to fly. As soon as I came to Rome, I " exposed myself to the wickedness and rage of Antony: Whom, when " I had exasperated against me, I began to enter into measures, in the " very spirit of the Brutus's (for such are peculiar to your blood) for
 " the delivery of the Republic. I shall omit the long recital of what " followed, since it relates to myself; and observe only, that this young
 " Cæsar, by whom, if we are willing to confess the truth, we subsist at " this day, flowed from the source of my counsels. I decreed him no
 " honours, Brutus, but what were due; none but what were necessary.
 " For when we first began to recover any liberty, while the divine vir" tue of D. Brutus had not yet shewn itself so far that we could know " its real force; and our whole defence was in the boy, who had repel-
 " led Antony from our necks; what honour was not really due to him?
 " Though I gave him nothing still but the praise of words; and that " even moderate. I decreed him, indeed, a legal command" [as Propræ-
 " tor, with the rank of Prætor in the Senate;] " which, though it seemed " honourable to one of his age, was yet necessary to one who had an " army: For what is an army without such a command? Philippus de" creed him a statue; Servius the privilege of suing for offices before
 " the legal time; which time was shortened afterwards by Servilius.
 " Nothing was then thought too much. But men are apt, I know not " how, to be more liberal in fear, than grateful in success. When D.
 " Brutus was delivered from the siege; a day of all others the most " joyous to the city, and which happened also to be his birth-day; I
 " decreed that his name should be ascribed for ever to that day in the " public calendars. In which I followed the example of our ancestors,
 " who paid the same honours to a woman, Larentia†; at whose altar
 " you Priests perform sacred rites in the Velabrum. By giving this to
 " D. Brutus, my design was, to fix in the calendars a perpetual memo-

* After all, these Rebels and Traitors were the acknowledged magistrates, and formed the legal administration: And Cicero took a commission of Lieutenant from one of the principal Rebels, his dear Delabella.

† The old writers give various accounts of the history of this Larentia, and of the origin of the rites, which were annually performed to her. The common tradition is, that she was Romulus's nurse, and left some considerable lands at her death to the people of Rome; and that Fomulus, out of piety to her memory, appointed a yearly festival and sacrifice to be celebrated at her sepulchre. Aul. Gell. vi. 7. Macrob. Sat. i. 10. The Velabrum was a street or square in old Rome, where the Forum Boarium, and the Temple of Janus stood. Marlian. Rom. topogr. l. iv. c. 4. Middl. note on this letter, p. 161.

“ rial of a most acceptable victory. But I perceived, on that day, that “ there was more malevolence than gratitude in many of the Senate.
 “ During these same days, I poured out honours, (since you will have “ it so) on the deceased Hirtius and Pansa, and Aquila also: And who “ can find fault with it, but those, who, when fear is once over, forget “ their past danger? But, besides the grateful remembrance of past ser“ vices, there was a view in it that reached to posterity: For I was de“ sirous that there should remain an eternal monument of the public “ hatred to our most cruel enemies. There is one thing, I doubt,
 “ which does not please you; for it does not please your people here;
 “ who, though excellent men, have but little experience in public af“ fairs; that I decreed an ovation to Caesar: But, for my part, though I “ may, perhaps, be mistaken: Nor am I yet one of those who are the most “ pleased always with what is their own;” [This is the character Cicero gives of Brutus in many of his letters to Atticus:] “ I cannot but think “ that I have advised nothing more prudent, during this war. Why it “ is so is not proper to be explained, lest I be thought to have been “ more provident in it than grateful. But even this is too much. Let “ us pass, therefore, to other things. I decreed honours to D. Bru- “ tus; decreed them to Plancus. They must be men of great souls, “ who are attracted by glory: But the Senate also is certainly wise, in “ trying every art that is honest, by which any one can be engaged to “ the service of the Republic. But I am blamed in the case of Lepi- “ dus, to whom, after I had raised a statue in the Rostra, I presently “ threw it down again. My view was to reclaim him by that honour “ from desperate measures; but the madness of an inconstant man got
 “ the better of my prudence: Nor was there yet so much harm in erect“ ing, as good in demolishing that statue.

“ But I have said enough concerning honours, and must say a word “ or two about punishments: For I have often observed, from your let“ ters; that you are fond of acquiring a reputation of clemency, by “ your treatment of those whom you have conquered in war. I can “ imagine nothing to be done by you but what is wisely done: But to “ omit the punishment of wickedness, which we call pardoning, though “ it may be tolerable in other cases, I take to be pernicious in this war.
 “ For, of all the civil wars that have been in my memory, there was not “ one, in which, what side soever got the better, there would not have “ remained some form of a Commonwealth: Yet in this, what sort of “ a Republic we are like to have, if we conquer, I would not easily “ affirm; but, if we are conquered, we are sure to have none. My “ votes, therefore, were severe against Antony; severe against Lepidus; “ not from any spirit of revenge; but to deter wicked citizens, at the “ present, from making war against their country; and to leave an ex“ ample to posterity, that none hereafter might be disposed to imitate “ such rashness. Yet this very vote was not more mine, than it was

Y. R. 710.
 Bef. Chr.
 42.
 409 Conf.

Y. R. 110. " every body's: in which, there seems, I own, to be something cruel, Ref. Chr. " that the punishment should reach to children, who have done nothing
 421. " to deserve it: But the constitution is both ancient, and of all cities:
 409 Cons. " Themistocles's children were reduced to want: And, since the same pu" nishment falls upon citizens, condemned of public crimes. how was
 " it possible for us to be more gentle towards enemies? But what reason
 " can that man have to complain of me, who, if he had conquered, must " needs confess, that he would have treated me even with greater se" verity?

" You have now the grounds of my opinions, as far as they relate " to the case of rewards and punishments: For, as to other points, you " have heard, I suppose, what my sentiments and votes have been.
 " But the mention of these is not so necessary: What I am going to " mention, Brutus, is greatly so: That you come with your army to " Italy, as soon as possible. There is the utmost expectation of you.
 " Whenever you set foot in Italy, all the world will run to you. For " whether it be our lot to conquer, (as we had already done, if Lepi-
 " dus had not been desirous to overturn all, and perish himself with his " friends) there will be a great want of your authority, in order to settle
 " some state of a city amongst us: Or, if there be any danger or
 " struggle still behind, our greatest hope is in your authority, as well " as in the strength of your army. But hasten to us, for God's sake:
 " For you know how much depends on opportunity; how much on dis" patch. What diligence I shall use in the care of your sister's children
 " you will be informed, I hope, by the letters of your mother and sis" ter: In whose cause I have more regard to your will, which is ever
 " most dear to me, than, as some think, to my own constancy. But " it is my desire both to be, and to appear, constant in nothing so much
 " as in loving you."

MILL. p.
473.

When Cicero saw the public affairs taking a turn quite contrary to his hopes, and that Octavius, especially by his demand of the consulship, as well as by every other step, seemed to be entering into measures to oppress the Republic, and to revenge his uncle's death; he took all imaginable pains to dissuade him from it, and never ceased from exhorting him, by letters, to a reconciliation with Brutus, and the observance of that amnesty, which the Senate had decreed, as the foundation of the public peace. Atticus, imagining that Brutus would be pleased with it, sent him a copy of what Cicero had written upon that subject. But, instead of pleasing, it provoked Brutus only the more; and he signified his mind upon it both to Cicero and Atticus, in such a style, says Dr. Middleton, as confirms what Cicero had long before observed, and more than once declared to him, that his letters were generally churlish, unmannerly, and arrogant; and that he regarded neither what,

Ad Att.
vi. 1. 3.

nor

nor to whom he was writing. That to Cicero has been transmitted to us, and is as follows :

BRUTUS TO CICERO.

Y. R. 715.
B. C. 43.
409 Conf.

“ I HAVE read a part of your letter, which you sent to Octavius, “ transmitted to me by Atticus. Your zeal and concern for my safety “ gave me no new pleasure : For it is not only common, but our daily “ news, to hear something which you have said or done with your usual “ fidelity, in the support of my honour and dignity. Yet that same “ part of your letter affected me with the most sensible grief which my “ mind could possibly receive. For you compliment him so highly for “ his services to the Republic, and in a strain so suppliant and abject, “ that—What shall I say?—I am ashamed of the wretched state to “ which we are reduced—yet it must be said,—you recommend my “ safety to him ; to which what death is not preferable ? And plainly “ shew, that our servitude is not yet abolished, but our Master only “ changed. Recollect your words, and deny them, if you dare, to “ be the prayers of a slave to his King. There is one thing, you say,
“ which is required and expected from him, that he will allow those citizens
“ to live in safety, of whom all honest men, and the People of Rome, think “ well. But what, if he will not allow it ? Shall we be the less safe for “ that ? It is better not to be safe, than to be made safe by him. For “ my part, I can never think all the gods so averse to the safety of the “ Roman people, that Octavius must be intreated for the life of any one “ citizen ; I will not say for the deliverers of the world. It is a pleasure “ to talk thus magnificently ; and it becomes me surely to those who “ know not either what to fear for any one, or what to ask of any one.
“ Can you, Cicero, allow Octavius to have this power, and be still a “ friend to him ? Or, if you have any value for me, would you wish “ to see me at Rome, when I must first be recommended to the boy, “ that he would permit me to be there ? What reason have you to thank “ him, if you think it necessary to beg of him, that he would grant and “ suffer us to live in safety ? Or is it to be reckoned a kindness, that “ he chuses to see himself, rather than Antony, in the condition to have “ such petitions addressed to him. One may supplicate, indeed, the “ successor, but never the avenger of another’s tyranny ; that those who “ have deserved well of the Republic may be safe. It was this weak“ ness and despair, not more blameable, indeed, in you than in all,
“ which first pushed on Cæsar to the ambition of reigning ; and after “ his death determined Antony to attempt to seize his place ; and has “ raised this boy so high, that you judge it necessary to address your “ prayers to him, for the preservation of men of our rank ; and that “ we can be saved only by the mercy of one, scarce yet a man ; and by “ no other means. But, if we had remembered ourselves to be Ro“ mans, these most infamous men would not be more daring to grasp

Ad Brut.
xvi.
M. III. P. 1.
xxiii. p. 164.

Y. R. 10. " at dominion, than we to repel it: Nor would Antony be more encour-
 B. f. C. 2. " raged by Cæsar's reign, than deterred by his fate. How can you, a 42. " Consular, and the avenger of so many treasons, (by suppressing which, 405 Cens " you have but postponed our ruin, I fear, for a little time) reflect on " what you have done, and yet approve these things; or bear them so " tamely, as to seem at least to approve them? For what particular " hatred had you to Antony? No other, but because he assumed all " this to himself; that our lives should be begged of him; our safety
 " be precarious, from whom he had received his liberty; and the Re" public depend upon his will and pleasure. You thought it necessary " to take up arms to prevent him from tyrannising over us: But was it
 " your intent, that, by preventing him, we might sue to another, who " would suffer himself to be advanced into his place; or that the Re" public might be free and mistress of itself? As if our quarrel was " not, perhaps, to slavery, but to the conditions of it. But we might " have had, not only an easy master in Antony, if we would have been " content with that fortune, but whatever share with him we pleased
 " of favours and honours. For what could he deny to those whose " patience, he saw, was the best support of his government? But no" thing was of such value to us, that we would sell our faith and liber" ty for it. Would not the very boy, whom the name of Cæsar seems " to incite against the destroyers of Cæsar, think it worth any price, if " there was room to traffick with him, to be enabled, by our help, to " maintain all that power, which he now enjoys? Since we have a mind " to live, and to be rich, and to be Consulars? But then Cæsar must " have perished in vain. For what reason had we to rejoice at his death,
 " if after it we were still to continue slaves? Let other people be as " indolent as they please; but, as for me, may the gods and goddesses
 " deprive me sooner of every thing, than the resolution of not allowing
 " to the heir of him, whom I killed, what I did not allow to the man
 " himself; nor would suffer even in my father, were he living; to " have more power than the laws and the Senate. How can you imagine
 " that the rest of you can ever be free under him, without whose leave
 " there is no place for us in that city? Or how is it possible for you,
 " after all, to obtain what you ask? You beg, that he would allow us " to be safe. Shall we then receive safety, think you, when we have " received life from him? But how can we receive it, if we first part " with our honour and our liberty? Do you fancy, that to live at " Rome is to be safe? It is the thing, and not the place, which must " secure that to me: For I was never safe while Cæsar lived, till I had
 " resolved with myself upon that attempt: Nor can I in any place live
 " in exile, as long as I hate slavery and insults above all other evils.
 " Is not this to fall back again into the same state of darkness; when " he who has taken upon him the name of the tyrant (though in the " cities of Greece, when the tyrants are destroyed, their children also " perish

“ perish with them) must be intreated, that the avengers of tyranny
 “ may be safe? Can I ever wish to see that city, or think it a city, “ which has not the power even to accept liberty, when offered, and “ even forced upon it; but has more dread of the name of their late “ King, in the person of a boy, than confidence in itself; though it “ has seen that very King taken off in the utmost height of power, by “ the virtue of a few? Do not recommend me, therefore, any more to “ your Cæsar: Nor yourself indeed, if you will hearken to me. You “ set a very high value on the few years which remain to you at that “ age, if for the sake of them you can supplicate that boy. But take “ care, after all, lest what you have done, and are doing, so laudably “ against Antony, instead of being applauded, as the effect of a great “ mind, be not charged to the account of your fear. For if you are pleased “ with Octavius so, as to petition him for our safety, you will be thought,
 “ not to have disliked a Master, but to have wanted a more friendly one.
 “ As to your praising him, for the things that he has hitherto done, I “ entirely approve it; for they deserve to be praised, provided that he “ undertook them to repel other men’s power, not to advance his own.
 “ But when you adjudge him, not only to have this power, but that “ you yourself ought to submit to it so far, as to intreat him, that he “ would not destroy us; you pay him too great a recompence: For “ you ascribe that very thing to him, which the Republic seemed to “ enjoy through him: Nor does it ever enter into your thoughts, that,
 “ if Octavius be worthy of any honours, because he wages war with An- “ tony; that those, who extirpated the very evil, of which these are but “ the relics, can never be sufficiently requited by the Roman people; “ though they were to heap upon them every thing that they could be“ stow. But see how much stronger people’s fears are than their me“ mories, because Antony still lives and is in arms. As to Cæsar, all “ that could and ought to be done is past, and cannot be recalled. Is “ Octavius then a person of so great importance that the people of “ Rome are to expect from him what he will determine upon us? Or “ are we of so little that any single man is to be intreated for our safety?
 “ As for me, may I never return to you, if I ever either supplicate any “ man, or do not restrain those who are disposed to do it, from suppli“ cating for themselves: Or I will remove to a distance from all such,
 “ who can be slaves, and fancy myself at Rome, wherever I can live “ free; and shall pity you, whose fond desire of life neither age nor “ honours, nor the example of other men’s virtue, can moderate. For “ my part, I shall ever think myself happy as long as I can please my“ self with the persuasion, that my piety has been fully requited. For “ what can be happier than for a man, conscious of virtuous acts, and “ content with liberty, to despise all human affairs? Yet I will never “ yield to those who are fond of yielding, or be conquered by those “ who are willing to be conquered themselves; but will first try and at“ tempt

Y. R. 710.
 Bef. C. 11.
 42.
 409 Conf.

Y. R. - 10. "tempt every thing, nor ever desist from dragging our city out of Bel. Cnr "slavery. If such fortune attends me, as I ought to have; we shall 42. "all rejoice: If not, I shall rejoice myself. For how can this life be 407 Co i "spent better, than in thoughts and acts which tend to make my coun"trymen free? I beg and beseech you, Cicero, not to desert the cause "through weariness or diffidence. In repelling present evils, have your "eye always on the future, lest they insinuate themselves before you "are aware. Consider, that the fortitude and the courage, with which "you delivered the Republic, when Consul, and now again, when "Consular, are nothing without constancy and equability. The case "of tried virtue, I own, is harder than of untried: We require fer-
 "vices from it as debts; and, if any thing disappoints us, we blame
 "with resentment, as if we had been deceived by it. Wherefore, for
 "Cicero to withstand Antony, though it be a part highly commendable,
 "yet, because such a Consul seemed, of course, to promise us such a "Consular, nobody wonders at it. But if the same Cicero, in the case "of others, should waver at last in that resolution, which he exerted
 "with such firmness and greatness of mind against Antony, he would "deprive himself, not only of the hopes of future glory, but forfeit
 "even that which is past: For nothing is great in itself but what flows
 "from the result of our judgment: Nor does it become any man, more "than you, to love the Republic, and to be the patron of liberty; on
 "the account either of your natural talents, or your former acts, or
 "the wishes and expectations of all men. Octavius, therefore, must "not be intreated to suffer us to live in safety. Do you rather rouse your"self so far as to think that city, in which you have acted the noblest
 "part, free and flourishing, as long as there are leaders still to the "people, to resist the designs of traitors."

M. Crevier, speaking of this letter of Brutus, says, that we see in it with admiration the great superiority that virtue alone gives one man over another of the most distinguished talents, the greatest dignities, and the most advanced age. Dr. Middleton's judgment is very different: "If we com-Mill. p. 427. "pare, says he, these two letters, we shall perceive, in Cicero's, an ex"tensive view and true judgment of things, tempered with the greatest "politeness and affection for his friend, and an unwillingness to dis"gust, where he thought it necessary even to blame. In Brutus's, a "churlish and morose arrogance, claiming infinite honours to himself,
 "yet allowing none to any body else; insolently chiding and dictating
 "to one, as much superior to him in wisdom, as he was in years; the "whole turning upon that romantic maxim of the Stoics, enforced with"out any regard to times and circumstances: That a wise man has a suf"ficiency of all things within himself. There are, indeed, many noble "sentiments in it, worthy of old Rome, which Cicero, in a proper sea"son, would have recommended as warmly as he; yet they were not
 "principles

“ principles to act upon in a conjuncture so critical ; and the rigid application of them is the less excusable in Brutus, because he himself did not always practise what he professed ; but was too apt to forget both the Stoic and the Roman.” But it must be considered, that Brutus and Cassius were at this time at the head of two formidable armies, and masters of all the eastern world, while the Chiefs in the west were making war upon one another : In these circumstances, Brutus did not doubt but he would be able to vindicate his ides of March ; and his letter is certainly written with a spirit agreeable to the character of a tyrant-killer, authorised and armed to defend the liberty of his country. No words can express sufficiently the meanness and folly of good Cicero’s prayer in such a conjuncture ; and there is no one in Brutus’s case but would have conceived the greatest indignation upon the occasion, without being a Stoic, or a Roman. As to Cicero’s letter, in which we are told, there is an extensive view, and true judgment of things, there is not one argument in it to justify Cicero’s violent and outrageous behaviour towards Antony, and afterwards towards Lepidus ; which threw him entirely upon Octavius ; nor any one reason given which could induce Brutus to hope that he could lead Octavius to the defence of liberty ; and the measures he took to lead him to it were such as to make the most sanguine friends to the cause despair of his ever bringing it about.

CHAP. XV.

OCTAVIUS is chosen Consul, with Pedius, his coheir to Cæsar. POLLIO and PLANCUS join ANTONY and LEPIDUS. D. Brutus is killed in his flight. The conspirators are impeached in form, and condemned at Rome. The law against DOLABELLA is repealed: His end. OCTAVIUS joins ANTONY and LEPIDUS, and settles with them the plan of a triple league. They enter Rome; are chosen reformers of the State, under the name of TRIUMVIRI, for five years. They publish an edict of proscription. The death of CICERO.

OCTAVIUS was chosen Consul in the legal form by an assembly of the people, with Q. Pedius†, his kinsman, and coheir in part of his uncle’s estate, in the month of Sextilis ; which, on the account of this fortunate beginning of his honours, was called afterwards from his own surname Augustus‡.

Appian

† They were substituted in the place of the deceased Consuls, Hirtius and Pansa ; and, in their room, were afterwards substituted P. Ventidius and C. Carinnas.

‡ He entered upon his consulship, not on the 22d of September, the day before his birthday, as Velleius Paterculus places it ; but on the 19th of August, as Liv. l. lvi. p. 590, puts it: From which date many reckoned the beginning of his reign. He died ; 6 years after, on the same day, a circumstance to which the people gave great attention ;

Y. R. 710. Appian and Dio tell us, that his first care was to get his adoption by
 Bel. Cal. Julius Caesar confirmed in the most solemn manner by a law of the peo-42 ple; and that he took henceforth the name of Caius Julius Cæsar Octa- 409 Cor. vianus; but he had certainly taken this name from the beginning, in
 App. l. iii. virtue of his uncle's will, and afterwards of a decree of the Senate.
 P. 321. He secured, on entering on his magistracy, the public money which he found in Rome, and divided it among his soldiers.

About this time Pollio, who was averse to the violent proceedings of Cicero's Senate, came to the assistance of Antony and Lepidus with two of his best legions. This accession made the army of the rebels much superior to that of Plancus and D. Brutus; who, since their junction, had kept upon the defensive, not thinking themselves strong enough to force their way into Italy. The consent of these Generals, and the unexpected turn of Antony's affairs, staggered the fidelity of Plancus, whom we shall find hereafter to have had a weak and servile mind, and the low talents of a courtier, rather than those of a Roman General; and he not only deserted his colleague D. Brutus, but endeavoured to betray him to his enemies*, which was done with the consent and approbation of Octavianus, with whom Plancus kept a correspondence by letters, and by the mediation of his Lieutenant Furnius, who was dispatched to him about the end of July†. D. Brutus thus abandoned, and left to shift for himself,

quod id in dies accepti imperii princeps et vitæ supremæ fuit. Tacit. Annal. l. i. c. 9. As he seized upon the consulate against the will of the Senate, so we shall soon see him lay it down without their consent; and from this moment neither Senate nor people ever recovered so much as the appearance of liberty. He was at this time, according to Livy, l. 119, unwitten years old, that is, he was in his thirtieth year, as Suetonius in Oct. 20, Eutropius, l. vii. Plutarch in Brutus, unanimously affirm, and the last cites Augustus's Memoirs.

* Plancus deinde dubia, id est, sua fide, diu quam esset partium secum luctatus, ac sibi difficile consentiens, et nunc adjutor Bruti designati Consulis, Collegæ sui, Senatûsque, se litteris vendicans, mox ejusdem proditor: Asinius autem Pollio firmus propositus, et Julianis partibus fidus, Pompeianis adversus; uterque exercitus tradidit Antonio. D. Brutus desertus primo a Planco, post insidiis ejusdem petitus.—Vel. Pat. ii. 63, 64.

† The following letter is the last of Plancus's correspondence with Cicero, and bears the lowest date of any in the collection of Cicero's familiar letters.

PLANCUS, Consul elect, to CICERO.

Fp. Fam. " I CANNOT forbear to express, upon every occasion, the sentiments I entertain
 x. 24. " of your repeated favours: Though, at the same time, it is with some reserve that I in-Nelm. xv. " dulge myself in this satisfaction. The great intimacy indeed, which you allow me to 18. " enjoy with you, renders all formal acknowledgments of this kind unnecessary: Nor " would I make so cheap a return to the many important obligations I owe to you, as that " of mere empty professions. I had much rather reserve the proofs of my gratitude to " some future opportunity of testifying it in person: And, if I live, I will convince
 " you by the assiduity of my good offices, and by every instance of respect and esteem,
 " that you have not a friend, nor even a relation, who is so warmly attached to you as " myself. In the mean time, I am at a loss to determine, whether the daily pleasure, or
 " the

self, with a needy and mutinous army; eager to desert, and ready to give him up to his enemies; had no other way to save himself, than by flying

Vol. IV. Z z 409

“ the lasting honour I shall derive from your affectionate regard, will be greatest ———
 “ I find the interest of my troops has been a part of your care. It was not with any in“ tention of advancing my own power, that I was desirous they should be distinguished by “ the Senate: As I am conscious of having no views, but what regard the welfare of the “ Republic. My reasons were, in the first place, because I thought they deserved to be “ rewarded; and, in the next place, because I was desirous they might upon all occasions “ be still more attached to the Commonwealth. I hoped likewise by this means so “ strongly to fortify them against all solicitations, that I might be answerable for their “ continuing to act with the same unshaken fidelity, which they have hitherto preserved.
 “ ———I have kept entirely upon the defensive; and, though I am well apprised with “ how much just impatience the public wishes for a decisive action, yet I persuade myself “ that the Senate will approve my conduct. If any misfortune indeed should attend our “ armies in this part of the world, the Republic would not very soon be in a condition
 “ to oppose any sudden incursion of these rapacious traitors. As to the state of our forces, “ I imagine you already know that those under my command consist of three veteran le“ gions, together with one new raised regiment: Which last, however, is composed of far “ the best disciplined troops I ever saw of this sort. Brutus [Decimus] on the other side is at “ the head of ten legions; one of which is veteran; another has been upon the establish“ ment about two years; and all the rest are lately raised. Thus, you see, tho’ our army “ is very numerous, it is not extremely strong. The Republic indeed has but too often “ had occasion to be convinced, how little is to be expected from raw and unexperienced “ forces. However, if we had been joined, either by the African legions, which are com“ posed wholly of veteran troops, or by Cæsar’s, we should without hesitation have hazar-“ ded a general engagement. As the troops of the latter were somewhat nearer than the “ former, I frequently pressed Cæsar by letters to advance; and he accordingly promised to join “ us with all expedition. But other views, I perceive, have diverted him from these in“ tentions. Nevertheless, I have dispatched my Lieutenant Furnius with another letter to “ him, if happily it may any thing avail. You are sensible, my dear Cicero, that I take “ an equal part with you in the affection you bear to Octavius. He has a right to my “ friendship; not only from that intimacy which I enjoyed with his uncle, but in regard
 “ also to his own disposition; which, as far as I could ever discover, is regulated by prin“ ciples of great moderation and humanity. It would ill indeed become that distin“ guished amity, which subsisted between Julius Cæsar and myself, not to look upon Oc- “ tavius with all the tenderness which is due to the son of my friend; after he has been “ adopted as such by Cæsar’s will, and that adoption approved by the Senate. What I am “ going to say therefore is more the dictates of concern than resentment: But it must be “ acknowledged, that if ANTONY still lives, if he has been joined by LEPIDUS, if their “ armies are by no means contemptible: In a word, all their hopes and all their attempts are “ singly owing to CÆSAR. Not to look farther back than to his promise of joining me:
 “ Had he fulfilled the assurances he gave me for that purpose, the war would by this time “ either have been totally at an end, or driven into Spain; where the enemy could not “ have carried it on without great disadvantage, as that province is utterly averse to them.
 “ I am at a loss to conceive, therefore, with what view, or by whose advice, Cæsar was “ diverted from a measure so greatly to his interest and his honour, in order to turn his “ pursuits towards a consulship of a few months duration; much to the terror at the same “ time of the Republic, and with pretensions too, exceedingly ridiculous. The remon“ strances of his friends might be extremely serviceable upon this occasion, both to him“ self and to the Commonwealth. But none of them, I am persuaded, would have so “ much influence over him as yours; as there is no man who is so much obliged to you, “ except myself: For I shall ever acknowledge that the favours I have received from you “ are great and innumerable. I have given instructions to Furnius to solicit Cæsar upon “ this subject: And, if I should have that authority with him which I am sure I ought, he “ will

Y. R. 710. flying to his name-fake in Macedonia: But the distance was so great,
 Bef. Chr. 42. and the country so guarded, that he was often forced to change his road, 409 Conf. for fear of being taken; till, having dismissed all his attendants, and having wandered for some time alone in disguise and distress, he committed himself to the protection of an old acquaintance and host, whom he had formerly obliged; where, either through treachery, or accident, he Vell. Pat. ii. 64. was surprised by Antony's soldiers, who immediately killed him, and re-App. l. iii. turned with his head to their General².
 p. 588.

Octavius, on his side, vested with the sovereign authority, kept no Appian, iii. 586. measures with the party of the Conspirators. The decree against Dola- bella, whose death was not yet known in Rome, was revoked; and a Liv. l. xxi. law was published, by the Consul Pedius, to bring to trial and justice all Vell. Pat. ii. 69. those who had been concerned, either in advising, or effecting Cæsar's Suet. in death: In consequence of which all the Conspirators were presently im-Mer. 3. peached in form by different accusers: L. Cornificius was the accuser of Phil. in Brutus, and the famous M. Agrippa of Cassius: And, as none of them Brut. appeared to their citations, they were all condemned of course, and, by Dio, xlv. a second law, interdicted from fire and water. Sextus Pompey, also, though
 322. he had borne no part in that act, was added to the number, as an irre-

“ will hereafter thank me for my advice. In the mean time, we have a very difficult part
 “ to sustain here: As, on the one hand, we do not think ourselves altogether strong “ enough to hazard an engagement: And, on the other, must take care not to expose
 “ the Republic to greater dangers by declining one. However, if Cæsar should comply “ with the dictates of his interest and his honour; or if the African legions should spe-
 “ dily join us; you may depend upon having nothing to fear from this quarter.—Let me “ intreat you to continue your friendship to me, and to be assured that I am intirely yours.
 “ From my camp, July the 28th.”

Plancus was, at this time, the occasional founder of the town of Lyon, by settling, at the confluence of the Saone and the Rhone, the inhabitants of Vienne, who were driven out of their possessions by the Allobroges, during these dissensions of the Roman Generals.
 Though Vienne returned soon again under the Roman power, yet this new colony still subsisted, and, by the advantages of its situation, became more flourishing than its mother city.

² Several of the old writers have reproached his memory with a shameful cowardice in the manner of his suffering death: Quid? D. BRUTUS exiguum et infelix momentum vite quanto dedecore emit! Nam à FURIO, quem ad eum occidendam ANTONIUS miserat, comprehensus, non solum cervicem gladio subtraxit; verum etiam constantius eum præbere admonitus, ipsis his verbis juravit: ITA UT VIVAM, DABO. O fati cunctationem ærumnosam! Val. Max. l.
 ix. c. 13. Senec. Ep. 82. Dio, l. 46. Dr. Middleton rejects this account, and thinks such cowardice unworthy of the man who killed CÆSAR and commanded armies, and altogether inconsistent with the character of his former life: As if he could be looked upon in any other light, than as a monster of ingratitude, perfidy, and cruelty; qualities with which cowardice suits admirably well. *DECIMUS BRUTUS desertus primò a PLANCO, post infidiis ejusdem petitus, paulatim relinquentem eum exercitum, fugiens, in hospitii cujusdam nobilis viri, nomine Camellii, domo ab iis quos miserat ANTONIUS jugulatus est; JUSTISSIMASQUE OP-
 TIME DE SE MERITO VIRO CÆSARI POENAS DEDIT: CUJUS CUM PRIMUS ONNIUM AMICORUM FUISSET, INTERFECTOR FUIT, ET FORTUNÆ, EX QUÀ FRUCTUM TU-LERAT, INVIDIAM IN AUTHOREM RELEGABAT; CENSEBATQUE ÆQUUM, QUÆ ACCEPERAT A CÆSARE, RETINERE; CÆSAREM, QUI ILLA DEDERAT, PERIRE.*
 Vell. Pat. ii. 64.

concileable

conciliable enemy to the Cæsarean cause. And now Octavius distributed to the citizens the legacies, which his uncle had left them by his will. Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr. 42.
409 Conf.

Soon after these proceedings, the news was brought to Rome of the death of D. Brutus. Minutius Bætilus, another of Cæsar's assassins, was murdered, about this time, by his slaves, enraged at his barbarous treatment of them. App. iii.
588.
Orof. vi.
18.

The news also of Dolabella's defeat and death was not known in Rome till after Pedius's law *. Dolabella, after his success against Trebonius, having pillaged the province of Asia of its money, and of all things useful for war, marched forward to execute his grand design upon Syria; for which he had been making all this preparation: But Cassius was beforehand with him, and, having got possession of that country, and of all the armies in it, was much superior to him in force. Dolabella, however, made his way with some success through Cilicia, and came before Antioch in Syria, but was denied admittance into it; and, after some vain attempts to take it, being repulsed with loss, marched to Laodicea, which had before invited, and now opened its gates to him. Here Cassius came up with him, and presently invested the place, where, after he had destroyed Dolabella's fleet in two or three naval engagements, he shut him up closely by sea as well as by land, till Dolabella, seeing no way to escape, and the town unable to hold out any longer, put an end to his own life, by the assistance of one of his slaves, to prevent his falling alive into Cassius's hands, and suffering the same treatment he had shewn to Trebonius: But Cassius generously ordered his body to be buried, with that of his Lieutenant Octavius, who killed himself also with him. Middl. p.
443.
App. l. iv.
625.
Dio, xlvii.
Ep. Fam.
xii. 13 15.

The people of Laodicea, if we believe Dio, were only fined in a sum of money; but Appian says, that Cassius committed great extortions and cruelties, and reduced the town to the utmost misery. The same author relates, that the town of Tarsus, which had also favoured Dolabella, was fined 1500 talents, [290,625 l.] and that, in order to raise this sum, the magistrates were obliged to sell not only the ornaments of their city, but also some of their citizens for slaves.

Octavius had no sooner settled the affairs of the city, and subdued the Senate to his mind, than he marched back towards Gaul, to meet Antony and Lepidus; who had already passed the Alps, and brought their armies into Italy, in order to have a personal interview with him; which had been privately concerted for settling the terms of a triple league, Middl. p.
488.
Liv. 120.
Flor. iv. 6.
Plut. Cic.
& Brut.
App. iv.
589.
Dio, xlvii.

* Dr. Middleton is certainly mistaken, when he says, "Not long after the battle of Modena, the news of Dolabella's defeat and death, from Asia, brought a fresh occasion of joy to Cicero and his friends at Rome:" It appears, by a letter to C. Cassius, written after the 30th of June, and copiated above in the text, as also by another of Cassius, the Quæstor, to Cicero, dated from Cyprus, June the 13th, [Ep. Fam. xii. 13.] that Dolabella was not yet destroyed: And in none of Cicero's letters is his death mentioned.

Y. R. 710. and dividing the power and provinces of the Empire among themselves.
 Ref. Chr. The place appointed for the interview was a small island about two miles
 42. from Benonia, formed by the river Rhenus, which runs near to that city:
 429 Conf.

Here they met, not without jealousy and suspicion of danger from each other; being all three attended by their choicest troops, each with five legions, disposed in separate camps within sight of the island. Lepidus entered it the first, as an equal friend to the other two, to see that the place was clear and free from treachery; and, when he had given the signal agreed upon, Antony and Octavius advanced from the opposite banks of the river, and passed into the island by bridges, which they left guarded on each side by three hundred of their own men. It is reported that their first care, instead of embracing, was to search one another, whether they had not brought daggers concealed under their cloaths; and, when that ceremony was over, Octavius took his seat betwixt the other two, in the most honourable place, on account of his being Consul. They spent three days in close conference to adjust the plan of their accommodation; the substance of which was: "That the " three should be invested jointly with the supreme power, for the term
 " of five years, with the title of Triumvirs for settling the State of the Re- " public; that they should act in all cases by common consent; nomi" nate the Magistrates and Governors both at home and abroad; and " determine all affairs relating to the Public, by their sole will and plea" sure: That Octavius should have, for his peculiar province, Africa,
 " with Sicily, Sardinia, and the other islands of the Mediterranean; Le-
 " pidus, Spain, with the Narbonese Gaul; Antony, the other two Gauls,
 " on both sides of the Alps: And that Octavius should resign the con-
 " sulship to Ventidius for the remainder of the year: That Antony and " Octavius should prosecute the war against Brutus and Cassius, each of " them at the head of twenty legions; and Lepidus, with three legions,
 " be left to guard the city: And, at the end of the war, that eighteen
 " cities or colonies, the best and richest of Italy, together with their lands
 " and districts, should be taken from their owners, and assigned to the " perpetual possession of the soldiers, as a reward of their faithful ser" vices." These conditions were published to their several armies, and received by them with acclamations of joy, and mutual gratulations for this happy union of their Chiefs; which, at the desire of the soldiers, was ratified likewise by a marriage, agreed to be consummated between Octavius and Clodia, the daughter of Antony's wife Fulvia, by her first husband, P. Clodius.

The last thing that they adjusted was the list of a proscription, which they were determined to make of their enemies. This, as the historians tell us, occasioned much difficulty and warm contests amongst them, till each of them, in his turn, consented to sacrifice some of his best friends to the revenge and resentment of his colleagues. The whole list is said to have consisted of three hundred Senators and two thousand Knights.
 They

They reserved the publication of it till their arrival at Rome, excepting only a few of the most obnoxious, the heads of the Republican party, about seventeen in all; the chief of whom was Cicero. These they marked out for immediate destruction, and sent their emissaries away directly, to surprise and murder them, before any notice could reach them of their danger: Four of the number were presently taken and killed in the company of their friends; and the rest hunted out by the soldiers in private houses and temples; which presently filled the city with an universal terror and consternation, as if it had been taken by an enemy. So that the Consul Pedius was forced to run about the streets all the night, to quiet the minds and appease the fears of the people, and, as soon as it was light, published the names of the Seventeen, who were principally sought for, with an assurance of safety and indemnity to all others: But he himself was so shocked and fatigued by the horror of this night's work, that he died the day following.

The Triumvirs soon arrived, and made their entry on three several days: Octavius the first, then Lepidus, and last of all Antony; each attended with a prætorian cohort and one legion. P. Titius, one of the Tribunes of the people, immediately proposed a law, for the constituting of three Sovereign Magistrates, Reformers of the Republic, for five years, M. Antonius, Lepidus, and Octavius, who took possession of their office on the 27th of November. Then they gave out their edict of proscription, and retaliated, upon the nobles and aristocratic faction, the cruelties of Sylla: This edict Appian pretends to give us, but it is a most sorry piece, and drawn up very probably by himself. Cicero was at his Tusculan villa with his brother and nephew, when he first received the news of the proscription, and of their being included in it. Notwithstanding the prophetic spirit, with which he is commonly supposed to have been endowed, he did not, probably, foresee this dire event ^b.

Undoubtedly

^b After Antony's defeat, imagining all danger to be over on that side, he had sent M. Brutus in pursuit of Dolabella, and it was decreed by the Senate, that the war against this Rebel should be carried on jointly by Brutus and Cassius. But, before Dolabella was destroyed, he was very importunate in his letters to engage them to bring their armies immediately into Italy, and comply with a vote of the Senate, which he had moved for, after the junction of Lepidus and Antony, by the advice of D. Brutus:

CICERO to M. BRUTUS.

“WE have yet had no letters from you, nor so much as any report, to inform us, that, Ad Brut.
“in pursuance of the vote of the Senate, you were bringing your army into Italy: Which Ep. x.
“that you would do, and with all speed, the Republic earnestly desired of you. For our Middl. Ed.
“intestine evil gains ground upon us every day; nor do we find more trouble from our enemies 19. p. 127.
“abroad, than from those at home: Who were troublesome, indeed, from the beginning of the “war, but more easily kept under.” [The partisans of Antony and Lepidus.] For the Senate “was then in higher spirits, roused not only by my votes, but exhortations. Pansa at “the head of it was sufficiently brisk and vigorous against all the rest of that class; but, “above all, against his father-in-law: [Calenus] who, during his consulship, wanted “neither

Y. R. 710. Undoubtedly he depended, for his own and his family's safety, on the
 B. 1. Chr. power of Octavius, who had given him the strongest assurances of his 42. protection.
 409 Conf.

"neither courage from the beginning, nor fidelity to the last. The war was so managed
 "at Mutina, that you could find no fault with Cæsar, though some with Hirtius. The "fortune of this war, if compared with a prosperous State, is uncertain; if with an ad"verse one, good. The Republic was victorious; Antony's forces routed; he himself
 "driven out of Italy by Decimus. But so many blunders ensued, that the victory slipped,
 "as it were, out of our hands: For our Generals did not think fit to pursue the frightened,
 "disarmed, disabled Rebels:" [His pupil Octavius would not, and Decimus could not]
 "and an opportunity was given to Lepidus, to make us feel the effects of his levity; tho'
 "felt by us, indeed, often before, but now to our greater mischief. The armies of Brutus
 "and Plancus are good, but raw:" [Plancus had four legions, three of which were vete"ran; Decimus, of ten, had but one veteran:] "The Gallie auxiliaries faithful and nu"merous. But, as to Cæsar, who has been governed hitherto by my advice, and is in"deed of an excellent disposition, and wonderful constancy, some people, by most wicked let"ters, messages, and fallacious accounts of things, have pushed him to an assured hope "of the consulship. Which, as soon as I perceived, I never ceased admonishing him in his "absence, nor reproaching his friends here present, who seemed to encourage his ambi"tion: Nor did I scruple to lay open the source of those traitorous counsels in the Se"nate; nor do I ever remember the Senate or the Magistrates to have behaved better on "any occasion. For it never happened before, in voting an extraordinary honour to a "powerful, or rather most powerful man, (since power is now measured by force and "arms) that no Tribune, nor any other Magistrate, nor so much as a private Senator "would move for it*. Yet, in the midst of all this firmness and virtue, the city is still
 "alarmed: For we are insulted, Brutus, both by the licentiousness of the soldiers, and "the insolence of the Generals. Every one demands to have as much power in the State
 "as he has force to extort it: No reason, no moderation, no law, no custom, no duty, is at "all regarded; no judgment or opinion of the citizens; no reverence for posterity." [Had "not this been the State of Rome, even as far back as from the time of the Gracchi?] I had "foreseen all this long beforehand, and was flying out of Italy, at the time when the same of "your edicts called me back again. But you, Brutus, gave me fresh courage at Velia:
 "For, tho' it grieved me to think that I was going to that city, from which you, who had "given liberty to it, was forced to fly, (which had happened also formerly to me, in a "case of similar danger, but of more unhappy issue) I yet went on and came to Rome;
 "and,

* Dr. Middleton, p. 456, thinks that this letter evidently proves, that Cicero never favoured Octavius's pretensions to the consulship, but was, of all men, the most averse to his design, and the most active in dissuading him from pursuing it. Mr. Melmoth, (Vol. iii. p. 382.) on the other side, is of opinion, that it does not discredit the evidence of Plutarch, Appian, and Dio. "There seems, says he, to be the strongest reason to question either the authenticity, or the veracity, of this letter: Because it is most certain, from one of Cicero's Philippics, that he actually did favour the earliest possible promotion of Octavius to the consulate. Quid est enim, P. C. says he, cur cum (Octavius) non QUAMPRIMUM AMPLISSIMOS HONORES capere cupiamus? Legibus enim annalibus cum grandiorum etatem ad consulatum constituamus, adolescentie temeritatem verebatur. C. Cæsar in eunte etate docuit, ab excellenti, eximique virtute, progressum etatis expectari non oportere: In hoc spes libertatis posita est; ab hoc accepta jam salus, hinc summi honores et exquiruntur et parati sunt. Philipp. v. 17, 18. Could Cicero after this, without being guilty of the wildest and weakest inconsistency, admonish Octavius by letter against his designs upon the consulship; reproach those to their face who encouraged him in that ambitious view; and lay open the source of those traitorous counsels in the Senate: When he had himself, in the speech and in the passage above cited, said every thing that his wit and his eloquence could suggest, in favour of Octavius's premature advancement to the consular office? . . . In farther confirmation of that historical evidence, for which I am contending, it may be observed, that Plutarch cites the authority of Octavius himself for what he affirms concerning the private agreement between Octavius and Cicero, in regard to the consulate. And it is probable he took this piece of secret history from those Memoirs, which Octavius wrote of his own life, as it is certain that both Plutarch and Appian made great use of them in compiling their histories."

protection. And the old historians tell us, that Octavius did not give up Cicero to the revenge of his colleagues, without the greatest reluctance, and

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.
42.
409 Conf.

“and, without the support of any guard, shook the power of Antony; and, by my advice
“and authority, secured to us the troops of Cæsar, which the occasion offered, against his “traiterous arms. In whom, if he continues in the same disposition and deference to my ad“vice, we are likely to have a sufficient guard.” [It must be owned that the behaviour of this docile pupil, since the raising of the siege of Mutina, does much honour to the tutor.] “But if the counsels of the disaffected should have more influence with him than “mine; or if the imbecillity of his age should not be able to sustain the weight of the “affairs, which he has now upon his hands; all our hopes are in you. For which rea“son, fly to us, I beseech you; and perfect your work of freeing the Republic, which you “have freed rather, as yet, by your virtue and greatness of mind, than in fact and re“ality. All the world will run to you. Exhort Cassius by letter to do the same. There “is no hope of liberty any where but in the strength of your camps. We have both the “Generals, and the armies in the West, wholly firm to us: I have some confidence also, that “these troops of the young man are still firm: But there are so many at work to pervert “them, that I am sometimes afraid lest they make an impression on him.” [What! was he not already perverted, when, in contempt of the laws and the Senate, he demanded the consulship by a deputation of his officers, and marched his army towards Rome.] “You “see the whole state of the Republic, as it stood at the time when I was sending away
“this letter. I wish that things may henceforward take a better turn: But if it should fall “out otherwise (which omen the gods avert!) I shall lament the fate of the Republic, “which ought to be immortal: But what a poor share of life is left at these years for me?”

Vell. Pat.
ii. 66.
Plut. in Ant.
Suet. in
Aug. 27.

In a letter that soon followed the foregoing, he writes: “I beg of you, my Brutus, with “the greatest earnestness, that you would not dismiss my son; but bring him hither along “with you. This you must do instantly, if you have any regard for the Republic, for “which you was born. For the war is renewed upon us by the great treachery of Lepi- “dus: And, as for Cæsar’s army, which was the best, it is not only of no service to us, “but obliges us even to call for yours. Whenever you shall set foot in Italy, there will not “be a single citizen, whom we can truly call by that name, who will not presently be in “your camp. We have D. Brutus, indeed, happily united with Plancus: But you are “not ignorant, how uncertain the minds of men infected with party, as well as the events “of battles, are.” [Of the Generals of the West, who were all firm in the last letter, Pol-
“lio seems in this to be given up, and Plancus is now suspected.] “Nay, should we con“quer, as I hope we shall, there will be a great want of your advice and authority, to “settle all our affairs. Help us, therefore, for God’s sake, and that as soon as possible:
“And assure yourself that you did not do a greater service to your country on THE IDES OF “MARCH, when you delivered your fellow-citizens from slavery, than you will do by coming “to us quickly. JULY THE 12th.”

Middl. Ed.
10. p. 139.

But, after all these repeated entreaties and remonstrances of Cicero, neither Brutus, nor Cassius, seem to have entertained the least thought of coming with their armies to Italy.
Cassius, indeed, by being more remote, and having Dolabella to oppose, could not come so readily, and was not so much expected as Brutus, who, before the battle of Mutina, had drawn all his legions to the sea-coast, and kept them at Apollonia and Dyrrhacium, waiting the event of that action, and ready to embark for Italy, if any accident had made his assistance necessary; for which Cicero highly commends him. But, upon the news of Antony’s defeat, taking all the danger to be over (as well as Cicero and his Senate;) he (with their approbation) marched directly away to the remotest parts of Greece and Macedonia, to oppose the attempts of *Dolabella (who sent about that time five cohorts

Middl. F.
466.
Ad Brut. ii.
Ad Brut. ii.

* “ON the 27th of April, when we were debating on the means of prosecuting the war against those who are adjudged to be enemies, Servilius moved, that Ventidius also should be included in that number; and that Cassius should pursue Dolabella: To whom, when I had assented, I made “ this

Y. R. 710. and after a struggle of two days to preserve him. It was the design of Ref. Chr. the triumvirate to keep their resolution a secret, if possible, to the mo-42.
 409 Conf. ment

horts as far as the Thracian Chersonesus upon the Hellspont;) and from that time seemed deaf to the call of the Senate, and to all Cicero's letters. His conduct, however, seems to have been extremely prudent. He was sensible that his arrival with an armed force would startle the veterans and all the Cæsarean party, and drive them into one camp:
 And he might well suspect the fidelity of his troops, and that they were not sufficiently confirmed and attached to him, to be trusted in the field against the veterans in Italy; whose example and invitation, when they came to face each other, might very probably induce them to desert, and betray their Commanders. We find that, even while the Consuls lived, Brutus was cautious of letting them know at Rome, how prosperously Cassius's affairs went on in Syria, for fear of giving umbrage to their enemies; and the following letter shews us that Cicero's scheme, of bringing Brutus into Italy, was not approved of by his relations and friends in Rome. I lay it before the reader also upon other accounts:

CICERO to M. BRUTUS.

Ad Brut. "AFTER I had often exhorted you by letters to come, as soon as possible, to the
 Ep. xviii. relief of the Republic, and bring your army into Italy; and never imagined that your Middl. Ed. own people had any scruples about it; I was desired, by that most prudent and dili-
 Ep. xxiii. gent woman, your mother, all whose thoughts and cares are employed on you, that I
 P. 181. would come to her on the 24th of July; which I did, as I ought, without delay.
 "When I came I found Casca, Labes, and Scaptius with her. She presently entered into "the affair, and asked my opinion, whether we should send for you to Italy; and whe"ther I thought it best for you to come, or to continue abroad. I declared what I took
 "to be most for your honour and reputation, that, without loss of time, you should bring
 "present help to the tottering and declining State. For what mischief may we not ex"pect from that war, where the conquering armies refused to pursue a flying enemy?
 "Where a General unhurt, unprovoked, possessed of the highest honours, and the greatest "fortunes; with a wife and children, and near relation to you; has declared war against "the Commonwealth? I may add, where, in so great a concord of the Senate and the "people, there resides still so much disorder within the walls? But the greatest grief,
 "which I feel, while I am now writing, is to reflect, that, when the Republic had taken
 "my word for a youth, or rather a boy, I shall hardly have it in my power to make good
 "what I promised for him. For it is a thing of much greater delicacy and moment to "engage

"this farther motion: That you also, if you thought it of use and benefit to the Republic, should carry "on the war against Dolabella; but, if you could not do it with convenience to the public affairs,
 "or did not think it for the public service, that you should keep your army in the same quarters where
 "you now are. The Senate could not decree any thing more honourable to you, than that it should "be left to you to determine what was the most conducive to the service of the Republic. My opinion "of the matter is this: That, if Dolabella has any troops, any camp, any place, where he can make "a stand, it concerns your character and dignity to pursue him. As to our Cassius's forces, we know
 "nothing at all about them: For we have neither received any letters from him, nor any intelligence
 "that we could depend upon as certain. You are very sensible of what importance it is, that Dolabella
 "should be destroyed: Not only that he may suffer the punishment due to his treason, but that "the Chiefs of the Rebels may not have a place to resort to, in their flight from Mutina. That this "was my opinion even before, you may recollect from my former letters: Though at that time our "only refuge was in your camp, and our hopes of safety in your army. Wherefore now, when we "are delivered, as I hope, from all danger, we ought to be more intent on the ruin of Dolabella."

Ad Brut. v. "I highly applaud your resolution, of not removing your army from Asolonia and
 "Dyrhachium, before you had heard of Antony's flight, Brutus's eruption, and the victory of the Ro"man people. As to what you write, therefore, that you have since resolved to lead your army into
 "the Chersonese, nor to suffer the Empire of Rome to be insulted by a most wicked enemy; you do
 "what is agreeable to your dignity and the public service." Ad Brut. ii.

ment of execution ; in order to surprise those whom they had destined to destruction, before they were aware of the danger, or had time to escape. Some of Cicero's friends, perhaps by the contrivance of Octavius, found means, however, to give him early notice of it; upon which he immediately set forward with his brother and nephew, towards Astura, the nearest villa which he had upon the sea, with intent to transport themselves directly out of the reach of their enemies. But Quintus, being wholly unprepared for so sudden a voyage, resolved to turn back with his son to Rome, in confidence of lying concealed there, till they could provide money and necessaries for their support abroad. The diligence of Antony's emissaries eluded all their caution. The son was found out first; who is said to have been more solicitous for the preservation of his father, than to provide for his own safety. Upon his refusal

VOL. IV.

A a a

fusal

“engage one's self for another's sentiments and principles, especially in affairs of importance, than for money: For money may be paid, and the loss itself is tolerable: But how can you pay what you are engaged for to the Republic, unless he, for whom you stand engaged, will suffer it to be paid? Yet I am still in hopes to hold him, tho' many are plucking him away from me.” [What can Cicero mean here, unless it is, that he hopes to engage Octavius's mercy for Brutus and Cassius?] “For his disposition seems good, tho' his age is flexible; and many are always at hand to corrupt him; who, by throwing in his way the splendor of false honour, think themselves sure of dazzling his good sense and understanding. Wherefore, to all my other labours, this new one is added, of setting all engines at work to hold fast the young man, lest I incur the imputation of rashness. Though what rashness is it after all? For in reality, I bound him, for whom I was engaged, more strongly than myself. Nor has the Republic as yet any cause to repent, that I was his sponsor: Since he has been hitherto the more firm and constant in acting for us, as well from his own temper, as for the sake of my promise. The greatest difficulty in the Republic, if I mistake not, is the want of money: For honest men grow every day more and more averse to the name of tribute*; and what was gathered from the hundredth penny, [a tax of one per cent. paid by the month,] where the rich are shamefully rated, is all spent in rewarding the two legions.” [Though they refused to obey a decree of the Senate ordering them to serve under D. Brutus.] “There is an infinite expence upon us to support the armies, which now defend us; and also yours; for our Cassius seems likely to come sufficiently provided. But I long to talk over this, and many things, with you in person; and that quickly. As to your sister's children, I did not wait, Brutus, for your writing to me: The times themselves, since the war will be drawn into length, reserve the whole affair to you.” [Such was Cicero's foresight, notwithstanding the many proofs of Octavius's disaffection to what was called the cause of the Republic:] “But, from the first, when I could not foresee the continuance of the war, I pleaded the cause of the children in the Senate, in a manner which you have been informed of, I guess, by your mother's letters: Nor can there be any case where I will not both say and do, even at the hazard of my life, whatever I think agreeable either to your inclination, or to your interest. The 26th of July.”

* This tribute seems to have been a sort of capitation-tax, proportioned to each man's substance; and had been wholly disused in Rome, ever since the conquest of Macedonia by P. Æmilius; which produced a revenue sufficient to ease the Republic ever after from that burden, till the present necessity obliged them to renew it. Plin. H. Nat. xxxiii. 3. “From the aversion, says Dr. Middleton, which even the honest are here said to have shewn to the renewal of it, one cannot but reflect on the fatal effects of that indolence and luxury, which had infected the Republic in this age, and hastened its ruin.” But what disgusted these honest was, probably, to see their money employed in recompensing veteran soldiers, traitors to the cause of the Republic, and rebels to the Senate; which nothing but Cicero's excessive complaisance for Octavius, or the dread of him, could make him approve.

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.
49.
409 Conf.

Y. R. 712. fusal to discover where his father lay hid, he was put to the rack by the Ref. Chr. soldiers; till the father, to rescue his son from torture, came out of his
 42. hiding place, and voluntarily surrendered himself, making no other re-429 Conf. quest to his executioners, than that they would dispatch him the first of Plut. Cic. the two. The son urged the same petition, to spare him the misery of
 App. 601. being the spectator of his father's murder; so that the assassins, to satis-Dio, p. 333. fy them both, taking each of them apart, killed them by agreement at the same time. Cicero, in the mean while, found a vessel ready for him
 M-HH p. at Assur, in which he presently embarked: But, the winds being cross
 495. and turbulent, and the sea wholly uneasy to him, after he had sailed about twelve leagues along the coast, he landed at Circæum, and spent a night near that place in great anxiety and irresolution. The question was, what course he should steer; and whether he should fly to Brutus, or to Cassius, or to S. Pompeius; but, after all his deliberations, none of them pleased him so much as the expedient of dying*. According to Plutarch, he had some thoughts of returning to the city, and killing himself in Cæsar's house, in order to leave the guilt and curse of his blood upon Cæsar's perfidy and ingratitude: But the importunity of his servants prevailed with him to sail forward to Cajeta; where he went again on shore, to repose himself in his Formian villa, about a mile from the coast; weary of life and the sea; and declaring that he would die in that country, which he had so often saved^d. Here he slept soundly Plut. Cic. for several hours; tho', as most writers tell us, "a great number of crows " were fluttering all the while and making a strange noise about his win" dows, as if to rouse and warn him of his approaching fate; and that " one of them made its way into the chamber, and pulled away his very
 " bed-cloaths; till his slaves, admonished by this prodigy, and ashamed
 " to see brute creatures more sollicitous for his safety than themselves,
 " forced him into a litter, or portable chair, and carried him away to" wards the ship, through the private ways and walks of his woods; ha" ving just heard, that soldiers were already come into the country in " quest of him and were then not far from the villa." As soon as they were gone, the soldiers arrived at the house; and, perceiving him to be fled, pursued immediately towards the sea, and overtook him in the wood. Their leader was one Popilius Lænas, a Tribune, or Colonel of the army, whom Cicero had formerly defended and preserved in a capital cause. As soon Liv. fragm. as the soldiers appeared, the servants prepared themselves to fight, being resolved to defend their master's life at the hazard of their own.
 But Cicero commanded them to set him down, and make no resistance:
 Then, looking upon his executioners with a presence of mind and firmness,

* Crematius Cordus ait, Ciceroni cum cogitasset, utrumne Brutum, an Cassium, an S. Pompeium peteret, omnia displicuisse præter mortem. Senec. Suasor. vi.

^d Tædium tandem eum et fugæ et vitæ cepit: regressusque ad superiorem villam, quæ paulo plus mille passibus à mari abest; moriar, inquit, in patria sæpe servata. Liv. fragm. apud Senec. Suasor. i.

which

which almost daunted them, and, thrusting his neck as forwardly as he could out of the litter, he bad them do their work, and take what they wanted: Upon which they presently cut off his head and both his hands, and returned with them in all haste and great joy towards Rome, as the most agreeable present which they could possibly carry to Antony. Popilius charged himself with the conveyance, without reflecting on the infamy of carrying that head, which had saved his own. He found Antony in the Forum, surrounded with guards and crowds of people; but upon shewing, from a distance, the spoils, which he had brought, he was rewarded upon the spot with the honour of a crown, and about eight thousand pounds sterling. Antony ordered the head to be fixed upon the Rostra between the two hands; a sad spectacle to the city: It drew tears from every eye to see those mangled members, which used to exert themselves so gloriously from that place, in defence of the lives, the fortunes, and the liberties of the Roman people, so lamentably exposed to the scorn of sycophants and traitors. The deaths of the rest, says an historian of that age, caused only a private and particular sorrow; but Cicero's an universal one. Yet it must be owned, that he had so much the less reason to complain of his fate, as it is certain that he suffered nothing more than he would have inflicted, had fortune put ANTONY in his power: And that he had brought this ruin upon himself and his friends by his rash and cruel counsels. Brutus, who immediately revenged his death upon C. Antonius, the Triumvir's brother, is reported, upon receiving of the news, to have said, that he was more ashamed of the cause of it than afflicted at the loss. He was killed on the 7th of December, about ten days from the settlement of the triumvirate, after he had lived sixty-three years, eleven months, and five days.*

A a a 2

Antony,

* Middl. p. 499. "The odium of Cicero's death, fell chiefly on Antony, yet it left a stain of perfidy and ingratitude also on Augustus; which explains the reason of that silence, which is observed about him, by the writers of that age; and why his name is not so much as mentioned either by Horace or Virgil. . . . Livy, though he seems to extenuate the crime of Cicero's murder, yet, after a high encomium of his VIRTUE*, declares, that to praise him as he deserved required the eloquence of Cicero himself. . . . In the succeeding generation, as the particular envy to Cicero subsided, by the death of those whom private interests and personal quarrels had engaged to hate him while living, and defame him when dead, so his name and memory began to shine out in its proper lustre: And, in the reign even of Tiberius, when an eminent statesman and historian, Cremutius Cordus, was condemned to

* The fragment of Livy is as follows: Vixit tres et sexaginta annos, ut, si vis abisset, ne immatura quidem mors videri possit. Ingenium et operibus, et premiis operum felix: Ipse fortune diu prospera: Et in longo tenore felicitatis, magnis interim ictus vulneribus, Exilio, ruinâ partium pro quibus steterat, et morte, exitu tam tristi atque acerbo, omnium adversorum nihil, ut vire dignum erat, tulit, præter mortem: Quæ verè æstimanti minus indigna videri potuit, quod à victore inimico nil crudelius passus erat, quam quod ejusdem fortunæ compos ipse fecisset. Si quis tamen virtutibus vitia senserit, vir magnus, acer, memorabilis fuit, et in cujus laudes persequendas Cicerone laudatore opus fuerit. Ap. Senec. Suasor. vii. Here, I should think, there is no high encomium of his virtue.

Y. R. 710.
Bel. Chr.
42.
409 Cons.

Antony, satiated with Cicero's blood, declared the proscription at an end, in regard to himself. He granted his mother, Julia, the life of her brother, L. Caesar; to his friend, Calenus, that of the learned Varro; and wrote with his own hand to Atticus, who had concealed himself, with his friend, Q. Gallius Canus, that both he and his friend were safe, and, by his orders, both blotted out of the list of the proscribed.

"to die for praising Brutus, yet Paterculus
"could not forbear breaking out into the "following warm expostulation with Antony, on the subject of Cicero's death:
"Thou hast done nothing, Antony; hast done
"nothing, I say, by setting a price on that di"vine and illustrious head, and, by a detest-
"table reward, procuring the death of so "great a Consul and Preserver of the Repub"lic. Thou hast snatched from CICERO a "troublesome being; a declining age; a life
"more miserable, under thy dominion, than
"death itself; but, so far from diminishing
"the glory of his deeds and sayings, thou hast
"increased it. He lives and will live in the "memory of all ages; and as long as this sys"tem of nature, whether by chance or provi"dence, or what way soever formed, (which
"be alone of all the Romans comprehended in his "mind, and illustrated with his eloquence)
"shall remain intire, it will draw the praises
"of CICERO along with it; and all poste"rity will admire his writings against thee,
"and curse thy act against him." [Undoubtedly, this historian greatly paid his court to the reigning family, in charging Antony with the whole odium of the proscription.]
"From this period, all the Roman writers,
"whether poets or historians, seem to vie
"with each other in celebrating the praises
"of Cicero, as the parent of Roman wit and "eloquence"; who had done more honour
"to his country, by his writings, than all
"their conquerors by their arms, and extended
"the bounds of their learning beyond those of "their empire. So that their very imperi-
"ors, near three centuries after his death,
"began to reverence him in the trials of their "inferior deities: A rank which he would "have preserved to this day, if he had hap"pened to live in papal Rome; where he "could not have failed, as Erasmus says, from
"the innocence of his life, of obtaining the "honour and title of a Saint." This assertion his ingenious and zealous panegyrist proves, at length, from Cicero's writings, which contain certainly the noblest principles of morality, and an eloquent exposition of all the duties of man. But his moral character must be shewn from his practice, from his actions, and the motives of his actions, not from theory and lessons of morality:

And these actions, with their springs, having been laid before the reader in the foregoing pages, we shall leave him to pronounce concerning it.

If these facts are true, and Antony was not of a cruel disposition, as we are told by Plutarch, how can we then give credit to the most inhuman facts related of him by this same Plutarch and other authors? We are told, that, in all this scene of misery, he gave himself up to all the excesses of debau-chery imaginable, that his house was filled with buffoons and players, and that he squandered away, amongst the vilest of mankind, the price of the blood of the most illustrious citizens. Nonius, it is said, was put to death, because he would not part with a fine opal; the famous Verres, because he would not give up two Corinthian vases:
One Fidustius was wantonly killed, because he had been proscribed by Sylla: Atilius, a boy, very rich, had the toga virili put on him, and was immediately proscribed: Fulvia was suffered to plunder and destroy whom she pleased: A head of a Senator, called, by Valerius Maximus, Cajetius Ru-sus, being brought to Antony, when at table, he examined it with attention, then told the bearers, I know him not: This is an affair of my wife's. This man had refused to let his house to Fulvia, and, lest Rome should mistake the cause of his death, his head, it is said, was fixed upon the house, and not in the Forum. These facts are altogether incredible, as well as her behaviour towards Cicero's head, which, some historians tell us, was sent to her by Antony, before he fixed it upon the rostra; and that this fair Lady placed it upon her knees, loaded it with garlands, put it upon it, opened the mouth and pulled out the tongue, which she perforated a thousand times with her bodkin.

• Our panegyrist adds: And as the most illustrious of their patriots.

Lepidus,

Lepidus, on his side, suffered his brother, L. Paulus, to escape, who went to Brutus's camp, and, after the battle of Philippi, might have returned to Rome, but chose to pass the remainder of his days at Mile-tum: And Messala, though in Brutus's camp, was declared free from all prosecution by proclamation, in which it was said: As the relations of Messala have certified to us, that he was not in Rome at the time that CÆSAR was killed, we erase his name out of the list of the proscribed. As to Octavius, Suetonius tells us, that, though he opposed the proscription at first, yet he shewed himself more cruel and bloody in urging it afterwards, than either of the other two; and relates, upon the authority of one Junius Saturninus, that, after the proscription was over, when Lepidus made an apology to the Senate for their proceedings, and gave hopes of a more gentle administration for the future, young Cæsar, on his side, declared, that he should set no bounds to the proscription but his pleasure, and still reserved to himself the liberty of punishing such as were guilty. But these accounts, though adopted by all modern authors, are not supported by any authentic or probable facts².

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.
42.
409 Conf.

The greatest number of the proscribed found means to escape, and they fled either into Macedonia to Brutus, or into Africa to Cornificius, or to young Pompey, who, having been appointed Commander-general of the seas by the Senate, had, under this title, assembled a considerable force, and made himself master of the greatest part of Sicily: And who, at this time, stationed small vessels all along the coast, to carry the proscribed from the cruelty of the Triumvirs.

The Triumvirs, having taken vengeance of their enemies in Rome and Italy, began now to think of levying the money necessary to carry on the war against Brutus and Cassius: And they are accused of having put in practice every method of extortion, and of having seized upon the treasures deposited in the hands of the Vestal Virgins; yet, the sums

² He is accused of having proscribed C. Toranius, formerly his tutor and his father's colleague in the ædileship. We hear, however, of no other instance of his cruelty at this time. But, before the triumvirate, Suetonius indeed, Aug. 27, lays an atrocious act to his charge: He says, that Q. Gallius, Prætor of the city, when he came to wait upon him, had unfortunately under his robe a double tablet (duplices tabulas), a sort of pocket-book, which Octavius judged to be a poniard; upon which suspicion, not venturing to make search, lest it should be found to be something else, he ordered him to be carried off by his guards and put to the torture, as if he had been a slave: And, because the Prætor would not own that he had a design to kill him, Octavius pulled out his eyes with his own hands, and ordered him to be executed. However, Suetonius has informed us that Octavius did not own the fact, and in his Memoirs told a quite different story: That Gallius desired a private conference with him, with a view of murdering him; for which reason he put him in prison, but afterwards banished him the city; and that he perished either in a storm at sea, or by the hands of robbers. Such is the evidence of Octavius's singular cruelty. Plutarch moralises at length upon the unnatural bargain made by the Triumvirs, when Antony consented to give up his uncle, and Lepidus, his brother, to the vengeance of young Cæsar, in exchange for Cicero. If that was the case, why did not this cruel monster, Octavius, insist upon the execution of this part of the treaty, after his friend had fallen the victim of it?

amassed

Y. R. 110. amassed not being sufficient, they devised a new tax never known before. This singular expedient was a tax upon women. They drew up a list of 1400 Ladies of Rome, mothers, daughters or relations of their enemies: These alliances were far enough fetched, for riches alone were sufficient to make them guilty in this case. These were ordered to make a declaration of their estates, in order to be taxed as should be thought proper. Appian tells us that the Ladies assembled on this occasion, and went in a body to the female relations of the Triumvirs; and that they were well received by Octavia, sister to young Cæsar; and by Julia, Antony's mother; but were not admitted by the haughty Fulvia, his wife. And that, upon this, they went to the Forum, and, both people and soldiers making way for them, they advanced to the tribunal of the Triumvirs, where Hortensia, the daughter of the famous Orator, made a speech, in the name of all the rest, to this effect:

Echard, B. " My Lords, these unhappy Ladies, whom you see here imploring in ch. 4. " your justice and bounty, would never have presumed to appear in this Appian. " place, had they not first made use of all possible means, which either " their native modesty might allow, or their best understandings could " inform them of. Though our appearing here may seem contrary to " the rules of decency prescribed to our sex, which we have hitherto
" most strictly observed, yet the loss of our fathers, our children, of " our brothers and our husbands, is sufficient to excuse us; nay, and
" to vindicate us too, when their unhappy deaths are made a pretence
" for our further misfortunes. You pretend you have been affronted,
" but what have the women done that they must be impoverished?
" If they are as blameable as the men, why don't you proscribe them " too? Certainly none of our sex have ever declared you your country's " enemies: We have neither plundered your goods, nor suborned your " soldiers: We have raised no troops against you, nor opposed those ho" nours and offices to which you pretend. We presume not to govern
" the Republic, nor is it our ambition which has drawn the present mi-" series and misfortunes on our heads; empire, dignities, and ho" nours were never designed for our sex. We, alas! have done nothing " to affront you, nothing to offend you, nor any thing to move you to " this severe treatment of us. But you tell us that you have a war to " support. And when have mankind been free from war? And yet " have women ever been taxed on that account? The universal consent
" of nations has confirmed an exception in their favour, which nature " herself has granted us. Formerly, indeed, the Roman women, in the " extreme exigency of the Republic, when in danger of becoming a " prey to the Carthaginians, contributed towards the expences of the " State, but they did it voluntarily: That which they gave was not
" levied upon their estates, dowries, and houses; they only appro" priated to it the ornaments of their persons: Nor were they subject " to any estimation, or informations of accusers. What is then the dan" ger

“ger which you apprehend at present? Do the Gauls or Parthians invade Italy? In that case you will find us no less generous than our mothers; but think not that we will contribute our estates to maintain civil wars, and enable you to destroy one another. Such a demand was never made either by Cæsar or Pompey, in their wars; nor by Marius and Cinna, during their cruelties; no, not by Sylla himself, who first set up tyranny in Rome: Yet, after all, you adorn yourselves with the glorious title of Reformers of the State^b.” This discourse appeared so bold and dangerous to the Triumvirs, that they immediately sent their Lictors to cause the Ladies to retire; but, perceiving that the multitude began to cry out against such violence, they promised to re-consider the affair, and afterwards drew up another list of 400 women, instead of 1400; but, to make good the sum they wanted, they taxed all the citizens and foreigners, without distinction, who were worth one hundred thousand drachmas, or upwards of 3200 pounds sterling.

Y. R. 710.
Bef. Chr.
42.
409 Conf.

During all this confusion, Lepidus and Plancus obtained a decree for a triumph on account of some inconsiderable success in Gaul; and, while the city was in the greatest consternation, they calmly issued out proclamations for public rejoicings. Plancus triumphed the 29th of December, and Lepidus on the 31st. The soldiers sung in the procession this line, De Germanis, non de Gallis, duo triumphant Consules: signifying very properly that their triumph was rather over their germani, or brothers, than over the Gauls.

Octavius resigned, as had been agreed, the consular fasces, before the end of the year, in favour of Ventidius, who had C. Corinnas for his colleague, in the room of Pedius. They enjoyed them only a part of the month of December, and they were transferred for the following year to Lepidus and Plancus.

In order to gratify the ambition of more of their friends, the Triumvirs not only named one of the ædiles to the vacant prætorship of Ventidius, but made all the other Prætors resign five days before the expiration of their office, that others might be named in their places, and enjoy the title and rank of antient Prætors. In fine, they appointed magistrates for several years; by which means they confirmed their power, by putting, for a long time, all the magistracies in the hands of those who were attached to them and interested in the support of their government. On the 1st of January, the Triumvirs solemnly swore to observe the acts of Cæsar, and made all the magistrates take the same oath.

^b Hortensia, Q. Hortensii filia, cum ordo matronarum gravi tributo à triumviris esset oneratus, nec quisquam virorum patrocinium eis accommodare auderet; causam feminarum apud Triumviros constanter et feliciter regit. Repræsentata enim patris facundia impetravit, ut major pars imperatæ pecuniæ his remitteretur. Val. Max. L. viii. c. 3.

T H E

Roman History.

E L E V E N T H B O O K.

From the Establishment of the SECOND TRIUMVIRATE
to the Settlement of the Empire on OCTAVIUS.

C H A P. I.

BRUTUS and CASSIUS reduce the Lycians and Rhodians, and march their armies into Macedonia. ANTONY and OCTAVIUS carry over their legions into the same province. The first battle of Philippi, and the death of CASSIUS. The second battle of Philippi, and the death of BRUTUS. The TRIUMVIRS make a new division of the Empire.

M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS II. } Consuls.
L. MUNACIUS PLANCUS, }

Y. R. 711.
Bef. Chr.
41.
410 Conf.

BRUTUS and Cassius were now masters of all the Eastern provinces, where they had made great exactions, and raised an army of 19 legions and 20,000 horse: And the latter was preparing for an expedition into Egypt against Cleopatra, when he was recalled by Brutus, upon the news that Antony and Octavius had joined their forces. Cassius, therefore, leaving Syria to his brother's son with one single legion, marched into lesser Asia, and met Brutus at Smyrna, where they consulted about the conduct of the war. Brutus moved to have the armies pass into Greece and Macedonia immediately, and there wait for Octavius and Antony; but to Cassius it appeared the wiser measure to reduce the Rhodians and Lycians; who had refused to pay any contributions, and were powerful at sea. It seemed to him of the most dangerous consequence to leave such considerable enemies behind them; and

and this expedition, accordingly, was entered upon without delay, and in a short time, completed. The Rhodians were severely plundered by Cassius, and scarce any thing, beside their lives, was left them; but the unfortunate Lycians, who had to do with the mild and humane philosopher, Brutus, fared much worse. Xanthus, their capital town, was burnt to the ground, and all the inhabitants destroyed. Those who surrendered at discretion he deprived of all their public and private money. After these military operations¹, the two Commanders met again at Sardis, and were there proclaimed Emperors by their two armies², and soon passed over into Thrace and Macedonia; whither the Triumvirs had sent two Lieutenants, Decidius Saxa and Norbanus, with eight legions, while they themselves made a fruitless attempt to drive Sextus out of Sicily: For they foresaw he would be a thorn in their side, and, in concert with the fleets commanded by Murcus and Domitius, interrupt their communication with Italy and the other transmarine provinces.

Y. R. 711.
Bef. Chr.
41.
410 Conf.

¹ Plutarch tells us that the destruction of the inhabitants of Xanthus happened against the will and earnest endeavours of Brutus, and was entirely owing to an unaccountable fury and frenzy with which they were seized, which made them set fire to their own houses and destroy one another: But the contrary is owned in the following letter of Brutus to the Rhodians: Xanthicus, cum à nobis defecissent, extremo supplicio afficimus. Nam usque ad parvulos omnibus caesis, eorum urbem igne & ferro diruimus. Patarenſibus, quia fidi nobis extiterant, tributa relaxavimus ac liberos & sui juris esse concessimus. Atque pro restauratione eorum, quæ demolita erant, quinquaginta talenta dono dedimus. Liceat & vobis consulere ac videre, utrum vos pro hostibus quemadmodum Xanthiis, an pro amicis cœu Patareni, haberi velitis. And this letter Plutarch himself has cited, but in fewer words: Xanthii beneficium meum despicientes, desperationis suæ habuerunt patrum sepulchrum. Patarenſes qui se in fidem meam contulerunt, nusquam desiderant in administrandis rebus suis libertatem. Itaque licet vobis quoque vel Patarenſium judicium vel fortunam legere Xanthiorum. Velleius Paterculus tells us, that Cassius behaved with greater moderation than Brutus: Dum ea in Italia geruntur, acri ac prosperrimo bello Cassius Rhodum, rem immanis operis, ceperat; Brutus Lycios devicerat. . . . cum per omnia repugnans naturæ suæ Cassius, etiam Brutî clementiam vinceret. Vell. Pat. ii. 69.

² Here it was that Brutus is reported to have seen a ghost in his tent. He ever employed, says Plutarch, the greatest part of the night in dispatching of affairs and reading; and one night, being thus employed, when there was a general silence in the camp, and especially about his tent, of a sudden he heard an unusual noise at the door, which opened at the same time. Brutus, casting his eye towards the place, perceived the frightful picture of a hideous spectre, of a proportion much more than natural, which presented itself before him: He had, notwithstanding, the courage to speak to it, demanding, Art thou a god, or art thou a man, and for what reason comest thou hither? I am, replied the spirit, thy evil genius, and thou shalt see me again near Philippi. Brutus answered, Well, I will see thee: And immediately it disappeared. He presently called up his slaves, who all told him, that they had neither seen nor heard any thing. He continued walking all the rest of the night, and, early in the morning, went to give an account of what had happened to Cassius, who, being an Epicurean, told him, that all this proceeded from the weakness of his senses, and the strength of his imagination at that time. However, continued he, let us not believe that there are any such spirits, that have either voice, human shape, or power over us; though I could wish there were, that we might not only rely upon the greatness of our forces, but likewise upon the assistance of those immortal beings, who could not but be favourable to a cause so just and sacred as ours is. Plutarch tells us, that the same spirit appeared again before the battle of Philippi.

Y. R. 711. Decidius and Norbanus marched their troops through Epirus and Ma- Bel. Chr. cedonia beyond Philippi, and encamped at the entry of a narrow pass 411 Conf. formed by two mountains, being the only commodious way from the ————— Chersonesus of Thrace into Macedonia: They had then behind them Phi- lippi, and upon the right, towards the sea, Neapolis, a sea-port town situated over-against the island of Thasos: And here they intended to wait the arrival of their Generals. Brutus and Cassius would have found it difficult to force the passage, if Rhescupolis, a Thracian Chieftain in their camp, had not led them over the mountains by a particular way, which had been judged impracticable by the enemy. Bibulus, son-in-law to Brutus, commanded the detachment, and took with him provisions and water for three days; and, after incredible fatigues, when the soldiers began to murmur, and to suspect Rhescupolis of treachery, at last, on the fourth day, they had a view of the plain and the river, and, upon this sight, they raised a shout of joy, which gave notice of their approach to the two Lieutenants, who otherwise would have been surrounded unawares. Saxa and Norbanus immediately retired to Am- phipolis, which they fortified with great dispatch. Brutus and Cassius marched on beyond Philippi, and encamped upon a rising ground not far from the town: Behind them was the sea, which furnished them with all kinds of provisions: The island of Thasos which was at twelve miles distance served them for a general magazine; and, at the distance of nine miles, was the town of Neapolis, which afforded them a secure port for their fleet. Antony soon came up with them: For, upon the first news of the retreat of his Lieutenants, fearing lest he should lose Amphipolis, he had made forced marches and arrived sooner than he was expected. He had the satisfaction to find not only his Lieutenants masters of Amphi- polis, but the town well-fortified. He there deposited all his baggage, leaving a legion to defend it: While, with the rest of his troops, he advanced, and, following the example, which Cæsar had shewn him in all his wars, of approaching as near as possible to an enemy, he encamped at only a mile's distance. Here he was joined a few days after by Octavius. Their combined armies consisted of nineteen legions, composed chiefly of Cæsar's old soldiers, and not only complete as to their number, but augmented by a great many supernumeraries. Thus their infantry amounted to one hundred thousand men, but their cavalry, consisting only of thirteen thousand, was less numerous than that of the enemy. They were much streightened for provisions, having only Ma- cedonia and Thessaly open to them; Sextus Pompey cutting off from them all communication with Africa, and Murcus and Domitius with Italy.
 This made Antony extremely desirous of coming to a battle; but Cassius, being sensible of his motive, refused to engage him, and restrained the impatience of his sanguine colleague. At last Antony, with great labour and industry, made a way through a large fen, and raised some forts opposite to the enemy's camp. Cassius, on his side, formed lines and threw

threw up works against him: And in this situation, says Appian, the forwardness of the two armies, who were near to each other, drew on a general action, though much against Cassius's will, who declared, that he was forced, in the same manner that Pompey had been, to expose the liberty of the Roman people to the hazard of a battle. A different story is related by Plutarch. He tells us, that Cassius, overcome by the importunity of his colleague and the rest of his officers, unwillingly consented to give battle. According to the same historian, Cassius, before the general engagement, asked Brutus's opinion concerning what they ought to do, if they should happen to be unsuccessful, and Brutus answered: That he had formerly, in his writings, condemned the death of Cato, and maintained that such a manner of avoiding disgrace was an insult upon the gods, and unworthy of a man of courage; but that he had now changed his opinion, and was resolved to lay down that life, which he had already sacrificed to his country on the ides of March, and to change it for a happier one, if fortune proved his enemy. We may then venture to engage the enemy, replied Cassius, embracing him; for either we will be Conquerors ourselves, or have no cause to fear those who are so.

The forces of the Triumvirs were commanded by Antony alone; Octavius not being recovered of the illness with which he had been seized before he left Italy: And, both armies being drawn up, Brutus's men attacked those of Octavius with little order, but with so much fury, that, at the first onset, they overthrew all that opposed them, and, pressing forward with great slaughter, they entered the very camp of Octavius, who had just before retired to that of his colleague. Antony was, on his side, very hotly engaged with Cassius, but, in a short time, found means to open a passage through the lines, and, charging Cassius's troops upon the flank, totally routed them; then, pursuing the victory, he soon became master of his camp. Cassius, having laboured in vain to rally his soldiers, retired to a hill not far off, expecting the event of the battle on his partner's side. Whence, descrying a body of cavalry making towards him, he sent Titinius to discover whether they were friends or enemies. Titinius was received with great joy into the ranks, and, instead of riding back directly, marched on with the body of horse towards his General, who, not doubting but that Brutus had been routed, and that his friend Titinius was taken prisoner, cried out, Alas! to preserve the remainder of a miserable life, I have ruined my best friend! And instantly, retiring into his tent, killed himself. Titinius arrived soon after with the cavalry, all rejoicing: But their joy was suddenly dashed; and Titinius, accusing himself of being the cause of so terrible a misfortune by his imprudence, in great despair, slew himself upon the body of his friend.

Brutus was very sensible of his loss by the death of his companion, whom he called the last of the Romans, and caused his body to be privately removed to the island of Thasos, lest the sight of it should make

N. P. 711
E. f. Ch.
21.
415 Conf.
Plut. in
Brut.

a bad impression on the minds of the soldiers; and though, according to the report of Messala, his party had lost but 8000 men, while the enemy had lost 16,000, yet he kept for twenty days within his intrenchments, refusing to accept the battle which Antony offered him. We are told he hoped to starve his enemies, who were now in extreme want of provisions, and whose fleet had been lately totally defeated; a circumstance Brutus was ignorant of several days after it was known in Antony's camp; which intimates that few or none deserted from the Triumvirs to him. And Plutarch, who is so lavish in his praises, relates, that he was obliged to put to death all the slaves he had made prisoners in the late battle, and dismiss the rest, lest they should debauch his army: And that he found it necessary also to promise his soldiers a donative of 2000 drachma's a man, together with the plunder of Thessalonica and Lacedæmon, two of the wealthiest cities in those parts, in order to raise their courage. At last, several of his officers having left his camp to join his enemies, the fear of a general desertion determined him to put all to the decision of a second battle. We are told, that the eagerness of the soldiers was such on both sides, that they betook themselves immediately to their swords, fighting with great fury, till, after much bloodshed, Brutus's party was borne down by main force, and intirely defeated. Brutus himself fled to a neighbouring hill¹, and there remained all night. When, in the morning, he saw all was lost, he cried out in the words of an ancient poet, O unhappy Virtue, I follow thee as a solid good, but thou art only a mere notion, a vain empty name, or, at best, a slave of fortune. Yet shortly after he told some of his friends, that he looked upon himself as much happier than any of his Conquerors, since he should enjoy that reputation which always follows virtue, and which tyranny and injustice could never deserve. Then, going aside with a particular friend, called Strato, he with great earnestness begged of him to do him the last office of a friend; and, seeing him very unwilling to perform so hard a duty, he called for a slave: Ab then, cried Strato, it shall never be said, that the great Brutus stood in need of a slave for want of a friend: So, turning away his head, he presented the point of his sword to Brutus, who threw himself upon it and immediately expired.

¹ Plutarch tells us, that he ran a great risk of being taken; that, being pursued closely by a troop of Tbracians, Lucilius, a friend of his, delivered himself up to them, telling them, that he was Brutus: Upon which he was immediately conducted to Antony. When, in his presence, he owned, that, to save his General, he had deceived the soldiers; and was ready to atone, by his sufferings, for the offence. The Tbracians were filled with indignation. Be not troubled, said Antony, at the mistake; you have taken a much better prize. You wanted to take an enemy, and you have brought me a friend. I take all the gods to witness, that I should have been very much perplexed how to behave to Brutus. But men, such as Lucilius, I love much better to have for my friends than my enemies. Plutarch, according to his custom, in order to lengthen out this last scene of Brutus's life, and make it more interesting, has collected a great many particularities too minute to find a place in this general history.

Thus

Thus fell these two famous champions for liberty, called the last of the Romans: Deserted at once by fortune with the same precipitation, with which she had given them the command of half the Empire. Cassius, who professed the Epicurean philosophy, left behind him no reputation for virtue; and it was every one's opinion that he hated the tyrant more than tyranny, and had interested and private views in the assassination of Cæsar. Brutus was, by his birth, his alliances, his connections, his riches, the head of the young nobility: And he was revered in his life and after his death, for the gravity of his manners, his extensive learning, his eloquence, his capacity; but, if we attend to facts, we shall find his glory greatly sullied by many instances of avarice, of pride, and of cruelty, which are even reported by his panegyrists, Cicero and Plutarch. A very ingenious and celebrated writer thinks that these two Generals killed themselves with a haste not to be vindicated; and that it is impossible to read this period of their lives without pitying the Republic which was so abandoned. When one considers, however, how very indifferent the provinces were in all these quarrels; how heartily they detested the Generals whom they had been forced to supply with money; and that the soldiers were all engaged to them against their will, or allured by immense liberalities, and greater promises; it is plain that their defeat was irreparable, and that they had no other place to fly to but Sicily, which was still held by young Pompey, whither the Triumvirs would have followed them with all their forces.

All such as had any share in Cæsar's death slew themselves with their own hands, but the rest rallying, to the number of 14,000, under the conduct of Messala and Bibulus, sent deputies to the Triumvirs for an honourable composition, which the two Generals readily granted. M. Cicero, with some other persons of distinction, escaped to the island of Thasos, where they went on board a squadron commanded by Cassius of Parma, which sailed to the Ionian sea, and joined the fleets of Statius Murcus and Domitius Ahenobarbus. The first of these Commanders declared his resolution to conduct his fleet to Sextus Pompey, which he soon executed: But Domitius chose to act an independent part.

The Triumvirs employed themselves for some days after their victory in punishing their enemies. Antony sacrificed Hortensius to the manes of his brother Caius, and put to death also some others: Cato's son, Varro, and Lucullus are mentioned by Paterculus. Livius Drusus, the father of that Livia, who was afterwards married to Octavius, killed himself in his tent; and Quintilius Varus, adorned with all the marks of those honours he had borne, caused himself to be slain by one of his freedmen. Suetonius tells us that Octavius, who had but a small share in the victory, behaved with great cruelty and insolence to the vanquished, that he sent the head of Brutus to be thrown at the pedestal of Cæsar's statue in Rome, and treated the most illustrious Romans with barbarity and abusive language. To one, who humbly begged the favour

Y. R. 711.
Esf. Chr.
41.
410 Conf.

Montesquieu, Grandeur
des Romains.

Vell. Pat.

killed 71.

Suet. in
Aug. 13.

of

Y. R. 711. of a burial, he answered, that what he requested would soon be at the disposal of the birds of prey. A father and a son, who sued for their lives, ^{Bef. Chr. 41.} were ordered by him to cast lots which of them should live, or to determine it betwixt them by the sword; but the father, refusing to accept of such a favour, delivered himself up to the executioner, and the son stabbed himself. His cruelty, it is said, was so excessive, that, when the prisoners were produced before him, loaded with chains, all of them, and particularly M. Favonius, reproached him with it, while they saluted Antony with respect by the title of Imperator ^a.

The two Generals, having satiated their revenge, made a new division of the provinces of the Empire, by which the feeble Lepidus was spoiled of all, excepting the province of Africa, properly so called. Octavius got Spain and Numidia: Antony all Transalpine Gaul, with that part of Africa which Cornificius possessed. Cisalpine Gaul was incorporated into Italy, which they all pretended to defend by their arms, and to which, as their common country, they had a right to return with their legions. At the same time Antony undertook to go into the Eastern provinces to raise money for the soldiers rewards: And Octavius took upon him to lead the old troops into Italy, and put them in possession of the lands that were promised them. Antony's commission assured him immense wealth, and was the more brilliant of the two; but that of Octavius gave him all power in Italy, and secured to him the affection of the veterans, who were to receive from him the long-wished for recompence of their services.

^a Nothing shews more plainly how little we can depend upon the truth of these particularities related by the old historians, than the account they have given us of the death of Portia. They say that this Lady, upon the news of her husband's unhappy fate, resolved not to survive him; and that, by the care of her relations and friends, all instruments of death being removed out of her way, she destroyed herself by swallowing burning coals. Now it is almost certain she died of a lingering disease before the battle of Philippi. For Plutarch himself mentions a letter of Brutus extant in his days, of the authenticity of which, indeed, he entertained some doubt, in which he lamented her death, and complained of his friends for neglecting her in her last sickness. Certain, however, it is, as Dr. Middleton observes, that, in a letter to Atticus, he speaks of Portia's indisposition, and that there is a letter of condolence to him from Cicero, which can hardly be applied to any other occasion but that of her death. See Ep. ix. ad Brut.

CH A P. II.

ANTONY's progress through Greece and Asia. CLEOPATRA's magnificence. She obtains of ANTONY all her requests, and is followed by him into Egypt. OCTAVIUS's behaviour in Italy: He is crossed in his operations by Fulvia and L. Antonius, who raise a civil commotion: He forces L. Antonius to surrender himself at discretion in Perusium, and his enemies to leave Italy.

ANTONY

ANTONY first visited Greece, where he frequented the conferences of the philosophers; was initiated into the mysteries at Athens; made great presents to that and other cities; courted the Græcians in every manner, and was repaid with the most refined flattery. Then, leaving Censorinus to command in that country, he passed over into Asia, with all his troops, consisting of eight legions. There all the Princes of the East, who acknowledged the Roman power, came to make their court to him, and the fairest Princesses strove to gain his favour, either by the charms of their beauty, or the magnificence of their presents. This croud of Sovereigns, which daily waited in his antichamber with their praises and submissions, did most agreeably soothe his voluptuous and ambitious temper. He pardoned all those of Brutus's party, who here surrendered to him, except Petronius, who was one of the Conspirators; and Quintus, who was charged with having betrayed Dolabella to Cassius in Laodicea. But then he took away the estates of several wealthy citizens to enrich his flatterers and buffoons; and, assembling the deputies of all the subjects and allies of the Romans in those parts, in a formal speech he insisted upon his necessities and their duties, and squeezed out of the inhabitants almost all the money that had been left them by Brutus and Cassius. After having raised two hundred thousand talents, an immense sum, he demanded still new contributions; and all this money was presently spent in the most extravagant luxury, and vainest prodigalities, so that the country was, at the same time, a theatre of mirth and misery. Strabo attests, that a player was charged with gathering the tribute of four cities; and Plutarch relates, that a cook, who pleased his taste, was recompensed with the house and goods of a rich citizen of Magnesia. In his progress through the country, he frequently gave extraordinary demonstrations of generosity; particularly to the towns which had suffered for their attachment to Dolabella, and the Cæsarean cause. He made himself sovereign Judge of the differences between the Kings of those countries, as in Cappadocia between Ariarathes and Syſenes, for whom the beauty of his mother, Glaphyra, was so powerful an advocate, as to carry the crown from his competitor.

But, among all those Sovereigns of the East, who depended upon Antony, Cleopatra was the most distinguished. She had sent troops to the assistance of Dolabella, as has been related above, under the conduct of Allienus, who had been obliged to give them up to Cassius: And she had also sent a fleet to the assistance of the Triumvirs which a storm disabled, but she might have done more for the cause; and Serapion, her Lieutenant in Cyprus, had fought for Cassius: Antony, therefore, when he was at Tarsus, cited her to his tribunal. She made no difficulty to obey his summons; and, conscious of her power over men of Antony's character, she set out with an assurance of making a conquest of him. Never did any Princess appear in a manner so singular and magnificent. Arrived at the mouth of the river Cydus, she embarked in a vessel,

Y. R. 711.
Bef. Ch.,

41.

410 Conf.

Plut. in

Anton.

Appian, p.
673.

37598400 L.

Y. R. 711. vessel, whose stern was of gold, the sails of purple silk, and whose oars, Euf. Car. covered with plates of silver, gently kept time to a concert of music.
 412 Cor. The Queen was laid under a canopy of rich cloth of gold, adorned like ——— Venus rising out of the sea, with lovely children about her, like Cupids, fanning her; and her women were dressed like Nereids, leaning negligently on the sides and shrouds of the vessel. The sweets of the perfumes that were burning reached the banks of the river, which were covered with an infinite number of people. Antony, who was mounted on a throne, to make a shew of majesty, found himself deserted by all his attendants: All ran to see such an extraordinary sight. He sent to desire her to land and sup with him: but she desired his company first; a request which he thought himself bound in civility to comply with. He was extremely surprised at the neatness and magnificence of the entertainment, with the ingenious disposition of the lights and many other peculiar contrivances*. The next day, he, in his turn, would treat her, and endeavoured to surpass her in sumptuousness, but he soon perceived he was far short of it; whereupon he turned all into mirth and raillery, which she joined with, and carried on with all the delicacy and dexterity imaginable; till, at last, taking a more serious turn in her discourses, she told him, that she came not thither to clear herself, but to be recompensed for the great services she had done to him and Octavius, in assisting Delabella; in commanding a fleet in person against Cassius and his Commanders, with many other things, which she related with that artifice, that wit and inimitable grace, that Antony could no longer defend his heart; but, from that moment, entertained a passion for her which was the cause of all the future misfortunes of his life. The first use she made of her power was to obtain an order for taking her sister Arfinoë out of the temple of Diana at Epbefus, and putting her to death: Another for seizing Scrapion in the temple of Hercules at Tyre, by whose execution she satisfied her vengeance, and justified herself towards Antony for the succours sent to Cassius: A third to seize, in the island of Aradus, an impostor, who pretended to be that Ptolemy, Cleopatra's brother, who had been vanquished by Cæsar, and, according to the common report, had been drowned in the Nile. After having, in this manner, secured her power, she set out for Egypt.

* An ancient writer, quoted by Athenæus, iv. 11, has informed us, that she repeated several times these entertainments, and always in a new taste and with new ornaments; giving to Antony each time all the equipage and furniture of the feast, the vessels of gold adorned with precious stones, and the tapestry and cloths of gold with which the walls and floor were covered. His friends also, it is said, who were entertained at twelve different tables, divided the couches on which they had supped, and the vessels of gold in which they had been served: And, when they retired, she made presents, to the most distinguished, of litters with men to carry them; or of horses richly harnessed; and to all, young Ethiopian slaves to carry torches before them. The same author relates, that, at the third entertainment, the floor of the hall was strewed with roses a cubit deep.

Antony entertained no longer any thoughts of marching against the Parthians. After a rapid progress through Syria, in which he hastily decided the affairs referred to him; and a fruitless attempt to surprise and plunder the town of Palmyra; he sent his forces into winter-quarters under the command of Decidius Saxa, and flew after Cleopatra into Egypt: Where he spent the whole following year in all the ease and softness to which his vicious temper prompted him, and in all the delights and pleasures which that luxurious nation could furnish.

While Antony remained thus idle in Egypt, Octavius was busy about settling the affairs of Italy, and dividing the lands for satisfying the veterans. This he found very difficult, and not a little dangerous, on account of the general odium it brought upon him; for it was absolutely necessary either to give up the several towns allotted for their recompence, or to satisfy his soldiers with a proportionable quantity of money, which the exhausted treasury could not furnish. Almost all the inhabitants of these towns came in great multitudes to Rome; vast numbers of women with children in their arms, whose tender years and innocence drew every one's compassion, daily filled the temples and public places with their lamentations: And the people of Rome talked very freely and boldly upon this account. These complaints and murmurings Octavius bore with all the discretion imaginable; he first borrowed what money he could; but, finding that not sufficient, he at last broke through all difficulties, and began to give his soldiers places and lands for their inheritance, as he first designed. This he was forced to by the insolence of the soldiery, who were very sensible of the obligations and regard due to them from the Triumvirs. Appian has recorded two instances of their haughty behaviour, which shew how little authority Octavius possessed over them. One of the common soldiers, having had the assurance to seat himself, in the theatre, with the Knights, Octavius ordered him to be taken away, because he perceived that the people were offended at it: This the soldiers resented, and, after the play, gathered about their General, and loudly called for their comrade, suspecting that he had been punished with death or imprisonment. The soldier soon appeared, and then they would have it that he had been just released from prison; which he denying, he was treated by them with contempt and indignation as a liar and a traitor to his companions. At another time, when Octavius had appointed them a meeting in the field of Mars, for a division of lands, they all assembled before it was light, and began to murmur at their General's tardiness in making his appearance: And a Centurion, who reprov'd them for it, was affronted, pursued, and killed by them, and his body placed in Octavius's way. Octavius, informed of their behaviour, went nevertheless to the field, and, seeing the body of the Centurion, turned unconcernedly from it: And, as if it had been the crime of some particular man, and an offence against themselves, he exhorted them, for the future, to spare one another, and

Y. R. 711. made his intended division. These two examples, says Appian, among Ref. Chr. many others, shew how difficult it is to govern the spirit of the soldiers,
 41. when the Generals are not commissioned to the command of their armies 410 Conf. by lawful authority, and troops are levied, not for the service of their country, but for the interest of private men, who are obliged to soothe them and depend more on the power of their largesses than on the fidelity of their adherents or the authority of the laws.

L. ANTONIUS
 P. SERVILIUS VATIA ISauricus II. } Consuls.

Y. R. 712. L. *Antonius, brother to the Triumvir, was now Consul with P. Ser-
 Ref. Chr. vilus Isauricus II. Cicero every-where represents Lucius as a vain, weak 420 man; and Dio tells us, that he was entirely governed by Fulvia, Antony's 411 Conf. wife, who possessed all authority in Rome. This imperious Lady was greatly grieved to see her husband deliver himself up first to Glaphyra, wife to Archelaus, Grand Pontiff of Comana; and afterwards to Cleopatra; and resolved, by any means, to bring him home, which she believed nothing but a war could effect*. Many plausible pretexts were made use of by her to produce a breach between Antony and Octavius, and these she easily found in the present unsettled and troublesome times.
Octavius, upon the first marks of her ill-will, sent her daughter back to her, assuring her, at the same time, that she was a virgin. In concert with L. Antonius, she laboured to unite the citizens, who had been turned out of their possessions, and the soldiers, against Octavius: They received, therefore, on one hand, the complaints of the oppressed and promised them Antony's protection: And, on the other, they publicly declared, that the confiscated goods of the proscribed, and the money raised by Antony in the Eastern provinces, were sufficient to pay off the rewards due to the soldiers. They inveighed also against the triumviral power, and gave it out that Antony was ready to restore the ancient government; and their conduct seems to have been extremely well calculated to gain the affections of the people. They began by demanding of Octavius to divide the charge of establishing the veterans in the colo-

Vel. Pat.
 74

* He triumphed the first of January for some trifling exploits in the Alps. Velleius Paterculus says of him: Vitium fratris sui conferri, sed virtutum, quae interdum in illis erant, expers. L. ii. c. 74.

E. xi 22.

† In an epigram of Octavius against Ful- via, preserved by Martial, she is accused of having solicited the young Triumvir, in order to avenge herself of the infidelity of Antony; a very improbable charge which the Abbé de St. Real insists much upon, as well as several other authors. “Octave, says this writer, “qui n’aimoit que par politique, & dont on a dit qu’il n’eut ja-

“mais d’autres amours, que celles que son “intérêt ou son ambition lui inspirerent,” [Certainly neither his interest nor ambition were concerned in his strong and lasting attachment for Livia]. “ne voulut point e“couffer dans sa naissance une guerre formi“dable, qu’il auroit pu terminer en paroif-“sant moins cruel a une jeune & belle per“sonne. Confid. sur Antoine.” I don’t know whether Fulvia was a belle personne, but certainly the widow of Clodius, who died above twelve years before, and whose daughter was actually married to Octavius, could not be a very jeune personne.

nies,

nies, so that he might regulate whatever concerned his own soldiers, and they what concerned those of Antony. Octavius alledged, in opposition to this, the authority of the convention made with his colleague; whereby it was stipulated that the direction of this whole affair should be left entirely to him. The young Triumvir found himself in very difficult circumstances. He had incurred the odium of all Italy; he had the coasts to defend against the fleets of Pompey and Domitius; and it was incumbent on him to procure corn for the people and soldiers, which was now very scarce, as almost all the passages by sea were stopped up by his enemies, and the produce of the land was consumed by the return of so many legions into Italy. Disorders were committed every day in the city, so that all trading was ruined and most of the shops shut up: Ventidius, Pollio, Calenus, Plancus, and others, commanded several small armies in different parts of the country; Lucius Antony himself had raised a considerable force: And M. Antony was in great favour with the soldiers, who much esteemed him for his bravery, and loved him for his generosity. Octavius resolved, therefore, if possible, to avoid a rupture, and seems to have consented to the demands of Fulvia and L. Antonius. The latter, taking Antony's children with him, went a progress through the southern part of Italy: But, upon a quick motion of Octavius's cavalry to the coast of the Bruttii, in order to hinder Pompey from landing there, he fled precipitately to Antony's colonies, and put himself and his nephews under their protection; accusing Octavius of infidelity towards his colleague. Octavius, on the contrary, sent to acquaint them, that there was no shadow of change in the friendship betwixt him and Antony, but that Lucius sought a pretence to make them arm against each other, because he was an enemy to the triumvirate, in the maintenance of whose power the soldiery were concerned, if they would not be driven from their colonies; and that, as for his horse, they were still in the country of the Bruttii, executing his orders. In consequence of this misunderstanding, the Antonian officers held a congress at Tbeanum; where they prescribed the following terms of peace to Octavius and to L. Antony: “That the Triumvirs should not disturb the Consuls in the government of the Commonwealth; that they should give lands only to those who had served at Philippi; that the money arising from the estates already forfeited, and the prices of those yet to be exposed to sale, should be equally divided between the veterans in Antony's colonies, and the other triumviral troops in Italy; that neither party should make any new levies of men; but that two of the Antonian legions should be employed by Octavius, in the expedition against Pompey; that Salvidienus might pass the Alps and go into Spain, to take the command of the legions in that province, without being impeded by Asinius Pollio; and that Lucius, satisfied with these conditions, should dismiss his guards, and follow the functions of his office in a peaceful manner.” These articles were agreed upon; but none of them were

Y. R. 712. carried into execution, except that Salvidienus cleared the passage of the Bef. Chr. Alps, and joined the army in Spain. Lucius, pretending that his life
 42. was in danger, retired to the fortress of Præneste; Fulvia fled to Lepi- 411 Conf. dus, putting herself and her children under his protection; and both sent messengers to Antony with letters to give him the alarm, and bring him into Italy.

In this extremity of affairs, Octavius, dreading that Pompey might take advantage of the dispute between him and Fulvia, sent a deputation of his officers to Præneste, to endeavour, if possible, to bring about a reconciliation. These invited Lucius to their meeting: But he was hindered from complying with their request by Manius Rufus, Antony's agent, who was influenced by Fulvia. After a short consultation, Manius answered them in the following terms: "That, while Antony was busy in raising money among strangers, Octavius by his cringing and flexibility secured to himself all the militia, and all the strong places in Italy: That he had taken away from Antony Netter Gaul, by enfranchising it and incorporating it into Italy: That, instead of eighteen towns designed for the reward of the veterans, he had granted them almost the whole country: That, instead of twenty-eight legions that were to be provided for, he was planting four-and-thirty legions in Italy: that he had taken money out of the temples, which had never been done before, whatever famine had been in the city; and that, on pretence of a war with Pompey, but indeed to gain over to himself the soldiery, and to employ them against Antony: that he had sold the goods of the proscribed at such low rates, that it was rather giving than selling them: And that, if he really desired peace, he ought first to give an account of what he had done, and should do nothing, for the future, but what should be resolved upon by common deliberation." This was proposing to take every thing out of the hands of Octavius; who, seeing Antony's party bent upon war, made his preparations with the greatest diligence. Two legions that were quartered in the city of Antona, informed of this beginning of a civil commotion, sent deputies to Rome, to entreat Octavius to consent to an accommodation. Octavius answered, that he had no design against Antony, but that Lucius would make war upon him. This gave occasion to another negotiation with Lucius, who was engaged by these deputies, in conjunction with several of Antony's officers, to consent to meet Octavius at Gabii, a town which lay at an equal distance from Rome and Præneste: But, a party of Octavius's cavalry having insulted a detachment which L. Antonius had sent to reconnoitre the road, Lucius retreated to his fortress, and neither entreaties nor menaces could prevail upon him to come to the place of meeting. Manifestoes were published on both sides, and an open war declared. Manius published letters from Antony, by which he approved of his brother's proceedings, and required of his officers and soldiers to support him.

Octavius,

Octavius, who, besides his own proper army, had most of the dismissed veterans on his side, and whose troops acted with the greatest celerity and concert, was an over-match for Lucius. The Consul had for him the good wishes of the city and country, because he had shewed a regard for the complaints of those who had been turned out of their estates, and had declared against the continuation of the triumviral authority, and many towns throughout Italy declared for him. Rome itself, though guarded by two legions under the command of Lepidus, joyfully received him, as soon as Octavius left it to go into Umbria: But he had but six legions of new-raised troops under his own command, and a precarious authority over the Lieutenants, who commanded Antony's legions, quartered in the distant parts of Italy. Hearing that Salvidienus was upon his march with a numerous army from Gaul, in order to join Octavius, and was followed in the rear by Asinius Pollio and Ventidius, two of his brother's Lieutenants, he marched to meet him, with a view of hemming him in between his army and those of his friends: But he soon found himself surrounded on all sides: For Agrippa marched after him into Insubria, and hindered his retreat: And Salvidienus guarded the passages with such care, that he prevented his joining Pollio and Ventidius. Not daring, in these circumstances, to venture a battle, he retired to Perusia; a strong town in Umbria, hoping that the Commanders in his interest would find means to come up with him. But Ventidius and Pollio did not exert themselves, and Octavius, bringing up all the remainder of his troops, effectually blockaded him. Fulvia was at Præneste with a number of Senators and Knights; where, according to Dio, she governed with an absolute authority, presiding in council and haranguing the soldiers with a sword by her side: She there raised a new army, which she put under the command of Plancus, and was very pressing in her solicitations to procure the junction of the several Commanders: But, whether they disapproved of this unseasonable war, or saw it was impossible to disengage Lucius Antonius, Ventidius retired to Ravenna, Pollio to Ariminum, Plancus to Spoletum, and the other Commanders, after some motions, remained quiet, and waited the event. Lucius defended the town with great bravery, and made several bold and desperate sallies, but with no proportionable success; till, finding his soldiers reduced to the utmost miseries of famine, he at last came out in person, and, giving himself up into Octavius's hands, with great earnestness interceded for his poor soldiers, and begged that his punishment might atone for their crimes. Appian who gives him a fair character, as a lover of the public welfare and an enemy to the power of the triumvirate, makes him speak to his army and to Octavius in a very spirited strain. The young Triumvir received him very honourably and with much generosity; and all Lucius's soldiers were pardoned, at the desire of Octavius's own men: The town was destined to be plundered, but one of the inhabitants set fire to his house before he stabbed himself, and the flames, being

Y. R. 712.
Bef. Chr.
40.
411 Conf.

Perugia.

Y. R. 713
Bef. Chr.
411 Conf. ing spread by the wind, consumed the whole city. Ventidius, and the other Lieutenants of Antony, made towards the sea-coast. Calenus, who commanded several legions in the Alps, dying at this time, his son surrendered them to Octavius: Fulvia fled to Greece with Plancus: Julia, Antony's mother, with several of her son's principal friends, and, among the rest, with Tiberius Nero, husband to Livia, and father of the Emperor Tiberius, sailed for Sicily, and received from Pompey ships to conduct them where they thought proper. Thus ended this dangerous war; and Octavius returned to Rome, where he entered in his triumphal robes, and crowned with laurel¹. L. Antonius was sent by Octavius into Spain with the honourable title of Proconsul, but without any real power; and he probably died there soon after, for there is no more mention of him in history.

C H A P. III.

ANTONY carries over his troops into Italy, and is joined in his passage by Domitius, with his fleet. Sextus Pompey, courted by Octavius, offers his assistance to Antony. The differences of the two Triumvirs are composed by their common friends, and Antony marries Octavia. An agreement is made with Pompey. A new division is made of the Empire. Ventidius's exploits against the Parthians.

CN. DOMITIUS CALVINUS II. } Consuls.
C. ASINIUS POLLIO. }

Y. R. 713.
Bef. Chr.
412 Conf. ANTONY was still immersed in pleasure at Alexandria, when he received the account of his brother's defeat, and the ruin of his party in Italy; and that Octavius had made himself master of both Gauls, and had got all the legions into his hands that were quartered in those parts. About the same time he received advice that the Par-

¹ Suetonius, in Aug. 15, writes that, "after the taking of Perusia, Octavius put many of the prisoners to death, answering all that offered to beg pardon, or excuse themselves, briefly—death was the word." Some authors add, says the same historian, "that three hundred of the equestrian and senatorian order, culled out of the rest, were slaughtered like victims, at an altar raised to Julius Caesar on the ides of March: And others have affirmed, that he entered upon this war, on purpose to engage his secret enemies, and such whose fear more than affection for him kept them quiet, to declare themselves now that they had an opportunity of doing it with Lucius Antony at their head; and that, by the defeat of them, and the confiscation of their estates, he might be enabled to make good his promises to the veteran soldiers."

Appian writes, that he only put to death the Senators of Perusia, with a few of his most inveterate enemies; and that he was constrained to this step by his soldiers. Paterculus also has said the same thing: In Perusinos magis ira militum, quam voluntate servitum ducis. Lib. ii. p. 74.

thians,

tbians, commanded by Pacorus, their King's son, and Labiennus^{*}, had made themselves masters of Syria and Judea, had sacked Jerusalem, and carried away Hircanus, the High-priest, and Herod's brother, prisoners. These disagreeable and disgraceful tidings roused him from his lethargy : He immediately gathered together two hundred ships, and a considerable army which he had ready in those parts. His design was to march immediately against the Parthians; but the pressing letters he received from his wife Fulvia, and his friends, obliged him to turn towards Italy. He went from Alexandria to Tyre, from whence passing by the isles of Cyprus and Rhodes, he arrived at Athens, where he met Fulvia. He much blamed her and his brother Lucius for occasioning the late disorders, and here he understood that Octavius had lately married Scribonia, the sister of Libo, Pompey's father-in-law, a Lady much more advanced in years than himself; and in which alliance he could have no other view than to gain over Pompey to his party for the sake of his shipping, of which he was almost destitute. Antony advanced therefore towards Italy, leaving Fulvia sick at Sicyon; which neglect and scorn finished what his infidelity had begun, and she died there soon after of grief. In these circumstances, it was a satisfaction to Antony to see himself courted by Pompey: This Commander, instead of closing with Octavius, chose to treat with Antony, and sent Libo to him under the pretence of conducting to him Julia, his mother. Antony acted with great discretion, and answered, that, if he was obliged to make war against Octavius, he would willingly accept of Pompey's proposal; and, if, on the contrary, their differences should be amicably determined, he would take care to reconcile him with his colleague. Domitius Aben- barbus joined him in his passage over the Ionian sea; and, after having kept an independent fleet since the battle of Philippi, surrendered to him with all his ships and forces. With this reinforcement he appeared before Brundisium, where he was refused admittance, under the pretence that he brought with him Domitius, who was an enemy to Cæsar. Antony, upon this, blocked up the place, and sent to Pompey in Sicily to engage him to invade Sardinia and Italy. Octavius marched directly to Brundisium, where the old soldiers being unwilling to fight against Antony, the army endeavoured by all methods to reconcile the two competitors; and this was at length brought about by the management and interposition of Cocceius Nerva, Pollio, and Mæcenæ. In consequence of this agreement all offences and affronts were to be mutually forgiven, and a marriage was proposed between Antony and Octavius's half-sister Octavia, the widow of Marcellus, a Lady of great beauty and of extraordinary virtues and accomplishments. Though Cleopatra had so large a share in Antony's heart, yet he could not without baseness refuse a Lady of Octavia's rank and admirable qualities; and, to avoid all present incon-

Y.R. 713.
Bef. Chr.
39.
412 Conf.

Flor. lib.
iv. c. 9.
Plut. in Anton.

^{*} This Labiennus was the son of Titus Labienus, who had been Cæsar's Lieutenant in Gaul.

Y. R. 713. veniencies, he married her. Manius, Antony's agent in Italy, and Salvi-
 Ref. Chr. dienus, Octavius's chief Lieutenant, were the victims of this reconcilia-
 39. tion. The first was put to death by Antony's order, as the chief author 412 Conf. of the Perusian war. The second was accused before the Senate by Oct- ——— avius of treasonable practices, and sentenced to die; which sentence he executed upon himself. The historians tell us, that Salvidienus offered his services to Antony, during the siege of Brundisium; and that Antony, upon his reconciliation, informed Octavius of the treachery of his Lieutenant. A new division of the Roman Empire was made upon this renewal of peace and amity, by which Cedropolis, a town of Illyricum, was made the boundary of their dominions: All from that place westward being to obey Octavius, and all eastward Antony; Africa was left to Lepidus.

After this division, Antony immediately dispatched Ventidius into Asia against the Parthians. But the troubles at home seemed much greater to both Antony and Octavius, who were now entertained with the sad and lamentable complaints of poor people, ready to starve for want of provisions; which Pompey hindered from coming either from the east or west by means of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corfica, which he had in his power; and from Africa by his navy, which was then very powerful.
Octavius, on account of some former affronts, would not be brought to any accommodation with Pompey, notwithstanding the continual cries and prayers of the multitude, whose rage and fury came at last to that height, that he was nigh being stoned by them, and Antony too by coming to his assistance. At last, both Triumvirs and Pompey were so far persuaded as to come to an interview upon two bridges built upon stakes driven into the sea, a little off the promontory of Misenum; the two Triumvirs accompanied by their troops drawn up upon the shore, and Pompey by a numerous fleet; but, the latter demanding large privileges for the proscribed persons, and to be admitted into the power and place of Lepidus, the treaty was ineffectual. Yet the pressing necessities and frequent mutinies of the people brought them together a second time, where, amongst other articles, it was concluded that Pom- pey should retain all the islands he was then in possession of, and also Pelopon- nesus; that he should be made Augur, and have the privilege of demanding the consulship in his absence, and of discharging that office by any of his friends; that he should leave the sea open, and pay the people what corn was due from Sicily; that those who had taken refuge with him, out of fear, should be restored to their possessions and privileges, and lose only their moveables; that the proscribed persons, except such as were guilty of Cæsar's death, should have all liberty to return and receive a fourth part of their estates; and that he himself should receive seventy millions of sesterces. This treaty was signed by the Generals, and was then sent to Rome to be kept by the Vestals. Thus a peace was concluded to the great joy and satisfaction of all the people. The three Chiefs thought of treating each other on this occasion;
 and

Appian.

66104 Ib.
 11.11.

Vol. P. 2.
 2. 77.

and it fell by lot to Pompey to give the first entertainment. He received them accordingly on board his ship: And, while they were at supper, Menas, his Admiral, whispered him in the ear: "Allow me to cut the cables, and you are Master of the world." Pompey, after a moment's reflexion, answered, "You should have done it without consulting me; Pompey cannot perjure himself." The two guests heard nothing of what was said, and the entertainment was concluded with as much gaiety as it had begun. Antony and Octavius treated Pompey in their turns; and these rejoicings seemed to speak the sincerity of their union.

Y. R. 713.
Bef. Chr.
39.
412 Conf.

L. MARCIUS CENSORINUS,
C. CALVISIUS SABINUS, } Consuls.

The noise of civil discord now ceased for a-while; and Octavius and Antony were welcomed to Rome with the loudest acclamations. The other Chief sailed back to his islands. Before they separated, they named, it is said, the Consuls for the four following years; Antony and Libo for the first, Octavius and Pompey for the second, Domitius and Sossius for the third, and Antony and Octavius for the fourth. This nomination, however, did not take place.

Y. R. 714.
Bef. Chr.
38.
413 Conf.

The stay which OCTAVIUS and ANTONY made at Rome was not long. Octavius, to keep his soldiers in action, sent a detachment of them into Illyricum, and led the rest into Gaul, where there were some disturbances; and Antony departed for the East, to carry on the war against the Parthians. This war his Lieutenant Ventidius had managed with great success, having overthrown Labienus and Barzapharnes in two engagements, in which these two Generals perished. Antony, being informed in his way of these particulars, stopped at Atbens, where he passed the winter, and gave himself over to his pleasures and diversions in the company of Octavia, with whom he is said to have been in love at this time. He quitted, during his residence there, all the ensigns of authority, and affected to live like a private person. He neglected business altogether, and divided his time between love, philosophy, and entertainments.

APPIUS CLAUDIUS PULCHER,
C. NORBANUS FLACCUS, } Consuls.

Antony, in the beginning of this year, thought of resuming the General. A jealousy perhaps of the honour acquired by his Lieutenant

Y. R. 715.
Bef. Chr.
37.
414 Conf.

VOL. IV.

D d d

had

* The two Consuls of this year, Calvinus and Pollio, laid down their office before the end of their nominal magistracy, in favour of L. Cornelius Balbus, a friend of Octavius; and of P. Canidius Crassus, one of Antony's Officers, whom we shall soon see at the head of his land-army. Pollio, when divested of the consulship, was sent to make war against the Parthians, a people of Illyria, who had shewn a strong attachment to Bru- sus.

Y. R. 715. had seized him at this time; and he left Athens to gather those laurels
 Bef. Cnr. which properly belonged to him. But, before he arrived at the army, 37. 414 Conf. Ventidius had put an end to the war by a complete victory which he had gained over Pacorus. This brave Prince perished in the battle, and all his men were destroyed, excepting those who found protection in Samosatis, the capital town of Commagena, where Antiochus reigned. Ventidius, who was afraid of offending Antony, did not pursue all the advantages of this victory. In the prosecution, however, of the war, he laid siege to Samosatis, which he would have taken in a short time, if Antony had not sent express orders to him to wait his arrival. As the justice, generosity, and bravery of the young Parthian Prince had endeared all the Syrians to his person, and there was no hopes of bringing back to their duty several towns and Princes in those parts, while they thought him alive, Ventidius caused his head to be carried about the province, and thus completely revenged upon the Parthians the cruelty and indignity they were guilty of, in regard to Crassus and his brave and generous sons. When Antony arrived, he took upon him the command of the siege of Samosatis, but his behaviour in the conduct of it procured him no honour. The town was bravely defended, and Antiochus at last purchased of him a peace for three hundred talents, though he had offered Ventidius a thousand before his arrival. After this exploit, away he flew to his dear Octavia at Athens. He was decreed a triumph in Rome for the victories of Ventidius; and this brave General was likewise admitted to the same honour. The triumph decreed to Antony was never exhibited; but Ventidius celebrated his, this same year, on the 28th of December, with great pomp; and the circumstance of his having been formerly led in triumph, in his infancy, added to the public joy, and to the glory of this distinction.

58, 125 L.
 Act.

C H A P. IV.

The renewal of the war between the TRIUMVIRS and SEXTUS POMPEY. OCTAVIUS's preparations. His bad success in several naval engagements. He at last destroys SEXTUS's fleet, and obliges him to quit Sicily. He dispossesses LEPIDUS of his army and the triumviral power, and applies himself to gain the affections of all orders of men.

THE peace which had been concluded between Pompey and the Triumvirs was not of long continuance. Antony, who by the articles of it was obliged to quit Peloponnesus, would not do it till Pompey
 had

tas. He took the town of Salona, and performed other exploits, which entitled him to a triumph. His colleague Calpurnius obtained the same honour for some success against the Cerritani in Spain. During their con-sulate, Herod was made King of the Jews

by a decree of the Senate, and old Dejotarus, that good ally of the Aristocrats, died, leaving behind him, among other memorable deeds, that of having murdered all his children, but the one whom he destined for his heir.

had satisfied him for such monies as were due to him from the inhabitants. Pompey would by no means hearken to this, but immediately began, contrary to his engagements, to augment his forces. He also secretly authorised the pirates to seize the provisions destined for Italy, which renewed the former grievances and miseries, and made the people complain, that the only change in their situation was, that they had four tyrants instead of three. Menas, one of Pompey's freedmen, in whom he had hitherto placed the greatest confidence, had opposed the peace, and now excited him to a rupture: Yet, soon after, upon a suspicion of a change in his master's affections, he revolted to Octavius, and delivered up to him Sardinia and Corfica with three legions and sixty galleys. Sextus demanded him back, and, upon receiving a refusal, he sent a squadron to pillage the coast of Campania. Octavius, on his side, took the treaty of Misenum out of the hands of the Vestals, alledging, that, by this hostility it was broke, and summoned Antony and Lepidus to come to his assistance. But, neither of them making haste to comply, he was obliged to act by himself; and he soon gathered two numerous fleets; one composed mostly of the vessels of Menas, and commanded by Calvisius Sabinus; another built and equipped on the Adriatic coast, under the conduct of L. Cornificius. These two fleets were to attack Sicily on two sides, and cause a diversion of the forces of the enemy, while his legions passed from Reggio into the island. But Sextus, who was in readiness for a vigorous defence, sent a squadron under the conduct of Mene-crates against Calvisius, and destroyed most of his ships near Cuma; and he waited himself, at Messana, the approach of the other fleet. This also was beat back by Pompey, and, when lying at anchor, was almost entirely destroyed. Octavius, who was on board of it, got on shore with much difficulty, and, having saved what men and vessels he could, contented himself, for the present, in distributing his land-forces along the coast, till he could get together another fleet.

Octavius was married this year to Livia, so famous for having engaged his constant affection during his whole life. She had lately returned to Rome with her husband Tiberius Nero, under the security of the peace of Misenum; and, by her refined and dexterous wit more than her beauty, she made such a deep impression on his heart, that, in order to procure her, he broke through all the rules of decency. Scribonia was divorced from him, the very day she was brought to bed of the famous Julia; and Tiberius Nero was constrained to yield up to him his wife, though she was six months gone with child. The scruple arising from this circumstance was removed by the college of Augurs. The question was put to them, "Whether a woman, with child by her husband, could be lawfully married to another man before child-birth?" They said, "that, since there could be no doubt to whom the child belonged, Livia was free to marry, though pregnant, the law forbidding it only,

Y. R. 715. "when that was uncertain." The Lady was delivered three months afterwards of Drusus, whom Octavius immediately sent to Tiberius ¹.

^{37.}
414 Conf. The five years of the triumvirate were now almost expired; and the Triumvirs prolonged their power for five years more, without regarding the suffrages either of the Senate or people.

M. VIPSANIUS AGRIPPA, } Consuls.
L. CANIDIUS GALLUS, }

Y. R. 716. Canidius was a creature of Antony's; and Agrippa was a faithful servant of Octavius; a man of low birth, but who had great talents for war and for a Court. He had lately brought back to their duty the rebellious ^{36.}
415 Conf. Gauls, and in this expedition had passed the Rhine. Octavius with the consulship had procured him a decree for a triumph: But he rejected this distinction as unbecoming, at a time when his General had been unsuccessful. The whole year of their consulship was spent in making preparations against Pompey. Agrippa was charged with the care of building a new fleet and exercising the rowers and seamen; and he acquitted himself of this double employment with great zeal and capacity, overlooking the carpenters, and presiding over the exercises, in which twenty thousand slaves were instructed. He executed also another noble work, the Julian port, formed by the junction of the lakes Lucrinus and Avernus with the sea; in which the greatest fleets might be received, and find sufficient shelter from the winds and tides. The lake Lucrinus, situated between Misenum and Puteoli, was separated from the sea by an old causey a mile in length, and of a sufficient breadth to allow a waggon to pass. Agrippa repaired and raised this causey, which, being weakened in several places, was frequently overflowed. He cut two openings in it to allow a passage for ships; and, from the bottom of the lake Lucrinus, he drew a canal to the lake Avernus, which last properly formed the port, and afforded a secure retreat to vessels. It is reported, that, in order to correct the bad quality of the air, which was supposed to be infectious and pestilential, Agrippa cut down the forests which grew on the borders of the Avernus, and thus, by giving a free circulation to the air, made it a healthful and pleasant situation. It was here he assembled all the new

Serv. in Virg. Æn.
iii. 442.

¹ Sueton. in Galba, c. 1. Livia olim post Augusti statim nuptias Vejentanum saum reviventi, pratervolans aquila, Gallinam albam, ramulum lauri rostro tenentem, ita ut rapuerat, demisit in gremium: cumque nutriti alitem pangique ramulum placuisset, tanta pullorum soboles provenit, ut hodie quoque ea villa ad Gallinas vocetur; tale vero Laurum, ut triumphaturi Cæsares inde laureas decerperent; fuitque mos triumphantibus alias confestim eodem loco pangere:—Plinius xv. 30. Livia Drusillæ, quæ postea Augusta matrimonii nomen accepit, cum pacta esset illi Cæsari, Gallinam con-

spicui candoris sedenti aquila ex alto abjecit in gremium illæsam: intrepideque miranti accessit miraculum, quoniam teneret rostro laureum ramum onustum suis baccis. Conservari alitem & sobolem jussere Aruspices ramumque eum feri ac rite custodiri. Quod factum est in villa Cæsarum fluvio Tiberi imposita, juxta nonum lapidem Flaminia via, quæ ob id vocatur, ad Gallinas: Mireque silva provenit. Ex ea triumphans postea Cæsar laurum in manu tenuit, coronamque capite gessit: Ac deinde imperatores Cæsares cuncti. Dio eadem habet libro iv. 8vo. p. 389.

vessels

vessels built in the several ports of Italy, and exercised the rowers and sailors ".

L. GELLIUS POPLICOLA, }
M. COCCEIUS NERVA, } Consuls.

Y. R. 716.
Bef. Chr.
36.
415 Conf.

Antony, in the beginning of this year, appeared before Brundisium, with a fleet of 300 sail; and pretended that he came to assist Octavius in the war against Pompey: But Octavius, having now gathered a very powerful force at sea, could willingly have dispensed with his colleague's civility. Plutarch says, that he came rather as an enemy than a friend; and the new disgusts that arose between them, at this time, seem to favour his opinion. Antony, it has been said, was not willing that Octavius should have all the honour and profit of the conquest of Sicily, and was desirous to exchange a part of his fleet, which was a great expence to him, for a land-army, which he wanted in order to push the war against the Parthians. But, whatever were the causes of their discontent, certain it is that they began to consider each other as rivals, and shewed openly their dissatisfaction. Antony was refused admittance into the port of Brundisium, and therefore landed at Tarentum, where Octavia, who accompanied him, obtained his leave to go to her brother, and clear up all misunderstandings. Octavius received her with the courtesy suitable to the great affection he had for her, but was yet so backward in answering her requests, that she publicly addressed herself to his two great friends, Agrippa and Mecenas: "All mankind, said she, have their eyes fixed upon me, and congratulate me for partaking of the grandeur of two powerful Generals. I am the wife of the one, and the sister of the other. But, if an ill destiny should lead them to war with each other, I shall be miserable without redress; I shall be reduced to the fatal necessity of losing a husband or a brother." Her entreaties had, at length, so much weight that Octavius consented to meet Antony between Tarentum and Metapontum. From the place chosen for their interview, it appeared that the young Triumvir intended to have a small river between him and his colleague. But Antony, who did not want generosity, when he saw Octavius approach, leaped into a boat, that he might cross over to him. This

Y. R. 717.
Bef. Chr.
35.
416 Conf.
Plut. in Ant.

" "An memorem portus, Lucrinoque
" addita claustra?
" Atque indignatum magnis stridoribus æ-
" quor,
" Julia quæ ponto longa sonat unda refluxo,
" Tyrrhenusque fretis immittitur æstus A-
" veris?" Virg. Georg. ii. 161.

———— Sive receptus
Terrâ Neptunus classes Aquilonibus arcet Regis opus." Hor. Art. Poet. v. 63.

This noble and royal work does not seem to have been of any lasting use. Strabo, who wrote under the Emperor Tiberius, takes very little notice of it; and, in the history of later ages, it is seldom mentioned. The face of these places was entirely changed in 1538, by an earthquake, which in one night raised a great part of the bottom of the lake Lucrinus, and the adjacent fields, into a mountain five hundred feet high, called now Monte Nuovo, which is covered particularly on one side with the scoriz of melted metal, and has a hollow in its summit, which is near a mile and a half in circumference.

Octavius

Y. R. 117. Octavius perceived, and, imitating the example, they met in the middle of the stream, and there disputed, who should go over to the other. ³⁵ Octavius prevailed, as he declared that he had an intention to go to Tarentum to see his sister. They soon agreed between themselves and against Sextus. Antony lent Octavius 120 vessels, and received from him twenty thousand legionary soldiers: And, in consideration of ten light ships of war, Octavia obtained, for her husband, a thousand chosen men, who were to serve him as a guard. They also, that they might confirm their negotiations, projected a double marriage; the one of Antyllus, the eldest son of Antony, with Julia, daughter to Octavius, who was not three years old; and the other of Antonia, the daughter of Antony and Octavia, who was still younger, with the son of Domitius Ahenobarbus; which last took place, and began the alliance between the family of Domitius and Cæsar. Having thus adjusted their differences, they took leave of each other: Antony returned into the East with his new legions, leaving Octavia in Italy: And Octavius, on his side, strengthened with such a considerable navy, applied himself entirely to the war against Sextus *.

Octavius determined to invade Sicily from three several quarters: Lepidus was to make a descent from Africa; Statilius Taurus from Tarentum, with the ships left by Antony; and he himself, with his new-built fleet from the Julian port: And the three armies set out, by agreement, on the first of July†. But, on the third day after they had set sail, a violent tempest arose, and rendered useless, at least for a time, these formidable preparations. Lepidus alone landed his men in Sicily, on the coast of Lilybaeum. Taurus was forced back to Tarentum; and Octavius's squadron, having no port near to put in at, suffered greatly. Sextus, who, on this occasion, sacrificed solemnly to Neptune, took for his colour the sea-green, instead of the purple; and Octavius, on his side, declared he would conquer in spite of Neptune. Lepidus was able to keep footing in Sicily, for he had sailed with a thousand vessels of burden and seventy gallies, which carried over twelve legions, five thousand Numidian horse, and all things necessary for their subsistence.

* Appian tells us, that, before he began any military operations, he purified his new fleet by the religious ceremony of a lusitania, which was performed after the following manner: Altars were erected in the sea a little off the shore, and the ships, with all their respective crews, in a profound silence, were ranked in order before them: The Priests sacrificed, standing in the water; then placed the victims in a pinnace, with which they rowed thrice round the fleet, followed by other boats in which were all the principal Commanders; all offering prayers, that, if the fleet was threatened with any misfortune, it might fall upon the victims. The victims were divided into two parts, and one half of them was thrown into the sea, the other half burnt upon the altars, whilst all the multitude made their prayers.

† According to Dio, l. xlix. p. 392, in the beginning of spring.—We shall follow Appian in the account of this war, his relation being as authentic and more consistent than any other.

Pompey

Pompey hoped that, after so many losses, Octavius would lie quiet; but when he heard that he had refitted his fleet, and was preparing to invade Sicily again, that very summer; he sent the perfidious Menas, who had already abandoned the party of Octavius, and had returned to his old master, to observe the motions of his enemy. Menas, ill satisfied with the reception he had met with from Pompey, who had trusted him with no other command than that of the seven ships which he had brought back with him, and which he commanded in the present expedition, resolved once more to change sides. To this purpose, imagining, that, whatever happened, it would be for his advantage to do some brave and valiant action, he distributed all the money he had among his companions, and, sailing directly towards Octavius's fleet, he fell unexpectedly upon the guard-ships: Then, going off, and falling on again, he carried away sometimes two of them, and sometimes three: He picked up also in the very ports several ships laden with corn, and sunk and burnt those he could not carry off, and filled the coast with terror. He grew so bold that he even came to an anchor in a bay upon the coast, where he lay, as if he had been fast in the ouze, till his enemies, running down from the mountains as to an assured prey, he gently rowed off, deriding them, to the grief and astonishment of the whole army. After he had thus made known his importance to Cæsar, he thought of giving a favourable impression of himself by performing an act of generosity; and he dismissed without ransom a Senator called Rebilus, who was among the prisoners he had taken. He then raised a report amongst his people, that they should soon have a fugitive of consequence, Vinidius Marcellus, an intimate friend of Octavius, whose affection he had found means to engage. Deceived by this pretext, his soldiers permitted him to have a conference with Vinidius, in one of the neighbouring islands; and he told Vinidius that, when he left Cæsar's party, he had been forced to it by the injuries he daily received from Calvisius, at that time Admiral; but that, since Agrippa had now the command of the navy, he was ready to return to Cæsar's service, provided Vinidius would bring him a safe conduct from Messala, who, in Agrippa's absence, commanded on the coast. He also promised, by some signal service, to repair his fault. Messala sent the safe conduct, and Menas came over to Octavius, who permitted the officers of his ships to go where they pleased, and pardoned Menas; but gave him no command and had a strict watch kept over him².

When the fleet was in readiness, Octavius came to Vibo, where he gave orders to Messala to pass over into Sicily, with two legions, in order to join Lepidus's army, and to land in the gulph of Taurominium: He sent three likewise to Stylida, which is the very extremity of the streight, to wait a fair opportunity; and commanded Taurus to cruise with ² This perfidious wretch, if we can believe Horace, lived afterwards in great opulence, and served in the capacity of a military Tribune. See Epod iv.

his

Y. R. 717. his fleet from Tarentum to Sylaceum, which lies opposite to Taurrominium.
 Bel. Car. Pompey, on his side, placed good garrisons in all the places of the coast, 416 35. where any forces could land; and kept his fleet at Messana ready to sail
 — upon the first order. While these preparations were going forward, Lepidus, having sent for the remainder of his forces, which consisted of four legions, Papias, one of Pompey's Lieutenants, met them in the open sea, and sunk and burnt several of the vessels in which they had embarked, forcing the rest to return to Africa. Two of the legions were cut off, and those of them, who thought to save themselves by swimming to the coast of Sicily, were there massacred by the order of Titienus Gallus, another of Pompey's Lieutenants. Papias, after this success, returned to Pompey; and the two legions, who recovered Africa, found means to cross over to Lepidus.

Cæsar himself passed, with his main fleet, from Vibo to Strongyle, one of the Æolian or Vulcanian islands; and, seeing several camps on the coasts of Sicily on that side, he supposed Pompey was there in person; and therefore, leaving Agrippa in that station, he returned to Vibo, and immediately joined Messala, with a design to lay hold of the opportunity of Pompey's absence to surprise Taurrominium, and to fall upon Sicily on both sides at once. Agrippa sailed from Strongyle to Hiera, another island, which lay nearest to the coast of Sicily; and determined the next day to make an attack upon Myle, and a fleet of forty sail, which lay there under the command of Demochares. Pompey, apprised of his intention, sent from Messana forty more ships to Demochares, under the command of Apollonphanes, another of his freedmen, who was followed by Papias, with seventy others. Agrippa, before day, weighed anchor with half his ships, designing only to fight with Papias, with whom, by his intelligence, he expected to meet; but, when he saw Apollonphanes's fleet followed by another of seventy sail, he sent presently to give notice to Octavius that Pompey was at Myle, with the greatest part of his naval force; and, placing himself in the middle of his great ships, sent to the rest at Hiera to join him without delay. The ships of the two Admirals, Papias and Agrippa, magnificently equipped with towers on poop and prow, began the fight, and gave the signals to the others, who instantly charged with great violence, some stem and stem, others standing off to gain their enemy's broadside, and fall on with greater force. Great was the noise made by the ships shocking against each other, and greater the shouts of the men.

Pompey's ships were middle-sized, light and easy to manage, and of course more active than those of the enemy, and, by their swiftness, fit to take all advantages in boarding; Octavius's, being greater and more heavy, were of consequence less nimble, but, by their superior strength, they gave the shock with more violence, and were abler to receive it. Octavius had the best soldiers, and Pompey the most skilful mariners. These charged not right forwards upon Cæsar's great ships, but, sheering by them, them, sometimes broke a whole line of oars, sometimes carried away their rudders, and sometimes suddenly bringing about, they attacked them with their beak-heads. But, when Octavius's ships could reach any of these light-timbered vessels, they pressed upon them so furiously, that they either staved them or bored them through and through; and, if they came at any time to fight board and board, the Cæsarean soldiers, from their great ships, miserably knocked their enemies down with missile arms thrown from aloft; and, casting in their grappling-hooks, easily stopped them; so that, the service being too hard to be borne, the Pompeians had no other way to save themselves, but by leaping into the sea, where skiffs, appointed for that purpose, took them up. Mean while, Agrippa, whose main design was upon Papias's ship, gave him so cruel a shock in the bow, that he opened all his keel, and those in the forecastle presently fell, and, the water entering, all the lower bank of rowers were drowned; the rest upon planks saved themselves by swimming. Papias himself was received into the next ship, and renewed the fight.

Y. R. 717.
Bef. Chr.
35.
416 Conf.

When Pompey, who from the top of a mountain was spectator of the fight, saw that his people never came near any of the enemy's ships without great loss of men, and that the rest of Agrippa's fleet was sailing from Hiera to his assistance; he made a signal for his men to retreat, which they did at first, gradually, still fighting with great bravery: But, being closely pressed upon, they all, at last, fairly fled, and took refuge in the mouths of several rivers, where Agrippa's pilots advised him not to hazard his heavy vessels on account of the flats. He came, therefore, to an anchor in sight of them in the open sea, as if he designed to attack them in the night; but, his officers admonishing him not to overharrass the soldiers, or be too confident in the present calmness of the sea, he retreated towards the evening; and Pompey's ships got into the harbour. Agrippa lost in this battle but five vessels, and Pompey thirty. The latter, nevertheless, commended his men for having so well defended themselves against ships so superior in height and strength, nor were his rewards less than if they had been victorious. He also gave them hopes, that, by fighting in the streights, they would have better success, as their light ships would better stem the current; and he promised withal to add somewhat to the height of them.

At the same time this brave Commander gave himself no rest; judging rightly that Octavius was gone to Taurus's camp to execute his design upon Taurominium, he set sail for Messana, leaving at Mylæ a part of his ships, to make Agrippa believe he was still there. Agrippa, on the other side, having given a little repose to his men, sailed towards Tyndaris, which had promised to surrender. The inhabitants were willing to receive him, but the garrison defended the place so valiantly that they drove him from it; yet some other towns, revolting to him, received his garrisons, and towards night he returned to his fleet. Oct-

Y. R. 417 Octavius, on his side, being well assured that Pompey was gone from Messana to Mylæ to meet Agrippa, came from Scylaceum to Leucopetra, from
Bef. Chr. 35
416 Conf. whence he proposed to pass by night to Taurominium; but, having information there of Agrippa's victory, he thought there was no longer any reason to conceal his embarkation, and determined to sail in broad day-light, not suspecting that Pompey would remove far from Agrippa. Day then beginning to appear, he took a view of the sea from the mountains as far as his sight could reach, and, spying none of the enemy's ships, he went on board, loading the ships with all the soldiers he could put into them; leaving the rest with Messala till the ships returned to fetch them. Being come near to Taurominium, he summoned the place to surrender; but, the garrison refusing, he passed on beyond the river Onobala, and the temple of Venus, and landed near Archigetes, where, having offered prayers to the Gods, he encamped. He was beginning the circumvallation of his camp, when Pompey was descried coming with a great fleet, to the astonishment of all the army, who thought that he had been quite ruined by Agrippa. Along the shore likewise came horsemen, striving in swiftness to out-pass the fleet; and in several parts were seen great bodies of foot. Cæsar's people, seeing themselves thus surrounded, were utterly dismayed. Octavius himself was in the greatest anxiety, because it was now impossible for Messala to join him. The horrid first fell among Octavius's men still employed in their trenches: And, if the fleet and foot had come on at the same time, Pompey would probably have gained an important victory; but, being ignorant of the terror his enemies were in, and not inclining to come to battle in the evening, he ordered the fleet to retreat to the promontory of Laccyna, and the foot, who durst not lodge near Octavius's camp, to the town of Phanissa. The night following, the Cæsarians fortified their camp. They consisted of three legions, five hundred horsemen without horses, about a thousand light-armed foot, and two thousand veteran volunteers, besides the sea-forces. Cæsar, not doubting but Pompey would attack his camp, left the defence of it to Cornificius, whom he ordered to defend himself to the last extremity; and he embarked himself before day-light to return to Italy for fresh succours. Pompey, however, did not think it adviseable to attack his camp, but fell upon his fleet with the utmost violence. The fight lasted till night. Many of Octavius's ships were taken, and the rest, a small number excepted, were either sunk or burnt. A few of his sailors who could swim escaped to Cornificius's camp, who sent his light-armed foot to receive them. Octavius, rowed a great way in the night in a small galley; but, being hotly pursued, he was obliged to get into a small boat, that he might not draw the attention of the Pompeian Captains; and, at length, by good fortune, he reached the port of Abala, where he landed with only one attendant; spent with fatigue, and overwhelmed with grief on account of his defeat. He was thence conveyed to Messala's camp, which was not far distant. As soon as he got thither, he dispatched a brigantine to Cornificius, to let him know that he would soon come to his relief; and the same night he went to Stylida, where Carinas was with three legions: and, being ready to put to sea, he gave him orders to pass over directly to Lipara, and there wait for him; and he wrote likewise to Agrippa, that, considering the danger Cornificius was in, he should with all speed send to him Laronius with the best of his forces. At the same time Mecenas was sent to Rome, to take cognizance of some disturbances there, and put a stop to them: And this he effected by his prudence and severity.

V. R. 717.
Ecl. Clu.
35.
416 Conf.
Lipari, the chief of the Æolian islands,
which has seven good havens.

Cornificius, being much streightened for want of provisions, drew out his legions to provoke the enemy to fight: But Pompey would not hazard the fortune of a battle against troops who had nothing but their arms to trust to, and whom he hoped to reduce by famine. It was therefore necessary that Cornificius should abandon his camp: And, having placed those who had escaped from the sea-fight, and who were without arms in the midst of the legions, he began to march towards Myle. In this desperate undertaking his troops were not less obstructed by the mountains and difficult ways they had to pass, than by the enemy's cavalry and light-armed foot. Appian tells us that, on the fourth day, they came upon a burnt soil, which the Sicilians call the Torrent of fire, and which reaches from Mount Ætna to the sea. Here the army suffered greatly, not only from an uncommon heat, but from a suffocating dust and thirst: And the enemy was also the more troublesome, as these inconveniencies did not permit Cornificius to halt a moment in order to repel them. When they drew near to the streights at the end of this burning ground, they found their enemies in possession of them, and were forced to carry them sword in hand; but when they saw before them other streights, which were likewise guarded by fresh troops, they lost heart, and made a stop, being quite spent with thirst, heat, and fatigue; yet, encouraged by their Chief, who assured them there was a fountain close by, they renewed the fight, and drove the enemy before them, not without very considerable loss: But other enemies were still masters of the fountain, so that now they gave themselves over to grief and despair. In this extremity, Laronius appeared at some distance with three legions, which Agrippa, according to Octavius's orders, had sent to their relief. The enemy, imagining that Agrippa's whole convoy was at hand, deserted the fountain; and the soldiers of Cornificius ran to it with the utmost precipitation, and, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of their officers, they drank so excessively that some of them died upon the spot. In this manner did Cornificius make good his retreat. Octavius, who had brought him into such distress, loaded him and his troops with praises and rewards; and Cornificius, it is said, was so proud of his success, that, when he went to Rome, he never supped abroad, but he returned mounted upon an elephant, in commemoration of this dangerous expedition.

Dio, l. x'ix.
p. 356.

Y. R. 717. The taking of Tyndaris, which was effected by Agrippa, laid the island
 Bef. Chr. open to Octavius, who immediately transported into it twenty-one le-
 15. gions, twenty thousand horse, and five thousand light-armed troops.
 416 C. C. Then Lepidus, who hitherto had kept near Lilibæum, advanced into the country; and the two Triumviri united their forces before the walls of Messana.

Pompey, seeing himself overpowered at land, and his affairs in a declining posture, and fearing, in consequence of that, the desertion of his officers and soldiers, was desirous to decide the quarrel by a general battle; and challenged Octavius to a sea-fight with three hundred ships on a side. Octavius did not think it proper to refuse the challenge^a; and, the day being agreed upon, the two fleets met in good order between Myle and Naulocus. Agrippa commanded the fleet of Octavius; and Demochares and Apollonbanes that of Pompey. The battle was fierce, and the victory for a long time doubtful. At last Agrippa prevailed, and chiefly by means of the grappling-iron which he had prepared. It was a strong shaft, five cubits long, bound about with iron, with a ring of the same metal in each end. In the one was the hook of iron; in the other, small ropes were made fast, which were commanded by a windlass in the ship. When an enemy's vessel therefore approached to do mischief, the iron hook was forcibly darted against it from a machine.
 If it stuck, the windlass instantly played, and before the iron shod shaft, or the ropes could be cut, the vessel attacked was drawn close to the other and boarded. Of the 300 Pompeian ships, but 17 escaped.
 This great victory was purchased with the loss only of three ships, according to Dio. Demochares, seeing his ship in the power of the enemy, killed himself; Apollonbanes, Pompey's other Admiral, who could have made off, delivered himself up.

l. xlix. p.
398.

The land army, commanded by Titius, surrendered, upon this defeat, to Octavius; and this defection made Pompey determine immediately to leave the island. Having therefore put on board his 17 ships all that he had that was valuable, he sailed for Asia, hoping to find protection from Antony. in requital of that which he had given to his mother Julia, and many of his friends. But before he set out he sent for Plennius, one of his Lieutenants, who had under his command eight legions. Plennius obeyed his orders; but, not arriving till Pompey was gone, he threw himself into Messana; which was soon besieged in form by the armies of the two Triumvirs; the one commanded by Agrippa, the other by Lepidus. Plennius, seeing it was madness to make any resistance, sent De-

^a Dio, l. xlix. p. 397, tells us, that Octavius, though he was sensible that Pompey would be soon in very great distress, consulted to give battle on the account of the uneasiness Lepidus gave him; who, pretending to an equality of command, and not having been treated by his colleague with the respect he thought due to him, had opened a negotiation with Pompey. If so, he had a very good reason to accept of Pompey's challenge; for at sea Lepidus would have no share in the battle, and nothing was to be feared from his ill humour.

puties to the two Generals to treat of a capitulation: Agrippa desired that the affair should be deferred till the next day, when Octavius would be present; but Lepidus received them upon terms, and, to get the army of Plennius into his own possession, gave them an equal share in the plunder of the city, which was that very night sacked by both armies. This weak man, finding himself now at the head of an army of two and twenty legions, conceived hopes, and laid a design of seizing upon Sicily^b: He grounded his right to it upon his first landing in the island, and having taken more cities than his colleague: Wherefore he gave command to his garrisons not to receive any troops, but his own; and seized upon all the passages. Octavius, on his arrival the next day, sent some of his friends to Lepidus, to make his complaint of these proceedings, and to represent to him, that he was not invited into the island to conquer it for himself, but to give assistance as an ally in a war already begun. Lepidus answered by a reciprocal complaint, that Octavius and Antony had deprived him unjustly of his part of the Empire, and that he was ready to give up both Africa and Sicily, if they would restore him his share. Octavius, incensed at this answer, went himself to reproach him with his ingratitude and folly; and they parted after mutual threats, and from that instant they kept each of them a stricter guard; and Octavius ordered his ships to anchor at a distance from the port, pretending that Lepidus had a design to burn them. Their rupture was now open and declared; and the foundation seemed to be laid of a new civil war; but Octavius, who entertained no high opinion of his rival, thought it only necessary to employ art to ruin him. The soldiers of Lepidus were disgusted with him for having allowed the legions of Pompey a share in the plunder of Messana, and they despised him as a General: And Octavius, well informed of their sentiments, sent underhand his agents to gain them over to his interest. Having, by means of these, sounded their officers, and found them in the temper he wished, he suddenly appeared before the trenches of his colleague's camp with a strong body of cavalry; and, leaving behind the greatest part of these, he entered it with a few attendants, and, proceeding through it, he took all he met to witness his good dispositions, and that he was forced to make war against his will^c. A great many of Lepidus's soldiers saluted him Emperor, and Pompey's troops, who did not think themselves secure till

^b Lepidus inflatus amplius xx legionum numero, in id furoris processerat, ut inutilis in alienâ victoriâ comes, quam diu moratus erat, dissidendo in consiliis Cæsaris, et semper diversa iis, quæ aliis placebant, dicendo; totam victoriam ut suam interpretabatur, audebatque denunciare Cæsari, excederet Sicilia. Vell. Pat. ii. 80.

^c Velleius Paterculus says, that Octavius carried off with him the standard of a legion, and was followed by the whole army of Lepidus.

Dio says nothing of this negotiation, and tells us that Octavius, having appeared in Lepidus's camp with a design of debauching his soldiers, was disappointed in his hopes, and obliged to withdraw speedily to his troops; and that then he drew out his whole army, and surrounded Lepidus's camp; which motion determined the officers and soldiers to desert their General.

Y. R. -17 their pardon was ratified by him, testified their inclination to go over to
 B. C. 41 him. Lepidus, informed of the tumult, advanced with some troops to 4 6 Conf. check it, and, charging those who accompanied Octavius, one of them ——— was killed, and Octavius himself received an arrow in his corslet. Instantly he withdrew to his body of horse; and, being derided in his flight by the guard of one of the forts of Lepidus's camp, he instantly attacked it and carried it by force. This example intimidated the Commanders of the other forts, which flanked the camp of Lepidus, or at least served them for a pretence; and all of them at that time, or during the night, surrendered to Octavius; some of them on a simple summons, and others after having suffered a slight attack. Lepidus threatened and soothed them by turns, but to no purpose. His cavalry were the last to forsake him, but, to make amends for their delay, they sent to Octavius to ask, whether they should bring Lepidus dead or alive. Lepidus, seeing himself entirely abandoned, put on the habit of a suppliant, and went to throw himself at Cæsar's feet. The young Triumvir rose up to receive him, and would not suffer him to fall on his knees before him;
 but, having reduced him to the state of a private man, he banished him to Circium, where he remained without any power or dignity.

Thus fell Lepidus, one of the heads of the triumvirate. Ancient writers have represented him^d as a vain, weak man, whom a fortuitous concurrence of circumstances had raised to supreme power, without any of the qualities which are necessary to support the weight of it: Yet the several employments which he bore under Cæsar, that of Governor of the city, of Consul, and of Master of the Horse, shew that he was not judged by him to be without capacity. His behaviour after Cæsar's death was more spirited than Antony's: He seized upon the High-Priesthood, and would instantly have revenged his friend's death, if he had not been restrained by the Consul. His union with Antony, after his defeat at Mutina, and the coalition formed by him of the Cæsarean Chiefs, was well concerted, and gave his party the superiority, at the same time that it procured for himself a share in the Empire of the world. Indeed, in the station of Triumvir, he behaved weakly, and was the jest of his colleagues, whose interest with the soldiers, and qualifications for command, were much superior to his; but in this last scene he appeared the most despicable of men; and, if his life was granted him, it is obvious that the contempt of his weakness was alone his security.

Appian.

Octavius reaped the whole advantage of the ruin of Sextus and Lepidus:
 He seized upon Sicily and Africa as his property; and saw himself Master of all the Western world; at the head of an army of five-and-forty legions, twenty-five thousand horse, and thirty-seven thousand light-armed troops;
 and of a fleet consisting of six hundred sail. But, in this height of ^d Vir omnium vanissimus, nec ullâ virtute tam longam fortunæ indulgentiam meritus. Vell. xi. 80.

power,

power, he was soon made sensible of his dependence upon the soldiery, and warned very opportunely to gain the affection of his subjects by his prudent conduct and moderation. Before he left Sicily, notwithstanding the recompences he bestowed upon his soldiers, and his promises of much greater, his own proper troops mutinied and demanded their immediate discharge, with the same reward they had received after the battle of Philippi. Octavius repeated his promises of rewarding them honourably and equally with those who were now serving under Antony, and at the same time represented to them, with some threats, the fault they committed against the laws of war, and against the oath they had taken. Seeing his remonstrances had no effect, but that they grew more insolent, he forbore threatening, and told them that he would discharge them as soon as Antony returned, assuring them he would no more employ them in civil wars, which, by the favour of the gods, were extinct; but that he would lead them against foreign nations, from whom they would all return rich: To which they told him plainly, that they would serve no longer, unless he presently gave them those rewards and honours which their past labours deserved. He answered, that, as to honours, they should be rewarded with them immediately; for, besides the crowns he had already distributed, he had others to bestow among every legion, and to the Centurions and Tribunes he would give robes of purple, with the rank of Senators in the towns where they were born. He was interrupted here by one of the Tribunes, who, raising his voice, cried out, that crowns and robes of purple were only fit to amuse children, but that soldiers expected more substantial things, money and lands. Octavius perceiving that the whole assembly applauded this insolent speech, he in a rage went down from his tribunal, and left the Tribune to glory in his prowess, and receive the congratulation of the soldiers. The audacious Tribune, however, disappeared that night, and was no more heard of. This accident made them more circumspect, and no particular officer or soldier dared to distinguish himself; but they assembled in troops, and persisted in their demands.

Octavius, seeing that all his endeavours to pacify them were vain, dismissed those, who had served at Mutina and Philippi, to the number of twenty thousand; and, lest they should nourish a spirit of sedition in the island, he shipped them off immediately. As soon as they were gone, he assembled his army, and took them for witnesses of the perjury of the others, whom he called deserters, because they had forced a discharge from him; and he declared that he never would take them back to his service again. He then praised their fidelity for remaining with him, and, having told them, that they might soon hope for repose and settlements, he distributed to each of them five hundred drachmas, which he raised by a tax upon the Sicilians. About 161,

Matters being thus quieted in Sicily, Octavius sent back to Antony the ships he had borrowed from him, and returned to Rome to receive the honours,

Y. P. 717
Bef C. 11.
35.
416 C. m.

Y. 71-
Bef. Chr.
35
410 Conf. honours, which the Senate, in consequence of his success, had decreed to him. The whole body of the Senators, with garlands of flowers upon their heads, as a sign of joy and congratulation, went a great way out of the city to meet him, and he entered it with the modest pomp of an ovation, on the ides of November. Besides receiving this honour, he consented that an annual festival should be instituted in memory of his victory; and that a gilded statue should be set up to him in the Forum, in a triumphal habit, having its pedestal adorned with the prows of vessels, and bearing this inscription: To Caesar, for having restored peace to Rome, a long time disturbed both by sea and land.

Near ten thousand pounds.

It was now the chief concern of Octavius to gain the esteem and love of the people. He publicly burnt all Pompey's papers, and all those that might be monuments of their divisions, signifying to all the world, that he was willing to forget what was past. In the distribution of lands which he had to make to his veterans, he conducted himself with the strictest equity; the funds appropriated to them belonging either to the Republic, or being fairly purchased from private persons or corporations. The colony of Capua, being very thinly inhabited, and possessing, on that account, in common, a large extent of ground which never belonged to any particular proprietor; he there established a part of his veterans; and, to satisfy the colony, he gave them, in the island of Crete, funds of a greater produce, and which brought them in twelve hundred thousand sesterces a year; and he also added a great and useful ornament to the town of Capua itself by making an aqueduct to supply them with water. Rome and all Italy being, at this time, greatly infested by thieves and robbers, who had formed themselves into companies, and were become very formidable, he gave it in charge to Sabinus to put a stop to this evil, and the whole race of them were destroyed in one year. It was now also that he began those great edifices, for the ornament of Rome, which have illustrated his reign. In fine, he gave them hopes, that he would soon lay down, with the consent of his colleague, his triumviral authority, and restore the Commonwealth: And the Senate, to engage him to keep his word, offered to create him perpetual Tribune; a magistracy, which, while it rendered his person sacred and inviolable, would have deprived him of all command in the army: But this proposal he neither accepted nor rejected.

CHAP. V.

ANTONY's behaviour in the East: His inglorious expedition against the Parthians. SEXTUS POMPEY's behaviour in Asia, and his death.

W H I L E

WHILE Octavius was thus increasing his power, and gaining the affections and esteem of the soldiers and people, Antony was wasting his best troops in an inglorious war, and gathering nothing but contempt and the public hatred by the most extravagant behaviour. He had no sooner left Italy and lost sight of Octavia, than his love for Cleopatra, which had lain quiet in his breast so long, gathered strength again, and, upon his approach to Syria, he immediately sent Fonteius Capito to conduct her to him. She soon arrived, and, as if he meant to make her a reparation for his past coolness, he granted her all her ambitious demands. He added to her kingdom Phœnicia, a part of Judea, and a part of Arabia-Felix. All these countries were possessed by several petty Princes, under the protection of the Romans; and some of these she engaged Antony to put to death, as being in the interest of the Parthians. He also yielded up to her the rights of the Republic over the island of Cyprus and the town of Cyrene on the Libyan coast, both which had formerly belonged to the crown of Egypt. He did not, however, forget his grand project against the Parthians, and employed this whole year in making preparations for war. His Lieutenants, in his absence, Sosius in *Syria, and Canidius Gallus, towards the Caspian sea, had prepared his way, and gained great reputation to his arms.

The crown of Parthia was now possessed by Pbraates†. His father Orodes, after bewailing the death of his beloved son Pacorus, had made choice of him to succeed him, as the eldest of his thirty sons. This young Prince was no sooner declared heir to the crown, than he strangled his father, and put to death all his brothers. Even the eldest of his own sons was sacrificed to his jealousy. Many of the Parthian nobility, alarmed at such monstrous cruelty, fled into the neighbouring states; and Moneses, one of the most illustrious and powerful of them, deserted to the Romans. Antony was at this time in Italy at too great a distance to take advantage of these disturbances; and Sosius, who commanded in Syria, had learnt, from the example of Ventidius, not to court a glory which might surpass that of his General. But Antony, upon his return

* The chief exploit of this Commander was the taking of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Herod, after a siege of five months. Most of the inhabitants were put to the sword, without distinction of either age or sex, not so much by the Roman soldiers, whom so long and obstinate a defence had greatly incensed, as by the merciless dispositions of the Jews, under Herod's command, who, prompted by the rage of party, gave no quarter to their unfortunate countrymen. Antigonus, the author of this war, which had now lasted a year, gave himself up into the hands of Sosius, who sent him in chains to Antioch, where he was soon after, through Herod's intrigues, tried for his life, beaten with rods, and beheaded. Such was the end of the last Prince of the Ajmonian line, which had possessed the high-priesthood, together with the sovereign power, for upwards of one hundred and twenty years.

† Strabo, l. xi p. 360, tells us, that the history of this war was written by one Adelphius, who commanded a body of troops in this expedition: And it may be observed, that several learned men have thought that this Adelphius is Dellius, who was an historian, and accompanied Antony into Armenia, in 720, and was sent twice to negotiate with Artabazus. Dio, l. xlix.

Y. R. 717. into Syria, gave Monefes the most honourable reception, and, calling to
 Bof. Chr. mind the manner Themistocles had been treated by the Perian Monarch², 416 Conf. 35. he made over to him three towns, Larissa, Arctufsa, and Hierapolis, for his maintenance, and even promised him the throne of Parthia; hoping to profit greatly in his expedition, by the interest and capacity of that nobleman. Fbraates, however, being sensible how much such a man had it in his power to hurt him, sent him such assurances of his favour, and made him such promises, that he again returned to his Sovereign.
Antony did not think proper to stop him, as he had in view to amuse the Parthian Monarch by the hopes of peace; and, with Monefes, he sent Ambassadors to begin a negotiation, demanding nothing more than the restitution of the colours and prisoners taken from Crassus. But he did not wait for an answer, and, taking leave of Cleopatra, he advanced towards Armenia, where he had appointed the general rendezvous of his troops³.

Artabazes,

² Artaxerxes is reported to have given three towns to Themistocles, one for his bread, one for his wine and a third for his meat.

³ Lic says, that he would willingly have taken a shorter way into Parthia over the Euphrates, but that he found all the passages well guarded. Concerning those passages there are some curious lines in the celebrated performance of the President Montesquieu: "Tr. jan, says he, accomplished Caesar's project of invading the Parthians, and was very successful in his wars with that mighty people: Any Monarch but himself would have sunk under the weight of such an enterprise, where danger was always present, and from whence the necessary source of his supplies was at a vast distance; in a word, where he could not be sure victory itself would save him from destruction. The difficulty consisted in the situation of the two empires, and the military discipline of both nations. If he directed his march through Armenia towards the sources of the Tygris and Euphrates, he was sure to be incommoded with a mountainous and impracticable country, through which no convoy of provision could pass, so that the army would be quite destroyed before they could penetrate into Media" [Why then is Crassus so much blamed by all the historians for not taking this road, and why is Antony in the present expedition only censured for setting out so late and leaving behind him his engines?] "On the other, if he should strike out a lower track towards "the South, through Nisibis, he would find himself bewildered in a ghastly desert that separated the two empires; and, if he proceeded still lower, and marched thro' Mesopotamia, he was then to cross a large country that was either uncultivated or laid under water; and, as the Tygris and Euphrates flowed from North to South, he could not gain a passage into the country without quitting these rivers, which, if he did, he must inevitably perish. — As to the manner practised by the two nations in making war, the strength of the Romans consisted in their infantry, which was the most firm and best disciplined body of soldiers in the world. The Parthians, on the contrary, had no infantry, but then their horse were admirable, and always combated at such a distance as placed them out of the reach of the Roman army, and the javelin was seldom launched far enough to wound them. Their own weapons consisted of a bow and many formidable shafts, and they rather besieged an army than gave it battle; they were pursued to no purpose in their flight, for that was the same to them as an engagement. They carried off all the inhabitants of the country, and only left garrisons in their fortified places, and, when these were taken, the conquerors were obliged to destroy them—the Parthians, likewise, set fire to all the country that lay round the Roman army, and did not leave them the least blade of herbage. In a word, they managed their wars in a manner

Artabazes, King of Armenia, the son of Tigranes, was then in alliance with the Romans, and in war with another Artabazes, King of the *Atropatenian Medes*¹, an ally of Pbraates. Antony came, therefore, as it were, to succour the King of Armenia, but his real intention was well known. His forces, when reviewed, consisted of sixty thousand legionaries, ten thousand Spanish and Gallic horse, and thirty thousand auxiliary light-armed troops²; to which Artabazes was to add six thousand horse and seven thousand foot. As his army, by taking a great circuit, had made a march of a thousand miles, and summer was very much advanced before he got to the borders of Media, he was advised to take up his winter quarters in Armenia, and not begin the campaign till the next spring; but, being confident that nothing could resist the impression of so great an army, and being desirous to get back to Cleopatra, he passed the Araxes to go and lay siege to *Praaspa*³, the capital of Atropatenia, where the King's wives and children were; and, to march the more expeditiously, he left behind him on the borders of Media all his machines of war, under the guard of two legions commanded by Oppius Statianus. The allied Kings of Parthia and Media marched towards the besieged, but, understanding that Antony had left his machines behind, they immediately turned off towards the place where Oppius was incamped, and, surprising him, cut his two legions in pieces, and broke or burnt all the machines. Oppius himself was killed, and, of the whole army, Polemon, alone, King of Pontus, escaped, having bribed the Parthians, by the hopes of a great ransom. This disaster quite discouraged Antony's allies, and Artabazes, King of Armenia, who had been the principal cause of the war, giving over all the hopes he had conceived of the Romans, marched home with all his troops. The victorious Parthians soon appeared before Praaspa, and, having thrown succours into the town, insolently upbraided and threatened the Romans. Antony, apprehending, if he suffered these insults, and left his troops in inaction, that his men would soon be disheartened, resolved to endeavour to bring about a general action; and, with this view, drew out of his lines ten legions, three prætorian cohorts, and all his cavalry, as for a general forage, hoping that the enemy would follow him and give him an opportunity of engaging with them. After one day's march, the Parthians

Y. R. 717.
Bef. Chr.
35.
415 Conf.

“manner very like that which is now practised on the same frontiers.” But, if the Parthians were invincible for all these reasons, how did Trajan conquer them?

¹ Media was distinguished into Great Media, and the Atropatenian. The first, whose capital was Ecbatana, was under the dominion of the Parthian Monarch. Media Atropatenia was a province of the old kingdom of the Medes, and took its name from Atropatros, who had preserved it from the Mace- donian yoke. Atropatros, in acknowledgment of his good service, was elected King: And the succession was continued down in his posterity till the time of Strabo.

² Velleius says thirteen legions. Florus, l. iv. c. 10. and Justin, xlii. 5, sixteen; and Livy, Epit. l. xxx, eighteen legions, and sixteen thousand horse.

³ It is probably the town called Vera by Strabo.

Y. R. 71. appeared, ranged in the form of a crescent, near the road he was to
 B. C. 41. pass. Antony, to deceive his enemies, and induce them to keep their 4:6 Conf. post, caused his tents to be struck, as if he designed to continue his march, and not to engage. He then ordered his men to file off, directing the cavalry to charge, as soon as the legions were near enough to support them. The cavalry executed his orders punctually, and closed so suddenly with the enemy, that they could make no use of their arrows :
 But they kept their ground till the Roman infantry, coming on with great shouts, and striking their shields, forced them to retire. Antony hoped that this battle would end the war, or, at least, make a considerable progress towards his intended conquest ; but, after having pursued the enemy for six miles with his infantry, and sent his cavalry after them thrice as far, he found that he had not killed above an hundred of them, and had taken only fifty prisoners. This success was but a small compensation for the loss he had sustained of his two legions and artillery, and he became very sensible of the disadvantages with which he made a war against an enemy who could not be forced to an engagement.

The next day Antony having prepared to return to Praespa, the Par- thians appeared again ; at first in a small body ; but, their numbers increased gradually ; and, at last, their whole army being assembled, they harassed his troops during their march by brisk and frequent attacks, and it was with great trouble and danger that he regained his camp. During his absence the besieged had made a successful sally and broke down a part of the mound, which had been raised with great labour. Antony, irritated at this bad success, decimated the cohorts, who had been upon service, and gave them barley instead of wheat. The war now became troublesome to both parties, and each feared more grievous consequences. For Antony, surrounded on all sides, could send no troops abroad in quest of forage, without the loss of many of his people ; and Phraates knew well it would be very difficult to engage his men to keep the field in the winter-season. Wherefore this Monarch made use of the following artifice to get rid of his enemy. By his order, the Commanders of the Parthians, instead of acting with their usual vigour against the Romans in their forages, affected a gentle behaviour, and, while they allowed them to get provisions, took the opportunity to extol their valour, and to blame Antony for not making peace with their Monarch, and sparing the lives of so many gallant men, whom famine and cold would soon destroy, though they had no enemy to fight with. This being several times reported to Antony, he caused inquiry to be made, whether the Parthians had been commissioned to hold these discourses with his men ; and, being assured that they were, he determined to send some of his friends to the King ; and, to save his honour in some measure, he charged them still to demand the restitution of the Roman colours and prisoners. The King, according to Dio, received the Ambassadors seated upon a golden chair, and holding in his hand a bow, the string
 of

of which he frequently drew. He rejected, as impertinent, the proposition of restoring the prisoners and colours, and broke out into many reproaches against the Romans, which indeed they well deserved; but what told them that peace and a safe retreat should be granted them, on condition they would speedily depart. Antony was obliged to be content with what was granted him; and he determined to leave the country: But grief and shame would not permit him to speak to the soldiers himself; and he commissioned Domitius Abencbarbus to harangue them in his name. His soldiers were sensible of the reasons of his silence, and were thence engaged to obey him with the greater zeal. As he was preparing to return by the same way that he came, through the naked deserts, a certain Mardian^m, of whose courage and fidelity the Romans had trial in the fight for the defence of the engines, and who was well acquainted with the Parthian manners, came to him and advised him to take his march by the foot of the mountains which lay on the right hand, and not to expose his army, loaden with arms, in vast plains, where they would be perpetually harrassed by the attacks of an innumerable cavalry. He discovered to him the secret intentions of Phraates, who had no other design in treating with him but to seize a favourable opportunity of attacking his forces; and concluded with offering himself to be the guide of his march. Antony followed his advice, but told him that he must consent to be bound till he conducted the army safe into *Armenia*ⁿ. The army marched two days without any alarm, but, on the third, when Antony thought of nothing less than the Parthians, and the soldiers, upon the assurance of the peace, were in the greatest security, the Mardian, espying the bank of a river newly broken, and the way by which they were to pass overflowed, he judged the Parthians had done it to stop the march of the Romans; and, shewing it to Antony, he advised him to prepare to receive the enemy. The Roman General presently marshalled his army, leaving between the ranks intervals for the archers and slingers to make their discharges. At the same time the Parthians appeared, not doubting but they would easily surround the Romans, and entirely destroy them: But the light-

Y. R. 717.
Bef. Chr.
35.
416 Cons.

^m Florus, l. iv. 10. and Paterc. l. ii. 82, write, that he who gave this wholesome advice to Antony was one of the Roman prisoners, who served then in the Parthian camp, and who, out of love for his countrymen, rode up to Antony's trenches in the night, and gave this warning to the officer upon guard in Latin. They do not say whether he staid with Antony: Unus ex clade Crassianâ Parthico habitu castis adequita: Et, salute latinè datâ, quum fidem ipso fecisset, quid immineret edocuit: Jam adfuturum cum omnibus copiis regem: Irent retro peterentque montes: Sic quoque hostem fortasse non desere.

Flor. Captivi cujusdam Romani consilio ac fide servatus, qui clade Crassiani exercitus captus, cum fortunam non animum mutasset, accessit nocte ad stationem Romanam, pradixitque ne destinatum iter peterent, sed diverso, sylvestrique pervaderent. Vell. Pat.

ⁿ Liso observes that Antony was really deceived by this guide, and that he turned off from his best road to take a very difficult one, where it was easy for the Parthians to annoy him. But in this opinion he is unsupported by the authority of any other writer.

Y. R. 717
Bef. Chr.
415³⁵ Conf.

armed foot charged them so briskly that they were forced to retreat ; yet they several times returned and renewed the skirmish, till the Gallic horse marched against them in a body, and treated them so roughly that they disappeared for that day. This assault taught the Roman General how to receive them on the like occasions. He made the army march in order of battle in four fronts, lining not only the rear, but likewise the flanks with archers and slingers, and giving orders to the horse to be ready to repulse the enemy, if they drew near, but not to pursue them. This method was effectual ; the Parthians followed them four days, and were constantly beat off with loss ; which made them resolve to give over the pursuit, making the ground of their departure to be the approaching winter. But, unluckily, the day before they were to march back, Flavius Gallus, one of Antony's bravest officers, requested a greater number of the light-armed foot for defence of the rear-guard, and some part of the cavalry from the wings, promising to achieve something considerable. Having obtained his desire, he set himself, contrary to orders, to chase back a body of the enemy who came forward to skirmish. The Commanders of the rear-guard sent in vain to warn him of the danger he ran of being surrounded and cut off from the rest of the army. He was deaf to their admonitions, and, eagerly pushing forward, found himself beset on all sides, and galled by showers of arrows. He was then forced to send for aid ; and the Colonels of the legions in the rear-guard and Canidius, who commanded there, instead of marching with all their force to rescue him, sent only a few cohorts to support him, and these were followed by a few more ; a method which, if it had been continued, would have occasioned the rout of the whole army. Antony himself was obliged to bring on speedily the whole van-guard : And this put an effectual stop to the attack of the enemy. The Romans lost no less than three thousand men in this engagement, and five thousand were brought off wounded : Gallus himself was pierced with four arrows and died soon after. Antony behaved on this occasion as a worthy General : He visited the wounded, and gave them unfeigned proofs of his affection ; and they in return made light of their misfortune, begging him to take care of his own life, and declaring that their wounds were all healed, while they saw him well.

The Parthians, who had before despaired of ruining the Roman army, were so encouraged by this unexpected success, that, contrary to their custom, they remained on horseback all the night, near the Roman camp, in expectation of plundering it the next morning ; not doubting but the Romans would abandon their baggage, as an impediment in their flight. But they were greatly disappointed when they saw the camp struck, every thing carried off, and the army marching in the best order : And more so when, coming on fiercely, they found a greater alacrity and ardour in the Roman soldiers to repel them than they had hitherto thereto experienced. They continued, however, their pursuit; and one day, as they galled the Romans with their arrows, the legionaries facing about, and receiving the light-armed troops into the ranks, set their knees to the ground, and, with their bucklers, formed a tortoise, upon which the Parthian arrows slid off, without doing any execution. The Parthians, not doubting but the Romans had taken that posture through weariness, came on to attack them with their pikes; but the legionaries, rising all at once, and giving a dreadful shout, flew upon them, mowed down the foremost ranks, and put the rest to flight. The Romans had the same operation to repeat for some days afterwards, which of course greatly retarded their march.

The army was now also greatly afflicted with famine; for the soldiers, employed constantly in fighting with the enemy, could not range about for provisions. The scarcity was so great, that a bushel of wheat was sold for fifty drachmas, and barley-bread for its weight in silver. The soldiers were therefore forced to live upon fruits; and we are told that they unluckily fell upon an herb which proved fatal to numbers of them. Those who eat of it lost their understanding and memory, and fell to turning and removing all the stones they met with, as if employed in some serious work; and at last died by the vomiting of pure bile. Wine, it was thought, was the only cure for this disorder, but there was none left in the camp: And, on this occasion, Dio says that many of the Roman soldiers deserted to the enemy, and that many more would have followed the example, if the Parthians had not barbarously, and in sight of the Roman army, pierced with their arrows all those who had trusted to them. Antony, seeing so many of his men falling off, and the Parthians still at his heels, often cried out, Oh the ten thousand! admiring those ten thousand, who, under the command of Xenophon, marched a much longer way, making their retreat from the plains of Babylon to the sea, and having to do with a much more powerful enemy.

The Parthians, seeing that it was impossible for them to stop the march of the Romans in the road they so steadily pursued, had again recourse to artifice. They began to take all opportunities of discoursing with their enemies, and, unbending their bows, they drew near to those who went in quest of forage; telling them, that they were satisfied with the revenge they had taken, and were now upon their return home; and indeed for two days they were followed only by a few Medes, who did not offer to molest them, but appeared to have no other view than to protect some villages in the country. Antony, tired with so long a march in so difficult a road, was much inclined to take an easier one through a plain which now presented itself, where he was told he would meet with every commodity; but a relation of Meneses, by name Mithridates, came to the camp, and desired to speak with one who could talk either the Parthian or Syrian language. Alexander, of the city of Antiach, a man whom the General could put his confidence in, was sent to the

Par-

Y. R. 717.
bcf Chr.

35.
416 Con.

Plut. Flor.
iv. 10.

Front. l. ii.
Stratag. c.
iii.

Dio, xlix.
p. 409.

Y. R. 717. Partien; who told him that Moses, in acknowledgment of the favours he had received from the Roman General, had sent him to give the army warning to be still upon their guard, and to continue their way along the mountains, where they would only encounter with the inconvenience of the want of water for one day; whereas, if they should cross the plain, the whole Partbian army being posted in ambush between the hills beyond it, Antony might meet probably with the fate of Crassus. The Partbian, after this kind warning, instantly departed. Antony sent for the Mardian guide to have his opinion: The Mardian told him, that, though there were no enemies in the plains, yet it would be difficult to find their way in a desert, and that he would meet with several difficult passes. Orders were therefore given to the soldiers to furnish themselves with water; and, because vessels were wanting, the soldiers filled their head-pieces, and some skins which they sewed together. They then set out, though it was night; and they marched 30 miles without stopping. The Partbians, upon the first intelligence of this motion, had also, contrary to their custom, set out in the night; and the next morning, by break of day, they were up with the rear-guard. The Romans, fatigued and dispirited for want of sleep, were greatly disheartened at so unexpected an event; however, they bravely defended themselves, and continued marching till they came to a river, the waters of which the Mardian guide forbade them to drink: But many of them paid no regard to his remonstrances, nor to the intreaties of their General; and the waters, though clear and cool, were yet brackish and venomous, and ulcerated their bowels as soon as they were swallowed, and provoked an intolerable thirst. A few hours march brought them however to another river, the waters of which they might drink in as great a quantity as they pleased, and in perfect safety. Here Antony designing to give his men some repose, as the soldiers were pitching their tents, Mitbridates came again, called for Alexander, and sent him to tell his General to march on with all speed till he had passed the next river, which was the boundary the Partbians had set for their pursuit, and beyond which they would not go. Antony sent the generous Partbian a present of several vessels of gold, and, following his instructions, continued the march that whole day without the least alarm: But the night was very tumultuous in the camp. Some of the soldiers agreed together to kill such as they suspected to have money, and rob them: And they plundered the baggage, and seized even on the military chest and their General's equipage, whose inlaid tables and cups set with jewels they broke in pieces and divided among them. The bustle and confusion was so great, that Antony could not imagine any thing less, than that the enemy had broken into the camp, and was ransacking the baggage. He sent for his freedman Rhamnus to run him through with his sword, as soon as he should command it; and to cut off his head, lest he should fall into the power of the enemy, or be known known when he was dead. While he and his friends were in this consternation, an account was brought him, that all the tumult proceeded from the avarice of the soldiers, who had plundered one another : And the guide at the same time assured him, that the river, which was to be the end of their toils, was now very near. About break of day, the tumult being over, and every one having fallen into his rank, the rear-guard felt again the Parthian arrow. The light-armed foot were therefore presently ordered out against the enemy, and the legionaries formed the tortoise. The Parthians, seeing them prepared to receive them, durst not approach, and the army moved on. The van-guard soon came to the banks of the wished-for river : And, at the sight of it, the Par- thians unbent their bows, praised the valour and conduct of the Ro- mans ; and one of them, we are told, raising his voice, cried to them :

Farewell, Romans, retreat now without fear : It is with good reason that fame has published your glory, and that nations acknowledge you to be their conquerors ; seeing that you have escaped the arrows of the Parthians.*

Y. R. 717.
 Bef. Chr.
 35.
 416 Con.

The Romans passed without molestation ; and, after resting themselves at leisure on the other bank, set forth on their march, not confiding too much on the words of the Parthians ; and, in six days after their last fight, they arrived on the banks of the Araxes, where they expected to meet again with the enemy in crossing a river which was both deep and rapid, but none appeared ; and the army, having passed over into Armenia, felt the same joy as if they had gained a port after a violent storm. The soldiers devoutly fell down prostrate and worshipped the land, and, rising up, embraced and wept over one another. Here many of them were less able to bear the plenty of every thing, than the hardships they had lately undergone : For, by overcharging their stomachs after faring so ill, numbers of them died of various disorders.

Antony, upon a review of his army, found that he had lost in this expedition, twenty thousand foot and four thousand horse^p, of which more than the one half died of sickness. After raising the siege of Præaspæ, he had marched three hundred miles in one and twenty days, during which time, he had fought eighteen times with the Parthians with advantage : But these victories were to no purpose ; for, not being able to pursue the enemy after he had routed them, they remained imperfect ; which makes the historians reflect on the prejudice he received from the retreat of Artabazes, the Armenian King, whose troops were armed after the manner of the Parthians, and accustomed to fight with them. The Parthians, so many times overcome, could never have rallied, if these troops had been with him to pursue the enemy.

* Idē & bene valete, Romani, meritò vos victores gentium fama loquitur, qui Partho-rum tela fugistis. Flor. iv. 10.

^p Vell. Pat. says, the fourth part of his soldiers, a third of the servants of the army, and all his baggage.

Y. R. 718. All Antony's Captains, sensible of the injury done them by the Armenian, were desirous that Antony should punish his perfidy ; but, in the
 Bef. Chr. present condition of his army, he thought it more expedient to dissem-34- ble, and defer his vengeance till another time. The properest method 417 Con. would have been to have taken up his winter quarters in Armenia, having no call any where else ; and he would have been at hand to take his revenge also upon the Partians ; but he had nothing so much in his thoughts as the meeting with Cleopatra. He led therefore his army through ice and snow in the winter season into Syria, and lost in so painful a march eight thousand more of his men^a. But the slowness with which they proceeded kept not pace with the eagerness of his desires ; and, as soon as he could with any decency, he left them, and went on before to a fortress called Leucome, upon the sea-coast, between Berytus and Sidon. There waiting for the Queen of Egypt, he gave himself up to the excesses of eating and drinking ; and would frequently, in the middle of a feast, start from table, and run to the seaside, to see whether he could not discover the vessels which were to convey to him his Cleopatra. At last she arrived, and brought with her cloaths and money for his troops. Though Antony had so little reason to be vain of his Partian expedition, he yet wrote to Rome in the style of a conqueror, disguising his losses, and magnifying his advantages ; for which he well deserved the reproaches which the flatterers of Augustus charged him with, for calling his flight a victory, and representing himself as a conqueror for having escaped out of the hands of the enemy^b. However, though they were well informed at Rome of the truth, the Roman vanity was concerned in supporting their General's accounts, and the Senate passed a decree of thanksgiving for so happy and glorious a success. Antony soon removed with Cleopatra to Alexandria.

Plut. Ant.
 Liv. Epit.
 132.

L. CORNIFICIUS, } Consuls.
 SEXTUS POMPEIUS,

Y. R. 718. Antony was no sooner arrived at Alexandria, than he received a mes-Bef. Chr. sage from Sextus Pompey, who had been obliged to quit Sicily, about the 34- time that Antony was forced to leave Partbia. The first land he made 417 Con.

^a It is probably this additional loss which makes Florus say that Antony brought back to Syria but one third of his legions. Dio, xlix. 410, says that Antony not only made no reproaches to the Armenian king, but courted him in order to get money and provisions from him ; and that, his troops not being able to continue their march in so cold a season, many of them were permitted to take up their winter quarters in Armenia. Antony, he adds, obtained this favour of the King by his fair promises ; and his real intention was in the spring to lead them back into Partbia.

^b Hanc Antonius fugam suam, quia vivus exierat, victoriam vocabat. Vell. Pat. ii. 82. Incredibili mentis recordia, ferocior aliquanto factus est, quasi vicisset qui evaserat. Florus iv. 10.

^c Sextus Pompeius, this year's Consul, was descended of a distant branch of the Pompeian family.

with the 17 vessels remaining of his powerful fleet, was the promontory of Lacinium, in the southern part of Italy, near Crotona, where he is said to have acted the pirate, and to have taken out of the temple of Juno Lacinia offerings of inestimable value. From thence he sailed successively to the islands of Corcyra, Céphalenia, and Lesbos; and his first design was to pass the winter in this last at Mitylene, and wait for Antony's return. But there, hearing by common report that Antony was defeated, he began to entertain hopes of recovering the power he had lost, and of succeeding Antony in the dominion of the East, if he was dead; or of dividing the provinces with him, if he returned in disgrace. The example of Labienus, who, with a name much less respected, had overrun all Asia, greatly heightened these hopes. He therefore took again the military robe and ensigns of command, refitted his little navy, exercised his rowers, and insisted into his service all the vagabonds that presented themselves; and a great number of his own soldiers, who were destitute of all resource, came flocking to him. The necessity he was under of defending himself against Octavius, and the desire of assisting Antony, were the pretences of his conduct. His deputies attended upon Antony, as soon as he was returned to Alexandria: And, at the same time, he privately dispatched others towards the Princes of Thrace and Pontus, and even to the King of Parthia, being resolved to retire to the Court of one of these Princes, in case Antony's answer was not favourable. Antony, who saw through his designs, had already given orders to M. Titius, who commanded in those parts, to oppose him with all his forces, at land and sea, if he pretended to make any armament; but to conduct him honourably to Alexandria, if he submitted in a peaceable manner. He therefore made no other answer to Sextus's deputies, than that the orders he had given Titius would soon discover what were the real sentiments of him who sent them. While they were earnestly pleading for their master, Pompey's envoys to the Parthian King were taken by Antony's officers, and brought to Alexandria. Sextus's deputies were greatly disturbed at this unfortunate incident, yet they offered to excuse him by observing that it was not surprising that a young man, reduced to the last extremity, and who had no security of Antony's favour, should seek a safe retreat where he could find it: But that, had he been well assured of Antony's kindness towards him, he would certainly have had recourse to no one else.

Pompey, in the mean time, had passed over into Asia, where Furnius, seeing him behave in a peaceable manner, and having no orders from Antony, gave him no trouble: But when Pompey began to raise troops, and act the independent chief, Furnius immediately invited Domitius Ahenobarbus, who commanded a body of troops in the neighbourhood, and Amyntas, King of the Galatians, to come to his assistance. It was soon found that Pompey had laid a scheme for making Domitius his prisoner,

Y. R. 718. soner, and had corrupted one of his domestics, who was to deliver him Bcf. Chr. up. This domestic of Demitius was discovered, and put to death by the 34- sentence of a Council of war, and Sextus, on his side, revenged himself 417 Con. on Theodorus, one of his freedmen, whom alone he had made privy to this plot, and whom he therefore suspected to have revealed it. This design not succeeding, he lost all hopes of deceiving Furnius, but he seized upon the town of Lampsacus, and, by bribes, engaged the citizens to declare for him; so that, seeing himself two hundred horse and three legions strong, he went and assaulted Cyzicus by sea and land, but was both ways repulsed by Antony's troops in the town, assisted by the gladiators kept there for the entertainment of the public. He therefore returned to a place called the port of the Achæans, to provide himself in corn; whither Furnius followed him, without offering to fight; and, encamping always as near him as he could with a numerous cavalry, he hindered him from foraging the country, or besieging towns. Pompey, however, had the boldness to assault his camp in front with one part of his forces, while the rest, taking a compass, were ordered to fall on behind; and, while Furnius brought all his men to the open attack, his camp was forced by those who attacked it on the opposite side, and the whole army put to the rout. All Furnius's men fled through the plains of Scammanaria, and, not being able to run very fast, because the ground was moistened by the rain, there was made a great slaughter of them: Those who saved themselves escaped into places of security, being too weak to make a stand, till such time as new recruits were come from Mysia, Propontis, and other places.
 This victory gained him great reputation, and the country people, ruined with taxes, willingly joined him; and with their assistance he took Nicea, Chalcedon, and some other less important places. But still, wanting horse, he was often distressed in going to gather in corn and forage: Wherefore, upon intelligence that a body of Italian horse were coming to Antony, which Octavia, who wintered at Athens, sent him, he dispatched some of his agents to corrupt them: But these sub-orners were seized by the commander of this body of horse, who distributed the money among his troopers.

In the beginning of spring, there arrived at Proconesus the seventy ships returned by Octavius to Antony, and, a little after, Titius brought thither from Syria sixty ships more, with a considerable army. Pompey was sensible that his ships cou'd serve him no longer; he therefore burnt them, and incorporated his rowers and sailors into his land-forces. But it was now madness to make any resistance either at land or sea; and, having disgusted his friends by his obstinacy, he saw himself abandoned by Cassius of Parma, Nasidius, Saturninus, Thermus, Antistius, and all the most considerable of his father's friends. Fan-nius, for whom he had the greatest value, and Lilo, his father-in-law, left him also; and, making their own composition, submitted to Antony.

Antony. Being thus deserted, he advanced through the midland of Bitby- nia, with a design, it was thought, of getting into Armenia. Furnius, Titius, and Amyntas, who had now joined their forces, having notice that to this intent he had quitted his camp by night, followed him, and made such haste, that they overtook him before night, and encamped separately round him, without intrenching themselves; because it was late, and their men were tired with their march. Pompey, seeing them in this posture, drew out three thousand men, and charged them in the dark so briskly, that, after killing great numbers of them, he forced most of the rest to betake themselves to flight half naked: So that, if he had fallen on with all his forces, or had but given them chace, he might have completed his victory; but he reaped no other fruit from so fair an opportunity, but the being enabled for a time to continue his march.

The enemy, having rallied, followed close at his heels, and very forely harrassed him; so that, being reduced by want of provisions, he desired a conference with Furnius, who had been his father's friend, and who was, by his dignity and merit, the most considerable of the three Commanders; and to that purpose went to the bank of a river that ran between them. He told him, that, having sent deputies to Antony, and having in the mean time no provisions, and no friends who could furnish him with any, he had been forced to do what he had done: "But, for your part, Furnius, added he, if it be by Antony's orders you make war upon me, he is ill advised, not foreseeing a war over his own head; but, if it be of your own motion, I beseech you to expect the return of my deputies, or, if you chuse it rather, I shall put myself into your hands, (for in you I can confide) provided you promise me, upon your honour, to deliver me in safety to Antony." To which Furnius answered, "that, if he had any intention of submitting to Antony, he ought in person to have gone to him at first, or have staid for his answer at Mitylene. But Pompey," continued he, "you designed war, and have done all that you could to kindle one; for why should you deny things which we certainly know? Yet, if you now repent, consider that there are three of us here who command for Antony, and do not create any jealousy among us, but deliver yourself up to Titius, who only has a commission concerning you. You may require of him the same security you do of me; for his orders are, if you obstinately hold out, to kill you; but, if you submit, to send you honourably to Antony." Pompey's pride would not allow him to deliver himself up to a man of low extraction, who owed him the greatest obligations for having preserved his life, and, by the treaty of Misenum, restored him to his country, and who yet had accepted the commission of making war upon him. He had also probably good reason to suspect Titius's honour, or even Antony's intentions, who had commissioned such a person to conduct him to Alex-

V. R. 712.
Bef. Chr.
34.
417 Conf.

Y. R. 718. Alexandria. He therefore offered himself once more to Furnius, and Bef. Chr. begged him to receive him; and, when that could not be obtained, he 417³⁴ Conf. desired that, at least, he might yield himself into Amyntas's hands.
 But, Furnius telling him that Amyntas would not do an action which would prove injurious to Titius, who had Antony's commission for this purpose, the conference ended. Antony's Lieutenants did not doubt but that Pompey, the next morning, would be forced, by the want of provisions, to yield himself to Titius; but, as soon as it was night, he caused fires to be kindled, and gave orders to the trumpets to sound at every watch of the night, according to custom; and he himself, without any noise, went out of his camp with the flower of his forces, without making any one privy to his design, which was to return to the sea, and burn Titius's fleet. And this, in all probability, he would have effected, if Scarrus had not deserted to the enemy, and given them an account of his march, and the way he took. Amyntas presently followed him, with 1500 horse, and soon overtook the fugitive, who had no cavalry with him. As soon as he appeared, all Pompey's men forsook him; and this unfortunate Commander was forced to surrender. As soon as Antony knew that he was taken, he sent an order, it was said, to have him killed; but, afterwards relenting, sent a counter order, which was carried with such expedition, that it arrived first; so Appian, p. 747. that, the order which condemned Sextus coming to hand last, Titius construed it, or chose to construe it, as the last resolution of Antony, and put it in execution. It was also reported, according to Appian, that Plancus, Governor of Syria, who had Antony's seal, gave the order; apprehending that Pompey might raise some new disturbance between Octavius and Antony, or even between Antony and the Queen of Egypt, who is said to have had a very great regard for the name of Pompey.
 But all this only proves that Antony was ashamed of the deed, and was glad by these rumours to throw the odium of it upon others. The people of Rome entertained such a detestation of Titius's ingratitude, that, when he returned to the city, and was celebrating games in Pom-pey's theatre, he was loaded with imprecations, and driven from the Circus. Thus died Sextus Pompeius, in the fortieth year of his age, after a life of perpetual warfare and danger. He owed entirely to the reputation of his father both his honours and misfortunes. He had more courage than prudence, and more ambition than art and good conduct. Chief of robbers, and afterwards of pirates: Rullic and impolite in his speech and behaviour, and, governed by his slaves and freedmen¹, he furnished ample subject of reproach to the writers, who wanted to make their court to the Triumvirs. What enabled him to

¹ Hic adolescens erat studiis rudis, sermone barbarus, impetu strenuus, manu promptus, comitacione celer, fide patri dissimillimus, libertorum suorum libertus, servorumque ser-
 va; speciosis invidens, ut pareret humillimis. Vell. Pat. 73.

hold out so long against Octavius was the desperate fortune of his followers, who were all fugitives, or men devoted to death by proscriptions, who had no resource but in their valour. The greatest blot in his life is the murder of Statius Murcus, who, after the battle of Philippi, joined him with a very considerable fleet, and whom he is said to have sacrificed to the jealousy of Menas and Mencrates, his freedmen and Admirals^a.

Octavius, on the death of Pompey, celebrated horse-races and other games in Rome, and caused the same honour to be decreed to Antony, which he had received himself after the conquest of Sicily. According to Dio, he placed his chariot before the Rostra in the Forum, and his statue in the temple of Concord, and he was allowed to feast there with his wife and family. Antony spent the year at Alexandria with Cleopatra, who was continually importuning him to add new territories to her dominions. According to Josephus, she demanded all Arabia and Judæa, and would have engaged him to kill Malchus and Herod, the Kings of these two countries. And Antony, though he did not consent to all she requested, was yet so profuse of his grants to her, that he shocked the Roman people, who loudly expressed their dissatisfaction with his conduct. This year Octavius, to keep his troops in exercise, sent them, under the command of his Lieutenants, into Illyricum, against the Dalmatii, the Japodes, the Pannonii, and other barbarous nations of those parts: And, that he might refute the suspicions entertained concerning his valour, he himself, it is said, appeared sometimes at the head of his army, and behaved very gallantly, having been twice wounded, and often in danger of his life. This war continued till he found it necessary to break with his colleague, and commence hostilities with him.

^a Statium autem Murcum, qui adventu suo classisque celeberrimæ vires ejus duplicaverat, infimulatum falsis criminationibus, quia talem virum collegam officii Menas & Mencrates fastidierunt, Pompeius in Siciliâ interfecerat. Vell. Pat. 77.

CHAP. VI.

ANTONY makes himself Master of Armenia, and puts the King in chains. His alliance with the King of the Medes. His extravagant deportment at Alexandria. He refuses to receive OCTAVIA, and orders her back to Rome. AGRIPPA's Edileship.

M. ANTONIUS II. } Consuls.
L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO, }

ANTONY was no sooner returned with his forces into Syria, than the two Monarchs of the Medes and Parthians, whom he had attacked, fell out about the division of the Roman spoils, and the King of the Medes suspected Pbraates of having a design upon his kingdom. He, therefore,

Y. R. 19. therefore, by the mediation of Polemon, King of Cilicia, and a part of
 B. Ch. Pontus, entered into a negociation with Antony and made him an offer of 415 Conf all his forces against the Parthians. Polemon, who followed Antony to ——— Alexandria, easily determined him to accept of the proffered alliance, as it would furnish him with a fair opportunity, not only of repairing his disgrace by the destruction of the Parthian empire, but of revenging himself of the perfidious Armenian. Having, therefore, made his preparations, he set out from Alexandria in the beginning of the spring of the present year, and marched his army directly towards *Armenia, and, not thinking it unlawful or dishonourable to use perfidy against the per-fidious, he sent ambassadors to Artabazes with an offer of his friendship and his alliance by the marriage of his son with a daughter of the Armenian, inviting him to come and join him. The King, conscious of his guilt, and who had entered at that time into a negociation with Oc-tavius, put no confidence in Antony's false caresses. He excused himself as well as he could, and was determined to avoid, if possible, putting himself in the hands of one whom he had so grievously offended. But Antony, by advancing toward Artaxata, the capital of Armenia, with all his forces, gave a weight to his invitation by the terror of his arms: And Dio, liz. p. Artabazes thought proper to go to the Roman camp. Antony had him in-415- stantly arrested, pretending that his view was no other, than to oblige him to lend him his treasures, which were kept in several fortresses, which the Commanders would never give up, unless it was to purchase the liberty of their King. Artabazes consented to be carried round to all these castles, and gave his orders to the several Commanders conformable to Antony's desire: But none of them obeyed; and the Grandees, seeing their Monarch in the power of the Romans, proclaimed his eldest son, Artaxias, King in his stead. Upon this Antony, quitting the mask, put, without any ceremony, the Monarch in chains; but they were of silver, to shew his great respect for the dignity of King. Thus Dio, ibid. a war was declared, but it was not of long duration. Artaxias, being en-Jos. l. i. B. tirely defeated in the first battle, fled into Parthia, leaving the king-
 c. 13. dom and all his family in the power of Antony. Such was the origin of Ant. l. xv. the troubles which shook, for a long time, Armenia, successively in-
 c. 5. vaded by two powerful empires, betwixt which it was situated, without Tacit. An. xi 3.

* Cleopatra accompanied him according to Josephus, l. xv. c. 5, as far as the Euphrates, whence, passing through Apamea and Damascus, she visited Judea, where she was magnificently received by Herod, to whom she farmed out the part of Arabia and of the country of Jericho, which had been lately given her. The same author adds, that she made him an offer of her person through incontinence, or with an insidious view to ruin him. The cautious and cir-cumspect politician, however, did not list-

ten to her solicitations, and entertained some thoughts of making away with her,
 for the ill services she had done him with Antony; but, his friends being all against such an attempt, he got rid of her as soon as he could, loading her with presents, and conducting her with great respect as far as Pelusium. Yet was he so apprehensive of her malice, that he immediately strongly fortified the castle of Messada, and stored it with arms for 12,000 men, as a place of refuge in case of need.

remain-

remaining fixed under the power of either. Antony thought he had reaped glory enough for one year by the conquest of Armenia, where, having left troops sufficient to preserve it, and confirmed his alliance with the Median monarch, he returned to Alexandria. There he entered in a triumphal car with his captives and spoils, and made an homage of them to Cleopatra. Artabazes and all his family, bound in chains of gold, were brought before the Queen, seated on a throne of gold, under an alcove of silver, surrounded by all her Court and a multitude of people. Antony's intention was, that his prisoners should prostrate themselves before her, and implore her mercy as their Sovereign: But Artabazes, though in this deplorable condition, remembered that he was the son of the great King Tigranes, and refused either to kneel to her, or give her the title of Queen; which behaviour cost him his liberty, and afterwards his life. He was sent to prison, and, after the battle of Actium, orders were given to put him to death. Nothing in all Antony's conduct gave greater offence at Rome than his triumph at Alexandria. It seemed intolerable, that a Roman General should impart such a peculiar honour to a foreign nation, and that Rome should be deprived of the glory of insulting over vanquished Kings, which, for so many years, she had enjoyed.

Y. R. 719.
Bef. Chr.
33.
418 Conf.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS II. } Consuls.
L. VOLCATIUS TULLUS,

Antony, still taken up with the chimerical project of conquering Parthia, left Alexandria in the beginning of this year, and went as far as Armenia, but he did not pass the Araxes. There he was met by the Median Monarch, and they made a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive: The Median was to furnish him with forces against Octavius, in case of a rupture between him and Antony; and Antony was to furnish his ally with forces against the Parthian. The Roman General transferred to the Median a part of Armenia; and received of him the ensigns taken two years before, when Statianus was killed and the engines destroyed; together with Jotape, his daughter, then very young, who was to be married to Alexander, his eldest son by Cleopatra, whom he had already declared King of Armenia: Yet we are told that he disposed of the lesser Armenia to Polemon, who had negotiated the alliance between him and the Median Monarch.

Y. R. 720.
Bef. Chr.
32.
419 Conf.
Dio, lib.
xlix. 417,
418.

Octavia had resided in Rome ever since Antony's first expedition into Parthia, and had not found an opportunity of joining him. Alexandria, or its neighbourhood, was not a proper place; but seeing him about to set out a second time against the Parthians, she obtained leave of her brother to go and visit him. Octavius consented, as most authors agree, with a view of making Antony more odious by the ill usage he well knew his sister would meet with from him. As soon as she arrived at Athens, she received letters from Antony, ordering her not to proceed any further; alledging, for his excuse, the war he was preparing to carry into ^{V.R. 722.} Partbia. Upon receiving this message, she sent, by Niger, a friend of ^{1. of Chr.} Antony's, a letter to acquaint him, that she had brought with her two ^{32.}

⁴¹⁹ Conf. thousand choice men well armed, with cloaths for his troops and presents for the chief officers of his army : And she desired to know how she must dispose of them. Cleopatra, upon the first account of Octavia's leaving Rome, had made use of every artifice to prevent her meeting with Antony. She lost her stomach, fell sick, and was continually in tears : And her creatures were very eloquent in exaggerating to Antony her anguish, and the imminent danger she was in. They represented to him that his marriage with Octavia was a political alliance on account of her brother, and that she enjoyed by it the name and honour of his spouse ; whereas Cleopatra, the Queen of so great a kingdom, did not disdain to pass for his mistress, provided she could have the happiness of enjoying his presence ; but, deprived of that, her death was inevitable ; so ardent was her love to him. Antony could not consent to kill Cleopatra, and the answer to Octavia was to send him what she had brought, and return to Rome. He was then in Syria, and he hurried away to the interview with the King of Media, and, after making the agreement with him just mentioned, he returned to Alexandria.

Here he abandoned himself to all the extravagancies imaginable : While Octavia at Rome continued to behave with the greatest dignity ; bestowing the greatest marks of affection on his children by Fulvia, and testifying the greatest regard for all his friends. He assembled the people of Alexandria in the Gymnasium, where there was raised an alcove of silver, under which were placed two thrones of gold, one for himself and the other for Cleopatra. There Antony, dressed like *Bacchus, and Cleopatra, like Isis, were seated ; and, in the presence of all the people, he declared her his lawful wife, and Queen of Egypt, Libya, Cyprus, and Celo-Syria, associating with her Cæsario, whom he styled the true and lawful son of Julius Cæsar. To the children he had by her he gave the title of Kings of Kings ; and, for their dominions, to Alexander, the eldest, he allotted Armenia, Media, and Partbia, which he pretended he would conquer in a little time : To Ptolemy, the younger, Phœnicia, Upper Syria, and Cilicia : And immediately the two boys were produced, clothed in the royal robes of their respective kingdoms ; Alexander, in a Medish dress, with a Tiara on his head ; and Ptolemy, with the robes which were worn by the successors of Alexander, the slippers, military coat, and cap covered with a diadem. In this pompous dress they paid their respects to Antony and Cleopatra ; after which they took their seats at their feet, being each attended with a guard, the one of Armenians, and the other of Macedonians. This ridiculous scene was followed by the most extravagant luxury. Antony suffered himself to be carried away with new pleasures and delights by Cleopatra, and the delicacy and profuseness of their entertainments still daily increased, till, at last, the Queen promised him, upon a wager, to give him one to the value of ten millions of sesterces. On this occasion a golden cup was served up, we are told, with a very strong dissolving liquor, in which Cleopatra put one of her pendants, which was a pearl of inestimable value, and immediately drank it off. Plancus, who was to judge of the wager, immediately secured the other pendant, which she was then taking off, giving it as his judgment, that she had already won the wager. The remaining pearl, after the death of Cleopatra, came into the hands of Cæsar, who caused it to be cut asunder, and made into two pendants for the image of Venus, which he thought gloriously adorned with the one half of this prodigal Queen's supper.

* Crescente indies & amoris in Cleopatram incendio, et vitiorum, quæ semper facultatibus licentiaque et assentationibus augeatur, magnitudine, bellum Patrie inferre statuit : Cum ante novum se Liberum patrem

appellari jussisset, cum redimitus hederis, coronâque velatus aureâ, et thyrsum tenens, cothurnisque succinctus, curru velut Liber pater vestitus esset Alexandriz. Vell. Pat. ii. 82.

While Antony was thus degrading and bringing himself into general contempt, Octavius's administration gained him the respect and esteem of all orders of men. His arms were employed against the enemies of the State, and, out of their spoils, he adorned Rome. It was at this time he built a magnificent portico, to which he gave the name of his sister Octavia, and where he placed afterwards a numerous library. No year in the Roman annals was more famous for all the arts of peace. Agrippa, though he had been honoured with the consulship, did not think it a disgrace to accept the edileship, an office which of late was fallen into great discredit, as it required great expences, and was no longer a step to the greater magistracies, by the favour of the people, which it procured. He repaired the ancient aqueducts almost fallen to ruin, and made a new one, which he called the Julian, fifteen miles long. For the more commodious distribution of these waters, he made seven hundred water-places, one hundred and five fountains, and one hundred and thirty reservoirs. All these works were richly ornamented with three hundred statues of marble or brass, and four hundred marble columns. He adorned also the Circus with statues of dolphins, and what they called eggs, being large masses formed in the shape of an egg, and placed upon the pillars next the end of the Circus, round which the chariots were to turn. Such was Agrippa's passion for embellishing Rome, that he was desirous to draw all the statues and pictures out of private houses and gardens to dedicate them to public use. He pronounced a speech upon the subject, which was still extant in the time of Pliny[†], and which, that author says, was worthy of the first citizen of the Republic.

The common sewers, that stupendous work of the two Tarquins, had been greatly neglected. These, of consequence, were filled up with [†] Exstat ejus oratio magnifica & maximo civium digna de tabulis omnibus signisque publicandis ; quod fieri satius fuisset, quam in villarum exilia pelli. Plin. xxxv. 4.

Y. R. 720. rubbish and choked up in several places. Agrippa made such a large Bef. Chr. collection of water, that it formed, as it were, seven torrents, which,
 32. being let in by the opening of the sewers, and running with rapidity,
 419 Conf. carried away all the dirt and filth; and, after this operation, he embarked himself upon the sewers which had been thus cleansed, and, by a subterraneous navigation, went from their entry to their opening in the Tiber. These great expences did not hinder him from entertaining the people in the most magnificent manner. Shews of all kinds, plays, combats of gladiators, courses in the Circus, and the Trojan game, were exhibited for fifty-nine days; during which time provisions were often distributed to the people, and a kind of lottery-tickets were thrown into the theatre, and those who brought them to him received their contents, which consisted of money, stuffs, and other moveables. An hundred and seventy baths were also kept open for the citizens, and served at his expence, during the whole year.

Thus Agrippa was no less serviceable to his Master by gaining over to him the affections of the Romans, and making them taste the long-interrupted sweets of peace, than by his military exploits.

C H A P. VII.

The rupture between ANTONY and OCTAVIUS: Their preparations for war. The decisive battle of Actium. ANTONY's land-forces submit with reluctance, and all the Kings and Provinces pay obeisance to the Conqueror. ANTONY's last efforts. His death: That of CLEOPATRA: And the settlement of the empire on OCTAVIUS.

CN. DOMITIUS AHENOBARBUS, } Consuls.
 C. SOSIUS,

Y. R. 721. THESE two Consuls were Antony's friends, and Dio assures us, Bef. Chr. that he did not scruple to send to them from Alexandria, an ac-
 31. count of his late distribution of kingdoms and provinces in favour of 420 Conf. Cleopatra and her children, to have it confirmed by the Senate: But it is hard to believe that he could expose himself in this manner, and, if he did it, he could not mean it otherwise than as a public insult upon Octavius and a declaration of war. The same historian says, that, though the Consuls were wise enough not to produce his letters, yet they had the boldness to harangue the Senate against Octavius, in his absence; and that Sosius, the fiercest of the two, would have proceeded to a decree against his interest, if he had not been stopped by the Tribune Balbus. Octavius, informed of this attack upon him, returned to the city, and appeared in the first assembly of the Senate, attended by a great number of his friends, armed with poniards under their robes. He took his seat between the two Consuls, and began by an open declaration of his his conduct, and an artful apology for what was objected to it. Then he bitterly inveighed against Antony and Sofius, pretending that he could convict them of several attempts against the Republic, as well as against himself. He was heard with attention, but without the least mark of approbation; and yet this Senate was almost entirely formed by himself; he had endeavoured by every method to recommend himself to it and it was entirely in his power. Observing that his speech had not the success he expected, he appointed another meeting, in which he promised to read such pieces as would put Antony's designs in their full and proper light.

Y. R. 721.
Bef. Chr.
31.
420 Cont.

The Consuls did not think proper to wait for that day: They privately left Rome to join Antony, attended by several of the Senators; and, Octavius having declared that all Antony's relations and friends were at liberty to follow the example, all those in his interest left Italy. Pellio, who had hitherto acted as a friend to Antony, and was esteemed of his party, staid behind; but refused to join Octavius in any measures against his General: And, when pressed to it by Octavius, he answered: The services I have done to Antony are greater than the favours I have received from him; but these are better known. I will therefore remain neuter, and become the prey of the Conqueror.

The two Chiefs kept now no longer any measures with one another. Octavius, provoked at the outrageous treatment of his sister, made a report to the Senate of all Antony's scandalous behaviour. He said, that he was become a slave to a foreign Queen, and had sacrificed to her the provinces of the Empire, and that he had dishonoured the Roman name by his faithless and cruel treatment of the King of Armenia and his whole family: He reproached him also with the death of Sextus Pompey, and, in fine, he grievously complained of the affront offered by Antony's unjust and indecent behaviour towards his sister, and by his acknowledging Cleopatra's son Cæsario for the lawful son of *Julius Cæsar. Antony, on his side, sent a bill of divorce immediately to Octavia, ordered her to leave his house in Rome, and, in his letters to Octavius, declared that he had been married to Cleopatra these nine years, and, consequently, that his children by her were his lawful children: And that Cæsario had been owned by Cæsar, which Matius and Oppius could attest. In answer to what Octavius had spoken and written against Antony's love for Cleopatra, and the prodigality of his feasts, he reproached him with the famous feast where he and his guests represented so many deities; with his preposterous match with Livia, his infamous divorce of Scribonia, and with the indecent familiarity in which he lived with several Roman Ladies: He even proceeded to attack Octavius's birth, his honour, and personal conduct, accusing him of cowardice in the battles of Mutina

* Some historians tell us, that Cæsario was acknowledged as the son of Julius Cæsar by the three Triumvirs; a fact, which is in itself utterly improbable, and which is disproved by this complaint of Octavius.

Y. R. 711. and Philippi. In fine, he sent formal complaints to the Senate, that Octavius had, contrary to all right, put himself in possession of all Sicily,
 B. 7. Ch. 41. and the provinces governed by Lepidus, whom he had unjustly and barbarously deposed: That he had not sent him back the whole number of ships lent him for his expedition against Pompey: And that he had parcelled out all Italy to his own soldiers, without giving Antony's their proper share: And, in some of these public letters, in order to regain the affections of the people, he declared his resolution to abdicate the triumvirship, as a magistracy too powerful and absolute in a republican State. Octavius answered that he was ready to do the same, and invited Antony to Rome to make good his word: And, as to the other articles, he made answer: "That Lepidus's conduct had obliged him to remove
 " him; that Antony should have a share in Sicily and Africa, when Antony
 " had shared with him Armenia; and, as for Antony's soldiers, that it " was not likely they would value a few pitiful lands in Italy, after they " had conquered all Media and the empire of the Partians, in following their brave Commander." Antony was so enraged at this jeer, that he ordered Canidius, to whom he had given the command of his land-forces, to march, without intermission, with sixteen legions, to Ephesus, which he appointed the general rendezvous of all his forces: And thither he soon repaired with Cleopatra. Here they were met by their friends, who had left Italy to join them. Domitius was very earnest to engage him to send Cleopatra back to Egypt, till the war was ended; and Antony was inclined to follow this wholesome advice; but she, fearing lest Octavia should take advantage of her absence, and make her peace, by large presents gained Canidius to represent to Antony the many inconveniencies her departure would occasion; particularly the depriving him of the assistance of the Egyptians, who made a great part of his navy. This Queen is said to have brought with her two hundred vessels with 20,000 talents, and provisions for all his forces. These counsels and her own cunning insinuations prevailed, and Antony consented to her stay. Left he should, however, be tempted again to give ear to Domitius and his true friends, she carried him over into the island of Samos, where, while the preparations were going on at Ephesus, she plunged him into all the pleasures and diversions that could be invented. Never, says Plutarch, were any man's cares so pleasantly divided as Antony's. On one side all the Kings, Princes, and Potentates from Egypt to the Euxine sea, and from Armenia and Illyricum, had orders to send arms, provisions, and soldiers to Ephesus; on the other all the comedians, dancers, musicians, and buffoons were obliged to repair to Samos: And, while the whole universe was in commotion, and many parts of it in great misery and desolation, joy and all kind of pleasure reigned in this island. Every city of Antony's empire had a share in his sacrifices, and the Kings who accompanied him contended who should make the noblest entertainment, so that it gave occasion to one to ask, "What rejoicings will
 " those

“ those people make for a victory, who make such magnificent treats “ before a dangerous war.”

From Samos, Antony and Cleopatra crossed over to Athens, where the Queen, amidst the usual amusements, was intent upon another object. She was jealous of the honours which Octavia had received in that city, and, by flattering that vain people, obtained a decree comprehending all kinds of honours, beyond what had been offered to any mortal: And Antony, in quality of a citizen of Athens, was at the head of the deputation, and pronounced the speech, in the name of the city, on this occasion. Some authors tell us, that Antony meant this compliment as a solemn reparation for the injury he had done her in that city, by honouring Octavia as his lawful spouse.

Thus the whole year was spent, on Antony's side, between vain amusements and preparations for war, when, if he had carried over his forces immediately, he would have found his enemy very little prepared to receive him. Octavius found himself under the necessity of laying heavy taxes on the people of Italy. The citizens paid him a fourth part of their revenue, and the freedmen an eighth. This, with the dread of Antony's arrival with the formidable forces he had gathered, put them in a very ill humour, and he was often obliged to make use of his soldiers to get the money into his coffers: But Antony gave him time to quiet all disturbances, and to inspire them with a thorough contempt for a man, who was more taken up in filling the theatres of Samos with fiddlers and pipers, than in carrying on his military operations.

Antony began now to be despised by his own party. Plancus, the constant companion of his debauches and the servile flatterer of the Queen, deserted him at this time, with his nephew Titius, the same who had taken Pompey and put him to death*. These deserters, to recommend themselves to their new master, told all they knew of Antony's enormities, and, amongst other things, acquainted him with the contents of Antony's will. This will was deposited in the hands of the Vestals, who were forced to give it up; and Octavius made no scruple of reading it in the Senate, and publishing the contents among the people. Antony therein confirmed the declaration he had already made concerning Cæ-

* The virulence, with which Paterculus has treated Plancus's character, betrays him to have been his personal enemy:

Inter hunc apparatus belli, Plancus non iudicio rectè legendi, neque amore Reipublicæ, aut Cæsaris (quippe hæc semper impugnabat) sed morbo proditor, cum fuisset humillimus assentator Reginæ, et infra servos cliens; cum Antonii librarius, cum obscenissimarum rerum et auctor et minister, cum in omnia et omnibus venalis; cum cæruleatus et nudus, caputque redimitus arundine, et caudam trahens, genibus innixus

Glaucum saltasset in convivio; refrigeratus ab Antonio, ob manifestarum rapinarum indicia, transfugit ad Cæsarem: Et idem postea clementiam victoris pro sua virtute interpretabatur, discitans id probatum à Cæsare, cui ille ignoverat: Hunc mox avunculum Titius imitatus est. Haud absurde Copinius, vir prætorius, gravissimus, P. Siliî fœcer, cum recens transfuga multa ac nefanda Plancus absenti Antonio in Senatu objiceret: Multa inquit, mehercule fecit Antonius, pridie quam tu illum relinqueres. L. ii. 83.

Varro 2:

Y. R. 721. scario: He bequeathed immense legacies to his children by Cleopatra, and
 B. 1. Chr. ordered, "that, in case he died in Rome, his body, after the usual ce-
 51. remonies, should be transported to Alexandria and delivered to Cleo- 423 Conf. patra, by whom he desired to be buried." To this a report was added, "that Antony designed to give Rome to Cleopatra, and to transfer the seat of the Empire to Alexandria."

Antony's friends in Italy, sensible how much the interest of the whole party was hurt by Cleopatra, made a last effort to recall their Chief to a sense of honour, and engage him to act a more prudent part. Geminus, one of his zealous partisans, was sent upon this errand; but Cleopatra, suspecting that she was the object of his mission, affronted him upon all occasions. However, Geminus bore with all, waiting an audience of Antony, till, at last, being called upon in the middle of a feast to explain himself, he answered, "The affairs I came to treat about are not of a nature to be debated at table: But one thing there is that every body must be sensible of, whether merry or sober, which is, that affairs would go very well, if Cleopatra returned to Egypt." Antony's passion rose, but the Queen answered, very calmly, "You have done right, Geminus, to speak your secret without being put to the torture." Geminus made his escape as soon as possible, and was followed by many more, who could bear no longer the imperious demeanor of the Queen, and the insolence of her favourites^b. Rome rung with complaints against Antony: A slave to Cleopatra, he appeared to have no other will, than that of his Queen, who had the assurance to promise herself the Empire of Rome, and, when she would confirm any thing by oath, used to swear by the laws she would dictate in the Capitol^c. She had already a Roman guard, and her name was engraved upon the bucklers of the soldiers. But Antony himself seemed to have forgot that he was a Roman: He would often appear cloathed in the manner of the Eastern Princes, all glittering with purple and precious stones, a Median sabre by his side, a golden sceptre in his hand, and a diadem upon his head, and, thus accoutred, set himself upon a throne of gold^d. His tent in the camp was no longer called prætorium, but the royal pavilion: And in the same manner as Cleopatra assumed all the attributes of the god-

^b ——— Capitolio
 Regina dementes ruinas,
 Funus et imperio parabat,
 Contaminato cum grege turpium
 Morbo virorum; quidlibet impotens
 Sperare, fortunæque duci
 Ebria. ——— Hor. l. i. od. 37.
^c Romanique ducis conjux Ægyptia tædæ Non bene sibi cadet; frustra erit illa mi-nata
 Servitara suo Capitolia nostra Canopo.
Ov. Met. l. xv.

^d Hæc mulier Ægyptia, ab ebrio impe-ratore, pretium libidinum Romanum Impe-rium petit: Et promisit Antonius. Igitur dominationem parare nec tacite; sed Patriæ, nominis, togæ, fascium oblitus, totus in monstrum illud ut mente, ita animo quoque et cultu desciverat. Aureum in manu baculum; ad latus acinaces; purpurea vestis in-gentibus obstricta gemmis; diadema aderat, ut Regina rex ipse frueretur. Flor. lib. iv.
 c. 11.

dels Isis in her pictures and statues, so Antony caused himself to be represented in brass and marble, or in painting with the symbols of Osiris.

Y. R. 721.
Bef. Chr.
31.
420 Conf.

Octavius was very industrious in bringing the Roman people and soldiers acquainted with these follies; and a decree passed to deprive Antony of the consulship which he was to hold the following year with Octavius, as also of the triumviral power; and war was declared, not against him, but against Cleopatra. The decree was so framed, that it left his partisans the liberty of saving themselves by abandoning their General, and made him more contemptible than if he and his adherents had been declared enemies to the Commonwealth. Octavius affected to say, "that Antony was no more himself, since Cleopatra, by her philtres, "had taken away the use of his reason: So that he was not to be esteemed as a person engaged in this war, which was only managed by " Mardion, her eunuch; and Iras and Charmion, her women." All Antony's followers were invited over with promises of rewards: And all Italy engaged itself by oath to serve Octavius. The city of Bologna alone asked and obtained liberty not to join in this oath, having been always under the patronage of the Antonian family.

The forces of the two Generals were now got together, and they were proportioned to the empire they contended for; one drawing all the East, and the other the West to his party. The ancient writers tell us, that Antony's army was composed of 100,000 foot and 12,000 horse, besides the auxiliary troops sent by the Kings in his alliance. Bogud, King of a part of Libya, Tarcondimotus, King of the higher Cilicia, Archelaus, King of Cappadocia, Philadelphus, King of Paphlagonia, Mitbridates, of Commagena, and Amyntas, of Galatia, served in person in his army: And the King of the Medes, Malchus of Arabia, and Polemon of Pontus, sent him their contingents. His fleet amounted to 500 vessels, a great many of which had from eight to ten rows of oars. Octavius had 80,000 legionary troops with cavalry equal to that of Antony: But his fleet did not exceed 250 vessels, and they were much smaller than those of Antony, but better built and better manned with sailors and rowers, who had learned their business in the war against Pompey; whereas those of Antony were half empty, and their sailors and rowers, being most of them forced into the service, had never seen the sea.

Antony sailed, with his whole force, to Corcyra, in the autumn of this year; but, being informed that the enemy's vessels appeared upon the

* Hinc Augustus agens Italos in prælia
Cæsar,
Cum Patribus, Populoque, Penatibus et magnis Dis.
Hinc ope barbarica, variisque Antonius armis.
Victor ab Auroræ populis et litore rubro,

Ægyptum viresque Orientis et ultima secum Bactra trahit; sequiturque nefas! Ægyptia conjux. Virg. Æn. l. 8.

* Antony having recalled the troops he had lent this Monarch, the Parthians took the opportunity to make themselves masters of Media; and Armenia was likewise lost.

Y. R. 721. neighbouring coast, he supposed that Octavius's whole fleet was at sea, and
 B. of Chr. retired towards Peloponnesus. There he put his troops into winter-quar-31.
 420 Cons. ters, and spent that season himself at *Patrae*².

C. JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS III. } Consuls.
 M. VALERIUS MESSALA CORVINUS. }

Y. R. 722. The two Generals were now in readiness for action. Antony brought
 B. of Chr. his fleet into the gulph of Ambracia, and Octavius assembled all his forces 30.
 421 Cons. at Brundisium and the neighbouring ports. We are told, that Octavius
 Gulph of wrote to his competitor, that, if he would approach at the head of his ar- Arta. my, he should have ports in Italy to land in without molestation; and he would draw his troops so far from the sea, that he should want no room for en-camping, and putting his men in battalia. To make a return to this bravado, Antony challenged Octavius to fight a single combat, or, if he pleased,

² Atticus died under the present consulship at the age of seventy-seven. He had been attacked with a fistula, for which finding no cure, he came to a resolution of starving himself to death: And though, after abstaining for two days, the fever left him, and he found himself better, yet he remained obstinate in his purpose, and was deaf to the entreaties of his relations and friends. He died altogether in character, as a true Epictetan, voluntarily sacrificing the remains of a languishing life, to purchase a deliverance from pain, which he deemed the sovereign evil. The difficulty of the times in which he lived, and the perpetual quiet he enjoyed in them, shewed that he was a perfect master of the principles of his sect, and knew how to secure that chief good of an Epicurean life, his private ease and safety. One would naturally imagine, that his union with Cicero and Brutus, added to the fame of his wealth, would have involved him of course in the ruin of the proscription. But, as if he had foreseen such an event and turn of things, he had always paid a particular court to Antony; and, in the time even of his disgrace when he was driven out of Italy and his affairs thought desperate, he did many eminent services to Antony's friends, and particularly to his wife and children. It must be likewise imputed to the same principle of Atticus's caution and regard to his safety, that, after so long and intimate a correspondence of letters with Cicero, on the most important transactions of that age, of which there are sixteen books of Cicero's still remaining, yet not a single letter of Atticus's was ever published: Which can hardly be charged to any other cause, but his having withdrawn them from Tiro, after Cicero's death, and suppressed them with a singular care; lest, in that revolution of affairs, they should be produced to his hurt, or the diminution of his credit with their new masters. But his interest with the reigning powers was soon established upon a more solid foundation than that of his personal merit, by the marriage of his only daughter with M. Agrippa; which was first proposed and brought about by Antony. This introduced him into the friendship and familiarity of Octavius, whose minister and favourite Agrippa was; and Vipsania Agrippina, born of this marriage, when scarcely a year old, being promised to Tiberius, son-in-law to Octavius, and his successor, he became allied to the reigning family; and dignity was added to his quiet. It appears, that he was born with very good natural parts, which he cultivated to his old-age by perpetual study, and was particularly very learned in the Roman history, which gave him an occasion of obliging many families by making out their genealogies. He never formed any pretensions to the honours of the State, and made therefore no enemies, but, with great address and assiduity courted the favour of all the great men, however opposite were their views and interests; and he had the success which every man of parts will have; who, with such a pliant disposition, and so much moderation, joins the splendor of an affluent fortune. Such a one is in nobody's way, and is necessarily looked on by all as an useful acquaintance.

he would give him battle in the plains of Pharsalia, where Cæsar and Pompey had decided their differences. As soon as the fair season came on, Agrippa was detached, at the head of a numerous fleet, to reconnoitre the enemy and distress them. He made descents on the coasts of Greece, took by force Methona, a considerable town of Peloponnesus, defended by a good garrison; killed Bogud, King of Mauritania, and seized a large convoy of provisions coming from Syria and Egypt. At his return, Octavius carried over his whole army, and landed them at the Ceraunian mountains, whence they were ordered to march along the coast as far as the gulph of Ambracia. He then sailed at the head of his fleet to the promontory of Ælium, where he was very near surprising Antony, whose fleet lay there at anchor, but was in no state of defence. Antony, however, put his ships into a fighting posture, and, to deceive his enemy, armed all his rowers, suspending the oars in such a manner, as to make their blades appear on each side of the ship. Octavius durst not engage him in that narrow passage, and stood off to sea. The two armies were now encamped on each side of the gulph, and, for several months, while they remained in this posture, had several skirmishes.

In the mean time, Agrippa, at the head of a part of the fleet, took Tiry-na, Patræ, Leucas, and Corinth, to the great astonishment of Antony's army; which success caused many desertions. Amyntas, Dejotarus, and Domitius Abenobarbus went over to Octavius^b. To the latter of these Antony generously sent all his servants and equipage, which so sensibly touched Domitius, who was already sick, that he died partly of grief and vexation. These desertions are said to have greatly soured his temper, and to have made him so suspicious and cruel, that he began to distrust Cleopatra herself, and would eat nothing without a taster. Cleopatra ridiculed his precautions: And, to convince him how useless all his care was, she poisoned the flowers of a garland which adorned her head, and, when the company was full of mirth and gaiety, she proposed to steep them in wine and to drink them. Antony instantly snatched from her the garland, threw the flowers into his cup, and was just going to drink, when the Queen stopped his hand, telling him that now it was evident he could have no guard against her address, were not her heart interested in his preservation. He thus perceived how useless it was to guard against cas oppugnata, Patræ captæ, Corinthus occupata bis ante ultimum discrimen classis hostium superata. Rex Amyntas meliora et utiliora secutus; nam Dellius exempli sui tenax fuit et illo bello; virque clarissimus Cn. Domitius qui solus Antoniarum partium nunquam Reginam nisi nomine salutavit, maximo et præcipiti periculo transmisit ad Cæsarem. Vell. Pat. ii. 84.

^b Longè antequam dimicaretur, exploratissima Julianarum partium fuit victoria. Vigebat in hac parte miles atque Imperator; illa marcebant omnia: Hinc remiges firmissimi; illinc inopiâ affectissimi: Navium hic magnitudo modica, cum celeritate; adversa illa, specie terribilior: Hinc ad Antonium nemo, illinc ad Cæsarem quotidie aliqui transfugiebant. Denique in ore atque oculis Antonianæ classis per Agrippam Leu-

Y. R. 711. the arts of a woman, who could so skilfully mingle the inevitable snares
 Bet. C. 11. of death among her pleasures.

50.
 422 Conf. The summer was now spent, and nothing decisive was done. The grand question in Antony's camp was, whether to trust all to a naval or land battle? Canidius, who commanded his legions, represented to him in the strongest manner, that it would be contrary to all reason to put a victory to the hazard of the seas and winds, which they were certain of at land, by the valour and experience of their General, who to that day had kept up the title of invincible; and by the bravery of their soldiers, who had been tried in so many great dangers: That it would be no dishonour for him to leave the sea to CÆSAR, whose officers and soldiers, in so long and desperate a war with S. POMPEY, had become skilful in sea-affairs. He also proposed, that CLEOPATRA should go back to Egypt, whilst ANTONY marched into Macedonia, where he might determine the quarrel by a general battle, and where he would receive a powerful assistance from DICOMES, King of the Getæ. Antony was much inclined to follow this advice; but Cleopatra biassed him the other way, and obliged him, against his will, to hazard his empire and life in a sea-fight, and this only that, in case of a defeat, she might escape with the greater ease¹. Dio pretends that she even advised him to march back all his troops to Egypt.

Antony, having taken this resolution to fight by sea, picked out of his numerous fleet one hundred and seventy of his best ships, which was all he could well man, and burnt the rest. These, with Cleopatra's sixty galleys, made two hundred and thirty; but, as they were larger and higher than the enemy's, he reckoned that advantage would infallibly give him the victory. He put on board these ships twenty thousand legionary soldiers and two thousand archers. While he was thus embarking his troops, a brave old soldier, all covered with scars, spoke to him aloud, My General, why do you despise this good sword and this old arm, which all my wounds have not weakened; and put your confidence in a frail army, shew that Octavius's officers and soldiers were as active and enterprising as Antony's were dejected and spiritless. Now, in case of a defeat at land, Antony would have found great difficulty to escape; his fleet, locked up in the gulph of Ambracia, was lost. Whereas, in a sea-fight, which he took care to begin but late in the day, he had an opportunity of making off to Egypt, where he had a sure retreat, and an army in the neighbourhood, with which he hoped, if not to retrieve his affairs, at least to make a stand, and, perhaps, some composition with his rival. He seems likewise, it may be observed, to have despaired, from the beginning, of bringing off his land army, in case of bad success at sea.

¹ If Octavius had great advantages over Antony in a sea-fight, I cannot think that he had less at land; and, certainly, the fatal consequences of a defeat at land were more immediate, than one at sea. The legions Antony carried over into the East were greatly diminished by his losses in the Parthian expedition, and they had lived the rest of the time at ease in a luxurious country: Whereas Octavius was really the General of the veterans, and could command as many as he saw necessary, or was able to maintain; he had kept them under continual duty, and inured his new levies to war in his expeditions against the people of Dalmatia and Illyria. The several towns taken by Agrippa, as it were in the sight of Antony's

piece of wood. Leave the water to the Egyptians and Phœnicians, people born and nursed up in that element; but leave us Romans to the firm land, where we may boldly meet death, and fall like men. Antony answered nothing; only by the motion of his head he seemed to encourage him, though he himself was not well satisfied; for, when his officers proposed taking away the sails, he opposed it, alledging, that he would have none of the enemy escape. Octavius, on his side, was very sensible of the advantage his enemy gave him by offering battle at sea, and prepared every thing for it. But, notwithstanding that the two Generals were ready to engage, a violent storm prevented them for four days. On the fifth, which was the 2d of September^k, the two fleets advanced towards each other.

Antony ranged his before the mouth of the gulph of Ambracia, giving the command of the right wing to Gellius Publicola, the left to Sosius, and of the center to M. Octavius and M. Jussius. He reserved to himself the general inspection of all, and, before the engagement, he, in his galley, went about encouraging his men with the remembrance of the many victories they had gained under his conduct, telling them, that the largeness of their vessels gave them an opportunity of fighting as firmly and with as much assurance as on dry land; and that this day, as he expected the empire of the world from their valour, so they might expect rewards answerable to so noble a conquest. Octavius gave the command of his fleet to Agrippa, who had under him in the right M. Lurius, and L. Arruntius in the left. The Consul Messala probably commanded the center. As to Octavius himself, he kept no particular command, but, surrounded by a number of little boats to carry his orders, superintended the whole. The two land-armies, drawn up on the two sides of the gulph, were simple spectators of the battle, and encouraged their friends; the one was commanded by Canidius, the other by Statilius Taurus. Antony had recommended to his officers to keep as near the shore as possible, and to consider their vessels as so many citadels designed to sustain the assault of a number of besiegers: And they staid in this situation till noon; Octavius, keeping at a mile's distance, being sensible that, while the enemy's fleet was in that position, he could avail himself but very little of the nimbleness of his ships, and the skill of his mariners, which were his chief advantages. About noon, a gale springing up, Antony's left wing, impatient to begin the battle, moved forwards; and Octavius, to draw them farther from the shore, made his right wing fall still farther back. The battle began on both sides with great courage and bravery, and so continued for a long time, till, Agrippa stretching out his left wing in order to surround the enemy, Publicola, who commanded Antony's right wing, was obliged to do the same; and, in spreading out his vessels, he was separated ^k The beginning of Octavius's reign was reckoned from this date by many authors. Vid. Scal. de Emend. temp. p. 453. and Petav. Deß. temp. l. x. c. 66.

gradually

Y. R. 722. gradually from the center, which began to be put in disorder. The Bet Chr. advantage was not determined on either side, according to all the an-421 Conf. cient historians, when Cleopatra, wearied with expectation and overcome with fear, unexpectedly tacked about, and fled towards Peloponnesus with her sixty sail: And, what is still more surprising, Antony himself, now regardless of his honour, fled precipitately after, and abandoned his men who so generously exposed their lives for his interest.
 Having reached Cleopatra's galley, he went into it, and sat a long time in a melancholy posture, without desiring to see the Queen, though he had followed her, says Plutarch, without any apparent reason but the thoughts of her absence.

The battle, notwithstanding, continued with great obstinacy till five in the evening, when Antony's forces were partly constrained to submit by the great conduct of Agrippa, and partly persuaded by the obliging promises of Octavius ¹.

The Conqueror's first care was to send away Mecenas with a squadron in pursuit of Antony and Cleopatra; but they had got so much the advantage of him, that he soon returned from the chase ², and was then dispatched to Rome to keep all quiet in Italy, in quality of Prefect.
Antony's land-army could not be persuaded, at first, that they were abandoned by their General, and were in expectation of seeing him every moment. In this confidence they held out seven days, paying no regard to Octavius's solicitations, and began to march towards Asia through Macedonia, till, at last, being deserted by the allies, who marched home, and also by their Commander Canidius, and by many of their chief officers, they yielded to necessity, and accepted the conditions of-

¹ Ubi initum certamen est omnia in altera parte fuere, Dux, remiges, milites; in altera nihil præter milites: prima occupat fugam Cleopatra. Antonius fugientis Re-giræ, quam pugnantis militis sui, comes esse maluit. Et Imperator qui in desertores sævire debuerat, desertor exercitus sui factus est. Illis etiam detracto capite in longum fortissimè pugnandi duravit constantia;
 et desperatâ victoriâ, in mortem dimicaba-
 tur. Cæsar, quos ferro poterat interimere, verbis mulcere cupiens, clamitansque, et ostendens fugiße Antonium, quærebat pro quo et cum quo pugnarent? At illi, cum diu pro absente dimicavissent duce, ægrè summissis armis cessere victoriam: citiusque vitam velantque Cæsar promissit, quam illis, ut ea precarentur, persuasum est. Fuitque in consensu, milites optimi Imperatoris, Imperatorem segacißimi militis functum officio:
 Ut dubites suone, an Cleopatræ arbitrio victoriam temperaturus fuerat, qui ad ejus arbitrium direxit fugam. Idem locutus in terra fecit exercitus cum se Canidius præcipiti fuga rapuisset ad Antonium. Vell. Pat.

 ii. 85.

If the battle did not begin till noon and all was over at five; and if Antony's ships fought a long time after his flight; then Cleopatra's expectation was soon wearied.
 Undoubtedly both she and Antony soon saw how affairs would turn, and were sensible that their fleet, consisting of heavy ships, was inevitably lost; and that they themselves would not be able to escape by flight, if they waited any longer. After they had lost their fleet and so many brave soldiers in the fight of their land-army, could they depend upon its fidelity? Since, even before the sea-fight, appearances were so much against Antony, that he was deserted by several of his chief officers, and, to that moment, the most zealous of his friends.

² Plutarch says, that one Eurycles did actually come up with Antony's ships, and took one loaded with plate and rich furniture.

ferred

ferred them. Octavius generously pardoned all his adversaries, excepting a very small number, who, in a very particular manner, were his declared enemiesⁿ. He then returned solemn thanks to Apollo, who was his particular patron among the gods, and the tutelar divinity of Actium, and consecrated to him a vessel of each kind, picked out of those taken from Antony, from one bank of oars to ten^o; and, remembering what had happened in Sicily after the reduction of Pompey's and Lepidus's armies, he immediately dismissed all Antony's old soldiers, and sent his own veterans into Italy, there to wait for the rewards which had been promised them: Keeping about him only such as had not served their full time, and who, in hopes of sharing the spoils of Egypt, would be faithful and zealous in his cause. At the same time to put the city and all Italy in good humour, he took off all the taxes, which he had been obliged lately to lay on them, and even remitted the arrears that were due. And, lest the veterans should raise a mutiny and disturbance, he sent Agrippa to take care of them. He himself went to Athens, where, being made acquainted with the oppression the Greeks had groaned under since Antony's arrival, he relieved the misery of the people by distributing among them the provisions which Antony had made for his army. From Athens he passed into Asia, with a design of marching on towards Egypt, when he was recalled into Italy by Agrippa, who had not authority enough over the veterans, who had grown turbulent, and loudly demanded their recompence.

Y. R. 722.
Bef. Chr.
30.
421 Conf.
Dio, l. li.
initio.
Strabo, vii.
p. 525.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS IV. } Consuls.
M. LICINIUS CRASSUS.

Octavius set sail in the middle of winter, and in his passage was twice in great danger of being shipwrecked; first upon the coast of Peloponnesus, and then on the coast of Epirus. He lost several of his ships, and the rigging and rudder of his own were torn away. At last he arrived safe at Brundisium, where he was met by all the Senators, Knights, and Magistrates, except two Prætors, and two Tribunes of the people, who were ordered by the Senate to remain in the city, in order to keep it quiet. His sudden arrival and this pompous reception disconcerted the mutinous soldiers, who were quite overawed by the severity of his

Y. R. 723.
Bef. Chr.
29.
422 Conf.

ⁿ Among the first are named Sofus, Furnius, and M. Scaurus, Sextus Pompey's half-brother by the mother's side. The chief of those put to death were Curio, the son of the famous Curio; Aquilii Flori, father and son; and Cassius of Parma. Velleius infers, from his present clemency, that the cruelties exercised in the beginning of the Triumvirate, and after the battle of Philippi, are not to be laid to his charge. Victoria fuit clementissima; nec quisquam interemptus, nisi paucissimi, & ii qui deprecari quidem pro se non sustinerent. Ex qua lenitate ducis colligi potuit, quem aut initio Triumviratus sui aut in campis Philippicis, si licuisset, facturum fuerit. Vell. ii. 86.

* Suetonius's account is something different in Aug. c. 18. Ampliato vetere Apollinis templo, locum castrorum quibus fuerat usus exornatum, navalibus spoliis, Nepotuno & Marti consecravit.

Y. R. 723. look and the haughtiness of his behaviour². However, he distributed Bef Chr. what money he had among the oldest of them, and allotted lands to
 29. them; but it was not in his power to discharge all that was due to 422 Conf. them, and, to make them sensible of it, he exposed to sale his own effects and those of his friends. These nobody ventured to purchase, and his soldiers were ashamed that they had forced their General to such an expedient. They consented, therefore, to wait quietly his time; and he paid them out of the immense spoils which he brought from Egypt.

² Divus Augustus vultu & aspectu Asiaticas legiones exterruit. Tac. An. i. 42. Our modern authors have made very free with Octavius's character as a soldier: "What a prodigious and incoherent mixture of opposite qualities in the same man!" says Abbe de Vertot, "and especially in a man that aspired to render himself master of the whole world! In him we see an exalted, bold, audacious genius, capable of forming the greatest designs, yet incapable of facing coolly the least danger, and that shewed no courage but in council, and where there was no need of venturing his person in the execution. He was very early sensible that courage, a General's first quality, was wanting in him: Yet, though he was conscious of this weakness in himself, it abated nothing of his ambition. He contented himself with calling another man's valour to his aid: He borrowed, as it were, Agrippa's courage." Hist. of the Revol. of Rome, B. xiv. Abbe de St. Real is of the same opinion, and Mr. Montesquieu is yet more severe in his censure: "I believe Octavius is the only man, of all the Roman Generals, who ever gained the affections of the soldiers by giving them perpetual instances of a natural timidity of spirit. The soldiers, at that time, were more affected with the liberality of their Commanders than with their valour: Perhaps it was even fortunate for him that he was not master of any qualities which could procure him the empire, and that his very incapacity should be the cause of his promotion to it, since it made him the less dreaded. It is not impossible that the defects which throw the greatest dishonour on his character were the most propitious to his fortune. If he had discovered at first any traces of an exalted soul, all

"mankind would have been jealous of his abilities; and, if he had been spirited by any true bravery, he would not have given Antony time to launch into all the extravagancies which proved his ruin." Reflections on the grandeur of the Romans, c. xiii. It is hard to understand what the President can mean by the last reflexion; for it is evident that, till Octavius had vanquished Sexsus Pompey and Lepidus, and Antony, by his extravagant behaviour, had lost the affections of the soldiers, the young Triumvir was not a match for his partner in power: And, as to the judgment these three very ingenious writers pronounce against Octavius's courage, it is grounded purely on some expressions which, Suetonius tells us, were thrown out against him in Antony's invectives and manifestoes. The whole tenor of his conduct, from his first entrance upon the stage of action is repugnant to it. No man could shew more daring spirit and more true courage than Octavius did, when he attacked Antony, armed with consular authority, and all the forces of the State, at the siege of Mutina; in his wars against S. Pompey; in those he waged against the Dalmatians; in fine, in this last against the formidable Antony himself. At the battle of Philippi he made no figure; he withdrew to Antony's camp: But we know very little of the circumstances of that battle: And it must be remembered that he had been long ill of a lingering disorder. But that he was lost for three days after the battle of Mutina; that he hid himself at Philippi among the baggage of Antony's army; and that, in a sea-fight against Pompey, he laid himself down in his ship upon his back, like a man in a trance, till the engagement was over; these are imputations as ridiculous in themselves, as they are inconsistent with the more authentic accounts of the ancient historians.

After a stay of only twenty-seven days, he embarked again for Asia, to complete his victory by the destruction of Antony. All the Kings of Asia came to assure him of their obedience; and none appeared more forward than Hered, King of Judea, who went as far as Rhodes to lay his crown at Octavius's feet, and offered to serve him in person with his troops. Octavius received him into favour, but would not spare Alexas, the Syrian, who attended him: And who, after having been Antony's greatest flatterer, was a most perfidious traitor to him. Didius, who commanded for Antony in Syria, declared likewise against him: And none of all his allies and officers remained faithful to him. A company of gladiators, which he had at Cyzicum, were the only friends he had left in all his dominions. These brave fellows set out to join him, and marched over all Asia, in spite of the opposition they met with from the Kings and States who had abandoned his party. Didius stopped them in Syria, but was not able to reduce them: They informed Antony of their situation, intreating him to come and put himself at their head; but, receiving no answer, they came to an agreement with Didius, and, upon condition that they should be no more obliged to fight in the amphitheatre, they consented to wait in the suburbs of Antioch till Octavius disposed of them. They were afterwards separated and incorporated into different legions.

Antony, after he was received into Cleopatra's galley, gave himself entirely over to melancholy reflexions and despairing thoughts, and, through shame or indignation, refused to see the Queen for three days; till, arriving at Tenarus, her women so bestirred themselves, that they brought them to see one another, and to sit together. There news was brought him of the entire loss of his fleet, but that it was uncertain whether his army remained firm. He wrote, therefore, from thence to Canidius to retreat through Macedonia and return to Asia, and he took what care he could of his friends, distributing amongst them all the money he had, and commanding them to leave him and provide for their own safety. From Tenarus he sailed to Paretonium, a town on the coast of Egypt, which borders on the territory of Cyrene.

Here Cleopatra left him to return to *Alexandria*¹. His view, in remaining some time in the neighbourhood of Cyrene, was to assemble about him the troops he had in that country under the command of Piuius Scarpus: But this Lieutenant declared himself for the Conqueror, and, having put to death Antony's couriers and also some soldiers who spoke loudly in favour of their General, he delivered Cyrene, with four legions, to Gallus, who commanded for Octavius in those parts. This disappointment rendered him desperate, and he would instantly have put ¹ Dio tells us, that she crowned her ships with garlands, and entered the port as if she returned victorious and triumphant; fearing lest the Alexandrians, in her distress, should refuse her admittance: And that her first care, after her return, was to put to death a great many of her principal officers and to confiscate the estates of others.

Y. R. 723. an end to his life, if his friends had not hindered him, and carried him
 Bel. Chr. to Alexandria. There he found Cleopatra engaged in a project, which
 29. well shewed her enterprising spirit. She had caused some of her gallies 422 Conf. to be carried over the isthmus of Suez into the Red Sea, proposing to Plut. save herself with her treasures in an unknown world: But, the Arabians Strab. I. having burnt them by the persuasion of Didius who commanded in Syria, viii. p. 335. she was forced to abandon a design so full of difficulties, and she set
 Liv. xli. about fortifying the avenues of her kingdom, and making preparations
 26. for war. She also solicited foreign assistance, addressing herself to all the Princes in the alliance of Antony; and it was then, to make up matters with the King of the Medes in particular, that she put to death Artabazes, King of Armenia, and sent his head to his enemy.

While Cleopatra was thus employed, Antony's behaviour was very different. We are told that he betrayed a shameful weakness; built a house near Pbaros, where he shut himself up without either friends or domestics, so imitate Timon, as he said, since he had no less reason to hate mankind than that Athenian, being betrayed by those whom he had most obliged. But his natural temper did not allow him to remain long in this state, and, quitting his cell, he gave himself up to feasting and every sort of extravagance. The society formed in the days of his power, and known under the title of the inimitable life, was now changed into another, which was called an engagement to die together. His friends subscribed their names, and all the fraternity prepared for death by the most excessive intemperance. In the midst of these diversions, Cleopatra is said to have made experiments of all sorts of poisons and venomous animals in order to find out the means of procuring the quickest and easiest death; and she found that the asp was the only one, which caused such a one as she desired, without convulsions or pains.
 A gentle moisture bedewed the face, the senses became obliterated, and an excessive heaviness oppressed the whole body like those who are in a very sound sleep: And to this death she resolved to have recourse.

Plut. Ant. Notwithstanding this firm resolution to die, we are told, that they sometimes entertained hopes of life; and Euphronius, tutor to Antony's children, was employed to make proposals to Octavius *. Cleopatra, also, privately sent her crown and sceptre, with a royal seal, as relinquishing all title to sovereignty herself, and demanded only the kingdom of Egypt for her children: And Antony requested that he might be allowed to live as a private man at Athens, if Octavius was not willing that he should stay in Egypt. It is added, that Antony, to soothe Octavius, had

* He and Cleopatra at this time, according to Dio, gave the toga virilis to Cæsario and Antyllus, and made this ceremony an occasion to regale the Alexandrians; perhaps, he thought also to strengthen his interest, by shewing two successors, who were already in a condition to supply his place and revenge him; but this precaution was of no use to him, and proved fatal to the two youths, who would have found more security under the robe of infancy.

the baseness to deliver up to him Turullius, who was one of Cæsar's murderers, but who had served him well. Octavius put Turullius to death, accepted of the presents, and made no answer to Antony's propositions, but sent word to Cleopatra, that there was no manner of favour which she might not reasonably expect, if she would either put Antony to death, or banish him. With this answer Euphronius returned, and with him Thyr-^{Y. R. 723. Bef. Chi. 29. 422 Conf.} sus, a freedman of Octavius, a person very artful and fit to manage an intrigue, who, coming with a message from a young Emperor to an ambitious Princess possessed with a mighty opinion of her own charms, had no difficult access to her. But these secret conferences between Cleopatra and him, and the honours she did him, threw Antony into such a furious passion of jealousy, that he immediately ordered him to be cruelly beaten with rods, and in that condition sent him to Octavius, with letters, that he had chastised Thyr-^{Plut.} sus for insulting over him at a time when his bad fortune had put him into an ill humour; but, if this proceeding offended him, he had his freedman Hipparchus by him, whom he might use after the same manner, and so be upon equal terms. Hipparchus was the first of Antony's freedmen that went over to Octavius. Cleopatra omitted nothing to clear Antony's mind of jealousy and suspicion; she redoubled her fondness and caresses, and, when her birth-day came, she kept it in a manner that was suitable to their deplorable condition; but Antony's was celebrated with great splendor and magnificence; and all the guests were enriched by the noble presents she made on his account.

In the mean time Octavius's forces advanced on each side of Egypt. Cornelius Gallus took possession of Paretonium, which was the key of E-^{Div. p. 448 & 449.} gypt on the west side; and Antony, who flew with his army and fleet to wrest it out of his hands, returned with great loss, particularly of his ships. For Gallus had left the port open, but had stretched chains under the water in the mouth of the harbour, which he drew up by the help of machines as soon as Antony's fleet had sailed in, and then attacked them on all sides: They were all burnt or sunk. Antony had flattered himself that the four legions which had been given up to Gallus would declare for him, as soon as he shewed himself to them; but Gallus, when he appeared and attempted to speak, caused all the trumpets to sound, and made a sally upon him with some success.

Octavius, on the other side, made himself master of Pelusium, the other key of Egypt. It was surrendered to him by Seleucus, and it was reported that this Governor had only followed Cleopatra's orders; but she, to clear herself, delivered up his wife and children into Antony's hands. Near the temple of Isis she had built a magnificent sepulchre; into this place she now removed her jewels, her gold and silver, and every thing she had which was valuable, causing them to be covered with great quantities of combustible matter; making no secret of her intention, which she declared to be to burn herself, if pushed to it, with all her

* According to Div. 1. li. p. 448, it was within the walls of the palace.

Y. R. 713. treasure. She was sensible that this menace would have some effect up-
 Bef. Chr 29. on Octavius, and she was not deceived; for, in his march towards Alex- 422 Conf. andria, he omitted no occasion of giving her assurances of his respect and his kind usage.

The nigh approach of the enemy began now to rouse Antony: It was plain that no other hopes were left him than of dying like a Roman, and this he fully resolved upon. He gathered all the troops he had, and made a brave sally on Octavius's cavalry, which he drove back into their camp, and even put the camp itself into disorder. Upon this advantage he entered Alexandria as in triumph, and went all armed to Cleopatra, to bring her the good news of his success, presenting one of his officers, who had behaved himself bravely in the fight. The Queen rewarded the valour of the man with an armour of gold; but that very night he went over to Octavius, which dangerous example very much troubled Antony. He tried to provoke Octavius's temper, and challenged him to a single combat; but he was coldly answered, that, if Antony sought death, he might find other methods to procure it. Dio adds, that he endeavoured to debauch Octavius's troops, and threw billets into his camp, promising 1500 drachma's to every one who would come over to him; which had no other effect than to raise in them a general indignation.

Dio, p.
449.

Antony, now finding his affairs quite desperate, resolved to make the last push, both by sea and land, with a full purpose to conquer honourably or die bravely. He ordered his people to treat him cheerfully and fill him his wine plentifully; perhaps, said he, this may be the last service you can do me, for to-morrow you may have another master, while I lie extended upon the ground, despised by all mankind. Finding his friends much moved at this sorrowful discourse, he added, However, I will not do you so great an injury as to lead you where death is more certain than victory.

At break of day, the first of August, he posted all the troops he had remaining upon the rising ground nigh the town, from whence he sent orders to his galleys to engage the enemy. The fleet advanced in good order, but, as soon as Cæsar's ships approached, the soldiers all held down their arms and saluted them: These returning the salute, both fleets joined and stood over-against the city. His cavalry, seeing this, left him also and went over to Octavius's camp; his infantry engaged, but was forced presently to yield*. The unfortunate Antony, abandoned thus Oros. vi. c.

19.
Dio, p. 449.
Strab. l.
xvii. p. 795.

* If these events followed so close upon one another, it is not possible to defer the taking of Alexandria till the 29th of August, the day which most writers have assigned: Or we must suppose the battle which preceded it later than the first of August. Dio, who always puts the worst construction upon actions, will have it that Cleopatra acted a treacherous part to Antony all along. She ordered Pelusum, he says, to be surrendered; she made the army and fleet revolt to Octavius; she gave out her death to engage Antony to kill himself and so get rid of him; and afterwards did all she could to engage the affections of his enemy. M. l'Abbe de St. Real and M. le President de Montesquieu are of thus by his men, and finding he could not die with glory in the field, returned back to Alexandria, overcome with a dreadful rage and fury, running and crying out, that Cleopatra had betrayed him, when he had ruined all his fortunes for her sake alone. Y. R. 723.

Ref. Chr.
29.
423 Conti.

The Queen, hearing of his transport, in a great fright retired to her monument, and secured the doors; and then made a report be spread that she was dead, which was soon brought to Antony. This sad and unexpected news recalled all that love and tenderness he had for this Princess. O wretched Antony, cried he, what hast thou here in this world, when fate has snatched from thee the only thing for which thou couldst endure to live? Then, returning to his cabinet, he laid aside his armour and renewed his complaints: "O Cleopatra, said he, our separation is not my greatest grief, for we shall meet again; but what afflicts me most is, that I, who have commanded so many gallant men, should be out-done by a woman in courage. Immediately he called Eros, the most faithful of his freedmen, whom he had engaged by oath to kill him, when he should think it necessary; and now bad him perform his promise. Eros drew out his sword, as if he designed to obey him; and, turning aside, gave himself a wound which threw him dead at his master's feet. Dear Eros, cried he, I thank thee for teaching me to do, myself, what thy regard for me did not permit thee to perform: And, at the same time drawing his sword and plunging it into his belly, he threw himself upon a bed that was near. The wound was mortal, but, the blood, by the situation of his body, being stopped, he soon came to himself, and most earnestly begged of his friends, who were come into his apartment, to dispatch him; but they all fled, leaving him in a miserable condition, tossing and struggling in the greatest anguish of pain. While he was in this situation, Diomedes came to him from Cleopatra, begging him, in her name, to suffer himself to be transported to the monument where she was, which Antony readily consented to. He was, therefore, brought to the place: But Cleopatra, having only her two women, durst not open the door, and only let down cords from the window". All the people of Alexandria were present at this of opinion that she treacherously fled during the battle of Actium, with a design to ruin her lover, and make her court to Octavius. "Yet this same Cleopatra, says the Abbé, "who seemed to live in Antony, treacherously abandoned him, and, by her perfidious flight, delivered him into the power of his enemy, whose affections she determined with herself, from that moment, to engage, if possible; a perfidiousness of which we see many examples, and which should convince us, that such is a woman's love, that we can never be secure of not being betrayed by her." Confid. sur Antoine. "It evidently appeared, says Mr. le President, by the circumstances of her future conduct, that she afterwards betrayed him: Perhaps, that incomprehensible spirit of coquetry, so predominant in her sex, tempted her to practise all her arts to lay a third Sovereign of the world at her feet." Grand. des Rom. ch. xv.

"Die, who is sensible that this tragical history is lame in many of its parts, has tried to mend it: He says that the door of the monument, when once shut, could not be opened again; that the monument was not finished at the top, and that the cords made use of to draw up Antony were the same

Y. R. 723. this sad spectacle, and nothing appeared so lamentable as to view this Bet Chr great man, renowned for so many conquests and victories, bathed in his
 29. blood and just expiring, holding out his hands to Cleopatra, and faintly 422 Conf. endeavouring to raise himself; and to see this famous Queen striving, with her body almost out of the window, with the feeble assistance of her women, to pull him up, the people all the time seeming to assist her with their cries and tears. When, after much pains she had drawn him in, she embraced him, and laid him gently upon her bed, tearing all her clothes in a most violent manner, beating her face and breast, calling Antony her Husband, her Lord, her Emperor! And, though her own misfortunes were very great, she forgot them all at the sight of this deplorable object. Antony begged of her to moderate the transports of her grief, and asked for some wine, either because he was thirsty, or because he thought it would soon end him. After he had drank, he exhorted Cleopatra to endeavour to save her life, if she could do it with honour; and, for that end, Proculeius, he told her, would be her best friend in Cæ- sar's camp; that she would not too deeply reflect upon the cruel turn of fortune which he felt in his last days, but rather think of that glory and renown he had long lived in, and that, after he had been the first man in the world, and the most illustrious of the Romans, he was at last overcome by a Roman.
 These, we are told, were his last words, after which he expired, in the fifty-third year of his age.

It cannot be denied but he was born with great natural endowments, which, notwithstanding the profligacy of his life, he cultivated so as to capacitate himself for every great office of the State, both civil and military. After Cæsar's death, we see him roused from the midst of pleasure and debauch, and an entire obsequiousness to the Dictator's will, forming the true plan of his interest, and pursuing it with a surprising vigour and address; till, after many and almost insuperable difficulties, he obtained the sovereign dominion which he aimed at. But, after the battle of Philippi, we find in him neither spirit nor prudence. The glory he reaped on that day, the influence he had over Lepidus and the greatest Commanders of the army, Ventidius, Pollio, Plancus; the esteem and affection of the soldiers, his own military skill, the immense riches of the Eastern provinces; undoubtedly gave him a great superiority over young Cæsar. All which advantages he gradually lost. He suffered his wife, her brother, and all his adherents, to be crushed in Italy, without taking his revenge, or demanding the least satisfaction; he foolishly helped Oc- tavius to destroy S. Pompey, who had sued for his favour, and who was a thorn in his competitor's side, and a strong barrier to his Eastern empire. He tamely saw his friend and saviour, Lepidus, deprived with ig-same the workmen made use of to pull up the stones. He has also given the women an eunuch to help them. But, good Dio, if Cleopatra did not love Antony, and gave out the report of her death in order to engage Antony to kill himself as you say, why did she not let him die in peace? Why put him and herself to all this trouble?

nominy

nominy of his dignity, his army, his provinces. He trifled away the treasures of the East, and wasted his army in an inglorious war. When we compare this conduct with that spirit which he shewed after Cæsar's death, it is hard not to allow the ambitious and politic Fulvia a share in the glory of his rise to power, since, separated from that active spirit, we see him weighed down by his indolence and sensuality.

Antony's bloody sword was taken up by one of his guards, and carried to Octavius, with an account of his death. He retired into his tent, where he could not refrain from tears, when he reflected on the deplorable end of so great a man. He called in his friends, to whom he declared, that he had contributed nothing to the overthrow of Antony through any hatred or ambition: Shewing them the copies of the letters he had written to him, which contained nothing but just and reasonable proposals, and Antony's answers full of passion and disdain. After this he sent Proculeius to employ his utmost address to seize upon Cleopatra, being extremely desirous to save her treasure, but more especially to grace his triumph with this Queen, who had so long triumphed over the Roman Commanders. Cleopatra refused Proculeius entrance, but, through the door, demanded Egypt for her children; which caused Proculeius, after observing the avenues of the monument, to return to Octavius, who, the same instant, sent Gallus with him, to make her new propositions. While Gallus was discoursing with Cleopatra below, Proculeius, with two others, entered by the window at which Antony had been drawn up; and one of her women, perceiving it, presently cried out, Wretched Princess, thou art taken alive! Upon which Cleopatra turned about, and, seeing Proculeius, drew out a dagger to stab herself; but Proculeius caught hold of her arm, saying, Madam, will you at once injure yourself and Cæsar, in depriving him of the most illustrious testimony he can give you of his generosity; and make the best and gentlest Prince in the world pass for cruel and barbarous? Whereupon he disarmed her, searched her clothes lest any poison should be concealed about her, and, after he had secured her person, returned to Octavius with this joyful news.

Octavius was extremely satisfied to have this haughty Queen at his disposal, who before had lifted the crown of Egypt above the empire of the Romans. He commanded Epaphroditus, one of his freedmen, to guard her with the greatest care, and yet to serve her like a Queen; and made his entrance into Alexandria in the most solemn and pompous manner. The majesty of Octavius, followed by so many armed soldiers, who breathed nothing but destruction, impressed the Egyptians with great fears, and they all fell prostrate upon their faces before him. Octavius told them, be pardoned the city for the sake of its illustrious founder, for the extraordinary beauty of it, and for the great esteem he had for Areius, their fellow-citizen and philosopher, who was then with him. Several Kings and Roman Senators are said to have begged of him the body of Antony, to pay their last respects to him; but he would not deprive Cleopatra of

Y. R. 723.
Bef. Chr.
29.
422 Conf.

Y.R. 723 a satisfaction so dear to her: and also furnished her with what was requi-
 Bef. Chr. site for the pomp of the funeral, which she solemnised with extraordinary 422 Conf. magnificence. Octavius now redoubled his complaisance to the captive Queen, that nothing might occasion the encrease of her afflictions; but her excessive melancholy, and the many blows she had given her breast, threw her into a slow fever, which gave her great hopes of ending her sorrows and her life in a short time: She had, besides, resolved to abstain from eating; a secret which she trusted her physician with*. Oc- tavius soon discovered her intention, and immediately threatened to put all her children to death, if she persisted in her obstinacy. This was the only thing she could be sensible of, and the thoughts of this caused her to comply, and receive whatever they prescribed to her.

Octavius resolved to visit Cleopatra and by his civilities to give her fresh assurance of his favour. He found her upon a plain bed[†], and, as soon as she perceived him, she rose in a slight garment she had upon her to throw herself at his feet, with her hair in disorder, her face torn, her breast bruised, her eyes red with weeping, and her voice weak and trembling; all which had not extinguished the brightness of her eyes, nor destroyed the charms of her person. Octavius civilly lifted her up, and sat down by her, and she immediately entered upon the justification of her conduct, pretending that all she had done was more out of fear of displeasing Antony, than from her own inclinations: But, when Octa- vius began to confute every article of her excuses, she presently turned the discourse to move his compassion, as if she desired nothing more than to prolong her life; and delivered him an inventory of all her jewels and treasure. Seleucus, her Treasurer, accusing her of concealing several things, Cleopatra, in a great rage, threw herself out of her bed, dragged him by the hair, and beat him severely; which, Dio thinks, was only a pretence to shew Octavius her beautiful shape and body, which she had too great a confidence in. However, Octavius only smiled at this action, and led the Queen to her bed. O Cesar, cried she, after the ho- nour of visiting me in this miserable condition, is it not cruel and barbarous that a vile slave should accuse me of laying aside a few trifles, alas! not to adorn myself, but to present them to Livia and Octavia, that their generous intercession may in some measure procure to me your favour? This discourse gave great satisfaction to Octavius, imagining it implied a desire she had of living: And thereupon he assured her, she might keep her jewels, and

* This physician's name was Olympus, and Plutarch tells us that he left in writing the story of Cleopatra's end, from which he borrowed his account.

† Dio tells us, that the bed was very rich and elegantly adorned; that she herself was clad in a negligent manner, but such a one as greatly became her; that the closet was hung with Julius Cæsar's images and pictures; and that she had ready in her lap, to shew Octavius, all the letters she had received from his father. He then tells us their whole conversation, and all her artful speeches. It is thus the historians have taken the liberty to ornament these events, every one according to his notions of the actors.

that

that he would use her more generously than she could reasonably hope for; and so retired, much pleased with his success, having, as he supposed, overreached her: But the Queen had sounded him every way, and deceived him.

Y. R. 723
Bef. Chr.
29.
422 Conf.

Cleopatra was soon afterwards informed by Dolabella, one of Octavius's favourites and her admirer, that Octavius had resolved to set out soon for Syria, and had determined to send, within three days, her and her children away before him. Upon this information, she sent to beg leave to pay her last oblations to the memory of Antony, which was granted her. Whereupon she was carried to the stately sepulchre where Antony's body was laid; and, attended by two women, she fell upon her knees, embraced his tomb with extreme grief and passion, and, after a flood of tears, she cried, My dearest Lord, I was a Queen and wore no chains, when I first placed thee in this monument; but, now that I pay my duties, I am Fortune's slave; my servile body is reserved to grace the triumph of thy foes, on which I dare not so much as print the marks of my grief. These tears, these pangs of grief, are the last tokens of the love and duty of thy Cleopatra, who now must be forced far from thee: No chance could separate us while living, but our cruel destiny will part us in our deaths. And, as, by a strange turn of fate, Egypt has afforded thee a tomb, so Rome will me: the only courtesy I shall receive from thy country. Yet I hope the heavenly powers that guard your happy abode (for ours have betrayed us) will stem the Conqueror's pride, and suffer him not to triumph over thee in my person. Hide me, therefore, here, and receive me into thy tomb; for, amongst all my bitter griefs and heavy afflictions, none ere pressed my soul so hard as living thus long without thee. After these lamentations, she crowned the tomb with garlands and flowers, embracing it as if she designed to grow to it. Then, as if her mourning was quite over, she ordered her women to prepare her a bath; which, when she had used, she dressed herself in the richest manner, and ordered her table to be served with the greatest magnificence. While she was eating, a countryman came and desired to speak to the Queen: The guards stopped him, and would know what he carried in a basket that he had in his hand. The Egyptian turned up some leaves and shewed them some fine figs in so innocent a manner, that they let him go. After dinner she sent a letter to Octavius, wherein she earnestly beseeched him to permit her to be buried in the same tomb with Antony; and, clearing her room of all, except Iras and Charmion, she is supposed to have applied her arm to the asp that was brought her. Octavius, informed by her letter of what she was about, sent immediately some messengers, who found her dead upon a golden bed adorned with her royal robes, in the posture of one asleep, with Iras also dead at her feet, and Charmion just breathing and placing her diadem right. One of the messengers very angrily asked, Is this well done, Charmion? Extremely well, replied she, and becoming a

Y. R. 723. Princess descended from so noble a race of Monarchs; at which she expired
 Bef. Chr. at her Mistress's feet ².

²⁹
 423 Conf. Thus died this famous Queen, in the thirty-ninth year of her age, having reigned twenty-two, twelve of which she passed with Antony. Octavius ordered her a magnificent funeral, laying her body by Antony's, according to her desire: And her women also were interred with considerable pomp, to honour their fidelity. With her ended the Ptolemean race, after it had lasted two hundred and ninety-four years. Her son Cesarion, whom she had by Julius Caesar, was shortly after slain by Octavius's orders, who was told by Areius, the philosopher, that many Cesars were of dangerous consequence. Her two sons by Antony, Ptolemy and Alexander, were led in triumph, after which they were dismissed and were no more heard of. Her daughter, Cleopatra Selene, was married afterwards to Juba, King of Mauritania. Her statues were left standing, a favour, says Plutarch, which Archilius, a faithful servant of the Queen, purchased at the price of a thousand talents. Antony's statues were all thrown down in Egypt as well as Rome, by virtue of a decree of the Senate, by which all that had been enacted in his favour was made void; his birth-day was ranked among those deemed unfortunate, and it was forbid in his family to bear the name of Marcus. M. Tullius, Cicero's son, was Consul when this decree passed, and he had the pleasure of executing it. It was designed so probably by Octavius, when he took him for his colleague ³. He thus made some atonement for his treachery to the father; and, by giving the family this opportunity of revenging his death upon Antony, fixed the blame of it also there; while the people looked upon it as divine and providential, that the final overthrow of Antony's name and fortunes should, by a strange revolution of affairs, be reserved for the triumph of young Cicero.

Dio, l. ii.
 p. 456.

Egypt was reduced into the form of a Roman province, and its immense riches were transported to Rome; which enabled Octavius to pay all he owed to his soldiers. It is said that upon this event, and the re-establishment of peace, every thing rose to double their value, and the interest of money fell from twelve to four per cent. A province, so rich

² Octavius represented her in his triumph with an asp sticking to her arm, and it was the common persuasion that she had made use of this animal to poison herself: Yet there was no spot or mark of poison upon her body, or any animal found in the monument. Only there were observed upon her arm two small punctures, and, upon the sand near the monument, some marks of the flight of an animal. It was suspected, at the time, that she and her maids had made use of a golden bodkin steeped in a very subtle poison, with which they pricked themselves. Dio reports that the Pfylli

were employed to suck out the poison, which they attempted in vain. This historian tells us very gravely, that the Pfylli were a peculiar people of Africa, (all males, for, says he, there is no Pfylla) of such a natural complexion, that no poisonous animal could hurt them, and they could cure any one bit or stung by sucking out the poison: They also could know whether their wives were faithful by exposing their children to asps and other serpents.

³ It appears, by the Capitoline marbles, that he bore this office from the ides of September to the calends of November.

and

and so extremely fertile in corn, was a very considerable acquisition to the Roman empire. It is said to have supplied the capital of the universe with provisions for four months of the year. But it was necessary to take measures to keep in subjection a people naturally fickle and disposed to sedition and revolt, and to prevent the Governor of it from aspiring to an independency in a kingdom so remote from Rome, and of such difficult access both by sea and land. To prevent these two inconveniencies, Octavius would not suffer at Alexandria either Senate or public Council, as there was in every great town of the Empire; but subjected them to a Prefect, who had all the authority of a Viceroy, having under his command three legions, and some other bodies of troops leis-
Y. R. 723.
Bef. Chr.
29.
422 Conf.
Tacit. Hist.
i. c. 11.
Strab. l.
xvii.
considerable distributed in different parts of the kingdom; and for this Prefect he neither chose a Magistrate nor a Senator, but a man of low birth, without adherents, and who owed his whole fortune to him. The first invested with this important prefecture was Cornelius Gallus, more distinguished by his literary talents than his military virtues: And it became a maxim of state afterwards to follow these regulations^b. However, Egypt was never happier than from this moment. The Governor made his troops cleanse the canals into which the Nile, in its rise, discharged itself, and which were half stopped up with mud: And this greatly contributed to the fertility of the country and to the facility of the interior commerce. He restored the vigour of the laws, and encouraged the foreign trade. Alexandria, by these means, preserved its rank of being the second city of the world, which she constantly enjoyed till the translation of the Empire to Constantinople.

Octavius^c left Egypt towards the end of the fine season, and went by Syria into Asia to pass there the winter. In all these countries, he applied himself to gain the affections of the people, and replaced in the temples the several statues, which Antony had taken away to gratify Cleopatra; a restitution which both religion, and the taste the Greeks had for arts, rendered extremely agreeable to them.

He had now an opportunity of concerning himself in the affairs of the Parthians. Pbraates's cruelty had driven them to a revolt, and they crowned Tiridates in his place. The fugitive Monarch had recourse on this to the Scythians, and, with their troops, returning into his kingdom, he, during Octavius's stay in Egypt, expelled Tiridates, who retired into Syria, with one of his enemy's sons, whom he had made prisoner. Tiridates offered to Octavius to become his vassal, if he restored him to the ^b This Prefect was called Augustalis, and had under him an officer for the administering of justice, called Juridicus; and his retinue was made up of the household, or the freedmen and dependants of Cæsar.

^c Before he left Alexandria, he had the curiosity to view the coffin and body of Alex- ander the Great, which were taken out of the vault: And he paid his respects to the memory of that Prince by the present of a golden crown and scattering flowers upon the body. Being asked whether he inclined to see those of the Ptolemy's, he replied, that he had a desire to see a King, not dead men.

Y. R. 723. Partbian throne; and Pbraates demanded back his son from him, together with his rebellious slave Tiridates. But Octavius hearkened to neither of them: He gave Tiridates protection in Syria, and kept the son of Pbraates as an hostage for his father's good behaviour.

Vell. Pat. 58. While he was still in Asia, Mecenas discovered at Rome a conspiracy against his life. The son of Lepidus, a rash, imperuous young man, was at the head of it: He saw in him the destroyer of all his relations, and proposed to revenge, by his death, his father whom he had spoiled of all his power and riches, his uncle Brutus, and, last of all, Antony, his father-in-law⁴. We have no full account of this plot: All we know of it is, that Mecenas soon discovered it, and kept such a vigilant eye upon the young man that he soon had proofs enough to convict him. He was seized and put to death: Servilia, his wife, desired to follow her beloved husband to his tomb, but, being carefully observed by her family, and, having no weapon, she choked herself by swallowing live coals⁵. The mother of the conspirator, Junia, sister of M. Brutus, was included in the criminal process against her son, and Mecenas was disposed to send her to Octavius, or, at least, he demanded security for her appearing, whenever she should be called upon. The Consul, before whom that process was carried on, was one who had been proscribed, whom Appian calls Balbinus.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS V. } Consuls.
SEXT. APULEIUS.

Y. R. 724. Octavius entered upon his fifth consulship in Asia, and did not return to the city till about Midsummer; he was then received with an universal joy and satisfaction, as a person who had put an end to the miseries and calamities of the State. The Senate had decreed him all sorts of honours both human and divine, as they had formerly done to his father Julius: And, in the month of August, he triumphed, for three days together, with extraordinary splendor and magnificence. His first triumph was for his success in Illyricum; the second for the battle of Actium; and the third for the conquest of Egypt. These triumphs were attended with the shutting of the temple of Janus, which had stood open 205 years; and by the performance of the divination called the augury of safety, which had not been renewed since the end of the third Mithridatic war: They were followed by great largesses made to the people and the soldiery; by entertainments of all kinds, and dedications of temples: And, to perpetuate the memory of a victory which had given

⁴ Antony, according to Dio, had given one of his daughters in marriage to Lepidus. She was now dead, since there is no mention of her among Antony's children, and the wife of young Lepidus was, at this time, Servilia.

⁵ The same thing has been falsely reported of Porcia, M. Brutus's wife. This fact rests upon the authority of Velleius Paterculus, l. ii. c. 88. Æquetur Calpurniae Antistii, Servilia Lepidi uxor, quæ vivo igni devorata præmaturam mortem immortalis nominis sui pensavit memoria.

him the empire of the world, he encreased the splendor and pomp of those games which had been celebrated at Actium in honour of Apollo from the remotest antiquity, and ordered that they should be renewed every five years. Upon the spot of ground there, where his army had encamped, he built a town which he called Nicopolis, the city of Victory, which soon, by the privileges granted it, became populous and flourishing. Another Nicopolis was built near Alexandria upon the field where Antony engaged him, and games were likewise instituted there.

V. R. 724.
Bef. Chr.
28.
423 Conf.

Octavius was now sole master of the Roman empire by the destruction of his enemies, but with no other legal title than that odious one of the Triumvir, which he had promised to resign; and we are told, that he had thoughts of fulfilling his promise, and took the advice of his two most intimate friends, Agrippa and Mecenas. Agrippa, it is said, advised him to restore the Commonwealth; but Mecenas dissuaded it. Dio has given us the speeches which these two Ministers made to their Master; and a long sermon of Mecenas, concerning the right administration of the Empire. The Senate had ordered that his name should be inserted in the public prayers for the safety of the Empire, in which hitherto none but the Senate and people had been named^f: And, on the first of January, the Consul, his colleague, and the whole Senate confirmed all his acts, and swore to observe his orders. This ceremony was observed ever after, and was no less than an oath of allegiance. But the first decree in his favour, made by the Senate, seems to have been that of the Tribunitian power for his whole life, which had already been offered him: Yet he does not seem to have accepted of this grant till after his eleventh consulship. He accepted, however, of a very substantial one in that of Imperator, which gave him the command of all the armies: And this, joined to the consulship, invested him in reality with all the military and civil power: And he continued himself in the consulship, till he gradually was vested with all the offices of the State. The following year he was made Censor with Agrippa. In fine, in his seventh consulship, finding all matters ripe for his purpose, he went to the Senate, and, after a studied speech, resigned his sovereign power on the seventh of January. The house unanimously besought him with many words and entreaties, that he alone would take upon him the administration of the government; and, after many arguments and persuasions, they compelled him, as it were, to accept of the sovereignty, under the title of Prince, a word sometimes used under the Republic, as in the case of the Prince of the Senate: So that he would appear to be no

^f It was also enjoined, according to Dio, to make libations to him in private entertainments; one may doubt whether this was enacted by public authority; but we learn, from an ode of Horace, that flattery introduced the custom:

Quisque — alteris
Te mensis adhibet Deum:
Te multa prece, te prosequitur mero
Desuso pateris; & Laribus tuum,
Miscet numen, ut Græcia Castoris,
Et magni memor Hæculis.

L. iv. od. 5.
more

Y. R. 724. more than the first man of the State. It was decreed, at the same time,
 Bel. Chr. 28. that he should have a constant guard, and that their pay should be double 423 Conf. that of the other soldiers.

Thus Octavius Caesar, by his artifice, in pretending to lay down all his power and authority, got it confirmed to him both by the Senate and people. Yet, to soothe the Senate and make himself popular, he refused to govern all the provinces, or to have a perpetual power over such as he should take care of. Therefore, on the ides of January, or on the 13th, he made a division of the Empire. The weaker and inward provinces being in a more peaceable posture, he left them to be disposed of by the people in favour of consular and praetorian Senators, with these provisions, that they should not take possession of them till five years after they had borne offices in the city: That they should hold their government but for a year; and that, as soon as successors were sent them, they should immediately depart from their provinces, and not fail of being at Rome within three months. These provinces were Africa and Numidia, Libya called Cyrenaica, Asia Minor, Greece with Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Crete, Sicily, Sardinia, and that part of Spain called Betica. Caesar kept the rest of Spain, all Gaul and Germany, as also Cilicia, Syria, Phœnicia, Egypt, and Cyprus, which were more exposed to the incursions of foreign enemies, and formed the barrier of the Empire. When any war broke out in any of the provinces in the department of the people, the Prince was to take it, and to give up some other one more quiet in its stead: So Augustus afterwards took Dalmatia, and made over to the people Cyprus and Gallia Narbonensis. By this contrivance he engrossed the whole militia of the Empire, declaring, at the same time, that he only took this charge upon himself for ten years.

On the 17th of the same month the Senate, in acknowledgment of the moderate use Octavius made of the sovereign authority, decreed him many honours. A laurel was placed before his gates, and upon it were hung garlands of oak leaves, to signify that he was the perpetual Conqueror of the enemies of the State, and preserver of the citizens*. His house was called the Palatium, wherever he took his abode. It was debated whether they should give him the title of Romulus, as second founder of the State; but the more venerable name and less invidious one

Suet. in
 Oct. vii.
 Florus iv.
 22.

* Postibus augustis eadem fidissima custos Ante fores stabis, mediamque tuebere quercum. Ovid. i. Metam. 562.

State Palatinae laurus, prætextaque quercu Stet domus. Id. iv. Fast. 953.

Cur tamen adposita velatur janua lauro;
 Cingit et augustas arbor opaca fores?

Num quia perpetuos meruit domus ista triumphos?

Au quia Leucadio semper amata Deo?
 Ipsane quod festa est, an quod facit omnia festa?

Quam tribuit terris pacis an ista nota est?
 Utque viret semper laurus, nec fronde caduca

Carpitur; æternum sic habet illa decus.

Id. iii. Trist. i. 39.

of

of Augustus, propounded by Munacius Plancus, was agreed to: For sacred places and temples, consecrated by Augurs, were termed Augusta^b. It was afterwards enacted that the Prince should have, in the city, all the honours and power of the Consuls, though he was not Consul; and in the provinces, governed by prætorian and consular Senators, the prerogatives of Proconsul, with a power superior to that of the proper Governors. He was made perpetual Master of Manners: He had all the power of the censorship and tribunate: And he was invested with the office of High-Priest, and the presidency in all the colleges of Augurs, Septemviri, and Quindecimviri. Thus the Prince got into his hands all the jurisdiction and privileges of the several offices of the State; and what was granted to Augustus by degrees was afterwards conferred upon his successors at once by one single instrument, and despotic monarchy established by a law, called afterwards lex regia^c. Augustus consented at first to receive the sovereign power for ten years: When the ten years were expired, he was prevailed to accept it for ten more, and in this manner kept it all his life.—His successors, in imitation of this example, though they had the Empire settled upon them without any limitation of time, yet, at the end of every ten years, celebrated solemn feasts, as for a renewal or continuation of the sovereignty in their persons.

^b Traſtatum in Senatu, an, quia condidisset imperium, Romulus vocaretur, ſed ſancitius et reverentius viſum eſt nomen Auguſti, ut ſcilicet jam tum, dum colit terras, ipſo nomine et titulo conſecraretur. Flor. iv. 12. The æra of the Roman empire is dated from the fiſt of January this year. This title of Auguſtus at fiſt was only perſonal, and did not convey any idea of ſovereignty: Several of the Imperial family took it, who were never Emperors; as Germanicus. The female line, who had not the leaſt ſhadow of ſovereignty with the Romans, had it, as Antonia Major: And thus Livia fiſt took the name of Auguſta, when ſhe was adopted by her huſband's will into the Julian family. After the time of Diocleſian, it was changed into Semper Auguſtus, which title the Emperor of Germany now enjoys. Taylor, p. 36. See Mem. de Litt. de l'Academie de Inſcriptions, t. xix, p. 432. Where Abbé de la Bletiric has taken the pains to enquire by what ſteps and at what period the title of Auguſtus came to expreſs the Imperial power.

^c A fragment of that relating to Veſpaſian was found engraven upon copper in the church of St. John de Lateran at Rome, and is now preſerved in the Capitol. It was alſo called lex Imperii, Auguſtum privilegium, lex Auguſti: And Ulpian, writing upon this law, uſes this expreſſion: Quod principi placuit, legis habet vigorem: utpoſe cum lege regia, quæ de imperio ejus lata eſt, Populus ei et in eum omne ſuum imperium et poteſtatem conſerat. D. i. 4. 1. pr.

E I N I S.

T H E

THE CAPITOLINE MARBLES; OR,
CONSULAR CALENDARS:
CONTINUED.

633. Y. of R.

332. Consulship. P. MANILIUS NEPOS.

C. PAPIRIUS CARBO.

Censors.

L. Calpurnius Piso Frugi.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus Balearicus.The sixty-first Lustrum.Tribunes of the People.

P. Decimus Mus.

M. Octavius Nepos.

The other eight are unknown.*Pro-Consul in Transalpine
Gaul.*

Q. Fabius Maximus,

Who triumphs over the Allobroges and Bituitus, King of the Arverni.Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, Triumphs over the Gauls and the Arverni.

634. Y. of R.

333. Consulship. L. CÆCILIUS METEL-

LUS DALMATICUS.

L. AURELIUS COTTA.

*Prætors.*Q. Fabius Maximus Eburnus, &c.*Tribunes of the People.*C. Marius Nepos. The other nine are unknown.

635. Y. of R.

334. Consulship. M. PORCIUS CATO.

Q. MARCIUS REX.

VOL. IV.

The first died during his magistracy: And in his place
was substituted

Q. ÆLIUS TUBERO.

Pro-Consul in L. Cæcilius Metellus, Dalmatia. Who triumphs over the Dalmatians.

636. Y. of R.

335. Consulship. L. CÆCILIUS METEL-
LUS.

Q. MUTIUS SCÆVOLA.

Pro-Consul in Q. Marcius Rex,
Liguria. Who triumphs over the Steni.

637. Y. of R.

336. Consulship. C. LICINIUS GETA.Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS EBURNUS.

638. Y. of R.

337. Consulship. M. ÆMILIUS SCAURUS,Who triumphs over the Carni.M. CÆCILIUS METEL-LUS.*Censors.*L. Cæcilius Metellus Dal-maticus.

Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.

The sixty-second Lustrum.Prætors.

P. Decimus Mus.

C. Marius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. P. Rupilius Rufus. The other nine are unknown.

M m m

Pro-

Pro-Consul in M. Æmilius Scaurus, the country of Who triumphs over the Car-
the Carni. ni.

639. Y. of R.

338. Consulship. M. ACILIUS BALBUS.
C. PORCIUS CATO.

Prætor in far- C. Marius Nepos.
ther Spain.

Prætor in Illy- T. Didius Nepos.
ricum.

Pro-Consul in M. Cæcilius Metellus.
Sardinia.

640. Y. of R.

339. Consulship. P. CÆCILIVS METEL-LUS CAPRARIUS.
CN. PAPIRIUS CARBO.

Prætor, a se- Lucius Cassius Longinus.
cond time, for capital crimes.

Tribunes of the Sex. Peduceius Nepos. The People. other nine are unknown.

Pro-Consul in M. Cæcilius Metellus,
Sardinia. Who triumphs over the Sardi.

Pro-Consul in C. Cæcilius Metellus Ca-prarius,
Macedonia.

Who triumphs over the Thra-cians and Macedonia.

Pro-Prætor a- T. Didius Nepos, gainst the Who triumphs over the Scor-Scordisci. disci and Macedonia.

641. Y. of R.

340. Consulship. M. LIVIVS DRVSUS.
C. CALPURNIVS PISO.

Prætor in far- L. Calpurnius Piso Frugi.
ther Spain.

642. Y. of R.

341. Consulship. P. CORNELIVS SCIPIO NASICA.

L. CALPURNIVS PISO BESTIA.

Prætors. L. Cassius Longinus.
Ser. Sulpicius Galba, &c.

Tribunes of the C. Memmius Gallus.
People. C. Boebius Sulca.

Quæstor in P. Sextius Nepos.
Numidia.

Pro-Consul in M. Livius Drusus.
Macedonia.

643. Y. of R.

342. Consulship. M. MINUCIVS RVFVS.

SP. POSTHUMIVS AL-
BINVS.

Prætor at Rome. Q. Marcius Philippus.

Prætor in bi- Q. Servilius Cæpio.
ther Spain.

Tribunes of the P. Licinius Crassus Dives.
People. C. Manilius Limetanus.

L. Annius Nepos.

L. Lucilius Balbus. The other six are unknown.

Pro-Consul in M. Livius Drusus, Macedonia. Who triumphs over the Scor-
disci.

644. Y. of R.

343. Consulship. Q. CÆCILIVS METEL-LVS NUMIDICVS.

M. JULIVS SILANVS.

Censors.

M. Æmilius Scaurus.

M. Livius Drusus, who died
during his magistracy,

Pro-Consul in M. Minucius Rufus.
Macedonia.

Pro-Consul in Sp. Posthumius Albinus.
Numidia.

Pro-Consul in Q. Servilius Cæpio.
farther Spain.

645. Y. of R.

344. Consulship. SER. SVPICIVS GALBA.
Q. HORTENSIVS NE-

POS, who did not enter upon the exercise of his office : And in whose place
was substituted

M. AURELIVS SCAVRVS.

Censors.

Q. Fabius Allobrogicus.

C. Licinius Geta.

The sixty-third Lustrum.

Pro-Consul in Q. Cæcilius Numidicus.
Numidia.

Q. Servilius Cæpio,

Triumphs over the Lusitani.

M. Minucius Rufus,

Triumphs over the Scordisci and Triballi.

646. Y. of R.

345. Consulship. L. CASSIVS LONGINVS,
C. MARIVS NEPOS.

The first was killed during his magistracy : And in his place was substituted

M. ÆMI-

M. ÆMILIUS SCAURUS
II.
Tribunes of the People. L. Manilius Mancinus.
C. Cælius Calvus.
Sp. Thorius Balbus. The other seven are unknown.
Quæstors in Numidia. L. Cornelius Sulla.
Cn. Octavius Rufus.
Q. Cæcilius Numidicus, Who triumphs over the Numidians and Jugurtha.
647. Y. of R.
346. Consulship. C. ATTILIUS SERRANUS.
Q. SERVILIUS CŒPIO.
Prætors. M. Licinius Crassus.
C. Annius Bellienus.
C. Flavius Fimbria, &c.
Ædiles. P. Licinius Crassus.
Q. Cæcilius Metellus Nepos.
Tribunes of the People. Q. Mucius Sævola. The other nine are unknown.
Pro-Consul in Numidia. C. Marius Nepos.
Pro-Prætor in Africa. L. Annius Bellienus.
Pro-Quæstor in Numidia. L. Cornelius Sulla.
648. Y. of R.
347. Consulship. P. RUTILIUS RUFUS.
CN. MALLIUS MAXIMUS.
Prætor in Sardinia. T. Albucius Nepos.
Tribunes of the People. L. Licinius Crassus.
C. Cassius Longinus. The other eight are unknown.
Quæstor in Sardinia. Cn. Pompeius Strabo.
Pro-Consul in Narbonne-Gaul. Q. Servilius Cœpio.
Pro-Consul in Numidia. C. Marius Nepos. Who triumphs over the Numidians and Jugurtha.
Pro-Quæstor in Numidia. L. Cornelius Sulla.
649. Y. of R.
348. Consulship. C. MARIUS NEPOS II.
C. FLAVIUS FIMBRIA.
Ædile. G. Aurelius Scaurus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Cassius Longinus.
Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
C. Servilius Glaucia.
L. Marcius Philippus. The other six are unknown.
Pro-Prætor in Sardinia. T. Albucius Nepos.
650. Y. of R.
349. Consulship. C. MARIUS NEPOS III.
L. AURELIUS ORESTES, Who died during the term of his magistracy.
Prætor in Sicily. C. Servilius Casca.
Prætor in his Spain. M. Fulvius Nobilior.
Prætor in Macedonia. C. Calpurnius Piso Cæsonius.
Curule Ædiles. M. Antonius Nepos.
Q. Mucius Sævola.
L. Licinius Crassus.
651 Y. of R.
350. Consulship. C. MARIUS NEPOS IV.
L. LUTATIUS CATULUS.
Censors. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Numidicus.
C. Cæcilius Metellus Caprarius.

The sixty-fourth Lustrum.
Prætor in Sicily. L. Licinius Lucullus.
Tribunes of the People. A. Pompeius Rufus.
L. Apuleius Saturninus.
T. Junius Nepos. The other seven are unknown.
M. Antonius, after having given chase to the pirates of Cilicia, obtains at Rome the honour of a naval triumph.
652 Y. of R.
351. Consulship. C. MARIUS NEPOS V,
Who triumphs over the Teutones, the Cimbri, and the Ambrones.
M. AQUILIUS NEPOS.
Tribunes of the People. M. Acilius Glabrio. The other nine are unknown.
Pro-Consul in Cisalpine Gaul. Q. Lutatius Catulus, who triumphs over the Teutones, the the Cimbri, and the Ambrones.

653. Y. of R.

352. Consulship. C. MARIUS NEPOS VI.
L. VALERIUS FLACCUS.

Prætors. C. Servilius Glaucia, &c.

Tribunes of the People. A. Nonnius Suffenas.

L. Apuleius Saturninus II.

Cn. Boebius Tamphilus. The other seven are unknown.

Quæstors. Q. Servilius Cæpio.

C. Scafeius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in Sicily. M. Aquilius Nepos.

654. Y. of R.

353. Consulship. M. ANTONIUS NEPOS.
A. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.

Prætor in farth Spain. L. Cornelius Dolabella.

Prætor in Asia. Q. Mutius Scævola.

Curule Ædiles. C. Claudius Pulcher.

L. Valerius Flaccus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Porcius Cato.

Q. Pompeius Rufus.

Q. Calidius Nepos.

P. Furius Nepos.

C. Canuleius Dives.

C. Decianus.

Sex. Titius Nepos.

L. Equilius Firmianus.

L. Apuleius Saturninus III.

The tenth is unknown.

Quæstor in Macedonia. C. Junius Norbanus.

M. Aquilius, after the defeat of the Sicilian slaves, receives the honour of an ovation.

655. Y. of R.

354. Consulship. Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS NEPOS.

T. DIDIUS NEPOS.

Prætor at Rome. M. Valerius Flaccus.

Prætor in Sicily. L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

Prætor in Macedonia. C. Sextius Calvinus.

Tribunes of the People. M. Dronius Nepos.

A. Plautius Silvanus. The other eight are unknown.

L. Cornelius Dolabella triumphs over the Lusitani.

656. Y. of R.

355. Consulship. CN. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.

P. LICINIUS CRASSUS.

Censors.

L. Valerius Flaccus.

M. Antonius Nepos.

The sixty-fifth Lustrum.

Prætor in Sicily. L. Hortensius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in farther Spain. T. Didius Nepos.

Pro-Prætor in Macedonia. C. Sextius Calvinus.

657. Y. of R.

356. Consulship. CN. DOMITIUS ÆNOBARBUS.

C. CASSIUS LONGINUS.

Prætor at Rome. Sex. Julius Cæsar.

658. Y. of R.

357. Consulship. P. LICINIUS CRASSUS.

Q. MUTIUS SCÆVOLA.

Prætor in Sicily. C. Claudius Pulcher.

Tribunes of the People. C. Junius Norbanus,

L. Aurelius Cotta.

T. Didius Nepos.

L. Antistius Rheginus. The other six are unknown.

Pro-Consul in hisher Spain. T. Didius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in farther Spain. P. Licinius Crassus.

659. Y. of R.

358. Consulship. C. CÆLIUS CALDUS.
L. DOMITIUS ÆNOBARBUS.

Prætor at Rome. L. Cornelius Cinna.

Prætor in Asia. L. Valerius Flaccus.

Tribune of the People. L. Sestius Nepos.

Prætor.

Pro-Consul in hisher Spain. T. Didius Nepos.

Prætor.

Pro-Consul in farther Spain. P. Licinius Crassus.

660. Y. of R.

359. Consulship. C. VALERIUS FLACCUS.
M. HERENNIUS NEPOS.

Prætors at Rome. T. Manilius Nepos.

L. Cornelius Sylla.

Prætor in Sicily. Cn. Pompeius Strabo.

Prætor

Prætor in far- P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.
ther Spain.

Pro-Consul in T. Didius Nepos, hither Spain. Who triumphs over the Celti-berians.

Pro-Consul in P. Licinius Crassus, farther Spain. Who triumphs over the Lusitani.

661. Y. of R.

360. Consulship. C. CLAUDIUS PUL-CHER.

Censors. M. PERPERNA NEPOS.
Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.

The sixty-sixth Lustrum.

Prætor in Sicily. L. Licinius Crassus.
C. Geminus Nepos.

Prætor in Asia. L. Cornelius Sylla.

Pro-Consul in C. Valerius Flaccus.
hither Spain.

Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.
farther Spain.

662. Y. of R.

361. Consulship. L. MARCIUS PHILIPPUS.
SEX. JULIUS CÆSAR.

Prætor at Rome. Q. Pompeius Rufus.

Prætor in Nar- M. Porcius Cato Licinianus.
bonne-Gaul.

Prætor in Asia. L. Cassius Longinus.

Curule Ædile. M. Claudius Marcellus.

Tribunes of the M. Livius Drusus.

People. P. Tarquinius Nepos.

Q. Varius Hibryda Sucronen-sis.

L. Fufius Calenus.

C. Papirius Carbo.

Q. Rubrius Varro.

L. Luceius Nepos. The other three are unknown.

Quæstor in Q. Sertorius Nepos.
Cisalpine
Gaul.

The Marsic War.

663. Y. of R.

362. Consulship. SEX. JULIUS CÆSAR.

P. RUTELIUS RUFUS,
Who was killed during his magistracy.

Prætor at Rome. Q. Varius Hibryda.

Prætor in Nar- C. Cæcilius Metellus.
bonne-Gaul.

Curule Ædile. C. Julius Cæsar Strabo.

Tribunes of the C. Scribonius Curio.

People. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer.

M. Plætorius Nepos.

C. Velleius Nepos. The other six are unknown.

Pro-Prætor in L. Cassius Longinus.
Asia.

Pro-Prætor in C. Valerius Flaccus. hither Spain.

664. Y. of R.

363. Consulship. CN. POMPEIUS S

BO, who triumphs
the Asculans and the I ...
tines.

L. PORCIUS CATO, who was killed during his magistracy.

Censors. P. Licinius Crassus.

L. Julius Cæsar.

The sixty-seventh Lustrum.

Prætors at A. Sempronius Asellio.
Rome. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.

App. Claudius Pulcher.

P. Gabinus Capito.

Tribunes of the L. Cassius Longinus.

People. C. Papirius Carbo.

M. Plautius Silvanus. The other seven are unknown.

665. Y. of R.

364. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS SYLLA FELIX.

Q. POMPEIUS RUFUS.

Prætor in Afri- C. Sextilius.

ca.

Tribunes of the P. Sulpicius Rufus, who was People. killed during his tribunate.

P. Antistius Labeo.

C. Boebius Sulca. The other seven are unknown.

Quæstor in L. Licinius Lucullus.
Asia.

666. Y. of R.

365. Consulship. CN. OCTAVIUS, who was killed during his magistracy.

L. CORNELIUS CINNA, who was deposed; and in whose place was substituted
L. COR-

L. CORNELIUS MERULA, who put himself to death before the end of his magistracy.

Prætor in Sicily. M. Claudius Marcellus.

Prætor in Apulia. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.

Pro-Consul in Asia. L. Cornelius Sylla Felix.

Tribunes of the People. M. Virgilius Nepos.

P. Magius Chilo. The other eight are unknown.

667. Y. of R.

366. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS CINNA II.

C. MARIUS VII, who died during his magistracy, and in whose place was substituted

L. VALERIUS FLACCUS.

Censors. L. Marcius Philippus.
Marcus Perperna.

The sixty-eighth Lustrum.

Prætors at Rome. C. Marius Gratidianus.
P. Antistius Labeo.
L. Licinius Murena.

Prætor in Africa. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.

Prætor in Macedonia. Q. Sertius Saturninus.

Pro-Consul in Asia. L. Cornelius Sylla.

Quæstor at Rome. C. Flavius Fimbria.

Quæstor in Asia. L. Manlius Torquatus.

668. Y. of R.

367. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS CINNA III.

Prætors. CN. PAPIRIUS CARBO.
M. Lætorius Mergus.
Q. Granius Nepos.
P. Cornelius Cethegus.
Cn. Granius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. Sex. Lucilius Nepos.
M. Petreius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in Asia. L. Cornelius Sylla.

Pro-Consul in Africa. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.

669. Y. of R.

368. Consulship. CN. PAPIRIUS CARBO II.
L. CORNELIUS CINNA

IV, who was killed before the end of his magistracy.

Tribune of the People. P. Popilius Lænas.

Quæstor in Cisalpine Gaul. C. Verres.

Pro-Consul in Asia. L. Cornelius Sylla.

Pro-Consuls in Africa. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.
C. Fabius Hadrianus.

670. Y. of R.

369. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO ASIATICUS.

C. JUNIUS NORBANUS.
Prætors at Rome. P. Burrius.
Q. Lucretius Offella.

Q. Antonius Balbus.
Q. Valerius Soranus.

Prætor in farther Spain. Q. Sertorius Nepos.

Prætor in Narbonne-Gaul. C. Valerius Flaccus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Popilius Lænas.
Cn. Aufidius Orestes.
C. Cassius Varus.

Quæstor in Italy. M. Pupius Piso Frugi Calpurnianus.

Quæstors in farther Spain. L. Herculeius Nepos.
C. Herennius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in Italy. L. Cornelius Sylla.

Pro-Consul in Campania. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.

Pro-Consul in Cisalpine Gaul. Cn. Papirius Carbo.

Pro-Prætor in Africa. C. Fabius Hadrianus.

Pro-Prætor in Asia. L. Licinius Murena.

671. Y. of R.

370. Consulship. C. MARIUS, who was killed during his magistracy.
CN. PAPIRIUS CARBO, III, who was also killed during his magistracy.

Prætors at Rome. L. JUNIUS BRUTUS DAMASIPPUS, who was killed killed during his prætorship.

C. MARIUS GRATIDIANUS II, who was also killed during his prætorship.
Pro-Consuls in Italy. L. Cornelius Sylla.
Q. Metellus Pius.
C. Junius Norbanus.
Q. Lucretius Offella.
Q. Valerius Soranus.
Pro-Consul in Sardinia. Q. Antonius Balbus.
Pro-Consul in hispania. P. Burrienus.
Pro-Consul in farther Spain. Q. Sertorius Nepos.
Pro-Prætor in Africa. C. Fabius Hadrianus.
Pro-Prætor in Macedonia. C. Sentius Saturninus.
Pro-Prætor in Asia. L. Licinius Murena.
Quæstors in Italy. C. Verres.
L. Manlius Torquatus.
Dictator. L. CORNELIUS SYLLA.
G. of the Horse. L. Valerius Flaccus.
672. Y. of R.
371. Consulship. M. TULLIUS DECULA.
CN. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA.
Dictator. L. CORNELIUS SYLLA,
 Who triumphs over Mithridates and Asia for two days.
 The creation of eight Prætors for Rome.
Prætors at Rome. Cn. Cornelius Dolabella.
Sex. Nonnius Suffenas.
Quæstors at Rome. P. Cornelius Lentulus Sura.
L. Valerius Triarius.
Pro-Consul in Sardinia. L. Marcius Philippus.
Pro-Consul in Sicily. M. Æmilius Lepidus.
Pro-Consul in Spain. C. Annius Luscus.
Pro-Prætor in Asia. M. Minucius Thermus.
L. Licinius Murena triumphs over Mithridates and Asia.

673. Y. of R.
372. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS SYLLA FELIX II.
Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS PIUS.
Prætors at Rome. The first instance of eight Prætors.
M. Fannius Strabo. The other seven are unknown.
Tribunes of the People. C. Herennius Nepos. The other nine are unknown.
Pro-Consul in Macedonia. Cn. Cornelius Dolabella.
Prætor in Cilicia. A person of the same name.
Prætor in hispania. L. Domitius Ænobarbus.
Prætor in farther Spain. T. Didius Nepos. The creation of twenty Quæstors.
Quæstors in Cilicia. C. Publius Malleolus. The rest are unknown.
 Pompey, as yet a Roman Knight, triumphs over Hircania and Africa.
674. Y. of R.
373. Consulship. P. SERVILIUS VATTIA ISAUERICUS.
AP. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.
Prætors at Rome. L. Octavius Nepos.
C. Calpurnius Piso.
Q. Calpidius Nepos, &c.
Prætor in Asia. C. Claudius Nero.
Curule Ædiles. L. Licinius Lucullus.
M. Terentius Varro Luscus.
Quæstor in farther Spain. C. Urbinius Rufus.
Quæstor in Cilicia. C. Verres.
675. Y. of R.
374. Consulship. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS.
L. LUTATIUS CATULUS.
Cn. Cornelius Dolabella triumphs over Macedonia.
Pro-Consul in farther Spain. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.
Pro-Consul in Sicily. C. Claudius Marcellus.

676. Y. of R.

375. Consulship. D. JUNIUS BRUTUS LE-PIDUS.MAM. ÆMILIUS LIVIA-
NUS.Prætors at Cn. Aufidius Orestes Aureli-Rome. anus.

L. Licinius Lucullus, &c.

Pro-Consul at App. Claudius Pulcher.
Rome.Pro-Consul in Q. Lutatius Catulus.
Italy.Pro-Prætor in Cn. Pompeius Magnus.
Cisalpine
Gaul.Pro-Consul in Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.
farther Spain.Pro-Consul in P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus.
Cilicia.Pro-Consul in Ap. Claudius Pulcher.
Macedonia.Prætor in Sicily. Cn. Junius Norbanus.Prætor in Nar- M. Fonteius Capito.
bonne-Gaul.Pro-Prætor in Cn. Terentius Varro.
Asia.Tribune of the M. Turpilius Nepos.
People.

677. Y. of R.

376. Consulship. CN. OCTAVIUS.
C. SCRIBONIUS CURIO.Prætors at L. Titius Nepos.
Rome. M. Terentius Varro Lucul-
lus.

L. Furius Philus, &c.

Prætor in Africa. L. Licinius Lucullus.Prætor in A- L. Gellius Publicola.
chaia.Prætor in Illy- Cn. Aufidius Orestes.
ricum.Prætor in Sicily. Sex. Peduceius Nepos.Pro-Consul in App. Claudius Pulcher.
Macedonia.Pro-Consuls in Mam. Æmilius Lepidus.
Italy. D. Junius Brutus.Tribune of the Cn. Sicinius Nepos, who was People: killed during his tribunate.Quæstor in C. Memmius Gallus, who was farther Spain. killed during his quæstor-ship.Quæstor in I- C. Ælius Stalenus Pætus.
taly.Pro-Consuls in Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.
Spain. Cn. Pompeius Magnus.Pro-Consul in M. Fonteius Capito.
Narbonne-
Gaul.Pro-Consul in App. Claudius Pulcher.
Macedonia.

678. Y. of R.

377. Consulship. L. OCTAVIUS.
C. AURELIUS COTTA.Prætors at Q. Cassius Longinus.
Rome. C. Licinius Sacerdos.
P. Cornelius Lentulus Sura.
M. Antonius Nepos.
M. Cassius Nepos, &c.Tribune of the Q. Opimius Nepos.
People.Pro-Consuls in Q. Cæcilius Pius Numi-Spain. dicus.

Cn. Pompeius Magnus.

Pro Consul in Servilius Vatia Isauricus.
Cilicia.Pro-Consul in C. Scribonius Curio.
Macedonia.Pro-Consul in M. Junius Silanus.
Bithynia.Pro Consul in C. Claudius Nero.
Asia.Pro-Consul in Sex. Peduceius Nepos.
Sicily.Pro-Consul in M. Fonteius Capito.
Narbonne-
Gaul.Pro-Consul in Cn. Aufidius Orestes Au-Illyricum. relianus.Pro-Consul in M. Terentius Varro Lu-Macedonia. cullus.Pro-Consul in L. Gellius Publicola.
Achaia.Pro-Consul in A. Pompeius Bithynicus.
Bithynia.Pro-Quæstor M. Tullius Cicero.
in Sicily.Pro-Quæstor L. Volteius Strabo. in Bithynia.

679. Y. of R.

378. Consulship. L. LICINIUS LUCUL-LUS.M. AURELIUS COTTA.
Prætor

Prætor at Rome. C. Verres.
Prætor in Narbonne-Gaul. M. Fonteius Capito.
Tribune of the People. L. Quinctius.
 680. Y. of R.
 379. Consulship. M. TERENTIUS VARRO LUCULLUS.
 C. CASSIUS VARUS.
Pro-Consul in Chalcedon. M. Aurelius Cotta.
Prætor in Sicily. C. Verres.
 681. Y. of R.
 380. Consulship. L. GELLIUS POBLICO-LA.
 CN. CORNELIUS LENTULUS CLODIANUS.
Pro-Consul in Macedonia. C. Servilius Curio.
Tribune of the People. M. Lollius Palicanus.
 682. Y. of R.
 381. Consulship. CN. AUFIDIUS ORESTES.
 P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS SURA.
Prætors. M. Licinius Crassus.
 Cn. Pompeius Magnus.
Pro-Consul in Pontus. L. Licinius Lucullus.
 Cn. Pompeius triumphs over Spain.
 683. Y. of R.
 382. Consulship. M. LICINIUS CRASSUS.
 CN. POMPEIUS MAGNUS.
Censors. L. Gellius Publicola.
 Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Clodianus.
 The sixty-eighth Lustrum.
Prætors at Rome. M. Acilius Glabrio.
 L. Aurelius Cotta.
 684. Y. of R.
 383. Consulship. Q. HORTENSIUS.
 Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS CRETICUS.
Ædiles. M. Tullius Cicero.

Prætors. M. Cæsonius.
 M. Pupius Piso,
 Who triumphs over Spain.
 Q. Lutatius Catulus.
 685. Y. of R.
 384. Consulship. L. CÆCILIUS METELLUS, who died before he entered on his office.
 Q. MARCIUS REX.
Pro-Consul in Crete. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Creticus.
Pro-Consul in Pontus. L. Licinius Lucullus.
 686. Y. of R.
 385. Consulship. C. CALPURNIUS PISO.
 M. ACILIUS GLABRIO.
Tribunes of the People. A. Gabinius.
 L. Roscius Otho.
 C. Cornelius.
 C. Manilius.
 687. Y. of R.
 386. Consulship. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS.
 L. VOLCATIUS TULLUS.
Prætor in Africa. L. Sergius Catilina.
Prætors at Rome. M. Tullius Cicero.
 P. Vatinius.
 688. Y. of R.
 387. Consulship. L. AURELIUS COTTA.
 L. MANLIUS TORQUATUS.
Tribune of the People. C. Papius.
Censors. Q. Lutatius Catulus.
 L. Licinius Crassus. They both abdicate their office.
 689. Y. of R.
 388. Consulship. L. JULIUS CÆSAR.
 C. MARCIUS FIGULUS.
Censors. L. Aurelius Cotta.
 Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius.
 690. Y. of R.
 389. Consulship. M. TULLIUS CICERO.
 C. ANTONIUS.
Quæstor. T. Fadius.
Prætors at Rome. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer.
 Q. Pompeius Rufus.
 C. Sulpicius Gallus.
 L. Valerius Flaccus.
 C. Cosconius Nepos.
 P. Cotta.

- P. Cornelius Lentulus Surull.
L. Afranius Nepos.
C. Pomptinius.
- Curule Ædiles. L. Julius Cæsar.
P. Cornelius Lentulus Spinther.
- Tribunes of the People. P. Servilius Rullus
L. Cæcilius Metellus.
T. Atius Labienus.
T. Ampius Balbus.
- Pro-Consul against Asiatick provinces. Cn. Pompeius Magnus.
- Pro-Consul in Apulia. L. Cæcilius Metellus Creticus.
- Pro-Consul in Asia. P. Orbius.
- Pro-Quæstors in Pontus. P. Plautius Hypsæus.
M. Æmilius Scaurus.
L. Licinius Lucullus triumphs over Pontus and Cappadocia; and over Mithridates and Tigranes.
691. Y. of R.
390. Consulship. D. JUNIUS SILANUS.
L. LICINIUS MURENA.
- Prætors. C. Julius Cæsar.
Q. Tullius Cicero.
C. Virgilius Nepos.
M. Atius Balbus.
M. Valerius Messala.
M. Calpurnius Bibulus.
- Tribunes of the People. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Nepos.
L. Calpurnius Bestia.
M. Porcius Cato.
Q. Minucius Thermus.
- Quæstors. P. Sextilius Nepos.
M. Curius Nepos.
- Pro-Consul in Pontus. Cn. Pompeius Magnus.
- Pro-Consul in Macedonia. C. Antonius Nepos.
- Pro-Consul in Cisalpine Gaul. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer.
- Pro-Consul in Illyricum. C. Marcius Figulus.
- Pro-Consul in Transalpine Gaul. C. Pomptinius Nepos.
- Pro-Consul in farther Spain. C. Cosconius Nepos.
- Pro-Consul in Africa. Q. Pompeius Rufus.
- Pro Consul in L. Valerius Flaccus.
Asia.
- Quæstor in Macedonia. P. Sextius Nepos.
- Quæstor in Cisalpine Gaul. T. Fadius Gallus.
- Q. Cæcilius triumphs for the island of Crete.
692. Y. of R.
391. Consulship. M. PUPIUS PISO.
M. VALERIUS MESSALA NIGER.
- Censors. Unknown.
- The sixty-ninth Lustrum.
- Prætors at Rome. C. Octavius Rufus, the father of the Emperor Augustus.
L. Calpurnius Piso Cæsorinus.
- Curule Ædile. L. Domitius Ænobarbus.
- Tribunes of the People. Q. Fufius Calenus.
C. Cornutus.
M. Aufidius Lurco.
- Pro-Consul in Macedonia. C. Antonius Nepos.
- Pro-Prætor in Sicily. C. Virgilius Nepos.
- Pro-Prætor in farther Spain. C. Julius Cæsar.
- Pro-Prætor in Asia. Q. Tullius Cicero.
- Præsid. in Syria. M. Æmilius Scaurus.
- Præsid. in Narbonne Gaul. C. Pontinius Nepos.
- Pro Quæstor in Macedonia. P. Sestius.
- Pompey triumphs for his conquests over the chief countries of Asia, and over the Kings Mithridates and Tigranes.
693. Y. of R.
392. Consulship. L. AFRANIUS NEPOS.
Q. CÆCILIVS METELLVS.
- Prætors at Rome. P. Cornelius Spinther.
Q. Cæcilius Metellus Nepos.
- Ædiles. M. Terentius Varro.
C. Licinius Murena.
- Tribunes of the People. L. Flavius Nepos.
C. Herennius Nepos.
M. Lollius Palicanus.
- Q. Minu-

Q. Minucius Rufus.
M. Servilius Geminus.
T. Posthumius Nepos.
Pro-Prætor in Macedonia. C. Octavius Rufus.
Pro-Prætor in Asia. Q. Tullius Cicero.
Pro-Prætor in Narbonne Gaul. C. Pontinius.
President in Syria. M. Æmilius Scaurus.
Quæstor in Macedonia. M. Æmilius Paulus.

694. Y. of R.
393. Consulship. C. JULIUS CÆSAR.
M. CALPURNIUS BIBULUS.
Prætors at Rome. Licinius Crassus Dives.
Q. Fufius Calenus.
Q. Claudius Flamininus.
T. Vettius.
L. Apuleius Nepos.
L. Piso Cæsonius.
Tribunes of the People. P. Vatinius Nepos.
C. Cosconius Nepos.
Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
Q. Ancharius Nepos.
C. Fannius Strabo.
Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius Scipio.
C. Nigidius Figulus.
Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.
Quæstor at Rome.
Pro-Consul in Cisalp. Gaul. L. Afranius.
Pro-Consul in Transalpine Gaul. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer.
Prætor in hispania. P. Cornelius Lentulus Spinther.
Prætor in Syria. L. Marcus Philippus.
Prætor in Sicily. C. Virgilius Nepos.
Pro-Prætor in Asia. Q. Tullius Cicero.
Pro-Prætor in Macedonia. C. Octavius Rufus.
Quæstor in Campania. Q. Cæcilius Bassus.
Pro Quæstor in Macedonia. L. Æmilius Paulus.

695. Y. of R.
394. Consulship. L. CALPURNIUS PISO CÆSONINUS.
A. GABINIUS NEPOS.
Prætors. L. Domitius Ænobarbus.
C. Memmius Gemellus.
L. Flavius Nepos.
L. Cornelius Lentulus Crus.
P. Nigidius Figulus.
T. Ampius Balbus.
M. Terentius Varro.
Curule Ædiles. M. Æmilius Scaurus.
P. Plautius Hypsæus.
Plebeian Ædiles. L. Calpurnius Bestia.
M. Lollius Palicanus.
Tribunes of the People. P. Claudius Pulcher.
L. Antistius Nepos.
P. Ælius Ligus.
Cn. Manlius Nepos.
L. Novius Nepos.
Q. Terentius Culco.
C. Julius Cæsar.
Pro-Consul in Transalpine Gaul and Illyricum.
Prætor in Africa. T. Vettius.
Prætor in Macedonia. L. Apuleius Nepos.
Prætor in Syria. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus.
Pro-Prætor in Sicily. C. Virgilius Nepos.
Pro-Prætor in Cyprus. M. Porcius Cato.
Quæstor in Cyprus. M. Canidius Crassus.

696. Y. of R.
395. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS SPINTHER.
Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS NEPOS.
Prætors at Rome. L. Cæcilius Rufus.
App. Claudius Pulcher.
M. Calidius Nepos.
C. Cornutus.
Tribunes of the People. T. Annius Milo Papianus.
P. Sextius Nepos.
C. Sestilius Nepos.
M. Cispus Lævus.
T. Fadius Gallus.
M. Curius

- M. Curius Nepos.
 Q. Fabricius Nepos.
 C. Messius Nepos.
 Sex. Atilius Serranus.
 N. Quinctius Gracchus.
Pre-Consul in C. Julius Cæsar.
Transalpine
Gaul and Il-
lyria.
Pre-Consul in L. Calpurnius Piso Cæso-
Macedonia. ninus.
Pre-Consul in A. Gabinus Nepos.
Syria.
Prætor in Bithy- C. Memmius Gemellus.
nia and Pontus.
Prætor in Ci- T. Ampius Balbus.
licia.
Pre-Prætor in M. Porcius Cato.
Cyprus.
 697. Y. of R.
 396. Consulship. CN. CORNELIUS LEN-TULUS MARCELLI-NUS.
Prætors at L. MARCIUS PHILIPPUS.
Rome. C. Claudius Pulcher.
 T. Posthumius Nepos.
 Q. Ancharius Nepos.
 Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
 M. Æmilius Scaurus.
Curule Ædiles. P. Clodius Pulcher.
 M. Claudius Marcellus.
Tribunes of the C. Porcius Cato.
People. Sex. Nonnius Suffenas.
 L. Proculus Nepos.
 A. Plautius Silvanus.
 L. Racilius Nepos.
 C. Cassius Longinus.
 L. Caninius Gallus.
 Antistius Severus.
 P. Rutilius Lupus.
 Cn. Plancius Nepos.
Pre-Consul in C. Julius Cæsar.
the Gauls.
Pre-Consul in L. Calpurnius Piso Cæso-
Macedonia. ninus.
Pre-Consul in A. Gabinus Nepos.
Syria.
Pre-Consul in Q. Cæcilius Metellus Ne-lithæ Spain. pos.
Pre-Consul in P. Cornelius Lentulus
Cilicia and Spinther,
Cyprus.
- Prætor in Sar-* App. Claudius Pulcher, dinia.
Prætor in Africa. Q. Valerius Orca.
 698. Y. of R.
 397. Consulship. CN. POMPEIUS MAG-NUS, the second time.
 M. LICINIUS CRASSUS,
 the second time.
Consuls. M. Valerius Messala Niger.
 M. Calpurnius Bibulus.

The seventieth Lustrum.
Prætors at P. Vatinius Nepos.
Rome. C. Cosconius Nepos.
 C. Fannius Strabo.
 C. Fannius Nepos.
Curule Ædiles. L. Æmilius Paulus.
 L. Sempronius Atratinus.
Plebeian Ædile. C. Messius Nepos.
Tribunes of the C. Trebonius Asper.
People. C. Atteius Capito.
 P. Aquilius Gallus.
 Q. Cæcilius Metellus Creti-
 cus.
Pre-Consul in C. Julius Cæsar.
the Gauls.
Pre-Consul in A. Gabinus Nepos.
Syria.
Pre-Consul in Q. Cæcilius Metellus lithæ Spain. Nepos.
Pre-Consul in P. Cornelius Lentulus
Cilicia and Spinther.
Cyprus.
Pre-Consul in Q. Ancharius.
Macedonia.
Pre-Consul in M. Æmilius Scaurus.
Sardinia.
Prætor in Asia. C. Clodius Pulcher.
Quæstors. L. Roscius Nepos.
 C. Scribonius Curio.
 699. Y. of R.
 398. Consulship. L. DOMITIUS ÆNO-BARBUS.
 APP. CLAUDIUS PUL-
 CHER.
Prætors. T. Annius Milo Papianus.
 C. Albius Nepos.
 M. Portius Cato.
 Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
 P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus.
 Ser.

Ser. Sulpicius Galba.
 Curule Ædiles. Cn. Plancius Nepos.
A. Plautius Silvanus.
 Plebeian Ædile. Q. Pedius Nepos.
 Tribunes of the C. Memmius Nepos.
 People. D. Lælius Balbus.
Terentius Varro.
Q. Mucius Scævola.
 Quæstors. Faustus Cornelius Sylla.
A. Hirtius Nepos.
 Pro-Consul in C. Julius Cæsar.
 the Gauls.
 Pro-Consul in Cn. Pompeius Magnus.
 Spain.
 Pro-Consul in M. Licinius Crassus.
 Syria.
 Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Lentulus
 Cilicia and Spinther.
 Cyprus.
 Pro-Prætor in C. Clodius Pulcher.
 Asia.
 Quæstors. M. Licinius Crassus.
Q. Cassius Longinus.
C. Cassius Longinus.
L. Cornelius Balbus.
C. Lælius Nepos.
M. Tullius Nepos.
C. Sextius Gallus.
C. Pomptinus Nepos triumphs over the Allabroges.

700. Y. of R.

399. Consulship. CN. DOMITIUS CALVINUS.
M. VALERIUS MESSALA.
 Prætors at L. Æmilius Paulus.
 Rome. P. Sestius Nepos.
Voconius Nepos.
 Ædiles. M. Favonius Nepos.
M. Juventius Laterensis.
 Tribunes of the Q. Pompeius Rufus.
 People. C. Lucceius Hirrus.
P. Licinius Crassus Junianus.
M. Cælius Vicinianus.
 Pro-Consul in C. Julius Cæsar.
 the Gauls.
 Pro-Consul in Cn. Pompeius Magnus.
 Spain.
 Pro-Consul in M. Licinius Crassus.
 Syria.
 Pro-Consul in Ap. Claudius Pulcher.
 Cilicia and Cyprus.

701. Y. of R.

400. Consulship. CN. POMPEIUS MAGNUS alone, the third time.
 Seven months after he associated with him
C. CÆCILIUS METELLUS SCIPIO.
 Prætors at A. Manlius Torquatus.
 Rome. L. Fabius Nepos.
Favonius Nepos.
M. Confidius Nonianus.
 Tribunes of the Q. Pompeius Rufus.
 People. F. Munatius Plancus Bursa.
C. Sallustius Crispus.
M. Cælius Rufus.
Manilius Caninianus.
M. Vibullius Rufus.
L. Livineius Regulus.
 Pro-Consul in C. Julius Cæsar.
 the Gauls.
 Under Pompey's orders.
 Pro-Consuls in L. Afranius.
 Spain. M. Petreius.
 Pro-Consul in Ap. Claudius Pulcher.
 Cilicia and
 Cyprus.
 Prætor in A- L. Caninius Gallus.
 chaia.
 Quæstor in the M. Antonius Nepos.
 Gauls.

702. Y. of R.

401. Consulship. SER. SULPICIUS RUFUS.
M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS.
 Prætors at A. Plautius Silvanus.
 Rome. M. Juventius Laterensis.
M. Favonius.
C. Ateius Capito.
 Pro-Prætor in C. Julius Cæsar.
 the Gauls.
 Pro-Prætor in Cn. Pompeius Magnus.
 Spain.
 Pro-Prætor in M. Calpurnius Bibulus.
 Syria.
 Pro-Prætor in M. Tullius Cicero.
 Cilicia and
 Cyprus.
 Pro-Prætor in Q. Minucius Thermus.
 Asia.
 Pro-Prætor in P. Atius Varro.
 Africa.

Quæstors

Quæstors in Cn. Velutius Saturninus.

Cilicia and L. Messius Rufus.

Cyprus.

Quæstor in Cn. Sallustius Nepos.

Syria.

Pro-Quæstor M. Antonius Nepos.

in the Gauls.

Pro-Quæstor C. Cassius Longinus.

in Syria.

P. Cornelius Lentulus Spinther triumphs for Cilicia.

703. Y. of R.

402. Consulship. L. ÆMILIUS PAULUS.

C. CLAUDIUS MARCEL-LUS.

Censors.

Appius Claudius Pulcher.

L. Calpurnius Piso Cæsoni-nus.

The seventy-first Lustrum.

Prætors at Rome.

C. Titius Rufus.

C. Curtius Peduceianus.

M. Portius Cato, the second time.

M. Livius Drusus.

Curule-Ediles. M. Cælius Rufus.

M. Octavius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. C. Scribonius Curio.

C. Furnius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in
the Gauls. C. Julius Cæsar.

Pro-Consul in Spain. Cn. Pompeius Magnus.

Pro-Consul in Syria. M. Calpurnius Bibulus.

Pro-Consul in Cilicia and Cyprus. M. Tullius Cicero.

Pro-Prætor in Sicily. Furcius Nepos.

Pro-Prætor in Africa. C. Confidius Longus.

Quæstor in Cilicia. C. Cælius Caldus.

Quæstor in Sy-
ria. L. Marius Nepos.

Quæstor in Macedonia. T. Antistius.

Pro-Quæstor
in Cilicia. L. Messius Rufus.

Pro Quæstor
in Asia. C. Antonius Nepos.

704. Y. of R.

403. Consulship. C. CLAUDIUS MARCEL-LUS.

L. CORNELIUS LENTU-LUS CRUS.

Dictator.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR.

Prætors.

M. Æmilius Lepidus.

L. Roscius Nepos.

C. Allienius Nepos.

C. Sosius Nepos.

L. Manlius Torquatus.

P. Rutilius Lupus.

C. Coponius Nepos.

Sex. Peduceius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People.

M. Antonius Nepos.

Q. Cassius Longinus.

C. Cassius Longinus.

L. Cæcilius Metellus.

L. Marcius Philippus.

A. Hirtius Nepos.

C. Lælius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in Syria.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus Scipio.

Pro-Prætor in Sicily. M. Porcius Cato.

Pro-Prætor in Sardinia. M. Aurelius Cotta.

Pro Prætor in Africa. L. Ælius Tubero.

Pro-Prætor in Cilicia and Cyprus. P. Sestius Nepos.

Pro Prætor in Bithynia and Pontus. Calvisius Sabinus.

705. Y. of R.

404. Consulship. C. JULIUS CÆSAR, the second time.

P. SER' ILIUS VATIA I-SAURICUS.

Prætors.

C. Trebonius Nepos.

M. Cælius Rufus.

Q. Pedius.

P. Sulpicius Galba.

A. Posthumius Albinus.

Ædiles.

C. Albius Carrinas.

C. Marcius Figulus.

L. Cornelius Balbus.

Tribune of the People.

A. Hirtius.

Quæstors.

M. Claudius Marcellus.

P. Cor-

P. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus.
C. Plautius.
T. Claudius Nero.

706. Y. of R.
 405. Consulship.
 Dictator II. C. JULIUS CÆSAR.
G. of the Horse. M. Antonius.
Q. FUFIVS CALENVS.
PUBLIVS VATINIUS.
Prætors. L. Muffidius Longus.
C. Sallustius Crispus.
Tribunes of the People. L. Cornelius Balbus.
P. Cornelius Dolabella.
L. Trebellius.
C. Afinius Pollio, &c.
Quæstor in Asia. M. Apulcius.
Quæstor in Syria. Sex. Julius Cæsar.
Quæstor in Cyprus. C. Sextilius Rufus.

707. Y. of R.
 406. Consulship. C. JULIUS CÆSAR, the third time.
M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS.
Ædiles. L. Cornelius Balbus.
Vopifcus Julius Cæsar.
Tribune of the People. P. Ventidius Bassus.

708. Y. of R.
 407. Consulship.
 Dictator III. C. JULIUS CÆSAR,
Consul IV. sine collega.
G. of the Horse. M. Æmilius Lepidus.
 Before the end of the year, Cæsar nominates to the consulship
Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS.
CAIVS TREBONIUS,
 who dies, and in whose place is substituted
C. CANINIUS REBILVS.
Tribunes of the People. Pontius Aquila.
L. Munacius Plancus.
Curule Ædiles. Q. Hortenfius Nepos.
P. Sura Nepos.
Plebei Ædiles. L. Trebellius Nepos.
L. Ælius Lamia.
Quæstor in Syria. C. Antistius Vetus.

Quæstor in farther Spain. L. Cornelius Balbus.

709. Y. of R.
 408. Consulship.
 Dictator IV. C. JULIUS CÆSAR,
Consul V. with
M. ANTONIVS.
 Before the end of the year Cæsar appoints to his place
P. CORNELIVS DOLABELLA.
Prætors. M. Junius Brutus Cæpio.
Caius Cassius, &c.
Tribunes of the People. L. Cæsetius Flavius.
C. Epidius Marullus.
C. Helvius Cinna.

710. Y. of R.
 409. Consulship. A. HIRTIUS.
C. VIBIVS PANSA.
 In whose room were substituted
C. JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANVS.
Q. PEDIUS.
 And, in the room of these,
P. VENTIDIUS.
CAIVS CARRINNVS.
Prætors. Q. Gallius Lupercus.
M. Cornutus.
M. Acilius Crassus.
Cn. Munacius Plancus, &c.
Tribunes of the People. P. Servilius Casca.
P. Titius.
P. Apuleius, &c.

711. Y. of R.
 410. Consulship. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDVS II.
L. MUNACIVS PLANCVS.
Prætors. L. Cornelius Balbus.
L. Ælius Lamia.

712. Y. of R.
 411. Consulship. L. ANTONIVS.
P. SERVILIUS VATIA ISAVRICVS II.
Prætors. T. Claudius Nero.
L. Marcius Censorinus, &c.
Quæstors. C. Rubellius.
Q. Confidius Gallus.
L. Egnatius Rufus.

P. Ser-

P. Servilius Posthumus, &c.
713. Y. of R.

412. Consulship. CN. DOMITIUS CALVINUS.

C. ASINIUS POLLIO.

In whose room were substituted

Q. CORNELIUS BALBUS.

P. CANIDIUS CRASSUS.

Prætors.

M. Vipfanius Agrippa.

C. Coponius.

Tribune of the People.

P. Falcidius.

714. Y. of R.

413. Consulship. L. MARCIUS CENSORIUS.

C. CALVISIUS SABINUS.

715. Y. of R.

414. Consulship. APPIUS CLAUDIUS PULCHER.

C. NORBANUS FLAC-
CUS.

Curule Ædile. P. Rutilius Rufus.

716. Y. of R.

415. Consulship. M. VIPSANIUS AGRIPPA.

L. CANINIUS GALLUS.

Ædile.

M. Oppius Nepos.

717. Y. of R.

416. Consulship. L. GELLIUS POBLICOLA.

M. COCCEIUS NERVA.

Curule Ædile. Q. Catulus Nepos.

718. Y. of R.

417. Consulship. L. CORNIFICIUS.

SEXT. POMPEIUS.

719. Y. of R.

418. Consulship. M. ANTONIUS II.

L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO.

720. Y. of R.

419. Consulship. C. JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS II.

L. VOLCATIUS TULLUS.

Ædile.

M. Agrippa.

721. Y. of R.

420. Consulship. CN. DOMITIUS AHE-NOBARBUS.

C. SOSIUS.

Tribune of the People.

Nonius Balbus.

722. Y. of R.

421. Consulship. C. JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS III.

M. VALERIUS MESSALA CORVINUS.

Quæstor.

M. Æmilius Anianus Flaccus.

723. Y. of R.

422. Consulship. C. JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS IV.

M. LICINIUS CRASSUS.

724. Y. of R.

423. Consulship. C. JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS V.

SEX. APULEIUS.

E N D of the Fourth and Last Volume.

A GENERAL

A

GENERAL INDEX

TO THE WHOLE WORK.

N. B. The Roman Numerals point out the Volume, and the Figures direct to the Page where each Article is to be found.

A.

ABELOX, a Spaniard, his treachery to the Carthaginians II. 156
Abgarus, an Arabian Chief, misleads and betrays Crassus into the hands of the Parthians — III. 531
Aborigines, inquiry into the etymology of that term — I. 5, note g.
 History of the people so termed — 6
Abydos, obstinate defence of that town against Philip of Macedon — II. 306
Achaëans, are gained over to the Roman interest in the war with Macedon, by the Consul Flaminius — II. 315
 Make war on the Lacedæmonians under Philopæmon — 346
 Declare for the Romans against Antiochus — 350
 Speech of their Prætor Lycortas to the Roman Commissioners — 376
 Refuse the friendship of Perſes King of Macedon — 396
 Are relieved from the obligation of sending a supply of men to Appius Claudius, by Polybius — 427
 Tyrannic treatment of, by the Roman Commissioners — 447
 Vol. IV.

Defeat the Lacedæmonians — 486
 Insult the Roman deputies — 488
 Their forces defeated by Metellus ibid.
 Are again defeated by Mummius — 489
Acbillas, Captain of the guard to Ptolemy, King of Egypt, is commissioned to murder Pompey on his taking refuge there after the battle of Pharsalia IV. 143
 Is appointed to command Ptolemy's army against Cleopatra — 151
 Is put to death by Arsinoë — 153
Acilius Glabrio, M. General of the war in Greece, subdues Thessaly — II. 354
 Defeats Antiochus the Great at Thermopylæ — 355
 His haughty reception of the Ætolian deputies sent to ask for peace — 356
Acron, King of Canina, makes war against the Romans — I. 34
 Is killed by Romulus — 35
Actium, the naval battle of, between Octavius and M. Antony — IV. 429
Adherbal, defeats the Romans in a naval engagement — II. 52
Adherbal, son of Micipsa, King of Numidia, is overcome by Jugurtha, and flies to Rome — III. 17
 Obtains a share of the kingdom, but is again
 O O O

I N D E X.

| | | | | | |
|--|---|-------------------|---|---------|---------------|
| again drove out by Jugurtha | — | 21 | overthrow | — | II. 95 |
| Applies to Rome for assistance | — | 22 | Æmilius Paulus, L. chosen Consul | II. 158 | |
| Yields himself up to Jugurtha, and is cruelly put to death by him | — | 23 | His address to the army before the battle of Cannæ | — | 160 |
| Adoption , the laws of, among the Romans, | — | III. 409, note c. | Is killed in that battle | — | 166 |
| Æduetici , retire to a strong fort on the defeat of the Nervii, and are besieged by Julius Cæsar | — | III. 611 | Æmilius Paulus, L. his character | II. 428 | |
| Make a fraudulent submission to Cæsar | — | 612 | Is chosen Consul and appointed to conduct the war in Macedon | — | ibid. |
| Attack the Romans, are defeated, and the survivors sold for slaves | — | 613 | His harangue to the people before his departure | — | 432 |
| Æburian law passed | — | II. 87 | Forces a passage into Macedonia | — | 433 |
| Ædiles , the first creation of | — | I. 184 | Defeats Perſes at Pydna | — | 435 |
| For the chronological series of these officers, see the tables of Consular Calendar, at the conclusion of volumes II. and IV. | — | | Macedonia submits to him | — | 438 |
| Ædui , how reduced to subjection by the Sequani | — | III. 647, note. | Perſes surrenders himself | — | 440 |
| Differences among them decided by Cæsar | — | 666 | Regulates the government of Macedon | — | 445 |
| Are engaged in a revolt against the Romans by Convictolitanus | — | 668 | His tyrannic treatment of the Grecian States | — | 446 |
| Æmilius, Scipio , was spectator of Massinissa's victory over the Carthaginians, | — | II. 468. | Gives a body of laws to Macedon | — | 447 |
| Distinguishes himself when a legionary Tribune in the third Punic war | — | 475 | Plunders the Epirots | — | 449 |
| Settles the kingdom of Masylia at Massinissa's desire at his death | — | 476 | His magnificent triumph | — | 450 |
| Is chosen Consul | — | 478 | His domestic misfortunes | — | 452 |
| His family and history | — | 478, note. | Æneas , how forced to quit the Trojan territories | — | I. 2. |
| Succeeds to the command before Carthage | — | 479 | Lands in Italy | — | 3 |
| Reforms discipline | — | 480 | Arrives at Latium | — | 4 |
| Forces a passage into the city | — | 482 | His speech to Latinus | — | 10 |
| Carthage destroyed | — | 484 | Marries Lavinia | — | 11 |
| Æmilius Barbula, L. ravages the territories of Tarentum | — | I. 602 | Becomes King of Latium | — | ibid. |
| Æmilius, L. his speech in the Senate, in favour of the Agrarian law | — | I. 286 | His death | — | 12 |
| Æmilius Lepidus, M. besieges Palantia in conjunction with his father-in-law Brutus, but is forced to give up the enterprise | — | II. 514 | Æqui , a bloody battle between, and the Volsci | — | I. 247 |
| Æmilius, Mancinus , Dictator, defeats the Fidenates and Veientes under Tolamnius, King of the latter | — | I. 395 | Conclude a peace with the Romans | — | 248 |
| Is elected Dictator again, and shortens the term of the office of Censor | — | 397 | Copy of the treaty | — | 249 |
| Is a third time chosen Dictator, and defeats the Fidenates | — | 400 | Besiege Rome, during the plague, in conjunction with the Volsci | — | 292 |
| Æmilius Papus, L. gives the Gauls a signal | — | | Surprise the citadel of Tusculum | — | 313 |
| | | | Are dispossessed and made to pass under the yoke | — | ibid. |
| | | | Ravage the Tusculan territories | — | 315 |
| | | | Invest the camp of the Consul Minucius | — | 316 |
| | | | Are reduced by the Dictator Cincinnatus | — | 318 |
| | | | Invade the Tusculan territories | — | 326 |
| | | | Are routed by the Consul Romilius, and their camp seized by Sicinius Dentatus | — | 328 |
| | | | Revolt, and are subdued | — | 564 |
| | | | Æsculapius , his history, deification, and worship | — | I. 591, note. |
| | | | His snake brought to Rome to cure the plague | — | 592 |
| | | | Ætolians , a confederacy formed by, with the | — | |

I N D E X.

- the Romans, against Philip of Macedon, II. 214
 Are twice defeated by Philip 227
 Terms of peace imposed on them 269
 Decline taking part between Rome and Macedon — — 310
 Join the Romans and are worsted by Philip — — 311
 Their arrogance on the battle of Cyncephalus — — 321
 Stir up commotions in Greece against the Romans — — 342
 Invite the assistance of Antiochus 348
 Ask peace of the Romans — 355
 Refuse the terms proposed — 358
 Another fruitless application to Rome 364
 Obtain a peace on severe terms 367
 Barbarous tyranny exercised over them by Roman influence — 446
Afranius, Pompey's Lieutenant in Spain, skirmishes between his forces and those of Julius Cæsar — IV. 75
 Is harrassed by Cæsar on his march 80
 His conference with Cæsar — 86
 Is forced to disband his army — 87
 Is defeated in Africa by Sitius — 188 Africanus. See Scipio.
Agathocles, his history. — II. 11, note.
Agisipolis, Chief of the Rhodian embassy, his speech to the Roman Senate II. 441
Agrarian law, the first proposal of, by the Consul Spurius Cassius — I. 250
 The demand of revived — 323
 The people hindered from passing it by the violence of the Patricians 325
 Is again agitated — 409
 Is passed by the assistance of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus — II. 525 Commissioners chosen for the distribution of lands — — ibid.
 The execution of the commission suspended by contests — 546
 Is abrogated on the death of the Gracchi 560
Agrigentum, is besieged by the Romans II. 22.
 Is deserted by Hannibal — 24
Agrippa, Menenius, his speech in the Senate on the secession of the two consular armies to the Mons Sacer — I. 172
 His speech to the legions as deputy from the Senate. — — 180
 His death and magnificent obsequies 185
Agrippa, M. Vipsanius, Consul, constructs the Julian port — IV. 383 Defeats Sextus Pompey's navy 392
 Takes Tyndaris — 396
 Gives Pompey's navy another overthrow, ibid.
 Accepts the Ædileship — 419
 His public works for the embellishment of Rome. — — ibid.
 Commands Octavius's fleet against Antony — 427
 Defeats Antony at the battle of Actium 429
Alabanda, in Asia, the gross adulation of this town to the city of Rome. II. 421 Alba, the city of, built by Ascanius I. 14.
 United with Lavinium into one kingdom under Silvius — — ibid.
 Succession of its Kings — — ibid.
 How engaged in a war with Rome 66
 Treaty concluded between them — 68
 The superiority adjudged to Rome by the victory of the Horatii over the Curiatii 69
 Is demolished by Tullus Hostilius, and the inhabitants transplanted to Rome 72
Albinovanus, treacherously murders his guests of the Marian party at an entertainment III. 157
Alesia, a city of Gaul, is besieged by Julius Cæsar — III. 679
 Is surrendered — 686
Alexander, King of Epirus, invades Italy I. 526 Enters into a treaty with the Romans ibid.
 Account of his death — 532
Alexander Balas, defeats and kills Demetrius Soter, and seizes the kingdom of Syria, II. 467
Alexandria, the library there burnt IV. 152
 Description of the Pharos — ibid.
 See Antony and Cleopatra, &c.
Allia, the Romans defeated on the banks of, by Brennus, the Gaulish General I. 440
Allobroges, are successively defeated by the Consuls Domitius and Fabius III. 12.
Allucius, a Prince of Celtiberia, receives his captive mistress from the hands of P. Scipio — II. 245
 Brings a reinforcement to him in return 246
Altinius, Dacius, his treacherous conduct between the Romans and Carthaginians — — II. 200
 O o o z Cruel

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|---|--------------|--|--------------|
| Cruel treatment of his family by Hannibal | 201 | Is put to death by Perſes | 303 |
| Ambrox , Chief of the Eburones in Gaul, his revolt againſt the Romans III. | 634 | Antiochus , the Great, his deſcent and poſſeſſions | II. 325 |
| Betrays the troops under Sabinus into ambuſh | 636 | Sends ambaffadors to Rome to treat of an alliance | 338 |
| Murders Sabinus and totally deſtroys his troops | 637 | Marries his daughters to the Kings of Egypt and Cappadocia | 342 |
| Attacks the camp of Q. Cicero | 638 | Reſolves on a war with Rome | 345 |
| Is defeated by the unexpected arrival of Julius Cæſar | 641 | Hannibal's advice to him | ibid. |
| Is ſurprized by a party of Cæſar's horſe, and forced to fly | 650 | Is diſſuaded by Thoas from ſending Hannibal to Italy | 347 |
| Ambrox , a great victory obtained over them and the Teutoni by Caius Marius III. | 82 | Is received by the Ætolians | 348 |
| Anibcar, Barcha , is ſent from Carthage to command the troops in Sicily II. | 57 | Is reſuſed admittance to Chalcis | 349 |
| Seizes Eryx | 59 | Is received at Chalcis | 351 |
| Ends the war by concluding a peace with the Conſul Lutatius | 63 | Marries and ſpends the winter in feaſting | 353 |
| Defeats the rebellious mercenaries | 74 | Is defeated by the Romans at Thermopylæ | 355 |
| Again defeats them | 76 | His fleet defeated | 358 |
| Entirely deſtroys them | 80, 81 | His fleet under Hannibal worſted | 360 |
| Review of his intentions towards Rome | 102 | His fleet under Polyxenidas defeated | 361 |
| Is killed in Spain | 103 | Makes propoſals of peace | ibid. |
| Amifus , a city of Pontus, is taken by Lucullus by aſſault | III. 233 | Sends Scipio Africanus his ſon | 362 |
| Amulius , King of Alba, his hiſtory I. | 15 | Battle of Magnesia | ibid. |
| Is killed by Romulus | 18 | Obtains peace | 363, 368 |
| Ansus Martius , grandſon of Numa Pompilius, choſen the fourth King of Rome I. | 74 | His death | 442 |
| Reduces the Latines | 75 | Antiochus Asiaticus , the laſt of the Seleucidæ, is depoſed by Pompey | III. 257 |
| Rome enlarged and improved by him | ibid. | Antiochus Epiphanes , how he obtained the crown of Syria | II. 442 |
| His other civil and military tranſactions | 76 | His ambitious war on Egypt | ibid. |
| Dies | ibid. | Is obliged to deſiſt from his conqueſts by Popilius, the Roman ambaffador | 443 |
| Andriſcus , impoſes himſelf on the Macedonians as a ſon of Perſes, and is acknowledged King | II. 477 | His death | 459 |
| Andromachus , undertakes to guide Craſſus in his retreat from Parthia, and betrays him to the Parthians | III. 536 | Antipater , commotions excited by him in Judæa | III. 257 |
| Anicius , Prætor, reduces Gentius, King of Illyricum | II. 432 | Antium , is taken from the Volſci by T. Quinctius | I. 290 |
| Reduces Epirus | 444 | A colony ſent there | 291 |
| Triumphs | 453 | A council held there by Brutus, Caſſius, and Cicero, after the death of Cæſar | IV. 211 |
| Annius , L. Preſident of the Latine council, his embaffy to the Roman Senate I. | 515 | Antennius , or Antony , Lucius , brother of M. Antony, elected Conſul | IV. 378 |
| Antigenus , couſin-german to Philip of Macedon, diſcovers the treachery of Perſes to his brother Demetrius II. | 392 | Unites with Fulvia in making a breach between his brother and Octavius | ibid. |
| | | Flies with his brother's children to the provinces under his protection | 379 |
| | | Is reduced to ſurrender himſelf up to Octavius | 381 |
| | | Is ſent by Octavius Pro-Conſul into Spain | 382 |
| | | Antennius , Marcus , Prætor, is ſent to reduce the Cilician pirates | III. 215 |

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|---|--------------|---|--------------|
| Is defeated, and dies of grief | 216 | Surprises Pansa's army, but is afterward | |
| Antonius, or Antony, Marcus, is elected Tri- | | defeated by Hirtius | 301 |
| bune | IV. 15 | Is defeated before Mutina by the two Con- | |
| An account of his life previous to the | | suls | 304 |
| commencement of the civil wars | ibid. | Is joined by Lepidus | 332 |
| | note 2. | Is joined by Pollio and Plancus | 352 |
| His speech to the people against Pompey's | | The second triumvirate formed by him, | |
| measures | 17 | Octavius, and Lepidus | 356 |
| His letter to Cicero exhorting him to join | | His share in the proscriptions that fol- | |
| with Cæsar | 59 | lowed | 364 |
| The command of the forces in Italy given | | The first battle of Philippi | 370 |
| to him by Cæsar | 71 | Defeats Brutus at the second battle of | |
| Drives Libo, Pompey's admiral, from | | Philippi | 372 |
| the harbour of Brundisium | 115 | Goes to the Eastern provinces to raise | |
| Follows Cæsar with troops into Greece | | money for his soldiers | 374 |
| | 117 | His extortions and voluptuousness in Asia | |
| His post at the battle of Pharsalia | 136 | | 375 |
| Is chosen Master of the Horse to Cæsar as | | Is captivated by the charms of Cleopatra, | |
| Dictator | 168 | | 376 |
| The cause of his opposition to the Tri- | | Spends a whole year luxuriously with | |
| bune Dolabella | ibid. | Cleopatra in Egypt | 377 |
| Purchases Pompey's estate and houses | 169 | His wife Fulvia creates dissensions in Ita- | |
| Is distressed for money to pay for his pur- | | ly, in order to draw him home | 378 |
| chase | 208 | Fulvia dies of grief | 383 |
| Hinders Dolabella from obtaining the | | Domitius Ahenobarbus surrenders up his | |
| consulship | 239 | fleet to him | ibid. |
| Divorces his wife and marries Fulvia, the | | Is reconciled to Octavius and marries | |
| widow of Clodius | ibid. | Octavia | ibid. |
| Offers the regal title to Cæsar | 241 | An accommodation entered into with Sex- | |
| Marries his daughter to the son of Lepi- | | tus Pompey | 384 |
| dus | 260 | Loiters away his time at Athens with his | |
| Advises conciliatory measures with the | | new wife | 385 |
| conspirators against Cæsar | ibid. | The war with Pompey renewed | 387 |
| Makes an oration to the people over Cæ- | | A difference between him and Octavius | |
| sar's body | 262 | prevented by his wife Octavia | 389 |
| Temporises with the conspirators | 266 | Returns into the East | 390 |
| Makes a progress through Italy | 267 | Sends for Cleopatra into Syria, and grants | |
| Letter from Brutus and Cassius to him | 268 | all her ambitious demands | 401 |
| Prepares for war against them | 269 | Prepares to undertake his Parthian expe- | |
| Seizes the public treasure | 270 | dition | 402 |
| Enters into an accommodation with | | His Lieutenant Oppius, with two le- | |
| young Sextus Pompey in Spain | 272 | gions, cut to pieces by Phraates | 403 |
| His invectives against Cicero in the Se- | | Gains a trifling advantage over the Par- | |
| nate | 278 | thian forces | 404 |
| Letter sent to him from Brutus and Cas- | | Compounds with Phraates for a safe re- | |
| sus | 279 | treat | 405 |
| Goes to Brundisium to raise forces | 282 | Is attacked by him on his march back | |
| Returns to Rome with an army | 284 | | ibid. |
| Leaves the city precipitately to seize Ci- | | Is continually harrassed by him during | |
| salpine Gaul | ibid. | his march | 406, 407 |
| The Senate sends peremptory orders to | | Escapes out of Parthia | 409 |
| desist from his design | 289 | Returns to Alexandria with Cleopatra | 410 |
| His proposals to the Senate | 290 | Sextus Pompey put to death by his or- | |
| His letter to Hirtius and Octavius | 297 | ders | 414 |
| | | | Li |

I N D E X.

- Is encouraged by the King of Media to undertake another expedition into Parthia ——— 416
- Seizes Artabazes, King of Armenia ibid.
- Triumphs at Alexandria ——— 417
- His treaty with Artabazes, King of Media ——— ibid.
- Refuses a visit from Octavia ——— ibid.
- Declares Cleopatra his wife ——— 418
- Divorces Octavia ——— 421
- His accusation against Octavius sent to the Senate ——— 422
- Joins his army at Ephesus ——— ibid.
- His will seized and made public by Octavius ——— 423
- Amount of his forces ——— 425
- Is totally defeated at Actium ——— 429
- His overtures to Octavius ——— 434
- The remainder of his fleet and troops go over to Octavius ——— 435
- Stabs himself ——— 437
- His death and character ——— ibid.
- Is magnificently buried by Cleopatra ——— 440
- Antyllus*, a Lictor, insults the people at a Comitia, and is killed by them — II. 557
- Apollonia*, a city of Macedon, sends an embassy to Rome ——— I. 631
- Appian way*, the road so called, constructed ——— I. 555
- Appius Claudius*. See Claudius.
- Appian Pulcher* is tried on the accusation of Dolabella, for misconduct in Cilicia, and acquitted by the assistance of his successor Cicero ——— III. 575
- Cicero's letters to him ——— 580
- Is chosen Censor ——— 585
- Asiaticus*, Praetor of Sicily, reduces the revolted slaves, under their King Athenis, in that island ——— III. 90
- Is brought to trial for extortion in his province ——— 96
- Is sent into Asia to restore the Kings of Bithynia and Cappadocia ——— 120
- Is given up to Mithridates by the people of Mitylene, and put to a reproachful death ——— 125
- Aquitania*, a province of ancient Gaul, its boundaries ——— III. 585
- See Gaul.
- A revolt there suppressed by Publius Crassus ——— 613
- Aracinae*, a colony of, settled in Italy under Evander ——— I. 6
- Civilise the Aborigines ——— 8
- Archagathus*, introduces the art of surgery into Rome ——— II. 120. note.
- Archelaus*, General to Mithridates, King of Pontus, takes Delos, and plunders the temple of Apollo ——— III. 137
- Defends the Pirrus at Athens against Sylla ——— ibid.
- His vast army defeated by Sylla ——— 142
- Is suspected of betraying his trust in this action ——— 145
- Takes refuge with Muræna, and encourages him to attack Mithridates ——— 224
- Archimedes*, his surprising machines for the defence of the city of Syracuse against the Romans ——— II. 199
- Is killed on the capture of the city ——— 209
- Ardea*, and Aricia, a tract of land litigated between these cities, seized by the Romans ——— I. 381
- The Romans put an end to a civil war among the Ardeates ——— 391
- The Romans make them amends for the seizure of their land ——— 392
- Arctas*, King of Arabia Petraea, assists Hyrcanus against Aristobulus, King of Judæa ——— III. 257
- Is forced to return home by the Romans ——— 258
- Is reduced to a submission by Pompey ——— 262
- Argus*, is delivered up to Nabis by Philip of Macedon ——— II. 320
- The inhabitants recover their liberty ——— 337
- Ariarathes*, King of Cappadocia, is driven from his kingdom by Demetrius Soter ——— II. 462
- The kingdom shared between him and his supposititious brother Holophernes, by a Roman decree ——— 463
- Is killed in assisting the Romans against Pergamus ——— 545
- Ariarathes*, son of Mithridates, King of Pontus, seizes on Cappadocia by his father's order ——— III. 121
- Artes*, or battering-ram, the several sorts of this machine described I. 141. note 6.
- Arisbarzanes*, King of Cappadocia, is expelled from his kingdom by Mithridates, King of Pontus ——— III. 100
- Is restored by Sylla ——— 104
- Is again dethroned by Mithridates ——— 120
- Is reinstated by the Roman Commissioners ——— 121
- Ariscaranes*, King of Cappadocia, is protected

I N D E X.

- rected and advised by Cicero, when Governor of Cilicia — III. 552
 His poverty — 554, note.
Ariovistus, a German Prince, his tyranny
 in Gaul — III. 597
 Messages between him and Julius Cæsar
 — 598
 His interview with Cæsar — 602
 Confines Cæsar's deputies — 604
 His reasons for declining a battle with
 Cæsar — 605
 Is forced by him to an engagement, and routed — 606
Aristarchus, an orator of Tarentum, escapes from the hands of Pyrrhus, and goes to Rome — I. 609
Aristian, an Epicurean philosopher, persuades the Athenians to take part with Mithridates, King of Pontus, against Rome — III. 136
 Assumes the supreme power in Athens for Mithridates — 137
 Is condemned to death by Sylla, on taking the city — 141
 Is put to death — 145
Aristo, a tragedian, discloses a conspiracy, and occasions a revolution in Syracuse
 — II. 194
Aristobulus, is made King of Judæa, on his brother Hyrcanus being deposed III.
 — 257
 Pleads his cause before Pompey — 261
 Is put in chains by Pompey for his dupli-
 city — 267
 Marches in the procession at Pompey's triumph — 393, note.
 Is set at liberty by Julius Cæsar IV. 72
 Is poisoned by Pompey's partisans — 130
Aristonius, bastard brother of Attalus, King of Pergamus, seizes the crown on his death — II. 542
 Defeats the Roman Consul Crassus — 544
 Is conquered and taken by Perperna ibid.
Artimé, sister to Ptolemy, King of Egypt, is forced, with her sister Cleopatra, to fly into Syria — IV. 151 Causes Achilles, the Egyptian General, to be killed — 153
 Is banished by Julius Cæsar — 161
 Her death procured by her sister Cleopatra — 376
Artabazus, King of Armenia, joins Phra-tes, King of Parthia, and cuts to pieces Oppius, Antony's Lieutenant, with his two legions — IV. 403
 Is seized by Antony — 416
 Is put to death by Cleopatra after the defeat at Actium — 434
Artemidorus, a Greek philosopher, warns
 Julius Cæsar of the conspiracy formed against him, which he neglects IV. 247 Arvaci, sue to the Consul Metellus for peace
 — II. 495
 Obtain a peace of him — 496
Aruns, son of King Porcena, persuades his father to make peace with Rome I. 131
 Is killed in battle — 137
Aruns, a native of Clusium, his wife carried off by an orphan under his guardianship — I. 437
 Brings an army of Gauls into Italy, which besieges Clusium — 439 Ascanius succeeds his father Æneas in the kingdom of Latium — I. 13 Reduces Mezentius to grant him peace
 — ibid.
 Builds the city of Alba — 14
Asculum, battle of, between the Romans and King Pyrrhus — I. 619
 The city of, reduced — 630
Asdrubal, the Carthaginian General, is defeated by Regulus — II. 35
 Is defeated by the Romans at Lilybæum
 — 43
Asdrubal, son-in-law to Amilcar, succeeds him in the command of the army in Spain
 — II. 103
 Is murdered — 104
Asdrubal, brother to Hannibal, is defeated by the Celtiberians — II. 156
 Marches to join his brother in Italy — 228
 Retrospect of his ill successes in Spain
 — 229
 Is defeated and killed in an action with the Consuls Livius and Nero — 250 Asina, Cn Cornelius, the Roman Admiral, is, with his fleet, taken at Lipara by Hannibal — II. 25
 Commands the fleet again, and takes Pa-normus — 42
Atius, Tribune of the People, invokes the gods, and devotes Crassus to destruction, on his setting out for Parthia,
 III. 502.
Atropa, in Spain, is taken by Julius Cæsar
 — IV. 212
Asbenio, a Cilician slave becomes King of the revolted slaves at Lilybæum III. 23 Joins

I N D E X.

- Joins Salvius, but is confined by him 89
Succeeds to the command on the death of Salvius ——— 90
Is killed ——— — ibid.
Albens, is besieged by Philip of Macedon
II. 307
Ridiculous resentment of the Athenians against Philip ——— 311
An embassy from, to the Roman Senate
465
The chief power in, seized by Aristion, an Epicurean philosopher, for Mithridates ——— III. 137
Is besieged by Sylla ——— 158
Is taken, and deprived of its privileges 141 Atinius, M. completes the reduction of Per-gamus ——— II. 545
Atinius Regulus, M. Consul, his operations against the Samnites I. 583 Atinius Labes, Tribune of the people, attempts the life of the Censor Metellus
II. 544
Atrox, in Thessaly, its gallant defence against the Consul Flamininus II. 315 Attalus, brother to Eumenes, King of Per-gamus, is sent by his brother ambassador to the Roman Senate II. 454 Attalus Philometer, King of Pergamus, dies, leaving the Roman people heir to all his goods ——— II. 526
Atticus, his account of the discontent of the Roman people at the triumph of Julius Cæsar for his success over Pompey's sons ——— IV. 218, note.
His death and character 426, note.
See Cicero.
Attius Tullus, General of the Volsci, receives Coriolanus kindly after his banishment from Rome ——— I. 213 Accuses him of betraying the Volscian cause ——— 228
Avaricum, a city in Gaul, is spared by Vircingetorix, when he desolated the country to distress the Romans III. 659
Is besieged by Julius Cæsar 660
Is taken and the inhabitants put to the sword ——— 664
Aventinus, Mount, derivation of its name
I. 15
The grant of to the people obtained by the Tribune L. Icilius ——— 320
The statue of Juno brought by Camillus from Veii, and a temple dedicated to her there ——— 427
Avernus, the lake joined with that of Lu-crinus, to form the Julian port IV. 388 Augurs, whence that art of divination was derived ——— I. 19, note.
The principles of the art ——— 24, note.
Augurs regularly instituted as a class of the priesthood by Numa ——— 55
August, the month of, whence it derived its name ——— IV. 351
Augustus. See Octavius.
Aulus, brother to the Consul Albinus, commands his brother's army against Ju-gurtha, and is reduced by him to pass under the yoke ——— III. 29.
Aulus Cæcina, writes a libel on Julius Cæsar, and afterward writes a panegyric on him to obtain pardon IV. 250 note.
Aurelius Orestes, L. is sent to suppress a rebellion in Sardinia ——— II. 549
Aurunci, engage in war with the Romans, and are defeated ——— I. 164 Attack the Romans and are defeated by the Dictator Camillus ——— 503
Are assisted against the Sidicini 525
- B.
- Baculus, Sextius*, a Centurion, his bold advice to Galba, on being surprised by the Gauls at Octodurus III. 614
His gallant conduct and death under Q.
Cicero at Aduatica ——— 653 Bakares, the islands so called, subdued by the Consul Metellus II. 553
Bassus, Cæcilius, seizes the province of Syria, and puts Sextus Cæsar to death
IV. 296
Bastarnæ, are invited to come and settle in Dardania by Philip of Macedon II.
387
Philip dying during their journey, only 30,000 arrive ——— 393
Battering ram, the several kinds of this machine described I. 141, note b.
Beaufort, M. de, remarks on his objections to the credibility of the early part of the Roman history ——— II. 1
Beliezesus, account of the migration of the Celts under his conduct I. 438, note.
Belgæ, a league formed among, against the Romans ——— III. 606
Break up their camp to separate homeward ——— 608
Are

I N D E X.

- Are routed in their retreat by Cæsar 609
 A second great defeat of by him 610
Belgic Gaul. See Gaul.
Bestia, L. Calpurnius, Consul, is sent to reduce Jugurtha, but is corrupted by him ——— III. 24
 Is condemned for his conduct in this affair ——— 32
 Goes into voluntary exile on the breaking out of the Italic war — 111
Bibulus, L. Calpurnius, is associated with Julius Cæsar in the consulship by the influence of the Senate III. 399
 Opposes Cæsar's prosecution of Pompey's agrarian law ——— 405
 He and his party forcibly driven from the Forum, and the law passed 406
Bibulus, Pompey's Admiral, destroys a number of Julius Cæsar's transport-vessels IV. 108
 Dies ——— 111
Bocchus, King of Mauritania, father-in-law of Jugurtha, raises forces to assist him after his defeat — III. 54
 Endeavours to treat with the Romans 55. 57
 Surprises the Romans, and is, with Jugurtha, routed by Marius — 62
 Is again defeated by him — 64
 Applies to Marius for a treaty ibid.
 Delivers up Jugurtha to Sylla — 71
Bogud, King of Mauritania contributes to Cæsar's victory over young Cn. Pompey and Labienus ——— IV. 213
 Joins Antony against Octavius 425
 Is killed by Agrippa — 427
Bohemia, account of the settlement of, by the Celtae ——— I. 438, note.
Boii, make war against Rome, and are subdued ——— II. 83
Bojorix, Chief of the Cimbri, kills his Roman prisoner Aurelius Scaurus for dissuading him from attacking Italy III. 74
 Is totally defeated by Marius and Catullus ——— 85
Bologna, the city of, obtains exemption from the oath to serve Octavius against Antony ——— IV. 425
Bomilcar, confident of Jugurtha, assassinates Massiva, grandson of Massinissa III. 23.
 Leads a detachment to surprise Rutilius, and is routed by him — 36
 Is put to death by Jugurtha for conspiring against his life ——— 46
 VOL. IV.
- Bosphorus*, kingdom of. See Pharnaces, and Mithridates.
Brennus, King or General of the Gauls, besieges Clusium ——— I. 439
 Marches to Rome ——— 440
 Defeats the Romans on the banks of the Allia ——— 441 Enters Rome, murders the remaining citizens, and burns their houses ibid.
 Is discovered in an attack of the capitol, by the cackling of geese ——— 445
 Agrees to a ransom of the capitol 446
 Is, with his army, destroyed by Camillus 447
Britain, ambassadors from, sent to Cæsar in Gaul ——— III. 624
 The natives oppose the landing of Cæsar 625
 Cæsar lands ——— 626
 The Britons attack his foragers — 627
 Are repulsed in an attack upon Cæsar's camp ——— 628
 Cæsar returns to Gaul ——— ibid.
 Cæsar returns ——— 630
 Cæsar gains an advantage over Cassibelanus, King of the Trinobantes 631
 Cassibelanus sues for peace, and Cæsar returns to Gaul ——— 632
Brundisium, is evacuated by Pompey, and seized by Julius Cæsar — IV. 45
Brutulus Papius, author of the revolt of the Samnites, kills himself on being delivered up to the Romans I. 539
Brutus, D. Junius, builds the town of Valentia, to settle the remains of Viriatus's army ——— II. 511
 Subdues the Lusitanians ——— 513
 Acquires the surname Gallæcus 514
Brutus, Lucius Junius, how he escaped on the murder of his father I. 104
 Instances of his wisdom in his journey to Delphos ——— 110
 On the violation and death of Lucretia, excites the people against Tarquin and his family ——— 113
 Is elected Consul ——— 116
 Takes an oath never to recal the Tarquins, nor create a King in Rome 119
 His sons engage in a conspiracy in favour of Tarquin ——— 121
 Condemns his sons to death — 122
 Procures the dismissal of Collatinus from the consulship ——— 123
 Is killed in battle by Tarquin's son 125
 P p p Brutus.

I N D E X.

| | |
|---|--|
| Brutus, Lucius Junius , a Plebeian, his speech to the Senatorian deputies sent to the legions at Mons sacer — I. 177 | |
| Proposes the election of Tribunes of the people — 181 | |
| Is chosen Tribune — 182 | |
| Increases the tribunitial power — 187 | |
| Brutus, D. defeats L. Domitius in a naval engagement off the harbour of Marselles — IV. 91 | |
| Obtains a second victory over the Massilian fleet and Nasidius — 92 | |
| Takes possession of Cisalpine Gaul on Cæsar's death — 265 | |
| Is besieged in Mutina by M. Antony — 287 | |
| Contributes to the defeat of Antony by a successful sally during his battle with the Consuls Hirtius and Panfa — 304 | |
| His reasons for not pursuing Antony given in a letter to Cicero — 318 | |
| Farther correspondence between them — ibid. note. | |
| Is joined by Plancus — 333 | |
| Is deserted by him — 353 | |
| Is killed, endeavouring to fly into Macedonia — 354 | |
| Brutus, Marcus , surrenders himself up to Pompey in Gaul, and is put to death by him — III. 178 | |
| Brutus, M. is spared by Julius Cæsar's especial order, after the battle of Pharsalia — IV. 142 | |
| Composes a panegyric on Cato — 203 | |
| Puts away his wife Claudia, and marries Portia, Cato's daughter — ibid. | |
| Makes an oration to Cæsar in favour of Dejotarus — 225 | |
| His family and character — 243, note. | |
| Is engaged by Cassius in the conspiracy against Cæsar — 243 | |
| His wife Portia's extraordinary scheme to draw the secret from him — 245, note. | |
| Murders Cæsar in the Senate-house — 248 | |
| Takes refuge in the Capitol — 258 | |
| Justifies himself in a speech to the people — 259 | |
| Retires to Lanuvium — 265 | |
| His letter, jointly with Cassius, to Antony — 268 | |
| Is sent by Antony to buy corn in Sicily — 270 | |
| Holds a council at Antium with Cassius and Cicero — 271 | |
| His successes in Greece against Antony's | |

| | |
|---|--|
| brother — — 291 | |
| His letter to Cicero on the decree of the Senate against Lepidus — 335 | |
| Farther correspondence between them — 337. 342 | |
| His letter to Atticus respecting Cæsar's conduct — — 339 | |
| Revenge the murder of Cicero on C. Antonius — — 363 | |
| His rigorous conduct in the Eastern provinces — — 368 | |
| Is reported to have been warned of his fate by an apparition — ibid. note k. | |
| The first battle of Philippi — — 370 | |
| Is defeated at the second battle of Philippi, and puts an end to his life — 372 | |
| His character — — 373 | |
| Bucklers, Roman , a view of the several kinds of — — I. 518 | |

C.

| | |
|--|--|
| Cæcina , Acron King of, makes war on Romulus — I. 34 | |
| Acron killed, and the city destroyed — 35 | |
| The inhabitants incorporated among the Romans — — ibid. | |
| Cæpio, Q. is deceived, defeated, and killed by Pompey, the Italian Consul — III. 113. | |
| Cæpio, Servilius , procures some of the Senators to be restored to the bench of Judges, from which privilege the whole body of them had been excluded by Caius Gracchus — III. 73 | |
| His operations against the Cimbri — ibid. | |
| He and Mallius defeated by the Cimbri — 74 | |
| Is deposed and his estate confiscated — 75. 99 | |
| Cæpio, Q. Servilius , unjustly attacks Viriatus, after peace had been concluded with him — II. 507 | |
| Procures Viriatus to be killed — 508 | |
| Cæsar, C. Julius , when born — III. 95, note b. | |
| Marries the daughter of the Consul Cinna — 151 | |
| His narrow escape from Sylla's proscriptions — — 161 | |
| Account of his parents — — 301 | |
| His early transactions — — 302 | |
| His adventure with the pirates — ibid. | |
| Is elected High-Priest — — 306 | |
| His character — — ibid. | |
| His | |

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|---|--------------|---|--------------|
| His conduct in respect to Cataline inquired into ————— | 326 | him ————— | 606 |
| Is accused of being concerned in Cataline's conspiracy ————— | 360 | A confederacy of the Belgæ formed against the Romans ————— | ibid. |
| His speech in the Senate against putting the conspirators to death — | 361 | Routs them in their retreat homeward | 608 |
| Is elected Prætor, and endeavours to ruin
Catulus ————— | 380 | Attacks the Sueffones, and takes Novio-
dunum ————— | 609 |
| Instigates the Tribune Metellus Nepos to prosecute Cicero ————— | 383 | Gives the Belgæ another defeat with great slaughter ————— | 610 |
| Puts away his wife Pompeia, on account of her connections with Clodius | 385 | Besieges the Aduatici in a strong town, who make a fraudulent submission to
him ————— | 612 |
| His successes in Spain, and election to the consulship ————— | 399 | Is attacked by them, defeats them, and sells the townsmen for slaves — | 613 |
| The first triumvirate formed by him,
Pompey, and Crassus ————— | 400 | A revolt in Celtic Gaul ————— | 615 |
| Adopts Pompey's agrarian law | 404 | Defeats the Veneti in a naval engagement ————— | 615 |
| Imprisons Cato for opposing this law | 405 | His severe treatment of the Veneti | 617 |
| Drives his colleague Bibulus from the Forum, and passes his law ————— | 406 | A victory over the neighbouring people gained by Titurius Sabinus ————— | ibid. | | Assists Clodius in his suit of being declared a Plebeian, out of resentment to Cicero ————— | 409 | Negotiates with a body of Germans, who, driven out of their own country by the
Suevii, had been invited into Gaul | 620 |
| Procures a ratification of all Pompey's Asiatic transactions ————— | 410 | Is attacked by them treacherously | 621 |
| Obtains the provinces of the two Gauls | 415 | Routs them totally ————— | 622 |
| Gives Pompey his daughter Julia ————— | ibid. | Builds a bridge over the Rhine, and passes the river ————— | 623 |
| Marries Calpurnia, the daughter of Piso | 416 | Receives ambassadors from Britain | 624 |
| Is supposed to have poisoned Vettius | 417 | Appears on the British coast — | 625 |
| Is vindicated from this aspersion ————— | ibid. | Lands, and his fleet afterwards shattered by a storm ————— | 626 |
| His favour courted by Cicero | 506 | His foragers attacked by the Britons | 627 |
| Death of his daughter Julia, the wife of Pompey ————— | 525 | Returns to Gaul ————— | 628 |
| Prepares to oppose the passage of the Helvetii into Gaul ————— | 589 | Decides the contest between Indutioma-
rus and Cingetorix ————— | 629 |
| Routs a body of the Helvetii passing the Arar ————— | 591 | Lands the second time in Britain | 630 |
| Is informed of Dumnorix's practices against him, by Liscus ————— | 592 | Reduces Cassibelanus to peace, and returns to Gaul ————— | 633 |
| Defeats the Helvetii ————— | 595 | Rescues Q. Cicero, whose camp was beset by Ambiorix ————— | 641 |
| Sends them back to their own country | 596 | Ravages the territories of the Nervii | 645 |
| The Gauls implore his protection against Ariovistus ————— | 597 | Suppresses the revolt of the Senones ————— | ibid. |
| Messages between him and Ariovistus | 598 | Passes the Rhine again ————— | 646 |
| His troops seized with a panic | 600 | Marches against the Eburones — | 651 |
| Revives their courage, and marches to the camp of Ariovistus — | 601 | His vigilance in collecting his troops to oppose Vircingetorix — | 657 |
| His interview with Ariovistus | 602 | Revenge the massacre of the Roman citizens at Genabum ————— | 658 |
| His ambassadors arrested by Ariovistus | 604 | Besieges Avaricum ————— | 660 |
| Forces Ariovistus to a battle, and routs | | Takes the town, and puts the inhabitants to the sword ————— | 664 |
| | | Composes differences among the Ædui | 666 |
| | | Marches to Gergovia ————— | 667 |
| | | Recovers the Æduan auxiliaries which | |

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|--|--------------|---|--------------|
| Litavicus was carrying to Vircingetorix | 669 | His remark on Cato's conduct to his wife Marcia | 71, note. |
| His men make an unsuccessful attempt on Gergovia | 672 | Sets out for Spain | 72 |
| Reproves his troops for their temerity and disobedience | 673 | The inhabitants of Marseilles shut their gates against him | 73 |
| Retires from Gergovia | 674 | Opposes himself to Pompey's Lieutenant Afranius | 75 |
| Is attacked by Vircingetorix, whom he defeats | 678 | Harrasses Afranius on his march | 80 |
| Defeats him in a second engagement | 679 | His conference with Afranius | 86 |
| Besieges Alefia | ibid. | Obliges Afranius to disband his army | 87 |
| Engages the Gaulish army which came to the relief of the town | 683 | Varro submits to him | 89 |
| Defeats them | 685 | His generous behaviour to Gades | 90 |
| Alefia surrendered to him | 686 | Marseilles surrenders to him | 95 |
| Reduces the Bituriges | 687 | Is created Dictator | 104 |
| Defeats and kills Correns, General of the Bellovaci | 690 | Reduces the ninth legion, which had mutinied, to obedience | ibid. |
| Besieges Uxellodunum | 692 | Is chosen Consul | 105 |
| His severe treatment of the garrison on its surrender | 693 | Follows Pompey into Greece | 107 |
| Restores Gaul to peace the last year of his government | 694 | Part of his transport-vessels destroyed by Bibulus | 108 |
| Pompey recalls one of his legions IV. 11. | | Make fresh overtures to Pompey | ibid. |
| His letter to the people for an accommodation with Pompey, read by M. Antony | 17 | His conference with Libo | 110 |
| Is ordered to disband his army by a decree of the Senate | 20 | His transports at Brundisium harassed by Libo | 115 |
| Preparations made by the Pompeian party to reduce him | 22 | Is joined by Antony with troops from Brundisium | 117 |
| Passes the Rubicon | 23 | Forms lines of circumvallation round Pompey's army | 119 |
| Account of the negotiation between him and Pompey | 26 | His lines forced by Pompey | 124 |
| Is deserted by his Lieutenant Labienus | 29 | His harangue to his soldiers on this disaster | 127 |
| Encamps at Corfinium | 34 | Removes his camp | 128 |
| Corfinium is delivered up to him by the garrison | 37 | Takes and plunders Gomphi | 131 |
| His letter to Oppius and Balbus | 39 | The order of battle at Pharsalia | 135 |
| Again endeavours to treat with Pompey | 43 | Defeats Pompey | 137 |
| Sits down before Brundisium | 44 | His treatment of his prisoners | 139 |
| Enters Brundisium on Pompey's embarkation | 45 | Follows Pompey to Egypt | 149 |
| Remarks on the enterprise he was now engaged in | 46 | Engages in the dispute between Ptolemy and his sister Cleopatra | 150 |
| Returns toward Rome | 54 | Is besieged in the palace at Alexandria, by Achilles, the Egyptian General | 152 |
| Invites Cicero to join him at Rome | ibid. | Gets possession of the Pharos | ibid. |
| Cicero's reply | 55 | Defeats the Egyptian fleet at Cheronesus | 154 |
| His conference with Cicero | 57 | Gives the Egyptians another defeat in the port of Alexandria | 155 |
| Writes again to Cicero | 58 | Is worsted in another action, and forced to throw himself into the sea and swim to another ship | 157 |
| Arrives at Rome and harangues the Senate | 69 | Releases Ptolemy, whom he had detained prisoner | 158 |
| Seizes the public treasure. | 70 | Mithridates of Pergamus raises an army to assist him | 159 |
| | | Defeats Ptolemy's army, who is drowned in | in |

I N D E X.

- | | | | |
|--|--------------|---|----------------------|
| in his retreat | 160 | lation of the Roman commonwealth | 227. 234 |
| Enters triumphantly into Alexandria ibid. | | Meditates on a Parthian expedition to re- | |
| Settles the government of Egypt on | | venge the death of Crassus | 239 |
| Cleopatra and her surviving brother | 161 | Divers grand works projected by him | 240 |
| Cleopatra bears him a son | ibid. | Refuses the title of King, though suspect- | |
| Goes to Syria to reduce Pharnaces, King | | ed of desiring it | 241 |
| of the Bosphorus | 162 | A design against his life formed by Cas- | |
| Defeats Pharnaces | 164 | sius and Brutus | 243 |
| Returns to Italy | 166 | Omens of his danger related | 246 |
| Is chosen Dictator | 168 | Is assassinated in the Senate-house | 248 |
| Causes himself to be chosen Consul, and | | His character | 249 |
| continues his dictatorship through the | | His will opened | 261 |
| year | 169 | His funeral | 262 |
| Suppresses a mutiny of his legions | 170 | Cæsar, L. Julius , Consul, his ill success | |
| Sets out for Africa | 171 | against the revolted Italian allies III. | 113 |
| Lands at Adrumetum | 172 | Procures the Lex Julia to be passed | 114 |
| Gives battle to Labienus | 174 | Cæsario , son of Julius Cæsar and Cleopatra, | |
| Invests Thapsus | 177 | born | IV. 161 |
| Defeats the united forces of Scipio and | | Is acknowledged by Antony and Octa- | |
| Juba | 178 | vius, and declared heir to his mother's | |
| His remark on the death of Cato | 187 | kingdom | 265, note. |
| Reduces Mauritania to a Roman province | 189 | Is put to death by Octavius | 442 |
| Returns to Rome | 190 | Cæso, Q. his character | I. 297 |
| His four magnificent triumphs | 191 | Is cited before the people by the Tribune | |
| Rewards his soldiers, and celebrates games | 192 | Virginus | ibid. |
| Dedicates his temple of Venus Genetrix | ibid. | Is accused of murder | 299 |
| His civil administration | 193 | Banishes himself | 300 |
| Reforms the calendar | 196 | Cajeta , promontory of, how it obtained its | |
| Pardons M. Marcellus | 198 | name | I. 4 |
| Pardons Ligarius | 201 | Calendar, Roman , reformed by Numa Pom- | |
| Answers Cicero's panegyric on Cato | 203 | pilius | I. 63 |
| Goes to Spain to reduce Pompey's sons | 210 | Difference between that and the Julian | IV. 18, note. |
| Takes Ategua | 212 | See Julian and Gregorian . | |
| Defeats young Cn. Pompey and Labienus | 213 | One, of terms for hearing causes, pub- | |
| Possesses himself of Corduba | 214 | lished, for the use of the people, by | |
| Reduces Hispalis | ibid. | Cn. Flavius | I. 565 |
| Returns to Rome, and triumphs for his | | Cales , chief city of the Ausones, is besieged | |
| successes over Pompey's sons | 218 | by Valerius Corvus, and taken by the | |
| Proclaims a general amnesty | ibid. | invention of covered galleries | I. 525 |
| Divests himself of the consulship | ibid. | A colony settled there | ibid. |
| Extravagant honours paid him by the Se- | | Calidius , Tribune of the People, his friend- | |
| nate | 219 | ship to Metellus Numidius gratefully | |
| Prostitutes the consular dignity to gratify | | returned by his son Metellus Pius III. | 173, note. |
| his favourites | 220 | Callicrates , his speech at the Achæan diet, | |
| The cause of Dejotarus pleaded before | | against an alliance with Perseus, King | |
| him | 225 | of Macedon | II. 395 |
| Visits Cicero | ibid. | His treachery to his countrymen | 447 |
| Letters from Sallust to him on the regu- | | Callimachus , Governor of Amisus, sets fire | |
| | | to the city and escapes, on its being as- | |
| | | saulted by Lucullus | III. 233 |
| | | Is taken by Lucullus at Nisibis, and laid | |
| | | in | |

I N D E X.

- in irons ————— 245
- Calpurnius Flaminius*, a legionary Tribune, rescues the Roman army from the power of Hamilcar ————— II. 29
- Camerini*, are defeated by the Romans, and incorporated with them — I. 43
- Revolt, and are a second time reduced 44
- Camerinum*, the city of, taken by Appius Claudius, and the inhabitants sold for slaves — I. 630
- Are fought out and gratified at Rome ib.
- Camerium*, a Latin city, taken and razed by Virginius — I. 141
- Camillus*, L. Furius, is chosen Dictator, to preside at the election of Consuls, and is himself chosen — I. 500
- Defeats the Gauls — 501
- Marches against the Greek pirates ibid.
- Is created Dictator, and defeats the Aurunci — 504
- Totally subdues Latium — 523
- Camillus*, M. Furius, created Dictator during the siege of Veii — I. 426
- Digs a passage into the city — 427
- Becomes master of Veii — 428
- Defeats the Falisci and invests Falerii 432
- His punishment of a treacherous school-master induces the city to submit ibid.
- Opposes peopling Veii from Rome 434
- Is accused of robbing the public of part of the spoil of Veii, and banishes himself — 436
- At the head of a body of Ardeates, he routs a party of Gauls — 444
- Is appointed Dictator by a commission from the Senate in the capitol 445
- Defeats and destroys the Gauls with their King Brennus — 447
- His dictatorship prolonged to prevent the desertion of Rome — 448
- In his third dictatorship he defeats the Volsci — 452
- Retakes Sutrium from the Hetrurians ibid.
- Defeats the Antiates, Latins, and Hernici — 454
- An inquiry into his character, and conduct toward Manlius — 462
- His prudent conduct in the war against the Volsci, in conjunction with L. Furius — 473
- Is chosen Dictator a fourth time 481
- Abdicates — ibid.
- A fifth time Dictator, he defeats an army of Gauls — 483
- Takes Velitræ — ibid.
- On the election of a Plebeian Consul, proposes the erection of the prætorship 484
- Campania*, is reduced by Manlius Torquatus — I. 522
- Is governed by a Præfect — 531
- The territory of, farmed out for the benefit of the Roman treasury II. 223
- Camulegenus*, a Gaulish General, is defeated by Labienus — III. 676
- Canidius*, marches M. Antony's army to Ephesus — IV. 422
- Advise Antony against risking his fortune by a naval war against Octavius 428
- Deserts his army on the defeat of Antony's fleet at Actium — 430
- Caninius Rebilus*, is elected Consul by Julius Cæsar for a single day IV. 220
- Cannæ*, battle of — II. 162
- Canuleius*, C. a Tribune, proposes a repeal of the law forbidding Patricians to intermarry with Plebeians I. 382
- Opposes the levies until his law is received — 383
- His speech in favour of admitting Plebeians to the consulship ibid.
- His law respecting marriages passed 385
- Caparonia*, a Vestal, strangles herself to avoid burial alive for incontinence I. 633
- Capitoline Marbles*, or Consular Calendars, II. 561. IV. 449.
- Capitolinus*, Mount, derivation of its name I. 38. 110, note.
- Temple of Jupiter built on it by Tarquin the Proud — 110
- The strength of Rome retires thither on the irruption of the Gauls 441
- Is saved from surprise by the cackling of geese — 445
- The capitol magnificently rebuilt 453. III. 212
- Cappadocia*, King Ariarathes expelled by Demetrius Soter, and Holophernes put in his place — II. 462
- The kingdom shared between them by a decree of the Roman Senate 463
- The inhuman usurpation of, by Mithridates, King of Pontus III. 103
- Ariobarzanes restored to the throne of, by Sylla — 104
- Cassia*, in Numidia, is taken and destroyed by Caius Marius — III. 58
- 3 Capua,

I N D E X.

- Capua*, the city of, besieged by the Samnites, implores the protection of Rome I. 505
- A plot among the Roman soldiers left there, discovered — 510
- The Senate of, saved from destruction by Pacuvius — II. 15
- Revolts to the Carthaginians — 176
- Is taken by the Romans — 213
- Is deprived of its privileges by the Roman Senate — 218
- Is restored to the rank of a colony by Julius Cæsar — III. 410, note.
- Octavius establishes his veteran soldiers there — IV. 400
- Carbo*, Papirius, succeeds Opimius in the consulship, and protects him when prosecuted for illegal condemnations III. 7
- Poisons himself — 9
- Carbo*, Papirius, is appointed by Cinna his colleague in the Consulship III. 144
- Prepares to oppose Sylla on his return from Asia — 152
- Procures a decree from the Senate, declaring all who joined Sylla enemies — 155
- Is defeated by Sylla — 156
- Is seized and put to death by Pompey — 162
- Carneades*, the Academic philosopher, is sent ambassador from Rome to Athens II. 455
- His character by Cicero — ibid.
- Carnutes*, engage the Gauls in a general revolt against the Romans III. 655
- See Vercingetorix.
- Are dispersed by Cæsar after the taking of Alesia — 687
- Carthage*, a treaty of alliance concluded by, with Rome — I. 502
- A crown of gold sent to Jupiter Capitolinus — 510
- Sends an embassy to Rome, and concludes another treaty — 563
- Sends assistance to the Romans against King Pyrrhus, which they decline accepting, but conclude an alliance 619
- Is deprived of its conquests in Sicily by Pyrrhus — 621
- Causes of the first war with Rome stated II. 4
- Rise and progress of the Carthaginian power — 6, note.
- Their expeditions into Sicily 8 note.
- Their form of government — 14 note.
- Are defeated by the Romans before Messina — 19
- Hannibal* deserts Agrigentum — 24
- Regulus* defeated and taken prisoner by Xantippus — 33
- Hanno* defeated by Lutatius — 62
- End of the first war with Rome — 63
- War with their mercenaries — 67
- End of this war — 81
- Commencement of the second war with Rome — 101
- Hannibal* appointed Commander in Spain — 104
- The justice of breaking with Rome inquired into — 114
- See Hannibal.
- Scipio* lands in Africa — 274
- Asdrubal* and Syphax defeated — 279
- Pretend to beg peace of Scipio — 284
- Hannibal* recalled from Italy — 286
- Battle of Zama — 292
- Peace concluded with Scipio — 296
- Ambassadors from, sent to Rome to complain of Masinissa — 402
- Refuses to submit the dispute with Masinissa to the Roman Senate — 463
- Enters into a war with Masinissa — 468
- Is reduced to make peace with Masinissa — 469
- War declared by Rome — ibid.
- Amazing alacrity in preparing for defence — 474
- The city described — ibid.
- The city stormed and taken — 482
- Is destroyed — 484
- Is rebuilt, and a Roman colony planted there — 556
- See Junonia.
- Carthalo*, a Carthaginian Admiral, ruins the Roman navy — II. 55
- Carvilius*, Sp. Consul, takes Cominium from the Samnites — I. 588
- Carus*, a Celtiberian General, defeats the Consul Fulvius — II. 494
- Cæsa*, one of the conspirators against Julius Cæsar, his narrow escape from discovering the secret in the Senate-house IV. 248
- Is elected Tribune — 285
- Cassibelaus*, King of the Trinobantes in Britain, attacks the Roman foragers, and is worsted — III. 631
- Is —

I N D E X.

- Is reduced to sue for peace — 632
Capitulum, the inhabitants of, murdered by a body of Prænestini, to prevent the city being surrendered to Hannibal II. 179
 Is taken by him — 180
 Is retaken by Fabius — 192
Cassius, C. Quæstor under Crassus in Parthia, dissuades him from prosecuting the war — III. 530
 Escapes with 500 horse into Syria on the defeat of Crassus — 536
 Burns two of Cæsar's fleets at Messina IV. 140
 Delivers up his fleet to Cæsar after the battle of Pharsalia — 141, 149
 His reflection on Cæsar's victories in Spain — 216, note.
 Forms the design of assassinating Cæsar 243
 His family and character ibid. note.
 Cæsar murdered by him and the rest in the Senate-house — 243
 Retires with Brutus to Lanuvium 265
 Their letter to Antony — 263
 Is sent by Antony to buy corn in Sicily 270
 Holds a council with Brutus and Cicero at Antium — 271
 Collects eight legions in Syria — 295
 His successes there against Dolabella 296
 Invests him in Laodicea, where he kills himself — 355
 His severe treatment of Rhodes 369
 Kills himself on a mistake at the first battle of Philippi — 371
 His character — 373
Cassius, Sparticus, Consul, concludes a peace with the Volsci, Æqui, and Hernici I. 248
 Copy of the treaty — 249
 Is justified from the imputations cast on him by Dionysius — ibid.
 Proposes an agrarian law to the Senate 250
 Is accused by the Quæstors before an assembly of the people — 254
 Is sentenced and cast down the Tarpeian rock — 255
 Scrutiny into the authenticity of the relations of his death — 256
Cæsar, governor of Phanagone for Mithridates, revolts against him III. 263
 Is rewarded by Pompey — 270
Castor and Pollux, a temple built to, after the battle of Regillus — I. 157 Catalina, Lucius Sergius, his inhuman murder of M. Marius Gratidianus, under shelter of Sylla's proscriptions III, 161
 His character — 311
 Murders his son, who proved an obstacle to his marriage with Aurelia Crestilla ibid.
 Engages in a plot to murder the Consuls and chief part of the Senate 312
 Is tried for his oppressions in Africa 314
 Is tried for the murder of Gratidianus 316
 Account of the associates in his conspiracy — 336
 Discloses his purpose to them — 338
 His conspiracy discovered to the Senate 341
 Cicero's famous oration against him 343
 Retires to the camp of Manlius in Hetruria — 346
 His letter to Catulus — 353
 Hazards a battle against the Consul Antonius's army, and is killed 369
 His partizans brought to trial 381
Cato, C. Porcius, is surprised and totally defeated by the Scordisci — III. 14.
 Is banished for extortion — ibid.
Cato, M. Portius, the first of the family publicly distinguished, accuses Scipio before the Senate — II. 271
 His speech against the repeal of the Opian law — 327
 Is sent to Spain — 331
 Assists in the defeat of Antiochus at Thermopylæ — 355
 Is chosen Censor — 377
 His character — ibid.
 Pleads in favour of the Rhodians 456
 Is sent to Africa to judge of a contest between Carthage and King Masinissa 463
 Advises the destruction of Carthage 464
Cato, Marcus Portius, his birth III. 297
 The early indications of his character 298
 The early transactions of his life 299
 Affects an austerity in his conduct 300
 Prosecutes Muræna for bribery 349
 His speech in Senate on the punishment to be inflicted on Cataline's conspirators — 364
 His motive for soliciting the office of Tri-

I N D E X.

- Tribune ————— 383 note.
 Rejects Pompey's proposed alliance with his family ————— 391
 Opposes Julius Cæsar's twofold sollicitation for the consulship, and for a triumph on his successes in Spain 399
 Is imprisoned by Cæsar for opposing his agrarian law ————— 404
 Is sent by Clodius's means to depose
 Ptolemy, King of Cyprus — 439
 Is disappointed of the prætorship by the Consuls Pompey and Crassus 499 Convicts Gabinius of plundering his province ————— 524
 Advises creating Pompey Consul without a colleague, on occasion of the confusions by the murder of Clodius 542 Votes against the decree of a thankgi-ving for Cicero's successes in Cilicia 570
 His letter to Cicero ————— 571
 Loses his election to the consulate by ill-timed severity to the people — IV. 5
 His conduct with regard to his wife
 Marcia ————— 71 note.
 Leaves Sicily on not being supported there by Pompey ————— 72
 Prevents young Pompey from killing Cicero, at a Council after the battle of Pharsalia ————— 140
 Exhorts young Pompey to oppose Cæsar
 175
 Is left by Scipio to command the garrison at Utica ————— 176
 Kills himself on Cæsar's victory over Scipio and Juba ————— 179
 His character ————— 185
 A panegyric wrote on him by Cicero, and answered by Cæsar ————— 203 Catulus, Q. Lutatius, his conduct when forced by the Cimbri to abandon his camp ————— III. 83
 In conjunction with Marius defeats the Cimbri ————— 85
 Kills himself on Cinna and Marius entering Rome ————— 135
Catulus, Q. Lutatius, is chosen Consul, together with Lepidus ————— III. 174 Defeats Lepidus, who had taken arms in Hetruria ————— 179
 Consecrates the Capitol on its being rebuilt ————— 212
 His ostentation in celebrating this festival ————— 307 note.
 Cataline's letter to him ————— 353 Endeavours to prove Julius Cæsar one of Cataline's conspirators — 381
 His death ————— 393
Cavalry, Roman, their place in battle, and methods of fighting ————— I. 520
Caudine forks, the Roman army entrapped
 there by Pontius, General of the Sam-nites, and forced to pass under the yoke ————— I. 541
 This ignominy retaliated ————— 549
Celæres, first appointment of, and the etymology of their name ————— I. 27
 This military body changed into a band of sacrificers ————— 55
Celtæ, account of the different migrations of ————— I. 438 note.
Celtiberia, the bounds of described II. 493
note.
 Occasion of the Celtiberian war 494
Celtic Gaul. See Gaul.
Censor, the first institution of that office I.
 389
 The duration of their office abridged 397
 One to be a Plebeian ————— 523
 For the chronological series of these officers,
 see the tables of Consular Calendar, at the conclusion of volumes II. and IV.
Censorinus, L. Marcins, and his colleague Manilius, command the armament against Carthage in the third war II.
 471
Census of the people, instituted by Servilius
 Tullius ————— I. 96
 Is revived by the Consuls after the expulsion of Tarquin ————— 128
Cento, Glandius, surprises and pillages
Chalcis ————— II. 307
Centumviri, the first appointment of II. 88 Centurions of the Roman army, the several orders of explained — II. 407 note.
Ceres, her adventure with Neptune expounded ————— I. 8 note.
Cethegus, C. one of Cataline's conspirators,
 his family and character III. 337
 Is put to death by a decree of the Senate 366 Chærea, a great victory obtained there by Sylla, over the army of Mithridates, commanded by Archelaus III. 142 Chalcis, refuses the offers of Antiochus to seduce them from the Roman interest
 II. 348
 Receives Antiochus ————— 351
 Is destroyed by the Consul Mummius 490
 499

I N D E X.

- Characters*, the drawing of, unfair both to the person described, and to the reader — — — — — III. 39. note c.
- Charists*, armed, first introduced in the wars of Italy by the Gauls — — — — — I. 580
- Chryseus*, a favourite freedman of Sylla, his cruel scheme to obtain the estate of Sextus Roscius — — — — — III. 170 note s.
- Cibber, Colley*, his observations on Middleton's life of Cicero — — — — — III. 373 note.
- His remarks on Cicero's conduct towards Clodius — — — — — 469 note.
- His state of the quarrel between Pompey and Cæsar — — — — — IV. 51
- Vindicates Cæsar from the accusation of aspiring after the regal title 242 note.
- Censures Cicero for justifying the assassination of Cæsar — — — — — 252
- His character — — — — — ibid. seq.
- Cicero, M.* son of M. T. Cicero, accepts the office of Lieutenant under Brutus at Athens — — — — — IV. 292
- Defeats and takes C. Antony prisoner 299
- Executes the decree of the Senate against the memory of M. Antony when Consul — — — — — 442
- Cicero, Marcus Tullius*, his plan for writing history II. Introductory Dissertation, 2 note.
- His defence of Roscius against Chryseus — — — — — III. 170 note s.
- His character of the Consul Curio 189 note.
- His motives for prosecuting Verres 205
- Account of this cause — — — — — 206 note.
- Is elected Consul — — — — — 261
- Procures a public thanksgiving for Pompey's victories in Asia — — — — — 271
- His family, birth, and education 272
- His early transactions — — — — — 274
- His character from Bishop Warburton 275 note.
- His prudent conduct in Sicily — — — — — 278
- His conduct during his prætorship 281
- Solicits the consulship — — — — — 284
- Is elected by general suffrage — — — — — 286
- Opposes the agrarian law of Rullus 287
- Instances of the force of his eloquence 290
- Defends Rabirius — — — — — 293
- Assists Lucullus in obtaining his triumph 296
- Remarks on his conduct toward Cataline 316.
- Crassus informs him of Cataline's conspiracy — — — — — 341
- His famous speech to Cataline in Senate 343
- Declares this conspiracy to an assembly of the people — — — — — 346
- Defends Muræna — — — — — 349
- Obtains farther proofs of the conspiracy from the Gaulish ambassadors 355
- Procures a decree of the Senate for putting Cataline's associates to death 366
- His honourable dismissal at the close of his consulship — — — — — 367
- The distinguished honours paid him on the death of Cataline — — — — — 370
- Arguments against the probability of his fourth oration having been spoken 371
- Defends P. Sylla — — — — — 381
- His conduct in the purchase of Crassus's house on the Palatine hill 382 note.
- Is protected by the Senate against the accusations of Metellus Nepos 383
- His letter to Pompey — — — — — 389 note.
- His account of the differences between the Senate and the Knights 394
- Justifies his connection with Pompey 398
- Defends C. Antonius, and Cæsar in revenge procures Clodius his desire of being declared a Plebian — — — — — 409
- Retires into the country perplexed how to act during the continuance of the triumvirate — — — — — 410
- Defends Valerius Flaccus, accused of extortions during his prætorship in Asia 412 note.
- His account of Vettius's accusation of Curio the younger — — — — — 419
- His terror at the proceedings of the Tribune Clodius — — — — — 430
- Goes into voluntary banishment 434
- His houses plundered and demolished 435
- His apology for Cato in submitting to the commission to depose Ptolemy King of Cyprus — — — — — 439
- Particulars of his journey — — — — — 440
- His want of fortitude under this disgrace 441
- His letters to his wife Terentia, during his exile — — — — — 446 note.
- His recal opposed in Senate by the Tribune Serranus — — — — — 455
- A decree passed in Senate for his recal 458
- His

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|--|--------------------|--|--------------------|
| His recall ratified by a vote of the people | 459 | Continuation of the correspondence between him and Cœlius | 576 |
| His honourable reception on his return | 461 | His letters to Appius Pulcher | 580 |
| Proposes a grant of extraordinary powers to Pompey to furnish Rome with corn | 463 | His letter to the Consul Marcus Marcellus | IV. 7 note. |
| Pleads before the college of priests for the recovery of his Palatine house | 465 | Acknowledges his own duplicity, in a letter to Atticus | 20 note. |
| Obtains damages for the demolition of his houses | 467 | Arrives at Rome, and obtains a triumph of the Senate | 22 |
| His letters to Lentulus Spinther on the affair of Ptolemy Auletes, King of Egypt | 474, 491 | His account of Cæsar's propositions for an accommodation | 26 note. |
| Is reconciled to Crassus before his journey to Parthia | 502 | Censures Pompey's conduct | 36 note. |
| His letter to Crassus | 504 | Pompey's letter to him, with his answer | 41 note. |
| Courts the favour of Julius Cæsar | 506 | His opinion of Cæsar's enterprize | 48 |
| His letter to Lentulus Spinther, giving an account of his reasons for defending Vatinius | 509 | Is invited by Cæsar to join him at Rome | 54 |
| His relation of the trial of Gabinius | 522 | His answer | 55 |
| Defends Gabinius and Rabirius | 524 | His conference with Cæsar | 57 |
| Accepts of a lieutenancy under Pompey, but resigns it at Cæsar's desire | 526 | Cæsar's letter to him | 58 |
| Is elected into the college of augurs | 539 | M. Antony's letter to him | 59 |
| Defends Milo on his trial for the murder of Clodius | 544 | Cœlius's letter to him | 60 |
| Inquiry into his conduct with respect to Milo's estate | 545 | Mr. Melmoth's account of his fluctuation between Pompey and Cæsar | 61 note. |
| Obtains the government of Cilicia | 548 | His reply to Cœlius | 63 |
| Visits Pompey at Tarentum | 549 | At length joins Pompey | 67 |
| Letters between him and Cœlius | 550 | Is slighted by Pompey | 68 |
| His upright administration | 552 | Cœlius's expostulatory letter to him | 113 |
| Marches against the Parthians | 554 | Dolabella's letter to him on Cæsar's surrounding Pompey's army with lines of circumvallation | 120 |
| Letters between him and Cœlius | 555 | Pompey the younger attempts to kill him at a council, after the battle of Pharsalia | 140 |
| Suppresses the banditti at Erana | 557 | Retires to Brundisium | 141 |
| Writes an account of his expedition to Cœlius | 557 | His letter to Cassius | ibid. note. |
| His letter to Curio | 558 note. | His reflections on the death of Pompey | 145 |
| Besieges and takes Pindenissum | 565 | His uneasy situation after his return to Italy | 166 note. |
| His letter to Cato on this event | 566 | His interview with Cæsar on his return | 167 |
| Protests the Cyprians against the extortions of Scaptius | 569 note. | Shrewd repartee of Decimus Laberius to him | 193 note. |
| A thanksgiving voted by the Senate for his successes | 570 | His panegyric on Cæsar's conduct | 198 note. |
| Cato's letter to him | 571 | Procures the pardon of Ligarius | 201 |
| His answer | ibid. note. | Writes a panegyric on Cato, which is answered by Cæsar | 202 |
| His reasons for soliciting a triumph, in a letter to Atticus | 572 | Puts away his wife Terentia, and marries Publilia | 203 |
| His popular conduct in his government | 573 | His letters to Papirius Pætus | 204, 205 |
| His daughter Tullia married to Dolabella | 576 | His letter to Nigidius Figulus | 206 |
| | | To Curio | 207 |
| | | Q q 2 | His |

I N D E X.

- His reflection on the death of Cn. Pompey ——— 216 note.
 His great grief at the death of his daughter Tullia ——— 221
 S. Sulpicius's consolatory letter to him on that occasion ——— ibid. note.
 Account of his writings during his retirement on this occasion ——— 223
 Pleads the cause of Dejotarus before Cæsar ——— 225
 Is visited by Cæsar ——— ibid.
 Censures the conspirators against Cæsar for sparing Antony and Lepidus 246 note.
 His correspondence with Aulus Cæcinius on his performance wrote to obtain Cæsar's pardon after libelling him 250 note.
 Justifies the assassination of Cæsar 252
 Is offended at Cleopatra's treatment of him ——— 265 note.
 His literary performances at this time ——— 266 note.
 His advice to Brutus and Cassius at a select council held at Antium 271
 His opinion of the schemes of young Octavius ——— 274
 Is prevented in his intentions of leaving Italy ——— 276
 Delivers his first Philippic in the Senate 278
 Retires to Naples, where he composes his second Philippic ——— ibid.
 His letter to Cassius ——— 280
 His speech in the Senate, exhorting them to oppose Antony ——— 285
 Delivers his fifth Philippic in the Senate 288
 Pronounces his sixth and seventh Philippics ——— 289
 His eighth Philippic ——— 291
 His tenth Philippic ——— 293
 His eleventh Philippic ——— 295
 His twelfth Philippic ——— 297
 His thirteenth Philippic ——— 299
 His fourteenth and last Philippic 303 note.
 His letters to Brutus on the deaths of the two Consuls Hirtius and Panfa 306
 Letters between him and Plancus, the Consul elect — 314 note. 323 note.
 Letters between him and D. Brutus, 317 note.
 His letter to Cassius on the defection of Lepidas ——— 333
 His letter to Brutus on the decree of the Senate against Lepidus ——— 334
 Farther correspondence between them 337, 342
 Is proscribed by the second triumvirate 357
 Is murdered ——— 363
 Cicero, Q. his troops attacked in their winter quarters by Ambiorix III. 638
 Is rescued by Cæsar ——— 641
 Is left by Cæsar to guard his baggage at Aduatica, while he pursued the Eburones ——— 651
 Is unexpectedly attacked by the Sicambri ——— 652
 Drives off the assailants by a vigorous defence ——— 653
 Serves under Julius Cæsar in Spain IV. 216 note k.
 Is proscribed, and killed together with his father ——— 362
Cilician Pirates. See Pirates, and Pompey.
Cimbri, their irruption into Gaul III. 16
 Defeat Aurelius Scaurus, and take him prisoner ——— 73
 Defeat Corpio and Mallius ——— 74
 Are totally routed by Marius and Catulus ——— 85
Ciminian forest, is first penetrated by Cæso Fabius ——— I. 557
 The Consul Q. Fabius routs the Hetrurians there ——— 558
Cincinnatus, Q. is reduced to poverty by paying the sureties for his son Cæso, who fled from Rome — I. 300
 Is chosen Consul ——— 310
 His bold declaration to the Tribunes ib.
 Opposes his re-election ——— 313
 Is created Dictator ——— 316
 Marches to the relief of the Consul Minucius ——— 317
 Divests him of the consulship 318
 Advises the Senate to admit the number of Tribunes to be increased 319
 Is appointed Dictator on occasion of the conspiracy of Sp. Mælius — 393
Cingetorix, prevails over the pretensions of Indutiomarus, for the supreme authority among the Treviri, by the countenance of Julius Cæsar III. 628
 Is proclaimed a public enemy by Indutiomarus, and his estate confiscated 644
 Is invested with the chief authority by Cæsar

I N D E X.

- Cæsar on the death of Indutiomarus 646
Cinna, L. Cornelius, Consul, is routed in the Forum by his colleague Octavius III. 127
 Is deposed by the Senate 128
 Brings a Roman army from Capua ibid.
 Recalls Marius from banishment 129
 Besieges Rome in conjunction with Marius 132
 Invites the slaves out of the city 133
 Is restored to his consulship, and enters the city in peace 134
 Declares himself Consul again 144
 Continues himself in the consulship, and marries his daughter to Julius Cæsar 151
 Is murdered 152
Circus, the first in Rome built by Tarquinius Priscus I. 78
 Its dimensions computed — ibid. note.
Cirta in Mauritania, is taken by Sittius for Julius Cæsar IV. 176
Civil law, the first rise of in Rome I. 109
Claudia, the sister of Claudius Pulcher, is fined for a disrespectful speech against the Roman people II. 58 note.
Claudius, Appius, a Sabine, removes to Rome, and is made a Patrician I. 139
 Opposes favouring the poor Plebeians 150
 Is elected Consul 160
 His speech in the Senate on the secession of the Roman legions to the Mons Sacer 173
 His speech in the Senate respecting the pretensions of the Tribunes in the affair of Coriolanus 201
 Opposes the agrarian law in the Senate 252
Claudius, Appius, son of the former, is elected Consul I. 279
 Irritates the people by a virulent harangue 280
 Is saved with difficulty from the violence of the Tribunes 284
 Leads an army against the Volsci, which suffers itself to be defeated 283
 His troops again routed 284
 Decimates his army ibid.
 Influences the Senate to oppose the distribution of conquered lands 287
 Is impeached before the people by the Tribunes 289
 Kills himself ibid.
Claudius, Appius, chosen Consul I. 331
 Patronises the compilation of a body of laws 1. 332
 Is chosen one of the Decemvirs 332
 Assumes a popular behaviour 333
 Procures himself to be rechosen Decemvir the second year 345
 Schemes to perpetuate the possession of the office ibid.
 His arbitrary conduct to the Senate 353
 Attempts to seduce Virginia 357
 His scheme to get possession of her ibid.
 Virginia is killed by her father 363
 Abdicates his office 368
 Is accused by Virginus 372
 Is ordered to prison 374
 Dies in prison ibid.
Claudius, Appius, grandson of the Decemvir, his advice to the Senate on the revival of the agrarian dispute I. 409
 His speech in justification of continuing the siege of Veii through the winter 419
 His speech in opposition to the claim of the Plebeians to the consular dignity 483
 Is created Dictator 490
Claudius, Appius, the Censor, introduces innovations in the Roman customs I. 555 Constructs an aqueduct, and the road called the Appian way ibid.
 Retains the censorship beyond the legal term 556
 Is first chosen Consul, and afterward Prætor 562
 Is unsuccessful in the war against the Hætrurians until joined by Volturnus 574
 Gains a victory over them 575
 His speech in the Senate when blind, against granting a peace to King Pyrrhus 617
Claudius, Appius, Consul, is sent to the relief of Messina II. 14
 His artful method of securing his passage over 16
 Defeats Hiero, King of Syracuse 19
 Routs the Carthaginians 20
Claudius, C. discredits the plot with which the Tribunes endeavoured to alarm the Senate and people, and appeases their apprehensions I. 303
 His speech in the Senate to his nephew Appius the Decemvir 350
 Intercedes for him when imprisoned by Vir-

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|---|-----------------------|---|--------------|
| Virginus | 374 | He visits her | 440 |
| Reproaches the Consuls with his murder | 376 | Her oblations at Antony's tomb | 441 |
| His speech on the law proposed by the Tribunes for admitting Plebeians to the consulship | 386 | Her death | ibid. |
| Claudius Crassus, Appius , takes Camerinum, and sells the inhabitants for slaves | I. 630 | Her character | 442 |
| The Republic seeks out the sufferers, and grants them the privilege of citizens | ibid. | Clodius, P. his character | III. 246 |
| Claudius Pulcher , is sent to reduce Spartacus the gladiator, but is defeated by him | III. 195 | Excites mutinies in Lucullus's army | ib. |
| Cleomenes , a Sicilian Admiral, his shameful conduct under the protection of the Prætor Verres | III. 208 note. | His conduct in the prosecution of Cataline | 314, 322 |
| Cleonymus , son to Cleomenes, King of Sparta, makes two unsuccessful attempts to settle in Italy | I. 566 | Pollutes the mysteries of the Bona Dea | 385 |
| Cleopatra , sister to Ptolemy, is excluded from the succession to the kingdom of Egypt by Pompey | IV. 107 | Is tried for this offence, but contrives to be acquitted | 387 |
| Her first acquaintance with Julius Cæsar | 151 | Endeavours to get himself declared a Plebeian, in order to solicit the tribuneship | 397 |
| Is settled in the kingdom with her surviving brother after Ptolemy's death, by Cæsar | 161 | Is declared a Plebeian by the interest of Cæsar and Pompey | 409 |
| Has a son by Cæsar | ibid. | Is chosen Tribune | 428 |
| Her conduct at Rome on Cæsar's death | 265 note. | New laws published by him | 429 |
| Sends assistance to Dolabella in Syria | 296 | Points his resentment particularly at Cicero | 430 |
| Is cited before Antony | 375 | His violent treatment of the young Nobles in the interest of Cicero | 432 |
| Captivates him, and procures the death of her sister Arsinoë | 376 | Plunders and destroys Cicero's houses on his retreat to Sicily | 435 |
| Detains Antony a whole year with her in Egypt | 377 | Procures Cato to be sent to depose Ptolemy, King of Cyprus | 439 |
| Meets Antony again in Syria, who grants all her ambitious demands | 401 | His arrogance toward Pompey | 443 |
| Conducts Antony to Alexandria after his Parthian expedition | 410 | Is accused of attempting Pompey's life | ibid. |
| Her visit to Herod, King of Judæa | 416 | Attacks the parties of his colleagues in Cicero's interest in the Forum, and makes great slaughter | 456 |
| Prevents Antony from receiving Octavia's visit | 418 | Excites riots in the city on Cicero's return | 463 |
| Is declared his wife | ibid. | His violent outrages on the rebuilding of Cicero's Palatine house | 468 |
| Her profusion | 419 | Is chosen Ædile | 481 |
| Attends Antony to his army at Ephesus | 422 | Prosecutes Milo | ibid. |
| Octavius declares war against her | 425 | Is murdered by Milo | 541 |
| Urges Antony to pursue the war by sea | 428 | Chullius , governor of Alba, his stratagem to engage the Albans in a war with the Romans | I. 66 |
| Sails away from the battle of Actium | 430 | His sudden unaccountable death | 67 |
| Is seized by Octavius | 439 | Chullius, Gracchus , General of the Æqui, plunders the Tusculan territories, and insults the Roman ambassadors | I. 315 |
| | | Is delivered up in chains to the Roman Dictator Cincinnatus | 318 |
| | | Chusum , a city of Etruria, the occasion of its being besieged by the Gauls | I. 437 |
| | | Requests assistance from Rome | 439 |
| | | Chypæ , taken from the Carthaginians by Regulus | II. 34 |
| | | Cæcus, Horatius , his valiant stand against Perse- | |

I N D E X.

Porſen?, to cover the retreat of the Roman army — I. 130
Cælius, mount, origin of its name I. 37
Cælius, Marcus, ſome account of III. 550
note.
 Letters between him and Cicero 551, 555, 560, 576
 Is choſe Ædile — IV. 7
 His character of Cicero — ibid. note.
 His account of the conteſts relating to Cæſar and Pompey — 8. 12
 Exhorts Cicero to join the party of Cæ-ſar — 59
 Cicero's reply to him — 63
 His turbulent conduct at Rome 112
 His letter to Cicero on his diſappoint-
 ments — 113
 Invites Milo back to Italy — 114
 Is killed at Thurium — 115
 His character by Seneca — ibid. note.
Collatinus, his wife Lucretia violated by Sextus Tarquinius — I. 112
 Circumſtances of her death — 113
 Is choſen Conſul — 116
 Takes an oath never to recall the Tarquins, nor create a King in Rome
 119 Endeavours to ſave his nephews who had conſpired in favour of the Tarquins 122 Is forced to reſign the conſulſhip and leave Rome — 123
Colonies, the nature of thoſe ſent out by the Romans, explained — I. 108 note.
 In what reſpect different from municipia
 and preſectures — I. 551 note.
Comitia, the three ſorts of deſcribed, with the method of voting in them I. 93
note.
 An inquiry into the nature of theſe af-ſemblies — 235
 A law paſſed to prohibit the aſſembling of, out of Rome — 495
Comius, is conſtituted by Julius Cæſar King of the Atrebatæ in Britain III. 624 Prevails on Cæſar to grant peace to Calſibelanus — 633
 Enters into the Gauliſh confederacy a-gainſt Cæſar — 681
 Submits and obtains peace — 694
Conſcript Fathers in the Roman Senate, origin of that appellation — I. 120
Conſul, derivation of that appellation I.
 115 note.
For the chronological ſeries of theſe officers,

ſee the tables of Conſular Calendar, at the concluſion of volumes II. and IV.
Conſular Calendars — II. 561. IV. 449
Conſuls, the adminiſtration of government in Rome veſted in, on the expulſion of Tarquin — I. 116
 The office ſuſpended during the decem-virate — 332
 Plebeians made eligible to the dignity of 484 Conviſolitanis, elected chief Magiſtrate of the Ædui, is eſtabliſhed in his office a-gainſt the pretenſions of Catus, by Julius Cæſar — III. 666
 Engages in a conſpiracy againſt the Romans — 668
Corduba, is gariſoned by young Sextus
 Pompey — IV. 212
 Is inveſted by Julius Cæſar — 214
 Pompey makes his eſcape — ibid.
 Scapula aſſumes the command of the city — ibid.
 Scapula kills himſelf, deſpairing of being able to defend it — ibid.
 Cæſar's faction in the town contribute to his taking it — ibid.
Corſunum, a government eſtabliſhed there by the Italian allies as the capital of Italy, in rivalſhip to Rome III. 111
 Is ſeized for Pompey by Domitius IV.
 24.
 Julius Cæſar encamps before it 34
 Is delivered up to Cæſar by the gariſon
 37 Asculum, the Proconſul Servilius murdered
 there on the revolt of the Italian allies.
 III. 110.
 Is beſieged by Pompeius — 114
 Is taken and pillaged — 118
Corinth, the city of, deſtroyed by the Roman Conſul Mummius — II. 489
Coriolanus, Caius Marcius, diſtinguiſhes himſelf againſt the Volſcians — I. 184
 Ravages the country of the Volſci 191.
 Makes a violent ſpeech in the Senate a-gainſt the people — 192
 His family and character — ibid.
 The Tribunes endeavour to ſeize him.
 194
 His raſh declarations before the people:
 196.
 Is ſentenced to death by the Tribunes
ibid.
 His ſpeech in the Senate — 205.
 Is decreed by the Senate to ſtand trial before:

I N D E X.

- fore the people ——— 206
 His defence before the people — 208
 Is sentenced to banishment by the tribes ——— 209
 Retires to the Volsci ——— 213
 His speech in an assembly of the Volsci ——— 215
 His depredations on the territories of Rome ——— 217
 Invests the city of Rome — 218
 His reply to the senatorian deputies 219
 His reply to a second deputation 220
 The priests deputed to him in solemn procession ——— ibid.
 His reception of his mother and wife ——— 224
 Relents ——— 228
 Withdraws his army ——— ibid.
 Is accused of treachery ——— ibid.
 Is assassinated ——— 229
 Comparison of Livy's account of him with that of Dionysius ——— 230
Corymbus, a description of the several kinds bestowed among the Romans, as military rewards ——— I. 324 note.
Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi, excites her son Tiberius to enforcing the agrarian law ——— II. 521
 Is suspected of the death of her son-in-law Scipio Africanus ——— 547
 Her character ——— 548 note.
Cornelia, daughter of Scipio, is married to Pompey, who associates her father in the consulship with him ——— III. 547
 Sees her husband killed taking refuge in Egypt after the battle of Pharsalia ——— IV. 143
Cornelius, C. Tribune of the people, his struggles to enact popular laws ——— III. 282
Cornelius, P. commands the first fleet sent to sea by the Romans, and makes an unsuccessful descent in Campania ——— I. 559
Cornificius is left by Octavius to defend his camp near Archigetes in Sicily ——— IV. 394
 His bold and hazardous retreat with his men ——— 395
 Is chosen Consul ——— 410
Corvus. See Valerius.
Corvus, the naval machine under that name invented ——— II. 26
Cassius, Cornelius, a legionary Tribune kills Volturnus, King of the Veientes ——— I. 395
Cassius, A. Cornelius, chosen Dictator to crush the faction of Manlius ——— I. 455
 Defeats the Volsci ——— 456
 Cites Manlius before him ——— 457
Corvus, General of the Bellovaci, is defeated and killed by Julius Cæsar ——— III. 690
Cotta L. Tribune of the people, is forced by his colleagues to pay his debts ——— II. 467
Cotta, M. Aurelius, Consul, is sent with a fleet to defend Bithynia against Mithridates, and is defeated by him ——— III. 227
 Besieges Heraclea ——— 230
 Takes and plunders the city ——— 236
Catys, King of the Ordryfians, obtains his captive son and hostages without ransom from the Roman Senate ——— II. 453
Crassus, L. Licinius, Consul, demands a triumph for reducing a band of robbers on the Alps, but is opposed by his colleague Scaevola ——— III. 99
 When Censor, shuts up the schools of the Latin Rhetoricians ——— 104
 Dies by exerting himself in the Senate, against the Consul Philippus ——— 107
Crassus, M. Licinius, goes over to Sylla on his return from Asia ——— III. 153
 Defeats the left wing of Telephus's army before the gates of Rome ——— 158
 Is rewarded by Sylla out of the confiscated estates ——— 170
 Defeats Spartacus the gladiator ——— 197
 Gives him another defeat ——— 198
 Finally defeats and kills Spartacus ——— 199
 An ovation granted him ——— 200
 Is elected Consul with Pompey ——— 202
 His family and character ——— ibid. note.
 Is reconciled to Pompey, with whom he had quarrelled ——— 211
 Is suspected of being privy to Cataline's conspiracy ——— 338 note.
 Discloses his intelligence of Cataline's conspiracy to Cicero ——— 341
 Is accused in Senate of being concerned in it, by Tarquinus ——— 359
 The first triumvirate formed by him, Julius Cæsar, and Pompey ——— 400
 Encourages Clodius and his faction against Pompey ——— 482
 Is again elected Consul with Pompey ——— 490
 Obtains the province of Syria, and sets out eagerly on his expedition to Parthia ——— 501
 Is

I N D E X.

- Is reconciled to Cicero before his departure ——— 502
- Is defended by Cicero in the Senate 503
- His misconduct in Parthia 528
- Plunders the temple at Jerusalem 529
- Is dissuaded by Cassius from prosecuting this war ——— 530
- Is misled by a crafty Arabian chief 531
- Is defeated, and his son killed 532
- Retreats to Carræ 535
- Is betrayed by his guides 536
- Is deceived by Surena, the Parthian general, and killed 537
- His head carried to Orodes and indignantly treated ——— 538
- Crassus, P. Licinius*, is defeated and killed by Aristonicus king of Pergamus II. 544
- Crassus, Lucius*, distinguishes himself by pleading against Carbo. III. 8
- Defends his relation Licinia, the Vestal, accused of incontinence 15
- Crassus, Publius*, brings a reinforcement of Gallic horse to his father in Parthia III. 529
- Is killed and his father defeated 533
- His character ——— ibid. note.
- Retrospect of his transactions under Julius Cæsar in Gaul ——— 615
- Cassius*, one of Julius Cæsar's officers, his gallant behaviour at the battle of Pharsalia IV. 136
- His body honourably buried by Cæsar 138
- Creditors*, their great power over debtors among the early Romans I. 151, note.
- Cremora*, a fort built there by the Fabii, to guard the Roman frontier against the Veientes ——— I. 268
- The garrison decoyed out and cut to pieces ——— 269
- Crevier*, his account of Cicero's conduct with respect to Cataline III. 324
- Conduct of Julius Cæsar on the same occasion 327
- Strictures on his account of Cæsar's journey to his government in Gaul 588, note.
- Accuses Julius Cæsar of want of veracity in his Commentaries IV. 43, note.
- His account of Cæsar's luxurious life in Egypt with Cleopatra 161, note.
- Critognatus*, his speech at a council of war held in Alefia, then besieged by Julius Cæsar ——— III. 682
- Critolaus*, Prætor of Achæia, excites the people to disaffection to the Romans II. 487
- Crixus*, the gladiator, separates his forces from Spartacus, and is defeated and killed by the Prætor Arrius III. 196
- Curia*, the first division of the Roman tribes into 1. 25
- Their original powers 28
- Curiaii*, see Horatii.
- Curio*, Consul, his contests with the Tribunes, by enforcing laws relating to them III. 189
- His character by Cicero ibid. note.
- Curio*, the younger, the disciple of Cicero, declaims in public against the triumvirate Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus III. 416
- Is put to death for a plot sworn against him by Vettius 417
- Curio* is elected Tribune IV. 7.
- His character by Coelius ibid. note.
- Is bribed by Julius Cæsar 10
- Embraces the cause of Cæsar against the Senate ——— 11
- His expedition to Africa 96
- Defeats Juba king of Mauritania 97
- His harangue to his disaffected troops 99
- Defeats Attius Varius 100
- Engages the Numidians rashly, and is totally defeated and killed by Juba 102
- Curio Dentatus, Manius*, Consul, his reception of the Samnite deputies I. 594
- Reduces the Sabines to subjection 595
- Reduces Lucania ——— ibid.
- Ravages the country of the Senones 598
- Defeats king Pyrrhus 624
- His magnificent triumph 626
- Cælius*, Q. one of Cataline's conspirators discovers the plot to Fulvia III. 339
- Sends the particulars of it, to the Consul Cicero by Fulvia ——— 342
- Endeavours to prove Julius Cæsar concerned in the plot 381
- Cartius, M.* extraordinary story of his leaping into the chasm of the earth in Rome ——— I. 289
- Cærule Ediles*, the first creation of I. 485
- Cybele*, the goddess, brought to Rome from Phrygia in obedience to the oracle II. 268

I N D E X.

Cyren, prime minister to Pyrrhus king of Epirus, his character I. 602
 His advice to Pyrrhus 603
 Is sent with a force to Tarentum 606
 His account of the Epicurean doctrines to Fabricius 616
 Is sent to Rome to negotiate a peace 617
 Returns without success 618
 Goes again to Rome without effect 620
Cynoscephala, battle of, between Philip of Macedon and the Consul Flaminius II. 321
Cyrene, the kingdom of, bequeathed to the Roman people by king Ptolemy Apion III. 98
Cyzicum, is besieged by Mithridates king of Pontus III. 228
 He is forced to abandon the siege by the Consul Lucullus 229

D

Damages, the Roman laws concerning, from the twelve tables I. 338.
Damis, an Athenian deputy, his harangue to the Roman Senate, in favour of the Æolians II. 367
Debtors, insolvent, how treated among the early Romans I. 151, note.
See Mens facer.
 The laws of the ten tables concerning 336
 Law in favour of 534
Decemviri, chosen to compile a body of Roman laws, and the government of the city vested in them I. 332
 The ten tables formed and confirmed by the Senate and people 333
 A re-election of, for another year 345
 Their tyrannical conduct 346
 Two more tables of laws composed 347
 Retain their power avowedly ibid.
 Abdicate their authority 368
See Claudius, and Virginia.
Decius, Tribune of the people, his speech to the Senate, respecting the power claimed by his colleagues in reference to Coriolanus I. 199
 His speech to the people on the trial of Coriolanus 209
Decius Magnus, a Capuan in the interest of Rome, how preserved after being delivered up to Hannibal II. 177
Decius Mus, P. a legionary Tribune, extricates his General Cornelius Cossus from being overpowered by the Samnites I. 508

 Is honourably rewarded 509
 Is elected Consul 514
 Devotes himself to destruction in the war with the Latines, according to agreement with his colleague Manlius Torquatus 520
Decius Mus, the plebeian colleague with the Consul Fabius Maximus, disputes the command of the war in Hetruria with him I. 578
 Is associated with him 579
 Devotes himself to death after the example of his father 580
Decurie, the first division of the curiæ into I. 25
Deiotarus, is dispossessed of the lesser Armenia by Pharnaces king of the Bosphorus IV. 162
 Joins Julius Cæsar on his arrival in Syria 163
 Cæsar's prejudice against him 166
 Is accused of designs against Cæsar's life 224
 His cause pleaded by Cicero 225
 Dies after killing all his children but his successor 386, note.
Delos, is taken by Archelaus general to Mithridates king of Pontus, and the temple of Apollo plundered III. 137
Demetrius, son of Philip king of Macedon, is delivered up a hostage to the Romans, on the conclusion of peace between his father and Rome II. 323
 Is restored to his father 357
 Is sent ambassador to Rome 376
 Reads his father's instructions to him to the Senate 379
 Is accused by his brother Perseus of attempting his life 388
 Is put to death by his father's order 389
 Discovery of his brother's treachery toward him 392
Demetrius, nephew of Antiochus Epiphanes, escapes from Rome, and seizes the crown of Syria II. 461 Sends presents to reconcile himself with the Senate ibid.
 Expels Ariarathes king of Cappadocia and places Holophernes in his stead 462
 Is defeated and killed by Alexander Balas 467
Demetrius, the favourite freedman of Pompey,

I N D E X:

- pey, his riches and influence over Pompey — III. 269, note.
Demetrius, of Pharos, delivers up Corcyra to the Romans — II. 90
 Is made regent of Illyricum — 91
 Begins war with Rome — 99
Dentatus, Siciinius, a plebeian, his character, and speech to the people on the Agrarian law — I. 323
 Is sent by Romilius to attack the camp of the Æqui — 326
 Performs it — 328
 Deprives Romilius of a triumph ibid.
 Is created Tribune, and fines Romilius — 329
 Is reconciled to Romilius — 331
 Is murdered by order of the Decemviri — 355
Dicus, Prætor of Achaia, is defeated by the Consul Mummius — II. 489
Dilector, the first appointment of in Rome, and the nature of that office — I. 153
For the chronological series of these officers, see the tables of Consular Calendar, at conclusion of volumes II. and IV.
Didius, commander of Julius Cæsar's fleet on the coast of Spain, pursues and destroys Cn. Pompey the younger in his flight — IV. 215
 Is himself surprized and destroyed by the Lusitanians — 216
Didius, T. his transactions in Spain — III. 96
Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, his manner of obtaining the throne, and his expulsion — III. 470
 Applies to Rome for assistance — 471
 Is restored by Gabinus — 497
Dido, queen, her history — II. 6, note.
Dionysius, his exposition of the fabulous history of Hercules — I. 9
 His account of Pallas — 12, note.
 His circumstantial history of Coriolanus doubtful — 230
 Scrutiny into his account of the death of Spurius Cassius — 256
Divitiacus an Æduan chief, attends Julius Cæsar's camp in Gaul — III. 592
 Intercedes with Cæsar for his brother Dumnorix — 594
 Acquaints Cæsar with the distracted state of Gaul, and the tyranny of Ariovistus — 597
 Intercedes with Cæsar in favour of the Bellovaci — 610
Dalabella, P. Cornelius, conquers the Hertrurians and Boii — I. 598
Dalabella, P. Cornelius, marries Cicero's daughter Tullia — III. 576 Impeaches Appius Claudius for his conduct in Cilicia — ibid.
 His letter to Cicero on Cæsar's surrounding Pompey's army with lines of circumvallation — IV. 120
 Is made Tribune and urges laws in favour of debtors — 168
 Is hindered of the consulship by the opposition of Mark Antony — 239
 Seizes the consulship on Cæsar's death — 261
 Demolishes the altar erected to Cæsar, and quiets the citizens — 267
 Seizes Smyrna, and puts Trebonius to death — 294
 Is invested by Cassius at Laodicea, and kills himself — 355
Dolopians, revolt from Macedon, and are reduced by Perseus — II. 394 Domitius Abenobarbus, his generosity in the prosecution of M. Scaurus — III. 78, note.
 Is killed and his camp taken by Pompey — 171
Domitius Abenobarbus, Cn. is elected Consul — IV. 418
 Leaves Rome and joins Antony — 421
 Returns to Octavius and dies of vexation — 427
Domitius Calvinus, is defeated by Pharnaces king of the Bosphorus — IV. 162
Domitius, Cn. Consul, defeats the Senones — I. 598
Domitius, L. seizes Corfinium for Pompey — IV. 24
 Is besieged by Julius Cæsar — 34
 Is delivered up together with the town to Cæsar, by the garrison — 37
 Goes to Marseilles which he defends for Pompey — 40, note, 73
 Is defeated in a naval engagement by D. Brutus — 90
 Is taken by Cæsar at the battle of Pharsalia and put to death — 139
Dona imperatoria, account of those bestowed among the Romans. — I. 323, note.
Dorylaus, general to Mithridates king of Pontus, is defeated by Sylla — III. 144
Drachma, Greek, the value of in English money — I. 481, note.
Druids in Gaul, Cæsar's account of them — III. 647, note.
Dru-

I N D E X.

Drusus, M. Livius, a Tribune, is engaged by the Senate to oppose his colleague Caius Gracchus — II. 555
Drusus, M. Livius, Tribune of the people, proposes popular laws, without success III. 105
 Is murdered — 108
Dulcius, Consul, defeats Hannibal by sea II. 27
 His triumph and honours — 28
Dulcius, Tribune of the people, puts a stop to the prosecuting the adherents to the Decemvirs — I. 375
 Opposes the prolonging the consulship of Valerius and Horatius — 377
 Leaves the college of Tribunes to be completed by co-optation — 378
Dumavix, a principal man among the Ædii, marries the daughter of Orgetorix — III. 586
 Favours the march of the Helvetii into Gaul — 590
 An account of his conduct given to Julius Cæsar by Liscus — 592
 Is accused by Cæsar on account of his brother Divitiacus — 594
 Is killed in an attempt to draw off with his forces, on Cæsar's second embarkation for Britain — 630
Dumius, Tribune of the people, repeals the sumptuary law relating to tables III. 96
 His name struck out of the list of Senators by the Censors for this repeal 98
Dumviri, appointed to take charge of the Sybilline books — I. 109
 The number enlarged to Decemviri 483

E

Æmilius, memorable sea-fight there between the Romans and Carthaginians II. 31
Æmilius, a Roman officer, preserves 300 horse from the defeat of his general Crassus in Parthia, by deserting him III. 535
Egypt. See Antony Cæsar, Clæopatra, Ptolemy, &c.
 Is reduced to a Roman province IV. 442
Eleusian mysteries, the doctrines taught by — III. 276, note.
Ems, the city plundered and the inhabitants massacred by the Roman governor Pinarius — II. 202

Ennius the poet born II. 64, note c.
Ensus, the religious veneration the Romans paid to them I. 171, note.
Ephesus, an assembly of deputies from all the cities in Asia, called there by Sylla, at the conclusion of the war with Mithridates — III. 150
Epirus, is reduced by the Prætor Anicius II. 444
 The towns which had favoured Perseus cruelly plundered by Æmilius 448
Equestris Neptunus, the festival of instituted I. 7
 See Neptunus.
Equites, the original establishment of that order — I. 27, note g Equitius, an impostor, who pretended to be the son of Tib. Gracchus, is elected Tribune of the people by the faction of Saturninus III. 93
Eryx, is taken by the Consul Junius Pulius II. 56
 Is seized by Amilcar — 59
Evander, leads a colony from Peloponnesus into Italy I. 6.
 His religious institutions ibid.
Eumenes, king of Pergamus, declares for the Romans against Antiochus king of Syria — II. 343
 Assists Scipio Asiaticus at the battle of Magna — 362
 Goes to Rome for a reward of his services — 364 Resolution of the Senate — 366
 His journey to Rome to accuse Perseus 398
 His narrow escape from being killed by assassins employed by Perseus 401
 Joins the Romans against Perseus 416
 Negotiates privately with Perseus 429
 Is forbid to come to Rome 458
 His neighbours carry complaints against him to Rome — 459
 Is openly insulted by Sulpicius, the Roman ambassador — ibid.
 His death — 465
Exani, a Syrian slave in Sicily, pretends to inspiration, and predicts his future royalty — II. 540
 Heads a conspiracy of slaves ibid.
 Assumes the title of king — 541
 Is defeated and seized by the Consul Rupilius — 542 Ex-

I N D E X.

Euphranor, admiral of the Rhodian fleet under Julius Cæsar, defeats the Alexandrian fleet ——— IV. 155

F

Fabia, wife of C. Licinius Stolo, a Plebeian, engages her father Fabius Am-bustus to raise Plebeians to the consular dignity ——— I. 477

Her husband made Tribune 478

Her husband chosen Consul 486

II. 459

Fabii, the family of, garrison a fort at Cre-mera, to defend the frontier against the Veientes ——— 268

Are decoyed out of their fort and cut to pieces ——— 269

Three brothers of this family sent to the camp of Brennus, general of the Gauls, to intercede for the Clusians
I. 439

They draw the resentment of the Gauls against Rome by joining the Clusians in their hostilities ——— ibid.

Are elected military Tribunes 440

Fabius Ambustus, M. story of his daughters
I. 477.

Is chosen military Tribune — 479

Subdues the Tyburtes — 497

Is chosen Dictator ——— 500

Fabius Buteo, M. is created Dictator to fill up the vacancies of the Senate, after the battle of Cannæ II. 181

Fabius Cæso, Consul, his troops refuse to gain him honour against the Veientes
I. 266

Urges the Agrarian law in Senate 267

Procures an association of the Fabian family, to protect the frontiers against
the Veientes ——— 268

Joins it on the expiration of his consul-ship, and is created Proconsul ibid.

Fabius Cæso, undertakes with a servant to explore the Ciminian forest I. 557

Fabius, C. is sent by Julius Cæsar to oppose Pompey's lieutenants in Spain
IV. 74

Fabius Gurgæ, Q. curule Ædile, recovers his character by reforming manners
I. 581

Is chosen Consul, and is defeated by the Samnites ——— 590

Defeats them by his father's assistance
591

Is superseded in the siege of Cominium
by the Consul Posthumius 593

Is with others sent on an embassy to Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt
627

Defeats the rebels of Volturni, but is killed there ——— 634

Fabius Maximus, is created Pro-Dictator
II. 148

His cautious conduct ——— 149

Is reproached with cowardice by his troops ——— 150

Is recalled ——— 152

Minucius associated with him 154

Rescues Minucius when worked by Hannibal ——— 155

His operations against Hannibal as Consul ——— 185

Procures his consulate to be continued 190

Takes Casilinum ——— 192

Takes Tarentum ——— 224

His speech in Senate in opposition to Scipio's intended expedition to Africa 261

His death and character — 287

Fabius, Q. prevails on the Tribunes to de-fit from their demand of a body of laws as a rule of government I. 294

Drives the Æqui from Tusculum 313

Fabius Rullianus, Q. general of the horse to the Dictator L. Papirius Cursor, engages the Samnites in the Dictator's absence contrary to orders I. 535

Escapes to Rome to avoid punishment
536

Obtains a pardon ——— 537

Is chosen Consul, and defeats the Sam-nites ——— 539

Is chosen Dictator ——— 552

Takes Saticula, and defeats the Samnites
ibid.

Roots the Hetrurians, and penetrates the Ciminian forest ——— 558

Is prevailed on to nominate Papirius Cursor Dictator ——— 559

Again defeats the Hetrurians ——— 560

Is made Censor, and reforms the innovations introduced in the state by Appius Claudius, by which he acquires the surname of Maximus 565

Is made curule Ædile, and prevents a scarcity of corn in Rome — 569

The consulship forced on him 571

Defeats the Samnites ——— 572

Ob-

I N D E X.

- Obtains the conduct of the war in Hetruria from his colleague Decius Mus 578
- Decius associated with him — 579
- Defeats the united Samnites and Gauls, after the self-devotement of Decius 580
- Opposes his son's election to the consulship — 590
- Assists him against the Samnites 591
- Is made Dictator to treat with the seceders on mount Janiculus — 597
- Fabricius*, C. his successes against the Lucanians — I. 599
- His answer to the offers of king Pyrrhus 615
- His kind treatment by Pyrrhus 616
- Apprises Pyrrhus of the treachery of his physician — 620
- Reduces the Tarentines and their confederates after the departure of Pyrrhus 621
- His motive for promoting Cornelius Rufinus to the consulship — 622
- Falerii*, treacherous behaviour of a school-master of that city, when besieged by Camillus — I. 432
- Submits to Rome — 433
- Falisci*, obtain the privileges of Roman citizens — I. 510
- Rebel and are subdued after the first Punic war — II. 65
- Fathers*, their rights over their children according to the twelve tables of Roman laws — I. 336
- Fasculus*, chief shepherd to Amulius king of Alba, preserves and educates Romulus and Remus — I. 16
- Is killed in the fray between the two brothers — 20
- Faciates*, their institution and office I. 58
- Feria Latina*, instituted by Tarquin the Proud — I. 106
- Fidene*, taken by Poplicola — I. 139
- Is surprized by the Tarquins 144
- Is taken by T. Lartius — 146
- Revolts in conjunction with Tolumnius king of Veii — 395
- Reduced — ibid.
- Is taken by the Dictator Q. Servilius Priscus — 396
- Is plundered by the Dictator Mamercus Æmilius — 400
- Fidmates*, are reduced by Romulus I. 45
- Are again routed by Tullus Hostilius 71
- See Fidene.*
- Revolt and are defeated by the Dictator Mamercus Æmilius 395, 400
- Fimbria*, C. Prætor urbanus, orders Q. Scævola, Pontifex maximus, to be killed, to grace the funeral of Caius Marius III. 135
- His transactions in Asia — 146
- Kills himself on the approach of Sylla 149
- Fire*, sacred, the preservation of, always a part of religion, in various places I. 55, note, d.
- Flamines*, the nature and office of the priests of this class — I. 54
- Flaminius*, Lucius Quinctius, is struck out of the list of Senators by Cato the Censor II. 378
- Flaminius*, T. Quinctius, his interview with Philip of Macedon — II. 314
- Defeats Philip — ibid.
- Is unable to take Atrax — 315
- Gives over the Achæans to the Roman interest — ibid.
- Is continued in his command 317
- His second conference with Philip ibid.
- Defeats Philip at Cynocéphalæ 321
- Obliges Nabis to restore Argos 336
- Returns to Rome and triumphs 338
- Confers with the Syrian ambassadors ibid.
- His embassy to Greece — 346
- His reply to Archidamus, the Ætolian minister at the Achaian diet 349
- Induces the Achæans to relinquish Zacynthus to the Romans 356
- Flaminius*, Consul, is defeated and killed by Hannibal at the Lake Thrasymenus I. 146
- Flaminius Nepos*, C. defeats the Gauls, and prosecutes his successes against them in defiance of the auguries, and his orders to return and abdicate by the Senate — II. 96
- Flavius*, a Lucanian, betrays Sempronius Gracchus into the hands of the Carthaginians — II. 207
- Flavius*, Cn. curule Ædile, publishes a Roman Calendar — I. 565
- Flavius*, Q. an infamous Roman, his extraordinary election to the tribuneship I. 530
- Fossa Mariana*, on what occasion that canal was dug — III. 80
- Fregella*, a city of the Sidicini, a Roman colony planted there — I. 529
- Is surprized by the Samnites, and burnt with

I N D E X.

- G
- with all the inhabitants 546
 The city razed for rebellion against Rome II. 550
- Fufcius*, governor of Alba, salutes Tullus Hostilius as king of Alba, on the victory of the surviving Horatius over the Curiatii I. 69
 Is put to death by Tullus, for treachery 72
- Fulvia*, a Roman lady, comes to the knowledge of Cataline's conspiracy from her lover Q. Curius, and discloses it III. 339
 Informs the consul Cicero of all particulars 342
- Fulvia*, the widow of Clodius, married to M. Antony IV. 339
 Endeavours to make a breach between her husband and Octavius, to draw him away from Cleopatra in Egypt 378
 Raises forces against Octavius 381
 Flies to Greece 382
 Dies of grief 383
- Fulvius Centumalus*, is defeated and killed by Hannibal II. 220
- Fulvius Flaccus*, M. is sent to command against the Saluvii, II. 550
 Arms the people of Rome in defence of Caius Gracchus 558
 Is killed by the Patricians, with his son 559
- Fulvius Flaccus*, Q. his barbarous treatment of the Senators of Capua II. 213
 Is appointed Dictator 221
 Procures his own nomination to the consulate 222
- Fulvius Nobilior*, Q. is surprized and defeated by Carus, general of the Celtiberians II. 494
- Funerals*, the ceremonies of, according to the twelve tables I. 340
- Furius*, L. military Tribune, his indiscreet conduct in the war with the Volsci, rectified by the prudence of his colleague Camillus I. 473
- Furius Philus*, P. Consul, delivers up the late Consul Mancinus to the Numantines, who refuse to accept him II. 515
- Furnius*, one of M. Antony's lieutenants is defeated in Asia by Sextus Pompey IV. 412
 Is worsted by him again, jointly with Titius and Amyntas 413
 His conference with Pompey ibid.
- Gabii*, the city of, treacherously betrayed to Tarquin the Proud, by his son Sextus I. 107
- Gabinus*, Tribune of the people, recommends Pompey to the command of the war against the Cilician pirates III. 216
 Is elected Consul 428
 His character 429, note.
 Restores Ptolemy Auletes king of Egypt 497
 His transactions in Judæa ibid. note.
 His disgraceful reception at Rome, on his return from Syria 521
 Is tried for misconduct 522
 Is tried again for plundering his province 523
 Is condemned to perpetual banishment 524
- Gades in Spain*, the inhabitants of, refuse admittance to Varro, Pompey's lieutenant, and declare for Julius Cæsar IV. 89
 The freedom of Rome conferred on, by Cæsar 90
- Galba*, king of the Sueffones, is appointed commander of the Belgic league against the Romans III. 607
 Submits, on the taking of Noviodunum, and delivers up his two sons hostages to Julius Cæsar 609
- Galba*, Ser. Sulpicius, his base massacre of the Lusitanians II. 498
- Galba*, Sergius, is sent by Julius Cæsar with the twelfth legion to maintain a free passage over the Alps III. 613
 His brave defence on being unexpectedly attacked in Oclodurus, his winter quarters 614
- Galba*, Servius, his account to Cicero of the actions between M. Antony and the Consuls Panfa and Hirtius IV. 301
- Gallus*, Flavius, suffers himself to be decoyed from Antony's army by the Parthians, who cut him and all his party off IV. 406
- Garnus*, governor to the princess Arsinoë, obtains the command of the Egyptian army on the death of Achilles IV. 153
- Gavius*, a Roman citizen, his cruel treatment in Sicily, by Verres III. 208, note.
- Gaul*, the ancient division of I. 437, note.
 The

I N D E X

- The different migrations of the Gauls 433, note.
 Brennus besieges Clusium — 439
 Brennus besieges Rome — 440
See Brecheux.
 An army of Gauls defeated by Camillus in his dictatorship — 483
 Another army of, defeated — 491
 Are again routed by the Dictator Sulpicius — 494
 Are defeated by the Consul L. Furius Camillus — 501
 The Senones cut off a Roman legion 579
 Are defeated in conjunction with the Samnites — 580
 A signal overthrow given to, by L. Æmilius Papus — II. 95
 Favour the design of Hannibal 129
 Its boundaries and divisions at the time of Julius Cæsar's government there — III. 585
See Orgetorix, Helvetii, Dumnorix, Ariovistus, Viriatharix, &c.
 A review of the political state of the several nations of — 617, note.
 Their manner of fortifying their towns 662, note.
 A general council of, called by Viriatharix — 681
See Cæsar.
Gæsa, public honours paid to, by the Romans, in memory of their preserving the capitol — I. 446, note.
Genabum, in Gaul, the Roman citizens there massacred by the Carnates — III. 655
 Is destroyed by Cæsar — 658
Genius, king of Illyricum, is outwitted by Pericles king of Macedonia — II. 429 is reduced by the Prætor Anicius — 432
 Is led in triumph by Anicius — 453
Genetius, Cn. Tribune of the people, attacks the Consuls on the distribution of the public lands — I. 274
 His sudden and suspicious death — ibid.
Genetius, L. a plebeian Consul, is defeated and killed in an engagement with the Hernici — I. 489
Germani, two nations of the Ufipetes and Tenctheri, driven from their habitations by the Suevi, seize the towns of the Menapii, on the banks of the Rhine — III. 639
 Are invited into Gaul by the Gaulish states — 620
 Negotiations between them and Julius Cæsar — ibid.
 Attack Cæsar treacherously — 621
 Are totally routed by Cæsar — 622
 Cæsar's account of their manners, and political state — 649, note.
Gergovia, is besieged by Julius Cæsar — 667
 The Romans retire — 674
Gisco, his prudent embarkation of the Carthaginian mercenaries from Sicily, after the first war with Rome — II. 67
 Is cruelly murdered by them — 77
Glaucia, stands candidate for the consulship, and procures his competitor Memmius to be murdered — III. 94
 Is with his party, massacred by the people — ibid.
Glycia, Claudius, is chosen Dictator in scoff — II. 54
 Is put to death for his behaviour in Corsica — 86
Gracchus, Caius, is chosen Quæstor — II. 549
 Distinguishes himself in Sardinia — 550
 Returns to Rome without leave — 551
 Is chosen Tribune — ibid.
 Popular laws proposed by him — 552
 Is again elected Tribune — 554
 Passes a law taking the right of jurisdiction from the Senate — ibid.
 Passes other laws — 555
 Is sent to rebuild Carthage, and plant a colony there — 556
 His death — 559
Gracchus, Tib. Sempronius, defends the Scipios before the people of Rome — II. 371
 Marries the daughter of Africanus — 372
 His successes in Spain — 493
Gracchus, Tib. Sempronius, his family and character — II. 526
 Undertakes to enforce the Licinian law — 522
 His oration in behalf of the poor and against the oppressions of the patricians — 523
 Suspends the magistrates on account of the opposition to his designs — 524
 Deposits his colleague Octavius Cæcina — 525
 His law for the distribution of lands passed — ibid.
 Justifies the deposition of Octavius — 526
 Endeavours to be appointed Tribune again — 527

I N D E X.

again on the expiration of his office 527
 Is killed by the Senators in the comitiae 528
 Reflections on his law, and the manner of his death 529
Granius, chief magistrate of Puteoli, is strangled by order of Sylla III. 175
Greece, for the several revolutions in, see under the names of the respective states.
 Is reduced to a Roman province II. 490
Gregorian calendar, on what occasion and when this regulation took place IV. 197, note.

H

Haliartus, in Boeotia, is taken and razed by C. Lucretius, the Roman Admiral II. 418
Hannibal, a Carthaginian general, is besieged by the Romans in Agrigentum II. 22
 Deferts the city 24
 Takes the Roman fleet under Cornelius Asina at Lipara 25
 Is crucified by his own sailors 30
Hannibal, son of Amilcar, is sworn by his father to perpetual enmity against the Romans II. 102
 Succeeds Asdrubal as general in Spain 104
 His first exploits 105
 Takes Saguntum 109
 His character 110
 His dispositions preparatory to war with Rome 113
 The justice of this undertaking inquired into 114
 Passes the Pyrennees into Gaul 118 Passes the Rhone 119
 Passes the Alps 123
 Defeats the Taurini 127
 His speech to his army on the approach of Scipio 132
 Defeats Scipio on the banks of the Ticin 135
 Defeats the Romans again under Sempronius 140
 Passes the Appennines into Hetruria 144
 Defeats the consul Flaminius at the lake Thrasymenus 146
 Enters Campania 150
 Deceives Fabius by a stratagem 151
 Vol. IV.

His address to his soldiers before the battle of Cannæ 161
 Battle of Cannæ 162
 Why he declined besieging Rome immediately 170, note.
 Is received by Capua 176
 Takes Casilinum 180
 Concludes an alliance with Philip of Macedon 183
 Is forced to raise the siege of Cumæ 185
 Excites a revolution in the government of Syracuse 195
 Surprizes Tarentum 204
 Appears before the walls of Rome 211
 Defeats Fulvius Centumalus 220
 Defeats Marcellus 223
 Is defeated by him in turn 224
 His brother Asdrubal defeated and killed 250
 Is recalled from Italy 286
 His interview with Scipio 290
 Battle of Zama 292
 Pleads the necessity of peace 296
 The occasion of his flying from Carthage 332
 Excites Antiochus the Great to war against Rome 340
 His conversation with Scipio Africanus at Ephesus 343, note.
 His advice to Antiochus 345
 His advice to Antiochus at Chalcis 351
 Warns Antiochus to prepare against the Romans in Asia 357
 Is defeated at sea by the Rhodians, and blocked up in a Port of Pamphylia 360
 Escapes to avoid being delivered up to the Romans 363
 Account of his death 381
 Parallel between him and Scipio Africanus 382, note.
Hanno, is sent from Carthage to the relief of Agrigentum, and is defeated by the Romans II. 23
 Is defeated at sea by Regulus and Manlius 32
 Treats personally with the Consuls for peace 33
Hanno, his character II. 61
 Is defeated by the consul Lutatius 62
 Is appointed general against the rebellious mercenaries, and is defeated by them 73
 Is deprived of his command 78
 His

I N D E X.

- His speech concerning the hostile conduct of Hannibal towards Rome 107
 His speech on the successes of Hannibal 177
Harpages, when first taken, and the principles of the art I. 24, note.
Hasta pura, described, and on what occasion bestowed as a military reward I. 323, note.
Hastati, among the Roman soldiery, their arms and place in battle — I. 517
Helvetii, enter into an association for the conquest of Celtic Gaul III, 586
 Destroy their own towns and begin their march — 587
 Their passage into Gaul opposed by Julius Cæsar — 589
 A body of them passing the Arar, routed by Cæsar — 591
 Are defeated by Cæsar — 595
 Submit, and are sent back to rebuild their towns — 596
Heraclea, a Grecian republic, is besieged by Cotta, for favouring Mithridates King of Pontus — III. 230
 Is taken and plundered — 236
 Is redressed by the Roman Senate ibid.
Heracleides, minister to Philip King of Macedonia, his character — II. 313
Heracles, his real history inquired into I. 9
Hercynian forest, its situation and extent III. 650, note.
Herdonius, his bold oration in the Latine council before Tarquin the Proud I. 105
 His death contrived by the treachery of Tarquin — 106
Herdonius, Appius, surprizes the capitol I. 306
 Examination of Dionysius's account of this enterprize 308, note.
 Is dispossessed and killed — ibid.
Hertunius, father of Pontius, general of the Samnites, his wife advice to his son, for his conduct toward the Romans I. 541
Hernici, defeat and kill the plebeian Consul Genucius — I. 489
 Are routed by his lieutenant Sulpicius 490
 Take arms and are routed by Marcus Tremulus — 562
 Are subjected to the Roman government 563
Herophilus, a farrier, pretends himself to be the grandson of Caius Marius IV. 217
 Is banished Italy — ibid.
 Returns, and is put to death by M. Antony — 266
Herfiliæ, the only married woman among the Sabine, seized by the Romans I. 34
 Mediates a peace between the Sabines and the Romans — 39
Hetruria, several cities of, submit to Romulus — I. 37
 Description of the territory so called 79
 Its states unite in a war against the Romans — ibid.
 Are reduced by Tarquinius Priscus 80
 March a vast army against the Romans 266
 Are defeated by the Consul Marcus Fabius — 267
 All the Lucumonies of, unite in a war against the Romans — 269
 Cut the Fabian garrison of Cremera to pieces — ibid.
 Defeat the consul Menenius and, invest Rome — 271
 Are defeated — ibid.
 Clusium besieged by the Gauls under Brennus — 439
 Are defeated by the Dictator C. Marcus Rutilus — 496
 Are defeated, and routed in the Ciminian forest by Q. Fabius — 558
 Obtain a truce — 559
 Receive another defeat from the Dictator Valerius Corvus — 567
 Are defeated by Cornelius Dolabella 598
Hiempsal, son of Micipsa King of Numidia, is murdered at the instigation of Jugurtha — III. 19
Hiero, King of Syracuse, supplies the Romans with provisions, at the siege of Rhegium — I. 628
 His history and character II. 5, note.
 Is defeated by the Romans before Messina 19
 Makes peace with the Romans 21
 Assists the Carthaginians against their mercenaries — 78
 Goes to Rome to see the games 84
 Assists the Romans against Hannibal 144
 His valuable presents to Rome 159
 Dies

I N D E X.

| | |
|---|-----------------------|
| Dies | 188 |
| His daughters killed | 195 |
| Hieronymus , grandson and successor to Hiero | |
| King of Syracuse, insults the Roman | |
| ambassadors, and makes a league with | |
| Carthage | II. 188 |
| Is killed | 189 |
| Himilco Phamæas , general of Carthaginian | |
| cavalry, deserts to the Romans | II. 476 |
| Hircan , is confirmed in the high-priesthood | |
| of Judæa by Julius Cæsar | IV. 163 |
| Hirtius , A. Consul, marches into Gaul with | |
| an army to reduce M. Antony | IV. 289 |
| Defeats M. Antony after his surprizing | |
| Pansa | 302 |
| Defeats Antony again, jointly with Pansa, | |
| but loses his life | 304 |
| His character by Dr. Middleton | ibid. note. |
| Hirtuleius , Quæstor, to Sertorius in Spain, | |
| is defeated and killed by Metellus | |
| Pius | III. 186 |
| Hispalis , is reduced by Julius Cæsar | IV. 214 |
| Histriones , derivation of that name for | |
| stage-players | I. 486, note. |
| Horatii , their remarkable battle with the | |
| Curatii, to decide the superiority be- | |
| tween Rome and Alba | I. 68 |
| The surviving Horatius murders his sister | 70 |
| Is tried for this murder | ibid. |
| His punishment | 71 |
| Horatius , the Poet, enters into Brutus's | |
| army at Athens | IV. 292, note. |
| Horatius Barbatus , M. his speech in the | | | Senate, on the tyranny of the Decem- | |
| vir | I. 349 |
| Is chosen Consul on the destruction of the | |
| decemvirate | 369 |
| Inquiry into the lex Horatia , now passed | ibid. note. |
| Defeats the Sabines | 376 |
| Is refused a triumph by the Senate | ibid. |
| Procures one from the people | 377 |
| Horatius Pulvillus , Consul, consecrates the | |
| Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus | I. 134 |
| Hortensia , her speech in the Forum on the | |
| tax laid by the second triumvirate | |
| on the Roman ladies | IV. 366 |
| Hortensius , Q. appointed Dictator, to treat | |
| with the seceders on mount Janiculus, | |
| dies in his office | I. 596 |
| Hortensius , Q. his shameful conduct in the | |

| | |
|--|----------------------|
| administration of justice | III. 208 |
| Is elected Consul | 212 |
| His character as an orator | ibid. note. |
| His moral character | 213, note. |
| Marries Cato's wife Marcia | VI. 71, note. |
| Hurdle , the method of putting persons to | |
| death under, explained | I. 411 |
| Hyrcanus , King of Judæa, is deposed, and | |
| the crown given to his brother Aristobulus | III. 257 |
| Pleads his cause before Pompey | 261 |
| Is restored by Pompey | 269 |
| Is again dispossessed, and restored by Ga- | |
| binus | 497 |
| Is carried away at the sacking of Jerusa- | |
| lem by Pacorus Prince of Parthia | IV. 383 |

J I

| | |
|---|-------------------|
| Janiculus , a secession of the Roman people | |
| on this hill, to obtain a repeal of the | | | law condemning debtors to slavery | I. 596 |
| Janus , the worship of, instituted by Numa | |
| Pompilius | I. 60 |
| Jacilius , L. head of the college of Tri- | |
| bunes, proposes a partition of mount | |
| Aventine, among the people | I. 320 |
| This demand how obtained | 324 |
| Rescues Virginia from the violence of Ap- | |
| pius Claudius the Decemvir | 359 |
| Brings back the army to Rome | 366 |
| Is again chosen Tribune | 368 |
| Julius , Spurius , Tribune of the people, | |
| procures a plebiscitum to secure the | |
| Tribunes from interruption in speak- | |
| ing to the people | I. 188 |
| Jerusalem , is besieged by Pompey | III. 267 |
| The temple taken | 268 |
| The temple plundered by Crassus | 529 |
| Julius Cæsar gives Hircan leave to rebuild | |
| the walls of | IV. 162 |
| Is sacked by Pacorus the Parthian | 383 |
| Is taken and cruelly treated by Sosius and | |
| Herod | 401, note. |
| Illyricum , occasion of the quarrel between, | |
| and Rome | II. 89 |
| Commencement of the second war with | |
| Rome | 99 |
| Gentius King of, cheated by Perseus King | |
| of Macedonia | 429 |
| Imilco , the Carthaginian general, his ex- | |
| ploits | 511 |

I N D E X.

plots in Sicily II. 9, note.
Impeachment of persons before assemblies of the people, form of I. 288, note.
Indutiomarus, is obliged to desist from his rivalship with Cingetorix for the supreme power over the Treviri, on the return of Cæsar from Britain III. 628
 Instigates the Gauls to revolt 634, 643,
 Is defeated and killed by Labienus 644
Iuberitances, the laws of, from the twelve tables ——— I. 337.
Isabria, is reduced to be a Roman province
 II. 98
Insula sacra, at Rome, the first formation of this island ——— I. 123
Interest of money, the rate of, first fixed by law ——— I. 49;
 Reduced ——— 503
Italy, its ancient names, previous to being so called ——— I. 4.
 Origin of its present name ——— 5
 Its primitive inhabitants ibid.
 A colony of Arcadians settles there, under Evander ——— 6
 See Æneas.
 A great plague throughout ——— 331
 A great drought ——— 399
 The dominion of, completed by the Romans ——— 631
 The allies of Rome, deprived of the rights of citizenship by a law of the Consuls Crassus and Scævola III. 98
 They meditate a revolt on this occasion
 108
 The Proconsul Servilius murdered at Asculum ——— 110
 The Allies establish a rival government to Rome, at Corfinium ——— 111 Commencement of the war of the allies, with Rome ——— 112
 The Lex Julia passed ——— 114
 The allies obtain the freedom of Rome at the conclusion of the war 119
Juba, King of Mauritania, is defeated by Curio ——— IV. 97
 Engages Curio again, and totally defeats him ——— 102
 Joins Scipio and follows Julius Cæsar to Thapsus ——— 177
 Is defeated by Cæsar ——— 178
 Kills himself ——— 188
 His kingdom converted into a Roman
 province ——— 189
Judacilius, a general of the Italian allies, forces his way through the intrenchments of Pompeius besieging Asculum, and in despair of preserving the town

 poisons himself ——— III. 118
Judea, commotions excited in by Antipater ——— III. 257, 497, note.
 See Aristobulus, Hyrcaus, and Pompey.
 Is conquered by Pacorus the Parthian
 IV. 383.
Judas Maccabæus, the Jewish general, defeats the Syrian army under Lyfias
 II. 459
 Concludes a treaty with Rome 462
Jugurtha, arrives with Numidian auxiliaries to the Roman army in Spain
 II. 517
 His character ——— III. 17
 Scipio's advice to him ——— 18
 Is left joint heir to Numidia with the sons of Micipsa ——— 19 Murders Hiempsal and seizes the kingdom ——— ibid.
 Drives out Adherbal, after the partition of the kingdom by the Roman Commissioners ——— 23
 Puts Adherbal to death, on his yielding himself up to him ——— 23
 Corrupts the Consul Bestia, who was sent to reduce him ——— 24
 Is prevailed on to repair to Rome 27 Procures Maffia to be assassinated, and leaves Italy ——— 28
 Reduces the Roman army under Aulus to submit to the yoke ——— 30
 His engagement with the Consul Metel-
 lus ——— 35
 Causes the Roman garrison at Vacca to be massacred ——— 45
 Puts Bomilcar to death for conspiring against him ——— 46
 Is defeated by Metellus ——— 52
 Procures assistance from Bocchus King of Mauritania ——— 54
 Surprizes Marins, but is routed by him
 62
 Is again defeated by him ——— 64
 Is delivered up to Sylla by Bocchus 71
 His death ——— 75
Julia, daughter of Julius Cæsar, is married to Pompey ——— III. 415
 Her death ——— 525
Julian Calendar, institution of, IV. 196
Julian Port, is formed by the Consul Agrippa ——— IV. 388
Julius

I N D E X.

- Julius Cæsar.* See Cæsar.
Iulus, son of Ascanius, appointed high priest of Alba — I. 14
Junius Pera, M. is created Dictator after the battle of Cannæ — II. 174
 Raises an army against Hannibal 179
Juno, the statue of, brought by Camillus from Veii, and placed in a temple dedicated to her on mount Aventine I. 429
Juno Moneta, the temple of, built I. 504
 A mint established there — 629
Junonia, a new city, is built on the ruins of Carthage, and a Roman colony planted there — II. 556
Jupiter Capitolinus, the temple of, built I. 110
 The building described ibid. note. 134, note.
 Is consecrated — 133
Jus imaginis, this prerogative explained III. 2, note b.
- K
- Kalendar*, Roman and Julian, difference between — IV. 18, note.
 See Julian and Gregorian.
Kenut, his description of Æmilius's triumph over Perles, from Plutarch II. 451, note.
Knights, Roman, the three centuries of, formed — I. 41
- L
- Laberius*, Decimus, a Roman knight, acts a mimic piece of his own composing, on the public stage at Rome IV. 193
 Repartees between him and Cicero ibid. note.
Labienus, lieutenant to Julius Cæsar in Gaul, is sent by him to seize a hill commanding the Helvetian camp III. 594
 Defeats and kills Indutiomarus 644
 Defeats Camulogenus — 676
 Deserts Cæsar, and goes over to Pompey IV. 29
 His treacherous conference with Cæsar's deputies — 112
 His cruel treatment of prisoners 126
 Gives battle to Cæsar — 174
 Is killed in an engagement with Cæsar, in Spain — 213
Labienus, son of the former, in conjunction with Pacorus, son of the King of Parthia, subdues Syria, and sacks Jerusalem — IV. 383
 Is overthrown and killed by Ventidius 385
Lacedæmon, recovers its liberty and assumes the republican form of government, on the death of the tyrant Nabis II. 347
 Is subdued by Philopæmon, and forced to renounce the laws of Lycurgus 368
 Decree of the Roman Senate concerning 380
 The forces of, defeated by the Achæans 486
Laevinus, M. Valerius, completes the reduction of Sicily — II. 220
 Evades nominating a Dictator, when required by the Senate 221
 His successes in Africa — 227
Laevinus, P. Valerius, is defeated by King Pyrrhus I. 611
 Offers Pyrrhus battle again, which he declines — 613
Land, a law proposed by the Tribunes to limit the possession of — I. 479
 This law passed — 484
 See Agrarian law.
Lastice, wife of Mithridates, King of Pontus, is put to death by him for incontinence, and conspiring against his life — III. 102
Lartius, Q. is created Dictator, at the first erection of that office — I. 153 Concludes a truce with the Latines ibid.
 Resigns — 154
Laternus, warns Plancus of Lepidus's treacherous intentions, and then kills himself — IV. 332
Latines, whence they derived that appellation — I. 4
 Are reduced by Ancus Marcius 75
 Institution of the Ferie Latine 106
 Signal defeat of, by the Dictator Posthumus 155
 Make war on the Samnites, in behalf of the Sidicini — 513
 Embassy of their Prætor L. Annius to the Roman Senate — 515 Receive a defeat from Manlius Torquatus — 522
 Are

I N D E X.

- Are totally overcome by L. Furius Camillus ————— 523
- Latins*, King of the Aborigines, his kingdom and subjects denominated from him ————— I. 4
- Enters into a league with Æneas ————— 10
- Gives him his daughter Lavinia ————— 11
- His death ————— ibid.
- Latium*, arrival of Æneas there ————— I. 4.
- Latins*, revolt against the Romans I. 408
- Are defeated by the Dictator Q. Servilius Fidenas ————— 409
- Lavinia*, daughter of Latinus, married to Æneas ————— I. 11
- Is brought to-bed of Silvius ————— 13
- Lavinium*, whence it derived its name I. 11
- Is united with Alba into one kingdom, under Silvius ————— 14
- Laurea* in Spain, is besieged and taken by Sertorius ————— III. 185
- Laws*, Roman, the ten tables of, compiled by the Decemviri, and confirmed by the Senate and people — I. 333
- Fragments preserved of these laws — 334
- Lustrum*, account of the festival of expiation so called, during the siege of Veii ————— I. 424
- Legion*, Roman, the derivation of the name, and the number of men it contained at the time of Romulus — I. 36
- How composed in the time of Polybius ————— 517, note.
- Lentulus*, his gladiators escape from Capua, and occasion a rebellion — III. 194
- See Spartacus.
- Lentulus*, L. a Roman officer, his advice on the army being entrapped by the Samnites ————— I. 542
- Lentulus Sura*, P. Cornelius, one of Catiline's conspirators, his family and character ————— III. 337
- Is put to death by a decree of the Senate ————— 366
- Lentulus*, a Macedonian, saves the life of King Pyrrhus, in his engagement with the Romans ————— I. 611
- Lepidus*, L. Æmilius, Prætor, is entrusted with the care of Rome by Julius Cæsar ————— IV. 71
- Procures Cæsar the dictatorship — 104
- Is elected Consul with Cæsar — 169
- The government of Rome committed to him on Cæsar's departure for Spain, against Pompey's sons — 210
- Brings his troops into the city, on the death of Cæsar ————— 259
- Enters into an accommodation with young Sextus Pompey, in Spain — 272
- His letter to Cicero, relating to the war with Antony ————— 308
- A review of his conduct respecting Antony ————— 322
- Joins Antony ————— 332
- His letter to the Senate ————— ibid.
- The second triumvirate formed by him, Octavius, and Antony — 356
- His share in the proscriptions that followed ————— 365
- Obtains a triumph ————— 367
- Is elected Consul ————— ibid.
- Is spoiled of his best provinces by his two associates ————— 374
- Lands with a force in Sicily to oppose Sextus Pompey ————— 390
- Messana is surrendered to him by Plennius ————— 397
- Aims at securing Sicily for himself ibid.
- Surrenders himself to Octavius, and is banished to Circæum — 398
- His character ————— ibid.
- Lepidus*, M. Æmilius, obtains the consulship, by the interest of Pompey III. 174
- Esposes the Marian party on the death of Sylla ————— 177
- Speech of Philippus in the Senate, on his hostile measures — ibid.
- Is defeated by his colleague Catulus in Hetruria ————— 179
- Dies ————— ibid.
- Leptines*, assassinate Octavius the ambassador from Rome to Syria II. 460
- Is delivered up by Demetrius Soter 461
- Leucasia*, isle of, how it obtained its name — I. 3
- Levies of soldiers*, how raised among the early Romans I. 149, note. 169, note.
- Lex and Plebiscitum*, the difference between these terms ascertained — L. 235
- Lex Horatia*, inquiry into — I. 369, note.
- Trebonia*, Julia, this law passed during the war of Rome, with the Italian allies — III. 114
- Liberti*, or freedmen, the privilege of citizens granted to them by Servius Tullius ————— I. 97
- Libe*, Pompey's admiral, his conference with Julius Cæsar — IV. 110
- Destroys some of Cæsar's transport-vessels at

I N D E X.

- at Brundisium ——— 115
 Is driven off by M. Antony ibid.
 Retreats to Tyre after the battle of Pharfalia ——— 1, 1
Licinius Crassus, P. is sent with an army against Perſes King of Macedonia II. 415
 Perſes obtains an advantage over him 417
 Is attacked by Perſes, who is forced to retire ——— 419
Licinius Nerva, occasions a revolt of the ſlaves in Sicily ——— III. 88
 Is defeated by them ——— ibid.
Licinius Stolo, C. a Plebeian, is engaged by the ambition of his wife Fabia, to aſpire to the conſular dignity I. 477
 Is made a Tribune ——— 478
 Is choſen Conſul ——— 486
 Is choſen Conſul a ſecond time 490
 Is fined for poſſeſſing an illegal quantity of land ——— 495
Lictors, the firſt inſtitution of I. 25
Ligarius, his pardon procured of Julius Cæſar, by the eloquent interceſſion of Cicero ——— IV. 201
Ligurius, Sp. a centurion, his ſpeech to the Roman people on occaſion of the levies for the ſecond Macedonian war
 II. 406
Lilybæum, beſieged by the Romans II. 49
Linæ, legion of Samnites, account of the formation of ——— I. 86
Lipara, the Roman fleet ſeized there by
 Hannibal ——— II. 25
 Is defended by Hamilcar againſt the Con-ſul Calatinus ——— 29
Litavius, commander of the Æduan auxiliaries ſent to Julius Cæſar, ſpirits up his men to enmity againſt the Romans
 III. 668
 Plunders and murders the Roman citizens, who furniſhed his camp with provisions ——— 669
 His men ſubmit to Cæſar, and he flies to Gergovia ——— ibid.
Livia, the wife of Tiberius Nero, is taken from her huſband and married by Oc-tavius ——— IV. 387
Livius Andronicus, a Sicilian, reforms the Roman theatre II. 64, note c.
Livius Salinator, M. is condemned by the tribes after the ſecond Illyrian war
 II. 100
 Is again choſen Conſul ——— 248
 With the aſſiſtance of his colleague Nero, defeats and kills Afrubal — 250 Gives way to his reſentments when Cen-ſor ——— 277
Locri, cruel conduct of Pleminius there
 II. 267
 Deputies from, complain of Scipio to the Senate ——— 270
Longinus, Q. Caſſius, his oppreſſive government of Spain ——— IV. 210
 An attempt made on his life ibid.
 Leaves Spain and is loſt in a ſtorm at ſea 211 Lorica, the Roman coat of armour, de-ſcribed ——— I. 518, note.
Lucanians, are deceived by the Tarentines to engage in a war with the Romans
 I. 533
 Are reduced by Curius Dentatus 595
Luceria, the city of, taken by the Romans, the citizens ſlaughtered, and a colony planted in it ——— I. 553
Lucretia, wife of Collatinus, is violated by Sextus Tarquinius I. 112
 Kills herſelf ——— 113
Lucretius, the Philoſopher and Poet, the time of his birth, and his character from Eusebius III. 100, note.
Lucretius Ofella, is left to blockade Præ-neſte, by Sylla ——— III. 156
 The gates of Præneſte are opened to him on Sylla's ſeizing Rome 159
 Is killed by Sylla's order, on his ſtanding candidate for the conſulſhip 164 Lucrinus, the Julian port, formed by the junction of this lake with the lake
 Avernus ——— IV. 388
Lucullus, Licinius, his unprovoked hoſtilities againſt the Vaccæi II. 496
 Is repulſed from Palantia — 497
Lucullus, Licinius, is choſen Conſul III. 226
 His character ——— ibid. note.
 How he obtained the province of Cilicia
 227 Forces Mithridates to retire from Cyzicum ——— 228
 Diſtreſſes Mithridates by ſea 229
 Drives him out of Bithynia 230
 Is worſted in an engagement with Mithridates ——— 231
 Defeats part of his troops, and forces him to fly from his army 232 Subjects all Pontus, and takes Amifus
 by

I N D E X.

- by assault ——— 233
 Relieves Asia from the oppressions occasioned by the Roman tax-gatherers ——— 234
 Takes Sinope ——— 236
 Marches into Armenia ——— 237
 Defeats and kills Mithrobarzanes ——— 238
 Besieges Tigranocerta ——— ibid.
 Defeats the immense army of Tigranes ——— 240
 Defeats Tigranes and Mithridates jointly ——— 244
 Takes Nisibis ——— 245
 His army becomes discontented ——— 246
 His troops refuse to march against Tigranes ——— 248
 Is superseded by the arrival of Pompey ——— 250
 Obtains a triumph by Cicero's interest ——— 296
 Opposes the ratification of Pompey's Asiatic transactions ——— 410 Lucullus, M. Tereutius Varro, triumphs for his victories in Thrace III. 201, note a.
Ludi Saeculares, the nature of these games explained ——— II. 84
Lupercale, origin and nature of the festival of ——— 116, note.
Lustanians, a base massacre of, by the Prætor Galba ——— II. 498
 See Peristylus.
 Are subdued by the Consul Brutus ——— 513
Lustrum, the ceremony of, instituted by Servius Tullius ——— I. 96
 Is revived by the Consuls after the expulsion of Tarquin ——— 128
Latinius Catulus, C. defeats Hanno in a sea engagement ——— II. 62
 Concludes a peace with Amilcar ——— 63
Lycnædes, of Bithynia, is made high priest of Bellona, by Julius Cæsar IV. 163
Lycortas, Prætor of Achaia, his speech to the Roman Commissioners, in answer to the complaints of the Lacedæmonians ——— II. 376
 Reduces the Messenians ——— 386
Lyon, the city of, founded by L. Munacius Plancus ——— IV. 354, note.
Lysias, guardian to Antiochus Eupator, the infant King of Syria, is defeated by Judas Maccabæus ——— II. 459
 Is with his ward put to death by Demetrius ——— 461
- M
- Macedonia*. See Philip and Perseus.
 The government of, regulated by Æmilius ——— II. 445
 Is reduced to a Prætorian province 490, note.
Mælius, Sp. a Roman knight, artfully acquires popularity to attain regal power I. 392
 His conspiracy discovered, and himself killed ——— 394
Magius Cilo, P. kills his friend M. Marcellus, on his journey to Rome, after being pardoned by Julius Cæsar, and then kills himself ——— IV. 200
Magnesia, battle of, between Scipio Asiaticus and Antiochus ——— II. 362
Mago, a Carthaginian Admiral, is sent with a fleet to assist the Romans against King Pyrrhus, which is refused I. 619 Prevents Pyrrhus from passing into Sicily ibid.
Mago, brother to Hannibal, is sent from Italy to Carthage, with an account of his brother's successes II. 177
 Is shrewdly interrogated by Hanno 178
 His transactions in Spain ——— 253
 Is defeated and killed ——— 285
Mallolus, Publicius, how killed for murdering his mother III. 87, note.
Mamilius, magistrate of Tusculum, marches a body of forces to Rome to regain the capitol from Herdonius I. 308
Mamurra, a Roman knight, a satire on his luxury repeated to Julius Cæsar, while bathing at Cicero's villa IV. 225, note.
Marcus, C. Hostilius, besieges Numantia, but is forced to conclude a treaty with the Numantines ——— II. 512
 The Senate refuses to ratify it, and delivers him up to the Numantines 513
 They refuse to accept him ——— 515
Manilius, Tribune of the people, obtains the government of Asia, and the conduct of the Mithridatic war for Pompey III. 221
Manipulares, whence they derived their name I. 18
Marcius Rufus, prevents an accommodation between L. Antonius and Octavius IV. 380
 Is sacrificed to the reconciliation between M.

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|---|--------------|--|---------------------|
| M. Antony and Octavius | 384 | Put the garrison of Casilinum to the sword, contrary to terms of capitulation | 197 |
| Manlius , a Centurion, enrolls men in Hetruria, to assist in Cataline's conspiracy | III. 347 | Is sent into Sicily | 195 |
| Is joined by Cataline, after the discovery of his plot | 346 | Besieges Syracuse | 199 |
| Manlius, Gnaeus , Consul, and General against the Hetrurians, his tent destroyed by lightning | I. 266 | Takes it | 208 |
| Is killed in battle | 268 | His magnificent ovation | 215 |
| Manlius Fulso, Cn. his successes against the Gallo-Greeks | II. 367 | Is accused by the Sicilians | 217 |
| Is attacked on his way home, in a wood, by a body of Thracians | 369 | Is acquitted | 213 |
| Obtains a triumph after some opposition | ibid. | Is put into possession of Salapia | 219 |
| Manlius, M. repulses the attack of the Gauls on the capitol | I. 445 | Is defeated by Hannibal | 223 |
| Envies the fortune of Camillus | 455 | Engages him again, and gains the victory | 224 |
| His acts of popularity | 456 | Is killed by an ambush | 226 |
| Is cited before the Dictator Cornelius Cossus | 457 | Marcellus, M. Claudius , his negotiation with the Arvaci | II. 495 |
| Is imprisoned | 458 | Concludes a peace with them | 496 |
| Released | 459 | Marcellus, M. Claudius , Consul, his character by Dr. Middleton | IV. 5, note. |
| Enters into new cabals | 460 | His opposition to Julius Caesar | ibid. 6 |
| Is condemned and thrown from the capitol | 461 | His pardon obtained of Caesar | 198 |
| Remarks upon his death | 462 | Is killed by P. Magius Cilo | 200 |
| Manlius, P. Dictator, appoints C. Licinius, a Plebeian, Master of the Horse | I. 482 | Marcus, Caius , how he acquired the name of Coriolanus | I. 184 |
| Manlius, T. is created Dictator on occasion of the plague | I. 487 | See Coriolanus . | |
| Is accused of cruelty to his son | 488 | Marcus Philippus, Q. a Roman Senator, his interview with Perseus King of Macedonia | II. 410 |
| Is freed from this prosecution by the piety of his son | ibid. | His progress through the Grecian states | 413 |
| Manlius Torquatus, Titus , his extraordinary expedient to free his father from prosecution, for cruelty to him | I. 488 | Conducts an army into Macedonia | 423 |
| Is made a legionary Tribune | 489 | Effects nothing when he arrives there | 425 |
| Kills a gigantic Gaul, and acquires the surname Torquatus | 491 | Marcus, Q. is sent ambassador from Rome to the court of Macedon, and the other Grecian states | II. 380 |
| Is created Dictator | 497 | His report to the Senate on his return | 386 |
| Is created Dictator to preside at the election of Consuls | 502 | Marcus Rex, Q. is sent to oppose Cataline and Manlius | III. 352 |
| Is elected Consul for the first time | 503 | Marcus, Antonius or Antony. See Antonius . | |
| When Consul and General against the Latines, orders the death of his son, for breach of discipline | 517 | Marius, Caius , is elected Tribune of the people | III. 9 |
| Defeats the Latines | 521, 522 | Passes a law to secure the freedom of elections | 10 |
| Reduces Campania | ibid. | Is chosen Prætor | 11 |
| Marcellus, M. Claudius , kills Viridomarus, the Gaulish King, in single combat, and defeats his army | II. 98 | Attends the Consul Metellus into Numidia, as his lieutenant | 33 |
| Triumphs | 99 | Determines to stand candidate for the consulship | 39 |
| VOL. IV. | | Examination of the character given of him by Plutarch | 40, note. |
| | | Occasion of his enmity to Metellus | 44 |
| | | Is elected Consul, and appointed to command | |
| | | T t t | |

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|---|--------------|--|-----------------------|
| mand in Numidia | 47 | Marcius, M. a Proconsul created by Ser- | |
| His harangue to the people | 48 | torius in Spain, is sent to Mithridates | |
| His great levies for prosecuting the war | 52 | King of Pontus, and received by him | |
| Arrives in Numidia | 55 | in that character | III. 170 |
| Takes and destroys the city of Capsa | 58 | Is taken by the Consul Lucullus, and put | |
| Gains an important fortress on a rock | | to death, as a traitor | 230 |
| near the river Molecca | 59 | Marriages , the laws of, from the twelve | |
| Routes Jugurtha and Bocchas, who came | | tables | I. 342 |
| on him by surprise | 62 | The law prohibiting marriages between | |
| Defeats him again | 64 | Patricians and Plebeians repealed | 325 |
| Leads Sylla and Manlius to treat with | | Marjelles , the inhabitants of, shut their | |
| Bocchas King of Mauritania | ibid. | gates against Julius Cæsar | IV. 77 |
| Jugurtha is delivered up to Sylla, by | | L. Domitius arrives there, with succours | |
| Bocchas | 71 | to defend the town for Pompey | ibid. |
| Is chosen Consul a second time, contrary | | Domitius is defeated in a naval engage- | |
| to usual order | 75 | ment by D. Brutus | 91 |
| Appoints Sylla his lieutenant in the ex- | | A second defeat of their shipping | 92 |
| pedition against the Cimbri | 76 | Works constructed by Trebonius against | |
| Is continued in the consulship, a third | | the town | ibid. |
| time | 78 | Is reduced | 95 |
| His fourth election to the consulship | 80 | Masiniſſa , son of Gala King of Masylæ, | |
| Digs the Fossa Mariana | ibid. | defeats Syphax King of Masylæ | II. 201 |
| Defeats the Ambrones and Teutoni | 82 | His history | 274 |
| Is the fifth time appointed Consul | 83 | Joins Scipio | 276 |
| Joins the army of Cæsar, acting against | | Takes Syphax prisoner, and marries So- | |
| the Cimbri | 84 | phoniba | 281 |
| Gives the Cimbri a total defeat | 85 | Persuades her to poison herself | 284 |
| Is elected Consul, the sixth time | 90 | His flattering embassy to Rome | 444 |
| Procures Metellas to be banished | 92 | Submits his dispute with Carthage to the | |
| Besieges Glancia and Saturninus in the | | arbitration of Rome | 463 |
| capitol | 94 | Enters into a war with Carthage | 468 |
| His behaviour to Mithridates King of | | Reduces the Carthaginians to peace on | |
| Pontus | 97 | his own terms | 469 |
| Seizes the camp of Vettius, General of | | His death and character | 476 |
| the Italian allies | 112 | Maffius , grandson of Masiniſſa, is assassi- | |
| Refigns his command | 114 | nated by Jugurtha's order at Rome | III. 28 |
| Is banished by a decree of the Senate | | Matius , his letter to Cicero on the death of | |
| under the influence of Sylla | 126 | Julius Cæsar | IV. 263, note. |
| Is recalled from banishment by Cinna | 129 | Matronalia , the festival of, instituted | I. 43 |
| Account of his distresses during his exile | ibid. | Mauritania . See Juba , King of. | |
| Besieges Rome in conjunction with Cinna | 132 | Is converted into a Roman province by | |
| Enters the city on Cinna's treaty with the | | Julius Cæsar | IV. 189 |
| Senate, and slaughters numbers of the | | Media , its parts how distinguished | IV. 403, note. |
| citizens | 134 | Megalenses , institution of the games so | |
| Dies, after appointing himself Consul | | called | II. 268 |
| a seventh time | 135 | Melmoth , his observations on Cicero's flight | |
| Marcius, C. son of the former, is defeated | | to Sicily | III. 437 |
| in an engagement with Sylla | III. 155 | His account of Cicero's fluctuating con- | |
| His death at Paenulæ | 159 | duct between Pompey and Cæsar | IV. 61, note. |

Mem-

I N D E X.

- M. M. C.* Tribune of the people, accuses the Nobles of being gained over to the party of Jugurtha III. 23.
His harangue to the people on the occasion ——— 25
Questions Jugurtha before the people, but is prevented by the Tribune Babius ——— 27
Stands candidate for the Consulship, and is assassinated at the instigation of Glaukia his competitor, and Saturninus the Tribune ——— 94
Menas, Admiral of Sextus Pompey's fleet, proposes putting off to sea with Octavius and Antony, then on board Pompey's ship ——— IV. 385
Revolts to Octavius ——— 387
Returns again to Pompey ——— 391
Goes once more to Octavius ——— ibid.
Menenius, T. is defeated by the Hetrurians I. 2-1
Is fined by the people, and dies of grief ——— 272
Merula, L. Cornelius, is elected Consul by the Senate, on the deposition of Cinna III. 128
Resigns his office that Cinna might be reitored ——— 134
Kills himself on Cinna and Marius entering the city ——— 135
Messenians, break loose from the Achaian association ——— II. 380
Are reduced by Lycortas ——— 386
Messina, the Consul Appius Claudius, sent over thither, to rescue it from the Carthaginians ——— II. 16
Metella, wife of the Dictator Sylla, is divorced by him, on her falling sick, during his public entertainment of the people ——— III. 174, note.
Metellus, Cæ.ilius, Consul, defeats Asdrubal at Lilybæum ——— II. 43
Metellus, Cæ.ilius, Pontifex Maximus, saves the Palladium during a great fire ——— II. 65
Metellus Pius, goes over to the party of Sylla, on his return from Asia ——— III. 153
Defeats an army of the Marian party ——— 156
His gratitude to the Tribune Calidius, who befriended his father 173, note.
His ill success against Sertorius in Spain ——— 182
Pompey arrives to his assistance ——— 185
Defeats Hirtuleius, Sertorius's Quæstor, and kills him ——— 186
Joins Pompey, and defeats Sertorius ——— 188
They are forced by continual harrassing to retire ——— 189
His ridiculous vanity ——— 191
Metellus, Q. Cæ.ilius, defeats Andriacus, the Macedonian pretender ——— II. 477
Overcomes the Achæans ——— 488
Acquires the surname of Macedonicus ——— 491
Instance of his humanity at the siege of Nertobriga ——— 504
His orations on matrimony and manners, when Cenfor ——— 543
His life attempted by a Tribune ——— 544
Metellus Q. Cæ.ilius, Consul, is sent against Jugurtha, and reforms the discipline of the army in Numidia III. 53
Gains an advantage over Jugurtha ——— 55
Ravages the country ——— 57
Occasion of the enmity between him and his lieutenant Caius Marius ——— 44
Defeats Jugurtha ——— 52
Reduces the city Thala ——— 53
Is superseded by the arrival of Marius as Consul ——— 55
Stands for the consulship, but is set aside by the interest of Marius ——— 91
Is insnared by Marius, and condemned to banishment ——— 92
Is recalled to Rome ——— 95
Metellus Creticus, Q. Cæ.ilius, is elected Consul ——— III. 212
His successes against the Cilician pirates ——— 216
Obtains a triumph after long solicitation ——— 384
Metius, Curtius, a Sabine, his courage and address in the battle between Titus Tatius and Romulus ——— I. 38
Meton, citizen of Tarentum, his device to engage the Tarentines to sober counsels ——— I. 601
Mexentius, King of the Tyrrhenians, makes war on Æneas, and occasions his death ——— I. 12
Is reduced to solicit peace of Ascanius ——— 13
Micipsa, King of Numidia, his apprehensions of the ambition of Jugurtha ——— III. 17
Leaves Jugurtha joint heir with his sons ——— 19

I N D E X.

- Mitro*, a chief of the Chalcidians, his reply to the offers of Antiochus II. 349
- Middleton, Dr.* his account of the first appointment of the Roman Senate I. 27, note p.
- His comparison between the conduct of Marius and Sylla, in the Italian war III. 118, note z.
- His remarks on the Mithridatic war 149, note.
- His representation of the corrupt state of the Roman Courts of Judicature at the time of Cicero's prosecution of Verres 205
- Strictures on his character of Cicero and Julius Caesar — 308, note.
- His account of Cicero's conduct, in respect to Cataline, examined — 321
- His account of the alteration of the Roman government by Sylla 329
- His character of the Consul M. Claudius Marcellus IV. 5, note b.
- His character of the Consul Servius Sulpicius — ibid. note i.
- His history of M. Antony's life, previous to the commencement of the civil wars — 15, note z.
- His remarks on Caesar's passage over the Rubicon — 46, 50
- His character of Cato of Utica 185
- His account of Caesar's ambition after the regal title — 242, note.
- Justifies Cicero from the accusation of being privy to Caesar's death 257, note.
- His character of the Consuls Hirtius and Panfa — 304, note.
- Milo*, is left in Tarentum, by King Pyrrhus, on his passage to Sicily I. 621
- Pyrrhus's present to him on leaving Italy 625
- Surrenders the city to the Romans 628
- Milo*, Tribune of the people, his contests with Clodius — III. 456
- Is violently attacked by Clodius's party, which he routs — 469
- Is accused before the people by Clodius, now Edile, and is defended by Pompey, Crassus, and Cicero 481
- Is opposed by Clodius, in his pretensions to the praetorship — 540
- Murders Clodius — 541
- Is condemned to banishment for this murder — 545
- Returns to Italy at the invitation of Cornilius, and is killed in besieging Cosa IV. 114
- Minio*, favourite of Antiochus the Great, his conference with the Roman ambassadors II. 344
- Minucius*, Consul, his speech to the People to justify the Patricians respecting the quarrel between Coriolanus and the Tribunes — I. 194
- His speech to the People at the trial of Coriolanus — 207
- His remonstrance to Coriolanus, when besieging Rome as General of the Volsci — 218
- Minucius*, Master of the Horse to the Pro-Dictator Fabius, engages Hannibal, contrary to orders — II. 153
- Is associated with Fabius — 154
- Is rescued by Fabius from a defeat 155
- Makes his submission to Fabius ibid.
- Is killed at the battle of Cannæ 169
- Minucius*, L. Consul, and General against the Æqui, his camp invested by the General Cluilius — I. 316
- Is relieved by the Dictator Cincinnatus, and directed of the consulship 318
- Minucius*, L. is appointed Superintendent of provisions, during the famine at Rome — I. 392
- Discloses the conspiracy of Sp. Mælius to the Senate — 393
- His vigilance rewarded — 394
- Misenus*, the port of, how it obtained its name — I. 4
- Mitbridates*, a Parthian, his kind hints to M. Antony, during his retreat from Parthia — IV. 407, 408
- Mitbridates*, of Pergamus, raises an army to assist Julius Caesar at Alexandria, IV. 159
- Defeats the troops sent by Ptolemy to oppose him — ibid.
- Is appointed by Caesar to succeed Pharnaces in the Bosphorus — 166
- Mitbridates Eupator*, King of Pontus, his character and early history III. 101
- His barbarous usurpation of Cappadocia 103
- Cappadocia restored to Ariobarzanes by Sylla — 104
- Dethrones Ariobarzanes again 120
- Defeats Nicomedes King of Bithynia 122
- His rapid successes in Asia — 123.
- Orders

I N D E X.

- Orders a massacre of the Italians in Asia 136
His armies under Archelaus and Dorylas routed by Sylla — 142. 144
Concludes a peace with Sylla — 145
His conference with Sylla — 147
Ratifies the peace — 149
Sends an embassy to Sertorius in Spain 189
Concludes a treaty with him — 190
Puts his son to death — 224
His battle with Muzena — 225
Attacks Bithynia — 226
Gains an advantage over the Consul Cotta — 227
Besieges Cyzicum — 228
Is forced to retire by the Consul Lucullus — 229
Is driven out of Bithynia — 230
Gains an advantage over Lucullus 231
Steals away from his army — 232
His kingdom of Pontus submits to Lucullus — 233
The unhappy fates of his wives and sisters — ibid. note.
Defeats Triareus — 247
Is deserted by Tigranes — 251
Is defeated by Pompey — 252
His private memoirs seized by Pompey 259
His subjects revolt against him 263
Is deposed by his son Pharnaces 264
Puts an end to his life — 265
His character — 266
His children led in Pompey's triumph 393. note.
Mithrobates, General to Tigranes, King of Armenia, is defeated and killed by Lucullus — — III. 238
Money, the etymology of the term I. 504 note.
Silver, first coined at Rome — 629
Mons Sacer, the two consular armies desert their Generals, and retire to I. 171
The first Tribunes of the People elected there — — 182
An altar erected there to Jupiter the Terrible — — ibid.
Montesquieu, his account of Parthia, and the Parthian manner of making war IV. 402, note.
Months, Roman, derivation of their names I. 63. note b.
Mummius, L. Consul, defeats the Achæans under Diaeus — — II. 489
Destroys the city of Corinth ibid.
Destroys the city of Thebes — 490
And Chalcis — — ibid.
Acquires the surname of Achaicus 491
Municipia, the difference between, and colonies or præfectures I. 551. note.
Muræna, his successes against the Cilician pirates — — III. 215
Commences hostilities against Mithridates King of Pontus — — 224
His battle with Mithridates. 225
Is prosecuted by Cato, and defended by Cicero — — 349 Mutina, is besieged by M. Antony IV. 290. 300.
Antony is defeated before the town by the Consuls Hirtius and Pansa 304.

N.

Nabis, Tyrant of Lacedæmon, his cruel treatment of Argos — II. 320
Is reduced to peace by Flaminious 336
Besieges Gythium — — 342
Is assassinated — — 347
Nævius, a Tribune, accuses the Scipios of defrauding the public — II. 370
Names, a general explanation of those borne by the Romans — I. 74. note a.
Naples, the first building of — I. 529.
Naravasus, a Numidian Officer, his generous friendship to Amilcar II. 75
Nasidius, L. is sent by Pompey with a fleet to the relief of Marseilles IV. 91
Retires from the Massilian fleet during the engagement with Brutus 92
Navius, the Augur, story of him and Tarquinus Priscus — — I. 81
Disappears unaccountably. — — 84
Neptune, his true history inquired into I. 7. note m.
Nero Claudius, joins his colleague Livius Salinator, and defeats the Carthaginian General Asdrubal — II. 250
Gives way to his resentments when Censor — — 277
His fleet intended for Africa dispersed by a storm. — — 297
Nervii, a character of the nation of Gauls so called — — III. 610
Are almost extinguished by Julius Cæsar 611
Nicias, Physician to Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, proposes to the Roman Generals — — 10.

I N D E X.

- | | |
|---|--|
| to poison his master — I. 620 A seat covered with his skin — 625 Nicomachus, the Epirot General, is defeated by the Consul Rafinus I. 622 Nicomachus, King of Bithynia, is dethroned by his brother Socrates, assisted by Mithridates King of Pontus III. 120 Is restored by Roman interposition ibid. Attacks Mithridates — 121 Is defeated by Mithridates 122 Nicomacheis, the city of, built by Pompey on the spot where he defeated Mithridates III. 253 Nicomacheis, another city of that name, founded by Octavius, near Alexandria, on the spot where he defeated Antony IV. 445 Norbanus, Tribune of the people, is tried for his conduct at the trial of Servilius Cæpio, and acquitted III. 99 Norbanus, C. Junius, Consul, is defeated by Sylla at his return from Asia III. 154 Flies to Rhodes, and kills himself, to avoid being given up to Sylla 157, 171, note. Nobility, the distinctions of, among the Roman people III. 2, note b. Noricum, the town of, surrendered to Julius Cæsar — III. 609 Is again taken by him — 658 The Roman garrison there put to the sword by the Ædui — 675 Numa Pompilius, his family and character I. 50 Is chosen King of Rome — 51 His speech to the senatorian deputies ibid. Is formally elected — 52 His civil and religious regulations 53 Forms the priesthood into distinct classes 54 Builds a temple to Vesta, and establishes the worship of her — 55 Institutes the worship of Janus 60 Introduces Termini, for the ascertaining the extent of landed property 61 Applies the soldiery to agriculture 62 Forms the tradesmen into companies 63 Reforms the calendar — ibid. Dies — 64 Namantia, siege of — II. 509 Popilius is driven from before it 512 A treaty concluded with the Consul Mancinus — ibid. | Mancinus is delivered up to them by his successor, but is refused 515 Is invested by Scipio — 517 The garrison destroy themselves, and the town razed by the Romans 519 Narrative war, a history of — II. 494 Numicus, general of the Latines, is defeated by Manlius Torquatus I. 521, 522 Numidia. See Mysinissa, Jugurtha, Metellus, and Marius. Numitor, King of Alba, is deposed by his brother Amulius — I. 15 His daughter Rhea Sylvia, brought to bed of Romulus and Remus 16 Discovers his grand-children 17 Is restored by them — 18 Numitorius, uncle to Virginia, defends her cause before Appius Claudius the Decemvir — I. 358 Brings the army sent against the Æqui back to Rome — 366 Is chosen Tribune — 368 |
|---|--|
-
- O
- | | |
|--|--|
| Osavia, half sister to Octavius, is married to M. Antony — IV. 383 Procures a reconciliation between them 389 Goes to visit Antony, who orders her not to come to him — 417 Is divorced by Antony — 421 Octavius, afterward the Emperor Augustus, reflections on the time of his birth III. 367, note. Commands a fleet under Pompey IV. 106 Besieges Salona — 109 Is forced to retire — 110 Harrasses the coast of Greece after Pompey's defeat — 165 Is defeated by Vatinus — 166 Comes to Italy on the death of Julius Cæsar — 273 Asserts his claims under Cæsar's will at Rome — 274 Attempts to get Antony murdered 282 Brings an armed force to Rome in Antony's absence — 284 Seizes Antony's camp, after his defeat by Hirtius and Pansa — 304 Succeeds to the command of the joint army on the deaths of both the Consuls | |
|--|--|

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|---|-------------------|---|------------------------|
| fuls | 305 | Declares war against Cleopatra | 425 |
| An ovation decreed him by the Senate | 307 | Battle of Actium | 429 |
| His motives for not pushing his successes farther against Antony | 309 | Antony's army surrenders to him | 430 |
| Stands for the consulship | 337 | His popular measures on this victory | 431 |
| Is chosen Consul | 351 | His military character defended | 432 note. |
| Enters into a treaty with Antony and Lepidus | 355 | Follows Antony into Asia | 433 |
| The second triumvirate formed by them | 356 | Takes Cleopatra | 439 |
| His share in the proscriptions that followed | 365 | Enters Alexandria | ibid. |
| The first battle of Philippi | 370 | His interview with Cleopatra | 440 |
| The second battle of Philippi | 372 | Reduces Egypt to a Roman province | 442 |
| His cruelty after this battle | 373 | Views the body of Alexander the Great | 443 |
| After a new settlement of affairs, returns to Rome | 374 | Triumphs three times | 444 |
| His difficulties in satisfying the demands of his insolent soldiers | 377 | Shuts the temple of Janus | ibid. |
| Fulvia, Antony's wife, endeavours to make a breach between her husband and him | 378 | The sovereign power vested in him by the Senate | 445 |
| Prepares for war against the Antonian party | 380 | Assumes the title of Augustus | 447 |
| L. Antony surrenders himself | 381 | Octavius Cæcina , Tribune of the people, opposes Gracchus's enforcement of the Licinian law, for the distribution of lands | II. 523 |
| His cruelty at Perusia | 382, note. | Gracchus deposes him | 525 |
| Marries Scribonia | 383 | Octavius , Cn. ambassador into Syria, is assassinated | II. 460 |
| An accommodation entered into with Sextus Pompey | 384 | Octavius , Cn. Consul, routs his colleague Cinna, in an engagement in the Forum | III. 127 |
| Renews the war with Pompey | 387 | Defends Rome against Marius and Cinna | 133 |
| Marries Livia | ibid. | Is killed on his tribunal by Marius's party | 134 |
| A difference between him and Antony prevented by Octavia | 389 | Ododurus , the twelfth legion under Sergius Galba, unexpectedly attacked there | III. 614 |
| Escapes from his fleet which is destroyed by Sextus Pompey | IV. 394 | The Gauls defeated and the city burnt | 615 |
| Is challenged by Pompey to a naval fight and defeats him | 396 | Ogulnius , two brothers, Tribunes of this name, procure a law to qualify Plebeians for the pontificate and augurate | I. 568 |
| His quarrel with Lepidus | 397 | Olthacus , Prince of the Dandarians, is disappointed in his scheme to assassinate the Consul Lucullus | III. 231 |
| Seduces his army from him | ibid. | Onias , a pious Jew, is murdered by his countrymen of the party of Hyrcanus | III. 258, note. |
| Banishes Lepidus to Circeum | 398 | Opimia , a vestal, is buried alive for incontinence | I. 263 |
| Suppresses a mutiny in his troops | 399 | Opimius , L. the enemy of Caius Gracchus, is chosen Consul | II. 557 |
| Is received at Rome with distinguished honours | 400 | Is vested with dictatorial power | 558 |
| Celebrates games on the death of Sextus Pompey | 415 | Erects a temple to Concord, on the destruction of Gracchus and the popular party | |
| His public works at Rome | 419 | | |
| Justifies his conduct in the Senate against the accusations of the Consul Sossius | 420 | | |
| Arraigns the conduct of Antony in the Senate | 421 | | |
| Antony's recrimination | 422 | | |
| Gets possession of Antony's will, and publishes it | 423 | | |

I N D E X.

Part ——— III. 3
 Is sent to compromise the dispute between Jugurtha and Adherbal in Numidia 21
 Is condemned for his conduct with regard to Jugurtha ——— 32
Oppius Statorius, left with two legions in charge of M. Antony's engines of war, is with his men cut to pieces by Phraates King of Parthia IV. 403
Orgetorix, a Helvetian Noble, leads out his countrymen to make a conquest of Celtic Gaul ——— III. 586
 His death ——— 587
Orsander, a Cretan, defrauds King Perseus of his treasure ——— II. 439
Ordes, King of Parthia, sends ambassadors to Crassus to know his reasons for making war on him III. 529
 Puts his General Surena, who had defeated Crassus, to death, through envy 538, note.
Oscilius, T. his nomination to the consulate opposed by the President of the Comitia, Fabius Cunctator II. 190
 Is sent with a legion to Sicily 191
Ovation, the first instance of this imperfect kind of triumph ——— I. 141 Described ——— ibid. note a.
Oxinta, son of Jugurtha, is invested with the title of King, by the Italian allies at war with Rome III. 113

P

Pacorus, son of the King of Parthia, in conjunction with Labienus, subdues Syria, and sacks Jerusalem IV. 383
 Is defeated and killed by Ventidius 386
Pacuvius Calpurnius, saves the Senate of Capua from being massacred by the people ——— II. 175
 Dissuades his son Perolla from assassinating Hannibal ——— 177
Paganalia, the festival of, instituted by Servius Tullius ——— I. 90
Painting, the art of, first practised at Rome I. 566
Palaeopolis, the inhabitants of commit hostilities against the Romans I. 529
 Is besieged by Publius ——— 530
 Is subjected by fraud to the Samnites 531

Surrenders to Publius ——— 532
Palatinus, origin of the name of that hill I. 6
 This hill chosen by Romulus to build his new city on ——— 20 See Rome.
Palinurus, cape, in Italy, how it obtained its name ——— I. 3
Palladium, origin of I. 12, note.
Pallas, story of, from Dionysius Hal. I. 12, note.
Paludamentum, the habit of the Roman Generals described I. 509, note.
Pan, the origin of his worship I. 6.
Pannorum, is taken by the Romans II. 42
Pansa, C. Vibius, marches an army to Gaul to assist Hirtius and Octavius against M. Antony ——— IV. 297
 Is surprized and worsted by Antony on his journey ——— 302
 Defeats Antony and dies of his wounds 304
 His character by Dr. Middleton ibid. note.
Pantheon, a description of that temple I. 135, note.
Papias, one of Sextus Pompey's Admirals, is defeated by Agrippa IV. 392
Papirius, a Senator, makes a collection of the Roman laws, in the reign of Tarquin the Proud ——— I. 109
Papirius Cursor, L. is chosen Dictator in the war against the Samnites I. 534
 His General of the horse disobeys orders and escapes to Rome ——— 535
 Asserts his authority, but pardons him 537
 Regains the affection of his army, and reduces the Samnites ——— 538
 Defeats Pontius, the Samnite General, and forces his army to pass under the yoke ——— 549
 Takes Satricum ——— 550
 His character ——— ibid.
 Is nominated Dictator, and defeats the Samnites ——— 560
Papirius Cursor, L. son of the former, defeats the Samnites by stratagem I. 587
 Dedicates the temple of Quirinus, and fixes up a sun-dial on it 589
Papirius, Maxius, is killed by the Gauls on their entering Rome I. 443
Papirius Mase, his expedient on being denied

I N D E X:

- denied a triumph on reducing Sardinia II. 83
- Parricide*, why no law against, among the early Romans — I. 30
- Parthia*, the murder of Phraates King of, by his sons, and the confusions occasioned by that murder III. 498, note. See Crassus, Pacrus, Phraates, Ventidius, &c.
- Peschal*, M. his reflection on the advice of Cyneas to king Pyrrhus I. 603, note.
- Paterculus*, his severe censure against Vatinus — IV. 292, note. His virulent character of Plancus 423, note.
- Patricians*, origin of that distinction or class of Roman citizens — I. 26
- A Senate chosen out of — 27
- See Senate.
- Patrons and Clients*, first distinction of, and the nature of their relation to each other — I. 26
- Pedius*, Q. is elected Consul with Octavius IV. 351
- Publishes a law to bring the conspirators against Julius Cæsar to punishment 354
- Dies with grief at the cruel proscriptions of the second triumvirate 357
- Pelopidas*, is sent by Mithridates King of Pontus to treat with the Roman Commissioners in Asia — III. 121
- People*, the common rights of, according to the twelve tables — I. 339
- Pergamus*, the kingdom of, by whom founded — II. 342, note. See Eumenes and Attalus.
- Is reduced to the form of a Roman province — 545
- Perolla*. See Pacuvius.
- Perperna*, is driven out of Sicily, which he defended for Sylla, by Pompey III. 162
- Leads the remains of Lepidus's vanquished army into Spain — 179
- Is forced by his soldiers to join Sertorius 184
- Conspires against Sertorius 192
- Gets Sertorius assassinated, and himself appointed his successor in command 193
- Is defeated and taken prisoner by Pompey 199
- Is put to death by Pompey 200
- Perperna*, M. Consul, defeats Aristonicus, King of Pergamus, and takes him prisoner Vol. IV.
- soner — II. 541
- Perseus*, eldest son of Philip King of Macedonia, accuses his brother Demetrius of attempting his life — II. 388
- Procures his brother's death by treachery 389
- Succeeds his father as King of Macedonia 393
- Visits the oracle at Delphos 394
- His friendship refused by the Achæans 395
- Is accused by Eumenes King of Pergamus, before the Roman Senate 398
- Employs assassins to murder Eumenes 401
- War declared against him by Rome 405
- Applies to the Senate for peace 408
- His interview with Marcius, a Roman Senator — 410
- Again solicits peace in vain 413
- Gains an advantage over the Consul Licinius — 416
- Makes farther overtures of peace 418
- Suffers a defeat — 419
- Repulses the Consul Hostilius 420
- Instances of extravagant unaccountable conduct in him — 424
- Possesses and fortifies Dium 425
- Negotiates with Eumenes — 428
- Outwits Geatius, king of Illyricum 429
- His ridiculous and base treatment of his Gaulish auxiliaries — 431
- Æmilius enters Macedonia 433
- Is defeated at Pydna — 435
- Retires to Samothrace — 437
- Is defrauded of his treasure 439
- Surrenders himself — 440
- Is led in triumph by Æmilius 451
- His death — 452
- Perusia*, is surrendered up to Octavius by L. Antony, and is burnt by one of the citizens — IV. 381
- Phalaris*, military rewards among the Romans described I. 323, note.
- Phanagoria*, revolts against Mithridates, King of Pontus — III. 1263
- The inhabitants declared free by Pompey 270
- Pharnaces*, son of Mithridates King of Pontus, deposes his father III. 264
- Submits himself to the Roman General Pompey — 270
- Is made King of the Bosphorus ibid.
- His conquests, — IV. 162
- Defeats Domitius Calvinus ibid.
- Is totally routed by Julius Cæsar 164
- U u u
- 15

I N D E X.

- Is defeated and killed by Asander, who usurped his kingdom 165
His kingdom bestowed on Mithridates
by Cæsar ——— 166
Pharsalia, is taken from Demetrius by the Romans ——— II. 100
Pharsalia, battle of, between Julius Cæsar and Pompey ——— IV. 135
Philip, King of Macedon, concludes a treaty with Hannibal against the Romans ——— II. 183
Is defeated by the Romans at Oricum 193
A confederacy of Grecian states formed against him ——— 213
Gives the Ætolians two defeats 227
Makes peace with them on his own terms
269 Retrospects of his situation and views
301
The Romans resolve on a war with him
303 Begins hostilities against the Grecian states ——— 305
Besieges Athens ——— 307
Is worsted by the Romans 311
Is defeated by the consul Flamininus 314
His second conference with Flamininus
317
Is defeated by him at Cynocéphalæ 321
Concludes a peace with Rome 323
Declares for the Romans against Antiochus 352 Presents a golden crown to Rome, and receives his son Demetrius back 357 Conducts the Scipios to the Hellespont 359
Prepares for another war with Rome 372
His complaints to the Roman Commissioners ——— 373
His cruel treatment of the Maronites
375
His cruel treatment of his own subjects 387
Is perplexed by the disagreement of his sons ——— 388
Orders Demetrius to be put to death 389
His death ——— 391
See Perfes.
Philippi, the first battle of IV. 370
The second battle of ——— 372
See Brutus and Cæsar.
Philippics, how Cicero's celebrated orations obtained that name IV. 293, note a.
Philippus, L. Martius, Consul, his invectives against the Senate III. 107
His harangue to the Senate on the hostile measures of the Consul Le, idus 177 Philomenus, betrays the city of Tarentum into the hands of Hannibal II. 204 Philometor, King of Egypt, his disputes with his brother Ptolemy Physcon
II. 466
Philopæmon, commands the Achæans in their war with the Lacedæmonians
II. 346
Persuades them to resume their liberty 347
Forces the Lacedæmonians to renounce the laws of Lycurgus ——— 368
Is put to death by the Messenians 370 Philosophers and Rhetoricians, banished from Rome ——— II. 461
Phraates, King of Parthia, butchers all his own family ——— IV. 411
In conjunction with Artabazes, King of Media, cuts Antony's lieutenant Op-pius with two legions to pieces 403
By treaty promises Antony an unmolested retreat out of Parthia ——— 405
Harasses him continually on his march 406, 407
Picentes, are reduced by the Consul Sem-pronius Sophus ——— I. 630
Pilum, a missive Roman weapon, described
I 518, note.
Pinaria, a prostitute Vestal, buried alive
I. 84
Pindemissum, a town of refuge for deserters and banditti, is besieged and taken by Cicero ——— III. 565
Pirates, Cilician, a history of III. 214
Are reduced by Pompey ——— III. 220
Piso, Calpurnius, Consul, opposes Pom-pey's levies for the war against the Ci-lician pirates ——— III. 219
Marries his daughter Calpurnia to Julius
Cæsar ——— 416
Is elected Consul ——— 428
His character ——— 429, note.
His inglorious conduct in Macedonia 501
Is chosen Censor ——— 585
Piso, Cn. engages in Cataline's conspiracy
III. 312
Is murdered in his way to Spain 313
Plague, a great one in Africa, occasioned by locusts II. 551, note.
Plautus, L. Mæcius, his letter from the farther Gaul to the Senate and Magistrates of Rome IV. 312, note.
Letters between him and Cicero 314,
note, 323, note.
A re-

I N D E X.

- A review of his conduct — 323
 Joins his forces with Brutus after the defection of Lepidus — 333
 Deserts Brutus and joins Antony and Lepidus — 352
 His letter to Cicero on this occasion ibid.
note.
 Obtains a triumph — 367
 Is elected Consul — ibid.
 Joins the Antonian party against Octavius 381
 Flies to Greece — 382
 Deserts Antony for his voluptuous inattention to business — 423
 Paterculus's severe character of him 423,
note.
 Proposes conferring on Octavius the title of Augustus — 447
Paulus Hyppicus, C. Praetor of further Spain, is twice defeated by Viriatus, and is banished for his ill success II.
 500 Plebeians, when first distinguished from the order of Patricians — I. 26
 Their power when assembled in curia
 28 Insurrection of — 162
 Refuse to be enrolled, against the Vol-scians — 163
 Are quitted by Manius Valerius, Dictator
ibid.
 Desert the Consuls, and retire to the Mons Sacrus — 171
 Tribunes of the people created 182
 See Tribunes.
Plebisquitum and Lex, the difference between these words ascertained I. 235 Plebs and Populus, the distinction between the acceptation of these terms I. ibid.
Pleminius, Pro-praetor of Locri, is punished for his rapacity and severity II. 267
 Is sent to Rome in irons — 272
Plempus, Sextus Pompey's lieutenant, surrenders Mesiana to Lepidus IV. 397
Pletius, C. chief creditor to the late Consul T. Veturius, is condemned to death for base treatment of the son I. 596
Plutarch, his unfair character of Caius Marius — III. 40, note.
 Remarks on his account of the commencement of the rivalry between Marius and Sylla 76
 His circumstantial account of the death of Cato, at Utica — IV. 180
Plutonium, a Latine city, its inhabitants removed to Rome — I. 74
 Is re-peopled, but destroyed by Ancus
 Marcius — 75
Pellio, Asinius, takes possession of Sicily for Julius Caesar IV. 72, note.
 His letters to Cicero, relating to the war with M. Antony 308 note.
 Joins Antony and Lepidus with two legions — 352
 His reasons for not taking part with Oc-tavius against Antony — 421
Polybius, his account of an early treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians
 I. 502, note.
 His account of a second treaty 503, note.
 His account of the Roman levies against the Gauls — II. 92
 His address in saving the Achæans from furnishing a supply of men to Appius
 Claudius — 427
 Is with numbers of his countrymen betrayed into exile in Italy 448 Assists Demetrius in escaping from Rome to Syria — 461
 His intimacy with Scipio Æmilianus
 478, note.
 The veracity of his account of the dispute between the Achæans and La-cedæmonians questioned 487, note.
 Defends the memory of Philopæmon
 490
 Is commissioned to settle affairs in Greece
 491 Polyxenidas, the Syrian Admiral, defeated
 by the Romans — II. 361
Pompeius, Consul of the Italian allies, defeats and kills the Roman general Q.
 Cæpio by stratagem III. 113
 Is defeated by Mamercus, and killed in an engagement with Metellus Pius 119 Pompeius, wife of Julius Caesar, is divorced for her intimacy with Clodius III.
 386 Pompeius, Cn. his army routed by the revolted Italian allies — III. 113 Takes the city of Asculum, and obtains a triumph — 118
 Is, when Consul, degraded by the Tribune Sulpicius — 125
 Is killed by the soldiers — 127
Pompeius, Q. obtains the consulship by artifice — II. 505
 Takes the town of Lanci — 506
 U u u z Makes

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|--|-------------------|--|-------------------|
| Makes a distinguished peace with the Numantines | 509 | Regulates the affairs of Syria | 259 |
| afterwards afterwards surnamed the Great, joins Sylla, after his return from Asia, | III. 153 | Gives audience to Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, who plead their cause before him | 261 |
| Routs a detachment sent by the Consul Carbo to the relief of Præneste | 156 | Receives the submission of Pharnaces, King of Pontus, on the death of Mithridates | 264 |
| Defeats Carbo's army | 157 | Confines Aristobulus, and besieges Jerusalem | 267 |
| Takes possession of Sicily for Sylla | 162 | Takes the temple of Jerusalem by storm | 268 |
| Reduces Domitius Ahenobarbus General of the Marian party, and defeats and kills Hiartas, a Numidian King | 171 | Restores Hyrcanus | 269 |
| Triumphs | 172 | Finishes the Mithridatic war | 270 |
| Procures the consulship for Lepidus | 174 | Distinguished honours decreed to him at Rome | 271 |
| Reduces Cisalpine Gaul to obedience, and kills Marcus Brutus | 178 | Returns to Italy | 383 |
| Is sent Pro-consul into Spain, to oppose Sertorius | 179 | Courts an alliance with Cato, which Cato rejects | 391 |
| Is taught by Sertorius to correct his opinion of him | 185 | Triumphs | 392 |
| Is joined by Metellus, and defeats Sertorius | 188 | The first triumvirate formed by him, Julius Cæsar, and Crassus | 400 |
| Is forced by continual harassing to part from Metellus and leave the country to Sertorius | 189 | Procures, by Cæsar's assistance, a ratification of all his transactions in Asia | 410 |
| Defeats and takes Perperna prisoner | 199 | Obtains Cæsar's daughter Julia to wife | 415 |
| Puts Perperna to death | 200 | Withdraws his countenance from Cicero | 433 |
| Triumphs | ibid. | His quarrel with Clodius | 443 |
| Is elected Consul with Crassus | 202 | Interests himself in the recall of Cicero | 458 |
| A review of his former life, and his character | 203. note. | Is vested with a power to supply the city with corn | 463 |
| Is reconciled to Crassus with whom he had differed | 211 | Defends Milo against the prosecution of Clodius | 481 |
| Is recommended by Gabinus to conduct the war against the Cilician pirates | 216 | Jealousy between him and Crassus | 482 |
| Obtains the command after much contest | 219 | Is again elected Consul with Crassus | 490 |
| Reduces the pirates | 220 | His theatre described | 500. note. |
| His generous conduct towards Metellus | ibid. | His wife Julia, daughter of Cæsar, dies | 525 |
| Obtains the government of Asia | 223 | Is created Consul without a colleague, on the confusions occasioned by the murder of Clodius | 542 |
| Takes the command of Lucullus's troops | 250 | New laws proposed by him | ibid. |
| Defeats Mithridates | 252 | Marries the daughter of Scipio, and rescues him from prosecution for bribery | 547 |
| Founds the city Nicopolis | 253 | Associates Scipio in the consulship with him | ibid. |
| Prince Tigranes takes refuge in his camp | ibid. | Engrosses the whole executive power of government during Cæsar's absence in Gaul | IV. 1 |
| Tigranes the father surrenders himself up to him | 254 | Procures himself to be appointed sole Consul | 2 |
| Restores Tigranes on terms | 255 | | Be- |
| His farther successes in Asia | 256 | | |
| Deposes Antiochus Asiaticus, the last of the Seleucidae | 257 | | |

I N D E X.

- Becomes jealous of Cæsar's successes in Gaul ——— 4
 Recalls one of Cæsar's legions 11
 Refuses an accommodation with Cæsar 17
 Procures a decree of the Senate for Cæsar to disband his army 20
 Cicero's account of the negociation between him and Cæsar for an accommodation ——— 26, note.
 His letters to the Pro-consul L. Domitius 31, 35
 His letter to the Consuls Marcellus and Lentulus ——— 35
 Flies before Cæsar ——— 40
 His letter to Cicero, with Cicero's answer ——— 41, note.
 Declines a treaty offered by Cæsar 43
 Is invested by Cæsar in Brundisium 44
 Embarks with his troops, and resigns Italy to Cæsar ——— 45
 Is joined by Cicero ——— 68
 His lieutenant Afranius reduced in Spain by Cæsar ——— 87
 Varro submits to Cæsar ——— 89
 His vast preparations in Greece to oppose Cæsar ——— 105
 His army surrounded with lines of circumvallation by Cæsar ——— 119
 Forces Cæsar's lines ——— 124
 Is joined by Scipio ——— 132
 The order of battle at Pharsalia 135
 Is defeated ——— 137
 His rout after the battle 138, 142
 Is killed on his landing in Egypt 144
 His character by Cicero and Dr. Middleton ——— 145, note.
Pompey, Cn. the younger, attempts to kill Cicero, at a council, after his father's defeat at Pharsalia IV. 140
 Collects a fleet to oppose Cæsar 176
 Drives Trebonius out of Boetia 211
 Is defeated by Cæsar ——— 213
 Is destroyed in his flight by Didius, Cæsar's Admiral ——— 215
Pompey Sextus, brings the remainder of Scipio's fleet to Spain IV. 211
 Shuts himself up in Corduba 212
 Escapes out of the city on the defeat of his brother ——— 214
 Conceals himself in the mountains of Celtiberia ——— 216
 Enters into an accommodation with M. Antony and Lepidus, after Cæsar's death ——— 272
 Is included in the edict against Cæsar's conspirators ——— 354
 A treaty concluded between him and the triumvirs Octavius and Antony 384
 Is advised by his Admiral to put off to sea with them, while he entertained them on board his ship ——— 385
 His reply ——— 387
 Renews the war ——— 387
 Is defeated in a naval engagement by Agrippa ——— 392
 Destroys a fleet of Octavius's, who narrowly escapes being taken 394
 Challenges Octavius to a naval fight, in which he is defeated ——— 396 Retires to Asia to claim protection of Antony ——— ibid.
 Forms a scheme for succeeding Antony in the Asiatic provinces, on hearing the ill success of his Parthian expedition 411
 Defeats Furnius ——— 412
 Is followed by Furnius, Titius, and Amyntas, whom he defeats 413
 His conference with Furnius ibid.
 His death ——— 414
 His character ——— ibid.
Pomponius, a Tribune, accuses the Dictator Manlius of cruelty to his son I. 488
 Is forced by young Manlius to desist from his prosecution ——— ibid.
Pontifex, an account of this order of priesthood ——— I. 59
Pontinus, C. procures a triumph for his successes over the Allobroges by violence ——— III. 525
Pontius, General of the Samnites, gets the Roman army entirely in his power by a stratagem ——— I. 541
 Rejects the wise counsel of his father 542
 Obliges the Romans to pass under the yoke 543
 Releases Posthumius and others, delivered up to him by the Romans 545
 Is defeated by Papirius Cursor 548
 Is with the inhabitants of Luceria forced to pass the yoke in retaliation 549
 Is taken prisoner ——— 591
 Is led in triumph and beheaded 593
Popilius Lenas, M. a Plebeian Consul, defeats the Gauls, and is decreed a triumph ——— I. 500
Popilius Lenas, his cruel proceedings against the

I N D E X.

- the Statelliates of Liguria II. 397
 His peremptory behaviour to Antiochus
 I piphanes King of Syria 443
 His haughty behaviour at Rhodes 455 Publius Lentus, murders Cicero, under the proscription of the second triumvirate
 IV. 362
Publius, see Volturnus, appoints Quintus to take charge of the public money I. 127
 Is chosen Consul a second time 128
 Is chosen Consul a third time 129
 Is deprived of the honour of consecrating
 the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus 133
 Is elected Consul a fourth time 138
 Rout the Sabines and takes Fidenæ 139
 His death and character — 140
Publius, King of Clusium, marches an army against Rome, to restore the Tarquins — I. 129
 Defeats the Romans — 130
 His life attempted by Mucius Scaevola
 131 Renounces the cause of Tarquin and makes peace with Rome — 132
Porta, a gate, derivation of the word I. 21 Porta Scelerata, at Rome, etymology of the name — I. 271
Portia, the daughter of Cato, married to
 M. Brutus — IV. 203
 How she obtained the secret of the conspiracy against Cæsar from her husband 245 Assists at a council held by her husband and Cassius at Antium — 271
 Reports concerning her death 374.
 note m.
Postumius, a contractor for the Roman armies, his impositions and punishment — II. 203
Postumius Albinus, L. Consul elect, is with his whole army destroyed by the Gauls
 II. 182
Postumius, Lulus, created Dictator I. 154
 Gains a signal victory over the Latines
 155
 Is honoured with a triumph — 157
 Defeats the Aurunci — 165
Postumius Megellus, L. obtains a triumph for his successes in Hetruria, in opposition to the Senate and seven of the Tribunes — I. 584
 Orders the Fabii to resign the siege of Cominium to him, which city he takes 593
 Is fined — 594
 Is insulted on his embassy by the Taren-
 tines — 599
Postumius, P. the Consul, is defeated by the Sabines — I. 140
 Recovers his honour in another battle
ibid.
 An ovation, the first of the kind, decreed to him — 141
Postumius Regillensis, military Tribune, breaks his word to his soldiers on the taking of Volæ — I. 410
 Is murdered by his soldiers 411
Postumius, Sp. is decoyed with his army into the Caudine Forks by Pontius, the Samnite General, and forced to pass
 under the yoke — I. 541
 Is delivered up to the Samnites with his colleague, by his own advice 545
Postumius Tubertus, Dictator, defeats the Æqui and Volsci I. 399
Præfatus, in what respect different from colonies and municipia I. 551, note.
Præneste, is blocked up by Sylla III. 156
 Is surrendered — 159
 The inhabitants massacred, and the town
 razed — 161
Prætexta, the robe for children, described
 I. 42, note a.
Prætors, the first creation of — I. 484
 The number of, increased to six II. 317
 The number of, increased to eight, and their forms of proceeding regulated by the Dictator Sylla III. 168
 The number of farther augmented by Julius Cæsar — IV. 194
 For the chronological series of these officers,
 see the tables of Consular Calendar, at
 the conclusion of volumes II. and IV.
Prætor Peregrinus, the first appointment of that magistrate — II. 60 Priesthood, Roman, divided into classes by Numa Pompilius — I. 54
Principes, among the Roman soldiery, their arms and place in battle — I. 517
Prævernum, the revolt of, suppressed by the Consul Plautius Hipsæus I. 513
 Revolts again and is taken — 528
 Is made a municipium — 529
Prochyta, island of, how it obtained its name — I. 4
Proculus, C. Valerius, is sent by Cæsar ambassador to the camp of Ariovistus, and is imprisoned by him III. 604 Recovers his liberty on the defeat of Ariovistus

I N D E X.

- ovistus ———— 606
Pro-Consul, that distinction first created, in favour of Cæso Fabius I. 268
For the chronological series of these officers,
see the tables of Consular Calendar, at conclusion of volumes II. and IV.
Proculus, Julius, relates to the people a story of the apparition of Romulus I. 47 Property, the Roman laws concerning, from the twelve tables — I. 337
Proscription, this method of condemnation first practised by Sylla — III. 160
Prusias, King of Bithynia, his servile flattery to the Romans — II. 457
 Is fined by the Senate for attacking Per-gamus ———— 465
Ptolemy, King of Cyprus, poisons himself on Cato being sent to depose him III.
 439 Ptolemy, is appointed King of Egypt, to the exclusion of his sister Cleopatra, by
 Pompey ———— IV. 107
 Pompey murdered by order of his Ministers, on his taking refuge in Egypt after the battle of Pharsalia ——— 143
 Is detained prisoner by Julius Cæsar, on his arrival at Alexandria ——— 151
 Is released by Cæsar ———— 153
 Is defeated by Cæsar and drowned in his retreat ———— 160
Ptolemy Apion, King of Cyrene, bequeaths
 his kingdom to the Roman people III.
 98 Ptolemy Epiphanes, King of Egypt, puts himself under the protection of Rome II.
 304 Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, sends an embassy to Rome, and receives one in return ———— I. 627
Ptolemy Physcon, his contests with his brother
 Philometer, King of Egypt II. 466
Publilius, a Plebeian, chosen Dictator, passes three popular laws — I. 523
 Is chosen Prætor ———— 525
 Besieges Palaopolis ———— 530
 Gains possession of it ———— 532
Publilius, a young Plebeian debtor, his story ———— I. 533
 Procures a law for the ease of debtors 534
Pulcher, Claudius, is defeated by Adherbal in a naval engagement — II. 52
Pulsio, T. and L. Varenius, two Centurions under Q. Cicero in Gaul, their extraordinary rivalry in bravery III. 639.
note.
Pulius, Junius, Consul, his fleet destroyed
 by Carthalo ———— II. 54 Takes Eryx, and the temple of Venus E-rycina ———— 56
Pydna, battle of, between the Consul Æmilius, and Perseus, King of Macedon II.
 435 Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, his descent and history ———— I. 600
 Character of his Prime-minister Cyneas
 602
 The advice of Cyneas ———— 603
 Concludes a treaty with Tarentum 606
 Arrives at Tarentum ———— 608
 His character ———— ibid.
 He endeavours to introduce discipline among the Tarentines ———— 609
 Defeats the Consul Lævinus ——— 611
 Declines a second action with him 613
 His offers to Fabricius rejected 615
 Sends Cyneas to treat with the Roman Senate without effect ———— 617
 Battle of Asculum ———— 619
 Is warned by Fabricius of the treachery of his physician ———— 620
 Passes over into Sicily ———— 621
 Returns to Tarentum ———— 623
 Is defeated by Curius Dentatus 624
 Leaves Italy ———— 625
 Account of his death ———— 627

Q.

Quæstors, the first appointment of I. 128
For the chronological series of these officers,
see the tables of Consular Calendar, at
the conclusion of Volumes II. and IV.
 The number of, increased to twenty by Sylla, when he was perpetual Dictator
 III. 167
 The number of, augmented by Julius Cæsar ———— IV. 194
Quæstors, Provincial, four appointed I. 632 Quintilius Capitolinus, T. Consul, his address to the people on their refusal to complete the levies ———— I. 379
 The people arm and defeat the Æqui and Volscian invaders ———— 381
 Character of his administration in his fifth
 consulship ———— 391
Quintilius, T. Consul, his character I. 279
 The effect of his judicious speech to the people, destroyed by his colleague Appius Claudius ———— 280
 Saves

I N D E X.

- Save, Appius from the multitude 281
 Makes a successful expedition against the Æqui ———— 284
 His victories over the Æqui and Volsci
 290 Quintius, Titus, Dictator, defeats the Prænestines ———— I. 474
 Brings the statue of Jupiter Imperator to Rome from Prænestine ———— ibid.
Quintius, T. a veteran soldier, is forced from his farm by the Roman conspirators at Capua, to be their Leader I. 511
 Prevails on them to return ———— 512
Quintalia, the festival of, instituted I. 47 Quirites, on what occasion the Romans assumed that name ———— I. 40
 Etymology of the word ———— ibid. note.
- R.
- Rabirius, C.* a Senator, is tried, after an interval of thirty seven years, for the murder of the Tribune Saturninus, and defended by Cicero ———— III. 292
Rabirius, Tribune of the People, his artful interposition between the Consuls Cassius and Virginus, on the subject of the Agrarian law ———— I. 251
Raleigh, Sir Walter, his censure of the Romans, in beginning the first Punic war, examined ———— II. 17, note.
 His remarks on the death of Regulus 48,
 note.
 His account of the transactions of the Sci-pios in Spain ———— 228
 His reflection on the conquest of Macedonia ———— 440, note.
 His remark on the plunder of the Epirots, by Æmilius ———— 449, note.
Ram. See Aries.
Regillus, battle of, between the Dictator A.
 Posthumus, and the Latines I. 155
Regulus, M. Atilius, Consul, in conjunction with his colleague L. Manlius, defeats the Carthaginian fleet under Han-no and Hamilcar ———— II. 32
 Takes Clypea ———— 34 Defeats the army under Asdrubal and his colleagues ———— 35
 Is defeated and taken prisoner by Xantippos ———— 38
 Is sent to Rome to treat of peace 45
 Uncertain reports of his death ———— 46
- Religion*, the laws of, from the twelve tables ———— I. 341
Remus, the story of his birth ———— I. 16
 Restores his grandfather Numitor 18
 Sets out, with his brother Romulus, to build a new city ———— ibid.
 His death ———— 20
 See Romulus.
Revenues, Public, of Rome, from whence they arose ———— I. 631
 Regulation of ———— 632
Rewards, Military, an account of those granted among the Romans I. 323, note.
Rex Sacrorum, the nature of that office I.
 116, note c.
Rhea, Sylvia, dedicated to the worship of Vesta ———— I. 15
 Is delivered of Romulus and Remus 16
Rhegium, the inhabitants of, basely cut off by a Roman legion sent to assist them
 I. 610
 The city taken, and the surviving conspirators punished ———— 629. II. 4 Rhodes, the Colossus of, overthrown by an earthquake ———— II. 96
 Is severely plundered by Cassius IV. 369 Rhodians, harsh treatment of, by the Romans ———— II. 455
 Obtain at last an alliance with Rome 457
Robberies, Roman laws concerning I. 335
Rome, and Romans, the city of, founded by Romulus ———— I. 20
 Various etymologies of its name ibid.
 note d.
 Opinions as to the date of its foundation
 21
 Romulus is chosen King ———— 23
 Licitors instituted ———— 25
 The number and division of its first inhabitants ———— ibid.
 Patricians and Plebeians first distinguished 26
 A Senate established ———— 27
 A view of the original form of its government ———— 28
 Laws instituted by Romulus ibid.
 Rape of the Sabine virgins ———— 32
 The Cæninenses defeated and incorporated among the Romans ———— 35
 The boundaries of the city enlarged 37
 Titus Tatius makes war and becomes master of the citadel ———— ibid.
 The Sabine wives mediate between their Roman husbands and Sabine relations 39
 How

I N D E X.

| | |
|--|-------------------|
| How the Romans acquired the appellation Quirites | 40 |
| The Romans and Sabines unite | ibid. |
| The three centuries of Knights formed | 41 |
| Death of Romulus | 46 |
| Numa Pompilius elected King | 51 |
| The priesthood regularly formed into distinct classes | 54 |
| Death of Numa | 64 |
| Tullus Hostilius chosen King | 65 |
| Battle of the Horatii and Curiatii | 68 |
| The city enlarged by the accession of the Albans | 72 |
| The Sabines reduced to peace | 73 |
| Death of Tullus Hostilius | ibid. |
| Ancus Martius elected King | 74 |
| The city improved by Ancus | 75 |
| Ancus dies | 76 |
| Tarquinius Priscus elected | 78 |
| The common sewers of, described, ibid.
note. | |
| Tarquin murdered | 84 |
| Servius Tullius assumes the government | 85 |
| The citizens divided into classes and centuries | 91 |
| Usurpation of Tarquin the Proud, and murder of Servius Tullius | 102 |
| The nature of the colonies sent out by the Romans | 108, note. |
| The Sybilline books purchased | 109 |
| Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus founded | 110 |
| Great plague | ibid. |
| Rape of Lucretia | 112 |
| Tarquin expelled | 115 |
| The government vested in Consuls to be elected annually | 116 |
| Peace concluded with Porseena | 132 |
| The Sabines defeated by Valerius and Posthumius, Consuls | 137 |
| A conspiracy in the city, excited by Tar-
quin, discovered | 145 |
| A review of the manners and customs of the early Romans | 147 |
| The first creation of a Dictator | 153 |
| A signal victory gained over the Latines
by A. Posthumius, Dictator | 155 |
| Insurrection of the Plebeians | 162 |
| The Volscians defeated by Servilius | 164 |
| The Aurunci defeated | 165 |
| Secession of the two consular armies to the Mons Sacer | 171 |
| Tribunes of the People created | 182 |
| am ine occasioned by the secession | 185 |

VOL. IV.

| | |
|---|--------------|
| Coriolanus sentenced to banishment | 209 |
| Coriolanus invests the city | 218 |
| The Priests sent in solemn procession to the Volscian camp to treat with Coriolanus | 220 |
| The Roman Ladies, with his mother and wife, prevail with him to withdraw his army | 228 |
| Peace concluded with the Latin States by Spurius Cassius | 248 |
| Copy of the treaty | 249 |
| An Agrarian law proposed in the Senate by Cassius | 250 |
| The Fabian garrison at Cremera cut to pieces by the Hetrurians | 271 |
| A truce for forty years granted to the Veientes | 273 |
| Suspicious death of the Tribune Cn. Genucius | 274 |
| A pestilence in the city | 279 |
| Volero's law, for electing the Tribunes in Comitia Tributa, passed | 282 |
| A great plague in the city | 292 |
| The city beleagued by the Æqui and Vol-sci | ibid. |
| The Tribunes endeavour to alarm the Senate and People with a plot | 301 |
| The Capitol surprised by Appius Herdo-nius | 306 |
| The Tusculans assist in regaining the Capitol | 308 |
| Cincinnatus created Dictator | 316 |
| The number of Tribunes increased to ten | 319 |
| Deputies sent to Greece to obtain a knowledge of the laws there | 331 |
| A great plague throughout all Italy | ibid. |
| Decemvirs chosen to compile a body of laws, and the government of the city
vested in them | 332 |
| The ten tables formed, and confirmed by the Senate and People | 333 |
| The Decemvirate continued another year | 345 |
| Two other tables of laws compiled | 347 |
| Story of Virginia | 357 |
| Creation of military Tribunes | 366 |
| The Decemvirate destroyed | 368 |
| The Tribunes propose the Plebeians should be eligible to the consulship | 382 |
| The law prohibiting marriage between Patricians and Plebeians repealed | 385 |
| Military Tribunes substituted in the room of Consuls, as a compromise of the dif-
fute | X x x |

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|---|--------------|--|--------------|
| pute concerning admitting Plebeians to the consulship — — — | 388 | The rate of interest fixed by law — — — | 495 |
| Consuls restored — — — | 389 | An alliance concluded with the Samnites — — — | 497 |
| The censorship instituted — — — | ibid. | The debtors relieved — — — | 499 |
| A famine in the city — — — | 392 | A treaty of alliance with Carthage — — — | 502 |
| Cincinnatus appointed Dictator on occasion of the conspiracy of Sp. Mælius — — — | 393 | Origin of the quarrel with the Samnites — — — | 505 |
| The Fidenates and Veientes defeated by the Dictator Mamercus Æmilius — — — | 395 | The city of Capua throws itself under the Roman protection — — — | 506 |
| The city afflicted with a plague — — — | 396 | Latium totally subjected — — — | 523 |
| The duration of the office of Censor reduced — — — | 397 | An interregnum occasioned by a plague — — — | 526 |
| A great drought — — — | 399 | A treaty made with Alexander, King of Epirus — — — | ibid. |
| A plague and famine — — — | 412 | The plot of a number of Roman women to poison their husbands discovered — — — | 527 |
| Siege of Veii undertaken — — — | 418 | The city of Privernum reduced, and made municipal — — — | 528 |
| The city of Veii sacked and taken by the Dictator Camillus — — — | 428 | The consular army obliged by the Samnites to pass under the yoke — — — | 543 |
| A partition of the territory of Veii among the Roman people — — — | 435 | This ignominy retaliated on Pontius and the inhabitants of Luceria — — — | 549 |
| Battle of Allia — — — | 440 | The Ciminian forest first penetrated, and the Hetrurians routed there by Q. Fabius — — — | 558 |
| The strength of the city retires to the Capitol — — — | 442 | Their first fleet put to sea against the Samnites under P. Cornelius — — — | 559 |
| The Gauls enter and burn the city — — — | 443 | The Hernici subjected — — — | 563 |
| Camillus appointed Dictator by commission from the Senate in the Capitol — — — | 445 | Another treaty concluded with Carthage — — — | ibid. |
| The Capitol saved from surprise by the cackling of geese — — — | ibid. | The Æqui subdued — — — | 564 |
| The Gauls defeated and cut off by Camillus — — — | 447 | The art of painting first used in the temple of the goddess of Health — — — | 566 |
| The dictatorship of Camillus prolonged to prevent the desertion of the city — — — | 448 | Plebeians made eligible to the pontificate and augurate — — — | 568 |
| The city hastily rebuilt — — — | 450 | A legion cut off by the Senones — — — | 579 |
| Manlius condemned and thrown from the Capitol — — — | 461 | A plague — — — | 582 |
| A plague — — — | 472 | A sun-dial erected — — — | 589 |
| The Tusculans admitted to the privileges of Roman citizens — — — | 474 | The snake of Æsculapius brought to Rome to cure the plague — — — | 591 |
| The statue of Jupiter Imperator brought from Præneste by the Dictator Titus Quinctius — — — | ibid. | Peace granted to the Samnites — — — | 594 |
| Decemvirs appointed to the charge of the Sybilline oracles — — — | 483 | The Sabines subjected — — — | 595 |
| An army of Gauls defeated by Camillus in his fifth dictatorship — — — | ibid. | A secession of the people to the hill Janiculum, to obtain a repeal of the law condemning debtors to slavery — — — | 596 |
| The first creation of the prætorship — — — | 484 | A fleet destroyed, and their ambassador insulted by the Tarentines — — — | 599 |
| Curule Ædiles created — — — | 485 | The Consul Lævinus defeated by King Pyrrhus — — — | 611 |
| A plague in which the great Camillus dies — — — | ibid. | The Senate refuses to treat with Pyrrhus — — — | 618 |
| The first institution of Scenici — — — | 486 | Refuse the assistance sent by the Carthaginians, but conclude an alliance with them — — — | 619 |
| M. Curtius leaps into the gulph — — — | 489 | | Pyrrhus |
| The gigantic Gaul killed by young Manlius, surnamed from hence Torquatus — — — | 491 | | |

I N D E X.

| | | | | | |
|--|-----|--------------|--|-----|-------------------|
| Pyrrhus passes into Sicily | — | 621 | Their alliance against Carthage refused | | |
| A peculiar plague | — | 622 | by the Spaniards and Gauls | 112 | |
| Pyrrhus returns, and is defeated by Cu- | | | See Hannibal, Fabius, Scipio, &c. | | |
| rius Dentatus | — | 624 | Fabius Maximus created Pro-dictator | 148 | |
| Pyrrhus leaves Italy | — | 625 | Extraordinary levies to oppose Hannibal | | 158 |
| An embassy received from, and sent to | | | | | |
| Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt | | 627 | Battle of Cannæ | — | 162 |
| A severe winter | — | 629 | Reasons which with-held Hannibal from | | |
| Silver money coined | — | ibid. | besieging the city | — | 170, note. |
| The dominion of Italy completed | | 631 | General consternation on this unfortunate | | |
| Sources of the revenues | | ibid. | defeat | — | 172 |
| Four provincial Quæstors appointed | | 632 | M. Junius Pera chosen Dictator | | 174 |
| A plague | — | 633 | M. Fabius Buteo also appointed Dictator | | |
| | | | to supply the vacancies in the Senate | | 181 |
| | | | | | |
| Differtation on the credibility of the | | | Posthumius Albinus: with his whole ar- | | |
| preceding part of this history | II. | 1 | my, destroyed by the Gauls | | 182 |
| Causes of the first war with Carthage | | | Innovations in religious worship suppres- | | |
| stated | — | 4 | sed | — | 203 |
| Appius Claudius sent over to Sicily | | 14 | Hannibal appears before the walls of the | | |
| Hiero defeated | — | 19 | city | — | 211 |
| The Carthaginians routed | — | 20 | The money reserved in the Treasury ap- | | |
| Peace with Hiero | — | 21 | plied to the expences of the war | | 222 |
| Prepare to oppose the Carthaginians by | | | The territory of Campania farmed out for | | |
| sea | — | 25 | the public advantage | — | 223 |
| Regulus defeated and taken prisoner | | 38 | The goddess Cybele brought from Phry- | | |
| Their fleet destroyed by a storm after de- | | | gia | — | 268 |
| feating the Carthaginians | — | 41 | Hannibal leaves Italy | — | 286 |
| Another fleet ruined | — | 42 | Battle of Zama | — | 292 |
| Neglect their navy | — | 43 | Peace concluded with Carthage by Sci- | | |
| Their navy once more ruined | — | 55 | pio | — | 296 |
| Appointment of the Prætor Peregrinus | | 60 | The peace ratified | — | 298 |
| Defeat of Hanno | — | 62 | Commencement of the first Macedonian | | |
| End of the first Punic war | — | 63 | war | — | 303 |
| A great fire, and overflowing of the Ty- | | | Ptolemy Epiphanes, King of Egypt, puts | | |
| ber | — | 65 | himself under the protection of the | | |
| Generous behaviour of, toward Carthage, | | | republic | — | 304 |
| during the war with the Mercenaries | | 81 | Battle of Cynocephalus | — | 321 |
| | | | Treaty of peace with Philip | — | 323 |
| The Boii subdued | — | 83 | The Roman Ladies endeavour to get a | | |
| Corfica subdued | — | 86 | repeal of the Oppian law | — | 326 |
| Temple of Janus shut for the first time | | | Cato's speech against the repeal | | 327 |
| since the reign of Numa | — | 87 | The law repealed | — | 331 |
| Sardinia reduced to a province | — | 88 | Preparations to oppose Antiochus | | 346 |
| Occasion of the first Illyrian war | | 89 | Antiochus defeated at Thermopylæ | | 355 |
| Peace with Illyricum | — | 91 | See Antiochus. | | |
| Amazing levies against the Gauls | | 92 | Peace concluded with Syria | — | 363 |
| A signal overthrow given to them | | 94 | Two commissions appointed to regulate | | |
| Insubria reduced to a province | | 98 | affairs in Greece | — | 372 |
| The second Illyrian war | — | 99 | The Senate terrified by ill omens | | 390 |
| A Census and a Lustrum | — | ibid. | Commencement of the second Macedo- | | |
| Colonies planted at Placentia and Cre- | | | nian war | — | 404 |
| mona | — | 101 | Gross adulation paid the city by the in- | | |
| Origin of the second war with Carthage | | ibid. | habitants of Alabanda | — | 421 |
| | | | Gentius, King of Illyria, reduced | | 432 |
| | | | X x x 2 | | Peries |

I N D E X.

| | |
|--|-------------------|
| Perfes defeated at Pydna | 435 |
| Perfes furrenders himfelf | 440 |
| Commissioners fent to regulate the affairs of Macedon and Illyricum | 444 |
| Triumph of Æmilius | 450 |
| An alliance, after much difficulty, granted to Rhodes | 457 |
| Philofophers and Rhetoricians banifhed | 461 |
| A treaty concluded with the Jews | 462 |
| The Alps firft paffed by a Roman army | 465 |
| War declared againft Carthage | 469 |
| Luxury introduced by the conqueft of Macedon | 479, note. |
| Carthage taken by Æmilianus | 482 |
| Instances of the degeneracy of Roman manners | 485 |
| Greece reduced to a province | 490 |
| The election of magiftrates altered from voting to balloting | 510 |
| Tiberius Gracchus endeavours to enforce the Licinian law | 523 |
| A law for the diftribution of lands paffed | 525 |
| Gracchus murdered by the Senators in the Comitiz | 528 |
| History of the war with the revolted flaves in Sicily | 540 |
| Pergamus reduced to a province | 545 |
| The Balears fubdued | 553 |
| Death of Caius Gracchus | 559 |
| This period to be marked as the end of Roman liberty | 560 |
| Commencement of the Jugurthine war | |
| | III. 17 |
| Salluft's account of the rife of the factions known by the name of the Senate and People | 31 |
| Jugurtha delivered up by Bocchus, King of Mauritania | 71 |
| The Cimbri totally defeated by Caius Marius | 85 |
| The fecond fervile war in Sicily | 87 |
| Human facrifices prohibited | 97 |
| The right of citizenship reftained | 98 |
| State of their empire in Aſia, at the time of the difpute with Mithridates, King of Pontus | 101, note. |
| The Italian allies diftinguihed | 109 |
| Commencement of the war with the Italian allies | 112 |
| The Lex Julia paffed | 114 |
| End of the Italian war, and the freedom | |

| | |
|--|-------------------|
| of the city granted to the allies | 119 |
| The city feized by Sylla, and Marius banifhed | 127 |
| A battle in the Forum between the two Confuls Cinna and Octavius and their parties | ibid. |
| The city invefted by Cinna, Marius, and Sertorius | 132 |
| Slaughter of the citizens by Marius | 134 |
| The cruel flaughters and proſcriptions of Sylla | 160 |
| Sylla created perpetual Dictator | 162 |
| Laws paffed by Sylla | 166 |
| Sylla abdicates the dictatorship | 173 |
| Corrupt ſtate of the Courts of juſtice at the time of Cicero's proſecution of Verres | 205 |
| The Capitol rebuilt and confecrated | 212 |
| Diftinguihed honours decreed to Pompey for his Aſiatic victories | 271 |
| History of Cataline's conſpiracy | 335 |
| The firſt triumvirate formed by Julius Cæſar, Pompey, and Cræſſus | 400 |
| Description of Pompey's theatre | 500, note. |
| A terrible inundation of the Tyber | 523 |
| Cræſſus's Parthian expedition | 527 |
| The wars of Cæſar in Gaul | 585 |
| The whole executive power of government engroſſed by Pompey IV. 1 | |
| Commencement of the civil war between Julius Cæſar and Pompey | 23 |
| The public treaſure ſeized by Cæſar | 70 |
| Cæſar created Dictator | 104 |
| Battle of Pharfalia | 135 |
| Infurrection in the city by the debtors and their creditors | 168 |
| Cæſar defeats Scipio and Juba | 178 |
| Cato kills himſelf at Utica | 179 |
| Cæſar's return and magnificent triumphs | 191 |
| Cæſar triumphs for his ſucceſſes in Spain over Pompey's ſons | 218 |
| Shameful inſtance of gluttony in the Romans | 226, note. |
| Cæſar murdered in the Senate-houſe | 248 |
| The ſecond triumvirate formed by Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus | 356 |
| Their proſcriptions | ibid. 364 |
| Tax the Roman Ladies | 366 |
| The firſt battle of Philippi | 370 |
| The ſecond battle of Philippi | 372 |
| The Julian port formed by the Conſul Agrippa | 388 |
| Lepidus banifhed by Octavius | 398 |
| The | |

I N D E X.

- The city embellished by Octavius and Agrippa — 419
 Battle of Actium — 429
 The sovereign power conferred on Octavius by the Senate — 445
Romilius, Consul, sends Sicinius Dentatus to attack the camp of the Æqui I. 326
 Defeats the Æqui, and is deprived of the honour of a triumph by Sicinius 328
 Is fined by the People — 329
 Votes for the compiling a body of laws, after the models of the Grecian States 330
Romulus, the story of his birth I. 16
 Restores his grandfather Numitor 18
 Sets out, with his brother Remus, to build a new city — ibid.
 Is said to kill his brother Remus 20
 Is elected King of Rome — 23
 Assumes a regal state, and appoints a guard of Lictors to attend him 25
 His division of the citizens into classes ibid.
 Establishes the Senate — 27
 His religious institutions — 28
 His civil regulations — 29
 Sends a deputation to the Sabines to desire wives for his subjects — 31
 Rape of the Sabine virgins — 32
 His speech to the women — 33
 Kills Acron, King of Cæcina, in battle 35
 Assumes the honour of a triumph ibid.
 The ceremony of his triumph — 36
 Subdues the Antemnates and Crustumini ibid.
 Marches an army against Titus Tatius, King of the Sabines — 37
 His engagements with Tatius — 38
 Makes peace with him, and admits him to share the kingdom with him 40
 His difference with his colleague — 44
 Reduces the Fidenates. — 45
 Concludes a treaty with the Veientes, ibid.
 Becomes tyrannical — 46
 His death — ibid.
 His character — 47
Roscius and Ægus, Allobrogian brothers, and officers under Julius Cæsar, desert to Pompey — IV. 123 Roscius, Sextus, is proscribed for the sake of his estate — III. 170, note.
Rubicon, Suetonius's account of Julius Cæsar's passing that river — IV. 23, note.
Rubrius, a Tribune, passes a law for rebuilding Carthage, and planting a Roman colony in it. — II. 556
Ruffinus, Cornelius, his successes against the Larentine confederates — I. 622
 Is created Dictator on occasion of a plague 623
 Is struck out of the list of Senators 626
Rufus, Vibullius, is taken prisoner by Julius Cæsar at Corfinium, and set at liberty IV. 38
 Is sent by Cæsar with overtures of peace to Pompey — 108
Rullus, P. Servilius, Tribune of the People, his scheme of appointing a decemvirate, for the purpose of distributing lands, overturned by the Consul Cicero III. 287
Rupilius, P. suppresses the revolted slaves in Sicily — II. 542
Rutilius Lupus, P. Consul, is surprised and defeated by Vettius, General of the Italian allies — III. 112
Rutilius Rufus, P. Consul, raises forces against the Cimbri, and teaches them the exercise of their weapons from the school of gladiators — III. 75
 Is unjustly condemned to banishment and confiscation — 100 Rutilus, C. Martius, a Plebeian, is chosen Dictator in the war with the Hetrurians I. 496 Defeats them and triumphs — ibid.
 Is chosen Censor — 500
- S.
- Sabines*, refuse wives to the Romans I. 31
 Rape of the Sabine virgins — 32
 Send to demand their daughters 34
 Their King Titus Tatius marches an army against Rome — 37
 See Titus Tatius.
 Unite with the Romans — 40
 Privileges decreed to their women 42
 Rebel, but are reduced by Tullus Hostilius. — 73
 Are defeated by Tarquin the Proud 107
 Are subjected — 595
 Are defeated by Valerius and Posthumius. 137
 Are again routed by Poplicola and Lucretius — 139
 Defeat Posthumius — 140
 Are beaten by him and Menenius ibid.
 Are

I N D E X.

- Are reduced to sue for peace — 141
 Are routed by the Dictator Manius Valerius — 169
Sabinus, Titurius, defeats the Unelli, Eburonices, and Lexovii, Celtic Galls, by stratagem — III. 617
 Is deceived by Ambiorix, and, resolving to retire, is betrayed into an ambush 635
 Is murdered by Ambiorix — 637
Sacramentum, or Military oath, the nature of, explained — I. 169
Sacrifices, Human, prohibited by the Senate of Rome — III. 97
Sagum, the Roman military habit, described — I. 509, note.
Saguntum, concludes an alliance with Rome II. 104
 Is taken and destroyed by Hannibal 109
Salapia, the town of, betrayed into the hands of Marcellus by Darius and Blatius — II. 219
 Retorts a stratagem on Hannibal 227
Salentinians, are reduced to obedience to the Romans — I. 630
Salus, account of this order of Priests, as established by Numa Pompilius I. 57
Sallust, his account of the origin of the two parties in Rome, the Senate and the People — III. 31
 His account of Cataline's conspiracy 335
 Is made Governor of Numidia, converted into a Roman province by Julius Cæsar — IV. 189
 His letters to Cæsar, on the regulation of the Roman Commonwealth 227, 234 Salona, in Dalmatia, its memorable defence against M. Octavius — IV. 110
Salvius, assumes the title of King over the revolted slaves in Sicily III. 88 Defeats the Prætor Licinius ibid.
 Is joined by another King of slaves, Athenio — 89
 Is worsted by the Prætor Lucullus ibid.
 Dies — 90
See Albanus.
Sannites, conclude a treaty of alliance with the Romans — I. 497
 Origin of their quarrel with Rome 505
 Besiege Capua — 506
 Are defeated by Valerius Corvus 507
 Obtain peace of Rome — 513
 The Latines, Sidicini, and Campanians unite against them — ibid.
 Take umbrage at the Roman colony of Fregellæ, and defy the Romans 530
 Possess themselves of Palæopolis by fraud 531
 Are defeated by Fabius Rullianus 534
 Are reduced by the Dictator Papirius Cursor — 538 Undergo another defeat — 539
 Are refused a peace — 540
 Their General, Pontius, gets the Roman army intirely into his power by stratagem — 541
 The Romans obliged to pass under the yoke — 543
 Burn Fregellæ with all its inhabitants 546
 Pontius with his army defeated and forced to pass the yoke by Papirius Cursor 549
 Various defeats and losses sustained by them — 552
 Are defeated by the Dictator Papirius Cursor — 561
 Two armies of, routed by the Consuls Posthumius and Minucius — 563
 Sue for an alliance, which is granted 564
 Receive a defeat, in conjunction with the Gauls, by Fabius Maximus — 580
 Make a general levy against the Romans 585
 Are defeated, and their General Pontius taken prisoner — 591
 Sue for a peace — 594
 Are totally subdued on the death of King Pyrrhus — 628
Samos, the voluptuous life of Antony and Cleopatra while on that island IV. 422
Sardinia is seized by the Romans from the Carthaginians, on frivolous pretences II. 82
 Is reduced to a province — 88
Satricum, a Volscian city, burnt by the Latins — I. 475
 Is taken and burnt by Valerius Corvus 503
 Is taken by Papirius Cursor — 550
Saturnalia, origin of the festival so called I. 72
Saturninus, Tribune of the people, passes, by force, a law for distributing the lands of the Cimbri in Gaul — III. 91
 Procures the banishment of Metellus 92
 Excites a tumult at the election of Consuls, and is killed — 94
Scæva, his gallant behaviour under Julius Cæsar against Pompey at Dyrrhachium IV. 121 10

I N D E X.

| | | | | | |
|--|---|-----------------|---|---|------------|
| Is rewarded by Cæsar | — | 122 | phax | — | 255 |
| Scævola, Mucius , his bold attempt on King | | | Quells a mutiny among his troops | | 257 |
| Porfenna, and fortitude under his dis- | | | Arrives at Rome, and is chosen Consul | | 260 |
| appointment | — | I. 130 | His reply to Fabius in Senate | — | 263 |
| Is rewarded | — | 133 | Is permitted to carry the war into Africa | | 265 |
| Scaptius , an old Plebeian, causes the people | | | Is received in Locri | — | 266 |
| to seize a tract of land, claimed by | | | Is accused in Senate for his conduct there | | 270 |
| the two cities Ardea and Aricia, and | | | His prayer on embarking for Africa | | 273 |
| submitted to the arbitration of the Ro- | | | Lands, and is joined by Masinissa | | 274 |
| mans | — | I. 381 | His first operations | — | 276 |
| Scaptius , his arbitrary exactions in Cyprus | | | Burns the camps of Syphax and Asdrubal | | 279 |
| | | III. 568, note. | Defeats them again | — | 280 |
| Is with-held, and the Cyprians protected | | | His reproof to Masinissa | — | 283 |
| by Cicero | — | 569, note. | Receives deputies from Carthage, and | | 285 |
| Scapula , the chief author of the revolt of | | | offers them terms | — | 285 |
| Spain, takes the command of Cordu- | | | His interview with Hannibal | — | 290 |
| ba, on Sextus Pompey's flight IV. 214 | | | Battle of Zama | — | 292 |
| Despairs of defending it, and kills him- | | | Concludes a peace with Carthage | | 296 |
| self | — | ibid. | Obtains the surname of Africanus | | 299 |
| Scaurus, Æmilius , his motives for taking | | | Is chosen Censor, and declared Prince of | | 309 |
| the part of Adherbal against Jugurtha | | | the Senate | — | 309 |
| in the Senate | — | III. 20 | His conversation with Hannibal at Ephe- | | 343, note. |
| His fruitless journey to Numidia to com- | | | Offers to serve as Lieutenant under his | | 358 |
| promise the differences between them | | 23 | brother in Greece | — | 358 |
| Is sent with the Consul Bestia to reduce | | | His reply to the offers of Antiochus | | 361 |
| Jugurtha, but is corrupted by him | | 24 | Receives his son from Antiochus | | 362 |
| Is appointed one of the Triumviri to in- | | | Is accused of defrauding the State | | 369 |
| quire into the affair of Jugurtha | | 30 | Parallel between him and Hannibal | | 382, note. |
| Escapes prosecution on occasion of the | | | Account of his son | — | 396, note. |
| Italic war | — | 111 | Scipio, L. Cornelius , is appointed to conduct | | |
| Scaurus, Aurelius , is defeated and taken pri- | | | the war in Greece, whither his brother | | |
| soner by the Cimbri | — | III. 73 | Africanus attends him as his Lieute- | | |
| Is killed by a Cimbrian chief | — | 74 | nant | — | II. 358 |
| Scenici , the first institution and nature of | | | Defeats Antiochus at Magnesia, and ac- | | |
| these shews | — | I. 486 | quires the surname of Asiaticus | | 362 |
| Scipio Africanus Æmilianus , reforms the dis- | | | Concludes peace with Antiochus | | 363 |
| cipline of the legions in Spain II. 516 | | | Is accused of accepting bribes and em- | | |
| Invests Numantia | — | 517 | bezzling public money | — | 369 |
| Razes the town after the inhabitants had | | | Is condemned | — | 371 |
| destroyed themselves | — | 519 | Scipio, L. Cornelius , Consul, leads an army | | |
| Incurs the ill-will of the Roman people | | 543 | against Sylla, which goes over to Sylla | | III. 154 |
| Opposes the Agrarian law | — | 546 | Scipio, P. Cornelius , leaves Spain to meet | | |
| His suspicious death | — | 547 | Hannibal after his descent from the | | |
| His character | — | 548 | Alps | — | II. 121 |
| Scipio Africanus, Publius , when a youth, saves | | | His speech to his army on the banks of | | |
| his father's life, in an engagement with | | | the Ticin | — | 130 |
| Hannibal | — | II. 135 | Is worsted in an engagement with Han- | | nibal, |
| His character | — | 242 | | | |
| Is sent Pro-Consul into Spain | | 243 | | | |
| His noble behaviour there | — | 245 | | | |
| Defeats Asdrubal | — | 254 | | | |
| Goes to Africa to the Court of Sy- | | | | | |

I N D E X.

| | |
|---|-----------------|
| Hannibal | 135 |
| Is joined by his colleague Sempronius | 135 |
| Is killed in Spain | 239 |
| Scipio, Metellus, joins Pompey with his forces in Thessaly | IV. 132 |
| His station at the battle of Pharsalia | 135 |
| Sails for Africa to join Juba, King of Mauritania, and renew the war against Cæsar | 141 |
| Is defeated by Cæsar | 178 |
| Is defeated by Silius in a naval engagement, and kills himself | 189 |
| Scipio Nasica, opposes Cato in his advice to destroy Carthage | II. 464 |
| Defeats the Dalmatians | 465 |
| Scutum, a description of, and wherein it differed from the clypeum | I. 518, note. |
| Seleucus Cebisæus, robs the tomb of Alexander the Great, and is put to death by his Queen Berenice | III. 471, note. |
| Sempronius Asellio, A. Prætor Urbanus, is murdered in mediating between the Roman debtors and creditors | III. 115 |
| Sempronius Atratinus, C. indangers the loss of his army against the Volsci by indiscretion | I. 402 |
| Deserts his camp | 403 |
| See Tempanius . | |
| Is fined | 408 |
| Sempronius Gracchus, T. successfully defends Cumæ against Hannibal | II. 185 |
| Defeats Hanno near Beneventum | 191 |
| Is betrayed to the Carthaginians and killed | 207 |
| Sempronius Sophus, reduces the Picentes | I. 630 |
| Sempronius, Tib. Consul, is sent to Sicily | II. 119 |
| Joins Scipio in Italy against Hannibal | 139 |
| Suffers a defeat in a rash engagement | 141 |
| Senate of Rome, the first establishment of, | I. 27 |
| Its original powers | 28 |
| The Sabine Council united to it | 40 |
| Romulus murdered by | 46 |
| Assumes the government during the interregnum | 50 |
| Refuses to confirm the election of Servius Tullius | 89 |
| Takes an oath never to recall the Tarquins, or elect a King | 119 |
| Origin of the appellation Conscript Fathers | 120 |
| Decrees Coriolanus to be tried by the | |

| | |
|--|---------|
| people | 206 |
| Decree of, concerning the conquered lands | 253 |
| Allows the number of Tribunes to be increased to ten | 319 |
| How forced to make a grant of Mount Aventine to the people | 321 |
| Passes a decree for forming a body of laws | 331 |
| The ten tables confirmed by | 333 |
| The authority of, usurped by the Decemviri | 347 |
| Decrees a subsistence for the army, while in the field | 416 |
| Decrees a partition of the territory of Veii among the Roman people | 435 |
| Open canvassing for votes for offices forbidden | 494 |
| Refuses to treat with King Pyrrhus | 618 |
| Refuses to ransom the captives after the battle of Canæ | II. 174 |
| A Dictator appointed to fill up the vacancies in, after this battle | 181 |
| Passes sentence on Capua | 218 |
| Permits Scipio to carry the war into Africa | 265 |
| Sends Commissioners to settle affairs in Asia | 366 |
| Demetrius pleads his father's cause to | 379 |
| Is terrified by ill omens | 390 |
| Sends Commissioners to regulate the affairs of Macedon and Illyricum | 444 |
| Arbitrary treatment of the Achæans | 447 |
| Reply of, to the apologies of Cotys, King of Ordryia | 453 |
| Makes a partition of the kingdom of Cappadocia between Ariarathes and Holophernes | 461 |
| Moderates the fine of the Athenians | 465 |
| Refuses to ratify the treaty concluded by the Consul Mancinus with the Numantines, and delivers him up to them | 513 |
| The Tribunes of the people made Senators | 544 |
| The right of judicature taken from, by a law of Caius Gracchus | 554 |
| Is corrupted by Jugurtha, and sends Commissioners to make a partition of Numidia between him and Adherbal | III. 21 |
| Rise of the factions, the Senate and People | 31 |
| Some of the body of, restored to the bench of Judges by the Consul Servilius Cæpio | 73 |
| Prohibits | |

I N D E X.

- | | | | |
|---|-------------|---|--------------------|
| Prohibits human sacrifices ——— | 97 | Their country ravaged by Curius Dentatus ——— | 508 |
| Is subjected to the controul of Sulpicius and Marius ——— | 125 | Are defeated by the Consul Domitius ibid. | |
| Is forced by Sylla, on his seizing Rome, to banish Marius and others of his party ——— | 127 | Dethrone their King Cavarinus, and revolt from the Romans — III. | 643 |
| Deposes the Consul Cinna, and elects L. Cornelius Merula in his stead ——— | 128 | Are reduced by Cæsar ——— | 645 |
| Is forced to restore Cinna ——— | 134 | Septimius , a military Tribune, kills Pompey the Great, in Egypt, after the battle of Pharsalia ——— | IV. 144 |
| Is assembled by order of the Consul, young Marius and certain Senators put to death ——— | 156 | Sequani , by what means they reduced the Ædui to subjection — III. | 647, note. |
| Three hundred Knights added to it by Sylla ——— | 165 | Serapis , the tutelary god of the Egyptians, story of ——— | I. 11. note |
| Senators restored to the privilege of being Judges by Sylla ——— | 166 | Serranus , S. Attilius , Tribune of the people, opposes the recall of Cicero, in the Senate ——— | III. 455 |
| Decrees a public thanksgiving for Pompey's victories in Asia ——— | 271 | Opposes the restoration of Cicero's Palatine house ——— | 467 |
| Is informed of Cataline's conspiracy ——— | 341 | Sertorius , attends the Consul Didius into Spain ——— | III. 66 |
| Orders a public thanksgiving in Cicero's name for the discovery of Cataline's conspiracy ——— | 357 | Escapes a snare laid for him at Castulo, and puts the inhabitants to the sword ——— | 97 |
| Decrees Cataline's conspirators to suffer death ——— | 366 | Brings a reinforcement of Gauls to Rome to assist in suppressing the revolt of the Italian allies ——— | 112 |
| Suspends Julius Cæsar, as Prætor, and the Tribune Metellus Nepos, from the execution of their offices ——— | 383 | Loses his election as Tribune, and joins the party of Cinna ——— | 128 |
| Determines on the recall of Cicero from exile ——— | 457 | Assists Marius and Cinna in besieging Rome ——— | 132 |
| Passes a decree for his return ——— | 458 | Assembles an army in Spain to oppose Sylla ——— | 161 |
| The Senate-house burnt, on the murder of Clodius ——— | 541 | Review of his transactions there ——— | 180 |
| Orders and decrees of, relating to Julius Cæsar's recall from Gaul ——— | 563. IV. 20 | His political conduct ——— | 183 |
| The number of Senators augmented by Julius Cæsar ——— | 193 | Is joined by Perperna ——— | 184 |
| The flattering honours bestowed on Cæsar by, on his reducing Pompey's sons in Spain ——— | 219 | His artifice to teach his soldiers prudence ——— | 185 |
| Cæsar murdered in the Senate-house ——— | 248 | Takes the city of Laurona ——— | 186 |
| A general amnesty agreed to, with the conspirators ——— | 260 | Is forced to retreat on Metellus and Pompey's joining to oppose him ——— | 187 |
| Divine honours decreed to Cæsar by the influence of Antony ——— | 277 | Is forced to a battle and worsted by them ——— | 188 |
| Sends Antony peremptory orders to desist from his intention of seizing Cisalpine Gaul ——— | 289 | Makes head against them again ——— | 189 |
| Decrees of, against Antony ——— | 291 | Receives an embassy from Mithridates, King of Pontus ——— | ibid. |
| Lepidus voted a public enemy, on his joining Antony ——— | 333 | Becomes unpopular among his own men ——— | 192 |
| Confers the sovereign power on Octavius ——— | 445 | Is assassinated ——— | 193 |
| Senones , cut off a Roman legion ——— | I 579 | Servilia , the sister of Cato, and mother of Brutus, assists at a Council held by her son, Cassius, and Cicero, at Antium, ——— | IV. 271 |
| Defeat and kill the Consul Cæcilius ——— | 598 | Anecdotes of her ——— | ibid. note. |
| VOL. IV. | | Servilianus , Q. Fabius , is defeated by Viriatus, ——— | |
| | | Y y y | |

I N D E X.

| | | | |
|--|----------------|--|------------------|
| riatus, General of the Lusitanians | II. 504 | der chosen to the consulate | — I. 484 |
| Is forced to conclude a peace with Viriatus | — 507 | Sextus Tarquinius , his treacherous scheme to put his father in possession of Gabii | I. 107 |
| Servilius , Proconsul in Picenum, is murdered by the Italian allies at Asculum | III. 110 | Is made King of Gabii | — 108 |
| Servilius Ahala , Master of the horse to the Dictator Cincinnatus, kills Sp. Mælius, who aspires to the sovereign power in Rome | — I. 394 | Ravishes Lucretia | — 112 |
| Servilius , P. chosen Consul | — I. 160 | His fate after the expulsion of his father | 117, note b. |
| Appeases a tumult of the people | 162 | Sicily , an account of its state at the arrival of King Pyrrhus | — I. 621 |
| Engages them to enroll themselves against the Volscians | — 163 | His successes there | — ibid. |
| Defeats the Volscians | — 164 | History and character of Hiero, King of Syracuse | — II. 5, note. |
| Decrees himself a triumph | — ibid. | Expeditions of the Carthaginians into this island | — 8, note. |
| Defeats the Aurunci | — 165 | The Romans oppose them there | 17 |
| Loses the favour of the people by his fear of offending the Senate | — ibid. | Siege of Agrigentum | — 22 |
| Servilius Prætor , 2. Dictator, defeats the Fidenates and Veientes, and takes the city of Fidenæ | — I. 356 | Siege of Lilybæum | — 49 |
| Is again chosen Dictator, and defeats the Lavicani | — 409 | Is ceded to the Romans | — 63 |
| Servilius , Sp. Consul, defeats the Hetrurians | — I. 271 | The government of, settled | — 64 |
| His successful defence of his conduct before the people against the accusation of the Tribunes | — 273 | Death of Hiero | — 188 |
| Servilius Tullius , by the policy of Queen Tanaquil, assumes the regency on the death of Tarquinius Priscus | I. 85 | Confusions in Syracuse excited by the Carthaginians. | — 194 |
| Retains the government without election | ibid. | Syracuse taken by the Romans | — 208 |
| His birth and education | — 86 | The reduction of the island completed | — 220 |
| His speech to the people | — 88 | History of the war with the revolted slaves | — 540 |
| The Veientes revolt against him | — ibid. | A second servile war there | — III. 87 |
| Obtains the sanction of a popular election | — 89 | Is defended against Sylla by Perperna | — 161 |
| His civil regulations | — 90 | Is seized by Pompey | — 162 |
| Marries his two daughters to the young Tarquins | — 91 | Cruel extortions of Verres while Prætor there | — 208, note. |
| Divides the citizens into classes and centuries | — ibid. | The freedom of Rome granted to the inhabitants of, by Antony | — IV. 270 |
| Institutes the Census and Lustrum | — 96 | Sicinnius , persuades the Roman legions to desert their Generals and retire to the Mons Sacer | — I. 171 |
| His speech to the Senate in favour of the Liberti | — 97 | Is chosen Tribune of the people | — 182 |
| Is accused before the Senate by Tarquin | — 99 | Pronounces sentence of death against Coriolanus | — 196 |
| Appeals to the people | — 100 | Sidicini , attacked by the Samnites, apply for assistance from the Campanians | I. 505 |
| Is murdered by Tarquin | — 102 | Are refused assistance by the Romans, and throw themselves into the protection of the Latines | — 513 |
| His character | — ibid. | Silanus Marcellus , D. Junius, is convicted of extortion against the Macedonians by his father, and strangles himself | — II. 510, note. |
| Sextius , L. a Plebeian, the first of that order chosen to the consulate | — I. 484 | Silvius , son of Æneas, elected King of Latium | — I. 14 |
| | | Sinope , the capital city of Pontus, is taken by. | |

I N D E X.

- by Lucullus ——— III. 236
- Sitius, P.* joins his forces with King Bogud, and takes Cirta in Mauritania IV. 176
- His character ——— ibid. note.
- Defeats and takes Faustus and Afranius prisoners ——— 188
- Defeats Scipio in a naval engagement 189
- Is put in possession of Cirta, converted by Cæsar into a Roman province ibid.
- Sofius, C.* Antony's Lieutenant in Syria, takes the city of Jerusalem in conjunction with Herod IV. 401, note.
- Is elected Consul ——— 420
- Harangues the Senate against Octavius ibid.
- Leaves Rome and joins Antony 421
- Is pardoned by Octavius after the victory at Actium ——— 431
- Soldiers, Roman*, a decree of the Senate for their maintenance in the field I. 416
- The cavalry begin to receive pay 421
- The different classes of, described I. 517
- Their manner of fighting ——— 519
- Sophonsha*, daughter of Aldrubal, married to Syphax, King of Masæsyia II. 272
- Is married by Malinissa, who took Syphax prisoner ——— 281
- Her unhappy death ——— 284
- Sora*, the city of, taken by the Romans I. 553
- Spain*, the successful operations of the Scipios there against the Carthaginians II. 228. 253.
- See Celtiberia. See Sertorius.
- The oppressive conduct of Q. Cassius Longinus there ——— IV. 210
- Cn. Pompey and Labienus defeated by Julius Cæsar ——— 213
- Corduba reduced by Cæsar ——— 214
- Cn. Pompey killed ——— 216
- Sextus Pompey flies to the mountains of Celtiberia ——— ibid.
- Spartacus*, a gladiator, assumes the command of a number of the same profession, who escaped from Capua III. 194
- Defeats Claudius Pulcher, and others, sent to reduce him ——— 195
- Defeats the Consuls Lentulus and Gellius successively ——— 196
- Is drove to the peninsula of Bruttium, where he is shut up by Crassus 197
- Forces his passage and escapes 198
- Is again defeated by Crassus ibid.
- Is defeated and killed by Crassus 199
- St. Real, M. de* his remarks on Cicero's second epistle to Atticus — III. 318
- M. Mongault's reply to him — 319
- Stalenus*, a Roman Judge, his doubly treacherous conduct in the cause of Oppianicus ——— III. 206, note.
- Stoic Philosophers*, their principal tenets IV. 185, note.
- Suetonius*, his account of Julius Cæsar's passing the Rubicon IV. 23, note.
- His remarks on the enterprise — 47
- Suevi*, their strength and way of life III. 619
- Dispossess the Usipetes and Tenchtheri of their country ——— ibid.
- Sulpicius, C.* is named Dictator in the war against the Gauls ——— I. 493
- Is forced to a battle by his mutinous soldiers ——— ibid.
- Defeats the Gauls and triumphs 494
- Sulpicius, C.* ambassador to Pergamus, insults Eumenes ——— II. 459
- Sulpicius Galba, P.* Consul, undertakes the first war with Macedon II. 303
- His advantages over Philip ——— 311
- Sulpicius, P.* Tribune of the people, his character ——— III. 124
- Forces the Consul Sylla to revoke the edict for holidays ——— 125
- Is betrayed to Sylla by his slave, and put to death ——— 126
- Sulpicius, Servius*, Consul, his character, by Dr. Middleton ——— IV. 5, note.
- His consolatory letter to Cicero, on the death of his daughter Tullia 221, note.
- Sundial*, the first in Rome fixed up by the Consul Papirius Cursor — I. 589
- Surenas*, a Parthian Noble, is sent by King Orodes, with an army, against Crassus III. 529
- Defeats Crassus ——— 532
- Inveigles Crassus to a conference, where he is killed ——— 537
- Is put to death by Orodes, through envy 538, note.
- Sybilline books*, purchased by Tarquin the Proud ——— I. 109
- Duumviri appointed to take charge of them ——— ibid.
- On what occasions they were consulted, ibid. note.
- Decemviri appointed to the charge of them ——— 483
- Sylla, L. Cornelius*, Quæstor to the Consul
- Ma-
- Y y y 2

I N D E X.

| | |
|--|--------------|
| Marius, arrives with levies to the army in Numidia | III. 63 |
| His family and character | 61 |
| Is sent to treat with Bocchus, King of Mauritania | 64 |
| His conference with Bocchus | 65 |
| Is again sent to Bocchus | 67 |
| Prevails on Bocchus to deliver up Jugurtha to him | 71 |
| Is appointed by Marius his Lieutenant in the expedition against the Cimbri | 76 |
| Contributes to the total defeat of the Cimbri | 85 |
| Procures the office of Prætor | 99 |
| Is sent into Asia to restore Ariobarzanes to the throne of Cappadocia | 100 |
| Defeats the Mæsi in the Italian war | 114 |
| Romantic account of his farther successes against the Italian allies | 116 |
| Is chosen Consul | 118 |
| Aspires to the command of the war against Mithridates | 123 |
| Leads his army to Rome to oppose Sulpicius and Marius | 125 |
| Seizes the city, and forces the Senate to banish Marius and his party | 126 |
| Besieges Athens | 138 |
| Seizes the treasure at Delphos | 139 |
| Takes Athens | 141 |
| Defeats Mithridates's vast army under Archelaus | 142 |
| Defeats his other General Dorylaus | 144 |
| Concludes a peace with Mithridates | 145 |
| His conference with Mithridates | 147 |
| Plunders Asia | 150 |
| Lands at Brundisium | 153 |
| Defeats the Consul Norbanus | 154 |
| Defeats the Consul young Marius | 155 |
| Takes possession of Rome, and defeats the Consul Carbo | 156 |
| Engages Telestinus, and the wing of the army which he commanded defeated | 158 |
| Massacres three thousand men, who surrendered themselves after the battle | 159 |
| His inhuman slaughters and proscriptions | ibid. |
| His prediction of Julius Cæsar's future greatness | 161 |
| Procures himself to be created perpetual Dictator | 162 |
| Orders Lucretius Ofella to be killed for standing candidate for the consulship | 164 |

| | |
|--|---------|
| His triumphal entry into Rome | 164 |
| Adds three hundred Knights to fill up the Senate | 165 |
| Increases the number of Quæstors, and reduces the power of the Tribunes | 167 |
| Other laws enacted by him | 168 |
| How he disposed of the confiscated estates | 170 |
| Allows Pompey to triumph | 172 |
| Abdicates the dictatorship | 173 |
| His death | 175 |
| Syphax , King of Masæsyliæ, makes war on Carthage in favour of Rome | II. 201 |
| Is visited by Scipio | 255 |
| Marries Sophonisba | 272 |
| His camp burnt by Scipio | 279 |
| Is taken prisoner by Masinissa | 281 |
| Is sent to Rome and imprisoned | 285 |
| Syracuse . See Hiero and Hieronymus . | |
| Commotions excited there by the Carthaginians | II. 193 |
| Is besieged by Marcellus | 199 |
| Is taken | 208 |

T.

| | |
|---|--------|
| Tables, Twelve . See Laws . | |
| Tanaquil , Queen, her policy on the murder of her husband Tarquinius Priscus, to secure the succession to her son-in-law Servius Tullius | I. 85 |
| Encourages Servius to retain the sovereignty | 89 |
| Tarentines , instigate the Senones to attack the Roman territories | I. 598 |
| Destroy a Roman fleet, and insult the ambassador sent to demand satisfaction | 599 |
| Apply for succour to Pyrrhus, King of Epirus | 600 |
| Take Thurium | 601 |
| Their territories ravaged by Æmilius Barbula | 602 |
| Arrival of Pyrrhus | 608 |
| Pyrrhus endeavours to introduce discipline among them | 609 |
| Are, with their confederates, reduced by Fabricius, after the departure of Pyrrhus | 621 |
| Pyrrhus invited back | 623 |
| The city of Tarentum surrendered to the Romans by Milo, the Epirot Governor | 628 |
| See Tarentum . | |

Tarentum,

I N D E X.

- Tarentum*, the city of, betrayed into the hands of Hannibal — II. 204
Is retaken by Fabius Cunctator — 224
Tarpeia, her double treachery between the Sabines and the Romans I. 37
Her death gives name to the Tarpeian rock — — 38
Tarquinienses, make war on the Romans I. 403
Are defeated and severely punished 497
Tarquinius, L. one of Cataline's conspirators, accuses Crassus of being concerned in the plot — — III. 359
Tarquinius Priscus, some account of his family and his measures to attain the sovereignty of Rome — I. 77
Is chosen King — — 78
Adds an hundred new members to the Senate — — ibid.
His wars with the Latines — — ibid.
Builds a circus — — ibid.
Reduces the Hetrurians — — 80
Beautifies and improves the city ibid.
Story of him and Navius the augur 81
Defeats the Sabines and Hetrurians 82
Defeats the Sabines again — — 83
Is murdered by the sons of Ancus Marcius — — 84
Tarquinius Superbus, is married to the daughter of Servius Tullius — I. 91
His wicked steps to marrying his wife's sister Tullia — — 99 Accuses his father-in-law before the Senate — — ibid.
Assumes the royalty — — 101
Murders Servius — — 102
Causes M. Junius to be murdered 104
His tyrannic government — — ibid.
His contemptuous treatment of the Latine Council — — 105
Procures the death of Herdonius 106
Builds the temple of Jupiter Latialis ibid.
Raises an army of Latines against the Volscians, whom he defeats — — ibid.
Defeats the Sabines — — 107
Treacherous scheme between him and his son Sextus, to reduce Gabii ibid.
Removes his sons by distant appointments 108
Purchases the Sybil's books — — 109
Builds the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus 110
Sends his sons to Delphos on account of the plague — — ibid.
Besieges Ardea — — 111
Is deposed by the people on occasion of the fate of Lucretia — — 115
Takes refuge in Hetruria — — 117
Prevails on the Hetrurians to send an embassy to Rome in his favour 120
Is defeated by Valerius — — 126
His cause renounced by Postumia 132
Surprises Fidenæ — — 144
Excites a conspiracy in Rome which is discovered — — 145
His death and character — — 159
Tasgetius, Chief of the Carnutes, is assassinated — — III. 633
Telestinus, a General of the Marian party, endeavours to surprise the city of Rome III. 157
Is killed in an engagement with Sylla 158
Tellus, goddess, a temple vowed to by the Consul Sempronius Sophus, on occasion of an earthquake — I. 630
Tempanius, Sex. his valour and conduct saves the Consul Sempronius Atratinus from being defeated by the Volsci I. 403
His discreet account of this action to the assembly of the people — — 404
Is chosen Tribune, and generously protects the Consul against an accusation of his colleague Hortensius — — 405 Tempe, the valley of, described II. 424, note.
Temples, the form of consecrating them among the Romans I. 133, note b.
Account of the principal temples in Rome 134, note.
Terentius Arsa, C. Tribune of the people, endeavours to get a body of laws compiled for the magistrates to govern by I. 294
Terminalia, the feast of, introduced by Numa Pompilius — — I. 61
Teuta, Queen of Illyricum, the occasion of her quarrel with Rome II. 89
Concludes a peace and abdicates the regency — — 91
Teutoni, a great victory obtained over them and the Ambrones by Caius Marius III. 82
Thala, in Numidia, is taken by the Romans under Metellus — — III. 53
Thapsus, is invested by Julius Cæsar IV. 177
Scipio and Juba defeated in the neighbourhood of, by Cæsar — — 178
Thiber,

I N D E X.

- Tiber*, the city of, destroyed by the Consul Mammilius ——— II. 290
- Theas*, dissuades Antiochus from employing Hannibal in Italy ——— II. 347
- Torajmenus*, the Consul Flaminius defeated and killed by Hannibal at the lake of ——— II. 146
- Tiber*, derivation of the name of that river ——— I. 15
- Tiber*, engagement between Hannibal and Scipio, on the banks of that river II. 135
- Tigranes*, King of Armenia, is induced by his father-in-law, Mithridates, King of Pontus, to dethrone Ariobarzanes, King of Cappadocia ——— III. 120
- Mithridates takes refuge in his dominions ——— 233
- His history and character ——— 235
- Lucullus enters Armenia ——— 237
- Is defeated by Lucullus ——— 240
- Is again defeated by Lucullus ——— 244
- Deserts Mithridates ——— 251
- Offers a reward for taking him ——— 253
- Surrenders himself up to Pompey ——— 254
- Concludes a peace with Pompey, and is restored ——— 255
- Tigranes*, Prince, son of the King of Armenia, revolts against his father III. 251
- Takes refuge in Pompey's camp ——— 253
- Is reserved for Pompey's triumph on refusing to abide by his award between him and his father ——— 255
- Walks in Pompey's triumph 393, note.
- Tigranacerta*, the city so called, built by Tigranes, King of Armenia III. 120
- Is besieged by Lucullus ——— 238
- Is delivered up by the Greek inhabitants ——— 241
- Timastibent*, chief Magistrate of Lipara, his generous behaviour to the Roman ambassadors conveying Camillus's offering to Delphos ——— I. 433
- Titinus*, kills himself on occasioning the death of Cassius by his imprudence at the first battle of Philippi IV. 371
- Titinius*, C. a robber, betrays the revolted slaves in Sicily into the hands of the Romans ——— III. 88
- Titius*, M. is commissioned by M. Antony to oppose Sextus Pompey IV. 411
- Pompey's reasons for not surrendering himself to him ——— 413
- Puts Pompey to death ——— 414
- Deserts Antony and goes over to Octavius ——— 423
- Titus Latinus*, by relating a dream to the Senate, occasions a repetition of the public games ——— I. 211
- Titus Tatius*, King of the Sabines, marches an army against Rome ——— I. 37
- Becomes master of the hill Saturnius and the citadel ——— 38
- His engagements with Romulus ibid.
- Concludes a peace with Romulus, and is admitted to an equal share of regal power in Rome with him ——— 40
- Forms a Sabine Council which is united to the Roman Senate ——— ibid.
- His death ——— 44
- Tolumnius*, King of the Veientes, defeated and killed ——— I. 395
- Torquatus*. See Marcius.
- Towers*, Moveable, and covered galleries for sieges, invented by Valerius Corvus ——— I. 525
- Trebonius*, C. a Roman Knight, his gallant conduct on the attack of Q. Cicero's garrison at Aduatica by the Gauls III. 653
- Besieges Marseilles for Julius Cæsar IV. 92
- The town reduced ——— 95
- Is appointed Prætor of Rome by Cæsar's influence ——— 105
- Is violently driven from his tribunal by Cælius ——— 113
- Refuses Dolabella entrance into Smyrna ——— 294
- Is put to death by Dolabella ——— ibid.
- Trebonius*, L. Tribune of the people, how he acquired the surname of Asper L. 378
- Obtains the law called Lex Trebonia to be passed, against co-optation in the election of Tribunes ——— ibid.
- Trespassee*. See Damages.
- Triarii*, among the Roman soldiery, their arms and place in battle ——— I. 517
- Triarius*, Valerius, Lucullus's Lieutenant, is defeated by Mithridates, King of Pontus ——— III. 247
- Tribes*, the first division of the Roman citizens into ——— I. 25
- Four new ones added ——— 453
- Three more added ——— 494
- Two more added ——— 551
- Two more added ——— 571, note.
- Tribunes of the People*, the first creation of, on

I N D E X.

- on the Mons Sacer — I. 132
For the chronological series of these officers, see the tables of Consular Calendar, at the conclusion of volumes II. and IV.
The nature of their office, and privileges at their first institution — 183
Acquire power of convening the people and haranguing them without interruption from the Patricians — 188
Are elected in Comitia Tributa, and their number increased to five — 282
Increased to ten — 319
The office of, suspended during the decemvirate — 332
Military Tribunes chosen — 366
Are again created on the destruction of the decemvirate — 368
Two Patricians chosen by co-optation — 378
The Lex Trebonia passed — ibid.
Propose that Plebeians should be eligible to the consulship — 382
Are made Senators — II. 544
Are deprived of their legislative power by Sylla, when perpetual Dictator III. 167
See the respective Tribunes mentioned in this history, under their proper names.
Tribunes, Military, first chosen by the Roman army on mount Aventine I. 366
Are substituted for Consuls during the disputes about admitting Plebeians to the consulship — 388
The consulship restored — 389
Are again chosen — 397
Triumph, the honour of, assumed by Romulus, on the defeat of Acron, King of Canina — I. 35
Triumvirate, the first, formed between Julius Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus III. 400
The second, formed by Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus — IV. 356
See under their proper names.
Trophies, Ancient, a description of I. 35 note i.
Tullia, Servius Tullius's daughter, her wicked intrigues with Tarquin the Proud, I. 99
Instigates him to seize the kingdom from her father — 100
Dictates the murder of her father 102
Tullus Hostilius, chosen King of Rome on the death of Numa Pompilius I. 65
Is saluted by Fuffetius, as King of Alba, on the victory of the surviving Horatius over the Curiatii — 69
Defeats the Fidenates, and punishes the treachery of the Albans — 72 Triumphs on the reduction of the Fidenates — ibid.
Reduces the Sabines, who rebelled 73
Uncertain accounts of his death ibid.
His character — 74
Tunics, a description of the several kinds of I. 85
Turenne, Viscount de, anecdote of II. 1
Turnus, story of his death — I. 11
Turpilius Silanus, the Roman Governor of Vacca, his garrison massacred by the inhabitants — III. 45
Is tried and put to death — 46
Tusculans, a body of, assist the Romans in recovering the Capitol from Herdonius I. 308
Are admitted to the privileges of Roman citizens — 474
Tusculum, the citadel of, surprised by the Aequi — I. 313
Tyburtes, declare war against Rome, and assist the Gauls — I. 490
Are subdued by the Consul M. Fabius Ambustus — 497

V.

- Vacca*, a city of Numidia, the Roman garrison there massacred by the inhabitants at the instigation of Jugurtha III. 45
Valentia, in Lusitania, by whom founded II. 511
Valeria, applies to Veturia, mother of Coriolanus, to intercede with her son in behalf of his country — I. 221
Is appointed Priestess to the temple of Woman's Fortune — 228
Valeria, her stratagem to engage the attention of the Dictator Sylla, who there upon married her III. 174, note.
Valerius, takes an oath never to favour the recall of the Tarquins, or create a King in Rome — I. 119
Opposes the solicitation of the Etrurian ambassadors, in favour of Tarquin 120
Is chosen Consul in the room of Collatinus — 125
Defeats the Tarquins — 126
Acquires the surname of Poplicola 127
See Poplicola.

Wale-

I N D E X.

- Valerius*, Admiral of the Roman fleet, his ships destroyed by the Tarentines I. 599
- Valerius*, Tribune of the people, his reply to Cato, in favour of the repeal of the Oppian law ——— II. 329
- Valerius Corvus*, M. how he acquired the surname of Corvus ——— I. 501
- Is elected Consul ——— 502
- Triumphs over the Volsci ——— 503
- Defeats the Samnites ——— 507
- Is created Dictator on occasion of the plot among the Roman soldiers at Capua ——— 511
- Reclaims them ——— 512
- Takes Cales by the invention of covered galleries ——— 525
- Is nominated Dictator, and defeats the Hetrurians ——— 566
- Defeats the Hetrurians, and lives to a great age ——— 570
- Valerius Flaccus*, L. is appointed Consul by Cinna, on the death of Marius III. 136
- Is nominated Inter rex, and procures Sylla to be created perpetual Dictator 162
- Is appointed General of the horse to Sylla 163
- Valerius*, Manius, chosen Dictator I. 168
- Appeases the tumultuous Plebeians ibid.
- Routs the Sabines ——— 169
- Resigns his office to the people 170
- His speech in the Senate on the secession of the two consular armies to the Mons Sacer ——— 173
- His speech respecting the affair of Coriolanus ——— 203
- Valerius*, P. his earnest exhortation to the Plebeians to arm for the recovery of the Capitol from Herdonius I. 507
- Is killed in the attack ——— 508
- Valerius Potitus*, L. his speech in the Senate against the tyranny of the Decemviri I. 348
- Proposes the election of a Dictator 352
- Is chosen Consul on the destruction of the Decemvirate ——— 369
- Is victorious over the Æqui and Volsci 376
- Is refused a triumph by the Senate ibid.
- Procures one from the people ——— 377
- His speech on the proposed law for admitting Plebeians to the consulship 387
- Varro*, L. and T. Pulse, two Centurions under Q. Cicero in Gaul, their extraordinary rivalry in bravery III. 639, note.
- Varinius*, P. Prætor, is several times worsted by Spartacus, the gladiator III. 195
- Varius*, Q. a Tribune, is suspected of murdering his colleague Drusus III. 108
- Obtains a law for inquiring into the cause of the revolt of the Italian allies, and suffers death in virtue of his own law 111
- Varro*, M. Pompey's Lieutenant in Spain, his oppressive treatment of the States in Cæsar's interest ——— IV. 88
- Surrenders himself to Cæsar ——— 89
- Varro*, Terentius, elected Consul II. 158
- Commands at the fatal battle of Cannæ 162
- Flies ——— 167
- Is recalled, and his reception at Rome 173
- Remarks on his conduct in this battle ibid. note.
- Is appointed Pro-consul, and sent to command an army in Apulia 182
- Varus*, Attius, is defeated in Africa by Curio ——— IV. 100
- Vatinius*, defeats Octavius in a naval engagement ——— IV. 165
- Vei*, the city of, besieged by the Romans I. 418
- A prophecy, relating to the fate of this city, occasions the Romans to consult the oracle of Delphos ——— 425
- Is sacked and taken by the Dictator Camillus ——— 428
- A partition of the land of, among the Roman people ——— 435
- Vei*, conclude an accommodation with Romulus ——— I. 45
- Revolt against Servius Tullius ——— 88
- Their King Tolumnius defeated and killed ——— 395
- See Vei.
- Vilites*, among the Roman soldiery, their arms and manner of fighting I. 518, note.
- Vulturn*, the city of, taken by Camillus in his fifth dictatorship ——— I. 483
- Is razed ——— 524
- Veneti*, revolt against the Romans, and instigate a confederacy in Celtic Gaul III. 615
- Are defeated by Julius Cæsar in a naval engagement ——— 616
- Their severe treatment by Cæsar 617
- Ventidius*, is sent by M. Antony into Syria against the Parthians IV. 384
- Defeats

I N D E X.

- Defeats and kills Labienus and Barzapharnes in two engagements 385
 Overthrows and kills Prince Pacorus 386 Triumphs — — — ibid.
Venus Genetrix, the temple of, dedicated by Julius Cæsar — — — IV. 192
Vergilius, commands Thapsus, for the Pompeian party, against Julius Cæsar IV. 177
 Surrenders the place to Cæsar on his victory over Scipio and Juba — 188
Verres, Quæstor to Papirius Carbo, takes refuge with Sylla on his return from Asia, to avoid passing his accounts III. 153 Account of his prosecution by Cicero 206, note.
 Heads of the accusation against him 208, note.
 His end — — — 210, note.
Verror, his account of the state of Rome at the time of Cicero's consulship III. 332
Vestals, the first establishment of in Rome by Numa — — — I. 55
 The nature of their office — — — 56
 Their punishment on the loss of chastity ibid.
 Instances — — — 84, 622, 633, III. 15
Vetilius, Prætor of further Spain, the Lusitanian army escape him by the artifice of Viriatus — — — II. 499
 Is defeated and killed by Viriatus 500
Vettius, a Roman Knight, account of his insurrection — — — III. 87, note.
Vettius Cato, General of the Italian allies, surprises and defeats the Roman Consul Rutilius, while his own camp is seized by Caius Marius III. 112
 Is delivered up to the Romans by his own army, but is killed by his slave 117
Vettius, Q. a Roman Knight, accuses Julius Cæsar of being concerned in Cataline's conspiracy — — — III. 380
 Convicts divers of Cataline's partisans 381
 His testimony loses credit — — — 382
 Swears a plot against Curio, who is thereupon put to death — — — 416
 Is supposed to have been poisoned by Julius Cæsar — — — 417
 Other testimonies as to this affair 418
Veturia, mother of Coriolanus, is applied to by the Roman women to intercede with her son for his country I. 221
 Vol. IV.
- Her account of her son's parting with his family — — — 222
 Leads a train of Roman Ladies to the Volscian camp — — — 223
 Her address to Coriolanus — — — 225
 Prevails on him to withdraw from Rome 228
Veturius, son of the Consul T. Veturius, complains of base usage by Plotius, his father's creditor, who is condemned to death — — — I. 596
Villius, his embassy from Rome to Antiochus, King of Syria — — — II. 342
Vindicius, a slave, discovers to Valerius a conspiracy to restore Tarquin I. 121
 Is made free and rewarded — — — 122
Virginitorix, is appointed Generalissimo of the Gauls, on their revolt against the Romans — — — III. 656
 Desolates the country to distress the Romans — — — 659
 Defends himself against a charge of treason — — — 661
 Encamps near Gergovia — — — 667
 Is attacked by Cæsar's troops, which are repulsed — — — 672
 Attacks Cæsar on his march, and is defeated — — — 678
 Suffers a second defeat — — — 679
 Enters Alesia to defend it against Cæsar ibid.
 Calls a general council of Gaulish Chiefs to furnish contingents — — — 681
 Is delivered up to Cæsar on the surrender of Alesia — — — 686
Virgil, the poet, born — — — III. 212
Virginia, the scheme contrived by Appius Claudius, the Decemvir, to get possession of her — — — I. 357
 Is protected by her lover Icilius 359
 Is killed by her father to save her honour from the violence of Appius 363
Virginus, father of Virginia, comes to Rome to protect his daughter from the violence of Appius Claudius, the Decemvir — — — I. 360
 Kills her — — — 363
 Returns to the camp, and excites the army against the Decemvirs — — — 364
 Brings the army back to Rome 365
 Proposes the creation of military Tribunes 366
 Is chosen Tribune of the people 368
 Accuses Appius Claudius before the people
 Z z z

I N D E X.

3

I N D E X.

Xantippus, a Grecian auxiliary, is appointed to the command of the Carthaginian army ——— II. 37

Defeats Regulus, and takes him prisoner ——— 38

His prudent conduct in retiring to his own country ——— 39

Xenophanes, comes to Italy to conclude a treaty with Hannibal, on the part of Philip of Macedon — II. 183

Is taken and sent to Rome ——— 184

Y.

Yoke, the punishment of being made to pass
under, explained ——— I. 71

Z.

Zama, battle of, between Scipio Africanus and Hannibal ——— II. 292

Zonaras, his account of the origin of the first Punic war ——— II. 15, note.

F I N I S.